Ontario-Quebec Conference. When the 1930s Depression brought unemployment to many members, the financial crisis was met by the union of the Ontario and the St. Lawrence conferences in 1932 as the Ontario-Quebec Conference, with a combined membership of 1,348. In 1944 the Mission du St. Laurent (St. Lawrence Mission) was set up as a separate organization, under the Canadian Union, to conduct the French language work, including not only the Gaspé Peninsula but also the whole French constituency in eastern Canada. By 1951 the portion of the Ontario Conference between the 86th and 89th meridians was added to the Manitoba-Saskatchewan Conference, but in 1960 the Ontario-Quebec Conference took back the western part of Ontario, with its churches of Port Arthur and Fort William, which had been administered previously by the Manitoba-Saskatchewan Conference.

Institutions. In 1898 two private health institutions were opened in Ontario: one a health food factory (now Kellogg's), opened by the new converts in London; the other a home for the friendless, operated by T. H. Tobinon. About 1899 Dr. C.V.S. Boettger and his wife opened a "hygienic institute" in Ottawa, which was later purchased and operated for many years by W. J. Hurdon. At Knowlton, Quebec, 70 miles (110 kilometers) from Montreal, the Canadian Sanitarium operated from 1903 to 1908. It was the first such SDA institution in Canada and the first to conduct a nursing school.

In 1884 the first church school in Canada began operation in the South Stukely church, with Mary Cushing as the first teacher. The church auditorium served as a classroom and the upstairs as a dormitory and dining room. In 1894 the Fitch Bay High School, the first SDA secondary school in Canada, opened at Fitch Bay, 25 miles (40 kilometers) from Stukely, with Carroll H. Drown as principal. The next year there were 37 students, nearly all in secondary grades. This school, in accordance with the laws of the province, received financial assistance from the Quebec government. At one time H. E. Rickard, who owned a large house in Fitch Bay, boarded as many as 25 students in his home in order that they might attend the school. In Ontario three church schools were in operation in 1899, taught respectively by Anna Nelson in the church auditorium at Selton, by Marguerite Artress above the health food factory in London, and by Cassie Cameron in Toronto.

Later Developments. It was 1943 before the membership in Ontario-Quebec passed the 2,000 mark. In the next 20 years the membership almost doubled. New congregations were organized in the Niagara Peninsula at Niagara Falls and Welland. In Toronto and vicinity new churches sprang up after the erection of the North York Branson Hospital in Willowdale. During the 1950s much time was devoted to the foreign-speaking population in Toronto and other centers. In 1963, in addition to the Ukrainian church established earlier, there were Yugoslavian-, Japanese-, Estonian-, and German-speaking congregations. In the north of Ontario new churches were organized in Haileybury and Sault Ste. Marie. During this same 20-year period many new, more representative, and better church buildings were either erected or purchased. Two youth camps were acquired: Camp Frenda in South River, Ontario, through the generosity of Fred and Brenda Hosking; and Cloud Lake, 29 miles (50 kilometers) southwest of Fort William, Ontario, donated by Donald and Edith McDonald.

During the late 1960s and early 1970s the membership grew very rapidly, passing the 5,000, 6,000, and 7,000 figures. In addition to the English-speaking work, progress was made among the Portuguese, Korean, Filipino, and Spanish people. In the Toronto area several large non-SDA churches were purchased, having a seating capacity from 500 to 800. These have now been largely filled with members, the membership in Toronto during the past five years having increased from under 2,000 to nearly 4,000 members. In 1971 the English-speaking organized churches and members residing in the province of Quebec became a part of the Quebec Seventh-day Adventist Church Association, and the conference once again became the Ontario Conference rather than the Ontario-Quebec Conference, thus dealing with members in Ontario rather than in the combined provinces.

In 1972 a new cafeteria-chapel-women's dormitory complex was built on the campus of Kingsway College at a cost of approximately $1 million. This has added greatly to the facilities provided and was the first major educational building, apart from an industrial building, added to the campus in many years.

The North York Branson Hospital has provided considerable work opportunities for many people in the northern section of Toronto.

Open and Shut Door

OPEN AND SHUT DOOR. An expression derived from Rev. 3:7, 8, where Christ is described as the one “that openeth, and no man shutteth; and shutteth, and no man openeth” (an allusion to Isa. 22:22), and as the one who says to the Philadelphia church, “Behold, I have set before thee an open door, and no man can shut it.” Seventh-day Adventists have applied these texts to the closing of the first phase and the opening of the second and final phase of Christ’s ministry in heaven, where He has been the Christian’s high priest since His sacrifice on the cross (see Sanctuary). Christ’s dual ministry was prefigured by the service of the ancient high priest, who served “unto the example and shadow of heavenly things” (Heb. 8:5). In the earthly sanctuary he served daily in the holy place, the first apartment of the sanctuary, and once a year in the Most Holy Place, the inner shrine where was the golden ark in which were the tables of the Ten Commandments and over which appeared the visible glory of God. This entering into the Holy of Holies took place on the Day of Atonement in the ceremony of the cleansing of the sanctuary (Lev. 16).

In applying the type to Christ, Ellen White declared: “Then Jesus rose up and shut the door in the holy place, and opened the door in the Most Holy, and passed within the Second Veil, where He now stands by the ark; and where the faith of Israel now reaches. I saw that Jesus had shut the door in the holy place, and no man can open it; and that He had opened the door in the Most Holy and no man can shut it: (Rev. 3:7, 8); and that since Jesus has opened the door into the Most Holy Place, which contains the ark, the commandments have been shining out to God’s people, and they are being tested on the Sabbath question” (Present Truth 1:21, August 1849; also EW 42).

This application corrected, not immediately but eventually, a misunderstanding of the “shut door” of the parable of the wise and foolish virgins—a misconception that had been derived from the Millerite movement of 1844.

The Millerites had based their expectation of the return of Christ principally on Daniel’s prophecy of the cleansing of the sanctuary at the end of 2300 prophetic days (Dan. 8:14). At the climax of the movement, in 1844, they specifically connected this prophecy with the purification ceremony of the ancient Day of Atonement as typifying the ending of Christ’s mediation for sins (though they saw the cleansing of the sanctuary as the purging of the earth in the final fires). At the same time they gave increased and specific emphasis to the prophetic parable of the wise and foolish virgins (Matt. 25).

William Miller had likened his message of the expected Second Advent to the “midnight cry” of the parable (“Behold, the bridegroom cometh”), and had emphasized the point that the wise virgins, who were ready to meet the arriving bridegroom, entered with him into the wedding, where the door was shut after them, leaving the tardy foolish virgins outside. The virgins he interpreted as those summoned to meet the returning Lord; the wedding, the eternal kingdom, from which the unready would be forever excluded. “The door was shut,” he said, “implies the closing up of the mediatorial kingdom, and finishing the gospel period” (William Miller, Evidence . . . of the Second Coming of Christ [1840], p. 237).

Unlike most others who were then looking for the near advent of Christ (see Premillennialism), the Millerites placed strong emphasis on the doctrine that at the coming of Christ every human being would be either ready or unready to meet Him, and that opportunity for salvation would then cease. This in theological parlance was called the close of human probation. The Millerites taught “that the notion of a probation after Christ’s coming is a lure to destruction, entirely contrary to the Word of God, which positively teaches that when Christ comes the door is shut, and such as are not ready can never enter in” (“Boston Second Advent Conference,” The Signs of the Times 3:69, June 1, 1842; reprinted in SB, no. 1083).

Because they expected Christ to return at the close of the 2300 prophetic days, they had emphasized the close of probation at the end of that period. Therefore, for a short period after the disappointment of October 1844, Miller and many others thought that their work for the world was done, that there was only a little “tarrying time” left—perhaps but a few days or months—until Christ would come. In December 1844 Miller wrote: “We have done our work in warning sinners, and in trying to awake a formal church. God, in his providence has shut the door, we can only stir one another up to be patient; and be diligent to make our calling and election sure. We are now living in the time specified by Malachi iii:18, also Daniel xii:10, and Rev. xxii:10—12. In this passage we cannot help but see, that a little while before Christ should come, there would be a separation between the just and unjust, the righteous and wicked, between those who love his appearing, and those who hate it. And never since the days of the apostles, has there been such a division line drawn as was drawn about the 10th or 23rd day of the 7th Jewish month” (William Miller letter, in Advent Herald, Dec. 11, 1844, p. 142; reprinted in Western Midnight Cry 4:25, Dec. 21, 1844).

Others expressed themselves similarly at first. But J. V. Himes, Miller’s most prominent colleague, and others held that since Christ had not come, the 2300—day prophetic period must not have ended in 1844; that it must extend to some other date in the future, and therefore that the fulfillment of the “midnight cry” of the parable of the virgins was also still future; and that the October 1844 movement (see Seventh-Month Movement) was a mistake, and was not a fulfillment of prophecy. By the spring of 1845 the main Millerite group, including Miller, had come to this view. This group, still possessed of the idea that the “door” of the parable of the virgins was none other than the “door of salvation,” argued thus: Since Christ has not come, the door of salvation is still open; therefore, the parable of the virgins has not yet met fulfillment. They concluded that anyone who taught that this parable had been fulfilled must believe that probation had ended, and must, therefore, be ipso facto a “no-mercy” heretic. The phrase “shut door” became an epithet.

But a minority continued to hold that the time had been correct; that the mistake had been in the nature of the prophetic fulfillment; that in October 1844 the 2300 days had ended in the symbolic Day of Atonement and the parable had been fulfilled (though not in the way that they had expected); and therefore that the door of the parable—whatever it might mean—had been shut in fulfillment of the prophecy. To them the phrase “shut door” was equivalent to the affirmation of belief that the “true midnight cry” had been the climax of a God-given message and the 1844 movement had been led of God and permitted, in His providence, as a test of their consecration and willingness to be ready to meet their Lord. Naturally these regarded the majority, who had given up “the time,” as turning their backs on the truth and denying the Lord’s leading in the “midnight cry.”

Some continued to hold—as Miller had taught—that the door was that of salvation, for they still expected Christ to return very shortly. As time passed, some held that it was the door of “access” to listeners—that obstinate and willful individuals had closed their ears to God’s message for that day; in either case there was no chance of winning acceptance of their message by the world at that time. The unfortunate controversy over the “shut door” magnified the subject unduly and prolonged the misunderstanding. As might be expected, feelings ran high in this time of disillusionment and confusion.

The extremists on the shut-door doctrine declared that Christ had come, not literally, but “spiritually” (see [Spiritualism \[1\]](#)). But the small group that formed the nucleus of the future Seventh-day Adventist Church opposed alike the vagaries of those who declared that Christ had come spiritually and the position of the majority who “denied their past experience” in the 1844 movement. They retained their confidence in the 1844 fulfillment, and concluded that the mistake lay in the event they had expected.

They accepted the explanation of the Disappointment that was first advanced by Hiram Edson on the day after the Disappointment, namely, that the ministry of Christ as our high priest in the heavenly sanctuary had not ended with the 2300 days, but had entered another phase, as symbolized (1) by the high priest’s entry into the Holy of Holies, the beginning of the symbolic cleansing of the sanctuary, and (2) by the coming of the bridegroom to the wedding (not to the earth); and that the end of this phase, symbolized by the priest’s coming out of the sanctuary and the bridegroom’s return from the wedding (Luke 12:36), was yet to come, and would be followed by the Second Advent.

Their retention of the belief in the 1844 ending of the 2300 days and their separating of the Second Advent from that prophetic period saved them from the error to which the majority group was susceptible—that of seeking future dates for the end. But it left them with the dilemma of either accepting the no-mercy doctrine or correcting their view of the “shut door” from the initial Millerite definition of it. They gradually came to see the opening of the final phase of Christ’s ministry as the shutting of the door of the holy place and the opening of the door to the Holy of Holies—the opening of a new message of the Sabbath, and the opening of a broadened ministry to the world preceding the Second Advent. But this took time.

It is interesting to trace the steps by which the little groups that later became the Seventh-day Adventists moved out of the shut-door dilemma and solved the double problem: (1) Is the door shut? and (2) What is the door?

Ellen G. Harmon (later White) was accused of claiming divine revelation for the no-mercy doctrine. This she denied. She stated later: “With my brethren and sisters, after the time passed in forty-four I did believe no more sinners would be converted. But I never had a vision that no more sinners would be converted. . . . I was shown that there was a great work to be done in the world for those who had not had the light and rejected it. Our brethren could not understand this with our faith in the immediate appearing of Christ” (letter 2, 1874, in ISM 74).

Her first vision (December 1844) portrayed the “Advent people” journeying along a path to the Holy City with the light of the “midnight cry” behind them, and entering the city at the Second Advent. This, to those who accepted it, meant reassurance that the 1844 message and movement had not been a delusion; or to put it another way, that the 2300 days had ended and the parable, with its “shut door,” had been fulfilled, and that very shortly they would see their Lord, who was delaying His appearance to test their faith.

Her view in February 1845 was in agreement with Edson’s explanation—Christ, the high priest, going from the holy place to the Most Holy Place, within the veil, explained as His going to receive the kingdom after which He would “return from the wedding” to receive His waiting ones at the Second Advent. In 1847 she connected this entering of the Holy of Holies with the shutting of the door.

Thus both Hiram Edson and Ellen Harmon taught that Christ’s work in the sanctuary had not ended, but was continuing in another phase. However, they thought that this phase would represent only a brief period.

When in 1848 she described a vision depicting the future SDA publications as “streams of light that went clear round the world,” the little group could not comprehend that there was either the time or the possibility for them to bear a message to the world at large.

In 1849 Ellen White had a vision of the heavenly sanctuary that further depicted the significance of the “open and shut door,” in connection with the Sabbath message and in connection with Rev. 3:7, 8 (see extract quoted near the beginning of this article). The shutting of one door meant the opening of another.

In 1850 James White reported the accession of one man who “had made no public profession of religion” before 1845. By the next year there was a noticeable change. In April, White stated that the door was shut to “those who had heard the everlasting gospel message and rejected it,” but he held that the following classes may be converted: (1) “erring brethren” in the Laodicean church (the majority group of ex-Millerites), (2) children now coming to the age of accountability, and (3) “hidden souls” compared with the biblical “seven thousand” who had “not bowed unto Baal” (1 Kings 19:18), who would be converted in the future “in His own time,” when they hear the message; but at present, he said, the message was for those in the Laodicean church (editorial note in Review and Herald 1:64, Apr. 7, 1851).

In September he reported some converts from this third class. In December G. W. Holt, a fellow minister in New York, wrote that “in some places where but a few months since there was seemingly no sign of there being one child of God, they are now springing up.” The next February White reported “many,” and by May “a large portion,” of those who had had no connection with the 1844 movement. These accessions seem to have changed the picture. White wrote in February, setting forth a new view of the “shut door”: “It however represents an important event with which the church is connected, that was to occur prior to our Lord’s return from the wedding. That event shuts out none of the honest children of God, neither those who have not wickedly rejected the light of truth, and the influence of the Holy Spirit” (editorial note 1 in Review and Herald 2:94, Feb. 17, 1852).

After quoting Isa. 22:22 and Rev. 3:7, 8 on the shut and open door, he continued: “This Open Door we teach, and invite those who have an ear to hear, to come to it and find salvation through Jesus Christ. There is an exceeding glory in the view that Jesus has OPENED THE DOOR into the holiest of all.

... If it be said that we are of the OPEN DOOR and seventh day Sabbath theory, we shall not object; for this is our faith” (ibid. 95).

Oppegard, Ole

OPPEGARD, OLE (1846—1934). Pioneer Seventh-day Adventist missionary in Argentina. He was born in Christiania, Norway, and educated in a military school. Without entering the armed services, he emigrated to the United States at the age of 25. There he became an SDA and after some training at Battle Creek College, went to Argentina in 1895 as a self-supporting worker and began to canvass among the Scandinavian settlers there. During the next 30 years he worked as a pastor and evangelist throughout the country, but mainly in and around Buenos Aires. In 1899 he married Lydia Greene, who for many years had assisted him in his work and at the same time served as editor at the Buenos Aires Publishing House. He retired from the active work only eight or nine years before his death at the age of 88 at his home near Buenos Aires.

Orangewood Adventist Academy

ORANGEWOOD ADVENTIST ACADEMY. A coeducational day school on the senior high school level, operated at Garden Grove, California, by the churches of Orange County (Southeastern California Conference).

Orangewood Academy traces its history back to the Centralia church school, which is believed to be the first Seventh-day Adventist church school in the state of California. The leading promoter in establishing the Centralia school in 1896 was Milton Henry Shirley, a local elder of the first church in Centralia. He was a teacher who in 1891 had come from the Dakotas, and shortly after arriving had joined the SDA Church. The first teacher was Carrie Hacker (1896—1897). According to Alma McKibbin, the second teacher, there were 30 pupils in nine grades, and the school day was from 8:00 a.m. to 5:00 p.m., or even later. Because there were no textbooks, all the lessons were written out on the blackboard. The school was held in a small unfinished room at the back of the Centralia church. Other church schools operated intermittently in the area, notably the Santa Ana church school, which, however, remained open continuously from 1910 to 1944. In 1944 under the leadership of Wilton O. Baldwin, educational superintendent of the Southeastern California Conference, the first union school was established in Orange County on Valencia Drive in Fullerton. Known as Valencia Junior Academy, it operated until 1956.

Early in 1950, 10 acres (four hectares) of land were purchased at 13732 Clinton Avenue, Garden Grove, in the center of north Orange County, on which was built an enlarged junior academy. In 1956 it opened with 243 students in 10 grades, with a good music department. Early in 1959 two more churches were added to the constituency of the school. The constituency now consists of 16 churches in Orange County, with a membership of approximately 6,300.

Under the supervision of Lester E. Park, plans were drawn up for a senior academy, and a unit accommodating 250 students was erected. In January 1961, grades 9 through 11 moved into the new facilities, leaving the old junior academy classrooms for the elementary school.

In September 1961 Orangewood Academy was established as a full senior academy, with an opening enrollment of 115, and graduated its first senior class, consisting of 23 members, in 1962.

Additions to the academy since 1967 are a new gymnasium, a 600-seat auditorium, five new classrooms, shower-locker facilities, and shop.

Ordination

ORDINATION. The act by which the church sets apart an individual for a special function in the church by prayer and the laying on of hands. Three categories of church workers are ordained—ministers, church elders, and deacons (see Church Elder; Deacon; Minister).

Ministers. Candidates for ordination must be male and church members who not only live consistent Christian lives but also are experienced in church work and have demonstrated confidence in the leadership of the church. Women also serve as ministers, but without ordination. At the 1990 session the General Conference stated that “we do not approve ordination of women to the gospel ministry,” but did allow women to continue serving as pastors according to division policy.

The North American Division reserves three functions for the ordained minister only: organizing a church; uniting churches; ordaining local elders and deacons (NAD Working Policy [1994—1995], p. 313).

Before ordination there is a careful examination of the candidate, covering such features as the candidate’s present personal religious experience, the Scriptures, his acquaintance with and full acceptance of the fundamental teachings of the Seventh-day Adventist Church, and his attitude toward denominational organization. Three ministers are customarily chosen before the service to take the leading parts: the ordination prayer, the charge, and the welcome. If other ordained ministers are present at the meeting, they are invited to take part in the ordination.

After a brief sermon on the high calling and responsibilities of the minister, the conference president presents the candidate, referring briefly to his past service. The ministers present then kneel about the candidate while one of them offers the ordination prayer. As the one offering the prayer speaks of the laying on of hands, the kneeling ministers place their hands upon the candidate’s head.

After the prayer a charge, or declaration of the sacredness and responsibility of the work of the minister, is given, after which words of welcome are spoken to the candidate. The ordained minister performs many functions, among which are to: preach, baptize, conduct the Lord’s Supper, perform the marriage ceremony, organize churches, unite churches, and ordain local elders and deacons.

Local Elders and Deacons. Church elders (not to be confused with ordained ministers, to whom SDAs in the United States commonly apply the title of Elder) and deacons of local churches, elected by the local church, are usually ordained in a simple ceremony during the church service on Sabbath. An ordained minister must be in charge.

At the ordination the minister reads appropriate passages of Scripture (such as 1 Tim. 3:1—7, for elders; 1 Tim. 3:8—13, for deacons). The candidate and the minister then kneel, and the minister prays, asking God to approve the choice of the church in the election of the candidate, to accept the candidate’s consecration as the candidate is set apart to the work entrusted to him or her, and to make him or her a wise steward, a faithful leader, and a blessing and example to the community. As the minister speaks of consecration and the laying on of hands, he places his hands on the head of the candidate. After the prayer the minister clasps the candidate's hand with a word of blessing. Once ordained, a local elder need not be reordained again upon reelection, or if he is subsequently chosen to be a deacon. Likewise, a deacon need not be reordained if he is reelected; however, if he is chosen to be an elder, he must be ordained as an elder. The 1975 Spring Meeting of the General Conference Committee voted "that the way be opened for women elected to serve as deaconesses in our churches to be ordained to this office and that the Church Manual Committee be requested to give study to a statement of the qualifications of deaconesses and suggestions in regard to a suitable ordination service" (p. 153). To date, however, the church has not seen fit to allow women to be ordained as deaconesses.

Ordination qualifies the local elder to conduct the Communion service in the church of which he or she is an elder. However, "in the absence of an ordained pastor, the elder shall request the president of the conference or local field to arrange for the administration of the rite of baptism to those desiring to unite with the church" (Church Manual [1990], p. 59).

Development of SDA Practice. In the early days of the SDA Church there seems to have been little need for ordaining new ministers, since most of the congregations were small and most of the ministers had already been ordained in the churches to which they had formerly belonged. At first there was considerable opposition to any form of church organization (see Organization).

However, the need for some form of church organization, and especially for a ministry ordained by the church, became increasingly apparent when certain self-appointed preachers refused to cooperate with the responsible leaders of the movement, claiming "'liberty to do as they pleased,' to 'preach what they pleased,' and to 'go when and where they pleased'" (J. N. Loughborough, The Church, Its Organization, Order, and Discipline, p. 101). To cope with this situation James White wrote an article entitled "Gospel Order," which appeared in a series of installments in the Review and Herald in December 1853. This article advocated strongly "that men who are called of God to teach and baptize should be ordained or set apart to the work of the ministry by the laying on of hands" (Review and Herald 4:189, Dec. 20, 1853), but it appears that even before it was published, White and some of the other leaders of the movement were already practicing ordination, for at a meeting held at New Haven, Vermont, in the autumn of 1853, "the wants of the cause were considered. And it was decided that there were those present that should be ordained to the work of the gospel ministry. . . . At 1 o'clock at night we adjourned to 8 o'clock in the morning, when the subject of ordination was again taken up. And it was the unanimous expression of all present that our dear Brn. J. N. Andrews, A. S. Hutchins, and C. W. Sperry should be set apart to the work of the ministry (that they might feel free to administer the ordinances of the church of God) by prayer and the laying on of hands" (ibid. 4:148, Nov. 15, 1853).

Even before this, it appears, Washington Morse had been ordained by the church, although whether the ordination occurred in 1851 or 1852 is not quite clear from extant sources. According to the Review and Herald, July 1851, at a meeting held by G. W. Holt, "Bro. Morse," presumably Washington Morse, was "set apart by the laying on of hands, to the administration of the ordinances of God's house" (ibid. 2:15, Aug. 19, 1851). It is not certain whether this ordination admitted him to the ministry or permitted him to function only in the administration of the Lord's Supper. According to his own account, written some years later, he was ordained to the ministry in 1852 (ibid. 65:643, Oct. 16, 1888). But it is possible that he had forgotten the precise date. The first ordination service for deacons among SDAs occurred a short time later. Frederick Wheeler, another prominent SDA leader, presented the subject of gospel order to the Dartmouth and Fairhaven, Massachusetts, SDAs, and laying on of hands, he proceeded to “set apart” “two brethren, one in Fairhaven and one in Dartmouth, to act the part of ‘deacons,’ as denominated in the Bible” (ibid. 4:199, Dec. 27, 1853).

Early the next year ordination services for deacons were held at Sylan and Jackson, Michigan, and Metomen, Wisconsin, and before long the ordaining of deacons was an established practice in all SDA churches. But it soon became evident to the leaders of the SDA movement that someone would have to look after spiritual interests of the churches in the absence of an ordained minister. In August 1854, Joseph Bates, one of the most prominent leaders of the Sabbathkeeping Adventists, suggested local elders as the solution of this problem. An installment in an article by J. B. Frisbie in the Review and Herald of June 26, 1856, entitled “Church Order” outlines the duty of such elders, showing that the practice of ordaining local church elders was by then an established practice among SDA congregations.

The 1974 Annual Council of the General Conference Committee opened the way for women to be ordained as local elders: “To request the President’s Executive Advisory to also arrange for further study of the election of women to local church offices which require ordination and that division committees exercise discretion in any special cases that may arise before a definitive position has been adopted” (Annual Council Actions [1974], p. 14).

Divisions then began cautiously allowing women to be ordained as local elders. A definitive position was voted at the 1984 Annual Council: “To advise each division that it is free to make provision as it may deem necessary for the election and ordination of women as local church elders” (ibid. [1984], p. 56). More than 1,000 women serve as elders in the North American Division, and many more serve other divisions of the world.

Biblical Reasons for SDA Practice: The practice of setting individuals apart for a special work by the laying on of hands has a biblical basis. For example:

“The Lord said unto Moses, Take thee Joshua the son of Nun, a man in whom is the spirit, and lay thine hand upon him; and set him before . . . all the congregation; and give him a charge in their sight” (Num. 27:18, 19; cf. Num. 8:10, 11).

And Luke records: “The Holy Ghost said, Separate me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them. And when they had fasted and prayed, and laid their hands on them, they sent them away” (Acts 13:2, 3; cf. Acts 6:6; 1 Tim. 4:14; 5:22; 2 Tim. 1:6; Titus 1:5).

The word “ordain” does not appear in the Greek New Testament. The word “ordain” that appears in the King James Version actually translates a number of Greek words, including poieō, “appointed” (Mark 3:14); ginomai, “to become, select” (Acts 1:22); tithēmi, “appointed, place, set” (1 Tim. 2:7); kathistēmi, “cause to be, appoint” (Titus 1:5); cheirotoneō, “stretch out the hand, appoint” (Acts 14:23). The English word “ordain” has a Latin root, ordinare, which derives from Roman law, which conveys the idea of a special status or a group distinct from ordinary people. That is why most modern versions do not use the word “ordain”—it does not give an accurate translation of the original meaning.

The doctrine of spiritual gifts (as taught in Rom. 12:4—8; 1 Cor. 12:1—28; Eph. 4:8, 11—16; Acts 6:1—7; 1 Peter 4:10, 11) teaches that God gives gifts for service to all without respect to race or gender. Included among those gifts are those of evangelist, prophet, teacher, and pastor.

In harmony with the New Testament custom, SDAs appoint ministers, who, like the apostles and evangelists of the early church, look after the general interests of the church; and elders (also called “presbyters,” or “bishops” in the New Testament) and deacons, who, like their New Testament prototypes, look, respectively, after the spiritual and temporal interests of the local congregation to which they belong.

History

History. Beginnings of the Work in the Area. The Seventh-day Adventist doctrines first reached Oregon through the pages of the Review and Herald. As early as 1870 the McChord family of Oregon City are mentioned as having accepted the Sabbath message as a result of reading that journal.

In response to Ellen White's urging "that missionary labor must be put forth in California, Australia, Oregon, and other territories," Isaac D. Van Horn was sent to the Northwest. After spending some time in Washington Territory and organizing a church in Milton, Oregon (now in the Upper Columbia Conference), he came to the Willamette Valley as the first SDA minister to work in the territory of the present Oregon Conference. Arriving at Oregon City on May 10, 1876, he stayed at the McChord home while holding meetings in a large tent. A company was organized at Oregon City. Then Van Horn moved the tent to Salem (then the largest city in the Northwest, with a population of 6,000) in July 1876. After two months of meetings, with attendances running as high as 700, there were some 30 converts. On Jan. 14, 1877, Van Horn organized a church of 35 members at Salem, the first church to be established in the present Oregon Conference. On May 12 of that year he ordained Thomas Starbuck, one of the new converts, as elder of the Salem church. On Oct. 13, 14, 1877, J. N. Loughborough attended a general meeting at Salem and helped to conduct the first Communion service in that city.

Not long after the Salem church was organized, the pastor of the local Congregational church, O. A. Dickinson, accepted the SDA faith. He later became treasurer of the conference and served as such until his death in 1893. In 1877 Van Horn also organized a church at Eola, with eight members, and held tent meetings in The Dalles and Portland, although no churches were formed in those towns at the time of his evangelism there.

North Pacific Conference (1877—1902). Five churches and six unorganized bodies in Oregon and Washington Territory, with a total of about 200 members, were organized into the North Pacific Conference, Oct. 25—29, 1877.

I. D. Van Horn was elected president; his wife, Adelia, secretary; and Alonzo T. Jones, treasurer. There were two churches in what is the present Oregon Conference (Salem, 35 members and Eola, eight members) and six companies (Jefferson, 12 members; Silverton, five; Beaverton, seven; Portland, 20; Oregon City, four; and Carrollton, Washington Territory, five), with a total membership of 96. In 1880 the portions of Washington and Oregon east of the Cascade Mountains became part of the new Upper Columbia Conference, and in 1886 British Columbia was added to the North Pacific Conference.

The first SDA camp meeting in Oregon was held in 1878 three miles (five kilometers) north of Salem. J. N. Loughborough and Ellen White were guest speakers at this meeting.

In 1879 the James Bunch family left Walla Walla, Washington, to settle at Coquille, Oregon, where they built sawmills and engaged in commerce, all the while spreading the SDA faith along the coast. This family was successful in establishing several churches and church schools.

From 1880 to 1885 interest developed in the Beaverton area, where a church building was erected, the first to be built and owned by Seventh-day Adventists in western Oregon. Also during this time, A. T. Jones organized a church in Damascus.

The first elementary church school in the Portland area was situated at 10th and E. Ankeny streets in 1885, and was taught by Carrie Mills. In 1888 the North Pacific Academy opened in Portland at NE. 19th and Pacific streets, with T. H. Starbuck as principal. It was closed when Walla Walla College opened in 1892.

Western Oregon Conference (1902—1932). In 1902 Western Washington and British Columbia were made separate conferences, and what was left of the North Pacific Conference was reorganized as the Western Oregon Conference (territory: Oregon west of the summit of the Cascade Mountains and Wasco and Klamath counties east of the range). Francis M. Burg was elected president. Also in 1902 land was secured at 60th and Belmont streets and a wooden building erected, which later developed into the Portland Sanitarium and Hospital.

In 1900 the Portland Central church (built in 1893—1894 at NE. 11th Avenue and Everett Street on property donated by Mrs. Josephine Gotzian) opened a church school in its basement. Four years later, in 1904, construction was begun on Laurelwood Academy, 25 miles (40 kilometers) southwest of Portland, in Oregon.

In 1910 the Western Oregon Conference was reduced in size by the formation of the Southern Oregon Conference (see next section).

In 1912 M. N. Doremus donated a site for the erection of a school on NE. 44th Street, near Burnside in Portland. The Doremus Union School served the Portland area until its facilities became inadequate. In 1927 the Portland Junior Academy was built at 49th and Couch streets. In 1962 these facilities were left to the Portland Union Grade School, while Portland Union Academy moved to a new school plant at 1500 SE. 96th Avenue.

From 1878 to the present, a camp meeting has been held each year in the conference. The meetings were held in various places (Salem, Cornelius, Beaverton, Corvallis, Woodburn, Forest Grove, Hillsboro, and most often Portland) until in 1930 the Chautauqua grounds at Gladstone were purchased as a permanent camp meeting site. This site, acquired largely through the generosity of Dr. William B. Holden, provided space for approximately 1,600 tents and cabins. Subsequent construction of a major building provided meeting space, a commercial kitchen, and guest rooms.

In 1920 two counties in southern Washington—Clark and Skamania, with eight churches and 362 members—were added to the territory of the Western Oregon Conference. In this area were three church schools, the largest of which was the 12-grade school at Meadow Glade, near Battle Ground, with an enrollment of 80 (which in 1921 became the present Columbia Adventist Academy).

Southern Oregon Conference (1910—1932). In 1910 the part of the state lying west of the summit of the Cascade Mountains and south of the north boundary of Lane County, also the county of Klamath lying east of those mountains, was separated from the Western Oregon Conference and organized as the Southern Oregon Conference. F. S. Bunch was the first president. Headquarters were at Roseburg, Oregon, later at Sutherlin, and then in Eugene. By 1917 the two Oregon conferences had a total of 55 churches, with a membership of 3,259 served by 14 ordained ministers. The tithe for 1917 totaled $63,817.22.

Oregon Conference (1932). As an economy measure, when the financial depression of the 1930s struck, the Southern and Western Oregon conferences were reunited in 1932 under the name Oregon Conference. By 1937 churches in the Oregon Conference numbered 81, with membership of 7,788. By 1960 there were 108 churches and 14,836 members, with 58 ordained ministers.

In 1952 a new conference office building was erected in Portland at 39th Avenue and Washington Street. Milo Adventist Academy in southern Oregon opened in 1955. In 1962 a site for a new youth camp was secured on Big Lake, 90 miles (145 kilometers) east of Salem, in the Cascade Mountains.

Together with these improvements, 52 new church buildings were erected from 1954 to 1974; 40 new church schools were built, and 33 Dorcas Welfare centers were established in various centers.

In 1981 the conference office moved to a larger site in Clackamas, a Portland suburb.

Laurelwood Adventist Academy closed in 1985. It was subsequently sold to private interests, who reopened the campus as Laurelwood Mission Training Center. The academy became a day school in 1977 when the dormitories were torn down.

After several years of unsuccessfully trying to sell the Gladstone campground, church members approved a master plan for redevelopment of the property. The first step, as mandated by local authorities, was the 1993 removal of all cabins and tent frames. Additional improvements were scheduled as funds became available.

Organization, Development of, in the Seventh-day Adventist Church

ORGANIZATION, DEVELOPMENT OF, IN THE SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH. A system of church government or polity is essential for directing the affairs of the church in an orderly manner. Organization functions to preserve the identity of a church society, to maintain purity of doctrine, to discipline members, to direct concerted efforts, and to care for the temporal as well as the spiritual existence of the church.

The Seventh-day Adventist form of church government came to have characteristics of several systems—particularly the congregational, with its emphasis on local church authority, the presbyterian, which provides for government by elected representatives; and in some points the Methodist, in that it has conferences as organizational units and in that the conference assigns ministers to the local churches. However, these features were not conscious imitations, but grew out of the situations and needs of the developing SDA groups.

I. Formation of Seventh-day Adventist Church.

I. Formation of Seventh-day Adventist Church. 1. Factors Leading to Organization. There was considerable opposition to church organization among many of the SDA pioneers, an attitude that may be traced to their having come from the Millerite movement. This movement had not been organized as a sect or denomination, though many of the Adventists in 1844 were forced by conscience or by expulsion to separate from the churches that opposed them. Millerites tended to look with marked disfavor on any form of organization; the only bond of unity among those who were expecting the imminent return of Christ was to be found in a common faith. But after the 1844 disappointment that bond was weakened by divergent views on prophetic fulfillment and the Sabbath.

At first it was largely the strong leadership of such pioneers as James White, Ellen White, and Joseph Bates that held together the scattered Sabbathkeeping Adventists. However, with the rapid increase in the number of adherents in the 1850s, several problems arose that brought into sharp focus the need of the church for a name and a corporate existence: the legal problems of holding church property and other assets (originally owned by individuals); the growing need for selecting, directing, and supporting a ministry; and the necessity of controlling personal ambition, fanaticism, and offshoot movements. The ordination of ministers was not an immediate problem among Sabbathkeeping Adventists, because the first ministers had been already ordained; what caused concern in the 1850s was the problem of self-appointed preachers who went out with more zeal than ability and consecration, and without being responsible to any church body—for the Sabbathkeeping Adventists had no organized church body.

2. Beginnings of Local Church Organization. As early as the autumn of 1851, in gatherings of Sabbathkeeping Adventists in New England, White and others preached on “gospel order, and perfect union,” and in some of these meetings actions were taken—disfellowshipping a member, choosing deacons (see Review and Herald 2:52, Nov. 25, 1851).

Already in the preceding July at a similar meeting held by G. W. Holt, “Bro. Morse,” presumably G. W. Morse, was “set apart by the laying on of hands, to the administration of the ordinances of God’s house” (ibid. 2:15, Aug. 19, 1851).

A strong plea for “Gospel Order” (that is, church organization based on NT models) was made by Ellen White in the fall of 1853 (published in 1854; see EW 97—101), after she and her husband, James White, attended conferences in New York State and New England, where they encountered strife and disunion. James White wrote on the same subject in a series of editorials in the Review and Herald during December 1853. He declared that while “God has been leading His people out of Babylon,” there were many of the Adventist brethren who have “been in a more perfect Babylon than ever before. Gospel order has been too much overlooked by them” (Review and Herald 4:173, Dec. 6, 1853). He advocated a fully qualified ministry, men ordained by the laying on of hands, which of itself would require unity and cooperation (ibid. 4:189, Dec. 20, 1853). Finally, the church members should support this ministry by their prayers and their means (ibid. 4:196, 197, Dec. 27, 1853).

One of the initial steps toward organization was the giving of cards of recommendation, signed by “leading ministers,” to preachers who had proved their ministry and who were in harmony with the program of the church. The card given to J. N. Loughborough in 1853 was signed “in behalf of the church,” by James White and Joseph Bates.

There had been some rudimentary church organization before on the local church level. As early as 1851 the Washington, New Hampshire, group of Sabbathkeeping Adventists had selected “a committee of seven . . . (see Acts vi) to attend to the wants of the poor” (ibid. 2:52, Nov. 25, 1851). In the same issue with White’s closing editorial on “gospel order” there is a report of the choosing of two deacons, one at Fairhaven, and the other at Dartmouth, Massachusetts (ibid. 4:199, Dec. 27, 1853). In the next issue Cornell tells of the Sylvan and Jackson churches in Michigan having each acquired a deacon (ibid. 5:7, Jan. 24, 1854).

In subsequent issues there are various reports of church meetings or area conferences at which individuals were disfellowshipped, deacons chosen, or ministers ordained. White remarked in May 1854 that “the brethren in Michigan have taken hold of the subject of Gospel Order in good earnest” (ibid. 5:142, May 23, 1854).

Church elders seem to have been a later development. In August 1854 Bates wrote an article on “Church Order” in which he emphasized the fact that Paul instructed Titus to “ordain elders in every city” (Titus 1:5), and cited 1 Tim. 5:17 to point out that there were two kinds of elders: those who rule, and those “who labor in the Word and doctrine.” He argued that “church order and unity” existed in the apostolic church, that it had been “deranged” by the great apostasy, and that it was to be restored by the church of the last days (ibid. 6:22, 23, Aug. 29, 1854). Then, in the second installment of a two-part article entitled “Church Order,” J. B. Frisbie, of Battle Creek, mentions local elders as functioning in the New Testament churches. Two weeks later White responded affirmatively to a question from John Byington as to whether elders and deacons should be appointed in every church where suitable men were available. White spoke of “disorderly spirits” who scorn “order in the Church of God,” and those who “talk loudly of coming out of Babylon, who carry a perfect Babel of confusion” with them. What he advocated was not “the weak and imperfect systems of men,” but the “perfect system of order, set forth in the New Testament” (ibid. 6:164, Jan.

23, 1855). His request for “a free expression on this subject” elicited no discussion in the Review. Apparently the idea of local church officers being elected by the membership had taken firm root.

The increase in membership in the middle 1850s, resulting in part from the use of large tents for evangelistic meetings, raised the question of the support of ministers. In 1859 the system of “systematic benevolence” was introduced, which resulted in another step in local church organization—the appointment of treasurers.

3. The Question of Denominational Identity. The practice of issuing cards signed by “leading brethren” to ministers did not please some who claimed liberty to preach when, where, and what they chose. In 1854 began the first organized disaffection among Sabbathkeeping Adventists. Two men, H. S. Case and C. P. Russell, who had been reproved by Ellen White for censoriousness, avarice, and extravagance, became embittered and were joined in 1855 by two ministers from Wisconsin, J. M. Stephenson and D. P. Hall, who insisted on preaching the “age-to-come” doctrine, which the majority opposed. From their “slandorous sheet” called the Messenger of Truth they were known as the “Messenger Party.” Although this divisive movement had practically lost its influence on Sabbathkeeping Adventists by 1858, it probably brought into focus the problem of the identity of the church as a whole—who was of it and who was not of it.

The erection of church buildings, beginning in 1855, raised the problem of church ownership of property. A group without a name and without corporate existence could not hold property. The first legally organized Sabbathkeeping Adventist church appears to have been that at Parkville, Michigan, May 13, 1860. This congregation, in order “that they might hold property in a lawful manner,” organized before erecting a church building. The “articles of association” read as follows: “We the undersigned hereby associate ourselves together as a church with the name of Parkville Church of Christ’s Second Advent: taking the Bible as our rule of faith and discipline.”

About the name, Loughborough remarked: “Perhaps a more appropriate name will be chosen by us as a people; but the church at Parkville concluded to take this name for the present” (Review and Herald 16:9, May 29, 1860).

The ownership of the publishing house posed the specific problem that finally precipitated action on the organization of the denomination as a whole. Since July 1849 when James White began publishing Present Truth, the publishing plant and business had been legally his, although he regarded the work as the “publishing department” of the church, because it had been financed partly by contributions from the members. In 1855 this publishing house came under church control, but not its ownership, for the church was not organized to hold property legally. In the Review and Herald, Feb. 23, 1860, James White called on the members to make it possible for the church to hold its own property and receive bequests.

Roswell F. Cottrell expressed strong opposition to White’s suggestion: to “make us a name” and to have any legal organization would be to become part of Babylon; legal incorporation would be union of church and state. Despite White’s reply, Cottrell’s articles influenced many readers, even after he modified his position. In May M. E. Cornell wrote that he was no longer prejudiced against organization because he realized the need for it.

White continued to beg the brethren to drop their prejudices and unite on a workable plan. In August he wrote that a new Review office must be built. Who was to hold it? In the same issue (Aug. 21) J. N. Andrews suggested that no step should be taken until after a general gathering from all parts of the country could be held.

4. First Seventh-day Adventist Organization—the Publishing House. In response to a call to a “General Conference,” signed by J. N. Andrews, Uriah Smith, J. H. Waggoner, and James White, ministers from five states met at Battle Creek, Sept. 28 to Oct. 1, 1860. This was one of the most significant Sabbathkeeping Adventist gatherings up to that time. The delegates assembled for business immediately after Sabbath, Sept. 29, 1860, and Joseph Bates was appointed chair. A full report of the proceedings appeared in the Review and Herald, Oct. 9—23, 1860.

James White asked for the forming of an organization that could legally own the publication office and meetinghouses. He was strongly supported by J. N. Loughborough, but many of the delegates were still afraid of becoming “a part of Babylon.” After lengthy debates a committee of three—J. N. Andrews, J. H. Waggoner, and T. J. Butler—was appointed to frame a plan of organization. This committee, enlarged by seven more, drew up a constitution for a legal association such as had been proposed by J. N. Loughborough. This was adopted. At first the delegation was unable to agree on a denominational name, but it was obviously impossible to conduct a business by an organization that had no name. Butler and others favored “Church of God”; finally, with one dissenting vote, the name Seventh-day Adventist was adopted as best representing the beliefs of the church. Concerning this name Ellen White remarked: “No name which we can take will be appropriate but that which accords with our profession and expresses our faith and marks us a peculiar people. The name Seventh-day Adventist is a standing rebuke to the Protestant world” (1T 223).

A committee of seven, headed by James White, was appointed to form the association, which was to be named the Advent Review Publishing Association. The next spring a new committee of five was formed, and the name was changed to the Seventh-day Adventist Publishing Association. The publishing house was incorporated on May 13, 1861, under the laws of Michigan. At its first meeting, May 23, it elected James White president of the association as well as editor of the Review and Herald.

II. Denominational Organization

II. Denominational Organization. 1. A Three-Level Organization Recommended. At a small conference (not a “general” conference) convened in Battle Creek, Apr. 26—29, 1861, to make preparation for the incorporation of the publishing association, it was felt that the time had come to consider closer denominational organization. This conference voted that the nine ministers present write for the Review and Herald an “address” on that subject. The outcome was a carefully prepared “Conference Address” entitled “Organization,” signed by J. H. Waggoner, Joseph Bates, James White, J. B. Frisbie, J. N. Loughborough, M. E. Cornell, E. W. Shortridge, Moses Hull, and John Byington, and published in the issue of June 11. It set forth the basic principles that have guided the denomination ever since, and at that time influenced considerably the sentiment for organization within the church. The writers proposed (1) a more thorough organization of local churches; (2) proper organization of “state or district conferences,” which would authorize ministers; (3) the holding of “general conferences” that would be “fully entitled to the name” as representing the will of the churches. They also recommended that all churches keep written records of all business transactions and membership lists, and issue “letters of fellowship” in the transfer of membership.

Despite a partial response on the local church level to the definite recommendations made in June, there still was delay and opposition to further organizing. In August James White wrote an editorial in which he mentioned Wheeler and Ingraham as holding back, as well as J. N. Andrews (though Andrews later expressed his regrets for not speaking out, and indicated he was in favor of “concerted effort”). Ellen White added her voice to the call for organization in the same issue (Review and Herald 18:101, Aug. 27, 1861).

2. Michigan Plan for Local Church Organization. At a conference for Michigan held in the church at Battle Creek, Oct. 4—6, 1861, with seven ministers present, J. N. Loughborough proposed that the organization of churches be studied, and James White presented the following resolution to the group: “Resolved, That this Conference recommend the following church covenant: We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together, as a church, taking the name Seventh-day Adventists, covenanting to keep the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus Christ” (ibid. 18:148, Oct. 9, 1861).

After this was passed, another resolution referred the question of “the proper manner of organizing churches” to the ministers present, with the request that they “hold a Bible class on it, and write an address to the brethren, to be published in the Review .”

This referral allowed the conference to proceed to other business, including the organization of the Michigan Conference. Then after adjournment the ministers drew up their recommendations on local church organization. This second “Address” of 1861, written by Loughborough, Hull, and Cornell (assisted by Smith, says White), appears on the editorial page of the Oct. 15 issue of the Review and Herald. White asks for suggestions from ministers in other States, and remarks that the “people have been ahead of the preachers, and have in some places entered into a sort of organization without the assistance of preachers.”

The address discusses the New Testament names for church leaders. Apostles (apparently ordained ministers), who have oversight of churches, and evangelists, who go out and “raise up” new churches, are not officers of local churches, like the elders and deacons. Each church should elect at least one elder (who is to administer baptism and the Lord’s Supper in the absence of any higher officer). The deacon or deacons, if needed, should be elected to handle the temporal affairs of the church. Records of church transactions should be kept by a clerk. Charter members are to form a church by signing the covenant (already quoted); new members are admitted by unanimous vote of the members in good standing; membership is to be transferred by “letters of commendation.” For the present practice, differing from this on some points, see Church Elder; Church \(local organization\); Deacon; Elder. See also the current Church Manual.

3. First Conference Organized—Michigan. At this same conference of October 1861 another far-reaching resolution was voted: “Resolved, That we recommend to the churches in the state of Michigan to unite in one Conference, with the name of the Michigan Conference of Seventh-day Adventists” (Review and Herald 18:148, Oct. 8, 1861).

It was further “Resolved, That the conference be composed of ministers and delegates from the churches” (ibid.).

The following officers were named: Joseph Bates, chair; Uriah Smith, secretary; conference committee, J. N. Loughborough, Moses Hull, and M. E. Cornell.

Another resolution provided for the issuing by the conference of annual ministerial credentials and certificates of ordination. These resolutions appear to have been adopted with little discussion, suggesting an unusual degree of harmony and unanimity. This meeting must be considered one of the most significant in the history of the church. Although there continued to be opposition to organization, the course to be taken in the future was largely laid down. During 1862 other local conferences were formed: Southern Iowa (Mar. 16), Northern Iowa (May 10), Vermont (June 15), Illinois and Wisconsin (Sept. 28), Minnesota (Oct. 4), New York (Oct. 25). Others followed shortly after.

In some areas the cause of organization made little progress. As a result of his persistent appeals in the Review and Herald for progress, James White began to see some results among laity as well as ministers. Joseph Clarke, layman in Ohio, voiced his annoyance at the slow progress in these words: "Are our officers acting like the army officers at the defeat at Bull Run? Men of God! Is it so? Are the soldiers cut to pieces for want of pluck in our officers?" (ibid. 20:197, 198, Nov. 18, 1862).

At the first regular session of the Michigan Conference, convened at Monterey, Michigan, Oct. 4—6, 1862, a layman, William S. Higley, was elected president for the following term, with James White, J. N. Loughborough, and John Byington as committee members. It was decided to pay the ministers a regular salary, fixed by an auditing committee, and to require regular reports from the workers. There was to be annual certification of ministers in addition to ordination. Another important action was taken: "Whereas, Several states are dependent on the Michigan Conference for laborers: and, Whereas, Those going out as laborers in some instances have been too much under the dictation of inexperienced brethren: therefore, Resolved, That it devolves upon the Michigan Conference to direct as to how and where such missionaries shall labor" (ibid. 20:157, Oct. 14, 1862).

A still more significant resolution was adopted: "Resolved, That we invite the several State Conferences to meet with us, by delegate, in general conference, at our next annual Conference" (ibid.).

In one sense this was not a new procedure; since 1855 a series of "general" gatherings had been called at Battle Creek, with invitations to delegates from any and all churches. Thus all Seventh-day Adventists had become accustomed to the fact of a "general" conference meeting at Battle Creek, transacting business that concerned the church as a whole, and solving the administrative and financial problems of the publishing house. This series of annual conferences had thus paved the way toward the organization of a continuing body.

The new step taken in this 1862 Michigan Conference was that it invited the participation, not of local churches, but of the newly organized state conferences through their official delegates. With local and state organization already functioning, the further step to a church-wide organization was a short one. Already, earlier in the year, J. H. Waggoner had proposed to White "that a General Conference Committee be appointed, with whom state conferences may correspond, and through whom they shall present their requests for laborers" (ibid. 20:29, June 24, 1862).

4. General Conference Organized, 1863. The next annual meeting of the Michigan Conference (originally scheduled for October) convened at Battle Creek May 20—23, 1863, under the temporary leadership of J. N. Aldrich, with Uriah Smith as secretary. Elected delegates were present from the New York, Ohio, Michigan, Wisconsin, Iowa, and Minnesota conferences.

A committee appointed to draft a constitution for the proposed General Conference organization brought in its report on Friday, May 21. The following constitution, after being discussed item by item, was adopted in its entirety: "For the purpose of securing unity and efficiency in labor, and promoting the general interests of the cause of present truth, and of perfecting the organization of the Seventh-day Adventists, we, the delegates from the several State Conferences, hereby proceed to organize a General Conference, and adopt the following constitution for the government thereof:

"Article I. This Conference shall be called the General Conference of Seventh-day Adventists.

"Art. II. The officers of this Conference shall be a President, Secretary, Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three, of whom the President shall be one.

"Art. III. The duties of the President and Secretary shall be such respectively as usually pertain to those offices.

"Art. IV. It shall be the duty of the Treasurer to receive and disburse means under the direction of the Executive Committee, and keep an account of the same, and make a full report thereof to the regular meetings of the Conference.

"Art. V. Section 1. It shall be the duty of the Executive Committee to take the general supervision of all ministerial labor, and see that the same is properly distributed; and they shall take the special supervision of all missionary labor, and as a missionary board shall have the power to decide where such labor is needed, and who shall go as missionaries to perform the same.

"Sec. 2. Means for missionary operations may be received by donation from State Conferences, churches, or individuals; and the Committee are authorized to call for means when needed.

"Sec. 3. When any State Conference desires ministerial labor from a minister not a resident within the bounds of such Conference, their request shall be made to the General Conference Executive Committee, and ministers sent by said Committee shall be considered under the jurisdiction of the Conf. Committee of such State: Provided, 1. That if such minister consider the State Committee inefficient, or their action so far wrong as to render his labor ineffectual, he may appeal to the General Conference Executive Committee: Provided, 2. That if such State Committee consider such minister inefficient they may appeal to the General Conference Committee, who shall decide on the matter of complaint, and take such action as they may think proper.

"Art. VI. Each State Conference shall be entitled to one delegate in the General Conference, and one additional delegate for every twenty delegates in the State Conference, such delegates to the General Conference to be chosen by the State Conferences or their Committees: Provided, That the delegates to such State Conferences be elected according to the following ratio, to wit: Each church to the number of twenty members or under shall be entitled to one delegate, and one delegate for every additional fifteen members.

"Art. VII. The officers shall hold their offices for the term of one year, and shall be elected at the regular meetings of the Conference.

"Art. VIII. Sec. 1. The regular meetings of the Conference shall be held annually, and the time and place of holding the same shall be determined by the Executive Committee, by whom due notice thereof shall be given through the Review.

"Sec. 2. Special meetings may be called at the option of the Committee.

“Art. IX. This constitution may be altered or amended by a two-third’s vote of the delegates present at any regular meeting: Provided, that any proposed amendment shall be communicated to the Executive Committee, and notice thereof given by them in their call for the meeting of the Conference” (ibid. 21:204, May 26, 1863).

James White was unanimously elected president, but when he declined to serve on the grounds that his strong advocacy of organization might compromise his office, John Byington was elected in his place and served for two one-year terms. Uriah Smith was elected secretary of the General Conference, and E. S. Walker treasurer. The Executive Committee consisted of James White, John Byington, and J. N. Loughborough, to whom were added J. N. Andrews and G. W. Amadon.

The conference then proceeded to frame a constitution of eight articles to be recommended to all the state conferences for their adoption (ibid. 205). Its chief provisions may be summarized as follows:

Article I. Each conference was to be composed of all ministers and of elected delegates.

Art. II. The officers were to be a president, secretary, treasurer, and an executive committee of three.

Art. III. Funds were to be raised by the Systematic Benevolence plan and other gifts, and reported regularly to the conference treasurer.

Art. IV. Churches were to obtain ministerial help through the conference.

Art. V. Ministerial licenses and credentials should be issued by the conference.

Art. VI. Ministers were to make written reports of their activities to each annual meeting of the conference.

Art. VII. Churches were to send delegates to the conference on the basis of 1 for each church with 20 members, or under and 1 for each additional 15 members.

Art. VIII. The constitution was to be amended at any regular meeting by a two-thirds vote of the members present, “provided such amendment shall not conflict with the constitution of the General Conference.”

Uriah Smith, the secretary of the General Conference, reported editorially in the Review and Herald of May 26, 1863, that “perhaps no previous meeting that we have ever enjoyed was characterized by such unity of feeling and harmony of sentiment.” Although opposition to organization was to be heard many times later, the church had chosen its course, and systematic church government was never seriously challenged again.

The general plan adopted in 1863 has not been changed since in its essential features, though it has been developed and expanded.

5. Early Functioning of General Conference Organization. With a membership in 1863 of only 3,500, concentrated east of the Missouri River and north of the parallel of the southern boundary of Missouri, and with only about 30 ministerial workers, it was possible for the president of the General Conference directly to look after much of the detailed work of the church. He could personally attend every important meeting and in addition give attention to much of the business connected with the publishing work. For example, in 1865 it was voted that the president of the General Conference should attend the sessions of all the eight state conferences.

However, the remaining years of the century saw rapid growth, and there followed in quick succession the establishment of a number of institutions and organizations that added to the complexities of the administration of the church. The health institution at Battle Creek was opened Sept. 5, 1866, whose articles of incorporation were signed on Apr. 9, 1867, as the Western Health Reform Institute (later the Battle Creek Sanitarium), John P. Kellogg being the chief shareholder. In 1869 the first local Tract and Missionary Society was organized in South Lancaster, Massachusetts, from which developed later a denomination-wide International Tract and Missionary Society. In 1874 J. N. Andrews went to Switzerland, the first Seventh-day Adventist representative sent overseas; also in the same year Battle Creek College was established. In 1878 the General Conference Sabbath School Association came into being. In 1879 the American Health and Temperance Association was formed. In the meantime state conferences were rapidly being organized.

III. Steps Toward Division of Responsibility

III. Steps Toward Division of Responsibility. Prior to 1871 James White personally had carried the heaviest responsibilities in the administration of the church. In 1873 George I. Butler, president of the General Conference, supported the view that a strong leader was essential to the administration of the church, citing the biblical instances of Moses, Joshua, and others to support his case. This view was endorsed by the General Conference session convened on Nov. 14, 1873.

In 1874 (beginning with the July 28 issue of the Review and Herald) Butler wrote a series of articles on church government supporting this view.

However, Ellen White and others urged a wider division of administrative responsibilities. In 1875 Ellen White wrote of the danger of one man's mind controlling that of another, and contended that the burdens of office should be more widely borne. She later wrote similarly concerning the management of the Battle Creek Sanitarium, warning against allowing Dr. J. H. Kellogg to assume dictatorial powers at that institution.

Again, in a letter of Oct. 28, 1885, to two of the members of the General Conference Committee, she urged: "Give men a chance to exercise their individual judgment" (Special Testimonies for Ministers and Workers, no. 6, p. 62).

1. European Responsibility. An indication of the widening geographical spread of authority was the General Conference's choice in 1875 of the following to serve as its executive committee: James White, of Battle Creek, Michigan; J. N. Loughborough, of Oakland, California, and J. N. Andrews, of Switzerland.

A step toward decentralization took place in 1882 when in Basel, Switzerland, the conferences and missions in Scandinavia, Great Britain, and Switzerland formed an organization they called the European Conference (the name was changed, on advice of the 1882 General Conference session, to the European Council of SDA Missions). In the 1884 meeting in Basel, General Conference president George I. Butler, who attended, reported "the perfecting of a plan of organization, so that responsibilities should rest upon all the leading workers there," whereby the Executive Committee of three was supplemented by a board of three in each of the three missions.

At the third meeting of the European Council, in 1885, Ellen White, addressing the workers on principles of relationships, laid foundations for unity while maintaining the need for individual initiative.

To make possible wider representation in the General Conference, the General Conference Committee was expanded to five members in 1883 and to seven in 1886.

2. General Conference Districts in North America (1888—1889). At the Minneapolis General Conference session of 1888 “it was proposed that the General Conference territory in the United States and Canada be broken up into several portions,” each comprising “a few local conferences and missions,” like the European Council, which had worked so well (C. C. Crisler, Organization, p. 135). This idea was not well received, but after the close of the session on Nov. 18, 1888, the General Conference Committee, as a temporary measure, divided the United States and Canada into four large districts, with a member of the General Conference Committee having oversight of each.

These four districts reported on their respective fields at the General Conference session of 1889, at which the area was divided into six districts, later named (1) Atlantic, (2) Southern, (3) Lake, (4) Northwest, (5) Southwest, and (6) Pacific, although they were commonly designated by number.

After this session, the General Conference Committee defined the duties of the general superintendent of each district, who was a member of the General Conference Committee. He was to attend annual state conferences and other annual meetings in his district, was to “counsel, caution, and instruct” officers of the state conferences and associations, and was to show special care for weak conferences and mission fields and “bring to the attention of the General Conference Committee the condition and wants of such fields” (SDA Yearbook [1891], p. 56). In the 1891 statistical report a District 7 was listed, including all foreign work, but this was apparently not official.

The district organization was further developed at the time of the 1893 General Conference session. The president, O. A. Olsen, recommended that district conferences be formed of the local conferences (including those in other lands) that would have property-holding organizations and hold their sessions between General Conference sessions, which were by then held in alternate years. The conference did not enact these recommendations in full, but did recommend biennial district meetings. The same conference made Australia the seventh district and Europe the eighth.

After the General Conference session closed, the General Conference Executive Committee outlined more specifically the plan for these district sessions: “42. That District Conferences be held in each General Conference District, as far as practicable, in the years alternating with the biennial sessions of the General Conference; that the representation of such Conferences consist of State Conference Committees, the Presidents and Secretaries of State Tract Societies, and Sabbath-school Associations, and the State Canvassing Agent of each State or Territory, in the District: that the District Superintendent be the presiding officer of the District Conference, a secretary being selected at the first meeting of each session; that the object of the District Conferences be to counsel concerning the interests of the cause in the territory of the Conference, and for planning for the extension of the work in all the various lines, no action being taken on matters which have not been considered in principle, at least, by the General Conference; and that devotional exercises and meetings for Bible instruction be held each day of the session” (SDA Yearbook [1894], p. 85).

In compliance with this recommendation, the first district conference was held at Battle Creek for District no. 3 in October 1893. Delegates were present from each of the four state conferences, representing the various departments of the work. This did not form a union conference as now understood, but the holding of such sessions may be considered a move in the direction of forming such conferences.

3. South African Conference. Another advance in organization was already being made overseas. While A. T. Robinson was head of the work in South Africa, he planned to organize a centralized conference in that field.

According to his recollection of the events, as recorded at the age of 96 in his autobiographical sketch, he proposed to the General Conference president to set up departmental secretaries under the conference president, a plan similar to one that had been submitted at an earlier General Conference session by a committee on which he had served, but which had been voted down (and not recorded in the minutes). He believed that the conditions in South Africa were so different from those in the United States that confusion would result from following the American pattern.

While waiting for approval from the General Conference, he went ahead and organized the conference according to his plan, only to discover that it was not approved at headquarters, where it was felt that it involved too much centralization. However, the plan worked well.

4. Australasian Union Conference (1894). While the districts were holding sessions in North America, the new District 7, in Australasia, also held a session in which the leaders followed the General Conference recommendation of 1893, with the counsel of O. A. Olsen, the General Conference president, who was present, and also took a further step—they organized a union conference. They provided for a president, a vice president, a secretary, a treasurer, and an executive committee, the superintendent of District 7 being the president. This Australasian Union Conference, the first in the denomination, later became a model for the reorganizing of the districts in North America into unions.

5. Decentralization at Headquarters. In August 1896 Ellen White addressed a letter to conference presidents urging certain changes in administration: “It is not wise to choose one man as president of the General Conference. The work of the General Conference has extended, and some things have been made unnecessarily complicated. . . . There should be a division of the field” (letter 24a, August 1896).

She obviously did not mean that the office should be dispensed with, but that his burdens should be shared. In a further letter she urged: “When the president of the General Conference is standing overloaded with work, let some young men, or some men of age and experience, come close to the weary man, and lift the burdens, sustaining him with encouraging words, standing in his place, and doing the work he would have done. . . . Men have learned to send every petty request to Battle Creek, until the elevated, sacred work has passed through so many human elements that it has become contaminated” (letter 100, Aug. 27, 1896).

Prior to 1897 the president of the General Conference also had been president of the Foreign Mission Board, president of the General Conference Association, president of the International Tract Society, and president of the Seventh-day Adventist Publishing Association, besides being a member of a number of other committees and boards. It was voted at the 1897 General Conference session “that the presidency of the General Conference Association, the presidency of the Mission Board, and the presidency of the General Conference work in North America be placed on three different men” (General Conference Bulletin [1897], p. 215).

It was also voted that the General Conference territory be divided into three sections: the United States and British North America, the European Union Conference, and the Australasian Union Conference, the rest to be under the care of the Mission Board. The Mission Board was to consist of nine members, and the General Conference Committee was increased to 13 members. Union conferences were to be organized in Europe and the United States as soon as it was deemed advisable.

IV. General Conference Reorganization in 1901

IV. General Conference Reorganization in 1901. 1. Need for Reorganization in Two Directions. With the early organization had come centralization and a failure to meet the administrative requirements inherent in a rapidly expanding enterprise. All matters throughout the world that could not be handled at the local conference or mission level had been directed to the General Conference Committee. Recent exceptions were Australasia, which already had been organized as a union conference, and to some extent Europe.

By 1901 the church had grown to such an extent that too many demands were being made of the president of the General Conference, too much authority was centered in the president and in a small group of men. Again Ellen White wrote sternly about “kingly power” and “Jerusalem centers.” She urged further decentralization: “New conferences must be formed. It was in the order of God that the Union Conference was organized in Australasia. The Lord God of Israel will link us all together. The organizing of new Conferences is not to separate us. It is to bind us together” (General Conference Bulletin, Apr. 5, 1901, pp. 68, 69).

On the other hand, there still existed divisive elements. The Sabbath school, publishing, and medical work operated independently in large degree. The Foreign Mission Board, the General Conference, and the International Medical Missionary and Benevolent Association each sent out missionaries. The medical organization had more employees than all other church agencies combined. Several of these semi-independent groups were in serious financial difficulties, but the General Conference had little control over them. Personal interests were involved, as well as differing views as to how to decentralize and yet unify the church organization. The solution would not be an easy one.

2. General Conference Session of 1901. On Apr. 1, 1901, the day before the formal opening of the General Conference session, Ellen White spoke to a specially called meeting of the General Conference Committee, state conference presidents, business managers, editors, physicians, and heads of training schools, and urged a thorough reorganization of denominational administration. She proposed that the General Conference Committee should represent all phases of the work, that every institution should have a voice, that the present Executive Committee should be relieved because it had accomplished little, that the leading men should go out into the field to observe, that there should be no “kings” in the work, and that the gospel work and the medical work should be blended.

A. G. Daniells, the chair of the preliminary meeting, was also chair of a committee of about 75 (which became known as the Committee on Counsel) appointed to recommend plans to the conference. To this committee he explained the organization of the Australasian Union Conference, in which the mechanics had been simplified and branches of the work, such as educational and publishing, had been made departments of the conference.

Immediately after the opening of the conference on Apr. 2, 1901, Mrs. White addressed the delegates, repeating much of what she had said the previous day. She again urged further distribution of responsibility: “God has not put any kingly power in our ranks to control this or that branch of the work. There must be a renovation, a reorganization” (General Conference Bulletin, Apr. 3, 1901, p. 26).

It would be for others to determine just how this should be accomplished. Her counsel was well received, and the final result was reorganization under a new constitution.

Six major changes were later enumerated by A. G. Daniells as set in operation by this conference:

“1. The organization of union conferences and union mission boards in all parts of the world where either the membership or the staff of workers make it advisable.

“2. The transfer of the ownership and management of all institutions and enterprises of the cause to the organizations with which they are by location directly connected.

“3. Making all the leading lines, such as the Sabbath school, educational, medical missionary, religious liberty, and publishing work, departments of the General Conference, and placing the chairmen of these departments on the General Conference Committee.

“4. Enlarging and strengthening all conference committees and mission boards by placing on them men especially qualified to represent the evangelical, educational, medical missionary, and publishing interests of the cause.

“5. Placing the responsibility of attending to the details of the work in all parts of the world upon those who are located where the work is to be done.

“6. Arranging an organic connection or union of all the parts of our organization and field by placing on the union conference committees the presidents of local conferences who are elected by the local churches; and further by placing on the General Conference Committee the presidents of union conferences, the superintendents of union mission fields, and the chairmen of all department committees. Thus every church, every department of work, and every institution in the denomination is represented in local and union conferences, and in the General Conference as well” (A. G. Daniells, in Review and Herald 83:6, 7, Mar. 29, 1906).

Before the conference closed, the original six districts in North America were reorganized by the delegates into union conferences modeled somewhat after the already existing Australasian Union Conference, with its simplified operating machinery and its arrangement of departments. These were the Eastern Union Conference (almost immediately renamed Atlantic), Southern Union Conference, Lake Union Conference, Northwestern Union Conference, Southwestern Union Conference, and Pacific Union Conference. Besides these there were the Australasian Union Conference and the European General Conference.

3. General Conference Executive Committee and Departments. The leading independent organizations within the denomination—educational, medical missionary, Sabbath school, religious liberty, and publishing—became branches, or departments, of the General Conference (see General Conference Departments). The chair—later called the secretary—of each department became a member of the executive committee of the General Conference, then increased to 25 members. While greater authority was now invested in one central body, it was more representative and responsible than previously. It was representative of the different departments of the work as well as of the various geographical units of the church around the world. The Executive Committee elected its own officers, appointed its own chair, and held office for one year in order to prevent any assumption of “kingly power.” This plan lasted for two years. A. G. Daniells became the first “chair,” but in effect began his long term as General Conference president.

The foreign mission work came under the supervision of the General Conference Committee, but the appointment of boards of management, titles to property, and obligation for debts of local institutions were transferred to union conferences.

A difficulty was encountered in attempting to bring the International Medical Missionary and Benevolent Association under the direction of the General Conference Committee. It was the most vigorous of all the denominational organizations, which, although controlled by members of the church, had received considerable support from non-SDAs. As a compromise, the Benevolent Association was given a representation of six members on the General Conference Committee, and its own board was to be appointed equally by the General Conference and its own constituents. (However, Dr. J. H. Kellogg, chair of the association, vigorously opposed any action that would bring it under General Conference control. By 1908 the International Medical Missionary and Benevolent Association, with the Battle Creek Sanitarium, passed entirely from denominational control.)

The General Conference reorganization of 1901 left much yet to be done, but it had achieved a degree of harmony that assured success as the decisions were translated into action. Self-interest still was found, but never again was there serious doubt about the course organization should take. The difficulties that arose were not so much in adjusting the machinery of administration to the new pattern as in dealing with the lack of insight on the part of some who failed to heed Ellen White's counsels against centralization at Battle Creek. Further work was yet to be done at the General Conference session of 1903.

However, on a number of subsequent occasions Mrs. White expressed her recognition of the reforms that had been effected at the 1901 General Conference session, and she made it clear that therefore many of the criticisms she had made of the leadership and the organization were no longer applicable.

She wrote to one of the conference workers: "Your course would have been the course to be pursued if no change had been made in the General Conference. But a change has been made, and many more changes will be made and great developments will be seen. No issues are to be forced. . . . It hurts me to think that you are using words which I wrote prior to the conference. Since the conference great changes have been made" (letter 54, 1901).

4. Constitution Revised in 1903. Certain deficiencies in the constitution of 1901 became apparent between 1901 and 1903. No official head of the denomination had been elected by the conference, but A. G. Daniells, the chair of the Executive Committee, decided, on the advice of others, to use the title of president. Pressing financial problems were taken care of by the transfer of the assets and liabilities of the General Conference to the union conferences, and by the decision to do business on a strictly cash basis. It had been understood in 1901 that each department was to be represented on the Executive Committee, but in 1903 this proposal was added to the constitution.

The General Conference session of 1903 extended the principles of organization initiated in 1901. The General Conference Sabbath School Department was to direct the work for the young people; the International Medical Missionary and Benevolent Association was requested to become a department of the General Conference; a plan for bringing institutions fully under denominational control was adopted; and provision was made for the support of aged workers and their dependents. Also, it was agreed that the General Conference headquarters and the Review and Herald should be moved from Battle Creek.

During the biennial period 1901—1903 there were organized 12 union conferences, three union missions, and 20 local conferences, a continuation of the policy perfected at the 1901 General Conference. No drastic organizational changes were made in 1903; recommendations made previously were put into action and developed to meet the needs of a rapidly expanding work.

5. Two Vice Presidents. One significant step taken at the 1903 conference was the election of two vice presidents where formerly they had elected one. To the one (called the first vice president) was specifically assigned the supervision of the work in Europe. The other was to supervise the work in North America. Thus the rapid growth of the church in Europe and in the parts of the world administered through and supplied by the European office was given administrative recognition. The question of a coordinate position for the European work with that of North America had been agitated for several years previously (see General Conference Bulletin, 1903, p. 170). In fact, already in 1901 the European leaders had organized the unions in that field into the European General Union Conference (or the General European Conference).

V. Divisions of the General Conference

V. Divisions of the General Conference. 1. Three Areas of World Field. Once the idea of coordinate administrative organization for major parts of the worldwide work had taken root in denominational thinking, the idea grew, and in the 1909 session a third vice president was elected, assigned to “the Asiatic division,” though there was no formal action establishing such an organizational unit. All three vice presidents were empowered to preside at meetings of members of the General Conference Executive Committee in their respective areas, or at missionary councils there. The 1910 Yearbook for the first time listed the titles: “Vice President for European Division,” “Vice President for North American Division,” and “Vice President for Asiatic Division.”

In 1912 the members of the General Conference Committee who had charge of the work in Europe addressed a memorial to the Autumn Council of the General Conference Committee, giving reasons for providing a divisional administrative unit comprising all union conferences and union missions in the European field, and requesting the General Conference to consider the matter at its next session. Already in 1912 they called their statistical bulletin the Quarterly Report of the European Division of the General Conference.

The need for something on this order had been foreseen as early as 1893, when O. A. Olsen recommended the formation of overseas districts in view of the rapid growth in overseas areas, but the 1863 constitution then in force had not been written in the expectation of a worldwide organization and could not be extended any further to cover the new needs.

2. Division Conferences Organized. On May 21, 1913, 50 years to the day from the time that the General Conference was organized, a constitution and bylaws for a European Division Conference were submitted to the General Conference delegates and accepted the next day. The division conference was an administrative unit intermediate between the union conference and the General Conference, with unions as its constituency and the source of its authority. The territory of the General Conference was to be composed of the North American and European Division conferences, the Asiatic Division Mission, and all other union and local conferences and missions. In the same year the South American Division was authorized.

3. Present Divisional Structure. In 1918 the division conferences were abolished, leaving the union conferences and missions again directly responsible to the General Conference. Instead of locally elected officers (including the president) for the former divisions of the work, the General Conference named vice presidents to supervise the world fields and provided for subtreasurers and assistant departmental secretaries from among members of the Executive Committee to reside in each and to conduct the field work.

According to the 1918 constitution, the members of the Executive Committee in each division of territory constituted an executive board for that area, but the control over departmental activities was retained by the General Conference Executive Committee.

The principal reasons for this change were (1) to preserve structural unity; (2) to place on every section of the church membership the responsibility of supplying funds and men for the whole world, including unentered fields; and (3) to avoid in the future some of the difficulties in administration, communication, and finance caused by World War I, when parts of one division conference were separated by the war front.

By 1922 the present pattern of divisional organization had developed and was inscribed in the General Conference constitution. The divisions of the world field remained essentially “sections” of the General Conference Executive Committee, with responsibility for their respective territories, but they were given a measure of authority in that they were given a full complement of officers and a divisional committee elected by the General Conference in session. This committee, composed of the delegates from the union conferences, missions, and unattached fields, was empowered to act on local matters in accordance with the general policies set by the full meetings of the Executive Committee. The name “division” has persisted, but the double term “division section” is rarely used, though it appears in the constitution.

Interunion organizations, comprising several unions, have at times been formed. Even as the union conference was being adopted for the whole church (1901), the growth of the church to continental dimensions in Europe, where it could not be united as a single union, led to the attempt to find some unit intermediate between the union and the General Conference. This resulted in the formation of the General European Conference, and eventually of the European and other divisions. But later there arose, in two cases, the need for an organizational unit between the union and the division. In Germany, at a time when the situation required that the German church exist as a united administrative organization, while the European Division included a number of countries, the German Inter-Union Association was formed. The Australasian Union Conference, when it was split into several unions in 1948 became the Australasian Inter-Union Conference. Both of these inter-union organizations are now identical with the divisions.

Since 1922 new divisions have been formed and there have been territorial adjustments among divisions, unions, conferences, and missions in keeping with political and economic developments. The emergence of new nations has accelerated the transfer of certain administrative authority from the foreign to the national staffs, but no significant changes have been made since that time in the overall structure of Seventh-day Adventist Church organization.

Oriental Watchman Publishing House

ORIENTAL WATCHMAN PUBLISHING HOUSE. A publishing house with its own printing facilities, operated by the Southern Asia Division at Pune, India, about 100 miles (160 kilometers) east-southeast of Bombay.

The house prints in 19 languages: Assamese, Bengali, English, Garo, Gujarati, Hindi, Kannada, Khasi, Malayalam, Manipuri, Marathi, Mizo, Naga (AO), Naga (Thankhul), Nepali, Oriya, Punjabi, Tamil, and Telugu. Most of the printing for the Southern Asia Voice of Prophecy Bible Correspondence School, Church Ministries Department, Department of Communication, and other division departments is done by this house. Six monthly health magazines—Herald of Health (English), Arogyadeep (Marathi), Arogyavani (Kannada), Marga Darsi (Telugu), Nalwazhi (Tamil), and Swasthya Aur Jeevan (Hindi)—are printed and published by the house. The house also prints the bimonthly evangelistic magazine Our Times, the official monthly news magazine of the division, Southern Asia Tidings, and the monthly world edition of the Adventist Review. Through the years numerous books on health, spirituality, and family living have been published.

Besides the earnings of the house, special funds are made available occasionally from denominational resources for new equipment and replacement of old machinery or for the general expansion program.

The management is responsible to a board of trustees, of which the president of the Southern Asia Division is the chair, and which governs the general conduct of the business. The staff is drawn entirely from among Seventh-day Adventists and numbers 108 persons.

History

History. SDA publishing work in India began in 1896 under the name of the International Tract Society. The society began by issuing a number of tracts in the International Series. In 1898 it began publishing a magazine, The Oriental Watchman, at first having the printing done by commercial printers in Calcutta. In 1903 the Watchman Press was founded and was housed at the mission's office at 38 Free School Street, Calcutta. In July of that year it turned out its first issue of The Oriental Watchman. In 1905 the press was moved to Karmatar, Bihar, and remained there until 1909, when it was transferred to 19 Banks Road, Lucknow. The growth of church membership and the consequent increase in the need for publications made a larger press building necessary. In 1911 a portion of a $300,000 fund given by the churches in the United States was used to build quarters for the India Union office and the Watchman Press at 17 Abbott Road, Lucknow. About this time the Watchman Press became known as the International Tract Society. The name of the press was changed in 1919 to the Seventh-day Adventist Publishing House. In 1924 the publishing house was moved to its present location at Salisbury Park, Pune, near the Southern Asia Division offices, and renamed the Oriental Watchman Publishing Association. Six years later, in July 1930, the house was renamed the Oriental Watchman Publishing House—a name under which it continues to serve the Seventh-day Adventist Church in Southern Asia.

Oriola, J. B.

ORIOLA, J. B. (d. 1984). Pioneer worker. He was the second national Seventh-day Adventist to be ordained in Nigeria. Before becoming an SDA, he was a strong member of the Anglican Church.

He was called to the ministry in 1916 and began work at Sao. In 1918 he was transferred to Erunmu, where he worked for two years. The rest of his ministry was in the various fields of Nigeria. He retired in 1955, but continued to nourish the work of God. He will be remembered for pioneering the work and for his good work with branch Sabbath schools.

Osborne, Howard Edgerly

OSBORNE, HOWARD EDGERLY (1873—1908). Secretary of the General Conference. He was the son of a Seventh-day Adventist minister and was educated at South Lancaster Academy and Battle Creek College. Before serving as secretary of the General Conference, from 1901 to 1903, he preached and engaged in religious liberty work in New York and Maine. A severe attack of pleuropneumonia led him to resign his secretarial post and move to California. There he married Jessie Barber in 1904 and from 1905 to 1906 taught English at Healdsburg College and from 1906 to 1908 at Fernando Academy. Typhoid fever ended his service early.

Oss, John

OSS, JOHN (1892—1959). Publishing and home missionary secretary of the China Division, editor of the Chinese Signs of the Times. After studying at Plainview Academy and at Washington Missionary College, he entered Seventh-day Adventist work in 1918 as a publishing secretary and evangelist in South Dakota.

In 1919 he and his wife, née Olga Bertine Osnes, whom he had married in 1917, went to China. He led the Publishing and Home Missionary departments first in Manchuria and then in the North and East China unions. While he developed the book sales work, his wife organized solicitation campaigns on behalf of SDA medical and welfare work in China. About 1932 he was appointed publishing secretary of the China Division, and at about the same time he joined the staff of the Signs of the Times Publishing House at Shanghai as associate editor of several Chinese language periodicals. The SDA Yearbooks list him as editor of the Signs of the Times and general book editor from 1938 until 1950, with the exception of the war years, which he and his wife spent as internees in a prisoner-of-war camp.

Upon release they had a period of recuperation. He was one of the last SDA overseas missionaries to leave mainland China in 1950. After his return to the United States he pastored the San Francisco Chinese church for several years. His death from heart failure occurred while he was engaged in research on a book, The Sabbath and the Weekly Cycle in China. He was the author of a historical account, Missions Advance in China, and helped in the translation and publication of many of Ellen White's volumes in Chinese. His wife has written an account of her experiences in China in a small book entitled Triumphs of Faith.

Oster, Frank Frederick

OSTER, FRANK FREDERICK (1881—1960). Minister, pioneer Seventh-day Adventist missionary in Iran. He was born in Switzerland but as a child was brought to the United States, where his parents became the first SDAs in their section of Wisconsin. Upon leaving public schools he followed the trade of a merchant tailor in Portland, Oregon, then attended Walla Walla College for two years, and while there volunteered for mission service in Persia. In 1909 he was sent to begin SDA work there. After preparatory training at Friedensau Missionary Seminary, Germany, and in Baku, Russia, he entered Persia in 1911 in company with Henry Dirksen.

Because of the harrowing experiences of World War I, Oster took a two-year furlough in the United States (1920—1921), during which he was ordained (1920). After this rest he returned to Persia, accompanied by his wife, née Florence Genevieve White, whom he had married in 1913, and who was the daughter of a prominent SDA worker, W. B. White. He resumed his work as superintendent and for a while was secretary-treasurer of the Persian Mission, while his wife carried responsibilities as a secretary-treasurer, educational and Sabbath school department secretary, and teacher. Between 1938 and 1943 he served as director of the Turkish Mission. In 1943 he returned to America and worked in the Indiana Conference until his retirement in 1948.

Oswald, Theodore Lewis

OSWALD, THEODORE LEWIS (1891—1970). Missionary and administrator. He was a native of South Dakota whose service to the church spanned 42 years. With his wife, the former Cora Ruth Youngberg, he served as a missionary in Bolivia and Chile. After returning to the United States he became president of the Arizona Conference and also served in the same capacity in the Kentucky-Tennessee Conference. He became home missionary secretary of the Pacific and North Pacific Union conferences, and then was appointed secretary of the General Conference Home Missionary Department.

Ottapalam Seventh-day Adventist Hospital

OTTAPALAM SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST HOSPITAL. A modern 120-bed general hospital on a 32-acre (13-hectare) compound two miles (three kilometers) out of Ottapalam, a small town in a rural but thickly populated area of North Kerala, India. Opened on Nov. 10, 1969, this well-equipped hospital serves Hindus, Muslims, and the few Christians in the area. It is staffed mostly by Vellore-trained SDA doctors and Nuzvid-trained SDA nurses.

Directors: K.A.P. Yesudian, 1969—1974; Mary Small, 1974; K. P. George, 1974—1984; R. V. Thomas, 1983—1989; M. Richard, 1984—1986; A. H. Kore, 1987—1991; Boban Thomas, 1991— .

Ottosen, Carl Jacob

OTTOSEN, CARL JACOB (1864—1942). Founder, promoter, and leader of Seventh-day Adventist health work in Scandinavia. He was born on a farm in the northern part of Denmark and became an SDA as a young student. During these years he worked as a teacher, preacher, and evangelist, and was ordained as a minister of the gospel.

As a student and later as a newly graduated physician, he made visits to the Battle Creek Sanitarium; the last time in 1896, at which time Dr. John Harvey Kellogg showed great interest in this young colleague.

Ottosen returned to Denmark, enthusiastic for the health ideas of the Seventh-day Adventist Church, and became the driving force in the establishment of the Frydenstrand Sanitarium (1897), the Skodsborg Sanitarium (1898), the Health Food Factory (Nutana, 1899), and a clinic for physical therapy in Copenhagen (1901).

It was also on his initiative that the Skodsborg Sanitarium began a course in nursing and physical therapy and a school for natural food service. The Skodsborg School of Physical Therapy has graduated more than 1,000 young SDA physical therapists.

From 1900 to 1936 Ottosen was medical director of Skodsborg Sanitarium and a pioneer in the methods of physical therapy in Scandinavia.

Ottosen's lectures were highly successful, and his program of the use of fresh air, exercise, water, electricity, massage, and vegetarian nutrition became well accepted after the first years of resistance.

He served as editor of the Danish health magazine from 1898 to 1942 and is the author of several popular books on healthful living and nutrition.

He connected with the temperance movement and was the president of the Danish Temperance Society from 1924 to 1935.

Ottosen was knighted by the king of Denmark for his great contribution to health and temperance, and at his death, the newspapers throughout Scandinavia referred to him as the "Health Apostle of the North."

Our Little Friend

OUR LITTLE FRIEND (July 4, 1890— ; eight-page weekly; PPPA; 1993 circulation, 54,079; files at LLU, PPPA). The Sabbath school paper for preschool children. It contains the cradle roll lesson for children ages 1—3, and the kindergarten lesson for ages 4—6. For 56 years it was the only Seventh-day Adventist publication for children up to the Youth's Instructor age.

My Bible Story (1946—1956), a four-page paper for tiny tots, interrupted this half-century continuity. In 1953 the Junior Guide (ages 10—14) absorbed the junior readership. In 1957 Our Little Friend incorporated My Bible Story, and the age-level ceiling was lowered to include only the cradle roll and kindergarten children. The material for primary children (ages 7 to 9), began to be published in a new weekly, Primary Treasure.

Subject matter includes true-to-life character-building stories written with the positive approach from a child's viewpoint. Simple lessons of life for Christian growth are emphasized. Honesty, truthfulness, courtesy, safety, health, and temperance are stressed. Nature articles, illustrated poetry, pictures to color, and simple puzzles are included.

The Signs Publishing Company of Warburton, Australia, publishes an Australian Our Little Friend. Foreign language versions of the paper appear in the Spanish El Amigo de los Ninos and the French Notre Petit Ami, published by the Pacific Press.

Since 1987 a monthly parenting column has been published.

Owen, Roderick Sterling

OWEN, RODERICK STERLING (1852—1927). Teacher, administrator. He was an active layperson in the Methodist Church and a student of law when introduced to Seventh-day Adventist teachings through reading Man's Nature and Destiny and Thoughts on Daniel and the Revelation. In 1883 he accepted the SDA faith and was baptized. He entered denominational service and for two years engaged in ship missionary work in San Francisco harbor. In 1887 he joined the faculty of Healdsburg College as a teacher of Bible and history, and from 1897 to 1899 served as president of the college. Afterward he pastored a church in the Los Angeles area and taught Bible and history at the San Fernando Academy (1903—1909). From 1909 until near the time of his death he was on the faculty of the College of Medical Evangelists.

Ozama Adventist Secondary School

OZAMA ADVENTIST SECONDARY SCHOOL (Colegio Adventista Ozama). A coeducational K-12 school located in Ozama in the Dominican Republic. It is under the direction of the Central Dominican Conference. Founded before 1968, it first offered grades 1—8. In 1974 it expanded to include 12 grades. In 1993 the school had 501 students in grades K-12, with 15 teachers and administrators.

In 1984 it received accreditation from the Antillian Union, and in 1991 it was accredited by the Inter-American Division. The school consists of a two-story building containing eight classrooms, offices, library, and cafeteria. It also has a volleyball court and is proud of a musical group that glorifies God's name.

In 1994 Mar'a Elena Kevellier was principal.

Ozark Adventist Academy

OZARK ADVENTIST ACADEMY. A coeducational boarding school owned and operated by the Arkansas-Louisiana Conference. It is situated on a 78-acre (32-hectare) campus in a poultry-raising and small-farm area in the extreme northwest corner of Arkansas, one mile (1.6 kilometer) west of State Highway 59 in Benton County two miles (three kilometers) southeast of Gentry (the postal address) and seven miles (11 kilometers) northwest of Siloam Springs.

The school has facilities for 148 dormitory students. However, some 60 to 70 students from the community attend as day students. Accreditation with the General Conference Board of Regents was extended provisionally in 1948 and finally in 1949. The school was accredited by the state of Arkansas in 1947. In 1991 it was accredited by the Arkansas Nonpublic School Accrediting Association.

The enrollment in 1992—1993 was 175, the total staff 28, of whom 21 were in administrative and instructional positions, seven were part-time employees, and nine directed the academy services and industries. There are work opportunities for students in the school services and in a cabinet factory, a box recycling operation, a packaging business, and a plastic bag industry.

The academy originated from a church school in the village of Gentry, first taught by Josephine Wilson (Tucker) in 1905—1906. Soon thereafter, however, the church and school were moved to the present site on Flint Creek. As the community grew, wings were added to the church to accommodate the growing school. When during the middle twenties the school began to offer secondary work, it became known as the Flint Creek Junior Academy. In 1934—1935 the name was changed to Ozark Junior Academy.

After W. D. Pierce became principal in 1938, buildings to house resident students were constructed. Through the help of the district pastor, Isaac Baker, support from the nearby Arkansas churches of Fort Smith, Fayetteville, Springdale, Rogers, Harrison, Bentonville, Hiwassee, and Decatur was obtained. In 1939—1940 the eleventh grade was added, and the first student to graduate from the twelfth grade did so in 1941. Also in 1941 the Arkansas-Louisiana Conference took over operation of the academy, but in 1945 decided to close the school. Upon request from the staff the academy was allowed to continue on its own for a year on a trial basis. One of the teachers, Mrs. Crystal Duce, was chosen to administer the school.

Immediately plans were laid to provide for an adequate building for administrative offices and classrooms. This enthusiasm of the staff led to a return to conference operation the following year. The administration building, begun in 1946, was completed in 1948. In 1955 a building for the cafeteria, laundry, and the Home Economics and Music departments was added. A new boys' home was completed in 1958, and a new girls' home in 1963. A gymnasium-auditorium was erected in 1965. A new industrial arts building was constructed in 1972. The new administration building completed in 1978, houses classrooms, the Home Economics Department, the library, the auditorium, and the Music Department. The Music Department received a rare distinction in 1993 by winning trophies for both band and small choir at the twentieth annual Festival of Music at Worlds of Fun in Kansas City, Missouri.

School publications are an annual, The Flintonian, first published in 1942, and a school paper, the Mountain Echo.

Pacific Academy

PACIFIC ACADEMY (Colegio del Pacífico; formerly Mexican Pacific Academy; Escuela Agrícola e Industrial del Pacífico). A coeducational boarding school operated by the Asociación Civil Filantrópica y Educativa (the civil association of Seventh-day Adventists in Mexico). It serves the western and northern states of Mexico, although students attend from other parts of the country as well. It is situated eight miles (13 kilometers) from the city of Navajoa, Sonora, Mexico. It is in a rich farming area where wheat, corn, cotton, soybeans, safflower, sesame seed, sorghum, melons, and winter vegetables are raised. The school farm is under constant cultivation.

Land for the school was donated by Frank Byerly and his family (residents of Navajoa since 1917) to the Liga Mexico Pan-Americana, an organization of Adventist physicians, dentists, and businessmen and women, which has contributed to the development of the school since its establishment. With Juan Gil as director, the school opened in September 1948 with 27 students.

Besides the 125 acres (50 hectares) of land originally donated, another 200 acres (81 hectares) were later purchased, making a total of 325 acres (132 hectares). A dining room-kitchen, the basement of which was used as a dormitory, was completed in 1949. The Elena Byerly girls' dormitory and the Francisco Byerly boys' dormitory were opened in April 1959. The T. Gordon Reynolds Auditorium was completed in 1961. A laundry building, most of the cost of which was donated by Dr. Chanceford Mounce and his wife, was opened in December 1962. The central section of the administration building, Harry C. Nelson Hall, was opened in 1963.

Because of financial difficulties, the school was closed in 1965, but reopened in September 1967 with 90 students and 16 faculty members. This same year it was accredited by the director of public education for the state of Sonora. The preparatory school was opened in September of 1969, and is accredited with the University of Sonora. Since its reopening, the school has made great advancement in the development of the campus. Three hundred seventy acres (150 hectares) of farmland have been added, bringing the total to 695 acres (281 hectares), with 676 acres (273 hectares) under cultivation. In 1968 a well for drinking water was drilled, and the fulfillment of the master plan for the school was begun, the rebuilding and repairing of existing buildings to suit present needs, and constructing new homes, classrooms, and buildings. The new dining room, with a capacity of 450, was opened in August 1972. The food plant, which began producing vegetarian foods in 1969, moved into a new and larger plant with more modern equipment in 1972. The boys' dorm has a capacity for 300. The girls' dormitory also was remodeled. New faculty homes and a new wing of classrooms have been built.

On Christmas Day 1973 the president of the republic of Mexico, Licenciado Luis Echeverría Alvarez, visited the school, leaving a gift of a school bus, and an authorization for the installation of a telephone line. All instruction is given in the Spanish language.

In 1979 the institution suffered the worst draught of its history. As a result a fresh-water well was installed in 1980. In 1982 administrative offices were constructed. In 1984 and 1985 houses were built for the deans of boys and girls. Apartments for singles were constructed in 1992.

During the same year Meadow Glade Elementary School made a donation of a bus along with $5,000 in cash that was to be used for scholarships for industrial students.

In 1993 the school hosted the second congress of the North Mexican Union with 300 teachers in attendance.

Pacific Adventist Academy

PACIFIC ADVENTIST ACADEMY (Colegio Adventista del Pacífico). A coeducational secondary school located in Guayaquil, Ecuador. It was established in 1980. In 1993 it had an enrollment of 243 and a faculty and staff of 24. In 1994 the principal was Carlos Flores.

Pacific Adventist College

PACIFIC ADVENTIST COLLEGE. A coeducational senior boarding college situated in Koiari Park, approximately 12 miles (20 kilometers) out of Port Moresby, capital of Papua New Guinea. Under the direction of the South Pacific Division, it has served since 1984 as the senior college for the three island unions (Papua New Guinea, Western Pacific, and Central Pacific) with a combined constituency (in 1993) of more than 200,000. A governing board of up to 24 members representing the division, island unions, and local mission is responsible for the operation of the college, and the division president is the board chair.

The college is authorized to offer academic awards under an act of the PNG Parliament, the Pacific Adventist College Act of 1983. PAC courses are structured in diploma and degree modules. Students graduate with a diploma after having completed the two- or three-year diploma module, then gain two or more years of field experience, and later return to study for one or two years in the degree module to earn a Bachelor of Education or Bachelor of Theology degree. Besides the education diplomas and degrees (with majors and minors in primary education and most subjects taught in secondary schools) and the theology diplomas and degrees, the college also offers diplomas in business (accounting), secretarial administration, and agriculture business management. PAC operates an Extension Services Department, which offers preliminary programs and a limited number of diploma subjects by correspondence.

The modern campus buildings are situated on sweeping tree-studded lawns surrounding three lakes in which a variety of water lilies bloom year-round, and the parklike effect makes PAC an attractive place to live and study. Fortunately, the college has access to abundant water supplies for irrigation, and a profitable commercial farm supplies fruit and vegetables to the nearby city of Port Moresby. The college currently has accommodation for 50 married student families in four villages, dormitory accommodation for 44 women and 88 men, 28 faculty houses, and 38 ancillary staff houses. A spacious air-conditioned library houses some 26,000 books, and a growing collection of historical documents and artifacts from the Pacific Islands region of the South Pacific is housed in a heritage vault being developed for the purpose. A video production unit has the capability of producing educational and promotional videos of high quality, and the agricultural research program has achieved considerable recognition by government and other agencies.

A popular feature of the college operation is its Work Study Scheme by which approved students from the Pacific Islands region can earn their way through college by working during vacations and in their spare time for tuition, board, books, and a small weekly living allowance. An endowment fund set up by the South Pacific Division makes the scheme possible.

History and Development

History and Development. At a meeting of representatives of the three island unions and the division in Honiara, Solomon Islands, in 1977 it was decided to establish a senior college for the Pacific Islands region. A search was made for a suitable site, and the current site was leased from the Koiari landowners in 1979. Buildings were constructed (library/administration, classrooms, offices, laboratories, lecture theaters, chapel, technology, dormitories, food services, faculty, staff and married student housing) and the college registered its first student intake (approximately 110 students) in February 1984. Since 1984 additional housing has been constructed as well as a farm complex, greenhouses, maintenance workshop, and other ancillary buildings.

The academic program began with diploma and degree courses in theology and education and diploma courses in business and secretarial studies. The Extension Services Department was added in 1985, the secretarial studies course was changed to secretarial administration in 1988, and the agriculture business management course commenced in 1989. A two-year off-campus Associate Diploma in Administration was offered to a single intake of 60 students commencing in 1987. The current enrollment (1993) stands at almost 150 on campus and approximately 130 studying through the Extension Services Department.

Pacific Press Publishing Association

PACIFIC PRESS PUBLISHING ASSOCIATION. A denominationally owned and operated publishing house producing books and magazines in English and other languages, also high-fidelity tapes and compact discs. Headquarters: 1350 North Kings Road, Nampa, Idaho.

History

History. Seventh-day Adventist publishing in the West began in 1874, when James White, who had begun to print the little paper Present Truth in New England 25 years earlier, founded Signs of the Times (not to be confused with a Millerite paper of the same name founded in 1840 in Boston). The early numbers, beginning June 4, 1874, were issued irregularly for several months, and carried the name of James White as editor and founder. These were printed in a second-floor commercial print shop in Oakland, California.

Then an appeal was made at a camp meeting held in Yountville, California, in October 1874 for funds to establish a publishing house on the West Coast. The people responded with gold and pledges amounting to $19,414, and James White secured an additional $10,000 in pledges in the East. With this backing, the Pacific Seventh-day Adventist Publishing Association was organized on Apr. 1, 1875, with J. N. Loughborough as the first president. O. B. Jones, builder of the Review and Herald offices, was employed to construct the new building, which was erected on an 80' x 100' (24 m. x 31 m.) lot on Castro Street, between Eleventh and Twelfth streets, Oakland. James White journeyed to New York to purchase equipment and also persuaded five trained young people to go West with him to work at the new publishing house.

The publishing work, now on firmer footing, grew steadily. Promotion of the Signs of the Times by tract and missionary societies gave impetus to the magazine's circulation; within a year the list of subscribers had reached the 4,000 mark. Books and tracts also were published, and secular job printing was done. Two years later a larger building was erected on an adjoining lot. Furnished with electrotype and stereotype equipment and bindery, the institution had become the largest and best-equipped printing establishment in the West.

James White was editor of Signs of the Times from the beginning of the magazine in 1874 until shortly before his death in 1881. During this period he also served two short terms as president of the Seventh-day Publishing Association, and for most of this time he was president of the General Conference. Associated with him in managing the plant were his sons Willie (W. C.) and James Edson. Uriah Smith and J. N. Andrews assisted as corresponding editors. J. H. Waggoner succeeded James White as editor of Signs of the Times in 1881.

Charles H. Jones, formerly pressroom foreman at the Review and Herald, arrived at Oakland in 1879 to begin a service of more than 50 years as manager, vice president, and president. Within eight years business had increased until nine cylinder and three job presses were in use and 125 persons were employed. The investment in the plant was $200,000, and the annual gross business $150,000. Branch offices were opened in New York City (1888), in London, England (1889), and in Kansas City, Missouri (1893). In 1888 the institution's name was changed to the Pacific Press Publishing Company. Later, in 1904, a new organization, the nonprofit, nonstock Pacific Press Publishing Association, was initiated. However, the changeover from the stock company to the nonprofit association was not completed until Jan. 25, 1909.

Because it often interfered with the production of denominational publications, the large amount of commercial work being done created a growing problem. Eventually, in response to Ellen White's counsel, the board voted in 1902 to reduce the volume of commercial work. Since by this time the city of Oakland had grown up around the plant, the board also took action to seek a rural site for a new plant. This decision resulted in the removal to Mountain View, 38 miles (60 kilometers) south of San Francisco, in 1904. Here, on a five-acre (two-hectare) lot donated by the city a two-story brick building was erected, only to be severely damaged by the San Francisco earthquake on Apr. 18, 1906. A new building of wood construction was hastily built with the help of a $20,000 loan from the General Conference, but this building was reduced to ashes on July 20 of the same year by a fire of unknown origin. Part of this loss was covered by insurance. The board decided to rebuild once more, and to do only denominational printing. Said C. H. Jones, "We have been admonished by the earthquake and the fire. Let us not need the wind, but listen to the still small voice pleading, 'Do My work only.'" This policy has been followed ever since.

The London branch of the press was closed in 1893, and the New York branch in 1903. However, new branches were established in Portland, Oregon, in 1904 (closed, 1963), and Regina, Saskatchewan, in 1907. The latter was transferred to Calgary, Alberta, in 1910 and later sold to the Review and Herald Publishing Association. In 1915 the International Publishing Association in College View, Nebraska (organized 1903 to publish in foreign languages), was taken over by the Pacific Press as a branch. After the building of the International branch burned to the ground in 1916, the branch was moved to Brookfield, Illinois. In 1912 a temporary depository was opened in New Orleans, Louisiana, which was turned over to the factory branch (established 1917) in Cristobal, Canal Zone, which served the Inter-American Division. In 1918 a branch was organized in Mountain View to foster sales in local territory. In 1924 the Kansas City branch and a branch that had been established in St. Paul, Minnesota, were replaced by a branch in Omaha, Nebraska. In 1952 the Cristobal branch discontinued factory operations and became a depository; it was closed in 1955, the Spanish-language operations being transferred to the Brookfield branch in Illinois. In order to effect still greater economies of operation, the Brookfield plant was closed in the fall of 1959, after which date all foreign-language publications were produced in Mountain View, California. On Jan. 1, 1970, Pacific Press assumed the operation of Maracle Press Limited and Kingsway Publishing Association in Oshawa, Ontario, Canada.

The publishing function of Kingsway, renamed Pacific Publishing Association, continues to operate as a branch office of Pacific Press. In 1992 Maracle Press (by this time primarily a commercial printer) was sold to a group of employees.

By the 1980s the high cost of operating in the Bay Area of California, as well as other financial considerations, dictated a relocation to an area providing less expensive operating costs. In addition, such a move would make it possible to realize savings as a result of a more efficiently designed facility. After considering sites in several Western states, the board voted to relocate Pacific Press on 40 acres (16 hectares) of land in Nampa, Idaho. The move took place in 1984 in two stages. The office area moved into temporary quarters in Boise in the summer, while the factory continued to operate in Mountain View. When the Nampa plant was constructed, the factory moved from California directly into the new facility, and the office area occupied the new building in the early part of 1985.

Besides English language publications, Pacific Press also publishes in Spanish and French. A small number of publications, primarily Ingathering materials and Sabbath school lesson quarterlies, are produced in other languages as well.

Periodicals

Periodicals. The Pacific Press has published Signs of the Times (since 1874); The Pacific Health Journal and Temperance Advocate (1885—1905); The American Sentinel (1886—1900) and its continuation The Sentinel of Christian Liberty (1901—1903); Our Little Friend (since 1890); Primary Treasure (since 1957); Primary Sabbath School Lesson Exercises (1953—1984); Listen, A Journal of Better Living (1948—1994); Health (1934—1948); Present Truth (1948—1955); My Bible Story (1946—1956); Sabbath School Lesson Quarterly (now called Adult Sabbath School Lessons and issued in various editions) (since 1895); Primary Sabbath School Lesson Quarterly (since 1935); The Sabbath School Worker (1890—1901); Alert (1950—1971); Smoke Signals (1955—1979); and Israelite (1954—1982).

Books

Books. In its earliest days the Pacific Press served as an agent for books and tracts published at the Review and Herald; then in 1875 it printed a set of children's books, and these were followed by others: Golden Grains and four volumes of Sabbath Readings. Additional early books were Story of Pitcairn Island, by Rosalind Young; Story of Redemption, by William Covert; Heralds of the Morning, by A. O. Tait; Testimonies for the Church, The Desire of Ages, The Great Controversy, and Prophets and Kings, by Ellen White; a series of small books called "The Young People's Library," by Emma H. Adams; and The Place of the Bible in Education, Empires of the Bible, The Great Empires of Prophecy, Ecclesiastical Empires, and Great Nations of Today, all by Alonzo T. Jones. Books by Ellen White have constituted a substantial portion of all books sold.

Pacific Press also publishes textbooks for use in SDA elementary schools and academies, Spanish-language books for North America, books for literature evangelists, and approximately 30 new trade titles per year.

Records and Tapes

Records and Tapes. In 1955 the Pacific Press took over the production and sale of a record business begun by the Pacific Union Conference. In 1958 Chapel Records was organized as a separate department of the Pacific Press, producing high-fidelity recordings of religious music performed mostly by Seventh-day Adventists on both records and tapes. Today recordings are released in cassette tape and compact disc formats.

Pacific Publishing Association

PACIFIC PUBLISHING ASSOCIATION (Canadian Branch of Pacific Press Publishing Association, formerly Kingsway Publishing Association). A publishing house serving all conferences of the Canadian Union Conference, situated at 1148 King St., E., Oshawa, Ontario.

Beginnings of the Seventh-day Adventist Publishing Work in Canada. Before the printing of Seventh-day Adventist publications in Canada began, materials for distribution were published in the United States. George King, the father of colporteur evangelism, was Canadian born. He sold books and took periodical subscriptions in Ontario in 1878 and 1879. Nothing is known of any actual publishing until 1889, when the SDA Publishing Association branch was established in Toronto. G. W. Morse, who was manager of this branch, reported on the work there: "Under the supervision of the Canada Tract and Missionary Society, the canvassing work had already been taken hold of to a limited extent in the province of Quebec; and in the province of Ontario one canvasser had been engaged for a portion of the time since last December. Something had also been done in the Maritime provinces. Two canvassers were sent from Michigan to Toronto to start the work there simultaneously with the establishment of the office" (General Conference Bulletin, Oct. 22, 1889, p. 35).

Ellen White's Great Controversy and Uriah Smith's Thoughts on Daniel and the Revelation were being sold in Canada. In the same report Morse explains that it was the purpose of the Toronto office to import completed books for distribution in Canada, but because of import duties and other restrictions, it was deemed advisable to import plates for the printing of several editions of Bible Readings in Canada. A contract was made with a large publishing house in Toronto to manufacture an edition of Bible Readings, the Review and Herald supplying the electrotype plates and paper. At least 15,000 copies of Bible Readings were issued in this manner. In later years Ellen White's Patriarchs and Prophets was also printed in Toronto.

In 1895 the Canadian Publishing Association was organized, with offices in Toronto. In 1902 it was transferred to Montreal, then back to Toronto two years later. In 1908 it was transferred to Ottawa, three years later to Port Hope (about 30 miles [50 kilometers] east of Oshawa), and in 1913 to the city of Oshawa, where the work was carried forward in various temporary locations until the erection (in 1920) of the Canadian Watchman Press on the eastern outskirts of Oshawa.

Canadian Watchman Press. This new publishing house, an important addition to the work of the church in Canada, was made possible through the donation of the land and building, and the transfer of equipment and personnel in Oshawa and in Winnipeg to the Canadian house by the Review and Herald Publishing Association. A new provincial charter, designating the new institution the Canadian Watchman Press, granted permission to publish and print a denominational magazine and to manufacture books, papers, and materials connected with the business of publishing for the denomination in Canada.

The new institution was equipped with facilities for manufacturing books, magazines, and tracts on a comparatively large scale. During the years that followed, subscription books were printed and bound, and the finished products were distributed throughout Canada. Among the more important books printed and bound, in addition to the titles already mentioned, were Modern Medical Counselor and Ellen White's Desire of Ages, also health books for the French-speaking population. Other important books that were completed from imported material were Bedtime Stories, The Bible Story, and The Children's Hour, by Arthur Maxwell, and Drama of the Ages, by W. H. Branson. Several magazines were published: The Canadian Watchman (1920—1943), which later became Signs of the Times (1943—1954); Le Messenger, a French church paper (1924—1928, 1937—1953); and Les Signes des Temps (1928—1936), an evangelistic journal designed primarily for the French-speaking population of Canada.

Experience soon proved, however, that the demand was insufficient to maintain production on a full-time basis. After operating losses were encountered during the first several years of operation, a careful study of the problem of reducing the losses resulted in a decision to supplement the denominational printing program with a limited volume of suitable commercial work. This program was followed until 1938, when it was decided jointly by the General Conference Committee and the publishing house board to lease the manufacturing equipment of the Canadian Watchman Press to private management. Under this arrangement C. G. Maracle began operation of the Maracle Printing Company on June 1, 1938. However, two years later the Canadian Watchman Press assumed control of the Maracle Printing Company and followed the plan of operation that had been outlined by private management. This proved reasonably successful for a number of years.

The Maracle Printing Company was operated under the control of the Canadian Watchman Press until the end of 1952. At that time it was deemed necessary, in consultation with legal counsel and the General Conference Committee, to organize the Maracle Printing Company as a separate legal entity. Maracle Press Limited was then organized; and at the same time the name of the publishing house was changed from Canadian Watchman Press to Kingsway Publishing Association. This organization carried forward the purposes and objectives that were envisioned in the organization and formation of the Canadian Watchman Press, and effectively promoted the interests of the publishing work in Canada in cooperation with publishing secretaries in each part of the union field.

In 1969, after a study of the total publishing work in Canada, the Canadian Union Conference requested that the publishing responsibility for the Canadian territory be undertaken by the Pacific Press Publishing Association. As a result, the operation of Kingsway Publishing Association and Maracle Press was transferred on Jan. 1, 1970, to the Pacific Press, and the Canadian Union territory became a part of the book and periodical territory of the Pacific Press. Kingsway continues to function as a property holder for the land and buildings that are associated with the publishing house.

The promotion and distribution of Seventh-day Adventist literature in Canada has, since that time, been carried on under the name Pacific Publishing Association, with offices located in Oshawa, Ontario. Pacific Publishing Association continues as the Canadian branch of Pacific Press Publishing Association at Nampa, Idaho. Maracle Press, the commercial printing operation, was sold to private interests Dec. 31, 1992, and is not now owned or controlled in any way by the Seventh-day Adventist Church in Canada or by the Pacific Press Publishing Association. Denominational literature, however, still continues to be printed here in the same volume as before.

Pacific Union College

PACIFIC UNION COLLEGE. A coeducational senior college, founded at Healdsburg, California (1882), but since 1909 situated in Angwin, Napa County, California, occupying a 200-acre (80-hectare) main campus surrounded by approximately 1,800 acres (730 hectares) of college-owned agricultural and forested land. In the 1992—1993 school year student enrollment was 1,512, and the teaching faculty numbered 120.

Fifteen curriculums are offered leading to associate degrees, 16 to the Bachelor of Arts degree, and 38 to the Bachelor of Science degree. Professional baccalaureate programs lead to the degrees of Bachelor of Business Administration, Bachelor of Music, and Bachelor of Social Work. The graduate program in elementary education leads to the Master of Arts degree.

PUC is accredited with the Western Association of Schools and Colleges, and is authorized by the state of California to grant general secondary and elementary teaching credentials. The Music Department is accredited by the National Association of Schools of Music, the Nursing Department by the National League for Nursing, and the social work program by the Council on Social Work Education (baccalaureate).

Healdsburg College, 1882—1908. At the 1881 session of the California Conference the need for a school in the West was recognized. Ellen White urged immediate action, and on Oct. 20 a school board was named with her son W. C. White as chair. On Apr. 5, 1882, the purchase of the defunct Healdsburg Institute provided a two-story building and 100 school chairs. With two teachers, Sidney Brownsberger (former president of Battle Creek College) and his wife, and with 26 students, Healdsburg Academy opened a special eight-week term on Apr. 11, 1882.

More land was secured, and the first school dormitory in the denomination was dedicated in 1883. Brownsberger, anxious to avoid earlier mistakes in Michigan, stressed student labor. By 1884 students were employed in carpentry, printing, and painting, and it was planned to add shoemaking, blacksmithing, and tentmaking. This last, when adopted, proved to be the most profitable school industry. By the end of the first regular term the faculty numbered six and the students 152. At the urging of the townspeople, the name “College” was substituted for “Academy,” but the first “collegiate” graduate, Kate Bottomes, did not complete her course until 1889. The students, many of them of mature years, tended to come and go at will, for most were preparing for an immediate part in denominational work and were not interested in completing formal curricula. Despite warnings from Ellen White, charges were kept low to attract students (board, room, and tuition were $15 to $19 a month in 1882). The college was rarely solvent.

In the opinion of students and constituents, Healdsburg’s high point was the paternal administration of W. C. Grainger (1886—1894). The strong faculty included G. W. Rine, A. T. Jones, R. S. Owen, and the president himself, who was reputed to be a “walking encyclopedia.” With “substance, not form,” Grainger ran the school with Western informality, unvarying kindness, and firm principle. When he resigned in 1894, Frank Howe, Frank Moran, and W. E. Howell were sent from Michigan to achieve a more formal and “cultured” atmosphere. The economic panic of 1893 added to President Howe’s problems. Board and tuition were cut to $14 in 1896 and the opening of school was delayed until enough students could be found.

Under the leadership of M. E. Cady, the school’s fortunes rose for a time. In 1902 enrollment climbed to 298 (185 collegiate). Cady was especially interested in the training of elementary teachers and the preparation of textbooks. Among those teaching in the revived Education Department were Alma McKibbin, Mrs. H. E. Osborne, Katherine Hale, and G. E. Johnson. He was also active in developing school industries, of which 16 were reported in 1902. Students were supposed to work two hours daily as a minimum.

During the last years at Healdsburg, problems multiplied. Losses, particularly in the industries, resulted in substantial debt. Furthermore, as Ellen White had warned, the town grew up around the school, and a move was being discussed as early as 1903. Industries, faculty, and class offerings were repeatedly reduced; land and buildings were sold. To avert closing in 1906, the devoted faculty offered to operate on their own responsibility. In 1907 President Reed economized by teaching eight classes daily himself. The school was renamed Pacific Union College, with eventual relocation in mind. On July 14, 1908, the doors closed for the last time. Some 2,000 students had attended the college; about 400 entered denominational service.

The Move to Howell Mountain. Much of the responsibility for finding a new location fell upon W. C. and Ellen White. Mrs. White disapproved of the central valley because it was not retired enough, the climate was rather warm, and there were possible problems over the use of irrigation water on the Sabbath. In August 1908 an estate near Sonoma was considered, but defects in the title and other difficulties ended that negotiation. Ellen White said that if that deal was closed up, the Lord had something better for them.

Then on Sept. 1, 1909, Angwin resort was purchased. On Howell Mountain near the St. Helena Sanitarium, the property covered 200 acres (80 hectares) of wooded and watered land. Mr. Angwin, who wished to move to town, agreed to sell his property—land, buildings, swimming pool, orchards, and livestock—for $60,000. When Ellen White saw the property she expressed her thankfulness that the Sonoma plan had failed. At the dedication she said, “God wanted us here, and He has placed us here. I was sure of this as I came on these grounds” (E. G. White manuscript 65, 1909).

The Pioneer Period, 1909—1921. Even before she knew of Angwin’s resort, Ellen White had called C. W. Irwin to be head of the future school because of his service record at Avondale College. Less than a month from the time of purchase and with almost no funds or equipment, but with 42 students, he opened Pacific College. Not until February 1910 were the legal details settled, the transfer from local to union conference effected (the name being lengthened again), and the faculty confirmed by the board. Engaged but not all present the first year were C. W. Irwin and his wife, H. W. Washburn, G. W. Rine, Hattie André, M. W. Newton, Alma McKibbin, Frank Field, Dr. Maria Edwards, Dr. H. F. Rand, and Lois Randall. Among later arrivals were J. H. Paap, William Robbins, and G. F. Wolfkill and their wives, and E. J. Hibbard, N. E. Paulin, and C. C. Lewis.

The young women occupied the hotel building, the faculty the cottages, and the young men, the barn and castoff tents. After mornings in classes the teachers led the students in building, logging, and gardening. President, faculty, and student body united in the proud task of building and operating the new school. President Irwin kept the school solvent, but at times had to advance funds from his own pocket.

The first building erected was a women's dormitory (now Graf Hall), in use by 1912. In that year a classroom building was begun, but its second section was not completed until 1919. (Extensively remodeled in 1935—1936, it was renamed Irwin Hall.) The dance hall became the chapel, the bowling alley five classrooms. The men moved into the hotel after the women moved into their new dormitory, and overflowed into sway-backed West Hall (now vanished). Alhambra cottage was successively the administration building, the president's quarters, and the store. Eventually it sheltered married couples until it was pulled down to make room for Newton Hall. In 1912 Agnes Lewis (Caviness) received the first college degree awarded on the Angwin campus. Degree programs and departments gradually developed, as did a strong interest in premedical training. The first summer school was held in 1914. Said F. D. Nichol in a funeral tribute to Irwin, his college president, "With faith in his heart and a pickax in his hand, he carved a college out of a hillside."

Between the Wars. The W. E. Nelson and W. I. Smith administrations were characterized by continued growth, strong financial management, and a solid faculty guided by long-service department heads. A partial list from those administrations includes H. W. Clark, C. E. Weniger, J. M. Peterson (the first Ph.D. on campus, in 1928), Dr. Mary McReynolds, R. E. Hoen, Raymond Mortensen, L. L. Caviness, W. R. French, George Greer, Minnie Dauphinee, W. B. Clark, D. A. Courville, M. E. Ellis, G. H. Jeys, Charles Utt, W. H. Teesdale, O. C. Baldwin, G. B. Taylor, H. D. Wheeler, Lysle Spear, Anna Olson, and Gladys Stearns Ellis.

Academic progress included denominational accreditation in 1932 (the first college to qualify) and accreditation with the Northwest Association (another first). Majors, minors, and letter grades became standard after 1921. Faculty improvement through graduate study became policy in 1931. In 1929 a field school in natural history began and eventually developed into the biological field station at Albion, California (1946).

The first graduate study offered in a denominational institution began on the PUC campus in 1933 in the Advanced Bible School, with visiting and local faculties; moved to Washington, D.C., after three years, it became the SDA Theological Seminary. The present graduate program began in 1940. The A Cappella Choir was founded in 1927, and the permanent college band in 1937.

New buildings included a gymnasium (1922), North (now Grainger) Hall on the site of the old hotel (1922), the elementary school (now West Hall) (1927), Home Economics (1929), the science building (now Clark Hall) (1930), Paulin Hall (1932), Newton Observatory (1932), new classroom wing to Irwin Hall (1935), a new swimming pool (1938), and McKibbin Hall (1941).

At least 400 students and alumni served in World War II.

Postwar Years. There were four presidents in the next 12 years, during which time postwar adjustments in America had their impact on PUC. H. J. Klooster came to the college in 1943, providing dynamic leadership in strengthening and vitalizing the work at PUC, and leaving an imprint that survived his two short years on campus. P. W. Christian, succeeding to the presidency just a few weeks after V-J Day, continued the changes initiated by Klooster. He presided over PUC's most sudden enrollment growth and the consequent expansion of the faculty and the campus building program. Veterans returning to finish their education boosted enrollments from 550 in 1944 to more than 1,000 in 1948. New dormitories—Andre, Newton, and Dauphinee halls—were added in 1947, 1951, and 1963, and the old ones were remodeled. A new gymnasium was built in 1949. GIs, and later married students, lived in Quonset huts and trailers in what was called Vet Heights. Separate buildings were provided for the biology, chemistry, and physics departments.

In 1950 J. E. Weaver succeeded Dr. Christian. He presided over the affairs of the college during four difficult years of contraction, between the falling off of the GI enrollment and the arrival of the “war babies” as enrollment dipped for a few years below the thousand mark. His administration saw the faculty earnestly engaged in intensive and extended study of the ideals of SDA higher education. Growing out of that study were curricular innovations representing an effort to reach those ideals more successfully.

Dr. Weaver’s successor, H. L. Sonnenberg, had little opportunity to see his plans take shape, for he died prematurely in the summer of 1955 after just a year in the presidency.

During the tenure of R. W. Fowler, enrollment again grew. Major additions to the campus during the Fowler years were the Nelson Memorial Library (1958) and Dauphinee Hall, a women’s residence hall (1961).

Later History. F. O. Rittenhouse assumed the presidency in 1963. His administration was characterized by a spirit of expansiveness as enrollment climbed steadily from about 1,250 to nearly 2,000. He actively built up the number of faculty and staff and energetically pursued the renovation of the campus, thanks to the board’s commitment on his arrival of $5 million in building funds. These funds were put to more visible use than had been possible in any previous administration.

The campus was physically turned around. The entrance to the campus was placed on the highway and the ensemble of old and new structures was tied together by an impressive central mall descending from the Irwin Hall portico to a broad plaza and fountain. Major additions included Fisher Hall, erected for the Industrial Education Department (completed in 1964), the College church (1968), new Paulin Hall for the Music Department (1967), and the Dining Commons with the Student Center (1972). Angwin Plaza, built west of the county road, included the market, hardware, dry cleaner, bakery, bookstore, and the bank and post office buildings.

Succeeding Rittenhouse in 1972, J. W. Cassell became president. For the first few years of his presidency enrollment continued to climb, peaking at nearly 2,300 in 1975—1976. Davidian Hall (1975), phase one of a projected three-phase science learning center, was built to meet the need for more classroom space. To provide augmented student housing two new dormitories, Nichol (1976) and McReynolds (1977), were constructed on the high ground behind Irwin Hall, and Brookside Park (1974), the 40-unit married student housing complex was developed west of the county road. A chapel was added to Dauphinee Hall, the dormitory renamed Winning Hall and the chapel designated Dauphinee Chapel. Other additions during Cassell’s administration were the Rasmussen Gallery, a visual arts center (1974), and the Charles E. Weniger Memorial Alumni Park, the latter in the wooded corner where Prof. and Mrs. Noah Paulin lived for a half century.

As the decade progressed, the college enrollment leveled off, then sharply dropped. A declining college-age population, shrinking student financial aid from government sources, and decreasing financial support from the church as a percentage of operating costs, combined to create major challenges for the operating of the college through the 1980s and into the 1990s. Cassell and his administrative colleagues had to initiate the first phases of retrenchment that would continue into the next administration.

D. Malcolm Maxwell assumed the presidency in 1983, the first PUC alumnus to hold that position. In the last year of Cassell's administration, enrollment had plunged from nearly 2,000 to about 1,600. President Maxwell and his colleagues were faced with the financial consequences of the sharp decline in enrollment, with its attendant effects on faculty and staff morale. Although operating in a climate of fiscal austerity, with enrollment barely above 1,400 for a few years, the new administration succeeded in gaining the loyalty and support of constituents and among the faculty a renewed confidence in the future of the college. Despite financial pressures, it was possible to raise sufficient funds to resume construction of Science Complex II (Chan Shun Hall), which had been suspended for a few years. Irwin Hall, except for the classroom wing, had been demolished at the end of the previous administration, and the offices of president, dean, and registrar were relocated in portions of Graf Hall, along with the Religion Department.

Himself a New Testament scholar, Dr. Maxwell has taken a special interest in strengthening the Religion Department, bringing to its faculty both promising young teachers and mature scholars of distinguished reputation.

The Student Association existed from 1935 to 1936, and after a nine-year hiatus, was revived in 1945. Student publications began with the Student's Workshop (Healdsburg, 1884). The Mountain Echo was published from 1918 to 1927, and the Campus Chronicle since that time. A regular school annual appeared in 1927, 1928, and 1935, and under the name Diogenes Lantern since 1938.

The Alumni Association was founded in 1913. At the annual homecoming in April, tradition requires the lighting of a missionary map in honor of the year's missionary contingent. During the first 50 years of the association, it was claimed that about a quarter of the graduates performed overseas mission service. In recent years PUC students have continued the spirit of commitment, and since 1964 approximately 900 PUC students have taken time out to serve as student missionaries.

Alumni and friends have formed the Committee of 100 to help support specific facilities and projects important to the development of the college. Recent examples include assistance toward the financing of Davidian and Chan Shun halls, and the refurbishing of Dauphinee Chapel.

Presidents (at Healdsburg): Sidney Brownsberger, 1882—1886; W. C. Grainger, 1886—1894; Frank Howe, 1894—1897; R. S. Owen, 1897—1899; M. E. Cady, 1899—1903; E. D. Sharpe, 1903—1904; W. E. Howell, 1904—1906; L. A. Reed, 1906—1908; (at Angwin): C. W. Irwin, 1909—1921; W. E. Nelson, 1921—1934; W. I. Smith, 1934—1943; H. J. Klooster, 1943—1945; P. W. Christian, 1945—1950; J. E. Pacific Union College Preparatory School

PACIFIC UNION COLLEGE PREPARATORY SCHOOL. A coeducational day school operated by five local churches on the campus of Pacific Union College in Angwin, California. The board of trustees includes representatives from the churches, the Northern California Conference, and Pacific Union College. The school is accredited by the Seventh-day Adventist Board of Regents and the Western Association of Schools and Colleges with courses approved by the University of California.

The Preparatory School of Pacific Union College (established 1909) graduated its first class in 1911. The secondary school was operated in conjunction with the college until 1934, when the academy was separated in administration from the college but still housed in college buildings. The new academy building, named in honor of Mrs. Alma McKibbin, pioneer teacher on both the Healdsburg College and Pacific Union College campuses, was erected in 1941 and opened for the second semester of the 1941—1942 school year.

McKibbin Hall is a well-equipped three-story building, housing administrative offices, nine classrooms, two laboratories, a teachers' lounge/committee room, nine teacher offices, a library, and a chapel. The new wing completed in 1970 doubled the classroom space in the building. PUC Prep students also have the use of the physical education, music, and technology education facilities of the college.

Pacific Union College Preparatory School is primarily concerned with preparing students for college, but it also supplements the regular curriculum with specialized college classes. Four years of instruction are given in religion and English, but also available in social studies, mathematics, science, and physical education.

Students may elect three years of foreign language and two years of technological education.

The first school yearbook, The Window Tree, was published in 1943. The school paper, originating as a section included in the college paper, The Campus Chronicle, was first published as The Prep Chronicle in November 1956 (eight issues per year).

The 1992—1993 enrollment was 127; total school staff, 17 (including four part-time teachers).

Principals: Lloyd E. Downs, 1934—1935; R. B. Lewis, 1935—1938; R. B. Prout, 1938—1940; A. R. Monteith, 1940—1944; J. E. Young, 1944—1945; I. R. Neilsen, 1945—1946; H. E. Metcalfe, 1946—1948; W. H. Other Pacific Union entities include Elmshaven (Ellen White's last home); Napa Valley Adventist Retirement Estates; and Ventura Estates.

The Pacific Union Conference was formed early in 1901, at the General Conference session that voted the organization of union conferences. It was comprised of California, Oregon, Washington, Idaho, Montana, Utah and Nevada, Alaska, Hawaii, and British Columbia. The next year Arizona was added. In 1906 the North Pacific Union Conference was organized, leaving the total Pacific Union territory much as it is today with the exception that Hawaii went to the North Pacific Union. Hawaii again became part of the Pacific Union in 1929, having been a detached field under the Foreign Mission Board since 1909. Conference configuration has been revised a number of times for efficiency as the field has grown. Hawaii became a conference in 1982.

Paddock, C. L., Sr.

PADDOCK, C. L., SR. (1891—1972). Author, publishing house manager. A native of Illinois, Paddock assumed the support of his mother at an early age after the death of his father. In his early teens he began selling Seventh-day Adventist literature, thereby earning scholarships for his education at Emmanuel Missionary College. His first work following graduation was as a secretary to Dr. David Paulson. After his marriage in 1915 he and his wife moved to Grand Rapids, where he became manager of the West Michigan Book and Bible House and later the East Michigan Book and Bible House.

When the Review and Herald opened its branch in Winnipeg, Manitoba, in 1920, Elder Paddock was called as manager. He served there until 1928.

In Oshawa he served the Canadian Watchman Press, first as Book Department manager, and later as general manager and editor of the Canadian Watchman magazine. Later he served with the Southern Publishing Association as manager of the Book Department.

From Nashville he moved to California, where he assumed the responsibility of the Book Department of the Pacific Press Publishing Association. He served in this capacity until his retirement in 1962. During his lifetime he authored 23 books.

Pages, Augusto

PAGES, AUGUSTO (1866—1946). Administrator in Brazil. Born and brought up in Germany, he joined the Seventh-day Adventist Church in 1893, and beginning in 1899 was the first manager of the German health food factory at Friedensau. Later he worked at the Hamburg publishing house as auditor. He came to Brazil in 1905 as manager of the newly established Taquari publishing house (see Brazil Publishing House). From then until 1939 he was listed in the Yearbook either as manager or as treasurer of the SDA publishing house in Brazil. He retired in 1942.

Pakistan

PAKISTAN. An Islamic republic, formerly composed of two parts, East Pakistan and West Pakistan, which were situated on the east and west, respectively, of the Indian peninsula in Asia, and were separated by nearly 1,000 miles (1,600 kilometers) of Indian territory. Pakistan was created on Aug. 14, 1947, out of the predominantly Muslim areas of British India. In December 1971 the eastern sector seceded from the west and became known as Bangladesh.

The total area of Pakistan is 310,403 square miles (803,944 square kilometers), excluding the disputed and not demarcated areas along the Indian border. Its population (1994) is nearly 122 million. The people are of mixed ancestry, related to the peoples of Iran, Arabia, Turkey, and Central Asia. Islam is the state religion, and in 1994, 97 percent of the population were reported as Muslims.

Pakistan borders on India to the east and southwest, Iran to the west, and Afghanistan to the northwest. Its people are of mixed ethnic origin, ranging from dark-skinned descendants of Dravidians to light-skinned Pathans. Urdu is the official language of the area, but English is widely used by the educated classes.

The land is mountainous in the north, with numerous peaks reaching more than 20,000 feet (6,100 meters) in elevation, while the south has extensive semidesert. The Indus is the principal river. The climate is dry. The rich agricultural plains surrounding Lahore are very fertile. The staple crops are wheat and rice. Cash crops of cotton and tobacco are also grown.

The territory of Pakistan comprises part of the Pakistan Union Section in the Trans-European Division.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. Statistics (1993) for Pakistan Union Section: churches, 50; members, 9,030; church or elementary schools, 27; ordained ministers, 30; licensed ministers, 1; educational workers, 86. Institutions Institutions. Karachi Adventist Hospital; Pakistan Adventist Seminary; Qasid Publishing House.

Beginnings of Seventh-day Adventist Work in Pakistan. Colporteurs visited the area now called Pakistan in 1901, among the first of whom was Anna Knight, a Black American missionary. In 1909 A.C.E. Johnston reported in Eastern Tidings (4:3, August 1909) that he had a group meeting for Bible study at Karachi. Then, in 1913, S. A. Wellman, traveling from Simla to Lucknow, met S. Samuels, an independent Christian minister from Gujranwala. As they traveled along they studied the Bible together with the result that Samuels accepted the seventh-day Sabbath doctrine and invited Seventh-day Adventists to open work in the Punjab. Wellman visited Gujranwala in December 1913, and a little later Wellman and H. R. Salisbury traveled through the Punjab province. Much interest was developed through these visits and the work of S. Samuels.

After a tour of the region F. H. Loasby and Dr. V. L. Mann settled at Lahore in 1914. Assisted by A. Gardner, a national from northern India, Loasby and Mann began itinerant evangelism and medical work in the villages west of Lahore. By night they slept under their oxcart to protect themselves and the oxen from thieves. In 1916 Mann purchased 10 acres (four hectares) of land in Chuharkana, about 35 miles (56 kilometers) west of Lahore, for a medical training center, where men could be trained to operate village dispensaries (see Chuharkana Hospital Dispensary). Gardner remained to assist in the medical work. The mission was moved to the site.

Soon Loasby found 12 young men interested in village evangelism. After a period of training, six were sent out as village workers. Soon Sabbath schools and companies of adherents were formed in surrounding villages. In 1917 the first baptisms took place in the Punjab. In the same year a woman physician, Olive Smith, joined the hospital staff at Chuharkana. During that year land was purchased at Chichoki Mallian, about 15 miles (25 kilometers) away, for a new station. To it the Loasbys moved, and from there Loasby promoted village evangelism, while his wife opened and operated a dispensary. Baptisms were held in Warren, Jhandiala, and Dhundianwala. Among the first regular national workers in the area were Mehnga Mall, Kasim Ali, and Sardar Khan.

In 1919 Mann returned to the homeland and Dr. Olive Smith took charge of the dispensary. When she became ill shortly afterward and had to leave, E. R. Reynolds, a young American missionary with some medical training, was asked to look after the dispensary work until Ima Dowling, a nurse from Australia, could arrive.

In 1921 or 1922 the hospital at Chuharkana was discontinued and its building was afterward converted into a school for boys, with O. O. Mattison, a recent arrival, as its first principal (see Pakistan Adventist Seminary). E. R. Streeter took charge of the school in the autumn of 1924, when Mattison was released for village evangelism. About 1929 a school for girls was opened at Chichoki Mallian (see Pakistan Adventist Seminary). Between 1930 and 1936 a hospital was operated there (listed in the Yearbooks as Chichoki Mallian Hospital) by a missionary physician, R. C. Lindholm. But when he left, the hospital was closed. In 1946 the medical work in the area was reactivated when a dispensary was opened at Chuharkana by a woman physician, Mrs. C. W. Robbins. In 1947 a small clinic was opened in Karachi by a woman physician, G. Joy Ubbink, which by the end of 1951 had developed into the Karachi Seventh-day Adventist Hospital.

Evangelistic work in English was conducted in Pakistan by several men, among them N. C. Burns, F. H. Loasby, and J. C. Collett, who did much to build up the English churches in Rawalpindi, Lahore, and Karachi.

Organization and Growth. Until 1910 Seventh-day Adventist work in British India, Ceylon, and Burma was administered by the India Mission, organized in 1895, with headquarters at Calcutta. In that year, at the fourth biennial meeting of the mission held at Lucknow, India, October-November 1910, the Seventh-day Adventist work in India was organized along the language lines into four missions, among them the Bengali Mission, with headquarters at Calcutta, including the part that later became East Pakistan. L. G. Mookerjee, A. G.

Watson, W. A. Barlow, and W. W. Miller were assigned to work in East Bengal. W. R. French, who had recently arrived from America, was given supervision of the work in that area. He was succeeded by L. G. Burgess in 1915, and by L. G. Mookerjee in 1919.

The work in what is now Pakistan was not opened until 1914, when the Northwest India Mission was organized, with Dr. V. L. Mann in charge of the medical work, centered in the dispensary at Chuharkana, and F. H. Loasby in charge of evangelistic work. In 1917 this mission was joined with the North India Mission under M. M. Mattison, but in 1919 the work in Punjab was made a separate mission under the Northwest India Union Mission. F. H. Loasby became its first director. In 1937 the Punjab Mission was reorganized as the Punjab Local Mission Field. Five years later, in 1942, the field was divided into two missions, East Punjab and West Punjab. After the partition of India in 1947, the Northwest India Union Mission was reorganized and more local missions were set up, but the union itself was not broken up along the political division line until 1949, when the West Pakistan Union was organized with three missions, later called the Central Punjab, the largest and oldest, the Northwest Frontier, with headquarters at Peshawar, and the Sind, with headquarters at Karachi. Since the membership in the last two sections was small, they were later put under the union administration. At the time of this reorganization there were 12 churches with 918 members in West Pakistan Union. Duane S. Johnson became the first president of the West Pakistan Union, with headquarters in Lahore. The union offices were later moved to an 18-acre (seven-hectare) plot outside Lahore, called Adventpura. The East Pakistan Section and the Punjab Section were united under the name of Pakistan Union. At that time there were 18 churches and 732 members in East Pakistan, 14 churches and 939 members in the Punjab Section, and four churches and 111 members in the union territory, making a total for the Pakistan Union of 36 churches with 1,782 members.

Since the organization of the West Pakistan Union in 1949 the work has spread into many new districts. This has been done mainly through village evangelism, the Voice of Prophecy Bible correspondence school, village Sabbath schools, and the schools of the union. In 1948 a small mimeographed church paper, Pakistan Union Newsletter (now Qasid-e-Jadid), came into being.

A modern 72-bed hospital was built in Karachi in 1951. This was later expanded to 120 beds and a school of nursing was added. A small hospital situated in the Punjab at Chuharkana opened in 1946. This hospital later became a part of Pakistan Adventist Seminary, and operates now as a health center on the campus of the seminary in Farooqabad.

In November 1972 the Pakistan Union was reorganized with the administrations of two of its largest institutions being taken over by the Southern Asia Division. The Karachi SDA Hospital and Pakistan Adventist Seminary are thus directly controlled by and are responsible to the division headquarters. The reorganization also placed the area of Afghanistan under direct division control. Following the political upheaval and secession of the East Pakistan province during the Indo-Pakistan war of December 1971, East Pakistan Section also became inaccessible to the Pakistan Union leadership. Because of this, the East Pakistan Section became the Bangladesh Section, and the administration was taken over directly by the Southern Asia Division.

The reorganization provided greater scope for the union leadership to place emphasis on evangelism and worker training in Pakistan. In early 1974 the Ministerial Training Institute was begun in Lahore, with K. S. Brown as its first director and S. A. Ditta as his assistant.

The school was founded to train vernacular-educated young men to serve as workers in villages in the country.

Evangelistic efforts in the 1960s and early 1970s also promoted the growth of the work in a number of new areas. Work was begun in the interior of Sind and churches organized in Mirpurkhas, Hyderabad, and Sukkur. A new church building was built in Multan, and an evangelistic effort there resulted in a good group in that city.

In 1973 the union administration began to plan for a publishing house in Pakistan that would print material in vernacular languages and English. The Qasid Publishing House was upgraded in 1974 to do publishing work in the country. The press took over the printing of the monthly Sehat (“Health”) magazine, which has been in circulation since 1952. About 25 regular and part-time literature evangelists spread the message by selling imported and local publications.

With growing interest in evangelism, two sections were created and managed by the union. The Sind section catered to the needs of the south, mainly in Karachi. The Punjab section office was originally set in Gujranwalla and later moved to Lahore. The sections were renamed Southern and Northern, respectively, in 1990.

Geopolitical changes compelled the General Conference to rethink its strategy for the Southern Asia Division. In the reshuffle, Pakistan was attached to the Trans-European Division in 1986. At that time G. J. Christo, president of the Southern Asia Division, officially handed over the Pakistan Union to Jan Paulsen, president of the Trans-European Division.

The work continued only in established places for several years. The 1980s saw the General Conference promoting such outreach slogans as the One Thousand Days of Reaping, Harvest '90, and Global Mission to the world church. Funds came into the union for expansion of work in unentered areas. D. C. Beardsell spearheaded the work of expansion with a campaign in Karachi in May 1990 with Mark Finley as the speaker. Under the leadership of S. A. Ditta work entered places that had long been untouched.

A major concern of both the union and the division is the need to enter Afghanistan. Several efforts have been made in the past, but even those by ADRA International have proved futile. Adventist World Radio, with facilities in Adventpura, Lahore, seems to be the answer. Planned in 1983, the studio came into operation on Aug. 25, 1993.

A family from Afghanistan was baptized in 1992 and have been a vital help in the work of Dari—a language akin to Farsi. Programs in Urdu and Dari are being prepared for the air.

Pakistan Adventist Seminary

PAKISTAN ADVENTIST SEMINARY. A coeducational boarding institution offering education up to the college level. The seminary is operated by the Pakistan Union at Farooqabad Mandi, formerly Chuharkana Mandi, Sheikhpura District, some 35 miles (56 kilometers) west of Lahore in Pakistan. Its enrollment in 1993 was 375 and it had a staff of 60, including auxiliary workers.

The school had its beginning in the early 1920s, when the hospital building of the Chuharkana Mission Station, the first Seventh-day Adventist station in Pakistan, was converted into classrooms and a chapel for a boys' school. The school, then known as Punjab Boys' School, opened on Mar. 23, 1923, with about 40 students. O. O. Mattison was the first principal.

In 1929 M. G. Champion and his wife opened the Punjab SDA Mission Girls' School at Chichoki Mallian, several miles from Chuharkana. In 1937 this school was moved to Chuharkana and a coeducational institution was established. The new school, with H. C. Alexander as principal, became known as Chuharkana Mandi Elementary School. After partition of the state of Pakistan from India in 1947, this school was raised to high school level and became known first as West Pakistan Union School and later as Pakistan Union School. For a short period, beginning in 1957, two years of college work were offered, but this was discontinued. In 1964 a collegiate training program was reintroduced and the school became known as Pakistan Union School and College. The first senior college graduation with academic credit was in 1970. In 1973 the present name of the school was adopted.

The seminary currently operates at three levels: lower seminary (elementary), middle seminary (high school), and higher seminary (college). The elementary and high schools offer in total 10 years of schooling, which follows the normal pattern of education in Pakistan. The higher seminary offers bachelor's degrees in business, education, language, and religion. An additional year of studies beyond the bachelor's level leads to an honors degree.

Throughout its history the school has been associated with health care in the community. The work begun by Chuharkana Hospital and Dispensary has evolved into a rural development project that functions as a department of the seminary. This department, working in conjunction with ADRA/Pakistan, is involved in village sanitation and development programs and in operating satellite adult literacy schools. The department also operates a maternity clinic and provides health education to local Christian and Muslim communities.

Palau Mission Academy

PALAU MISSION ACADEMY. A coeducational boarding secondary school located in Airai state, Palau. Palau is the last United Nations Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands of Micronesia to have “free association” with the United States. Palau is about 550 miles (880 kilometers) east of Mindanao, Philippines, and 850 miles (1,360 kilometers) southwest of Guam. Palau Mission Academy is the only coeducational boarding school operated by the Guam-Micronesia Mission of Seventh-day Adventists and is accredited by the Far Eastern Division and chartered by the authorities of the republic of Palau. The property consists of a 57-acre (23-hectare) picture-window rural site view.

The academy began as an elementary school, which opened in a Quonset hut in 1952 under J. L. Bowers and his wife, first American SDA missionaries to Palau. About 55 students enrolled at that time and were taught by Mrs. Bowers and three Palauan young women. By 1956 the first eighth-grade class graduated, and the school had an enrollment of about 100. That year grades 9 and 10 were added and the school became a junior academy.

In 1957, under the leadership of W. A. Burton, more land was leased around the old school. A new school building was built by the church members, using materials salvaged from abandoned military buildings and equipment. Its six modern classrooms, erected at a cost of about $5,000, were first used in 1960. By 1961 there were 165 students enrolled, and the faculty numbered seven.

In 1962 E. W. Higgins, Jr., added the eleventh grade. At that time the enrollment reached 190 and the teaching staff 10. In 1963 the high commissioner of the Trust Territory authorized the chartering of Palau Mission Academy as a 12-grade coeducational school. The first senior class graduated on June 7, 1964.

In 1967 a typhoon destroyed the academy buildings. The secondary school relocated nine miles (14 kilometers) outside of Koror, next to the airfield, on its present site. The typhoon-proof concrete structures typify the building plans. The administration building consists of four classrooms, laboratory, home economics room, typing room, library, principal’s office, teachers’ room, store, storage, and restrooms. The cafeteria also serves as a multipurpose meeting place. The school farm is one of the best in Palau.

In 1977 the girls moved from their Quonset hut dorm to a new concrete dormitory. In 1980 the girls’ dorm was expanded further. A chapel was constructed at one end with the dean’s apartment under it. Pastor Willy Nobuo and his wife, Hatsumi, became the boys’ and girls’ dean in a big family setting. In 1987 Jack Penner built a modern gymnasium with classrooms at one end. The school poultry industry is producing eggs for the community, with 8,000 layers.

Palawan Adventist Academy

PALAWAN ADVENTIST ACADEMY. A coeducational boarding day school on the high school level, operated by the Central Luzon Conference of the North Philippine Union Mission. The school is situated on a 168-acre (68-hectare) lot in Tacras, Narra, Palawan, 75 miles (123 kilometers) south of Puerto Princesa, the capital of Palawan. In 1993 there were 260 students with 11 teachers.

Founded in 1967 as a junior academy, the school became a senior academy in 1973 when official recognition was granted by the government. The first class of students graduated in 1969—1970. Groundwork was laid in 1970 for a building to replace the original temporary building, which was made of bamboo. The new building houses the administrative offices, library, four classrooms, and an auditorium that seats 700.

In 1975 dormitories were erected for men and women. PAA has two faculty homes, a multipurpose court for students, and one vehicle (a pickup) for transportation. The school operates a rice farm, ranch, and orchards to augment its family needs.

Palmer, Cyril Stewart

PALMER, CYRIL STEWART (1893—1976). College administrator. Born in Tonga, he served as principal of New Zealand Missionary College (now Longburn Adventist College), New Zealand; Beulah College, Tonga; and Australasian Mission College (now Avondale College), Australia.

Palmer, Edwin R.

PALMER, EDWIN R. (1869—1931). Publishing secretary, administrator. Following his graduation at South Lancaster Academy and a period as publishing secretary in Vermont, he was appointed publishing secretary and secretary-treasurer of the Oklahoma Conference and Tract Society (1894).

Then he headed the publishing work in Australia and for two years was manager of the Book and Periodical departments of the Echo Publishing Company, at the end of which time, in 1899, he became principal of what is now Avondale College.

Returning to the United States in 1901, he became administrative assistant to A. G. Daniells. For one year (1904) he was manager of the Paradise Valley Sanitarium, and then for two years worked at the Pacific Press. Again, from 1905 to 1913, he served as secretary of the Publishing Department of the General Conference (during the first four years as secretary under a chairperson), and in 1912 he was appointed general manager of the Review and Herald Publishing Association. During his nearly 19 years in this office there was marked growth in all departments of the institution.

Panama

PANAMA. A republic in Central America on an isthmus that links South America with North America. It is bounded on the west by Costa Rica, on the north by the Caribbean Sea, on the east by Colombia, and on the south by the Pacific Ocean. The land area of Panama is 29,761 square miles (77,081 square kilometers). The population (1994) is 2.6 million. Off the coasts there are no fewer than 1,621 islands. Panama City, the capital, is situated at the south end of the 10-mile- (16-kilometer-) wide strip of territory known as the Canal Zone.

The country has a temperate climate and heavy rainfall. There are numerous small industries, and the main exports are pineapples, cocoa, bananas, and shrimp.

The official language is Spanish, but English is widely used. Panama is predominantly a Roman Catholic country. However, laborers from the West Indies brought in to work on the banana plantations and the canal were mostly Protestants, and their descendants still espouse that faith.

Panama was first visited by Spaniards early in the sixteenth century and was soon colonized. In 1513 Vasco Nuñez de Balboa crossed the isthmus and became the first European to see the eastern shore of the Pacific Ocean. Panama broke away from Spain in 1821 and joined Colombia, but in 1903 it declared its independence.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. Seventh-day Adventist work in the Panama region of Central America began when missionaries from the Bay Islands of Honduras visited throughout the area in the 1890s. In 1897 a schooner, The Herald, built by, and under the command of, F. J. Hutchins, a preacher-colporteur-dentist, served as a floating base of the work along the coast from Honduras to Colombia. When in 1901 the schooner was sold, the headquarters of the work was established at Bocas del Toro, Panama, where a plot of land, a building, and a small gasoline launch, The Messenger, were acquired. In 1900 the first SDA medical worker in Central America, Dr. John Eccles, joined Hutchins in the area, but less than two years later, in 1902, both died at Bocas del Toro. According to the General Conference Bulletin, by the end of 1901 there were 56 SDA members in the area.

About this time B. Thompson arrived and held open-air meetings for the English-speaking plantation workers, H. K. Humphrey, from Jamaica, went to Colón and preached on street corners, and I. G. Knight conducted tent meetings in Cristóbal, Canal Zone.

Organization and Growth. About 1903 the work was organized as the Panama Mission. At the end of that year there were three churches and four companies, with a total membership of 129. In 1905 C. E. Peckover preached to the many thousands of East Indians in the Canal Zone. In 1906 the West Caribbean Conference was organized, with H. C. Goodrich as president and with headquarters in Bocas del Toro. The territory included Panama, Costa Rica, Nicaragua, Corn Islands, and the Colombian islands of San Andrés and Old Providence.

In 1907 a church was built at Mount Hope, two miles (three kilometers) from Colón, with a membership of about 40. From this church canvassers were sent throughout Panama. One of the first canvassers in Panama City was Phillip Morgan, from Jamaica. Another early colporteur was Edward Burke, who canvassed in the provinces of Bocas del Toro and Chiriqui, as well as in the cities of Chitre and Santiago de Veraguas. In Chiriqui he met with much opposition from religious leaders, and his life was threatened.

In 1907 the conference headquarters were moved to Cristóbal, Canal Zone. At that time there were eight organized churches and 375 members in the conference. Later, from 1915 to 1922, the country of Colombia was added to the territory of the West Caribbean Conference.

From 1917 to the end of 1955 the Inter-American Branch of the Pacific Press operated at Cristóbal and exerted a stabilizing influence on the early work in the Colón area. On Apr. 5, 1921, the West Caribbean Training School, with an enrollment of 30 students and under the direction of Clarence J. Boyd, was opened in Las Cascadas, overlooking the Panama Canal. In 1931, after 10 years of operation, the school was closed. From 1923 to the middle of 1942 the Inter-American Division headquarters were situated in the Canal Zone.

In 1927 Costa Rica and Nicaragua, with Corn Island, were taken out of the West Caribbean Conference and organized into a mission. On Sept. 12, 1928, the territory of Panama, Canal Zone, Talamanca Valley (Costa Rica), and San Andrés and Old Providence islands became officially known as the Panama Conference.

In 1930, after several visits to the Guaymi Indian country of Cerro Iglesia, Ismael Ellis baptized 33 persons and organized a church. In 1931 José Chavanz was sent there, and a year later he started a school, which has continued to grow to the present. In 1963 there were 571 baptized members among the Guaymi Indians.

In 1945 the Panama Industrial Academy was opened at Pedrogalito, with L. A. Wheeler as director. The school operated for 10 years.

The Colombian Islands of San Andrés and Old Providence were transferred to the Colombia-Venezuela Union on Jan. 1, 1952, and on Nov. 23, 1956, the Talamanca Valley was transferred to the Costa Rica Mission.

Recent Developments. In 1962 Claudio Hernandez and his wife were sent to Río Sidra in the Mulatas Islands of San Blas to begin new work. Hernandez spoke the dialect of the Cuna Indians, who inhabit these islands. Under his ministry, 31 of these Indians became church members. Sixty-eight pupils enrolled in a day school. About 80 attended the two morning sessions of the Sabbath school, with about 40 attending the afternoon branch Sabbath school.

In 1963 a new church building was completed at Balboa, Canal Zone. It serves also as an evangelistic center for English-speaking residents of the area.

In 1964 work began among the Indians in the Darien jungles of the southernmost tip of Panama, bordering on Colombia. Obed Quiroz was sent to Yavisa, Darien, and found that the people had been praying that God would send someone to teach them the way of salvation. He enrolled 259 in the radio Bible school and began studying with each one. Several Sabbath schools were organized.

Panama Adventist Institute

PANAMA ADVENTIST INSTITUTE (Instituto Adventista Panameño). A coeducational boarding school located in San Vicente, Panama. The institution operates on a secondary level. The doors of the school were first opened in La Concepción, Chiriquí, under the leadership of Rafael Acosta. In June 1970, under the directorship of LeRoy Abrahams, it was transferred to its present location, which embraces an area of 250 acres (100 hectares).

This institution serves the young people of Panama and is recognized by the Ministry of Education of Panama. Three buildings originally constructed on campus for industrial purposes are now used as classrooms, laboratory, and dining room. Other buildings have been added that are used as administrative offices, boys' dormitory, auditorium, and maintenance facilities. A new girls' dormitory was built with funds from the Thirteenth Sabbath offering overflow of the last quarter of 1986.

Directors: L. Phillips, 1967—1969; A. Abrahams, 1970—1972; G. Melendez, 1972—1975; J. Caballero, 1975—1977; E. Alva, 1977—1980; D. Zimmerman, 1980—1981; J. Parchment, 1981—1989; A. Magallon, 1989—1990; H. Moreno, 1990— .

Panama Industrial Academy

PANAMA INDUSTRIAL ACADEMY. A former coeducational boarding school on the senior high school level established in 1944 and operated until 1955 by the Panama Conference to serve the English-speaking young people of Panama. It opened in May 1945 on a 154-acre (60-hectare) farm situated in Pedrogalito, Panama. The school eventually served both the Spanish and the English constituency and was authorized by the Panamanian government to offer full secondary work.

Papaaroa College

PAPAAROA COLLEGE. A coeducational boarding school offering grades 1—8, situated on Rarotonga, Cook Islands. The first Seventh-day Adventist school on Rarotonga was organized in 1902 with Evelyn Gooding as teacher. She was followed in 1906 by Mark Carey. A boarding school was opened in 1906 with 22 students in attendance. Some time later this school ceased to operate and its equipment was sold.

In 1938 an estate of more than 100 acres (40 hectares) was made available (on lease) at Titikaveka on Rarotonga to the mission, and a boarding school for 57 students was opened. A. C. Jacobson, the mission superintendent, operated the school with the help of a national staff. In 1945 N. W. Palmer was appointed the first headmaster.

In 1945 the school began a training program for Cook Islands workers, but in 1950, when Fulton Missionary School in Fiji began to train workers, the Rarotonga school reverted to its former program. In 1965 forms 3 and 4 were closed by government action, but in 1973 form 3 was reoffered, with form 4 following in 1971. Three new classrooms house these classes. The school is once again a day central school (academy) and offers 11 grades of education. Enrollment averages 100 students yearly. A new primary day school was opened in January 1975 on Aitutaki Island.

Headmasters: N. W. Palmer, D. H. Watson, J. Cernik, M. Taikakara, R. K. Wilkinson, R. I. Gotts, S. G. Thompson.

Papua New Guinea

PAPUA NEW GUINEA. A country made up of the eastern half of the island generally known as New Guinea (the western half is part of Indonesia and is known as West Irian or Irian Jaya), and several groups of islands, the Schoutens, the Western Islands, the Bismarck Archipelago, Bougainville, the Trobriands, Woodlark, the D'Entrecasteaux, and the Louisiade Archipelago as well as a number of smaller islands. The country of Papua New Guinea became self-governing on Dec. 1, 1973, and became an independent nation in 1975.

Papua, the southeastern portion of the island of New Guinea, was a territory of Australia, and until World War II was administered as a colony by Australia. From 1884 until World War I the northeastern portion of New Guinea, along with the Bismarck Archipelago, Bougainville, and several other island groups, was a German colony. Between the two world wars this territory was an Australian mandated territory under the League of Nations. During World War II the Japanese occupied many points along the coast and islands of northeast New Guinea and also the north coast of Papua, but were driven out by the combined American and Australian forces in the South Pacific. Throughout the war years the two territories were administered as one by the Australian New Guinea Administrative Unit, and since that time, until the declaration of self-government, the two territories were administered as one by Australia, the New Guinea portion being under a trust from the United Nations.

This country covers about 180,740 square miles (468,000 square kilometers) and has a population (1994) of 4.2 million. The people generally are of three groupings, Negrito, Papuan, and Melanesian, with a smaller number of Polynesians. Most of the people were animists, but the majority have now accepted Christianity, some islands being inhabited entirely by Seventh-day Adventists.

With more than 700 languages and dialects in the country, communication is a problem. The use of two lingua francas, Neo-Melanesian (New Guinea Pidgin) and Hiri Motu, has helped materially in the spread of the gospel and in the work of administration. English is the language used in education and to quite an extent in administration. Business in the House of Assembly is conducted in English with translations available in the two lingua francas.

The country is mostly rugged mountains, although there are extensive plains in certain areas. There are a number of active volcanoes. Dense tropical jungle covers a large portion of the country, but there are fairly extensive areas of grassland. There are many rivers, the three largest of which are the Fly, the Sepik, and the Ramu. The hydro power potential is great, and considerable development in this area is taking place.

The produce of the country is copper, gold, silver, copra, coconuts, cocoa, rubber, coffee, tea, timber and plywood, oil palm, chilies, pyrethrum, vanilla, and crocodile skins. While the economy of the country has been rather primitive, subsistence gardening being the way of life, in recent years there has been considerable development in cash cropping, and the economy of the country is undergoing a fairly rapid change. Mining dominates the economy.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. Because of the varying arrangements of the administration of Seventh-day Adventist mission work in this country, the history of the work will be taken sectionally.

Papua

Papua. Papua was entered in 1908 by S. W. Carr and his wife, and Peni (Beni) Tavodi, a Fijian teacher. The work was not easy. The government had divided the whole of the Papuan territory between three mission bodies—the Methodist, the Anglican, and the London Missionary Society. Under this agreement no other mission body could purchase land, because all land leased by the nationals was first bought by the government. Carr eventually succeeded in leasing 130 acres (53 hectares) about 27 miles (43 kilometers) inland from Port Moresby, at Bisiatabu. In 1909 he was joined by Gordon Smith and his wife, and a Rarotongan by the name of Solomana. A small school was opened for the indigenous people. Tavodi, who assisted in the work, died of snakebite after six years of service. A. N. Lawson and his wife came to Papua in 1911 and remained until 1921. Other leaders at the first station and the dates of their arrival included Gerald Peacock and his wife (1923), A. N. Lock (1924), C. J. Howell (c. 1928), and L. I. Howell (1931).

On Apr. 13, 1921, veteran missionary G. F. Jones and his wife sailed for Papua, where they explored inland territory on the now famous Kokoda trail.

About 1924 medical work was begun by Emily Heise (a nurse) and a Fijian national, Nafitalai. About that time work was opened at Efogi some 50 miles (80 kilometers) inland. All goods sent there were transported by carriers over high mountain ranges and over many rivers and streams.

By 1928 C. E. Mitchell and his wife had begun work at Vilirupu, and about 100 miles (160 kilometers) west of Port Moresby at Vailala, G. H. Engelbrecht and his wife were operating a station. In December 1931 Ross James, his wife, and Alma Wiles opened work at Aroma, 80 miles (130 kilometers) east of Port Moresby.

On Feb. 27, 1933, a training school for national workers was opened at Mirigeda, some 16 miles (26 kilometers) from Port Moresby, where for a number of years the headquarters were situated. C. J. Howell was placed in charge.

A mission boat, called the Diari (meaning "light"), for the coastal areas was supplied by the Sabbath School Department in 1933 and served the field for 25 years.

When the Japanese invaded Papua toward the end of 1941, the European missionaries left the work to the nationals. At that time there were 173 baptized members and 2,097 Sabbath school members.

On their return the missionaries found an orderly, progressive work. After the war the work developed rapidly. By 1948 a training school for the entire Papuan field had developed at Bautama, and by 1953 a central school was opened at Belepa. In 1949, in the reorganization of the field, Papua became a part of the Coral Sea Union Mission. Local mission headquarters were established at Port Moresby.

In the original Coral Sea Union Mission as formed in 1949, Papua was administered as one local mission. When the union was reorganized in 1953 Papua was divided into four local missions—Central Papua, Eastern Papua, Papuan Gulf, Western Papua. In 1959 the Western Papuan Mission was combined with the Papua Gulf Mission and became territorially the largest mission in the union. It is now known as the South West Papua Mission. Work in the northern district was pioneered by nationals and with the exception of the year 1973, the first year after the Milne Bay Mission was joined with the North Papuan Mission (now called North East Papuan Mission) was administered by expatriate administration. In the 1980s it began to be administered by nationals.

In the year 1959 L. I. Howell pioneered work in eastern Papua and a small local mission, the Milne Bay Mission, was developed and organized in 1962, with headquarters on Gesila Island. At a special meeting of the Papua New Guinea Union, Apr. 11, 1972, the Milne Bay Mission was joined with the North Papuan Mission and became the North East Papua Mission with headquarters at Popondetta. Throughout Papua, considerable progress has been made in recent years. In 1972 Central Papua had the distinction of having the highest ratio of SDAs per capita of population in the country, 1 in 24.

Bismarck Archipelago and Bougainville

Bismarck Archipelago and Bougainville. The islands of the Bismarck Archipelago together with Bougainville and associate islands just south of the equator are referred to by the people of the country as the New Guinea Islands.

Admiralty Islands

Admiralty Islands. The northwesternmost prominent group of islands in the Bismarck Archipelago.

In 1933 a native of Manus named Nugini, employed in Rabaul, New Britain, met SDAs and later, on a visit to his home on the island of Tong in the Admiralty Group, arranged for SDA missionaries to be invited to his island. He returned to Rabaul with the invitation, and in response in 1935 the mission vessel Veilomani, under Captain Gilbert McLaren, with A. G. Stewart, a minister, and several Fijian-Solomon Island missionaries on board, proceeded to the Admiralty Group, where they established a mission station on Tong Island and left Robert Salau, a Solomon Islander, in charge.

During the same itinerary the mission party visited the islands of Baluan and Lou. Later, churches were built and schools opened in both places. However, when Ereman Matani, a minister from Matupi Island, and four missionaries from New Britain took up residence on the island of Lou a little later, they encountered considerable opposition from the chief of that island. To meet this opposition, the missionaries began praying earnestly for the chief's conversion. After a few weeks he began to attend worship and became friendly. The work thrived, and the whole island quickly came under SDA influence.

In 1936 G. Peacock, superintendent of the Territory of New Guinea Mission, and A. S. Atkins, a new missionary, visited the island evangelists, and R. H. Tutty and his wife settled on Lou Island as the first resident European missionaries. They remained there until they were evacuated in 1942 at the outbreak of the Pacific war. During their stay mission work developed strongly and numerous outstations were opened throughout the group. They traveled by native canoe at first; later by a motor launch.

Mission work was continued during the Japanese occupation under the direction of Karese Manovaki, a Solomon Islander. Tutty and his wife returned in 1946. In 1950 R. A. Harrison placed three nationals from Manus as teachers in a new mission area of the Western Islands not opened previously for mission activity, about 200 miles (320 kilometers) northwest of Manus.

Before World War II the Manus district was attached to the New Guinea Mission; in postwar years, to the Bismarck Archipelago Mission. During 1951 and 1952 it was linked with the Northwest New Guinea Mission, but in 1953 the Manus Mission, with Manovaki as president, was organized as one of the fields within the Bismarck-Solomons Union Mission. In 1955 the mission was united with the New Ireland Mission to form the North Bismarck Mission, with headquarters at Kavieng. However, in 1964 the Admiralties again became a separate mission, known as Manus Mission, with headquarters at Lou Island, and with A. A. Godfrey as president.

With the reorganization of the union that took place at a special meeting at Lae on Apr. 11, 1972, the Manus Mission was combined with the Madang Mission to become the Madang Manus Mission, with R. A. Harrison, who had been president of the Manus Mission, as its first president, with headquarters at Madang. Effective January 1974, the presidency was localized, with Joseph Mave as president.

Bougainville

Bougainville. A sailor by the name of Sarago, a crew member of a trading ship, Drumba, was used of God to introduce the Advent message to the island of Bougainville. A native of the village of Lavilai, Bougainville, he was commissioned by his people to keep his eyes open in his travels for a mission that would help his people. At Tulagi, then capital of the British Solomon Islands Protectorate, he came in contact with J. C. Radley, who recommended the Seventh-day Adventist mission and arranged with H.B.P. Wicks, superintendent of the mission, for an initial contact to be made. Unable to be present himself, Sarago wrote a letter to his people recommending the mission, and according to native custom, he sent with his letter five arm bands and five strings of native money, and asked his people to indicate their acceptance of his recommendation by receiving the armbands and string money. They were accepted and in September 1924 R. H. Tutty and two Solomon Island missionaries, Nano and Rongapitu, arrived to open work on that island. A. J. Campbell joined forces there in 1927, and the following year the first two converts were baptized. One of these men, Taunai, was present at the jubilee celebration held at Rumba. D. H. Gray also helped in pioneer work on that island.

The Bougainville Mission was established in 1929 and organized in 1953. Cyril Pascoe began work there before the outbreak of the Pacific war and contributed much to the work until 1957. Because of civil strife, the North Solomons Mission (Bougainville Mission) has been administered by the South Pacific Division since 1990.

New Britain

New Britain. The largest island of the Bismarck Archipelago is New Britain. It is about 300 miles (500 kilometers) in length, and on an average about 50 miles (80 kilometers) in width. The terrain is mountainous and covered with dense jungle. There is one main town, Rabaul.

In 1929 G. F. Jones was appointed by the Australian Conference to open mission work in the eastern section of New Britain. Accompanied by G. Peacock, superintendent of the Solomon Island Mission; A. G. Stewart, vice president of the Australasian Division for the island mission field; and several national evangelists, he proceeded to the islands, and obtained a grant of land on Matupi Island in Rabaul Harbor. Jones and his wife established a mission station and began to operate a school. In 1930 Captain Gilbert McLaren arrived from Fiji with the newly acquired mission boat Veilomani and its Fijian crew and established his base at Rabaul. When the Joneses returned to Australia some time later, A. S. Atkins took charge of the school, and later McLaren left to search for new outstation sites on other islands.

The Matupi Island compound became the headquarters of the New Guinea Mission, which comprised the whole of the Mandated Territory. After the violent eruption of Mount Matupi a new headquarters site was chosen in 1937 at Palm Beach on the opposite side of the harbor. This mission station was completely destroyed during the Japanese invasion 1942—1945. Malcolm Abbott, the superintendent, and Arthur Atkins were captured by the Japanese, and both lost their lives.

In 1946 the headquarters were rebuilt and the field was reorganized as the Bismarck Archipelago Mission. In 1953 the newly formed Bismarck-Solomons Union Mission took over the Palm Beach compound, and the island of New Britain was organized as a separate mission field. E. A. Boehm, R. A. Harrison, and Cyril Pascoe successively served as presidents until 1961, when Joseph Mave, a national from Emira Island, was appointed to that office. In 1963 the field became East New Britain Mission, and consisted of the northeastern half of the island of New Britain and the southeastern portion of New Ireland.

The work in the western part of New Britain began in 1953 and was concentrated mainly on the offshore islands of Kombe and Witu. In 1961 a mission was established, and in 1963 the work was organized as the West New Britain Mission with headquarters at Silovuti, near the administrative center of the area of Talasea.

In 1972 the two New Britain missions were combined with the New Ireland Mission to form the New Britain New Ireland Mission. See New Ireland below.

New Ireland and Adjacent Islands

New Ireland and Adjacent Islands. New Ireland, situated north of the island of New Britain, is the second-largest island of the Bismarck Archipelago. Among the adjacent islands are the St. Matthias Group (Mussau, Emira, and Tench), New Hanover (Lavongai), Tabar, Tanga, Feni, Lihir, Nissan (Green Islands), and Nuguria. Seventh-day Adventist work is conducted mainly on Mussau, Emira, Tench, New Hanover, and Tabar islands. The leaders of the church there are all Melanesians.

The St. Matthias Group, comprising Emira (sometimes spelled Emirau), with a population of 530, Mussau, with 3,302, and Tench, with 48, was inhabited entirely by primitive people until SDAs began working there in 1930 under the leadership of Captain G. McLaren, then superintendent of the New Guinea Mission. With the newly acquired mission auxiliary ketch Veilomani, based at Rabaul, New Britain, McLaren visited Emira, Mussau, and Tench islands. Six months later, in 1931, he returned with two teachers from the Solomon Islands; one of them, Robert Salau, began work on Emira, and another, Oti, went on to Mussau. The people of the islands had been long noted for treachery and were regarded as a decadent race, but remarkable success attended these first two missionaries.

In 1932 two trained nurses, A. S. Atkins and his wife, came to Mussau and there established nine schools, taught by men from the Solomon Islands. Later a Fijian by the name of Nafitalai settled with his family on Emira, and Salau joined Oti on Mussau. S. H. Gander, W. W. Petrie, and teachers from the Solomons augmented the staff. Day schools were operated in almost every village until within two years all the inhabitants were converted to Christianity and became Seventh-day Adventists. The transformations that occurred within two years were so remarkable that a government official was heard to exclaim: "I have never seen, heard of, or read of such a change anywhere."

The work on Tench, a tiny circular island about a quarter of a mile (.4 kilometer) across and about six feet (two meters) above high tide, some 70 miles (110 kilometers) east of Mussau, kept pace with the developments on the larger islands of the group. The population of Tench is Seventh-day Adventist.

During the war years, 1942—1945, although cut off from European supervision, the church membership on these islands did not decline. The church activities were supervised by a Solomon Islands pastor, Rogapitu. After the war T. F. Judd became district director of the group and continued in that post until 1949.

J. R. Martin held the post from 1949 to 1954. Martin was followed by C. R. Stafford, who was succeeded by nationals. In 1955 the work there was organized as a part of the North Bismarck Mission. In 1964 the work in the Admiralty Islands was organized into the Manus Mission, and the remainder of the North Bismarck Mission was renamed New Ireland Mission.

Every village in the group now has an organized church and a well-built church building. Many of the church buildings are of European-type construction and are of a high standard of workmanship.

New Hanover, a small island off the northwestern tip of New Ireland, is about 35 miles (55 kilometers) long and 22 miles (35 kilometers) wide and its coastline is surrounded by a coral reef about 100 miles (160 kilometers) in length. The terrain is hilly and jungle covered; the population lives mainly in small villages.

SDAs began work there in 1949 when T. F. Judd and J. R. Martin placed Melanesian teachers in six villages. Martin made continued visits to the island. One of the early missionaries, Pikis by name, contracted leprosy on New Hanover and had to spend a number of years in a Hansenide colony. Upon recovery he resumed active service with the mission.

Although early successes were encouraging, permanent results have not been great.

Seventh-day Adventist work on Tabar Island, off the northeastern coast of New Ireland, began after Willi, the first local convert in the Territory of New Guinea, interested his brother living on Tabar Island, as a result of which a call was made for an SDA missionary. In March 1952 J. R. Martin visited there and left two Mussau Islanders. Later a church was organized as the result of their work.

The work on New Ireland Island has progressed slowly. However, the past few years have seen new areas of New Ireland opening up largely through the work of volunteer laity, and the prospects for advance are much brighter.

As a result of the reorganization that took place in April 1972, the two New Britain missions and the New Ireland Mission were combined to make the New Britain New Ireland Mission, and R. E. Cobbin was appointed president. The headquarters of the mission are in Rabaul. In 1990 Wilson Stephen became the first national president of the mission.

Northeast New Guinea

Northeast New Guinea. The first Seventh-day Adventists to enter northeast New Guinea as missionaries were G. McLaren, head of the New Guinea Mission, and 10 islanders (from Mussau and Matupi), who arrived in mid-July 1934. Mission headquarters at that time were on New Britain Island. They found that the indigenous people were primitive cannibals. Land that later became part of Kainantu Mission, central New Guinea, was surveyed July 19, 1934.

A few weeks later, early in September, W. W. Petrie, secretary-treasurer of the New Guinea Mission, relieved McLaren. Petrie's wife and his son, Arthur, arrived later and remained until the end of January 1935. On Jan. 4, 1935, S. H. Gander, his wife, and his daughter, Gwen, arrived and became the first permanent mission family. In December of the same year A. J. Campbell joined the Ganders, and early in 1936 his family arrived.

When World War II came to the Pacific in December 1941, E. M. Abbott, superintendent, was taken prisoner. Later he lost his life when the ship in which he was traveling was torpedoed. Kainantu Mission headquarters were bombed during the war, but little damage was done to the European-type buildings. Mission administration began anew Nov. 22, 1944, when C. E. Mitchell was appointed leader of the combined territories of Papua and New Guinea. This territorial arrangement ended Sept. 25, 1947, when the Bismarck Archipelago Mission was formed, leaving northeast New Guinea attached to the Papuan Mission. R. R. Frame was superintendent at the time of this division, and headquarters were at Port Moresby, Papua.

Effective Jan. 1, 1949, the Coral Sea Union Mission was organized, comprising Papua, the Trust Territory of New Guinea, and the British Solomon Islands Protectorate, within the Australasian Division, with Herbert White as president, and headquarters at Lae, New Guinea. At that time SDA work in northeast New Guinea was separated from Papua, with H. W. Nolan as president of the Northeast New Guinea Mission and E. A. Boehm, secretary-treasurer. Headquarters were established at Madang, New Guinea.

Later, when mission activities spread over coastal areas, the highlands territory was divided into the Northeast New Guinea Mission and Northwest New Guinea Mission.

In 1953 the territory was reorganized when the British Solomon Islands Protectorate and adjacent islands were separated from the Coral Sea Union Mission and became known as the Bismarck-Solomons Union Mission, with E. A. Boehm as president and headquarters at Rabaul, New Britain. There were 12 churches with 1,292 church members, and 123 Sabbath schools with 13,069 members.

In the same year, northeastern New Guinea territory was divided into five local missions: Western Highlands, Eastern Highlands, Morobe, Madang-Manus, and Sepik.

With nearly a third of the country's population in the five highlands districts, this area comprising the Eastern Highlands Mission and the Western Highlands Mission became a very fruitful area for evangelism. With its 8,404 members, the Eastern Highlands Mission in the 1970s was the largest mission or conference in the Australasian Division. In 10 years the church membership in the Western Highlands Mission almost trebled, from 1,612 to 4,826, and the Eastern Highlands Mission almost doubled, from 4,388 to 8,404.

The union organization that became effective in 1953 remained in force until April 1972. Because of the rapid political development of the country, with independence looming in the near future, it was felt that our church should speak with one voice in the country. Accordingly at the annual meeting of the Australasian Division of Nov. 23, 1971, it was voted that there should be a reorganization of the three union missions of the Australasian Division (now South Pacific Division). As a result of the reorganization, the Coral Sea Union Mission and the Bismarck Solomons Union Mission ceased to be, and the Papua New Guinea Union Mission came into being, with O.D.F. McCutcheon as president. In this organization the whole of the country of Papua New Guinea became the territory of the Papua New Guinea Union Mission. With a church membership of 152,000, this union is the largest within the South Pacific Division and in membership more than twice the size of the other two union missions combined. The South Pacific Division in session in 1990 elected the first national union president, Yori Hibo.

Aircraft have played a large part in the development of SDA work in Papua New Guinea. To help in its administrative and evangelistic program, this union presently utilizes two aircraft. The use of these aircraft has assisted considerably in the work throughout the union. The new union mission organization became effective Apr. 1, 1972. The old Coral Sea Union Mission headquarters at Lae became the headquarters of the Papua New Guinea Union Mission. A new office building that was projected was enlarged and built and is now the administrative center of the union mission. At a special meeting called on Apr. 11, 1972, the local mission arrangement was decided. In order that the union mission committee would not become unwieldy, some local missions were combined to make 10 local missions within the union. As of March 1993 all local missions were under national leadership.

Papua New Guinea Union Mission Bible Workers' Training School

PAPUA NEW GUINEA UNION MISSION BIBLE WORKERS' TRAINING SCHOOL. A school to train Bible instructors for the area, established 1964. It was situated on the same compound with the Omaura Hospital, about 20 miles (32 kilometers) from Kainantu, Papua New Guinea. During its operation, about 20 young men graduated each year, most of whom were appointed as missionaries.

The school was forced to close in December 1991 because of continuous civil strife.

Paracey, Nadejda Antonovna

PARACEY, NADEJDA ANTONOVNA (1928—1988). Translator. Born into a Ukrainian Seventh-day Adventist family, she married a minister and was a constant source of courage, love, and inspiration to him, family, and friends. During her lifetime she translated 12,500 pages of Ellen White writings into the Russian language. She actively spread the three angels' messages and was an encouragement to all she met, welcoming them into her home and heart. She lived in Russia and Moldova, but later returned to Ukraine, her homeland. She dedicated more than 40 years to the service of God and others.

Paradise Valley Hospital

PARADISE VALLEY HOSPITAL. A 228-bed general hospital operated by Adventist Health System/West, in Greater San Diego at 2400 East Fourth Street, National City, California.

The origin of this medical institution may be traced back to 1901, according to Mrs. T. S. Whitelock, wife of Dr. T. S. Whitelock, who in that year was operating a treatment room under the direction of the Southern California Conference at Fourth and C streets in San Diego. In this same year Ellen White communicated with Dr. Whitelock, telling him of her interest in obtaining property for a medical institution near San Diego. A few weeks later John Boal, who had been coming to the treatment rooms, told Dr. Whitelock of a piece of property, a defunct medical institution, in National City that he thought suitable for an expansion of the work carried on in the treatment rooms. Boal stated that the first mortgage of $22,000 was held by a Dr. Harrison, who was eager to dispose of it even at a considerable sacrifice. Dr. Whitelock began to negotiate at $18,000 with Dr. Harrison.

In September 1902 Ellen White saw the property, a three-story building of about 50 rooms on a 20-acre (eight-hectare) site beautifully landscaped with rare shade trees, situated in Paradise Valley, and approved its purchase if the money could be raised. The original institution had opened for patients, under the planning and guidance of Dr. Anna Longshore Potts, on Dec. 6, 1888; mainly because of a lack of water it did not remain open for long, and after another attempt in 1894 it failed again for the same reason. Ellen White was certain that water would be found.

When the price was reduced to $8,000 through negotiation, Dr. Whitelock took his wife and some friends to see the property. While they were in the building, two women drove up and entered. When one of the women spoke favorably of the building, Dr. Whitelock began to point out that the cost of renovating would be high. On learning that he was Dr. Whitelock, she said, "I have been looking for you. I feel that if you offer $6,000 now for the property, Dr. Harrison will take the offer." Dr. Whitelock telegraphed Ellen White, who advised him to proceed, and assured him that $4,000 would be forthcoming if he could close the deal. Upon Dr. Whitelock's telegraphing a bona fide cash offer of $4,000, Dr. Harrison accepted. If action had not been immediate, the property would have gone to another, for an offer of $6,000 was then on the way by mail.

But the leaders in southern California, without money and faced with heavy debts, could not be persuaded to venture into the operation of a medical institution at that time. Mrs. Josephine Gotzian and C. S. Ballenger joined Ellen White, each putting $2,000 into the venture in order to open the institution. It was operated for a time by a stock company, and E. R. Palmer was the first business manager. During the first months of preparation, water as well as money was scarce, but Ellen White insisted that water was available if they would dig for it. A well, which was dug in November 1904, yielded, much to the surprise of everyone, an abundant supply of pure water for the young institution.

Late in 1904 the Paradise Valley Sanitarium opened its doors to patients. T. S. Whitelock, M.D., was the first medical superintendent. The first recorded board meeting, dated Apr. 12, 1904, lists: "Present: W. C. White, W. B. White, J. F. Ballenger, Prof. E. S. Ballenger, J. A. Burden, F. I. Richardson, T. S. Whitelock, M.D., L. O. Johnson, Sophie Johnson, M.D., and E. R. Palmer. W. B. White, chair, and E. R. Palmer, secretary." Several of these names were closely connected with the institution for more than a quarter of a century. J. A. Burden had an active hand in several major building projects.

By April 1905, 13 stockholders held stock in the amount of $11,900 and the institution was solvent, with $500 in the bank. On Apr. 21, 1905, T. H. Robinson was chosen as business manager. The board set his salary at $12 per week and board, and that of the medical director, Dr. Whitelock, at $17 per week. J. F. Ballenger, serving during the winter of 1905—1906 as the institution's first chaplain, received room and board as total remuneration.

In April 1906 a three-story addition was begun that was to house treatment rooms and additional patients' rooms. At the same time negotiations were being made to transfer the sanitarium to the Southern California Conference, but it was not until Aug. 9, 1912, that final arrangements for the transfer were completed.

In 1949 two more floors were added to the building housing the physical therapy department, kitchen, and surgical floor (begun in 1928), and a complete remodeling of the older part was finished.

In 1962 a modern laundry, boiler house, and a multipurpose assembly room were completed as the first step in a modernization program. In 1966 a completely new hospital of 150 beds was built on a site located at the northwestern part of the property, facing Fourth Street. In addition to providing 150 beds (the majority being private rooms), the services included a primary emergency room (accessible by helicopter), radiology, physical therapy, laboratory, occupational therapy, respiratory therapy, social services, pharmacy, EKG and EEG departments, nuclear medicine, and the first home-care service licensed in San Diego County.

With the occupation of the new hospital building, the original structure was razed, except that one of the concrete wings was renovated to serve as a long-term skilled-nursing facility of 83 beds. Paradise Valley Manor, a retirement home for senior citizens, now occupies this site.

In 1972 a west wing was added, bringing the acute bed capacity to 210. The emergency room, intensive- and coronary-care units, medical records, and departmental offices were moved to quarters in the new wing.

During the intervening years the hospital has grown to 228 beds with the addition of a four-story, 70,000-square-foot (6,500-square-meter) outpatient pavilion and medical office building opening in 1994. Future plans include a new 10-bed pediatric wing and a new 10-bed surgicenter.

A training school for nurses was organized in 1909. The first class graduated two members in 1912. Shortly after the registration of nurses became effective in California in 1914, the school was accredited by the state and continued as an accredited School of Nursing until its transfer to Loma Linda University, La Sierra, in 1967. A total of 729 students graduated from the Paradise Valley School of Nursing.

In nursing service and nursing education the following individuals have given prominent leadership: Lucia Perry, three years; Winifred Frederick, three years; Myrtle Phillips, three years; Cora Parrett, eight years; Helen Rice, 17 years; Ernestine Gill, four years; Bertha Parker, 11 years; Verdelle Ells, nine years; Elsie Ziprick, three years; Maxine Blome, nine years; Carolyn Johnson, two years; and Carrie Lyster, five years.

Medical Directors: T. S. Whitelock, 1904—1906; R. S. Cummings, 1907—1911; F. F. Abbott, 1911—1913; T. J. Evans, 1914; W. J. Johnson, 1914—1916; O. S. Parrett, 1916—1919; A. D. Butterfield, 1919—1936; C. E. Nelson, 1936—1943; J. W. Warren, 1943; A. R. Stadin, 1943—1946; Horace A. Hall, 1946—1948; C. E. Randolph, 1951—1954.

In 1954 the hospital began electing a two-year-term chief of staff to serve as medical director. Chiefs of Staff: Joseph C. Hayward, Gordon Skeach, Arne Knutsen, William F. Baker, Kenneth J. Cales, Edward J. Sheldon, Matthew A. Williams, Warren L. Ralph, Russell Zetterlund, Jacquelin Trestrail, Calvin Maloney, Michael J. Renshle, William D. Paraguay PARAGUAY. An inland republic situated in south central South America, bounded on the east and north by Argentina and Brazil, on the northwest by Bolivia, on the west and south by Argentina, having an area of 157,047 square miles (406,750 square kilometers), and a population (1994) of 5.2 million. Ninety-five percent of the population are classed as mestizo. Roman Catholicism is the established religion, but the constitution provides that other religions are to be tolerated “if they are not contrary to public morality and order.” It is estimated that there are more than 50,000 Protestants in the country. Spanish and Guarni, an Indian language, are the official languages. The Paraguay River, which runs from north to south, divides the country into two distinct parts. The eastern third of the republic consists of rolling, occasionally mountainous, country covered with meadows and hardwood forests; the western two thirds is made up of undulating alluvial plains covered with grassy prairies and swamps. The climate is generally mild to subtropical, but subject to extremes because of the nature of the terrain, which allows dry, cold polar winds to flow in from the south and hot, humid winds to blow in from the north. Paraguayan economy is based chiefly on agriculture, cattle raising, and forestry.

Historical Background

Historical Background. The original inhabitants of what is now Paraguay were Indians, who had achieved a high degree of civilization in pre-Columbian times, and who were divided into various tribes all speaking the same language, Guarani. The first European to visit what is now Paraguay is believed to have been Alejo Garcia, a Spanish explorer, who was killed somewhere in Paraguay about 1520. In 1537 Juan de Salazar, a Spanish adventurer, founded Asunción, the present capital. Shortly after this event the region that is now Paraguay was placed under the viceroyalty of Peru. In 1608 Spanish Jesuit missionaries succeeded in winning over the warlike Guarani Indians and establishing a system of government that was practically independent of all other colonial authorities, and that continued until 1767.

In 1776 Paraguay was transferred to the viceroyalty of the Rio de la Plata. When the Hispano-American War of Independence broke out in 1811, Paraguay supported the Spanish governor against Argentinean revolutionaries, then deposed the Spanish governor and declared its independence on May 14.

From the time of its independence until now, Paraguay has been dominated by dictatorships. Early dictators were Jose Rodriguez Francia (1814—1840), Carlos Antonio López (1844—1862), and his son, Francisco Solano López (1862—1870). Under the younger Lopez, Paraguay fought against Brazil, Argentina, and Uruguay in the War of the Triple Alliance, which is generally regarded as the bloodiest war in Latin American history. In five years its population of approximately 1.2 million was reduced to an estimated 28,000 men and about 200,000 women.

Recuperation of the prostrate nation occupied the people for the next 50 years. In 1870, the year the war ended, a new constitution was adopted, which continued in force until 1940.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

In 1932 a long smoldering controversy between Paraguay and Bolivia erupted in the Chaco War, in which Paraguay was victorious, and in 1938 it was awarded about three fourths of the disputed territory it claimed. The history of Paraguay since the armistice (1935) has been marked by a succession of revolutions and dictatorships.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. The territory of Paraguay constitutes the Paraguay Mission, within the Austral Union Conference, which in turn is in the South American Division. Statistics (1992) for the Paraguay Mission: churches, 63; members, 5,458; schools, 11; ordained ministers, 10; licensed ministers, 8; teachers, 16; colporteurs, 129. Headquarters: Kubitschek 899, Asunción, Paraguay.

Institutions

Institutions. Asunción Adventist Academy; Asunción Adventist Sanitarium; Hohenau Adventist Sanitarium.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. According to extant records, the first SDA worker to visit Paraguay was Lionel Brooking, a colporteur, who sold books in the Gran Chaco of Paraguay in the latter part of 1892 (General Conference Bulletin 1:462, Mar. 4, 1895). In August 1900 E. W. Snyder and his wife arrived from the United States. SDA canvassers had reported that a German at Colonia Nacional (National Colony), Paraguay, had accepted SDA teachings through reading a German paper sent to him by his brother in Uruguay (Missionary Magazine 12:430, 431, September 1900; Review and Herald 78:382, June 11, 1901). Through further distribution of the same paper (Der Christliche Hausfreund), others became interested, and four families began to observe the Sabbath (ibid. 77:640, Oct. 2, 1900). Snyder visited the interested Germans and began securing the names of colonists in various parts of Paraguay, to whom he sent publications (ibid. 78:382, June 11, 1901). As a result of the interest aroused, five persons were baptized late in 1901 at Colonia Nacional (Missionary Magazine 14:41, January 1902), apparently the first converts in Paraguay. Around the beginning of 1903 Snyder and his wife were called to work in River Plate Mission office in Buenos Aires, leaving Paraguay without any SDA workers until the latter part of 1903, when Juan McCarthy and R. H. Habenicht visited interested persons (probably in Asunción, the capital) in Paraguay, and left six keeping the Sabbath. Late in 1904 Luis Ernst, who was working in Corrientes province, Argentina, was asked to go to Paraguay in order “to strengthen the few brethren there” (La Revista Adventista, Supplement 5:4, February 1905).

Early Organization and Growth. In 1906, in harmony with a recommendation of the South American Conference, Paraguay and Misiones province in Argentina, formerly administered by the union conference, were constituted a separate mission, which became known as the Upper Paraná Mission (Misión Alto Paraná), with Luis Ernst as its superintendent. The first general meeting of this mission was held at Santa Ana, Argentina, late in 1907. Early in 1907, as a result of the work of Luis Ernst and Ignacio Kalbermatter, a church with 12 members was organized in Asunción.

Seventh-day Adventist work in Paraguay progressed slowly because of the influence of the clergy over the people and the unstable political conditions that existed, but by 1912 there were seven churches, two ordained ministers, and 198 members in the country. Most of these members were foreign colonists, who were scattered throughout the country.

In the middle of 1916, a church of 14 members was organized in Asunción, where work had been begun in 1902, but with “very meager results” (Review and Herald 97:14, Apr. 8, 1920). Results were meager also in the rest of Paraguay, as indicated by the paucity of reports on the work in Paraguay in SDA periodicals between 1920 and 1937.

Shortly after the conclusion of the Chaco War, La Revista Adventista (37:11, Oct. 18, 1937) reported: “The late war between Paraguay and Bolivia reduced . . . the number of our believers [in Paraguay]. In spite of this, there yet remain around 100 faithful brothers in that republic. . . .”

After this war Seventh-day Adventist work began to make a gradual recovery. The Clinica Fisioterápica Mayo (Mayo Physiotherapy Clinic), situated on 25 de Mayo Street in Asunción, from which it took its name, was opened Aug. 4, 1945, by two nurses, Miguel Esparcia and Arnol Treiyer. The Asunción Seventh-day Adventist church building, begun early in 1947, was inaugurated May 15, 1948, in spite of a revolution that swept the country while the building was being constructed.

Later Developments. On Dec. 21, 1947, the Austral Union organized Paraguay as a separate mission in recognition that it was “capable of administering its own affairs” (La Revista Adventista 48:13, Aug. 2, 1948). By the end of 1948 membership stood at 168.

Membership continued to increase, reaching 513 by 1959. The same year, on July 26, the Sanatorio Adventista del Paraguay (Paraguay Adventist Sanitarium), which absorbed the Clinica Fisioterápica Mayo, was established in Asunción. There was a decline in church membership after 1959. In 1961 membership stood at 361, but by 1963 it had increased to 412.

In 1965 there were 596 baptized members, in 1970, 745, and at the end of 1974, 1,089. The SDA Church is growing with the population, being the only church established in some villages. In 1974 this became more noticeable with an increase in baptisms. In the 10 years before 1973, 789 were baptized; or an average of 78.9 yearly. In 1974, 183 members were added through baptism. By 1992 the membership had reached more than 5,000.

An increase in the work among Japanese immigrants is helping the church in Paraguay. A boarding school for Japanese young people born in Paraguay has been established. The school is situated in Asunción, on a property of 21,500 square feet (2,000 square meters) donated by Dr. Joseph Nozaki, who served as medical missionary in the Paraguay Adventist Sanitarium and Hospital.

In 1962 steps were taken to establish another sanitarium in Paraguay, and the first edifice was erected in 1963. That same year Dr. Carlos Drachenberg was named director of the Hohenau Adventist Sanitarium and Hospital, situated 22 miles (36 kilometers) from Encarnación, the second important city in Paraguay. In 1992 there were 22 beds, five physicians, and eight nurses serving the institution.

Paraná Adventist Academy

PARANÁ ADVENTIST ACADEMY (Instituto Adventista Paranaense). A coeducational boarding school on the high school level. It is owned and operated by the North Paraná Conference in Brazil.

The school is a successor to the Colégio Adventista de Butiá (Butiá Adventist School), founded in 1940 near Mafra, Santa Catarina. At first the Butiá school, with Werner Frank as principal and teacher, offered only a primary course. In time, secondary courses were added, and later the curriculum standards were raised further. The initial enrollment of 47 in 1941 increased to 93 in 1945. The following were the directors of the Butiá school: Waldemar Ehlers, 1941—1942; Emílio Rodrigues Azevedo, 1943—1944; José Darcí de Carvalho, 1945; Romeu Ritter dos Reis, 1945—1947.

Because of its distance from a principal city, which created administrative problems, this school was transferred in 1946 to near Curitiba. Construction was begun in 1946 and classes opened in 1948, under the direction of Romeu Ritter dos Reis. The curriculum was officially accredited the following year. Enrollment increased to 343 in 1973. However, at the beginning of 1974 the school was transferred again, this time to the northern part of the state of Paraná, because the land was expropriated by the city. The new site is 13 miles (21 kilometers) from the city of Maringá, in Ivatuba County.

The soil of this 900-acre (365-hectare) property is excellent and well suited for the production of wheat, soybeans, rice, cotton, et cetera. The farm has 300 head of cattle. The school's facilities were enlarged in the late 1970s. In 1992 the academy had an enrollment of 254 and a faculty and staff of 31.

Directors: Romeu Ritter dos Reis, 1948—1950; Enoch de Oliveira, 1951; Jacob Germano Streithorst, 1952—1954; Dario Garcia, 1955—1957; Rubens Segre Ferreira, 1957—1959; Renato Emir Oberg, 1960—1961; Arthur Dassow, 1962—1966; Earle P. Linhares, 1966—1972; N. S. de Abreu, 1972—1973; Edmir de Oliveira, 1973—1977; Irineu Rosales, 1977—1984; Albino Marks, 1985—1986; Valter Aniceto de Souza, 1987—1990; José de Azevedo, 1991—1992; Jose Paulo Martini, 1993— .

Parane Secondary School

PARANE SECONDARY SCHOOL. A boarding school on the secondary level located in the Same district of Kilimanjaro Region in Tanzania. It is owned and sponsored by the Tanzania Union. Established in 1975, there were 320 students enrolled in 1993 in grades 9—12.

The school accepts students from all parts of the country, from both Seventh-day Adventist and non-SDA homes.

Park Manor Personal Care Home

PARK MANOR PERSONAL CARE HOME. A 100-bed personal-care home built in 1967 and situated in Transcona, a suburb of Winnipeg, Manitoba. Park Manor is under the auspices of the Manitoba-Saskatchewan Conference of the Seventh-day Adventist Church.

Twenty-four-hour nursing care, occupational therapy, chaplaincy services, and resident activities are part of the services provided by a multidiscipline team that aims to maximize the well-being of residents by providing for physical, social, spiritual, and emotional needs. An effort is made to provide a homelike atmosphere in this nonprofit, government-funded facility.

In 1986 an attached 60-unit seniors' apartment complex was completed. An adult day-care program now operates four days a week and 25 meals a day are provided to the community through the Meals on Wheels Program. Twenty-fifth anniversary celebrations took place in 1992.

Administrators: Bernard Skoretz, 1967—1977; William Olson, 1977—1984; Don Laing, 1984—1986; Charles Toop, 1986— .

Park Ridge Hospital

PARK RIDGE HOSPITAL. A 103-bed medical center providing general acute care and behavioral services in Fletcher, North Carolina, owned and operated by Adventist Health System/Sunbelt Health Care Corporation.

The hospital's beginning goes back to an evening in 1909 and a conversation between Martha Rumbaugh of Asheville, North Carolina, and her house guest, Ellen White, who was traveling from Nashville, Tennessee, to a General Conference session in Washington, D.C. Mrs. Rumbaugh spoke of her desire to do more for the work of the church. She had already assisted in placing workers in the area, contributed to building the first Seventh-day Adventist church in Asheville, built a parsonage, and had regularly supported a pastor.

"The Lord would be pleased if you would start a medical and educational work in the vicinity of Asheville," Mrs. White told her.

Two men who played an important part in establishing this work were Arthur Whitefield Spalding and Professor Sidney Brownsberger. Spalding had been head of the English Department at Emmanuel Missionary College (now Andrews University) in Berrien Springs, Michigan. Brownsberger was the first principal of Battle Creek College (1874—1881), Battle Creek, Michigan, and principal of Healdsburg College (1882—1887) in northern California.

The Naples Agricultural and Normal School Board of Trustees convened for the first time on Sept. 6, 1910, and began plans for a self-supporting training school for Christian workers in connection with a medical work. By 1916 two treatment rooms were built, and the brother and sister team of John and Ethel Brownsberger (children of Sidney Brownsberger) joined the institution. Both were graduate nurses from Madison College near Nashville, Tennessee.

In the early days some patients stayed in cottages where meals and medications were delivered to them. By 1918 the institution was called Mountain Sanitarium. Sometime in 1927 a larger facility was built with a long porch where patients enjoyed the view of the Blue Ridge Mountains.

As the work grew, so did the need for qualified staff. A school for nurses opened in 1929. That same year John Brownsberger, who had completed medical training in Loma Linda, California, moved to Mountain Sanitarium as the first resident physician, surgeon, and medical director.

A 24-bed facility was built in 1938. It was expanded in 1963 and again in 1970, bringing the total number of beds to 103. In 1973 the name was changed to Fletcher Hospital. The last class graduated from the school of nurses in 1984.

Fletcher Hospital became part of Adventist Health System/Sunbelt Health Care Corporation in 1984, and in 1985 the name was changed to Park Ridge Hospital. On July 31, 1986, it moved into a new facility on a 30-acre (12-hectare) site that was previously the location of the institution's apple orchard.

Presidents: Clarence Simmons, 1978—1985; Robert Burchard, 1985— .

Parker, C. H.

PARKER, C. H. (1869—1939). Missionary. After preaching in the Minnesota Conference (1889—1898), he served as superintendent of the Fiji Mission (1898—1900). Then he preached in New South Wales (1900—1902), later returned to Fiji and worked in Samoa and Tonga (1902—1908). After a term as president of the Victoria-Tasmania Conference (1908—1911), he entered pioneering work in the New Hebrides (1912—1916), was president of the Central Polynesian Conference (1916—1922), superintendent of the New Hebrides Mission (1922—1925), superintendent of the Fiji Mission (1927—1928), president of the New South Wales Conference (1928—1930), and again superintendent of the New Hebrides Mission (1930—1934). His wife, née Myrtle Griffis, accompanied him in his pioneering work. They returned to America in 1933 after 35 years of service in the South Pacific area.

Parkview Adventist Academy (Alberta)

PARKVIEW ADVENTIST ACADEMY (Alberta). A boarding school on the secondary level established in 1982 in College Heights, Alberta. It offers courses of study that meet all the requirements for the Alberta high school diploma.

The history of the school goes back to about 1900 when railroad construction and free homesteads attracted settlers to the prairie provinces. In 1906, one year after Alberta and Saskatchewan assumed the status of confederated provinces, a group of men met at Leduc to attend an institute for Christian laymen. A farm was purchased two miles (three kilometers) west of Leduc, and school opened in the fall of 1907 under the name of the Alberta Industrial Academy.

During March 1982 the academy was officially separated from the college and renamed Parkview Adventist Academy. While the cafeteria, music building, physical education complex, and a few other facilities are shared with the college, PAA does have its own classroom facilities.

From the position where the campus is situated, one looks over 20 miles (32 kilometers) of fertile valley, near the center of which is the town of Lacombe. Beautiful lakes are visible in almost every direction.

Principals: Ralph Janes, 1979—1983; James Jeffrey, 1983—1987; John Janes, 1987— .

Parkview Adventist Academy (Oklahoma)

PARKVIEW ADVENTIST ACADEMY (Oklahoma). A nonboarding secondary school established in 1983 in Oklahoma City. The school is sponsored by eight constituent churches in the Oklahoma City area.

Principals: Randy Gilliam, 1984—1985; Arlo Krueger, 1985—1988; Jack Francisco, 1988—1992; Richard DeLong, 1992— .

Parkview Memorial Hospital

PARKVIEW MEMORIAL HOSPITAL. A 55-bed acute general hospital at Brunswick, Maine, operated by the Northern New England Conference. It was first established as a self-supporting institution, with a capacity of 35 beds, in 1959 by R. A. Bettle, M.D., with the support of several other Seventh-day Adventist doctors and the community, at an original cost of $430,000. In 1964 it was turned over to the conference. In 1973 a $1.4 million addition was built and other major improvements were made.

The hospital operated as a member of the Adventist Health System from 1982 to 1992.

Parkview Retirement Village

PARKVIEW RETIREMENT VILLAGE. A housing complex consisting of 48 bright and airy apartments situated in a beautiful rural setting in Brunswick, Maine. Twelve of the apartments are one-bedroom units, and 36 are two-bedroom units—all on the ground floor, with ample room, plenty of sunlight, and modern appliances. For those with automobiles, there are 35 one-car garages available on the premises. The village is operated by the Northern New England Conference of Seventh-day Adventists, 91 Allen Avenue, Portland, Maine, and is designed and maintained primarily for the benefit of older people who, while still pursuing an independent lifestyle, wish to avoid the work and hassles of maintaining their own home.

The project, which grew out of a desire on the part of the conference administration and some concerned laypeople to provide senior citizens with attractive housing in a safe and friendly environment, has been operating at near-capacity levels since its inception.

Phase 1 began in 1974 with the construction of four buildings housing 12 one-bedroom units and eight two-bedroom units. As enthusiasm for the program began to spread throughout the conference, and more funds became available, additional phases were launched until the project reached its present size. The final phase of construction was completed in 1981. The retirement center is located in a complex with the Parkview Memorial Seventh-day Adventist Hospital, the Seventh-day Adventist Professional Building, and the 450-member Brunswick Seventh-day Adventist Church. Famous Bowdoin College is nearby, and the ocean is but a short drive from the complex.

Parmele, Rufus Wells

PARMELE, RUFUS WELLS (1869—1945). Administrator. Baptized in 1886, he worked as a colporteur in Kansas and Illinois, then as stenographer in the General Conference office, and later as secretary-treasurer in the Oklahoma, Kansas, and Southwestern Union conferences. He was instructor in business subjects at Union College (1904—1906), served as circulation manager of the Southern Publishing Association (1906—1907), and then as president of the Florida Conference (1907—1912), the Louisiana Conference (1912—1915), and the Cumberland Conference (1915—1917). In 1916 he became general superintendent of the Northern Latin American Missions. From 1922 to 1935 he was successively pastor of the Glendale, the White Memorial, and the Pomona Seventh-day Adventist churches.

Parmenter, Keith Samuel

PARMENTER, KEITH SAMUEL (1918—1993). Administrator. Born in New South Wales, Australia, as a young child he moved to Inverell, where the family joined the Seventh-day Adventist Church after attending meetings held by Pastor Charles Reynolds. Keith studied for a year at Avondale College, but was forced to leave because of his father's failing health.

In 1939 he married Heather Chilott and soon after began canvassing in the Tamworth district. He and his family returned to Avondale College, where he prepared for the ministry, graduating in 1947. He served for a while as a pastor, but his administrative ability was soon noticed. He was called to serve as president of the Queensland Conference, then served in the same capacity in North New Zealand. In 1970 he became secretary of the Australasian (now South Pacific) Division, and in 1976 was appointed president, a position he held with distinction until his retirement in 1984.

Pasay City Adventist Academy

PASAY CITY ADVENTIST ACADEMY. A coeducational day school on the senior high school level, situated on a lot adjoining the North Philippine Union Mission compound at Pasay City, a few miles south of Manila. It is operated by the Central Luzon Conference.

Forerunner of the school was the four-grade Pasay church school, established in 1930 by the Central Luzon Mission and taught by Rosalina Macalinao. It was closed from 1941 to 1945, when it reopened with five grades. In 1952 it had six grades, taught by three teachers. In 1954 the school was authorized to offer the first year of the secondary course, and in the next two years the second and third years. In 1957 it offered a four-year secondary curriculum and adopted the name Pasay City Academy, which was changed to Pasay City Adventist Academy in 1970. In 1962 the academy ranked among the upper 20 percent of all secondary schools in the Philippines in the national government examinations.

A campaign headed by Dr. Jose Tojino was conducted in 1974 to build a better, more permanent-type structure to replace the present one, which was built in the early 1950s.

Principals: Rizalina Q. Tigno, 1954—1961; Rizalina T. Supit, 1961—1962; Samuel Ladion, 1962—1963; Luz C. Tangalin, 1963—1964 (for four months Benjamin S. Salvador); Samuel Ladion, 1964—1966; Justiniano M. Tawatao, 1966—1968; Benjamin C. Sanidad, 1968—1969; Salvador G. Miraflores, 1969—1971; Reuben A. Budayao, 1971—1973; Rodolfo G. Evangelista, 1973—1974; Melchor Dapo, 1974—1976; J. V. Afenir, 1976—1980; Antonio S. Botabara, 1980—1981; Raymond S. Barizo, 1981—1984; Antonio S. Botabara, 1984—1990; J. C. Afenir III, 1990—1992; Antonio S. Botabara, 1992— .

Passebois, Louis F.

PASSEBOIS, LOUIS F. (1874—1948). Minister, missionary, born in France. He joined the Seventh-day Adventist Church in 1889, enrolled in Battle Creek College in 1890, and married Elizabeth Reed Price in 1898. He was sent as a missionary first to France (1898), then to Egypt (1899). Returning to America in 1905, he worked in New England until 1914, then among the French Canadians in Quebec. For many years he was associated with the North American Foreign Department. His fearless preaching was not deterred by opposition: he was arrested 14 times, he received 14 letters threatening his life and the lives of the members of his family, and his home was burned down. Ill health forced him into retirement for a period after 1936, but he returned to active service and worked until he retired permanently in 1945.

Pastor

PASTOR. An ordained or licensed minister assigned to a church or district by the conference or mission committee and paid by the conference. Pastors are not considered regular officers of that church, but serve as the leader of the church and assist the officers in carrying out their duties. They have charge of the pulpit, are usually chairperson of the church board, ex officio members of any committee, but direct their church by influence rather than by any authority vested in them.

In the early days of the denomination, churches did not have pastors: the traveling preachers and evangelists visited on occasion, but the churches functioned under their local (lay) elders (see Church Elder).

Writing in the Review and Herald in 1883, W. H. Littlejohn, in his series of Church Manual articles, remarked that at that date the work of the Seventh-day Adventist minister was largely evangelistic. Only enough attention was given to the older churches to keep them in “good running order.”

The pastor’s special functions, duties, and responsibilities are described in the Seventh-day Adventist Minister’s Manual (1992). See also Minister.

Pastor's Bible Class

PASTOR'S BIBLE CLASS. A series of lessons previously prepared by the Sabbath School Department of the General Conference and currently in 1993 by the Church Ministries Department for use by pastors in presenting Seventh-day Adventist beliefs to interests, baptismal candidates, or new SDAs. Classes meet each week during the regular Sabbath school lesson study period, usually under the leadership of the church pastor.

In 1972 a series of Pastor's Bible Class lessons entitled "Profiles of Faith" was launched, prepared by the Sabbath School Department in cooperation with the Ministerial Association. It consisted of a four-color set of 28 study guides, including a review lesson. The series covered all the major doctrines of Scripture and was designed to acquaint the class member with Christ and to lead him or her into full fellowship with God's family on earth.

The lessons were undated and unnumbered except for an inconspicuous code number on the back of each lesson for the teacher's benefit in keeping records. This allowed the teacher to follow either the suggested sequence of lessons or his own sequence. The final lesson served as a review in preparation for baptism and entry into church membership.

As a means of further establishing the new believers in the truths of God's Word, a set of 11 books was prepared with covers matching the corresponding lessons. These books were designed for free distribution to the students at designated stages in the course as supplementary reading, and as a nucleus of an Adventist library in the home.

In 1993 a new series of Pastor's Bible Class lessons was prepared under the direction of the Church Ministries Department. Written by Erwin Gane and Leo Van Dolson, they cover the 27 fundamental beliefs of Seventh-day Adventists and are entitled This We Believe. Printed in Sabbath school lesson quarterly style, the lessons are divided into two books. Book 1 covers the first 13 major doctrines of the Seventh-day Adventist Church and book 2 covers the last 14. A 250-page supplemental book written by the same authors and also called This We Believe not only serves as a companion volume designed to present additional materials on each doctrine in an easy-reading format but also can be used to present an overview of the teachings of the Seventh-day Adventist Church.

Pathfinder Basic Staff Training Course

PATHFINDER BASIC STAFF TRAINING COURSE (formerly Pathfinder Staff Training Course). A 10-hour training course that has been designated as a separate unit in the overall plan for leadership training of Pathfinder leaders. The Basic Staff Training Course is a familiarization exercise, which provides adequate awareness and beginning skills for volunteer leaders. The granting of a certificate is recognition of the completion of this course, and the revalidating of this certificate continues to make this 10-hour training course a strong foundation for the study of the Pathfinder Leadership Award.

Pathfinder Clubs

PATHFINDER CLUBS. Organizations providing a character-building program of activities for both boys and girls from 10 to 15 years of age. Launched in 1950, these clubs promote the Pathfinder classes and emphasize happy association of adults with children in mutually enjoyable projects. The general organization, sponsored by the Youth Department, has adopted a uniform, a club flag, unit guidons, and ceremonies. Each club is divided into units of six to eight boys or girls; each unit has two officers, captain and scribe, chosen by the unit, and an adult counselor appointed by the staff. The staff is composed of a director and deputy directors elected by the church, and counselors and instructors. The club is to help each member become a sincere Christian—trustworthy, resourceful, possessing a worthy goal in life and a sense of mission in preparing to meet the needs of a neighbor near or far.

On Pathfinder Day (since 1957 a recurring appointment on the church calendar in North America, usually the fourth Sabbath in September) the club is accorded recognition by the local congregation and appeals are made for new members.

The Pathfinder Fair is an important annual event, when the conference calls together all clubs for combined exercises, crafts, and nature activities exhibits, parades, and demonstrations, in which each club is at its best, and the interchange of ideas benefits all participants. The Pathfinder Camporee, a conference-wide campout, climaxes the camping season. Units join in comparing camping skills in a wilderness area, spending at least two nights and three days in outdoor living, enjoying open-fire cookery and campfire stories.

The Silver Anniversary year was celebrated in 1975, with participation by clubs internationally.

In 1989—1990 the fortieth anniversary of Pathfinding was celebrated.

The Pathfinder Club is now a worldwide organization, in 1993 numbering more than 900,000 members.

Pathfinder Honors

PATHFINDER HONORS. An award for proficiency in any of specific fields classed under Arts and Crafts, Household Arts, Nature Study, Outdoor Industries, Outreach Ministries, Recreation, and Vocational. The skills, understandings, appreciations, and attitudes gained through the earnings of Pathfinder Honors are intended to help the Adventist Youth/Pathfinder become the benefactor to others that this name implies.

The basic requirements were set by the General Conference Youth Department at the suggestion of the 1927 Advisory Committee. The Pathfinder Honors were first called Vocational Merits, later Vocational Honors, then MV Honors, then AY Honors, and since 1980 have been called Pathfinder Honors.

Most Pathfinder Honors, except those in technical lines, may be gained by private endeavor. Advanced Honors are offered in some fields.

When requirements have been met for any Pathfinder Honor, application is made to the local conference youth director for the specific Honor certificate and Honor token. It is usually presented at an Investiture service. The felt Honor tokens may be worn on a Pathfinder sash over the shoulder.

Pathfinder Leadership Award

PATHFINDER LEADERSHIP AWARD (introduced in 1988). An award designated as a definite forward step in Pathfinder leadership. It is designated not only for the counselor or staff member but for the club director, area coordinator, and conference Pathfinder specialist as well. The emphasis is on inservice training and active involvement within the club in order that the participants may gain new experiences and the chance to develop greater leadership skills. With the Basic Staff Training Course completed, the participant has opportunity to build on his or her foundation with a more detailed in-depth study of the fundamentals of Pathfinding. The course has been divided into seven skills areas, and these segments of the Pathfinder Leadership Award will involve the participant in at least 20 hours of seminar attendance.

Following on from this seminar instruction, the participant is in a position to select two of the seven skills areas studied and major in these subjects. This further study enables participants to specialize in skills that suit their talents and interests.

Advanced Pathfinder Leadership Award (also introduced in 1988). In the Advanced Pathfinder Leadership Award, the participant is asked to choose a further skill and complete the necessary requirements. This course is designed as an additional training unit for Pathfinder staff members and is open to all applicants meeting the course requirements and involved with Pathfinders. A person could spend many years in Pathfinding with the objective of ultimately becoming qualified in all the seven skills areas as outlined in the Advanced Pathfinder Leadership Award requirements.

In 1974 a new Pathfinder Staff Manual was published, with 533 pages of material covering every aspect of Pathfinding.

Paulini, Peter P.

PAULINI, PETER P. (1882—?). Pioneer Seventh-day Adventist minister in Romania, administrator in Romania and Switzerland. Of Protestant background, Paulini was studying medicine when J. F. Ginter came to Bucharest to preach. Paulini was one of his first converts (1906). After studying at Friedensau Missionary Seminary for six months and gaining practical experience in the ministry in the city of Burg, Paulini began preaching to the Romanian peasants in Hungary. In 1909 he married Alice Elisa Favre, a Swiss girl.

When Ginter was expelled from Romania for preaching SDA doctrines, Paulini became head of the SDA work in that country and was ordained to the ministry in 1911. In 1913 he became president of the newly organized Romanian Conference. Later he served as president of the Romanian Union (1919—1927, 1932—1936), the Swiss Union (1928—1932), and the Banat Conference in Romania (1936—1938). For many years he edited SDA publications in Romania. His name continued to be listed in the Yearbook till 1955.

Paulson, David

PAULSON, DAVID (1868—1916). Philanthropic physician, founder of the Hinsdale Sanitarium. His parents came from Denmark and settled in Wisconsin. A year before his birth his parents joined the Seventh-day Adventist Church through the preaching of John G. Matteson. When David was 6 years old, his parents moved to South Dakota, which was then new frontier territory. When 8 years of age, David attended the first camp meeting held in South Dakota and was impressed by the preaching of James and Ellen White, who were there. He was baptized at that time. In 1888 he heard W. W. Prescott speak on the value of Christian education, and determined to attend Battle Creek College, from which he graduated in 1890. He then began the study of medicine at the Battle Creek Sanitarium, continued it at the medical school of the University of Michigan, and transferred in his senior year to the Bellevue Medical College in New York. While in New York he lived in the house of Dr. Dowkontt, one of the pioneers of the medical missionary idea and leader of a medical mission for the poor. He graduated as a physician in 1894. Two years later he married a woman physician, Mary Wild, who later was a cofounder of the Hinsdale Sanitarium and for many years served as guide and counselor there.

Paulson taught in the American Medical Missionary College, and in 1899 he took charge of the sanitarium's medical missionary work in Chicago and became editor of the Life Boat, the magazine devoted to the promotion of the sanitarium's charitable, medical, and social work in Chicago. In 1904, with the assistance of one of his wealthy patients, he established a small sanitarium at Hinsdale and afterward devoted his life to developing that institution not only as a medical service to paying patients but as an institution providing and promoting charitable work, first in the city of Chicago and later in the community in which it was situated.

Always public-spirited in his thinking, about 1906 he became president of the Anti-Cigarette League, in connection with which work he traveled and lectured extensively. He never enjoyed robust health and died in 1916 after an illness that lasted several months.

Pearson, John, Jr.

PEARSON, JOHN, JR. Son of John Pearson, Sr., of Portland, Maine, and editor of the short-lived journal Hope of Israel, in which appeared T. M. Preble's first discussion of the Sabbath. Pearson was in partnership with his brother Henry (C. H.) until mid-1845; then Henry began publishing Hope Within the Veil, and a few months later married its editor, Emily C. Clemons. By the autumn of 1845 both brothers rejoined the majority party of Adventists, headed by J. V. Himes.

Pearson, John, Sr.

PEARSON, JOHN, SR. A Baptist deacon among the Adventists of Portland, Maine. He was a friend and counselor of Ellen Harmon in the beginning of her work, and is referred to as “Father” Pearson in LS 70, 71; 1T 64.

Peck, Sarah Elizabeth

PECK, SARAH ELIZABETH (1868—1968). Educator, writer, missionary. A native of Wisconsin, she received her education at Battle Creek College and was one of the church's first women missionaries to Africa, where she opened up the educational work for children. She worked for a period with Ellen White in Australia and in America in the preparation of manuscripts. In 1906 she became educational secretary for the West Coast, and it was at this time that she began the preparation of much-needed reading material for the church schools. The result was the long-lasting series True Education Readers. Recognizing the distinct advantages of the denomination's system of education, she also began to prepare suitable Bible textbooks. God's Great Plan provided a biblical foundation for many Seventh-day Adventist young people at the crucial decision-making period of their lives.

She was called to the General Conference Department of Education, where she advanced the cause of Christian education until her retirement in the 1930s. A short time before her death she was cited by Andrews University as its "alumna of alumni." She passed to her rest a few weeks after her 100th birthday.

“Peculiar People”

“PECULIAR PEOPLE.” A biblical phrase applied to the people of God in the Old Testament (Deut. 14:2; 26:18) and in the New Testament (Titus 2:14; 1 Peter 2:9). The Hebrew word translated “peculiar” is segullah, “property,” and the passages designate Israel as a prized possession belonging exclusively to God. Two Greek words are translated “peculiar” (1) peripoiēsis, “personal possession” (1 Peter 2:9), and (2) periousios, “chosen,” “especial” (Titus 2:14). The English word “peculiar” comes from the Latin peculiaris, which is from the Latin noun peculium, meaning that which is one’s own. In Old English, “peculiar” designated something as being exclusively one’s own, and was thus an accurate translation of the Hebrew and Greek terms. It did not suggest eccentricity of appearance or conduct, as the word does today.

Pematang Siantar Academy

PEMATANG SIANTAR ACADEMY. A day school located in a residential section of the city of Pematang Siantar, a major city for the surrounding district in north Sumatra, Indonesia. The school has been in continuous operation, starting as a junior academy, since 1982. It advanced to senior academy status in 1984.

The school serves the surrounding Seventh-day Adventist community. A few students board with faculty. It is a constituent school of the Jalan Nias church and is located on the same property as the church.

In 1993 the enrollment was 124 students, 91 percent of whom were from Seventh-day Adventist homes.

Principals: M. A. Simbolon, 1984—1990; R. O. Saragi, 1991— .

Penang Adventist Hospital

PENANG ADVENTIST HOSPITAL. A 146-bed medical institution operated by the Southeast Asia Union Mission at Penang, Malaysia.

Seventh-day Adventist medical work in Southeast Asia was begun on Penang Island, a body of land 45 miles (70 kilometers) in circumference, 500 miles (800 kilometers) north of Singapore. In 1924 Dr. J. E. Gardner opened a clinic in a large, newly completed 150-foot (45-meter) building on Muntri Street in the city of Georgetown. The building housed the clinic on the ground floor, and the doctor's family on the upper floor. After some three years the upper floor was used to accommodate 10 patient beds. In 1932 a three-story building on Chulia Street was secured, which provided room for the clinic on the ground floor and two floors for 14 beds. Then a more suitable site was discovered nearby on which stood a building that had been an Anglo-Chinese school with eight rooms upstairs and a number of rooms downstairs with space to care for approximately 30 inpatients. At this place the poor were charged at the rate of 50 cents to one dollar (Malay) and were asked to bring their own food. However, there was not enough space for those who wished to have private rooms.

In 1928 construction began on the present building on Burmah Road by E. C. Wood, builder for the Far Eastern Division, and continued by A. P. Ritz. This new hospital, costing about M$50,000, admitted patients in 1931, seven years after the beginning of the medical work on Muntri Street. Dr. Gardner divided his time between the new hospital and the clinic.

Additional property was later purchased and a west wing was added. This wing, partially finished in 1941, was completed by the Japanese after they took over the hospital. The Japanese allowed the downtown clinic to operate, but it functioned with an inadequate staff.

After World War II the downtown clinic building, considered unsafe for occupancy because of bomb damage, was sold, and all the patients were directed to the Burmah Road hospital. A new wing was opened in 1958, with the governor of Penang present at the opening.

In the early 1960s, a building was erected at the rear of the hospital to house a kitchen with gas stoves and a dining room for employees.

A top floor was added to the east wing, making the building a total of four stories. This was opened as a maternity floor in 1966 by the mayor of Penang.

In 1974 a two-story wing was completed with facilities for food service, X-ray lab, storage, and auditorium on the ground floor, and rooms for surgical patients, intensive-care unit, and a pediatric unit on the first floor.

The campus includes four houses and two duplexes for workers, laundry, maintenance shop, and guest apartments.

Pênfigo Adventist Hospital

PÊNFIGO ADVENTIST HOSPITAL (Hospital Adventista do Pênfigo). A hospital specializing in the treatment of pemphigus foliaceus (Cazenave), an endemic skin disease commonly known as fogo selvagem (“savage fire,” or “wildfire”). The hospital, with a capacity of 80 beds, is situated on a 62.5-acre (25-hectare) tract of land at Sitio Saltinho, state of Mato Grosso, Brazil, about seven miles (12 kilometers) from Campo Grande, and is owned and operated by the South Brazil Union Conference.

In 1948 Alfredo Barbosa de Souza, a Seventh-day Adventist minister whose wife had been cured of wildfire by a preparation discovered by Isidoro Jamar, began treating victims of this disease at Campo Grande, in the state of Mato Grosso. Soon sufferers from this disease came in such numbers that it became necessary for the Mato Grosso Mission to do something for them, and in March 1949 Durval Stockler de Lima, the mission president, and his wife initiated a plan for building a hospital for treating this disease. This hospital was inaugurated Nov. 9, 1952, with Dr. Edgar Bentes Rodrigues serving as its first medical director until 1959.

From 1949 to 1959, 478 cases of pemphigus were treated there. Of this number 167 (38 percent) were discharged with the disease in complete regression, and 108 (25 percent) with 80 percent regression. Thus 63 percent of these cases were benefited. The mortality rate during treatment was 15 percent. The patients were treated by the external applications of a homemade remedy called Jamarsan.

Beginning in 1960, under the direction of Dr. Gunter Hans, Jamarsan was replaced by Neo-Jamarsan, made by an improved formula that was perfected in cooperation with experienced pharmaceutical help. The less toxic, less irritating formula, used in conjunction with Corticosteroids, antibiotics, and a more adequate diet, proved its worth quickly as reflected in the higher percentage (81 percent) of complete regressions, (9.5 percent) partial regressions, and the reduced number of deaths (4.8 percent in 1963). The formula has been improved (modified) several times since.

Between 1949 and 1962 more than 600 pemphigus patients were treated at the hospital entirely free of charge. The hospital maintains a dairy, a poultry farm, an apiary, an orchard, and gardens, where many of the patients contribute their labor and thus lighten the institution’s financial burden. The hospital also receives many private and some government donations.

The work being done in this institution has awakened the interest of national and international medical scientists, some of whom have visited the hospital on different occasions.

In 1975 a more modern 80-bed hospital providing better facilities was completed. The number of patient beds was later increased to 100.

Peninsula Secondary School

PENINSULA SECONDARY SCHOOL. A coeducational day school on the senior high school level, situated some 20 miles (32 kilometers) from Freetown at the east end of the village of Waterloo, Sierra Leone, on 15 acres (six hectares) of government-owned land overlooking the old and new main motor roads to the interior. Instruction is in English and prepares students to the General Certificate of Education level.

Waterloo Training School was opened by T. M. French as a primary day school in 1909, and as a boarding school in 1910. It became a center for training Seventh-day Adventist workers not only for Sierra Leone but also for Liberia, the Gold Coast, and Nigeria. For several years prior to 1942 it operated as a secondary school. In 1941 the school property was requisitioned by the military. After an attempt to carry on in rented quarters, the school was closed in 1942. (It was also listed in the Yearbook as Waterloo Industrial School and as Sierra Leone Training School.)

In 1961 D. Lowe concluded negotiations begun by E. Keslake and A. M. Moyer with the Sierra Leone Department of Education concerning the opening of a secondary school. Because of its past educational record there, the Seventh-day Adventist Mission was offered the management of a new school to be built by the government in Waterloo. The control of the school was vested in a board on which the Seventh-day Adventist Mission has strong representation.

What was later named Peninsula Secondary School was opened in 1961 by J.A.M. Kamara and K. W. Brown in rented quarters. It offered a preparatory course for the nationwide selective entrance examination to secondary schools. In September 1961 H. I. Dunton became principal, and the school moved into a newly finished single-story school building on a new site east of Waterloo. By May 1963 a total of five classrooms, a science laboratory, and rooms for industrial arts and domestic science were completed. A 10-year development plan was inaugurated, subject to the availability of government funds. Enrollment grew from 32 in one grade to 97 boys and 35 girls in three grades in September 1962; 45 percent of the 1962 enrollment was from Muslim homes, 35 percent from SDA homes. All the major tribes of Sierra Leone were represented.

Further developments. Student enrollment continued to increase through the years, but the off-campus dormitory arrangements proved unsatisfactory. It was decided to take only day students. J.A.M. Kamara again assumed leadership of this school in 1970, and continued to encourage student participation in church and AY activities.

The staff has increased to 38 because of the rapid increase of the student population since the 1991—1992 academic year. Enrollment for the 1993—1994 school year was 1,100. This increase is a direct result of the civil war in neighboring Liberia and Sierra Leone, which saw thousands of Liberian refugees and displaced Sierra Leonean students seeking admission into various schools in safer parts of the country.

The increase has necessitated the implementation of a double shift system to accommodate the student population. The Liberian refugees are sponsored by the United Nations High Commission for Refugees (UNHCR).

Even though the majority of students and staff are not Seventh-day Adventists, the Adventist minority has embarked on soul winning through activities and programs that include Bible studies, the Adventist Youth Society, and the Voice of Youth campaigns.

Early History of the Work in the Area

Early History of the Work in the Area. The work of Seventh-day Adventists in western Pennsylvania began as early as 1851, when Hiram Edson and J. N. Andrews in July went into Potter County and also Tioga County, adjoining it to the east. They won a number of converts near what a report calls the “head waters of the Genesee, Allegheny, and Susquehanna rivers.” This seems to have been in the area of Ulysses, for at this place meetings of adherents were scheduled by Rhodes, Bates, and Edson in 1851 and 1852. There is mention of a church in Ulysses by 1853, when W. S. Ingraham held meetings and won six from among the Seventh Day Baptists. Later A. S. Hutchins joined Ingraham working in that district, and a new convert, C. H. Barrows, moved to Liberty, McKean County, adjacent to the west, and started an interest there. The Ulysses church was the scene of weekend “conferences” or “general meetings” from time to time—one of them in 1860 had about 100 Sabbathkeeping Adventists in attendance. Disbanded about 1865 “on account of removals,” it was reorganized with 18 members in 1867, and appears often in notices as late as 1879.

In McKean County, in addition to the work in Liberty, already mentioned, evangelism was carried on in Port Allegany, Shippin (no longer in existence), and Smethport, also in Westport, Tioga County, requested by 14 new converts convinced by reading. In these four places J. N. Loughborough, William Ingraham, and R. F. Cottrell held tent meetings in the summer of 1856.

In 1862 the Ulysses church in Potter County and the Mixtown church in Tioga County were incorporated into the New York Conference (later known as the New York and Pennsylvania Conference) at its formation.

In 1877 a church was organized in Port Allegany. By 1879 a church with a Sabbath school membership of 30 to 40 members was well established in Sunderlinville. At a meeting in East Otto, New York, in the spring of that year, J. G. Saunders reported that he had spent the preceding winter building up the Sunderlinville, Port Allegany, and West Pike churches.

Pennsylvania Conference Organized. In November 1878 the New York and Pennsylvania Conference voted to divide, and in 1879 the Pennsylvania Conference began to operate, with the president of the New York Conference, B. L. Whitney, as president of both. The new conference included all of Pennsylvania and the New York counties of Chemung, Steuben, Allegany, Cattaraugus, and Chautauqua (these five counties were later restored to the New York Conference).

In 1890 the membership stood at 914 in 42 churches. By 1902 the membership had grown to 1,420 in 59 churches and 110 Sabbath schools. Then it was divided to form the East Pennsylvania and the West Pennsylvania conferences in 1903. The united Pennsylvania Conference had been a part of the Atlantic Union Conference, organized in 1901, and the East Pennsylvania Conference and the West Pennsylvania Conference likewise until they became a part of the new Columbia Union Conference at its organization in 1907.

Because the history of the Seventh-day Adventist work in Pennsylvania was written before the reunion in 1963, and was originally discussed in two articles under the headings East Pennsylvania Conference and West Pennsylvania Conference, most of the remainder of this article treats the history separately under similar subheadings.

East Pennsylvania

East Pennsylvania. In 1880 J. W. Raymond and F. Peabody held meetings in Lawrenceville, Tioga County, and won several people despite opposition of local ministers. Also in 1880 I. Sanborn won several people in eight meetings held at Fleetwood, Berks County, at the request of Amos Snyder, who had embraced SDA teachings in California some years before and, on his return, had won others to the observance of the Sabbath. This was apparently the group of German Sabbathkeepers in Berks County later visited by S. N. Haskell and B. L. Whitney in 1882. A church was organized in 1884 with 14 charter members. In that year new converts were added, and a tract society of 10 members was organized during tent meetings held by L. R. Conradi at Fleetwood. Five were baptized at Emaus (now Emmaus).

In August 1884 a city mission was opened in Philadelphia by J. M. Kutz and his wife, who distributed Signs of the Times and other periodicals; then on Sept. 4, 1884, F. Peabody began work, holding Bible studies and laying plans to get reading material into the hands of the people.

D. T. Fero preached at Roaring Branch in 1884, and the next year he organized a church of 29 members and a tract society of 15 members; the two Sabbath schools there had an aggregate membership of more than 50. In 1886 the work was further developed in Allentown by L. R. Conradi, assisted by J. S. Shrock, and tent meetings were held in Bethlehem by Reis, Shrock, and a couple named Trump.

In 1887 F. Peabody and K. C. Russell held tent meetings in Round Top, Tioga County. In Williamsport, where interest grew rapidly, meetings were conducted by J. W. Raymond and J. E. Robinson. The next year E. W. Snyder was appointed to act as state agent in the interest of the canvassing work. At Reading, J. S. Shrock and K. C. Russell conducted meetings in both the German and English languages in 1888. Progress was slow, but a beginning was made. By October 1888 a new church building had been erected in Williamsport, and the church was organized in November with 24 charter members. Ellen White and her son W. C. White visited Williamsport Jan. 31, 1889. In 1900 a church school was opened at Williamsport, reputedly the first in the Pennsylvania Conference, with B. A. Wolcott as teacher.

The work was prospering in Philadelphia by 1900. This church, with a membership of 102, operated the Gospel Help Mission, which cared for 2,000 men and sold about 20,000 penny servings of food each month.

East Pennsylvania Conference Organized. On June 1, 1903, the Pennsylvania Conference (organized 1879) was divided into the East and West Pennsylvania conferences. The line of separation was along the eastern boundary of the following counties: Potter, Clinton, Center, Mifflin, Huntingdon, and Fulton.

The division, voted in a conference session held at Kingston in the month of June, was desirable because of the problem of giving ministerial assistance to the widely scattered churches. Twenty-seven churches and about 800 members were assigned to the East Pennsylvania Conference; R. A. Underwood was the first president.

Subsequent History. The tract society and Sabbath School Department were moved from Williamsport to Philadelphia during 1904. The conference headquarters were in Philadelphia at various addresses until 1951, when they were moved to Reading.

At the conference session in 1904 the Philadelphia Sanitarium, which had been opened by Dr. A. J. Reed in 1902, was accepted by the conference. Thus the medical work became a department of the conference. The sanitarium prospered, graduating its first class of four nurses on July 5, 1906.

The German church in Philadelphia was organized in March 1907. Meetings had been held there at different times by L. R. Conradi, J. H. Schilling, and O. F. Schwedrat. The first church property was purchased by this congregation in 1909. There were also many German-speaking people who became SDAs in other parts of the conference.

In September 1910 T. H. Branch of Denver, Colorado, arrived in Philadelphia to begin work among the Black people. With the cooperation of the Black members of the North Philadelphia church, a church called the First African Seventh-day Adventist Church of Philadelphia was organized Feb. 11, 1911, with 16 charter members.

In 1925 the Allentown church secured control of radio station WCBA. Friday evenings were dedicated to Bible stories for the children and the International Sunday school lesson. Vesper services were conducted at 5:00 on Sunday afternoons and at 7:00 H. A. Vandeman presented a sermon. As far as any record can be found, this was the first radio work done in eastern Pennsylvania.

The Italian work had its beginning in 1925, when an evangelist named Robino rented a hall in the Italian section of Philadelphia and held lectures. The number of Italian members in Philadelphia was 88 in 1963.

Developments Until 1963. The conference membership increased from 800 members and 24 churches in 1903 to 4,601 members and 62 churches in 1963. Further developments of the work were reflected also in the expansion of facilities. In June 1928 the Emmanuel Grove campground, near Wescosville, was purchased for $7,300, to provide a permanent campsite. Improvements included a large pavilion, a dormitory, dining room, cafeteria, office and store, and 41 cinder-block cabins. More acreage was purchased from time to time. The conference headquarters, moved to Reading from Philadelphia, were housed in a two-story stone mansion, purchased in April 1951 for $35,000.

Blue Mountain Academy, which opened its doors in 1955, represents an investment of almost $3 million. On the property, comprising 725 acres (300 hectares), is Camp Keystone, which serves youth, church, and camp meeting needs.

West Pennsylvania

West Pennsylvania. In 1883 I. N. Williams and J. G. Saunders organized a church in North Warren. About that same time work was being established in the Pittsburgh area.

By 1883 the Health and Temperance Association, with D. T. Fero as president, operated in Pittsburgh. About the beginning of 1885 a city mission was opened at 41 Frankstown Avenue, with a staff of four, and Frank Peabody as manager. During the first 10 months three converts were won and the lecture room had an average attendance of 10 nonmembers. During the fall of 1886 a church was organized in Pittsburgh with 21 charter members. About this time J. E. Robinson was conducting work east of Pittsburgh in New Enterprise, Bedford County.

Others who helped to establish the work in western Pennsylvania in the 1880s and 1890s were I. N. Williams, J. W. Raymond, K. C. Russell, J. G. Saunders, and C. F. McVagh, who served both as ministers, building up the churches, and as conference committee members. By 1890 the number of churches in Pennsylvania had grown to 42, with 914 members, a large number of whom were in the western part of the state. After tent meetings were held in Altoona in 1894 K. C. Russell organized a church there. Other churches followed in the central part of the conference. In 1889 J. W. Raymond organized a church at Albion, west of Erie, and by 1897 a church was organized in Erie. By that time SDAs were found in most areas of western Pennsylvania. In 1899 C. S. Longacre preached in Greensburg, 30 miles (48 kilometers) east of Pittsburgh, with the help of Lee S. Wheeler, and organized a church there.

West Pennsylvania Conference Organized. Because of the problem of giving ministerial help to widely scattered churches, Pennsylvania was divided into two conferences at a conference session held at Kingston, Pennsylvania, in the summer of 1903. The western part of the state was organized as the Western Pennsylvania Conference in June 1903 with E. J. Dryer as the first president. The new conference had 40 churches and 750 members, no medical institutions or church schools, and a heavy debt inherited from the Tract and Missionary Society. The working force consisted of six ministers and two Bible instructors. In 1907 the Western Pennsylvania Conference changed its name to West Pennsylvania Conference.

Subsequent History. The years 1903 to 1910 were lean years financially for the West Pennsylvania Conference because of a financial depression in 1908 and 1909 that closed many steel mills and coal mines. The conference president, F. D. Wagner, reported: "When the mines closed, the church treasurer had little use to open the books."

Although a school had been operated in Erie for a short time about 1898, the West Pennsylvania Conference as such had no church schools until one was opened in 1906 at Indiana, Pennsylvania, in Indiana County, by J. W. Watt. By 1908, after two years of operation, it had 16 pupils and a newly erected school building. At the conference session held in Oil City, June 18 to 28, 1908, a resolution was passed calling upon every member to donate two cents a week to a church school fund to assist new church schools. By 1909 two schools were in operation, with an enrollment of 28.

During the summer of 1903, when Sunday blue laws were agitated in Pittsburgh, C. S. Longacre took advantage of the opportunity to hold a series of meetings, which won a large company of converts and resulted in a church. A second church of 30 members was organized in Pittsburgh on Jan. 21, 1906. By 1915 there were four churches in that city with a combined membership of 191. In 1951 three Pittsburgh churches with a total membership of 480 were combined as the Shadyside church. This new congregation purchased a former Methodist church.

Work also was conducted among foreign language groups in the conference. A nine-week evangelistic campaign in German was conducted by Charles A. Scholl and George West in a 30' x 50' (9 m. x 15 m.) tent in Allegheny (a suburb of Pittsburgh) in the summer of 1908. The five or six converts won at this time later developed into a German-speaking church. At Warren and Mount Jewett, meetings for the Swedish people resulted in a Swedish church, organized at Mount Jewett in 1917. A Slovakian church was organized in Pittsburgh in 1939 by Andrew Yakush.

The conference office remained at Corydon, Pennsylvania, from 1904 until 1910; then it was moved to Pittsburgh, on Mount Vernon Street. In 1918 it was moved to Indiana, Pennsylvania, then back to Pittsburgh in 1920, thence to Greensburg in 1922, where it occupied three different locations. Then in 1940 the office was again moved to Pittsburgh.

Later Developments. The conference membership increased from 27 churches and 750 members in 1903 to 40 churches and 1,661 members in 1940. Except for a decrease in the late 20s, and a drop in 1945 when 318 Black members were transferred to the Allegheny Conference, a steady growth marked the work in West Pennsylvania.

A youth campsite was purchased in 1954 a few miles east of Punxsutawney, on which a large artificial lake and several buildings were constructed. By 1961 the conference owned 34 church properties, including two junior academies (at Erie and Pittsburgh) and six church school buildings.

Pennsylvania Conference Reunited

Pennsylvania Conference Reunited. In 1963, after 60 years of separation, the East and West Pennsylvania conferences were reunited. On Jan. 1, 1964, the Pennsylvania Conference began to function, with headquarters in Reading.

The Pennsylvania Conference has seen the development of a lay advisory council, whose function is to interpret and share the intents, objectives, and concerns of the church, provide communication between membership and leadership, and generate new ideas, plans, and creative approaches to problems and challenges of the church. A nearly $250,000 debt was liquidated in eight months under this council.

A full 10-day camp meeting was reestablished in 1971 and a permanent location (Blue Mountain Academy) voted at the triennial session in 1973. The Wescosville campground was sold in November 1970 for the sum of $102,596.25. The Pennsylvania Development Plan was implemented in 1973, providing the means for growth and development in evangelism, education, church and school, and youth and family facilities at Laurel Lake Family Camp. During the first year this plan was implemented, $67,608 was received and dispersed throughout the state. In 1985 PDP was given the new name of Pennsylvania Soulsaving Advance. More than $100,000 is received each year for conference growth.

Evangelism. The It Is Written telecast was launched in the Philadelphia area in 1972, in Pittsburgh in 1974, and in Erie and Scranton in January 1975. Radio programs of local origin and special Voice of Prophecy releases now touch many areas of Pennsylvania.

Education. A number of consolidated schools were established throughout the conference. In 1970 Greater Pittsburgh Junior Academy joined one of the oldest, Reading Junior Academy. Greater Philadelphia Junior Academy was built and opened in 1967.

Youth and Family Facilities. Major steps have been taken to enlarge the use of Laurel Lake Camp and Retreat Center. A recent key improvement is the construction of Baker Lodge, which contains a spacious kitchen, offices, dining hall, and motel-type sleeping rooms. Further enlargement plans are in the making.

The publishing work has been expanding and sales soaring. Pennsylvania led the union in 1969 and the North American Division in 1972 and 1973. In 1991, with the development of Family Enrichment Resources, the publishing work leadership moved out of the conference office. Sales in the state have continued to be strong.

The Pennsylvania Adventist Book Center expanded its operations to include a bookmobile in 1969, which delivered supplies throughout the conference. A branch was dedicated and put into service at Blue Mountain Academy in 1969. The ABC Religious Books and Supplies and Nutrition Food Center in Reading was closed in April 1984 and moved to a new building on the Blue Mountain Academy campus. The blessing of this move is shown in the more than $1 million in sales in 1991 and 1992.

The Reading Institute of Rehabilitation was made a part of the Pennsylvania Conference on July 1, 1966, six years after the purchase of the 263-acre (110-hectare) Eberley Estate to establish the institution. In 1969 the institute became a member of the American Hospital Association. When it became evident that the mansion housing the institute was no longer adequate, a $3.5 million 80-bed hospital was constructed on the estate and opened Dec. 8, 1974. In 1979 a four-story wing was added for doctors' offices, communication disorders, psychiatry, social services, and a warehouse. In May 1986 a head injury wing was dedicated. With the acceptance of 20 subacute rehabilitation beds the hospital will be certified with a 100-patient capacity.

The Better Living center was established in 1969 in Philadelphia by J. Wayne McFarland, M.D., cofounder of the Five-Day Plan. A satellite Better Living center was established in 1973 in Montrose, where a similar program was conducted.

A concentrated plan was implemented in Pittsburgh in 1990. It is known as the Pittsburgh Project and is under the leadership of Pastors Tony Moore and Steve Farley. This NAD Global Mission Project envisions the establishment of a new 100-member congregation in the South Hills section of the city.

Perez, Braulio Marcio

PEREZ, BRAULIO MARCIO (1904—1974). Originator of the Spanish language Voice of Prophecy. A native of Spain, he moved with his family to the Americas in 1908 and was educated at River Plate College in Argentina. Following his graduation in 1930, he gained recognition as an educator, author, and poet. After his marriage in 1931, he served as director of the Central American College of Seventh-day Adventists in Costa Rica, and later as pastor, evangelist, and youth counselor for the Inter-American Division.

In 1942 Dr. Perez began the broadcast of the Spanish Voice of Hope programs, and continued as an active broadcaster until his death. His audiences reveled in his command of the Spanish language. His life and ministry did much to change the image of Adventism and Protestantism in Latin America. It is estimated that in excess of 40,000 people joined the church largely as a result of his ministry.

Perk, Gerhard

PERK, GERHARD (1859—1930). One of the first Seventh-day Adventists in Russia, a native of a Mennonite colony in southern Russia; a colporteur, Bible instructor, evangelist, and administrator in Russia, Romania, and Germany. About 1882 he learned from a neighbor of some publications, sent three years previously by relatives in America, which were so dangerous that “even an earnest member of the Brethren Church might be led astray by them.” His curiosity aroused, Perk begged to see the tracts, and upon promise not to show them to anyone, he was given a copy of The Third Angel’s Message, which he took to the haymow to read in secret. Telling no one, he copied the address of the publisher and ordered more publications. He soon became convinced that what he had read contained the message for the time, but he did not immediately profess the SDA beliefs openly. In the same year he became an agent for the British Bible Society in Russia. As he traveled through the country, his experiences led him to the conviction that he should keep all of God’s commandments if he expected Him to provide his needs. Having settled this matter, he began observing the seventh-day Sabbath.

In 1886 L. R. Conradi wrote to him suggesting that he sell SDA literature in Russia. This meant not only losing the good wages paid by the Bible Society but also exposing himself to personal danger, for although the sale of Bibles was allowed in Russia, not so the sale of SDA literature, which was clearly an attempt to proselyte among the members of the established church—a crime against the state at that time. Nevertheless, Perk agreed and carefully and cautiously began selling SDA publications.

Moreover, at his urging, L. R. Conradi came to Russia in July 1886, the first SDA minister to visit that country. Together with Perk, who served as his interpreter and guide, Conradi visited scattered groups of Sabbathkeepers throughout the Crimea and along the Volga River, baptized converts, and established churches. While in the Crimea, Perk and Conradi were arrested for proselyting among the Russians and were kept in prison at Perekop 40 days.

After their release, Perk resumed his colporteur work in the south of Russia, but was soon again arrested and escaped imprisonment only through agreeing to a voluntary exile to Switzerland and Germany. While there he worked as a self-supporting missionary between 1887 and 1894. From 1895 to 1897 he was a Bible instructor in Berlin. In 1897 he made another attempt to bring the SDA message to Russia, this time working in the St. Petersburg-Reval (Leningrad-Tallinn) area, where he organized a few churches, but he soon returned to Germany. He was ordained in 1899 and organized churches in Chemnitz, Leipzig, and Dresden.

In 1902 he was called to direct the Seventh-day Adventist mission in Romania but was expelled because of his religious activities soon afterward. He worked again in Germany from 1904 to 1910, for some time as president of the Silesian Conference. Then he superintended the Siberian Union Mission for three years. Again in Germany, he presided over the Thuringian Conference until 1919, when he went to Leipzig. He retired in 1921 and resided in Berlin until his death, which occurred while he was on a visit to Pomerania.

Perkins, Eva

PERKINS, EVA (Miller, Mrs. Eli B.; Hankins, Mrs. Ira J.) (1858—1942). Educator, missionary. Entering Battle Creek College in 1874, she later became assistant to G. H. Bell in the classroom and in the preparation of his grammars, and was graduated in 1880. From 1878 she was also first corresponding secretary of the General Sabbath School Association. After her marriage to Eli B. Miller she and her husband both taught in Battle Creek College until 1892, when they were sent to Africa as the first overseas Seventh-day Adventist missionaries in the field of education. While in Africa she was at different times bookkeeper, teacher, preceptor, and matron of the Claremont Union College, of which her husband was president. They returned to the United States in 1895, and on the death of her husband in 1900, she resumed teaching at Battle Creek College. In 1903 she married Ira J. Hankins and worked briefly as educational secretary of the Indiana Conference before she and her husband the same year went to Africa. There she was educational secretary of the field and assistant editor of the South African Sentinel. She and her husband returned permanently to the United States in 1923.

Perrin, William Elmer

PERRIN, WILLIAM ELMER (1875—1951). Printer, administrator, and editor. He was brought up in a Seventh-day Adventist home, but received his education in public schools and by correspondence. In 1900 he entered church work as compositor for the Worker's Bulletin, published by the Iowa Tract Society. Later he edited the paper and also served as bookkeeper for the society. In 1908 he went to India, where he managed the Watchman Press and edited the Eastern Tidings. In 1914 he was elected secretary of the India Union Mission as well. From 1916 to 1918 he was secretary of the tract society in the Eastern Michigan Conference, from 1918 to 1919, treasurer of the New England Sanitarium, and from 1919 to 1921, secretary-treasurer of the Greater New York Conference. Between 1921 and 1929 he served as auditor of the Southern Asia Division. In 1929 he went to Canada, where he was secretary-treasurer of the Eastern Canadian Union Conference (1929—1937) and later administrator (1937—1939) of the Rest Haven Sanitarium, from which position he was forced by ill health to retire in 1939.

Perry, Franklin Leland

PERRY, FRANKLIN LELAND (1876—1961). Pioneer Seventh-day Adventist missionary in Peru. He was educated at Union College, taught in the public schools for a number of years, then joined the tract society staff of the Dakota Conference in 1899. He was ordained in 1902 or 1903. When in 1905 the South Dakota Conference offered to support a missionary in Peru, it sent Perry to begin SDA work in that country. After four years he was compelled to return to the United States to regain his health. He reentered ministerial work and became president of the Manitoba Conference in 1910. The next year he returned to South America and headed successively the Uruguay Mission, and the Chile and Argentina conferences. In 1922 he took charge of the South Mexican Mission. When his wife died several months after the move to Mexico, he returned to the United States and engaged in pastoral work in Iowa and Nebraska. In 1924 he became president of the North Texas Conference. In 1926 he remarried and took charge of the Inca Union Mission, but his wife's failing health made necessary their return to the homeland. From 1928 to 1930 he was president of the South Texas Conference, and from 1930 to 1932, of the North Texas Conference. After that he joined the General Conference Bureau of Home Missions as associate secretary of the Spanish department, from which he retired in 1938.

Perseverance

PERSEVERANCE. In Calvinist theology, “perseverance of the saints” denotes the unalterable continuance of the new life in Christ, as the experience of those who have, presumably, been elected by God to salvation. This special power to persevere, so Calvin taught, preserves them from ever falling into sin. This theological concept has found expression in the popular affirmation, “once in grace, always in grace.” This doctrine was first clearly set forth by Augustine in the fourth century, and is held by churches in the Calvinistic tradition as a logical consequence of the doctrine of election. See Predestination.

Seventh-day Adventists have never held this theory, inasmuch as the Scriptures explicitly state that persons may fall away after they have accepted Christ as Saviour and thus forfeit the gift of eternal life (Heb. 6:4—6; cf. Eze. 3:20). In fact, Seventh-day Adventists reject both the Calvinist theory of election and its corollary, the perseverance of the saints. They believe, instead, that God purposed, or predestined, all persons to salvation in Christ Jesus (1 Tim. 2:4; Eph. 1:3—5), but that this purpose becomes effective only as people respond in faith to God’s gracious invitation, of their own free will (John 3:16; 1:12, 13; etc.). This new life in Christ is maintained, strengthened, and deepened as Christians live lives of continual voluntary submission to the will of Christ in all things (Rom. 6:8—13; 2 Cor. 5:14; Gal. 2:20; Phil. 2:12, 13; James 4:7; 1 John 5:18).

Ellen White wrote in 1889: “The Word of God lays down the condition of our salvation, and it rests wholly with ourselves whether or not we will comply with Him” (5T 692). Again, in 1900, she said: “The Scriptures make it plain that those who once knew the way of life and rejoiced in the truth are in danger of falling through apostasy, and being lost. Therefore, there is need of a decided, daily conversion” (SDACom 6:1114, 1115).

That it is possible for a man once saved by grace to fall away from Christ and forfeit salvation is evident from such passages as Eze. 33:13; 1 Cor. 9:27; Heb. 6:4—6; 10:26—27.

To be sure, sinners saved by grace must persevere, or endure, to the end in order to be saved (Matt. 10:22; 2 Peter 1:10, 11). But this endurance results from their continued voluntary cooperation with divine grace in the life, not from an irresistible power taking possession of them, as Calvin taught.

Persévérance Boissard School

PERSÉVÉRANCE BOISSARD SCHOOL (École la Persévérance de Boissard). A coeducational Seventh-day Adventist school begun in Guadeloupe in 1947 by the Pointe-à-Pitre church. It was a simple primary school composed of three classes under the leadership of Joseph Bigord, a retired school director.

That school, located on the first floor of a multistoried building, provided classes for children from 5 to 14 years old. It had to accommodate more than 60 students in a small room divided into three sections by two blue rough canvas curtains.

In 1952 the school was transferred to two rooms that had just been built. In 1955 three new rooms were added, making it possible to open the school officially under the name La Persévérance school. That same year the second year of high school was offered; in 1956 the third year was offered, and in 1957 the fourth.

In 1969 a new building was erected providing classrooms, a laboratory, offices, a nursery, a library, a kitchen, and a dining room.

In 1980 six new rooms were added, including a library and a science laboratory. In 1993 the school had 26 classrooms and more than 535 students.

Personal Evangelism

PERSONAL EVANGELISM. See Lay Evangelism.

Personal Ministries

PERSONAL MINISTRIES (Lay Activities). A facet of the church, the beginning of which can be traced to a women's group in South Lancaster, Massachusetts, called the Vigilant Missionary Society (established 1869). The work of the society gave S. N. Haskell the idea that led to his establishing in New England in 1870 the first of the Tract and Missionary Societies of the various conferences. These conference "T. and M. Societies," either directly or through district or local societies, enlisted lay members in circulating Seventh-day Adventist tracts, pamphlets, books, and periodicals through sale or free distribution, in conducting personal evangelism through visits or correspondence, and in aiding the needy. Then in 1874 the General Conference set up its General (renamed International) Tract and Missionary Society. When the General Conference Publishing Department was set up about 1901, it absorbed the International Tract and Missionary Society, but the fostering of lay evangelism was assigned in 1913 to a separate subdivision—the "Home Missionary Branch of the Publishing Department," with Edith M. Graham as secretary. After functioning thus for five years, the Home Missionary Branch was made a department in 1918 (General Conference Bulletin [1918], pp. 104, 118, 149).

In 1915, soon after the General Conference had recommended the appointment of home missionary secretaries to promote church missionary work in both the General Conference and the North American Division, the home missionary secretaries were appointed also in union and local conferences.

At the General Conference session in 1922 A. G. Daniells, the General Conference president, explained what the Home Missionary Department meant: "It is not a campaign, it is a religious movement. It is a revival of pure religion in the church, and the going forth to bear it to others. . . . This department is to train men and women all over the world to go out about their homes to win souls to Christ" (General Conference Bulletin [1922], p. 77).

In time, five areas of departmental evangelistic activities developed:

1. Bible correspondence course enrollments.
2. Community services, involving the work done by Dorcas-Welfare Societies in local churches and Community Services centers and units. Specific programs included emergency provision of food and clothing, interviewing and referral, adult-education classes in first aid, home management, sponsoring summer camps for disadvantaged children, and disaster relief.
3. Ingathering. This annual appeal has made millions of personal contacts, enrolled thousands in Bible correspondence courses, and raised funds for medical, educational, community service, and evangelistic work around the world.
4. Lay Bible evangelism, including personal Bible studies or public meetings. Many churches have organized groups specializing in lay preaching, prison evangelism, and certain specific Community Services projects.
5. Literature distribution, including systematic house-to-house distribution, mailing programs, tract racks, and individual or church lending libraries.

At the 1966 General Conference session the GC Home Missionary Department became the Lay Activities Department. In 1985 the General Conference Lay Activities Department became part of the newly formed Church Ministries Department. Lay activities and personal ministries departments and divisions continue at various levels of church organization. See Church Ministries Department; Lay Activities Department.

Peru

PERU. A unitary republic on the Pacific coast of South America, lying between Ecuador and Chile, with its eastern boundary touching Colombia, Brazil, and Bolivia. There are about 23.7 million inhabitants (1994) in an area of 496,222 square miles (1.2 million square kilometers), with a population density of nearly 50 per square mile (20 per square kilometer).

The country is divided into three distinctive geographical regions: 1. La Costa, the narrow coastal plain, an arid region, broken by valleys watered by short rivers that flow down from the high mountains to the sea. Agriculture, industries, and fishing flourish in these valleys. 2. La Sierra, the mountainous region, including the western and eastern Andean ranges with heavily populated mountain valleys that range in elevation from 8,000 to 12,000 feet (2,450 to 3,660 meters). The mountains rise abruptly from the coast to a peak of 22,205 feet (6,768 meters) at the top of Huascarán, the highest mountain in Peru. The most notable of the high plateaus is the Titicaca basin. The Andean highlanders engage principally in agriculture, sheep and cattle raising, and mining. The mountain climate has been summarized as hot sun, cool shade; warm middays, frosty nights; rainy summer, dry winter. 3. La Selva, the eastern jungle, part of the great Amazon basin. This low, flat region, hot and humid, with abundant rainfall, is crossed by a network of streams and is covered with exuberant tropical vegetation. Most of the inhabitants of the jungle are members of various native tribes, still uncivilized or semicivilized. But there also are towns and cities, mainly along the rivers, populated by highly cultured people and connected by railroads, highways, and airlines.

Lake Titicaca, situated between Peru and Bolivia, and lying at an elevation of 12,507 feet (3,800 meters), is the highest navigable lake in the world. It is 110 miles (175 kilometers) long and 35 miles (55 kilometers) wide, and is crossed by 1,000-ton (900 metric tons) steamers. On Amantani Island in the lake there is an organized Seventh-day Adventist church. The highest SDA Sabbath school in the world meets at Patalaca near the southern end of the lake.

Peruvians are divided into two distinct social classes: the poorer class, by far the majority, whose standard of living is low, although slowly improving; and the rich aristocracy that possesses the larger part of the wealth and the lands. There are a few who belong to a growing middle class. The population is made up of a small percentage of Europeans, a larger percentage of those who are descendants of Whites and Indians, and a still larger percentage of full-blooded Indians who speak either the Quechua or the Aymara language. There is a strong movement under way for improving living conditions in the cities and providing more and better homes and hospitals for the working class. New grade schools and high schools are continually being built. During the first five years of the sixties, 10 new universities sprang up, some offering technical training. SDA primary schools in the highlands have contributed significantly in helping to stamp out illiteracy.

Peru is predominantly Roman Catholic, because that was the religion of the Spanish conquerors. However, the large Indian population, while nominally Roman Catholic, preserves many pagan superstitions and practices. Besides the Roman Catholic majority there are relatively small groups that profess Protestantism and a few Orientals who have brought in their religions. The times of religious fanaticism and open persecution have passed.

Historical Background

Historical Background. Peru arose from the Inca Empire, which included the present countries of Ecuador, Peru, and Bolivia, plus parts of Colombia, Argentina, and Chile—almost half of South America. That empire with its amazing culture continued until 1532, when the Spanish conqueror Francisco Pizarro, arriving at the city of Cajamarca, took prisoner the Inca chief Atahualpa, and soon had him tried and executed. There followed the periods of the Conquest, the Colonization, the Viceregency, and the Republic. The 40 viceroys who ruled Peru had as their seat of government the city of Lima, which Pizarro had founded, still called la Ciudad Virreynal and still the capital of the country. Among large colonial cities were Arequipa and Trujillo, second and third in size. Spain's control was overthrown when on July 28, 1821, Peru's independence was declared and shortly afterward the republic was born.

The present constitution of Peru expresses the ideals of democracy and provides for liberty of conscience, freedom of expression and of the press, and freedom of religious worship. The population of Peru is made up of a mixture of races, but Indians and mestizos form the largest group. There are some Blacks and Asians. When Peru was yet a colony, Blacks were brought into the country to replace the Indians who worked in the mines and the fields. President Ramón Castilla (1855—1862) abolished slavery, after which Chinese coolies were brought in to do the work.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. The territory of Peru is part of the Inca Union Mission (which also includes Bolivia), a part of the South American Division. Statistics (1992) for Peru: churches, 845; members, 271,319; church or elementary schools, 163; ordained ministers, 155; licensed ministers, 93; credentialed missionaries, 256.

Statistics (1992) for the conferences and missions—Central Andina Mission: churches, 88; members, 20,360; church or elementary schools, 15; ordained ministers, 10; licensed ministers, 9; credentialed missionaries, 3. Headquarters: Huancayo. Central Peru Conference: churches, 171; members, 49,056; elementary schools, 22; ordained ministers, 25; licensed ministers, 20; credentialed missionaries, 30. Seventh-day Adventist Work in Peru

Seventh-day Adventist Work in Peru. Forerunners. Late in the 1800s a young man of a distinguished family in Arequipa, by the name of Eduardo F. Forga, was sent to study abroad. During the years that he spent in Europe he became proficient in French, German, and English. As he studied and did research in the great universities he became convinced that the teachings and practices of the Roman clergy were false. He read the Bible, not so much as the Word of God but as an important historical-philosophical work. When he returned to his native city, known as “the Rome of Peru,” he began to write tracts exposing ecclesiastical abuses. These were widely distributed in the departments of Arequipa, Puno, and Cuzco. As a result of reading these tracts, many sympathized with Forga’s convictions and lost their confidence in the Roman Catholic clergy. But his own relatives, prominent figures in Arequipa society and all zealous Catholics, were encouraged by the clergy and their friends to exclude him from their family and social circle. Thus Forga fled to Europe. In London he accepted the SDA faith and became a valuable worker in the translating and publishing of SDA literature in the Spanish language. His ideas on the separation of church and state, disseminated through his publications, prepared the way for Adventism in Peru.

Beginnings on the Coast. Seventh-day Adventist missionary efforts in Peru began some time in 1898. According to the January 1899 issue of The Missionary Magazine, SDA work had “just been carried into Peru.” This issue reported that a Chilean member by the name of Escobar, with a company of six adults, had settled in the city of Lima. They were working as self-supporting missionaries. Other Chilean members had gone with their families to Mollendo in southern Peru. As a result of their missionary efforts small groups of persons joined them.

When writing in La Revista Adventista, Nov. 11, 1939, page 6, E. W. Thomann recalled that the group that went to Mollendo arrived on a Friday and began missionary work the next day. They were immediately attacked by a mob, arrested by the police, and in a few days shipped back to Chile. The other group, under the leadership of Jose Luis Escobar, began self-supporting work. He mentioned that despite hardships and persecution, they succeeded in winning a few converts.

According to La Revista Adventista (April 1902) Enrique Balada, a Chilean colporteur and pioneer worker, went to open work in Lima among the interested persons there. The adherents immediately began to experience hostility of both their former friends and the popular church, and to suffer persecution. Balada did not stay long in Lima. When he left, the lay workers and the new converts requested that a missionary be sent to baptize them and organize an SDA church. In answer, H. F. Ketring was sent from Chile to visit the interested ones in Lima. He arrived Oct. 13, 1904, and found a group of about 20 adherents at Lima, seven of whom he baptized on Nov. 12, 1904. This baptism was conducted in secret, and the meetings were held behind closed doors. On Nov. 16, 1905, F. L. Perry arrived from South Dakota, and the work that was already growing was organized as the Peru Mission.

Perry organized a band of colporteurs from the enthusiastic converts who volunteered for that work, prominent among whom were Ramón Betrán S., and Julio Nerio Espinoza. He also traveled extensively throughout the coast and highlands, preaching with a faith that was contagious. Since he was the only missionary—mission superintendent, treasurer, and departmental promoter all in one—the heavy work soon took its toll of his strength, and he was forced to return to the homeland in 1909. He later returned to Peru for further service.

At that time there were more than 100 adherents in Peru, about 30 of whom had been baptized. La Revista Adventista reported that the first church was organized in Lima about the middle of 1907, with about 20 members (7:6, June 1907). From 1908 to 1932 these converts met in three successive locations; in 1932 they finished and occupied the church known today as the Central church of Lima.

The second church to be organized was at Lanca de Otao, a small town among the hills about 40 miles (65 kilometers) east of Lima, and the third at Huacho, about 80 miles (130 kilometers) north of Lima.

With the arrival in 1909 of A. N. Allen and other missionaries, the Peruvian Mission was strengthened and began to develop rapidly. Allen served as mission superintendent; O. H. Maxson, secretary-treasurer; E. F. Wilson, colporteur director; E. H. Wilcox, home missionary and Sabbath school secretary; and W. R. von Pohle, who arrived in December 1909 as mission evangelist. The first colporteur institute was held in Lima in 1909 with 18 colporteurs in attendance. Present too were Manuel Z. Camacho, an Aymara chief from Plateria near Puno, and a young man, Fernando Osorio, who later related many of the early experiences of the work.

Lake Titicaca Area Entered. During the fall of 1900 two colporteurs and a companion by the name of Escobar passed through Arequipa and Puno on their way to Bolivia, selling and taking subscriptions to Las Señales de los Tiempos (“The Signs of the Times”), which Thomann had been editing in Chile. These papers fell into the hands of the Peralta and the Aragón families in Puno, who in turn passed them on to the Aymara chief, Manuel Z. Camacho. Securing copies of Bibles, they studied and accepted the SDA faith. Perry visited them in 1908, and in 1910 Allen baptized four of the converts in Puno, as well as Chief Camacho and 14 of his villagers.

The colporteurs who attended the first institute in Lima went out protected by certificates from government offices, stating that the books they were selling were legitimate merchandise. César López, by now a veteran, and Fernando Osorio, the youngest recruit, were assigned the cities of Arequipa, Puno, and Cuzco. As Osorio remembers it, they went from door to door on opposite sides of the street; López had great success, but Osorio’s efforts seemed to result in nothing but failure. When the mission superintendent, Allen, passed through Arequipa, the discouraged and homesick Osorio asked for permission to go home. But Allen offered him a different and unexpected solution. The converts in Puno were begging for a missionary and this young man seemed to be the answer to their prayers. Osorio could not refuse this invitation, even though he would receive as compensation only his room and board. Thus from May 1910 to February 1911 he carried on gospel work in Puno. He found four families of adherents, about 20 persons in all, four of whom were already baptized.

On Sabbaths Indians from Camacho’s village began to arrive at church in increasing numbers. When these Indians told their chief about the young preacher in Puno, he himself came to invite Osorio to teach his people. An arrangement was made for Osorio to teach in Plateria from Monday to Thursday and in Puno from Friday to Sunday each week. Every Monday morning a young man by the name of Luciano Chambi brought a horse for Osorio to ride to Plateria. La Revista Adventista reported that on May 27, 1911, 29 Aymara Indians were baptized by J. W. Westphal, then president of the South American Union, who was visiting Puno. One hundred and fifty more were preparing for that rite at a later date.

It was at this time that F. A. Stahl and his wife, who had begun work in La Paz, Bolivia, in 1909 were transferred to Plateria. The history of the pioneer experiences and missionary service that endeared them to the Aymara Indians is recounted most interestingly in Stahl's book In the Land of the Incas. Their work and that of their coworkers and successors made possible the great progress and success of the mission work in the Lake Titicaca region.

The Stahls believed that one of the first steps to take was the training of native workers. Mrs. Stahl personally tutored the mission boy Luciano Chambi (who later became an ordained minister) until he was able to read and write excellently. Then, with Luciano as her assistant, she opened a small, poorly equipped school where the Indian children could begin their education. From that humble beginning the number of mission schools on the Peruvian side of the lake gradually rose to an all-time high of 113 in 1951. The total enrollment in that year was 5,654 pupils. The majority of the 164 teachers were prepared at the Colegio Adventista de Titicaca (Titicaca Adventist Academy), established near Juliaca in 1922.

Inca Union Mission Organized. In order to supervise better the growing work in Peru, Bolivia, and Ecuador, where missions had already been organized, these three local missions were united in 1914 to form the Inca Union Mission, with E. L. Maxwell as president. Offices were established in Lima and later moved to a suburb, Miraflores. In 1919 the Industrial Institute (now the Union Adventist Educational Complex) was founded in Miraflores.

Lake Titicaca Mission Organized. Because the whole of Peru was far too large a territory to be under one mission organization, the southern part was separated in 1916 to form the Lake Titicaca Indian Mission, with headquarters in Puno. Its territory took in the departments of Puno, Cuzco, and Madre de Dios in Peru, and also the basin of Lake Titicaca on the Bolivian side of the lake. In 1920 the territory in Bolivia was transferred to the Bolivia Mission, and eventually the departments of Apurimac, Arequipa, Moquegua, and Tacna were added to the Lake Titicaca Mission.

In view of calls for missionaries from 18 villages, the mission committee sent an urgent request for seven married couples from the United States and an appropriation to provide homes and support for them for a year, and also a call for 24 national workers. In the following years congregations numbering hundreds of Indians gathered at the many mission stations around the lake. As early as 1921 there were 10 organized churches, with a membership of 3,120. The baptisms in 1922 totaled 680. About this time the new Juliaca Clinic and the Lake Titicaca Training School began functioning.

In 1920 the local and union committees voted that the word "Indian" be dropped from the name of the mission and that it be called henceforth the Lake Titicaca Mission of Seventh-day Adventists. Soon plans were laid for more aggressive work in the large cities of Peru, and a call was placed for a city evangelist.

In 1923 the union faced a grave financial crisis. The budget for established work was reduced 28.5 percent, but the missionaries, not willing to allow the advance of the work to be interrupted, rallied to the need by voting to cut back the margin of safety in the estimate of expenses, to save on legitimate expenses, to sacrifice evangelistic funds and instead to work among the church members for a spiritual revival, and to donate four weeks without pay. The “lean” years proved to be “fat” in soul winning, especially in the Lake Titicaca Mission, where the baptisms jumped to 955 in 1923 and to 1,420 in 1924.

Because of the extremely high elevation, the Lake Titicaca Mission was always a difficult field healthwise for missionaries. A rest home was maintained in Tingo, a suburb of Arequipa, and another was rented in Mollendo, so that workers could escape periodically from the altitude.

In the mid-1960s the mission was renamed South Peru Mission, and in 1974 its headquarters were transferred to Arequipa, an important city about 7,000 feet (2,100 meters) above sea level, closer to the largely neglected coastal cities of south Peru. In the late 1970s a new Lake Titicaca Mission, comprising the department of Puno, was formed from the South Peru Mission.

Advance Into the Amazon Jungle. In July 1921 the Inca Union committee requested F. A. Stahl to visit central Peru to investigate the opportunities for Indian work in the eastern jungle. After reconnoitering and studying the possibilities for two months, he sent an urgent plea to be permitted to stay in the Chanchamayo district. The request was granted, and once again the Stahls were pioneering, this time among the jungle tribes. The Metraro mission station was set up on the Perené River, and through hardship, sickness, lack of facilities, and opposition they struggled on until the mission was firmly established. Then they returned to the United States to attend the 1926 General Conference session and enjoy a much-needed rest. They took with them a young Campa girl named Chave, firstfruits of the jungle work. She accompanied them also on a trip to Europe, and great interest was aroused everywhere in the work for the jungle Indians—the Campas, Piros, Cashivos, Shipibos, Conibos, and others living along the numerous Amazon tributaries.

In 1927 an action was taken to separate the eastern jungle territory from the Peru Mission and to organize it as the Upper Amazon Mission of Peru, known now as the East Peru Mission, with Stahl as superintendent and with headquarters at Iquitos; also to construct two small homes and purchase a boat. This was carried out in 1928.

A piece of property north of town was greatly desired, but because of lack of funds the mission bought only the part fronting on the road; Stahl bought the other part with his own means and built his own house there. The first church in Iquitos was organized in 1927.

The promised boat, made possible through gifts from the United States, was a wood-burning steam launch named Auxiliadora (“Helper”). In it Stahl made long missionary trips up and down the rivers. Eventually it was sold, and in 1940 was succeeded by a more practical Diesel-powered launch built in Belém, Brazil, as the twin sister of L. B. Halliwell’s Luzeiro II. See Missionary Vessels.

The work in those years was difficult, as exemplified by a letter Henry Westphal’s wife wrote to her mother: “Our workers are all having troubles. The Schaefflers [missionaries among the Indians on the upper Ucayali River] sent a telegram asking Elder Stahl to go up to help them. . . . Then Brother Chávez has had his books confiscated. The Indian teacher, Manuela, is in prison. And here we are at a standstill, with no place for our meetings. A new school year is approaching, with no teachers and no building in sight. There just aren’t enough of us, and there is never enough money!” (Barbara Westphal, A Bride on the Amazon, p. 78).

A building was erected in 1930 on the mission property in Iquitos with the hope that a medical institution could be established there. For many years it served simply as a mission office and home. Finally, the Stahl Clinic was opened.

Later Growth. From 1898 until 1923, there was only one organized church in Lima, which reached a membership of about 70. A church was organized in Miraflores in 1923 for the professors and students of the Lima Training School. When that school was moved to Ñaña (15 miles [24 kilometers] east of Lima) in 1946, a large congregation remained in Miraflores, meeting in the old school chapel. In 1964 the largest Seventh-day Adventist church building in Peru was erected on Espinar Avenue to house that congregation.

As the result of public meetings in the 1950s, new congregations sprang up in the Porvenir, Pueblo Libre, and San Martin districts of Lima, each formed by new converts and members from the Central church.

The Indian missions at Nevati and Unini carry on the work begun in Metraró. The Clinica Adventista Miraflores was established in 1946.

Radio Work. In 1950 the Radio Department of the Inca Union was created, with B. A. Larsen as secretary. Seventy-two weekly Voice of Prophecy (Voz de la Esperanza) broadcasts go out in the Inca Union (including Bolivia and Ecuador).

North Peru Mission. Because of the demands of the growing work, in January 1961 the Peru Mission was once again divided to create the North Peru Mission. The remaining part was then called the Central Peru Mission, its offices continuing in Miraflores. The new mission, with headquarters in Chiclayo, department of Lambayeque, included all the old mission north of the Santa River and also the department of Amazonas, which was formerly part of the Amazon Mission.

Central Peru Conference. After years of steady growth, the Central Peru Mission achieved conference status in January 1974. In 1990 the Central Andina Mission was formed from part of the conference.

Disasters. Earthquakes damaged churches in Cuzco (1950) and in Arequipa (1958 and 1959). A severe drought afflicted the Titicaca region from 1955 to 1958, seriously affecting the personal economy of the Indians on their small farms. Large numbers of SDA Indians have moved away from the highlands, seeking employment on the coast, thus causing a shift and even a considerable loss in membership in the South Peru Mission. The mission carried on an extensive program of distribution of CARE packages during the drought and helped earthquake victims.

Headquarters. The property in Miraflores, which was acquired in 1922, has since been the headquarters for the Inca Union Mission. A training school was begun, and other buildings were added, such as workers' homes and a union office. The first major change came with the sale of the school farm and the transfer of the school to Ñaña in 1946. Soon afterward a street-widening project necessitated the rebuilding of the whole compound. A new union office was occupied in 1955.

Peten Agricultural School

PETEN AGRICULTURAL SCHOOL. A coeducational boarding school formerly operated on the junior high school level by the Guatemala Mission, which forms a part of the Central American Union Mission. In 1971 a concession of 1,800 acres (730 hectares) of land was received from the Guatemalan government, and construction of the project began the following year. The school was located six miles (10 kilometers) from the town of Poptún in the northern province of El Peten, which borders on Belize. At an elevation of 1,600 feet (490 meters) above sea level, the climate is healthful and moderate.

The school was formally opened in January 1973 under the direction of James Bechtel, with an initial enrollment of 22 students. Enrollment grew to 72, with a staff of eight members permanently employed and eight others who served under the Volunteer Service Corps plan. The scholastic program was geared to vocational training with special emphasis in agriculture. The agricultural program was operated along the lines of the Jacob Mittleider Food Production program. Dr. Charles Hackett and Henry Smith initiated the program and developed it into a thriving industry.

In February 1974 authorization was granted by the General Conference for the operation of the school, and in June the Guatemalan government also granted its official approval.

Started as a faith project in Christian education, the school was built from private donations and volunteer labor, with no appropriations from denominational sources.

In the 1980s the school was rented on a long-term lease to the International Children's Care organization.

Peters, George Edward

PETERS, GEORGE EDWARD (1885—1965). Minister and departmental secretary of the General Conference. He was born on the island of Antigua in the West Indies in the family of a Moravian minister and principal of a parochial school. When he was about 13, the family joined the Seventh-day Adventist Church. In his youth he went to Trinidad and later to Panama, where he met Ethel Espeut, who later became his wife. After studying at Oakwood College, about 1908 he entered evangelistic work in the southern United States becoming, after a period, a union evangelist. In 1922 he went to Chicago to pastor a Black congregation. While there he directed in the building of the Shiloh church. In 1929 he was elected secretary of the North American Colored Department, but returned to evangelism the next year, working in New York City. In 1939 he went to Philadelphia as pastor of the Ebenezer church. In 1941 he was again elected secretary of the North American Colored Department. This position he filled until his retirement in 1953, serving also as a field secretary of the General Conference during the last three years. He was the first editor of the North American Informant and was author of the book Thy Dead Shall Live.

Petersen, Bernhard

PETERSEN, BERNHARD (1884—1957). Pioneer Seventh-day Adventist missionary in Manchuria. He was born in Denmark and at the age of 18 came to the United States, where the next year he joined the SDA Church through the influence of an SDA family and through reading Daniel and the Revelation. He attended Union College, and in 1906 participated in evangelistic work in Chicago. Later he returned to Denmark for additional study at Copenhagen University. In 1908 he joined the faculty of the Scandinavian Department of Union College, Lincoln, Nebraska, and taught for two years. Later he again engaged in evangelistic work in Chicago and Nebraska. In 1911 he was ordained and in 1912 was appointed to establish a Seventh-day Adventist mission in Manchuria. In 1913, after special training at the Washington Foreign Mission Seminary, Takoma Park, Maryland, he and his wife, née Bertha Erickson, whom he had just married, went to China. For the next 17 years (1913—1931) he was in charge of the SDA work in Manchuria, and later directed Anhwei Mission in East China for five years (1931—1935). In 1936 he returned to the United States and worked in the Iowa and Upper Columbia conferences until his retirement about 1948.

Peterson, Alfred W.

PETERSON, ALFRED W. (1887—1971). Educator and departmental secretary. He was a native of Minnesota and attended Union College from 1905 to 1910. While there, he was baptized by Elder Luther Warren. In 1912 he entered the literature ministry and soon thereafter was called as principal of an intermediate school in Oklahoma. During a four-year term of service at Southwestern Junior College, he was married to Stella May Parker.

Beginning in 1920, he served the denomination as educational secretary of the Southwestern and North Pacific unions, and in 1929 he went to South America as the educational and MV secretary of the division, returning in 1931 because of illness in his family.

In 1932 he became educational and MV secretary of the Southern Union, following which he joined the General Conference staff as MV secretary, a position he held for 12 years.

After a year of graduate studies, he was called to the Australasian Division, again as secretary of the educational and MV work. In 1953 he returned to the United States, where he served as research secretary and counselor for the Voice of Prophecy until his retirement in 1956.

Peterson, Frank Loris

PETERSON, FRANK LORIS (1893—1969). Minister, teacher, departmental secretary, administrator. He was born in Florida to devout Methodist parents. At 14 he became a Seventh-day Adventist and was baptized into the church. Studying theology at Pacific Union College, he became in 1916 the first Black man to graduate from that school.

In 1922 he married Bessie Elston. At this time he was teaching at Oakwood Junior College, where he continued until 1926. At that time he became assistant Missionary Volunteer, home missionary, and assistant educational secretary of the Southern Union. In 1930 he became pastor of the Boston, Massachusetts, Berea church, and then was elected secretary of the North American Regional Department.

In 1941 he was invited to a pastorate in California, which position he held until 1945, when he was elected president of Oakwood College. Nine years later he became an associate secretary of the General Conference.

At the General Conference session of 1962, Elder Peterson was elected a general vice president of the General Conference, the first Black man to be named to this high office.

After his retirement in 1966 he returned to California.

Peterson-Warren Academy

PETERSON-WARREN ACADEMY. A nonboarding secondary school located in Inkster, Michigan. The property consists of seven acres (three hectares) of land and a physical plant known as Campus I. The preschool and kindergarten, which opened in 1985, are located on a separate site in Inkster. This facility is known as Campus II. In 1994 the school had a staff and faculty of 17.

Principals: Carlyle Miller, 1978—1980; Alvin Barnes, 1980— .

Petri, Johann Philipp

PETRI, JOHANN PHILIPP (1718—1792). German pastor and writer on the prophecies; on some points a forerunner of Seventh-day Adventist interpretations connected with the 70 weeks and the 2300 days. While serving as pastor of the Reformed church at Seckbach, now a suburb of Frankfurt am Main, from 1746 to 1792, he wrote a number of treatises on the prophecies.

He found the key to the chronology of the 2300 days (Dan. 8) in the 70 weeks (Dan. 9), by beginning both 453 years before the birth of Christ, thus placing the death of Christ in the midst of the 70th week and ending the 2300 days, as years, 1847 years after Christ's birth (Aufschluss der Zahlen Daniels und der Offenbarung Johannis, 1768, pp. 7—9; this book was reprinted in facsimile by the Advent-Verlag, Hamburg).

If calculated from 4 B.C., the date for the Nativity generally accepted in Miller's day, Petri's "year 1847 after the birth of Christ" was equivalent to William Miller's 1843/1844. However, Miller arrived at his conclusions independently.

Petri did not initiate a movement, but his chronology probably influenced later writers. In the widespread nineteenth-century movement many were looking to 1843, 1844, or 1847 for the end of the 2300—day prophecy, even though they did not necessarily know of Petri.

Petrópolis Adventist Academy

PETRÓPOLIS ADVENTIST ACADEMY (Instituto Petrópolis Adventista de Ensino). A coeducational boarding school on the senior high school level, situated on 136.5 acres (55 hectares) of land, 34 miles (54 kilometers) from Rio de Janeiro, on the Rio-Bahía Highway, and about 14 miles (22 kilometers) from the historical city of Petrópolis. It is owned by the East Brazil Union Conference and is operated by a board representing the union and serving principally the southern states of that union.

The forerunner of Petrópolis Adventist Academy was Instituto Educacional e Agrícola de Petrópolis (Petropolis Educational and Agricultural Institute), founded in 1939 by the East Brazil Union Mission. In 1940 the name of the school was changed to Instituto Teológico Adventista (Adventist Theological Institute), in 1960 to Instituto Petrópolis de Ensino (Petropolitan Institute). From 1972 to 1983 it was called East Brazil Academy. It has had its present name since 1984.

In 1942 the school became accredited. The academic curriculum includes elementary school, three secondary courses, normal, commercial, and assistant laboratory technician; all of which prepare students to enter the university.

Directors: J. D. Hardt, 1940—1941; W. J. Brown, 1942—1943; S. J. Schwantes, 1944—1947; Joao Bork, 1948—1949; Tosaku Kanada, 1950; Jairo Araujo, 1951; D. D. Holtz, 1952—1953; E. Pettis, Jerry L.

PETTIS, JERRY L. (1916—1975). Congressman from the Thirty-third Congressional District of California. A native of Phoenix, Arizona, he received his education in Western schools. In 1938 he graduated from Pacific Union College with a major in speech. In later years he took advance studies at the University of Denver and the University of Southern California. After graduation from Pacific Union College, he served as a ministerial intern in Arizona. Always interested in aviation, he obtained his pilot's license and then traveled by light plane as he served his scattered congregations in the Mojave Desert.

In following years he worked in evangelism in Missouri and joined the faculty of Union College, teaching in the Speech Department. In 1947 he married Shirley McCumber. One year later he became professor of economics at Loma Linda University, a position he held for 16 years. During a portion of this time he also served as vice president in charge of development, and from 1960 to 1967 he was chairman of the Board of Counselors.

On Nov. 9, 1966, Pettis was elected to the Ninetieth Congress as representative from California's Thirty-third Congressional District, one of the largest in the country. He was subsequently reelected to the Ninety-first, the Ninety-second, the Ninety-third, and the Ninety-fourth Congresses, each time increasing his margin of victory. During his years in the House of Representatives he gained a reputation for much personal attention to the needs of his constituents.

At the time of his death he was the third ranking Republican member of the powerful Ways and Means Committee. He died on Feb. 14 when his private plane crashed in the mountains near Beaumont, California. He was the first member of the Seventh-day Adventist Church to be elected to the Congress of the United States.

PHAG Food Factory

PHAG FOOD FACTORY (Fabrique de produits dietetiques) (PHAG is a trade name formed from the initials of Produits Alimentaires Hygiéniques, Gland). A health food factory at Gland, Switzerland, owned by the Société Philanthropique de la Lignière, Inc., under direct supervision of the Euro-Africa Division. Originally opened in connection with the establishment of a medical institution in Basel, Switzerland, in 1895, it at first limited itself almost entirely to the manufacture and sale of oatmeal and biscuits. Kellogg specialties were later added, such as peanut butter, Granose biscuits, and cereal flakes.

In 1905, when the medical institution moved from Basel to Gland, on the shores of Lake Geneva and halfway between Lausanne and Geneva, the food factory moved with it and was established on the same property. Since the abridged title PHAG is reminiscent of the Greek verb phagein, “to eat,” it is a suitable name for a food manufacturing enterprise.

From year to year the factory increased its production and sales, added new products, and improved its equipment. The factory became well known throughout Switzerland. Among the foods that deserve special mention are those derived from almonds, hazelnuts, and peanuts. Meat and coffee substitutes and diabetic specialties are also produced.

In 1980 a close cooperation began with the German Health Food Factory (DE-VAU-GE Gesundkostwerk), whereby the production of most of the products was transferred step by step to the German company. PHAG continues with the distribution of these products. The yearly turnover (1992) exceeds $1.4 million.

In 1993 the organization had seven employees.

Phang Nyuk Thin

PHANG NYUK THIN (1875—1961). The first national Seventh-day Adventist minister in Southeast Asia to be ordained. He was born in Kwangtung province of China and worked at Basel Mission, a nondenominational mission operated by a European society in British North Borneo (now Sabah). It was here that a relative, an SDA colporteur, influenced him to join the SDAs. He trained for the ministry in Singapore and in 1917 took charge of the Bible training course of the Chinese department at Singapore Training School (now Southeast Asia Union College/Southeast Asia Adventist Seminary). He remained there 14 years until he retired at the age of 60 and entered the colporteur work. For a time he also served as chaplain of the Bangkok Mission Clinic in Thailand.

Philanthropic Service for Institutions

PHILANTHROPIC SERVICE FOR INSTITUTIONS (formerly Institutional Consulting Service). An office that nurtures and encourages the acquisition of voluntary financial support by church-operated colleges, academies, and hospitals in the North American Division. The function documents philanthropic data by sources and provides annual comparisons that stimulate and inspire continued efforts. A monthly publication, The Philanthropic Dollar, is sent to 500 church and institutional leaders as well as to staffers who contribute professionally at the various institutions. The office also administers a program designated to facilitate entry into the field of philanthropy by young men and women. It is known as the STEP/UP program—acronym for student training and experience program underscoring philanthropy. Discounted computer services, professional books, service from the National Foundation Center, periodic conferences, and consulting visits to institutions are also provided by the office.

PSI was established in 1973 as the result of some successful campaigns that had been undertaken in the previous six years. The Hackettstown Community Hospital, Shawnee Mission Medical Center, Huguley Memorial Medical Center, Portland Adventist Medical Center, and Bella Vista Hospital (Puerto Rico) were sites of successful capital campaigns that, in effect, persuaded church leaders to formalize and establish the philanthropic function. In 1978 the first Tri-annual Conference on Philanthropy was held on the campus of Union College with 37 in attendance. The 1993 conference—the sixth—was attended by more than 125, showing a significant increase in programs.

In 1979 the Hospital Development Fund was established by the General Conference to extend challenge grants to the hospitals for achieving dollar goals for capital campaigns and annual funds. In 1985 the Adventist Health System itself joined in funding the program. By 1992 some $1.7 million invested in challenge programs to the hospitals had helped to generate $38 million, almost entirely from non-Seventh-day Adventist sources.

In addition to enhancing the financial picture at the various institutions, philanthropy makes known the mission of the church to hundreds of thousands who otherwise would not have known.

In 1980 Philanthropic Service for Institutions set up a $2.1 million fund by asking various business executives to join church leadership in challenging SDA colleges and universities to raise significant moneys from their alumni. After 12 years of work (and an additional $1.3 million in challenge moneys), the BECA (Business Executives' Challenge to Alumni) Program helped to generate some $22 million. In 1986 a similar program was initiated for academies, which within seven years was prompting academy alumni and other constituents to give $4 million annually for their programs. Collectively, some 100 institutions in NAD were receiving $1 million each week through philanthropy. During a 12-year period ending in 1993, $430 million in philanthropic moneys came to institutions.

The service also contributes to the advancement of philanthropy at the national level by providing publications and modest funding for national agencies. The Page-a-Day Giving

Is Caring quotes calendar is distributed to hundreds of nonprofits throughout the nation. As of the end of 1993 some 340,000 have bedecked the offices and homes of donors and volunteers. Other publications with national standing include books on how to recognize donors and volunteers, humor in philanthropy, quotations for writers, speakers, and leaders.

Thanks to funding provided by an SDA business couple, a very modest “BECA type” program has been working with a dozen colleges outside the North American Division where alumni are beginning to take note of the possibilities. In the process, $145,000 of challenge moneys have generated $435,000 from alumni of these institutions.

Philippine Publishing House

PHILIPPINE PUBLISHING HOUSE. A publishing organization with its own printing plant operated by the North, Central, and South Philippine unions at Caloocan City, near Manila, Philippine Islands. It issues Seventh-day Adventist publications in Bicol, Cebuan, Chinese, English, Ilocano, Pampango, Panayan, and Tagalog. The following periodicals are published by the house: Gaceta sa Iglesya ("Church Gazette," in Cebuan), Mizpa (in Cebuan, English, Ilocano, Panayan, and Tagalog), Sabbath School Lesson Quarterly (senior, in Cebuan, English, Ilocano, Pampango, Panayan, and Tagalog), and Health and Home (in English). A number of books by local authors have also been published.

Development. The publishing house had its beginning in 1914 in a stable behind the house in which L. V. Finster, superintendent of the SDA work in the Philippines, was living in Malate, Manila. The printing equipment consisted of a secondhand foot-power Colt's Armory job press, and a small assortment of type brought from the United States by Finster when he returned from furlough in the autumn of 1913. The printed signatures were stored in the open basement of the Finster house until they were assembled and bound into books as needed. Previous to the setting up of the press, publications in the Filipino dialects used by the colporteurs had been printed by local non-SDA printers.

In an effort to keep up with the demands for books and leaflets, the press, which could print only two pages at a time, was operating from 5:00 a.m. until 10:00 p.m. By mid-1915, there had come off the press 20 publications, including books of from 200 to 500 pages, printed in the four major Philippine dialects: Tagalog, Cebuan, Ilocano, and Ilonggo.

In 1915, with an appropriation from the Far Eastern Division, a plot of about five acres (two hectares) was purchased in Pasay City, near Manila, and work on a building begun. In March 1916 the handpress was moved to the new building, which had been erected at a cost of $2,000. It was 75 feet (23 meters) in length, its front section was 43 feet (13 meters) wide, and its rear section 33 feet (10 meters) wide.

By early 1917 the new plant was well equipped. Among its new machinery was a large cylinder press. Most of the equipment was donated by the Pacific Press Publishing Association.

The new building and equipment soon proved inadequate to meet the demands. During the next several years buildings were enlarged and equipment was added. In 1922 a Linotype and power cutter were installed, in 1923 a Miehle press, and in 1926 a second Linotype.

From 1916 to 1928 there were six additions to the original plant, bringing the total floor space to 13,000 square feet (1,210 square meters). Some of the space was used by the Philippine Union Mission offices.

In 1922 printing was being done in nine dialects and by 1927 in 11. By 1924 the Philippine Publishing House was self-supporting and able to give substantial bonuses to all press workers. It led the other denominational publishing houses in the Far Eastern Division in sales. Press manager E. A. Moon reported that in 1925 and 1926 (the best years up to that time), the press produced 48,658 bound books, 83,040 paperbound pamphlets, 81,186 tracts, 464,244 magazines, and 111,012 missionary calendars, a total output of 786,140 units.

From 1928 to the Japanese invasion in 1941, the production of the Philippine Publishing House reflected the economic conditions of the country. With the fall of the Philippines, publishing ceased. When the Japanese forces retreated in 1945, they burned the building and destroyed all the equipment.

Postwar History. Soon after the cessation of hostilities, a new plant was constructed on a site of about five acres (two hectares) that had been part of the campus of Philippine Union College. Through an action of the Publishing Rehabilitation and Expansion Committee, the Pacific Press Publishing Association helped generously in the rebuilding and the reequipping of the new plant. By 1948 it was in full operation. The new institution was larger than the old plant, and in 1953 was reported to be the third-largest denominational publishing house outside of North America.

Space additions have brought the total floor area to more than 29,000 square feet (2,700 square meters). Expansion of the plant became necessary as the demand of literature evangelists increased. In 1960 a new offset pressroom was added. In 1970 a sizable annex was added to become the Bindery Department. A part of this area now houses the Shipping Department. In 1971 a photo studio room was added on the mezzanine floor. The construction of a new chapel was completed in 1989, together with that of a canteen and a clinic. Two years later the Shipping Department was expanded and the Periodical Department was relocated to ease space constraints. In 1993 a conference room, additional guest houses, and a two-floor apartment were among the new building projects completed.

Major equipment items installed from 1960—1992 are Komori offset presses GM2 and KL-2, Multilith press, Invicta 32 offset press, Stahl folder, Durst Laborator G-139, Graphotype, and a Hydromat three-knife trimmer. In 1971 the house was able to purchase a new book-sewing machine, a casing-in machine, and a two-color Roland offset press. Since then the house has acquired a two-color Heidelberg offset press, a four-color Roland offset press, a two-knife cutter, a Smyth sewing machine, and a 450-kva generator. The plant began its computerization program and went into desktop publishing in 1988. The renovation of its multiline bindery equipment followed three years later.

Throughout the years since its reestablishment, the house has had a steady growth in sales of books and periodicals. Surprisingly, the switch from imported books, which made up 75 percent of sales in 1968—1969, to locally produced books, which now comprise 99 percent of the sales, was made without the anticipated drop in total sales. The 1-million peso mark in annual sales was reached for the first time in 1963. The Philippine Publishing House exceeded the 10-million peso mark for 1974. With the implementation of the cash-and-carry policy in 1986, total sales of the house increased rapidly, reaching 155 million pesos in 1992.

From its initial circulation of 6,000 in 1959, Home and Health magazine increased to 75,000 in 1975. By 1991 circulation had climbed to 140,000.

Direct evangelistic crusades led by workers of the house from 1988 to 1992 yielded 676 converts.

Philippine Union College

PHILIPPINE UNION COLLEGE. A coeducational boarding school on the senior college and graduate level operated by the North Philippine Union. The school is situated at Puting Kahoy, Silang, Cavite.

Plans to establish a training school in the Philippines were laid as early as 1915, when Arthur G. Daniells visited there. In 1916 L. V. Finster, president of the field, did the preparatory work, and I. A. Steinel and O. F. Sevens arrived. The school's first building, costing approximately US$4,000 (P6,500), was erected near the outskirts of Manila, in Pasay, Rizal Province, on a five-acre (two-hectare) plot of land, on which were situated also the publishing house and three homes.

The school, called the Philippine SDA Academy, aimed to offer a symmetrical general education and to prepare workers for some branch of Christian service. The school was opened on June 12, 1917, with 36 students on the academy level, 12 of whom were girls. On the first floor of the only school building were the classrooms, the chapel, the dining room, the kitchen, and the library; the boys lived on the second floor. An old house on the land became the first dormitory for girls. Its basement was used for the kitchen and dining room. The first teachers were I. A. Steinel, O. F. Sevens, and Marciano A. Roxas. In 1918 Mrs. I. A. Steinel, Macario C. Pascual, and Mrs. Merced C. de Pascual joined the staff. By this time the enrollment had increased to 80. The students engaged in various work programs, such as helping to build the homes, making desks, chairs, and other furniture for classroom use, and working in the gardens and the school kitchen.

In 1919 a girls' dormitory was built. A large nipa house, which had served as the matron's quarters, was converted into a primary and normal school building. The first class graduated from the academy in 1920. By 1923 there had been 13 graduates, but 88 students had participated in some form of denominational work. During these same five years 67 students had been baptized. By 1923—1924 the enrollment had reached 300.

In 1925 the Far Eastern Division authorized the school to offer two years of college work. One year was to be added in 1926, and the other in 1927. With this enlargement of course offering, the school was named Philippine Junior College. The articles of incorporation were amended in January 1926, and permission was granted by the Department of Public Instruction of the Philippines for the school to operate on a junior college level.

When a growing enrollment made desirable a larger and better site away from the environs of the city, a tract of 65 acres (26 hectares) was purchased at a cost of approximately US$33,000 (P65,951.95) in Baesa, Caloocan, Rizal, toward the end of 1927. In 1931 the construction of a new school building was begun. Much of the labor was done by the students and teachers. In memory of two former leaders, the administration building was named Jackson-Sevens Memorial Hall. In 1932 the division committee raised the institution to senior college standing and its name was changed to Philippine Union College. In 1935 the first degrees were conferred. Government recognition placed Philippine Union College on the same level as other colleges in the land.

At the time of the move, on the faculty of 21 members, were 13 Americans and eight Filipinos. By 1936 only nine out of the 23 teachers of Philippine Union College were Americans. From then on the percentage of Filipinos on the college faculty has steadily increased.

The school publication, English Journal, was launched in 1936. This was replaced later by the College Voice, which became the official monthly organ of the school. The Alumni Association was organized in 1938, and in the same year the first annual, The Golden Souvenir, was published (renamed Balintawak Memoirs in 1940).

When the missionaries were interned during World War II, Reuben G. Manalaysay became president and Honesto C. Pascual became business manager. Schoolwork was carried on during the Japanese occupation except for the year 1944—1945. Although none of the buildings were destroyed, losses in equipment were heavy.

In 1949 the college opened an extension division in Mindanao, offering junior college courses on the campus of Mindanao Mission Academy. This extension school was the forerunner of Mountain View College. In 1952, with the appointment of Reuben G. Manalaysay as president and Romeo D. Brion as business manager, the administration of Philippine Union College was placed in the hands of national leadership. Demands for better-qualified workers led to the addition of courses leading to bachelor's degrees in secretarial science, nursing, and medical technology. The school of nursing at the college utilizes the personnel, physical resources, and experience of Manila Sanitarium and Hospital.

On June 10, 1957, government recognition and General Conference authorization were given to the graduate curriculum leading to a master's degree in education. In January 1964 the master's degree in religion was authorized; thus Philippine Union College was the first Seventh-day Adventist institution outside the United States to offer a graduate degree. There were four in the first class of M.A. graduates in 1959.

A large percentage of the denominational workers in the Philippines are graduates or former students of Philippine Union College. Students from other countries began to attend as early as 1921. Nearly all of these have returned to their homelands.

The Seventh-day Adventist Theological Seminary (Far East) at Philippine Union College was granted membership in the Association of Theological Schools of Southeast Asia at an accreditation meeting held May 21—25, 1973.

In 1972 the board of directors decided to transfer the school to a new location—a 412-acre (165-hectare) site in Puting Kahoy, Silang, Cavite, 31 miles (50 kilometers) south of Manila. This gave more space for intensive farming and other agricultural pursuits for students and teachers.

In May of 1972 the Silang property was purchased. L. L. Cebrian began farming seven acres (three hectares) of the property in August.

The first graduate and seminary students moved to Silang in January of 1978 and utilized the present elementary building as their classroom. In the process of moving, a part of the graduate school still held classes at the main campus in Baesa, Caloocan City.

In June 1979 the first group of 266 first-year students began classes at the Silang campus. The majority of the teachers were commuting from Baesa every Tuesday and Thursday for their teaching assignment, while Monday, Wednesday, and Friday classes were taught by teachers who were housed on campus and those who went home weekends.

The number of students increased when, in June 1981, the juniors and seniors joined the college family, thus basically completing the move of the college to the Silang campus. Presently (1993) there are 2,373 college and graduate students and 508 high school and elementary students enrolled.

Academic Offerings. The move to Silang provided greater opportunity to open additional academic schools and departments. From the original three schools there are now seven schools: School of Arts and Sciences; School of Education; School of Graduate Studies; School of Business; School of Public Health; School of Theology; School of Nursing. The Seventh-day Adventist Theological Seminary, Far East, which was part of the college from 1978 to 1988 became a separate institution operated by the Far Eastern Division and was relocated at the Silang campus.

Looking forward to obtaining university status, the college opted to strengthen its academic program with the creation of the Institutional Research Center.

Naga View Campus. In 1971 by special arrangement with the Southern Luzon Mission, Naga View Academy at the foot of Mount Isarog, with its 216 acres (85 hectares) of agricultural property, came under the supervision of Philippine Union College. In the same year the school was granted recognition by the Bureau of Private Schools of the Republic of the Philippines to operate a junior college.

Philippine Union College also supervises a second junior college on the Northeast Luzon campus.

Philippine Union College Academy

PHILIPPINE UNION COLLEGE ACADEMY. A coeducational day school, secondary level, duly recognized by the Department of Education and Culture of the republic of the Philippines. Founded in 1917 on the 65-acre (26-hectare) campus of Philippine Union College, then moved to Baesa Caloocan City, the academy served as PUC's laboratory school for secondary school teachers. The academy was under the administration of Philippine Union College until 1959.

In June 1981 Philippine Union College moved to a new site at Puting Kahoy, Silang, Cavite, occupying a 430-acre (175-hectare) campus. In June 1982 the academy followed with 103 students. With more improved facilities, the school increased its enrollment to 240 in 1993.

Principals: J. Herrera, 1947—1959; A. A. Poblete, 1959—1963; B. B. Alsaybar, 1963—1966; J. V. Afenir, 1966—1970; B. S. Salvador, 1970—1971; R. B. Castro, 1971—1973; R. A. Fernando, 1973—1977; D. B. Alsaybar, 1977—1978; R. D. Pedernal, 1978—1981; E. B. Guadiz, 1981—1982; R. D. Pedernal, 1982—1988; R. S. Carillo, 1988—1989; R. D. Pedernal, 1989—1993; C. F. Idasos, 1993— .

Philippine Union College Health Foods

PHILIPPINE UNION COLLEGE HEALTH FOODS. A food factory built in 1955 by Stephen Kim. He started by producing soy sauce. Later William L. Perry, the industrial manager of the college, took over. He named the factory Omega Food Products. He began production of peanut butter and loaf bread. The third man who handled its operation was Anselmo Nermal, who for the first time introduced the production of vegetarian meats at the college, although it was Dr. Harry W. Miller who brought the technology to the Philippines during the early part of the 1950s.

Mrs. Elisa de Leon was the fourth department head. It was during this time that cinnamon rolls were introduced to the consumers. Miss Judith Abello became the caretaker of the department, when De Leon was transferred to the Nutrition Department of the college. In 1965 Dr. Conrado M. Jimenez was designated as the department head and food technologist, and it was he who started the development of soy milk under the guidance of Dr. H. W. Miller. The product was later sold in bottles and vegetarian meat was also sold in cans.

In the 1970s the North Philippine Union Mission saw growth and increased earning capacity in the food factory. NPUM took over the operations and designated Benjamin Avellona as the head of the industry, replacing Jimenez. In the same year the food factory operations were halted because of a serious steam accident involving Mr. Avellona. In 1975 PUC again opened the food factory under the direction of Alice Ramos. Then Corazon Tangonan took over from 1976 to 1979, and Benido S. Cayetano (1980—1981).

From 1981 to 1989 Corazon Tangonan-Bañaga headed the department for the second time. It was during this time that the food factory was transferred from Baesa to the new campus in Silang, Cavite, and the name PUC Health Foods was adopted and registered with the government. From 1989 until the present time the food factory has been under the leadership of William P. Galang.

PUC Health Foods was originally established to supply the health food productions needed by its students, faculty, staff, and its immediate communities. With the increased production, it now delivers its goods to the provinces and metropolitan areas within its reach. Its product lines are assorted vegetarian meats, breads, pastries, peanut butter, and soy milk.

Philippines

PHILIPPINES. A republic occupying the Philippine archipelago lying off the southeast coast of the Asian continent between the South China Sea and the Pacific Ocean. There are about 7,100 islands in the group, whose total area is 115,831 square miles (300,000 square kilometers). The two largest islands, Luzon in the north, and Mindanao in the south, account for about two thirds of the area. Other large islands in order of size are Samar, Negros, Palawan, Panay, Mindoro, Leyte, Cebu, Bohol, and Masbate. The population of the country (1994) is 69.8 million. The Filipinos, who belong to the Malay race, constitute the overwhelming majority of the population; however, there are small but important groups of Chinese, Indians, and Europeans. Filipino and English are the official languages of the country; besides these, there are more than 85 local dialects in use among the people of the islands. About four fifths of the people adhere to the Roman Catholic Church; another 10 percent belong to the Philippine Independent Church (Aglipayan); among the remainder are Muslims, Protestants (largely federated in the United Church of Christ in the Philippines), and Buddhists.

The islands, long in commercial contact with the Asian mainland, were discovered by the Europeans in 1521, at which time Magellan claimed them for Spain. They were named after the Spanish king Philip II, and remained a Spanish colony until 1898 when they passed to the United States as a result of the Spanish-American War. An independence movement, suppressed under the Spaniards, succeeded in obtaining first a degree of autonomy, and eventually, in 1946, independence for the Philippines.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. The territory of the Philippines constitutes three union missions in the Far Eastern Division. Statistics (1992) for the Philippines: churches, 2,722; members, 555,442. Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. In 1905 G. A. Irwin, president of the Australasian Union Conference, visited the Philippines on his way to the General Conference, where he recommended that Seventh-day Adventists begin work on the islands by placing colporteurs in Manila. Responding to this recommendation, R. A. Caldwell, from Australia, arrived before the end of that year and successfully sold Spanish language health and religious books.

In 1906 the Australasian Union sent J. L. McElhany and his wife, who arrived in April, and worked for nearly two years, principally among the large numbers of Americans then in Manila. They distributed thousands of copies of Signs of the Times and wrote personal letters to the hundreds of American teachers scattered throughout the islands. McElhany also helped in preparing publications for the nationals of the country.

In December 1908 L. V. Finster took charge of the work in the islands and began working for the Filipinos. At the 1909 General Conference the Philippines were reassigned from Australasia to the newly formed Asiatic Division.

While studying the Tagalog language, the dialect spoken in the Manila area, Finster devoted time also to preparing tracts and books in the local dialects. During his period of language study Finster gave Bible studies in Santa Ana, a section of Manila, to a group of progressive young men who soon became deeply interested in the new religion, as well as in perfecting their English. From this group came the first converts, baptized in March 1911. A church of 18 members was organized in Santa Ana with a complete set of officers. Except for two Finsters and two Caldwells, all were Filipinos. By that time R. A. Caldwell had already delivered in Luzon some 1,500 copies of Ellen White's Patriarchs and Prophets and 1,000 copies of J. Edson White's The Coming King in Spanish, and had worked only part of the island and had not yet touched the southern islands.

Two of the new converts were about to finish high school, and two were from the ministry of other faiths. Finster immediately began training these young men as evangelists by conducting institutes and holding tent meetings in different parts of the city with their help. Before the end of 1911 these men were sent out, and their early successes form one of the stirring chapters in Seventh-day Adventist history in the Philippines.

On Nov. 22, 1911, E. M. Adams, together with a young canvasser, Floyd Ashbaugh, sailed from San Francisco for the Philippines. The arrival of Adams made possible a furlough for the Finsters. Ashbaugh found canvassing in Panay, Guimaras, and other southern islands successful beyond his highest expectations, in spite of disastrous floods and typhoons. People would stop him on the street to buy, or take his prospectus and get signers without his saying a word. Influential men would write notes to their friends, urging them to buy. Despite difficult travel, for more than two years his average sales were well over $100 a week, often with 100 percent delivery. One week his sales amounted to $243. After giving help at colporteur institutes in the Cebu area, he returned to the United States in 1915 to continue his education.

L. V. Finster represented the Philippines at the General Conference of 1913, returning in October of that year, accompanied by a group of 13: the Hay, Fattebert, Lanier, and Stewart families.

R. E. Hay and his family were assigned to work for the Ilocanos in northern Luzon, where they pioneered until 1921. When they began, there were no SDA publications in the language of the people, nor were there any members in the field. When they left in 1921 there were seven organized churches with a total membership of 327; two ordained Filipino ministers, five licensed ministers, four Bible instructors, and 16 colporteurs, besides office staff; 35,000 books in the vernacular had been sold and thousands of magazine subscriptions taken.

Dr. Carlos Fattebert and his wife were assigned to the Cebu field. Robert Stewart joined them as a colporteur and quickly became self-supporting by selling Ellen White's Patriarchs and Prophets, J. Edson White's The Coming King, and a book called Home and Health in several provinces. At the general meeting near the end of 1918, Dr. Fattebert reported 15 baptisms that year, bringing the total membership in that area (later known as the East Visayan Mission) to 50.

In January 1914 Adams and his wife were transferred to Iloilo to open work on the island of Panay and the other islands, a work later organized as the West Visayan Mission. By 1919 Adams reported a membership of 159 in four churches, six Sabbath schools with 213 members, two ordained Filipinos, Fausto Jornada and Wenceslao Rodriguez, and at Jaro, Iloilo, the first church school to be established in the entire Philippines.

Filipino Evangelists Trained. In northern Luzon, Hay held training institutes lasting up to 10 weeks for young workers and prospective colporteurs. Among those he trained who later carried heavy responsibilities were Juan Afenir, Manuel Oliva, Tito Atiga, Emilio Valera, and Rafael Pilar.

Typical of the work of the young Filipino evangelists Finster was training in central Luzon was the story of the San Pablo church. After Isaac Enriquez, a colporteur assigned to Paete and other towns along Laguna de Bay, had won a few converts at San Pablo, some 50 miles (80 kilometers) from Manila, an evangelist, Bibiano Panis, was sent there to hold meetings. For the first time the people heard the SDA message preached in their own native tongue, Tagalog, by a Filipino. As a result, early in 1916 Finster baptized 104 and organized a church with 116 members. By the end of a year the membership had increased to 249, according to the clerk's record.

Among other nationals engaged in evangelism were Emilio Manalaysay and Leon Z. Roda, the latter sent in 1916 to the Ilocano region to assist Hay in the Northern Luzon Mission. In Santa Cruz, a section of Manila, Manalaysay held meetings with the help of his associates, that resulted in the baptism of 66 persons. Among these were four who later became ministers—Pedro Magsalin, Ricardo Magcalen, Flaviano Dalisay, and Valeriano Garcia. In Malolos, the hometown of the Manalaysay family, a church building was dedicated on Jan. 25, 1912, reported as the first in the Philippines. This was built of local materials costing about $150, the members doing most of the work.

Publishing Work. Paralleling the success of public evangelism, and strongly supporting it, was the publishing work. Although commercially printed tracts and books had been distributed from 1909 to 1913, the real beginning was made with a small hand-operated job press brought back from the United States by Finster in the fall of 1913 and set up in a shed in his yard. By running almost around the clock this press turned out nearly 3 million pages of SDA publications in 1914 in the Tagalog language, and later in the Ilocano, Cebuano, and Panayan. The bindery work was done in the basement of the Finster home.

On a five-acre (two-hectare) tract of land purchased in 1915 in Pasay, a suburb of Manila, a press building and a manager's home were erected (see Philippine Publishing House). Under the direction of W. E. Lanier from 1913 to 1917, and later under others, a strong corps of Filipino field secretaries and colporteurs successfully promoted the book and magazine sales. From $3,200 in 1914, the totals increased to $65,506 in 1918.

In 1919 there were about 60 colporteurs in the field, and publications in the Pampango and Bicol dialects had been added.

Organization and Growth. In December 1916 the General Conference president, A. G. Daniells, with other leaders, spent several weeks in the Philippines perfecting a formal organization that lasted with little change for several decades. The Tagalog area around Manila, with 752 members in eight churches, was organized into the first local conference in Asia, the Central Southern Luzon Conference, with L. V. Finster as superintendent. At that time the local tithes supported about 67 percent of the Filipino work.

The Panayan Mission (later known as the West Visayan Mission) was organized under E. M. Adams, with headquarters at Iloilo. Dr. Carlos Fattebert was appointed head of the Cebuano Mission (later known as the East Visayan Mission), with headquarters at Cebu. Headquarters for the Northern Luzon Mission were at Vigan, with R. E. Hay as superintendent. These three local missions and the one local conference constituted the Philippine Union Conference with headquarters in Manila. In the entire union there were 10 foreign families. Of the 70 Filipino workers, seven were evangelists, 15 Bible instructors, four teachers, 30 colporteurs, 12 printers, and two office workers. There were 11 organized churches with a membership of 846.

At the time of organization the first three Filipino ministers were ordained—Leon Z. Roda, Bibiano Panis, and Emilio Manalaysay. Although Panis later apostatized, the other two men served until their deaths in the early and middle 1920s.

By 1922 the Philippine Union was again classified as a union mission, but the Central Southern Luzon organization retained its conference status until about 1931, when it reverted to mission status and was divided into the Central Luzon Mission and the South-Central Luzon Mission.

In the largest single group of SDA missionaries ever sent out up to that time (42 adults and six children), who sailed from San Francisco in August 1916 were I. A. Steinel and O. F. Sevrens, with their wives, who on June 12, 1917, opened the training school, the Philippine SDA Academy, with an enrollment of 87 in grades 1—12 (see Philippine Union College). Mission workers were so urgently needed that at the close of the first year nine of the older students were employed. In addition, about 20 joined the colporteur force. By the end of five years 67 students had been baptized and 88 had entered SDA work.

Under the leadership of S. E. Jackson, superintendent of the Philippine Union Mission from 1918 until his health failed in 1929, the work continued to grow in all lines. In 1923 the number of baptisms reached 1,029, and in succeeding years never fell below that number. In December 1928 the total church membership reached 11,008. During the preceding two-year period there were 3,573 baptisms. The ratio of SDAs to total population of the country was then about the same as in the United States, and since that time it has become considerably higher.

In the spring of 1920 Manuel Kintanar entered the large southern island of Mindanao and in two months sold 250 copies of Uriah Smith's Thoughts on Daniel and the Revelation and also some books of the World Crisis Series. At the same time other colporteurs were doing well in the Sulu Archipelago south of Mindanao, having sold books to a sultan and other Muslim chiefs in Jolo.

In January 1924 the Bicol area of southern Luzon was separated from the Central Southern Luzon Conference to become the Southern Luzon Mission. It began with a membership of 80 in three churches, under the leadership of W. B. Riffel, but by September 1929 it had 11 churches, with 356 members.

During the middle twenties, the work suffered from a shortage of Bibles in the Filipino languages. These Bibles had formerly been obtained from a Christian publishing house in Japan, but the great earthquake and fire of September 1923 destroyed even the plates from which these were printed, and not until 1928 were new plates for seven of the major languages completed.

Medical Work. Demand for Seventh-day Adventist medical work in the Philippines began in the middle twenties when influential surgical patients of Dr. H. W. Miller urged the erection of a hospital in Manila. In the fall of 1928 Dr. H. A. Hall arrived and opened a dispensary on the ground floor of his residence, with a small hospital in a house nearby where the Finsters had formerly lived.

When F. A. Mote arrived in the field early in 1929, his first assignment was to supervise the erection of a building for a sanitarium (see Manila Sanitarium and Hospital), which quickly gained the favor of influential government officials, world travelers, diplomats, and the professional class.

One member of the first class of 10 who received their nursing diplomas in 1935 was Consolacion Vergara, who pioneered the field nursing service. After 20 months of touring the four missions of Luzon, she reported having visited 151 places and given 453 lectures, 150 demonstrations, and about 1,000 treatments. Her fellow graduate, Francisco Cabansag, followed a similar program in the Visayan Islands. This work of visiting churches, schools, colporteur institutes, conventions, and homes to conduct health classes, give demonstrations, examine children, and treat the sick was so well received that by 1938 there were 10 nurses devoting their time to fieldwork, all supported from Ingathering funds.

Educational Work. Although some junior academies had been operated earlier, the 1930s saw the gradual development of three schools to senior high school level—East Visayan, West Visayan, and Northern Luzon academies, which graduated their first classes in 1939, 1937, and 1938, respectively. In 1931 the academy moved from its crowded quarters in Pasay to a more spacious country location on the outskirts of Manila, and with denominational and government recognition as a senior college, it assumed a new name, Philippine Union College, during 1933.

An important contribution to the educational program during the 1930s was the Manila branch of the Home Study Institute. Hundreds of students enrolled in courses in Bible, church organizations, Christian salesmanship, commerce, and English. By the end of 1938 there were 17 who had completed the three-year course in evangelism; O. A. Blake and L.

L. Pan were the first to complete the five-year course in commerce. Classes in Chinese and Tagalog were also offered.

Gains and Losses in the Twenties and Thirties. R. R. Figuhr, later president of the General Conference, came to the Philippines in 1923, and at first held various administrative and editorial positions. From 1931 until immediately before World War II broke out, he was superintendent of the union mission.

Few countries in the world where SDA mission work has been carried on have shown records of greater or more rapid membership growth than the Philippines.

By the close of 1939, in less than 30 years since the work began, the membership had grown to more than 20,000. However, before the end of the 1920s, a leveling off in the rate of growth had set in. At first, although there was some opposition to SDA missions, the masses of people, newly freed from centuries of oppression, and stimulated by democratic ideas and the liberalizing effect of public education, were ready to break with tradition and accept the new faith. However, in the later twenties and thirties, opposition became stronger, better organized, and more determined. Converts were beaten, attacked with bolos, driven from the land they had occupied as tenant farmers, rejected by their families, or robbed of their carabaos and sewing machines. Evangelists met violent abuse and had their meeting places stoned or set on fire, or their tents slashed.

From a peak of 1,972 baptisms in 1926, the yearly figures declined steadily until in 1936, baptisms reported were 1,312. In part, this reflected the reduction in the working force because of the economic depression. Sharply decreased appropriations forced the missions to lay off many Filipino workers, and some missionaries on furlough were not able to return. For the 19-year period ending in 1938, losses in membership by death, apostasy, or other reasons amounted to 28.3 percent of baptisms.

During this same period two Filipino workers, first Flaviano Dalisay and later Roman Senson, were active in religious liberty promotion, protesting compulsory religious education in public schools, Sunday legislation, calendar change, and compulsory military training.

The first Filipino delegate to a division council was Bibiano Panis, who, in 1915, attended a meeting in Shanghai. Juan Afenir was the first Filipino delegate to a General Conference (1926) and also the first Filipino mission director, taking charge of the Northern Luzon Mission in 1927. In 1938 Northern Luzon Academy had its first Filipino principal, Roman Senson, who also was the first Filipino to attain the MV rank of Master Comrade (now Master Guide), and the first to finish the five-year Home Study Institute course for evangelists.

Through the years large numbers of converts were won by laymen. It was not unusual for a church to conduct evangelistic meetings without the help of any mission workers. Between 85 and 90 percent of the converts were first introduced to the faith by laymen. This enthusiastic participation by the church members themselves helped the church to survive the disruption of organized work during World War II.

World War II. Because of hostilities on the Asia mainland, many missionaries from China were in the Philippines at the time of the Japanese attack in December 1941, and were interned together with the missionaries assigned to the Philippines. After the fall of Bataan the missionaries who originally were working in Manila were released. There were no casualties among the overseas staff; however, before the war was over, two missionaries had died.

In July 1944 the missionaries in the Manila area were interned at Los Baños, where they remained until their dramatic rescue by American and guerrilla forces on Feb. 23, 1944, just before an order for their execution was to have been carried out. Of the group in Baguio, B. B. Davis, a teacher at Philippine Union College, succumbed in February, and on Mar. 31, Mrs. Mary Blake, mother of Mrs. F. A. Mote and O. A. Blake, died in Manila. Honesto Pascual, treasurer at Philippine Union College, also was a victim of the hostilities.

Suffering severely from malnutrition, most of those released from internment were repatriated as soon as transportation was available. A small group felt it their duty and obligation to stay until replacements could be sent. L. C. Wilcox, union mission superintendent, O. A. Blake, secretary-treasurer, E. M. Adams, formerly director of Northern Luzon Mission, J. A. Leland, manager of the Philippine Publishing House, with their wives, and also two nurses, Bessie Irvine and Edna Stoneburner, remained until substitutes could be found to relieve them.

Although the country was cut off from communication with the outside world, later records show that during the four years 1942—1945, under national leadership, there were 5,250 baptisms, plus 3,189 in 1946, a record for any field in the Orient.

Many mission properties were destroyed. The newly completed two-story administration building at Northern Luzon Academy was one of the first to suffer. The publishing house, with all of its equipment, valued at $60,000 at prewar rates, was totally destroyed by the retreating forces in 1945. Philippine Union College lost all of its library books and equipment. Its main buildings were saved only by the efforts of Kensaku Yasui, a former student from Japan, who pleaded with his officers not to burn them. The union mission office and equipment, local mission offices, academy buildings, and eight homes were lost. The Manila Sanitarium buildings, completed in 1940 at a cost of about $100,000, were used by the occupying forces until 1945, who upon leaving, exploded a demolition bomb in the elevator shaft, intending to destroy the building. Although badly damaged, it was used temporarily by the American forces when they entered Manila. However, all equipment was looted after the Japanese left.

Postwar Development. Among the first to undertake the work of rehabilitation were the SDA servicemen, who donated army rations and medical supplies, rebuilt chapels, helped to support Filipino preachers and teachers, and by their active participation in all church activities brought new vigor to the war-weary members.

With the arrival in December 1945 of V. T. Armstrong, president of the Far Eastern Division, and others, it was possible in January 1946 to hold the first union committee session since 1941, at which representatives from all missions, departments, and institutions, as well as from the division, could be present. In February 1946 G. A. Campbell arrived to reactivate the book work, and A. M. Ragsdale to take charge of Philippine Union College. A little later M. E. Loewen and Werber Johnson came as president and secretary-treasurer of the union mission.

The next few years were a time of rapid expansion as well as rehabilitation. Rebuilt by the close of 1949 were the union office, four local mission offices, 13 buildings at four academies, the publishing house, 20 workers' homes, and 70 of the 148 churches that had been destroyed. Rehabilitation of the sanitarium as a 90-bed institution was completed by early 1949. It admitted its first patient in September 1948, and resumed the training of nurses who had begun their courses before the war.

Growth in the East Visayan Mission made necessary a number of organizational changes. Even before the war popular migration to the open spaces of Mindanao had begun, and in December 1937 the large southern island was separated from the East Visayan Mission to become the Mindanao Mission. After the war, settlers poured into Mindanao by the scores of thousands. In January 1950 the island was divided between the Northern and Southern Mindanao missions, and in January 1958 Western Mindanao was set off as a separate mission. In January 1965 Davao was established as a separate mission, and in January 1966 Northeastern Mindanao became a separate mission.

With more than 35,000 members, the Philippine Union was divided in 1951 into the North and South Philippine unions. The two unions had about the same populations, but the North had established institutions, such as the sanitarium, the publishing house, and Philippine Union College, and had greater financial stability, whereas the South had a considerably larger territory and more members (20,641 against 15,251 in the North).

In the north the Mountain Provinces Mission was added in January 1956. By 1960 it had more than 1,000 members in nine churches and seven companies. In January 1948 the Northeast Luzon Mission had been separated, but in 1957 it was recombined with Northern Luzon. At the beginning of 1962 the island of Negros became the sixth local mission in the South Philippine Union. At the division council held in Tokyo late in 1962, plans were laid to divide further the South Philippine Union, which then had a membership of more than 50,000 (one to every 287 of population), into two unions, one comprising the island of Mindanao, the other the central islands known as the Visayas. This was done in 1964 when the Central Philippine Union came into existence.

Departmental Work. Although a Sabbath school was organized before the first church, and a Young People's Society very soon after, formal departmental work did not begin until several years later. According to one of the early union Sabbath school secretaries, Mrs. Bertha Chaney, Sabbath school membership grew from 34 in 1910 to 2,346 in 1920; then to 13,283 in 1930. In the late 1920s the Sabbath School Investment plan was successfully introduced. Beginning in 1948, the plan of having all the Sabbath schools in a given area band together into a Sabbath school association became popular. In the mid-1930s a plan of conducting branch Sabbath schools was introduced, and in 1936, 15 Vacation Bible Schools were held. However, it was not until some 20 years later that the idea became popular. In 1959, in the North Philippine Union, 40 Vacation Bible Schools were held, with an enrollment of about 1,000 children. Two child-evangelism workshops also were held. In the South Philippine Union an average of more than one branch Sabbath school was organized every week, and 238 Vacation Bible Schools were held in 1960 and 1961. The 938 Sabbath schools in the South Philippine Union were grouped into 96 associations at the end of 1961.

The Missionary Volunteer Department was first organized in 1918, with Irving Steinel as union MV secretary supervising 132 members in four societies. When the two unions were divided in 1951, there were 13,300 members in 389 societies. After the first Master Comrade training camp was held at Los Baños in mid-1949, with L. A. Skinner and C. P. Sorensen in charge, a program of youth camps was begun in all the missions. Pathfinder Clubs were introduced in 1952. A series of local and union youth congresses in the 1940s and 1950s culminated in April 1961 in a division-wide youth congress in Manila, attended by delegates from all the countries in the Far East. Stimulated by this great gathering, the following year the youth of the North Philippine Union Mission conducted 21 Voice of Youth evangelistic series, resulting in 93 baptisms. In the South Philippine Union Mission, as the fruit of 37 Voice of Youth evangelistic crusades, 740 were baptized.

Promoted by the Education Department, from the very earliest years, church schools, mission schools for non-Christian tribes, academies, and the college were established. Financial problems, however, often made it impossible for more than a small fraction of the children of church members to obtain a Christian education. In 1961, with a membership of more than 27,000, the North Philippine Union operated 62 church schools, with 2,542 pupils enrolled under 104 teachers. In the South, with a much larger membership, there were more than 3,000 pupils in 74 schools.

The major educational project in the South Philippine Union during the 1950s was the establishment of Mountain View College on more than 2,500 acres (1,000 hectares) of government land in the cool, high central plateau of Bukidnon. Begun as an extension of Philippine Union College on the campus of Mindanao Mission Academy at Manticao in 1949, it became the college for the South Philippines shortly after the division of the field into two unions.

For years welfare work was carried on by Dorcas Societies, who distributed bales of clothing and other relief supplies to the victims of fire, flood, typhoon, or volcanic eruption. Then in the early 1960s the Adventist Welfare Service was approved to distribute surplus milk, flour, corn meal, rice, cooking oil, and clothing. Most of the 19,310 persons given help in 1960—1961 (valued at $135,708.77) were non-SDAs.

Medical Work Expanded. After the war several small medical units in both the North and the South Philippine unions were opened. As the result of an Ingathering contact in late 1947, the Lakeside Clinic was opened on Mar. 25, 1948, in Dansalan, known as the “Moro Capital.” A staff of 12 workers directed by Dr. R. T. Santos in 18 months performed 287 surgical operations and treated 7,400 outpatients, the large majority of whom were Muslims. The earnings from this clinic, which operated until 1954, helped finance the construction of the Mindanao Sanitarium and Hospital at Iligan City. The latter, opened in 1953, was directed by Dr. F. T. Geslani. It soon became so overcrowded that a new wing had to be added, increasing its capacity from 25 to 40 beds.

The non-Christian tribes in the mountains north of Baguio are served by the Masla Clinic, which was dedicated on Christmas Day 1951. Operated by a nurse, Mark Balaoas, the medical work there resulted in the baptism of 18 persons in January 1953.

The Miller Sanitarium in Cebu City was erected in 1955 and enlarged in 1960. In 1962 ground was broken for a new sanitarium in the booming sugar center of Bacolod City. In the northern part of Luzon, the Cagayan Valley Sanitarium and Hospital, under the direction of Dr. Celedonio Fernando, opened in March 1959. Much of the equipment was donated by doctors and former missionaries. Its nine-bed capacity was sometimes stretched to 30 by putting patients in the halls and crowding extra beds in the rooms.

Specialized Evangelism. Although in the south the ratio of workers to church members dropped from 1 to 66 in 1951 to 1 to 108 in 1960, radio work helped multiply the effectiveness of the ministry. Broadcasting was begun in English in 1936, then continued by F. T. Dalisay in Tagalog. After the war, when more programs were put on the air over more powerful stations, the Bible correspondence school was opened. Lessons for the many thousands of students who enrolled were translated into the major languages. In 1960—1961 the Manila Voice of Prophecy Bible school graduated 3,629. Recording equipment was installed in Cebu in the early 1960s to make possible the preparation of programs in various local dialects as well as in the more widely used languages.

By 1960 evangelistic centers had been established in both Manila and Cebu. Between 1960 and 1962 there were 249 baptisms at the Capitol Center in Cebu, and 350 as a result of three major series of meetings at the Manila Center. The Adams Center in the South Philippine Union Mission was established in Davao City in 1967.

A dramatic result of prison evangelism carried on by the students and teachers of Philippine Union College was the baptism of 19 Japanese prisoners of war, none of whom had previously been members of any Christian church. Baptism was administered by A. N. Nelson in October 1949. Through the years many other conversions resulted from the meetings held in New Bilibid Prison, Camp Murphy Military Stockade, and the Manila City Jail. Work among the hundreds of prisoners of war was initiated under the supervision of an SDA Army chaplain assigned to prisoner of war ministry in the city of Manila at the time.

Filipino Missionaries. The first worker sent overseas from the Philippines was Monica Bayocot (later Mrs. Gil de Guzman), who sailed for Singapore in May 1923 as a missionary teacher. The first foreign missionary couple to be supported by the offerings of the young people of the Philippines were Jose O. Bautista and his wife, who were sent to Palau in 1934. In the 1950s scores of trained medical and educational workers found their way to other countries, both within and beyond the Far Eastern Division. During 1962, 17 Filipino missionaries were sent out to such places as Pakistan, Libya, Taiwan, Hong Kong, Guam, Thailand, Vietnam, and Irian Barat (West New Guinea). Thus, within half a century, the Philippines developed from an unentered country to a major home base for SDA missionary work.

Phoenix Academy

PHOENIX ACADEMY. See Thunderbird Academy.

Phoenix Adventist Secondary School

PHOENIX ADVENTIST SECONDARY SCHOOL. A coeducational day school on the senior secondary level, operated by the Indian Ocean Union Mission at Phoenix on the island of Mauritius. It was established in 1948 as a junior secondary school with Henri Evard as principal. The initial enrollment was 80.

The school is situated in a region about 1,000 feet (300 meters) above sea level, close to the main road linking the densely populated towns of the central plateau. Located on the school campus are an administration building with classrooms, including chemistry and physics/biology laboratories; special rooms for teaching art, communication graphics, and computer studies; an audiovisual room; and a large library. Plans are being made to build additional classrooms to accommodate the new Higher School Certificate classes.

In 1992 there was an enrollment of 680 students, the majority of whom belong to the non-Christian section of the population. There is a teaching staff of 26, of whom 21 are Seventh-day Adventists. The nonteaching staff of 13 are all SDAs.

The purchase of an adjoining four-acre (1.6-hectare) property on the other side of the stream bounding the former school campus on the eastern side has furnished new possibilities for development. Two old buildings on this property have been completely renovated to house a small theological school for the training of French-speaking workers in the union and to provide facilities for a few boarding students.

The school is grant-aided by the Mauritian government. The official Cambridge School Certificate and Cambridge Higher School Certificate syllabi are followed, but Bible courses are taught daily.

Phoenix Islands

PHOENIX ISLANDS. A group of eight scattered islands in the south-central Pacific area: Kanton (Canton), Enderbury, McKean, Birnie, Phoenix, Kikumaroro (Gardner), Orona (Hull), and Manra (Sydney). They are situated immediately east of the date line, south of the equator, and lie due north of Samoa. The total land surface is about 11 square miles (28 square kilometers). They were uninhabited for many years except for occasional parties who worked the guano deposits. However, in 1938 the Gilbert and Ellice Islands government, under whose control most of the islands came, settled a number of Gilbertese from their overcrowded homeland on the islands of Hull, Sydney, and Gardner.

In 1963 the government of the Gilbert and Ellice Islands removed those who had been settled during the Phoenix Island settlement scheme to Gizo in the British Solomon Islands. Today these islands are inhabited. All of the islands became part of independent Kiribati in 1979.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. There now is a Seventh-day Adventist minister for the Phoenix Islands, based on Christmas Island. There are 113 church members. The Phoenix Islands are assigned to the Western Pacific Union Mission, which in turn is a part of the South Pacific Division. See also Kiribati.

Phuket Adventist Hospital

PHUKET ADVENTIST HOSPITAL. A 70-bed hospital and clinic operated by the Southeast Asia Union Mission at Phuket, Thailand, a port city in the Indian Ocean off the western coast of the Malay Peninsula. The hospital was opened in 1940 by A. E. Geschke, M.D., a Loma Linda graduate, in response to repeated urgings from the local people that Seventh-day Adventists establish medical facilities there. A building owned by Tan Cheng Hor, a Chinese businessman, was granted rent free for clinic use. Within a month of its opening the clinic was treating 60 outpatients daily, and its 15 beds upstairs were constantly occupied by inpatients.

When World War II came to Southeast Asia early in December of 1941, the clinic was closed and the entire personnel was evacuated. Responding to an urgent call from the people of Phuket, F. N. Crider, M.D., reopened the clinic at its prewar site in July 1949. The outpatient department flourished, but the inpatient capacity was restricted by law to 10 beds. Religious services were conducted in the waiting room and soon a small company of adherents was formed. Later a branch Sabbath school was opened in a nearby village and there a church building seating 100 persons was built.

In 1959 a three-acre (1.2-hectare) tract of land was purchased for a new hospital, worker housing, and a church. Two houses were completed in 1961. The church was constructed and dedicated Oct. 9, 1970. This church has a seating capacity of 250, plus space for junior, primary, and kindergarten Sabbath school departments.

By the early 1960s it was felt that the old clinic hospital in its poor location in the center of town was inadequate. A search began for a plot of land just outside the city limits. An ideal location was found, but the owner refused to sell.

Luang Anubhas Bhuketkarn (Tan Chin Guan), a prominent tin miner in Phuket, had become desperately ill and had been admitted by Dr. Paul Watson to the little hospital. Because of lack of available blood he was flown to Bangkok, where Dr. Roger Nelson performed lifesaving surgery. To show his appreciation, he donated a 10-acre (four-hectare) tract of land to the clinic. In 1963 plans were developed to construct a hospital and auxiliary buildings on this larger site. In February 1965 the new hospital building was formally opened and dedicated. In 1970 a new wing was constructed to enlarge the hospital to the capacity of 47 beds, two operating rooms, a delivery room, and labor room. In November 1971 a cafeteria for the use of hospital employees and patients was built next to the hospital. Between 1971 and 1974 three new houses were built to provide staff housing.

In 1986 another two-story wing was added to the hospital. The ground floor was for the physiotherapy and the second floor was for worship services and health education lectures.

At present a new three-story building has been constructed, which provides for a modern and spacious inpatient wing, and a bed capacity of 70. The building also houses the emergency room, intensive-care unit, and radiology and dental services.

Physical Therapy

PHYSICAL THERAPY. The use of the physical agents in the treatment of disease or injury. The most frequently used of these agents are (1) hydrotherapy: water applied at various temperatures and pressures; (2) exercise; (3) rest; (4) massage; (5) light therapy: sunlight and artificial radiation including visible, infrared, and ultraviolet radiations; (6) electrotherapy: low voltage direct and alternating currents and the high frequency currents including shortwave and microwave diathermy; (7) ultrasonic therapy: high-frequency sound waves. Physical therapy is best administered by professionally trained and registered physical therapists. It may also be applied by graduate nurses who have had training in this field.

Physical Medicine. When physical therapy is administered on the prescription and under the supervision of a physician trained in physical medicine and rehabilitation (psychiatrist), it is more properly called physical medicine. Rehabilitation is a comprehensive multidisciplinary program aimed at restoring persons to the maximum of their recovery potential. Physical therapy is an essential feature of the rehabilitation program.

Early in the history of the movement, Seventh-day Adventists became a health-conscious people (see Health Principles).

In the middle of the nineteenth century, as the Seventh-day Adventist Church emerged and began developing, the science of pharmacology was in its infancy.

Potent drugs such as mercury, strychnine, and the opiates were prescribed empirically in large dosages. (Today, mercury and strychnine are obsolete as therapeutic agents for internal administration, and the opiates are used sparingly.) Against this background developed a growing interest in the physiologic approach to treatment by “natural” or “physical” agents.

During the first half of the nineteenth century, the Austrian peasant Priessnitz popularized hydrotherapy in Europe. Physical therapy, although not designated by that term in the mid-nineteenth century, was not entirely new. Various physical therapy procedures had been employed intermittently since the time of Hippocrates (460—357 B.C.). In 1648 a Seventh Day Baptist physician, Dr. Peter Chamberlen (1601—1683), proposed a system of hydrotherapeutics in public baths in England, but was turned down by the College of Physicians. A few years after Priessnitz’ work, Professor Winternitz, of Vienna, placed hydrotherapy on a scientific footing. Contemporaneously in the United States there were physicians interested in the reform of existing medical practice. One of these was Dr. J. C. Jackson, who operated the Health Institute at Dansville, New York. Another was Dr. R. T. Trall, who conducted the Hygio-Therapeutic College, at Florence Heights, New Jersey. Both of these men influenced in some degree the early development of the treatment program of Seventh-day Adventist medical institutions.

Under the inspiration of Ellen White, the Western Health Reform Institute, later known as the Battle Creek Sanitarium, was founded in the fall of 1866. In the institute drugs were not prescribed, but patients were treated with rest, exercise, hydrotherapy, and a vegetarian diet. In 1876 Dr. J. H. Kellogg became medical superintendent of the institute. During his long tenure he did a considerable amount of experimental study of the physical therapy procedures. The Battle Creek Sanitarium became famous the world over for its physical therapy program and its vegetarian diet.

Before the Battle Creek Sanitarium was removed from church control, about 1908, other sanitariums were being established by the denomination, under the guidance of Ellen White and Dr. Kellogg in other parts of the United States and in foreign lands, and in each of them physical therapy became a prominent feature of the treatment program. One of the largest of these institutions was the Skodsborg Sanitarium near Copenhagen, Denmark. At present many Seventh-day Adventist hospitals continue to operate an active physical therapy department. Along with other advances in medicine, newer methods of treatment are used, often in the broader context of physical medicine and rehabilitation.

Loma Linda University School of Allied Health offers undergraduate and graduate training in physical therapy.

In 1941 a School of Physical Therapy was established at Loma Linda in connection with the School of Medicine for the training of qualified physical therapists. A fully approved school with a degree course, it has one of the largest enrollments among approved physical therapy schools in the United States. Andrews University now also operates an accredited School of Physical Therapy.

In 1947 the American Medical Association established a qualifying Board of Physical Medicine and Rehabilitation for physicians who specialize in this field, which includes physical therapy. Some of the larger SDA hospitals have board-qualified specialists in physical medicine and rehabilitation, known as physiatrists, who have charge of this phase of the treatment program. Most Seventh-day Adventist hospitals have physical therapy services in their institutions.

Pickett, Fred Lloyd

PICKETT, FRED LLOYD (1897—1938). Pioneer Seventh-day Adventist worker in Cambodia. He became interested in the study of the Bible while a student at Ohio University, Athens, Ohio, and in 1923 joined the Seventh-day Adventist Church. During World War I he served in the United States Navy. In 1924 he began studying for the ministry at Emmanuel Missionary College and was graduated in 1927. In the same year he married Ada Irene Reeder, a graduate of the Bible workers' course. After that he worked as an evangelist in Illinois for about two and a half years. After ordination to the ministry he went to French Indochina (now Vietnam) and opened Seventh-day Adventist work in Cambodia in 1930. Later he was director of the Siam Mission (1934—1936) and of the French Indochina Mission (1937—1938). He died in Saigon after a brief illness.

Pierce, Stephen

PIERCE, STEPHEN (c. 1804—1883). One of the pioneer Seventh-day Adventist ministers; conference administrator; writer and editor. He was born and reared in Vermont, and was apparently an earnest Millerite. He was one of the group who with James and Ellen White, Joseph Bates, and Hiram Edson, “after the passing of the time in 1844, searched for the truth as for hidden treasure” (1SM 206; see Sabbath Conferences). For a number of years in the late 1850s, he was a corresponding editor of the Review and Herald. From 1863 to 1865 he was president of the Vermont Conference. In late summer of 1865 he moved to Minnesota and was recommended by the General Conference Committee to the churches there as a faithful and efficient minister. From 1865 to 1870 he was president of the Minnesota Conference. His later years were spent in Iowa and in South Dakota. He died at the age of 79 from typhomalarial fever.

Pierson, Robert Howard

PIERSON, ROBERT HOWARD (1911—1989). Pastor, evangelist, missionary, author, administrator, president of the General Conference. He was born in Brooklyn, Iowa, into the family of Will and Mabel Pierson. His mother was a devout Seventh-day Adventist. His father never interfered in the spiritual training of the children, but because of distance, attendance at church was sporadic.

When he was in his teens, the family moved to Florida, where Robert attended high school and met Dollis Mae Smith, whom he later married. During the terminal illness of his mother Robert yielded his heart entirely to the Lord and determined to prepare for service. Dollis had been converted through Robert's sister. After their wedding in 1931, they headed for Southern College in Tennessee in their Model T Ford.

In 1933 he accepted his first assignment for the church—as a pastor-teacher in Georgia. Before the year ended he had a new job as Home Missionary and Sabbath School secretary for the Georgia-Cumberland Conference. After a year there he was called to Poona, India, where he was ordained.

In 1939 the Piersons accepted a call to southern India, where he became superintendent of the Tamil Mission.

Because of World War II, the Piersons returned to the United States in 1942. Robert was a pastor briefly and then was called to pioneer a new venture, as speaker on The Bible Auditorium of the Air, a denominational broadcast from a 50,000-watt commercial station in New York City.

During the war years Pierson was called to various positions in administration in the Inter-American Division, including the presidency of two unions. In 1950, after only 18 months as president of the Caribbean Union, he was elected president of the Southern Asia Division, and the family was once more on their way to India. Upon arrival Robert immediately began to lay plans for getting young national men into positions of leadership. Later, when it became difficult for foreigners to enter India, capable trained workers were able to fill all positions.

Robert is remembered by his associates in Southern Asia as the most indefatigable and best organized worker they have ever known.

The Piersons returned to the United States in 1954 to educate their sons. Robert became president of the Kentucky-Tennessee Conference where, through Madison College, he was introduced to the ministry of self-supporting SDA institutions. He maintained a keen interest in such work for the rest of his life.

In 1957 Pierson was invited by the Texas Conference constituency to become their president. Fifteen months later, at the General Conference session in Cleveland, Ohio, he was elected president of the Southern African Division. The Piersons endured the stress of the political upheaval that prevailed in Africa in the 1960s, during which time the division became the Trans-Africa Division. He served there for nearly eight years, until his election to the General Conference presidency on June 17, 1966, where he served until his retirement to North Carolina in 1979.

In 1989 he accepted a short-term call to serve as pastor of the Kailua church in Hawaii. Shortly after his arrival he died suddenly, leaving the entire SDA world in mourning.

Robert Pierson was the first General Conference president to officially visit the USSR. During his nearly 50 years of service he received many well-deserved awards and commendations, including an honorary Doctorate of Divinity from Andrews University.

During his active life he authored more than 25 books and many poems.

Pieter Wessels Home for the Infirm Aged

PIETER WESSELS HOME FOR THE INFIRM AGED. A facility for the aged situated near Nigel, 45 miles (70 kilometers) east of Johannesburg. This institution, before becoming part of the dynamic Seventh-day Adventist Community Services program in 1981, was operated privately and catered for 79 residents. In 1991 an extension named Protea House was added adjacent to the existing home with seven bedrooms, a large self-contained kitchen, a lounge, and modern bathing facilities. In 1993, 96 residents were receiving Christian love and care by competent and dedicated staff.

Pil’Kevitch, Ippolit

PIL’KEVITCH, IPPOLIT (c. 1850—c. 1935). One of the pioneer Russian Seventh-day Adventist workers in the Ukraine. He became an SDA through the preaching of Michael Kusmin and was baptized at Stavropol (now Voroshilovsk) in the Caucasus in 1894. Soon afterward he began preaching in central Russia. By 1907 he was working in the city of Kiev, in the Ukraine, assisted by a colporteur by the name Gontar’. Repeatedly he was arrested and jailed for his missionary activities. He was in jail when A. G. Daniells visited him on a trip to Russia some time before World War I. From 1914 to the mid-1920s he preached in the Black Sea Conference, after which he retired in Theodosia in the Crimea. He died a natural death in retirement, but his wife, a loyal SDA Bible instructor, was arrested and disappeared.

Pine Forest Academy and Sanitarium and Hospital

PINE FOREST ACADEMY AND SANITARIUM AND HOSPITAL. A former self-supporting institution operated on the Madison plan (see Madison Institutions), embracing a 12-grade boarding school and a 30-bed sanitarium and hospital on a 385-acre (145-hectare) farm 16 miles (26 kilometers) west of Meridian, Mississippi. It originated in 1934 when a piece of property at Gilbertown, Alabama, which had been used for a school was offered to the Alabama-Mississippi Conference on condition that it be used for educational purposes. The conference arranged for the operation of a school on a self-supporting basis and named it Alabama-Mississippi Conference Academy. In 1935 the institution was moved to its last location, and in 1938 renamed Pine Forest Academy and Sanitarium.

Facilities included a food-processing laboratory and bakery combination with sewing room, and a kiln for curing lumber, which was sawed on the school sawmill. Other industries included a dairy, gardens, and farm. Emphasis was placed on both scholastic and practical work achievement. The school closed in 1991.

Pine Forge Academy

PINE FORGE ACADEMY. A secondary coeducational boarding school on the senior high school level; operated by the Allegheny East and Allegheny West conferences and situated five miles (eight kilometers) northwest of Pottstown, Pennsylvania, off State Route 422 in the extreme eastern Berks County-Delaware Valley area, 40 miles (65 kilometers) west of Philadelphia.

Pine Forge Institute (organized in 1945 and opened in 1946) was the direct outgrowth of the need for a secondary boarding school for Black constituents of the North American Division. Accordingly, the Allegheny Conference purchased a 575-acre (230-hectare) tract of land with the Manatawny River running through it. A large manor house, a mill, and several other cottages and buildings served as the humble beginnings of the only Black coeducational boarding academy in North America. Most of these buildings were converted for use as dormitories, administration office, and classrooms and residences for the faculty and staff. This tract was the old Thomas Rutter Estate, notable in Colonial history as an original gift of William Penn dating back to 1726. It was the site of the first iron forge in Pennsylvania and was an Underground Railroad station for runaway slaves. It took vision to see the possibilities that this place offered to a young conference without immediate funds. However, Dr. Grace Kimbrough, a practicing physician in Philadelphia and member of the Ebenezer church, advanced the earnest money to bind the sale, and later Dr. Kimbrough left most of her estate to the Allegheny Conference to aid in the education of young people. The girls' dormitory at the school is named Kimbrough Hall in her honor and memory.

J. H. Wagner, Sr., conference president at the time of the school's founding, led in the development and administration of the school. Finance and the curricula were placed under the supervision of a school board whose members consisted of the conference president, the principal-manager (now principal), the conference secretary-treasurer, the conference educational superintendent, and additional members of the conference committee. These officers were elected at the biennial session of the conference.

The operation of the institute has been uninterrupted since it first opened in 1946. Five modern buildings—an administration building (1954), a girls' dormitory (1961), a boys' dormitory (1973—1974), a church (1985), and a gymnasium (1986)—were added to the original property. The student body, drawn from Black constituents from all parts of the United States and from several foreign countries as far away as eastern Africa, has totaled as many as 270 in a year.

The name was changed from Pine Forge Institute to Pine Forge Academy in 1965. It offers curricula on two levels: college preparatory and a general course of study. A work-study program operates in cooperation with assorted local businesses. The school is well known for its choir, which tours annually throughout the United States and occasionally in the Caribbean.

Principals: J. L. Moran, 1945—1949; R. L. Reynolds, 1949—1951; E. I. Watson, 1951—1961; C. L. Brooks, 1961—1963; L. R. Palmer, Jr., 1963—1966; C. B. Tivy,

Pine Tree Academy

PINE TREE ACADEMY. A 12-grade coeducational school that primarily is a day school but has two duplex homes, each housing 10 students. Other boarding students live in homes in the community. Grades 9—12 offer college preparatory and general courses. The school is owned and operated by the constituency of five churches in the Northern New England Conference; namely, Auburn, Bath, Brunswick, Freeport, and Portland. The school is located on a 100-acre (40-hectare) farm, on the Pownal Road, Freeport, Maine. The enrollment for 1992—1993 was 60 in grades 9—12 and 68 in grades 1—8, with a full and part-time staff of 12.

The school was planned on Mar. 4, 1961, when the first board meeting was held, and it began operation in September 1961 with 92 pupils in grades 1—10 inclusive, and a staff of seven, including the principal.

In 1969 a wing was constructed to provide more classrooms, and in 1973 a large addition was made to provide such facilities as a gymnasium, offices, and classrooms.

The name Pine Tree, an aphorism of the Pine Tree State, is also an adoption from the old Pine Tree Academy that operated on a farm four miles (six kilometers) out of Auburn, Maine, from September 1921 to June 1933, when it closed because of the 1930s depression. The school graduated 100 pupils from grade 12 during its operation, and these loyal alumni and others of the old PTA have donated more than $4,000 to the present Pine Tree Academy.

Principals: Ronald Rogers, 1961—1966; John Craig, 1966—1967; Roger Holton, 1967—1968; Herbert Wrate, 1968—1971; Gilbert Young, 1971—1975; Robert Habinect, 1975; Robert Quillin, 1975—1977; Ronald Goodall, 1977—1981; Floyd White, 1981—1982; Al Stevens, 1982—1983; Robert Rice, 1983—1984; Gary Frost, 1984—1988; Malcolm Hutchinson, 1988—1993; Ronald Krueger, 1993—1994; Brad Hunter, 1994— .

Pinney, E. R.

PINNEY, E. R. (d. 1855?). A Baptist minister, of Seneca Falls, New York, a Millerite preacher and writer. As early as 1844 he held that the kingdom of God would be established on the earth at the end of the millennium-not at the beginning, as the Millerites in general had always thought. In 1845 James White stated that he agreed with him on this point (Review and Herald 7:61, Oct. 16, 1855). It is not known whether he derived the idea from independent study or from others. Pinney never taught (as did Storrs and, later, Marsh) probation during the millennium, even though he was Marsh's assistant editor in 1850, while the latter's "age-to-come" editorials were being published. Pinney's last pastorate was in Rochester, New York.

Pioneer Valley Academy

PIONEER VALLEY ACADEMY. A coeducational boarding school formerly operated on the high school level at New Braintree, Massachusetts, by the Southern New England Conference. The academy was opened in September 1965 with an initial enrollment of 233 students. The institution replaced the boarding facilities of the South Lancaster Academy. It was first planned in 1958 and the ground was broken on July 2, 1961. Work opportunities for students included Harris Pine Mills and Dakota Bake-N-Serv.

Principals: H. D. Lawson, 1965—1969; Jack Knowles, 1969—1974; Lyle Botimer, 1974—1979; Robert Lebard, 1979—1982; Garry Sudds, 1982—1983.

Piper, Albert H.

PIPER, ALBERT H. (1875—1956). Missionary and administrator for nearly 60 years. Born in New Zealand, he received his ministerial training at Australasian Missionary College, where he lived in the home of Ellen White for a year. He entered the ministry and was the first Seventh-day Adventist missionary to be sent to the Pacific Islands by the Australasian Division. He served as president of a number of conferences in the Australasian Division, was general secretary of the Australasian Union Conference, and then became its vice president. He also served as principal of West Australian Missionary College and then of Australasian Missionary College.

Pitcairn

PITCAIRN. A vessel (built as a schooner, refitted as a brigantine) used by Seventh-day Adventists for transporting missionaries across the Pacific Ocean from 1890 to 1900. This ship is probably the best known of Seventh-day Adventist missionary vessels. M. C. Wilcox, who was present at the Pitcairn's dedication, described the schooner as follows: "The length of the ship is 100 feet [30 meters], breadth of beam 27 feet [eight meters], depth of hold 10 feet [three meters]; and it is of about 120 tons [110 metric tons] burden. It is made of the very best timber, and the workmanship is of the best character. The ship has two masts, foremast and mainmast, each 79 feet [25 meters] long. She is capable of spreading to the breeze 1,576 square yards [1,300 square meters] of canvass" (Review and Herald 67:636, Oct. 14, 1890).

The decision to build a missionary ship was made at the General Conference session of October 1889, and construction began soon after. The ship was paid for by Sabbath school offerings. The vessel was to have been named Glad Tidings, but on further consideration the Foreign Mission Board settled on the name Pitcairn.

The ship, completed in the fall of 1890, cost $11,746.33, and furnishings an additional $2,125.30; various expenses amounted to $4,811.42, and stocks of books for missionary purpose cost $3,415.30. This made a grand total expenditure of $22,098.35 by the time the ship sailed on her first voyage.

Dedication services for the Pitcairn were held Sept. 25, 1890, during the California camp meeting, and were attended by about 1,500 persons.

The schooner set sail from Oakland, Oct. 20, 1890, with the following crew: captain, J. M. Marsh; first mate, J. Christiansen; carpenter, J. I. Tay; sailors, G. A. Anderson, Peter Hansen, C. Kahlstrom; cook, Charles Turner; and cabin attendant, Nicholas Garthofner. The missionary work was under the supervision of E. H. Gates, who was accompanied by his wife. Other missionaries were A. J. Read and his wife, and J. I. Tay and his wife.

The ship sailed directly to Pitcairn Island, arriving there Nov. 25, 1890. During the next 10 years the Pitcairn made six missionary voyages with various crews and missionaries, who established missions in many of the islands of the South Pacific between 1890 and 1899. Because maintenance of the missionary ship was expensive, the Pitcairn was sold in 1900, by which time steamship connections with the islands had improved. See also Missionary Vessels.

Pitcairn Island

PITCAIRN ISLAND. A remote British island possession in the southeastern Pacific Ocean, 3,500 miles (5,700 kilometers) northeast of New Zealand. The island is volcanic, about two miles (three kilometers) long and one mile (1.6 kilometers) wide, with its highest elevation 1,109 feet (340 meters). The soil is fertile and grows subtropical fruit, yams, taro, and sugarcane. The population (1994) is 66. The island was discovered by English/

Navigator Carteret in 1767, but it remained uninhabited until nine mutineers of the H.M.S. Bounty and a group of Tahitians arrived there in 1790.

By 1800, through drink and fighting, all the men were dead except Alexander Smith (who later changed his name to John Adams). With him were 11 women and 23 children. Shortly after this he was converted through reading the Bounty Bible and immediately began to teach the children from the Bible and from the Anglican prayer book. Because of overcrowding, in 1856 the colony was transported to Norfolk Island, but within five years about 45 persons returned. At present the economy is supported by the sale of fruit and souvenirs to rare passing ships and by the issue of postage stamps.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. The territory of Pitcairn Island constitutes the Pitcairn Island Mission in the Central Pacific Union Mission, which in turn is in the South Pacific Division. Statistics (1992): churches, 1; members, 47; licensed ministers, 1; nurse, 1. Headquarters: Pitcairn Island.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. In 1876 James White and J. N. Loughborough sent literature to Pitcairn. Ten years later John I. Tay, a Seventh-day Adventist ship's carpenter, spent five weeks on Pitcairn and persuaded the islanders to keep the seventh-day Sabbath. In 1888 A. J. Cudney set out from the Hawaiian Islands to Pitcairn but was lost at sea.

On Nov. 25, 1890, the missionary ship Pitcairn, built with funds from Sabbath school offerings, arrived at Pitcairn from San Francisco with several missionaries aboard, including J. I. Tay. During a three-week stay, E. H. Gates and A. J. Read baptized and organized a church of 82 members and a Sabbath school of 114 members (Dec. 6, 1890).

In July 1892 Gates and his wife returned as resident missionaries and stayed until February 1894. Five months later W. C. Buckner and his wife arrived there as self-supporting missionaries. In June 1895 Edwin S. Butz and his family came and stayed 12 months.

In February 1893 Hattie André came from America on the second cruise of the Pitcairn and directed a school for three years; later came Mark Carey (1907—1912) and M. R. Adams and his wife (1913—1917). In 1924 Robert Hare spent several months on the island and held a 10-day camp meeting.

Workers now come from Australia for two-year terms. The worker's wife, invariably a trained nurse, serves as the government medical officer. Mark Ellmoos was the minister in 1993.

Place, Olney Galen

PLACE, OLNEY GALEN (1860—1926). Pioneer Seventh-day Adventist medical missionary to India, founder of Boulder Sanitarium. He joined the Seventh-day Adventist Church at an early age, took nurse's training at Battle Creek Sanitarium, and later completed his education at the University of Michigan with a medical degree. After graduation he was on the staff of the Battle Creek Sanitarium for a number of years, then served as medical superintendent of the Mount Vernon (Ohio) Sanitarium until it closed. Early in 1895 he was sent to begin medical work at Boulder, Colorado; he opened the predecessor of the Boulder Sanitarium and started the first buildings of the present institution. In 1896 he was called to go to India to begin medical missionary work in Calcutta. He established a small sanitarium and treatment rooms. However, in 1901, because of his wife's condition of health, he returned to the United States. He carried on sanitarium work at Boulder for a few years, then supervised Glenwood Springs Sanitarium for a year, and after that practiced privately in Colorado. A series of strokes led to his death.

Plagues, Seven Last

PLAGUES, SEVEN LAST. The designation in Rev. 15:1 for the fearful judgments (v. 4) of God upon perversely impenitent sinners in the last days, in which it is said that the “wrath of God” is “filled up.” The seven last plagues are introduced in Rev. 15 and described one after another in Rev. 16. What John was shown with respect to these plagues is said to be “another sign [Gr. sēmeion] in heaven” Rev. 15:1; cf. Rev. 12:1, 3). It was a symbolic enactment in which seven angels were represented as pouring the plagues from seven bowls, or “vials” (Rev. 15:7).

The first plague consisted of a virulent and incurable sore. The second and third rendered useless the salt and fresh waters of the earth. The fourth subjected the earth to intense heat and was followed by the fifth, utter darkness. The sixth consisted in the drying up of the Euphrates, followed by “three unclean spirits” going forth to deceive the nations of earth into fighting “the battle of the great day of God Almighty” (see Armageddon). Under the seventh, Babylon is judged, and her judgments consist of an earthquake, lightning, and hail.

In a sublime choral anthem, those who have suffered at the hands of the impenitent declare the justice of God in His ways (Rev. 15:2—4). The plagues issue from “the temple . . . in heaven” (v. 5). They afflict “the men which had the mark of the beast” and those who “worshipped his image” (Rev. 16:2).

“The fact that the first plague is poured out upon men who have received the mark of the beast and who worship its image (Rev. 16:2) places the plagues after the setting up of the image and the affixing of the mark (see on Rev. 13:14—17), and also after the proclamation of the third angel, which warns against the beast and its mark (see on Rev. 14:9—11). Furthermore the fact that the seven last plagues constitute the fullness of divine wrath untempered by mercy (Rev. 14:10; 15:1; 16:1) clearly implies that the probation of those upon whom they fall has closed (see on Rev. 22:11). The fact that at the time of the fifth plague men are still suffering from the sores of the first plague (Rev. 16:11) clearly implies that the plagues are poured out successively and within a comparatively short period of time (see on v. 2). It appears also that the judgment of mystical Babylon, which takes place under the seventh plague (v. 19), precedes that of the kings of the earth at the appearance of Christ (see on Rev. 17:16; 18:11, 20; 19:2, 11—19; cf. Rev. 6:15—17; 14:14)” (SDACom 7:838).

The fact that one of the seven plague-bearing angels presents the judgment of mystical Babylon in Rev. 17 (see v. 1), and that this is the subject of the seventh plague (Rev. 16:17—21), makes Rev. 17 an extended description of the seventh plague, explains its nature and purpose, and relates the great battle described in vs. 14—17 to the battle to which the same kings of earth have been gathered under the sixth plague. Rev. 18 is a highly figurative, poetic description of the judgment of Babylon, and Rev. 19:1—6 stands as a paean of praise to God for judging Babylon. Rev. 19:11—21 gives a figurative representation of Christ descending from heaven to destroy His enemies (see Second Advent).

Some early Christian expositors, as did some in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, assigned the seven last plagues to the future. However, Martin Luther and Protestant interpreters rather consistently explained the plagues as a series of consecutive historical eras similar to the seven churches, the seven seals, and the seven trumpets (see Revelation, Interpretation of). They generally applied the fifth plague to Rome. Practically all post-Reformation expositors, both in Europe and in the New World, held that the plagues were in progress, and some of them specifically assigned the sixth plague to the Turks. Expositors of the nineteenth-century Advent Awakening in America took the same position. William Miller believed that the plagues were all divine judgments on papal Rome, from Reformation times forward (William Miller, Evidence From Scripture and History of the Second Coming of Christ About the Year 1843, pp. 220—230).

At least one of Miller's colleagues differed on this point. Josiah Litch held that the plagues were in the future, but his view seems to have had little influence at the time, possibly because he said that they would fall after the Second Advent, in an interval while the saints were caught up for safety to the sea of glass before descending to the final victory (Prophetic Expositions, vol. 1, pp. 175, 190, 196, etc.).

Probably the earliest exposition of the plagues by a Sabbathkeeping Adventist writer was James White's 1847 discussion in which he placed them in the future, but before the Second Advent: "For more than one year, it has been my settled faith, that the seven last plagues were all in the future, and that they were all to be poured out before the first resurrection. . . .

"Now where shall we look for the day of wrath . . . ? Not to the crucifixion, nor while Jesus is fulfilling his Priesthood in the Heavenly Sanctuary. But, when he lays off his priestly attire, and puts on the 'garments of vengeance' to 'repay fury to his adversaries, recompence to his enemies;' then the day of his wrath will have fully come. As the 'wrath of God' on the living wicked is 'filled up' in the plagues, and as the day of wrath is future, it follows that the plagues are all future. . . .

"The plagues come before, and not after the advent; for the wicked will not suffer by the plagues, after they are destroyed by the burning glory of his coming" (A Word to the "Little Flock," pp. 1—3).

Ellen White's first published mention of the plagues dates from 1849. She places the plagues at the end of Christ's priestly ministry in the heavenly sanctuary, the time at which the four angels (Rev. 7:1) will cease to hold the four winds (reprinted in EW 36).

Thus early Seventh-day Adventist interpreters assigned all the plagues to the future, as falling subsequent to the close of human probation and culminating at the appearance of Christ in the clouds of heaven. This, they felt, was the only interpretation consistent with Adventism. The reasons for this were set forth by the editor (probably Uriah Smith) of the Review and Herald (11:72, Jan. 7, 1858). Noting that some Adventists were adopting the traditional Protestant position that six of the plagues were already past, he points out that this would invalidate the entire Advent message, including the 1844 movement. If even the first plague were in the past, he reasoned, then the image to the beast had already been set up and men had been compelled to worship it and to receive its mark, for it is on such persons that the first plague is poured out. Furthermore, the third angel's message of Rev. 14 would then be in the past also.

J. N. Andrews connected the seven last plagues with the third angel's message, which warns (Rev. 14:11) against the divine wrath that is announced in Rev. 15:1. "The wrath of God as threatened by the third angel is poured out in the seven last plagues; for the first plague is inflicted on the very class that the third angel threatens. Compare Rev. xiv, 9, 10; xvi, 1, 2. This fact proves that the plagues must be future when the third angel's message is given" (Review and Herald 6:209, Apr. 17, 1855).

Comparing the seven last plagues with the 10 plagues visited upon Egypt at the Exodus, Andrews comments: "We see no reason why they will not be just as literal as those poured out on Egypt" (ibid.). Considering the plagues on Egypt as types of the seven last plagues, he asks, "Why will not the antitype be as real and literal?" (ibid.).

Uriah Smith listed six reasons for considering the plagues as yet future: 1. They are said to be last. 2. The sealing work of Rev. 7 must be completed before they are poured out. 3. The wine of God's wrath in Rev. 14:10 is evidently identical with the wrath of God in Rev. 15:1. 4. The plagues must come after the third angel's message has been given. 5. The statement in Rev. 16:15, "Behold I come as a thief," implies that Christ is about to come. 6. According to Rev. 15:8, no one could enter the sanctuary in heaven while the plagues were being poured out; therefore Christ is not ministering there, no one can be saved, and probation has evidently closed (ibid. 10:52, June 18, 1857).

In summary, Seventh-day Adventists believe that the seven last plagues are future, that they begin to fall soon after the close of human probation, and that they culminate at the personal appearance of Christ in the clouds of heaven. All seven are literal in the sense that they consist of visitations of divine wrath upon impenitent sinners in the form of intense physical suffering. The plagues are poured out upon all who are guilty of complicity in earth's last great apostate movement, symbolically represented in the Revelation as mystical Babylon the great, and as the worship of the beast and its image. The plagues have the effect of unifying all the finally unrepentant in earth's last generation, in a universal conspiracy to annihilate God's people and to take over control of this world, and of permitting them to demonstrate that they are, indeed, rebels against divine authority.

Plainview Academy

PLAINVIEW ACADEMY. A former coeducational boarding school on the senior high school level, operated by the South Dakota Conference first at Elk Point, then at Redfield, South Dakota. It was closed in 1965.

Plainview Academy developed from an intermediate school variously known as South Dakota Intermediate School, Elk Point Intermediate School, and Elk Point Industrial School. This school was established in 1902 in the southeast part of the state of South Dakota on land that had been donated in 1901 by the Elk Point (now Hurley) church. J. W. Beach, Bert Rhoads, and E. J. Hayes were early principals. In 1909 the school became a full-fledged academy under the name Elk Point Academy.

In the autumn of 1911 the school was moved to a site on a slope in “plain view” of the town of Redfield, and renamed Plainview Academy.

From 1903 to 1963 a total of 2,001 students were enrolled, of whom 816 were graduated. The peak enrollment was 120, in 1913—1914.

Principals—Elk Point Academy: J. B. Clymer, 1909—1910; F. R. Isaac, 1910—1911; Plainview Academy: F. R. Isaac, 1911—1912; G. G. George, 1912—1915; H. J. Sheldon, 1915—1920; W. F. Platte Valley Academy

PLATTE VALLEY ACADEMY. A coeducational boarding school on the senior high school level, situated on 470 acres (190 hectares) of level, irrigated farmland on Highway 30 one and a half miles (2.4 kilometers) east of Shelton, Nebraska. It is owned by the Kansas-Nebraska Conference and operated by a board chosen by the conference K-12 Board. It serves the entire state of Nebraska. Student enrollment in 1993 was 109; total school staff, 24 (including teachers, administrators, assistants, industrial heads); address: 19338 W. Campus Drive, Shelton, Nebraska 68876.

Forerunner of Platte Valley Academy was Hastings Intermediate School, 415 East High Street, Hastings, Nebraska. At this school, in 1918, a special committee met to discuss a site for a new intermediate school that would serve Nebraska and adjacent Wyoming as well. On May 26, 1918, they investigated and voted to buy an 80-acre (32-hectare) site at Shelton, which had been recommended by R. A. Underwood, president of the Central Union Conference, because of the advantage of having a farm connected with the school, the ease of access from the western part of the state and from Wyoming as well, good railroad facilities, and availability of good water. One year later another 80 acres (32 hectares) was added, and other land was added from time to time to make up the present 470 acres (190 hectares). Work began immediately on a building with classrooms and a dormitory on each end. The school, renamed Shelton Academy, opened at the new site in the fall of 1919. In 1947 the name was changed to Platte Valley Academy. Buildings added to the campus included new farm buildings in 1946, a gymnasium in 1948, an addition to the original girls' dormitory in 1947, in 1962 a new girls' dormitory, and in 1963 a cafeteria. An administration building was completed in 1968 and a boys' dormitory in 1972. A gymnasium-auditorium was completed in 1975. A broom factory, farm, and dairy furnish work for students.

Platte Valley Academy offers a college preparatory course. The school is accredited by the SDA Board of Regents (1931) and by the state of Nebraska.

The first school paper was called the Shelademy. This name was early changed to the Sun Dial. Earlier annuals were called Sheltonian and Golden Memories. The present school annual is the Aquila.

Platte Valley Medical Center

PLATTE VALLEY MEDICAL CENTER. A 58-bed acute care facility serving the Brighton community in Colorado and surrounding 40 square miles (104 square kilometers). The Adventist Health System began managing the Brighton Community Hospital in 1978. The hospital had been in existence since 1960, when a number of the citizens of Brighton organized a fund drive and built the combination nursing home/hospital.

As time went on, the citizens of Brighton began to realize that they could no longer feasibly operate a small, local hospital. The governing board began surveying several Denver area hospitals, looking for a management team. After negotiations were completed, they elected to sign a management contract with the Adventist Health System, aligning themselves with Porter Memorial Hospital.

The goals of the Adventist Health System for the Brighton Community Hospital were to begin construction on a new building and to establish a quality of care consistent with the SDA hospitals.

The current facility was opened in 1983, and Brighton Community Hospital became Platte Valley Medical Center in 1985. In 1993 there were more than 200 employees and a medical staff of 35. Platte Valley Medical Center prides itself on being a hospital with 1990s technology coupled with the caring atmosphere that exists in a small community.

Plummer, Lorena Florence (Fait)

PLUMMER, LORENA FLORENCE (FAIT) (1862—1945). Sabbath School Department secretary. She was more generally known by her shortened name, L. Flora. She and her husband, Frank E. Plummer, were teachers in Iowa public schools when, in 1886, she accepted the Seventh-day Adventist faith. Shortly afterward she joined the Sabbath School Department of the Iowa Conference, and in 1900 the Sabbath School Department of the Minnesota Conference. In 1901 the Sabbath School Department of the General Conference was organized and Mrs. Plummer was appointed corresponding secretary. Her office continued to be in Minneapolis until 1905, when she moved to Washington, D.C., to continue her work at denominational headquarters. From 1913 until her retirement in 1936 she was secretary of the department. (Her husband died in Washington, D.C., in 1918.) She was the author of The Soul-Winning Teacher, The Spirit of the Teacher, and The Soul-Winning Sabbath School; she also wrote a brief history of the Sabbath school and from 1904 to 1936 edited the Sabbath School Worker.

Plumstead Orphanage

PLUMSTEAD ORPHANAGE. An institution operated from 1895 to 1904 by the Medical Missionary and Benevolent Association near Cape Town, South Africa. Fred Reed, a chemist from Kimberley, was the prime mover in establishing the orphanage, contributing liberally toward the cost of the building. The land was donated by the mother of Peter Wessels, from her Timour Hall estate. Intended at first to care for orphans of Seventh-day Adventist parents, it was soon accepting needy orphans from non-SDA coloured families. The number of orphans never exceeded 20, the average figure being 10, ranging in ages from 1 to 12.

When Timour Hall was sold, the orphanage was moved to a new building erected in Plumstead. Lack of funds made it necessary to limit the number of children to 10 or less. In 1904 the orphanage was closed. The buildings were later used by the Cape Sanitarium and Plumstead Nursing Home.

Pohnpei Seventh-day Adventist School

POHNPEI SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST SCHOOL. A K-12 grade mission school operated by the Guam-Micronesia Mission of Seventh-day Adventists. This school is located just beyond Kolonia town's southern limits, about three miles (five kilometers) from the airport on the island of Pohnpei, part of Micronesia. The campus has seven buildings, including 21 classrooms, nine staff apartments, and a shop, situated in a rough circle around a large playing field.

Seventh-day Adventist educational work in Pohnpei was begun in 1970 under the direction of Frank Taitague, the first pastor and district leader of Pohnpei Chuuk district of Seventh-day Adventists. A one-room elementary school was opened with 20 pupils and one teacher, Mr. Oliod Moura. Growth has been continuous since that time. Total enrollment at the beginning of the 1992—1993 school year was 405 students (145 in grades 9—12). The total staff of 31 consists of 17 student missionaries, five Pohnpeians, eight two-year missionaries, and one six-year interdivision missionary.

Principals: Frank Taitague, 1970—1974; Remenster Jano, 1974—1977; Edwin Reynolds, 1977—1978; Glenn Hildebrand, 1978—1979; A. Point Fortin Seventh-day Adventist Secondary School

POINT FORTIN SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST SECONDARY SCHOOL. A co-educational nonboarding high school that was situated at Mainfield Road, Point Fortin, Trinidad, West Indies. The school started in September 1962, with Reuben Wilson as principal, and was operated until 1982 by the Point Fortin Seventh-day Adventist Church. The school offered five years of secondary instruction in preparation for the General Certificate of Education ordinary level examinations. It was succeeded in 1982 by the Point Fortin Seventh-day Adventist Business Institute.

Principals: Reuben Wilson, 1962—1965; Patrick Thomas, 1965—1967; Merrill McKenzie, 1967—1971; Andreason Ahyoung, 1971—1974; Colville St. Hillaire, 1974—1978; Ansel St. Hillaire (acting), 1979; Janetta Cupid, 1979—1982.

Poland

POLAND. A country in Eastern Europe bounded by Germany on the west; Lithuania, Belarus, and Ukraine on the east; the Czech Republic and Slovakia on the south; and the Baltic Sea on the north. The area of Poland is approximately 120,000 square miles (312,000 square kilometers), with a population of about 39 million. Two large mountain ranges, the Carpathians and the Sudeten, form Poland's southern border. Industry and agriculture are the principal occupations. Poland has had a long history, and its people are proud of its cultural tradition.

The large majority of the Poles are Roman Catholics; the second-largest church in Poland is the Polish Autocephalous Orthodox Church. Protestants are few. Of these, the Lutheran Church has about 80,000 adherents; the Seventh-day Adventist Church in Poland is second among Protestants, with the Calvinist, Methodist, and Baptist churches occupying third, fourth, and fifth places.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. In 1888 J. Laubhan, a Seventh-day Adventist worker, and H. Szkubowicz moved from the Crimea to eastern Poland. Their three years' work there resulted in a church in Zarnówka in Volhynia. Although it was most probably in an area now in Russia, it was in any case the first Seventh-day Adventist church in what then was Poland. K. Fendel and a minister named J. Szledzinski came to Łódź in 1893 from Zarnówka and their preaching won a Baptist family named Lach as well as other families. The first church in Łódź met in the Lach home. H. J.

Loeb sack, a minister from Russia, held a series of public meetings in 1895 and baptized the first members of the church in Łódź.

The next Seventh-day Adventist church in Poland was organized in Poznań by ministers from Germany. One of the prominent converts there was Stanislaw Zielinski, the first Polish Roman Catholic to accept the SDA faith in Poland. He later became a successful minister for the Poles and brought his brother into the ministry as well.

In Silesia the work began early in the twentieth century. The first church was established in Bielsko in 1903 by J. Peter, who came from Austria. Other churches in Silesia (Cieszyn, Skoczów, Wisa, Brenna, and Jaworze) were begun mainly through the work of two ministers, Jozef and Michal Niedoba. Many Polish ministers came from these churches.

In 1900 H. Schmitz from Germany began preaching in Warsaw, the capital of Poland. Because he could not speak Polish, he began his work by going from house to house, reading the names on the doors. Whenever he found a German name, he knocked, and when admitted presented SDA beliefs. As a result of this missionary endeavor, the first church was organized after a few months, with German-speaking members. As the work developed and converts who spoke both German and Polish joined, the church was organized and services were conducted in Polish.

In 1912 the churches in the section of Poland that then formed part of the Russian Empire were organized as the Warsaw Mission with H. Schmitz as president. The mission played a significant part in the development of the future Polish Union.

Early Organization and Growth. In 1912, at Opava in Silesia (then in Austria, now in the Czech Republic), the Moravian-Silesian Mission was organized in the Cieszynian-Moravian area with Jan Muth as director. This organization was replaced in 1921 by the Silesia-Galicia Conference. In 1918 the churches in the western portion of Poland were organized into a conference with headquarters first in Poznań and later in Bydgoszcz. In the readjustment of territories at the close of World War I, those portions of the ancient kingdom of Poland that had formed parts of the Austrian and German empires were united with Russian Poland to form the new Polish Republic. L. Mathe of Poland was placed in charge of the work in the new state until a more complete organization could be effected. From Oct. 6 to 9, 1921, L. R. Conradi presided over a general meeting of Polish workers in the city of Bydgoszcz, at which “the Seventh-day Adventist Union in Poland” was organized, consisting of the Posania Conference, the Silesia-Galicia Conference, and the Warsaw Mission, with L. Mathe as president.

At the end of 1921 the total membership was 1,080. In the succeeding years the conferences changed, but the three general areas remained about the same: South Polish Conference: district of Kraków, Rzeszów, Opole, and Katowice, with headquarters first in Bielsko-Biała and ultimately in Kraków. West Polish Conference: the following administrative provinces: Poznań, Gdańsk, Bydgoszcz, Koszalin, Szczecin, Zielona Góra, and Wrocław. It was first organized in 1918, with headquarters at Poznań and later Bydgoszcz. East Polish Conference: corresponding to the former Warsaw Mission, but organized as a conference in 1927, with T. B. Will as the first president. Its territory comprises the eastern and central provinces of Poland, namely, Warszawa, Łódź, Kielce, Lublin, Białystok, and Olsztyn. Headquarters were successively at Luck, Białystok, Warszawa, Łódź, and presently at Warszawa.

Later Events. After World War I Polish SDAs encountered many difficulties because of the power of the Roman Catholic Church. Without state recognition as a church, SDAs were not allowed to own chapels or other buildings in the name of the denomination. Instead, a private building company “Konstrukcja” was organized, to hold the church properties. However, according to the constitution, the church was tolerated.

In 1921 the “Poliglot” publishing house was set up in Bydgoszcz but was later transferred to Warsaw (see Polish Publishing House). The first colporteur leader was H. Bigalke, who worked hard to popularize SDA publications among the people. An SDA school for ministers was opened in 1925 in Warsaw and established on a permanent basis the next year in Bielsko. Now it is located in Podkowa Lesna, near Warsaw. (See Polish Spiritual Seminary.)

During World War II the Polish nation suffered much at the hands of invaders. The German authorities dissolved the Polish Union (except for one conference, which was subordinated to the East German Union) and prohibited Seventh-day Adventist activity. All church properties were confiscated and the work was dissolved. In many places Sabbath worship had to be conducted in secret for fear of persecution. Many church members from the eastern part of Poland were sent to Siberia by the Soviets.

With the close of the war, SDA work in Poland entered a new and prosperous period. In 1945 J. Kulak, who was the president, began to reorganize the work that had been almost destroyed. Properties belonging to the church were recovered. For the first time the Seventh-day Adventist Church was legalized in 1946 as a recognized religious body in Poland and granted full rights to conduct its activities. (All denominations were placed on an equal basis before the law and their rights confirmed by the constitution. No special privileges were accorded any religious organization.)

In 1946 all three conferences and the publishing house were reestablished. The school for ministers continued to prosper. Evangelistic meetings have been held and thousands of converts won.

Many new buildings and chapels have been bought or rebuilt since 1945. Much favorable comment resulted from the establishment of an old people’s home opened in 1960 in Bielsko, near the Beskid Mountains, in a building used for a time by the seminary. In 1961 the Polish Union was renamed The Seventh-day Adventist Church in Poland. In 1966 the state approved the church constitution, thus regulating in a preliminary way the state-church relationship. In 1967 lectures on Seventh-day Adventist theology were initiated at the Christian Theological Academy in Warsaw.

The following years were marked by numerous evangelistic campaigns, permanent and mutual contacts with the division and the General Conference, participation in international religious meetings, attendance at the General Conference sessions, activities in the field of temperance, morality, and education, friendly relations with other Christian churches, organizing new churches, and new church buildings. Publishing and literature evangelistic work developed in a special way, and young people began organizing camps and music festivals. In 1973 a Bible correspondence course was begun.

In 1988 the Seventh-day Adventist Church celebrated the centennial of SDA work in Poland. In 1989 Communist rule ended and Poland became politically independent, opening a new era for the SDA Church. The church received fuller guarantees of religious freedom. A new series of Ellen White books were published and many evangelists from abroad conducted meetings. New contacts have been made with SDAs living outside Poland. In 1990 the seminary was upgraded and two years later was accepted officially by the General Conference as a junior college. In 1992 the Polish Religious Liberty Association was established.

In 1993 the twenty-sixth union session was held. The delegates voted a new constitution that was felt to be more adapted to Seventh-day Adventist Church responsibilities in modern times. General Conference president Robert Folkenberg visited Poland in 1992.

Polish Publishing House

POLISH PUBLISHING HOUSE (Chrzescijanski Instytut Wydawniczy Znaki Czasu). A publishing firm operated by the Polish Union Conference in Warszawa, Poland. The firm issues books, a Sabbath school lesson quarterly, and two periodicals, Znaki Czasu (“Signs of the Times”) and Glos Adwentu (“Voice of Advent”).

Seventh-day Adventist books and periodicals were issued in the Polish language by the Hamburg Publishing House as early as 1910. The first SDA publishing house in Poland, Naklad Polyglotte (Polyglot Publishing House), was founded in 1921 in Bydgoszcz, not long after Poland achieved political independence (1918) after 123 years of foreign subjugation. It was then that the two Polish periodicals were begun.

Transferred to Warsaw in 1922, the house was for many years known as Polyglot, and then as Polski Dom Nakladowy Lim (Polish Publishing House). It published in the Polish, German, Russian, and Ukrainian languages. The firm prospered from 1922 to 1939, but was completely closed down by the occupying powers during World War II. During the war the building, along with its library and thousands of books in stock, was completely destroyed by fire.

After the close of the war, since Warsaw was in ruins, the firm was reopened in Cracow under the name Wydawnictwo “Znaki Czasu.” In 1956 it was again reestablished in the capital.

The postwar period showed a marked increase in the output of the Polish Publishing House. In addition to periodicals, pamphlets, and tracts, the firm published more than 50 books of 100 pages or more by 1964. These include a large hymnal, with musical notation, and Polish editions of books by Ellen G. White, such as Patriarchs and Prophets, Prophets and Kings, The Desire of Ages, The Acts of the Apostles, The Story of Redemption, and Christ’s Object Lessons.

Since 1964 the house has published 30 new books, among them the following by Ellen G. White: The Adventist Home, Steps to Christ (seventh edition), Evangelism, Education, Thoughts From the Mount of Blessing, The Ministry of Healing, The Great Controversy, Gospel Workers, Testimony Treasures, vols. 1 and 2, and The Great Controversy.

The publishing house was enlarged in 1970 by adding a new bindery. Later, small presses were added and also desktop publishing. In 1993 more than 90 titles were on sale.

Polish Spiritual Seminary

POLISH SPIRITUAL SEMINARY (Wyzsze Seminarium Duchowne Kosciola Adventystow Dnia Siodmego im. M. B. Czechowskiego). A coeducational boarding school on the junior college level, operated by the Polish Union Conference at Podkowa Lesna, near Warszawa, on an estate consisting of five buildings, an orchard, a small wood, and a tract of arable land.

The seminary offers three courses: ministerial, lay evangelist (two years), and a school of English. The four-year curriculum includes subjects in theology, biblical and church history, Greek, ethics, homiletics, music, and English.

As a junior college the seminary accepts only those students who have completed their secondary school education and already have their maturity or university entrance certificates.

The first attempt to train workers in Poland was made in 1924, when a two-month course was taught at Bydgoszcz by W. H. Landeen, A. Luedtke, and E. J. Klute. It was attended by a number of ministers, Bible instructors, and colporteurs. The present Polish training school was established in Warsaw in 1927 (at first called simply the Mission School) in the former union and publishing house offices. H. L. Rudy, who arrived from the United States, was the first head of the school. Toward the end of the year, the school was transferred to a new building purchased at Kamienica, near Bielsko. Because the Seventh-day Adventist religious organization was not recognized by the state, and consequently could not operate a teaching institution, the school had to use pseudonyms such as “Youth Center” or “Switala Boarding House.” A four-year seminar course was offered during most of that time. The seminary did not operate from 1930 to 1933 and from 1937 to 1938.

In 1939 Nazi occupation authorities closed the school. After the war, in 1947, the school was reopened in Cracow by M. Krycki (Krietzky) and in 1949 was moved from Cracow to Kamienica Slaska, where it continued, with one interruption (1953 to 1958) until 1959, when the present property was purchased.

In 1972 the name of the school was changed to honor the SDA pioneer missionary in Europe, Michael B. Czechowski, an ex-Roman Catholic priest of Polish descent. Two years later the school adopted the four-year curriculum in its present form.

Principals: H. L. Rudy, 1926—1930; J. Schwital, 1933—1937; M. Ostapowicz, 1939; M. Krycki, 1947; A. Maszczak, 1947—1953, 1958—1960; K. J. Bulli, 1960—1966; E. Lawaty, 1966—1969; W. Polok, 1969—1976; K. J. Bulli, 1976—1979; W. Kosowski, 1979—1988; J. Hatala, 1988— .

Ponce, Emiliano Sedano

PONCE, EMILIANO SEDANO (1889—1966). Pastor, administrator, musician. A native of Jalisco, Mexico, he was director of the Presidential Band in Mexico from 1919 to 1922, but the Seventh-day Adventists of Inter-America will best remember him for his arrangement of “Mas Alla del Sol” (the hymn of Inter-America).

After his baptism in 1922 he began his work for the church and was ordained to the ministry in 1933. A year later he became president of the Central Mexican Mission, the first Mexican pastor to assume administrative responsibilities. In 1951 he became secretary of the Mexican Union, a position he held until his retirement.

Port Maria High School

PORT MARIA HIGH SCHOOL. An educational institution on the senior high school level operated by the Central Jamaica Conference at 88 Stennett Street on the outskirts of the north coast town of Port Maria. Established in 1962, it embodies senior high, preparatory, and kindergarten divisions and an evening institute.

The high school offers courses leading to the Caribbean Examination Council examination. Instruction is given in religious education, English, mathematics, business, accounting, office procedures, typing, history, geography, biology, home economics, and welding. Courses are adapted to conform with denominational standards.

Principals: Mrs. R. Henry, 1962—1963; J. Persuad, 1963—1964; J. P. Wesley, 1964—1967; W. Preddie, 1967—1971; V. Cato, 1971—1972; O. Moncrieffe, 1972—1974; S. Beckford, 1974—1979; C. Portage Plains Academy

PORTAGE PLAINS ACADEMY. A pioneer Canadian coeducational boarding school on a high school level operated by the Manitoba Conference from 1904 to 1909 near Portage la Prairie, Manitoba, for the training of Canadian young people for denominational service. It had an English and a German department and a faculty usually of five. Until 1908 it was called Northwestern Training School.

Principals: Orrin A. Hall, 1904—1907; E. R. Potter, 1907; B. C. Haak, 1907—1908; M. E. Anderson, 1908—1909.

Porter Memorial Hospital

PORTER MEMORIAL HOSPITAL. An acute general 368-bed hospital located at 2525 South Downing Street, Denver, Colorado, operated by the Mid-America Union Conference. It is accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Healthcare Organizations, Chicago, Illinois. It has an administrator and an open staff of 585 active physicians and 2,000 employees, of whom 500 are nursing personnel. Porter features a number of special services, including cancer care, heart care, ophthalmology, obstetrics and gynecology, 24-hour emergency care, behavioral health, and a kidney and pancreas transplant program. In addition, Porter serves its community with Ask-a-Nurse, a 24-hour free health information and physician referral service. Porter is the flagship hospital in the regional corporate organization Rocky Mountain Adventist Healthcare.

History

History. Porter Memorial Hospital was an outright gift to the Central Union Conference by Henry M. Porter and his daughter, Dora Porter Mason. He became favorably disposed toward Seventh-day Adventist hospitals when he was a patient at Glendale Sanitarium in 1928. Not only was he delighted with the care, but he was also impressed with the treatment room attendant's refusal to take a tip. However, the attendant did suggest that Porter could make a contribution to the institution if he chose. Porter was again impressed when, after having been a patient at the Paradise Valley Sanitarium, he was mailed a refund check of 45 cents, an amount he had been inadvertently overcharged. These incidents, together with his observation of the employees' kindness to patients, influenced him and his daughter to offer to establish a similar institution in Denver. To a General Conference representative, C. E. Rice, and the president of the Colorado Conference he showed a 40-acre (15-hectare) plot he had already selected for the proposed institution, and offered $330,000 for the project—$15,000 to purchase the site and $315,000 to construct a 100-bed hospital. The General Conference and Central Union Conference committees proposed that he erect a 50-bed hospital and set aside the rest of his gift to furnish and open the institution. Finally a 75-bed institution was agreed upon. The contract, signed Oct. 16, 1928, represented the largest single gift received by the Seventh-day Adventist Church up to that time.

The building committee chairman was J. J. Nethery, the contractor M. E. Carlson, an SDA of Denver. On Feb. 26, 1929, after a fire thawed the spot, ground was broken by Denver's mayor, Benjamin Stapleton, and on Apr. 7 the cornerstone was laid.

The institution, named Porter Sanitarium and Hospital, opened publicly on Sunday, Feb. 16, 1930, and was visited by an estimated 4,000-5,000 people. On the seventeenth, five patients were received, and on the nineteenth the first operation was performed and the first baby was born.

Dr. R. J. Brines, the medical superintendent, and Mrs. Ruth Mohr, the superintendent of nurses, came from the Kansas Sanitarium at Wichita, and many of the nurses came from Boulder-Colorado Sanitarium. Otis Hudson, who for several years had been manager of the Florida Sanitarium at Orlando, became the first manager.

Upon seeing the need for a nurses' dormitory, Porter and his daughter, who watched the sanitarium develop, made a second gift of $50,000 to erect the structure. The new dormitory, named the Dora Porter Mason Hall in honor of the codonor, was occupied in the summer of 1931.

During the first 10 months, when 611 patients were received, there was an operating loss of $3,217. This had not been anticipated but was understandable in view of the existing economic depression. The hospital succeeded financially as the years went by.

The institution aimed to be a hospital rather than a sanitarium of the old Battle Creek Sanitarium type. Seventy-two physicians brought patients to the institution the first 10 months. Only slightly more than a third of the patients were cared for by the sanitarium-employed doctors. At that time the medical staff numbered 69, including some of the most prominent physicians of the city.

From time to time the plant was enlarged, until by the late 1940s it was a 130-bed institution. It began offering nursing education in the early 1940s, when it entered an affiliated nursing school program with Boulder Sanitarium under the supervision of Boulder nursing educators. In 1947 the Union College bulletin announced that the two medical institutions entered into an arrangement with Union College at Lincoln, Nebraska, by which they established the collegiate nursing program. In 1954, when Boulder Sanitarium dropped out of the program, the Union College department of nursing continued on the Porter campus through the 1970s.

With the exception of a few months at the beginning, Dr. A. L. Moon was medical superintendent from the founding of the hospital until the open staff system was adopted in 1959, and then continued on the staff. From 1937 to 1941 Boulder and Porter were under joint management, with R. J. Brown as manager.

In 1949 a $250,000 building program increased the hospital's capacity to 215 beds. On Feb. 16, 1955, the hospital celebrated its twenty-fifth anniversary by paying a debt of $130,000 on the 1950 addition. In 1959 a substantial building project involving various services was undertaken at a cost of $700,000.

Through the years the hospital remained a cherished institution of the Porter family, who followed its progress with keenest interest and gave it their personal patronage whenever the health of the family dictated. When Porter's son, William E. Porter, died in 1959, he bequeathed to the Porter Hospital a residual portion of the estate, which amounted to a million dollars. As a consequence, another addition, which brought the patient capacity up to 300 at a cost of $2.5 million, was completed and occupied early in the spring of 1964. At a meeting of the board June 18, 1963, the name of the institution was changed to Porter Memorial Hospital. The corporate name of the institution was Porter Sanitarium and Hospital until September 1969, when it was changed to Porter Memorial Hospital.

During 1968 and 1969 a major remodeling program was undertaken in which the facilities in the original building were modernized at a cost of slightly more than $1 million. More recent building projects included a north wing addition (1976), a five-story medical office building (1979), a day-care center for employees' children (1983), an outpatient dialysis center and heliport (1984), a second five-story medical office building (1986), a new obstetrics/gynecology unit (1987), an outpatient cancer center (1989), and a third medical office building that also houses an ambulatory surgery center (1993). In addition, Porter established Littleton Hospital, eight miles (13 kilometers) to the south, in 1989; and it supported the building of Avista Hospital in Louisville, Colorado, in 1990. In 1992 administrators streamlined the hospital's patient care delivery system and its general operation. They also commenced a process of including a renewed emphasis on the Seventh-day Adventist health mission as essential for a time of rapid change and significant challenge in U.S. health-care delivery.

Porter, Roscoe Celester

PORTER, ROSCOE CELESTER (1858—1918). Minister and administrator. He was converted at the age of 13 through the influence of the Sabbath school and of his parents. After studying at the State Agricultural College at Ames, Iowa, and at Battle Creek College, he entered denominational service in 1879 as a tentmaster in Nebraska and later in the year returned to Iowa, where he preached for nine years. Afterward he was president of the Minnesota Conference (1890), New England Conference (1891—1895), and superintendent of District no. 1 (1895—1896). Failing health caused a temporary retirement, but after the turn of the century he returned to the ministry and later served as president of the Missouri Conference (1903—1906), Kansas Conference (1906—1907), Southwestern Union Conference (1907—1908), South African Union Conference (1908—1913), and Asiatic Division (1913—1917).

Portland Adventist Academy

PORTLAND ADVENTIST ACADEMY. A coeducational day school on the senior high school level, operated by a local constituency of Portland area churches and located at 1500 SE. 96th Avenue, Portland, Oregon. It is accredited as a standard secondary school by the SDA Board of Regents.

History

History. Beginnings. The earliest predecessor of the Portland Adventist Academy was a small church school begun in the fall of 1885, taught by Carrie Mills in rooms on the same premises as the church.

Because it was evident from the first that the facilities were totally inadequate, the conference decided to build an elementary-secondary school in East Portland, and called T. H. Starbuck to raise funds, build, and serve as principal. An angular two-story building, completed by the fall of 1887 at a cost of about $2,600, housed the new school called North Pacific Academy. Nearby cottages provided boarding facilities. Five years later it was sold when Walla Walla College was opened.

There was no denominational school in the Portland region until 1899, when the Montavilla church, east of Portland proper, opened a nine-grade school. But no common effort for a central school proved successful until the representatives of seven Portland area churches established the Doremus Union School in 1911—1912, built for about $3,500 on two acres (.8 hectare) of land made available by Marcus Doremus, in a semirural area at 45th Avenue and Couch Street. G. E. Johnson became the first principal. There were 90 students and three teachers, and offerings up to grade 10. By 1926—1927, when the enrollment passed 180, the Portland constituency was forced to meet the challenge of growth.

Portland Junior Academy. A new school, named the Portland Junior Academy, was erected on 11 lots, a short distance east of Doremus Union School. The main building, a modern Spanish-style white stucco building containing five rooms and a full basement (later added to), cost nearly $30,000. Transfer of about 200 students to the new quarters was made in the fall of 1927.

Portland Union Academy. The depression years of the 1930s successfully weathered, the school achieved senior academy status in 1938—1939. A new gymnasium addition was put into use the same year. In addition to about 120 secondary students, there were some 110 pupils in the grade school, which met in the same building until the fall of 1942, when a separate four-room, brick-veneer grade school was erected on the same campus. After subsequent additions, it became evident that there was insufficient room for both academy and grade school to operate on one campus.

On Jan. 8, 1962, construction began on a new $725,000 secondary school plant, designed to accommodate more than 400 students, on a 14-acre (six-hectare) tract of land in East Portland. Plans included nine classrooms, administrative area, chapel, library, music wing, home economics area, kitchen science area, dining room, and a gymnasium usable as a hall seating 2,300; included also was an industrial education department in a specially constructed basement area, emergency-provisioned for 550 persons, which could double as a fallout shelter, the first of its kind registered in Oregon.

In September 1962 classes began in the attractive, highly functional new units. Seventh and eighth graders quickly filled the vacated campus at Couch and 48th streets. By 1968 the elementary grades to grade 6 required both school buildings at the Couch Street site, and the junior high school grades were moved to the 96th Street campus, where they were housed in three mobile classrooms, thus offering the junior high school group the advantages of the senior academy's fine dining, gymnasium, music, and home economics facilities until acceptable arrangements were made for the junior high elsewhere. By September 1972 only the senior academy attended the 96th and Market streets campus. The school was renamed Portland Adventist Academy in 1974. On June 22, 1993, the PAA operating board requested the Oregon Conference to dissolve the interim board under which it had been operating since 1964 and empower a new board of constituent churches to operate the school beginning in the 1993—1994 school year.

Portland Adventist Convalescent Center (PACC)

PORTLAND ADVENTIST CONVALESCENT CENTER (PACC). A 175-bed nursing facility, situated on the slopes of Mount Tabor Park at SE. 60th and Belmont (6040 SE. Belmont), Portland, Oregon. Since it opened its doors in 1978, it has provided short-term assistance and long-term care, specializing in skilled nursing and rehabilitation for persons of all ages. It is licensed by the state of Oregon and certified for Medicare and Medicaid. PACC is owned by Portland Adventist Medical Center.

Medical Director: J.W. Griffin, M.D., 1978— .

Administrators: D. Buel, 1978—1984; B. Hartnell, 1984—1986; H. Clendenon, 1986— .

Portland Adventist Medical Center

PORTLAND ADVENTIST MEDICAL CENTER. A 302-bed full-service hospital offering high-quality medical and surgical services coupled with active health promotion and corporate wellness programs. It is located in Portland, Oregon's east side, at 10123 SE. Market Street, just off Interstate 205 and close to Interstate 84. More than 1.5 million people live in the metropolitan area.

Hospital services include behavioral health (through CareMark Behavioral Health Services), cancer treatment, cardiac care, communication therapy, emergency, general medicine, health education, home care (through Portland Adventist Home Health Agency), laboratory, maternity, medical clinics (through Portland Adventist Medical Group, P.C.), medical imaging (radiology), occupational and environmental medicine, occupational therapy, orthopedic, pastoral care, pediatrics, physical therapy, pulmonary medicine, skilled nursing (through Portland Adventist Convalescent Center), sports medicine, surgery, and women's services.

The institution is owned and operated by Adventist Health System/West, and is fully approved by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Healthcare Organizations (JCAHO). It employs approximately 1,300 people, and has approximately 400 medical staff members.

The School of Nursing operates a four-year collegiate program in affiliation with Walla Walla College, College Place, Washington. The Walla Walla College School of Nursing program is accredited by the Washington State Board of Nursing and the Collegiate Board of Review of the National League of Nursing.

History

History. Dr. Louis J. Belknap was nearly penniless when he arrived in Portland in 1893. He had been robbed of all his possessions while waiting on a dock in San Francisco, but he still had a vision. He intended to establish a sanitarium modeled after the world-renowned Battle Creek institution.

A local Seventh-day Adventist family lent him the first month's rent for a small house in which to start up his practice. Dr. Belknap's wife, reportedly the best surgical nurse Dr. John Harvey Kellogg had ever had, arrived from Battle Creek shortly thereafter and assisted with the practice. As the only SDA physician in town, Dr. Belknap naturally gained many church members as patients.

Health-care options were limited in Portland at the time. Although a medical practices act had been passed in 1889, quack doctors still sold an abundance of useless patent medicines.

Dr. Belknap's eight-room house on East Twelfth Street had a capacity for only six patients, and soon larger quarters were needed. Once again, church members came to the doctor's assistance with contributions toward new facilities, enabling Dr. Belknap to rent the Reed Mansion, the largest house in downtown Portland. The large ornate house provided room for 20 patients, along with a surgical ward, office, kitchen, and dining room. The stable was remodeled into treatment rooms and a nurses' dormitory.

In 1896 Dr. and Mrs. Belknap decided to move to California to start a sanitarium in San Jose. The Seventh-day Adventist church, through the International Medical Missionary and Benevolent Association, took charge of the work in Portland and organized several new programs. A two-year nurses' training program began in 1897, the same year the Portland Sanitarium Health Food Company was formed. The food company did not prosper as hoped, however, and the sanitarium found itself subsidizing the business for several years. In 1905 the board voted to separate the food company from the sanitarium.

In 1902 the sanitarium was soon ready to expand again. This time the directors wished to relocate to a more rural area, and several acres on the side of Mount Tabor proved nearly ideal. A steam train from Portland brought patients within a few blocks of the institution. The new sanitarium, capable of housing 75 patients, was a bright red four-story frame structure with two broad verandas in front.

Dr. William Holden arrived in 1903, and continued with the institution to the year of his death in 1955. His skill as a surgeon attracted many patients. By about 1919 the work at the sanitarium was about one half surgical. A return to strictly sanitarium care would require the institution to move to the country and advertise itself as a health resort. The facility stayed in town and the surgical side of the work continued to grow, while long-term care became gradually less popular.

In 1920, shortly after paying off the debt from the new construction, Mount Tabor was annexed by the city of Portland and the sanitarium was forced to close because of stricter fire codes. After some debate over possible alternate locations, the board decided to rebuild on the same site. The new brick building was completed in the spring of 1922, thanks to the untiring efforts of Ralph W. Nelson (who in all gave the hospital 38 years of service), Dr. Holden, H. W. Cottrell, conference president, and a few others.

Mr. Nelson was the first business manager in the denomination to be given the title of hospital administrator.

Patients filled the 60 beds almost from the beginning, and in 1924 another small unit was added, providing more operating rooms and 16 additional beds. An old three-story house on the southeast corner of 60th and Yamhill was purchased to provide a nurses' residence. Further growth demanded numerous additions to the sanitarium over the course of the next half century, including a new nurses' dorm in 1928 and new wings in 1949 and 1964.

Several new programs were started in the 1950s and 1960s, including training programs in medical technology, radiological technology, and practical nursing, along with a Pediatrics Department.

The many new and improved programs at the hospital helped to increase the patient load to the point where, by the mid-1960s, major expansion became necessary. The fund-raising campaign of 1963—1964 was the first time the hospital had approached the general public for funds. The $2.5 million expansion received aid from federal grants and from the Seventh-day Adventist Church as well.

In 1968 the board voted to change the name from Portland Sanitarium and Hospital to Portland Adventist Hospital. This change acknowledged the gradual shift that had taken place from sanitarium-type care to general hospital services, and more clearly identified the hospital with other denominational health-care facilities.

Northwest Medical Foundation was established in 1972 to recruit physicians to the Northwest, but the organization soon developed into the planning and management for all

Seventh-day Adventist health-care facilities in the North Pacific Union Conference. That same year the VertiCare Corporation was also developed to provide group practice outpatient clinics in areas without readily accessible primary medical and dental services.

By this time Portland Adventist Hospital needed to expand even further, beyond what the Mount Tabor site would allow. Administrators had searched for a possible new location and purchased the 232-acre (94-hectare) Glendoveer Golf Course. Plans called for 46 acres (19 hectares) to be reserved for the hospital, which would be set back among the trees. The remaining land would be redesigned into a 27-hole championship golf course and driving range.

The controversial proposal angered some citizens, who wished to retain the 36-hole course as it was. Others saw the hospital plan as the best option—providing both an improved golf course and a guarantee that the land would not be turned into a housing development.

Although the hospital had received a certificate of need for its new facility, the Multnomah County Planning Commission reversed its decision in 1972 and denied the hospital a land use permit. Eventually the county agreed to buy the golf course for $3 million—the price the hospital had originally paid for it. Portland Adventist Hospital purchased a new, more accessible site east of the projected Interstate 205 highway.

The groundbreaking for Portland Adventist Medical Center (as the new facility was to be called) took place in 1974. The physicians' office building opened in 1976, followed the next year by the hospital itself. Three ambulance companies provided as a public service 11 ambulances and five wheelchair cars to move patients from the old hospital to the new. "Operation Keep Step" successfully transferred patients, equipment, and staff without seriously interrupting any hospital services. Portland Adventist Medical Center moved 204 beds to the new facility immediately, while 72 remained at the Mount Tabor building until the completion of the hospital's north wing the following year. In 1978 the final phase of construction was completed: a residence hall and classroom building for the Walla Walla College School of Nursing.

The old Portland Adventist Hospital became Portland Adventist Convalescent Center. The old nurses' dorm now serves as an outpatient chemical dependency treatment center. In 1980 the oldest portion of the Mount Tabor facility (the original 1922 sanitarium) was demolished. 1980 also marked the beginning of a new administrative system. Portland Adventist Medical Center joined Adventist Health System/West, which was created by the merger of Northwest Medical Foundation and Adventist Health Services, the managing organization for health-care facilities in the Pacific Union Conference.

By the time Adventist Health System/West was formed, the original VertiCare clinics had become private practice offices. VertiCare had merely been a concept ahead of its time, however. When Portland Adventist Town Center Clinic was started in 1984, it experienced great success. Since that time, the clinic system has changed and grown rapidly, and primary clinics are once again a vital part of Portland Adventist Medical Center's health-care system.

In the early years of the sanitarium, alcoholics, drug addicts, and other "offensive" patients were refused treatment. Today, however, medical professionals attempt to meet the needs of these individuals as well. To increase the cost-effectiveness of these programs, Portland Adventist Medical Center has formed a joint venture corporation with Legacy Health System to manage chemical dependency and behavioral medicine programs.

Because health care involves prevention as well as treatment, Portland Adventist Medical Center devotes a great deal of attention to health education. A new health and medical education center, completed in 1987, provides facilities for educational and screening programs, while the Healthvan brings outreach programs directly to the community.

Helping people to change undesirable habits promotes healthier lifestyles and reduces health-care costs. Health for Life programs emphasize exercise and nutrition, reflecting some of the same concerns as the early Adventist health reformers who promoted natural remedies.

Portland High School

PORTLAND HIGH SCHOOL. An educational institution on the high school level operated by the East Jamaica Conference at Port Antonio, Jamaica, since 1962. In 1969 the school was moved from the Port Antonio Seventh-day Adventist Church to its present site at 16 Rice Piece Road into an old building. Construction and further remodeling were done between 1976 and 1981 to accommodate administrative offices, a library, science laboratory, and additional classrooms.

The school offers courses in commerce, business education, and the sciences leading to the General Certificate of Education of London and Cambridge universities and the Caribbean Examination Certificate examination. Courses are adapted to suit the requirements of denominational schools, and graduates are employed in denominational as well as governmental services and private enterprises.

Principals: L. H. Fletcher (acting), 1962—1963; S. G. Campbell, 1963—1964; E. C. Pryce, 1964—1969; T. Gardner, 1969—1971; Mrs. B. Taffe, 1971—1972; Maynard Brown, 1972—1977; L. Roo McKenzie, 1977—1978; M. Jos. Grant (acting), 1978—1979; A. V. Mayne, 1979—1985; E. H. Thomas (acting), 1985—1986; D. A. Bignall (acting), 1986—1987; F. M. Davis, 1987— .

Portugal

PORTUGAL. A republic in the extreme southwestern section of Europe, in the western part of the Iberian Peninsula. It covers about 36,000 square miles (93,250 square kilometers) and its population (1994) is 10.5 million, mostly Catholic. Lisbon, with a population of about 2 million, situated on the north bank of the river Tagus, and Porto (Oporto), on the bank of the river Douro in the north, with a population of about 1.5 million, are the two largest cities. The Madeira Islands and the Azores, both in the Atlantic, belong to Portugal.

The Portuguese formed an independent kingdom in the middle of the twelfth century. By the end of the Middle Ages they sent numerous exploratory expeditions to all corners of the globe, discovering the Cape of Good Hope, Brazil, and Labrador, and acquiring overseas possessions in Africa, Asia, and South America. From 1580 to 1640, Portugal was joined to Spain, but later reassumed its independence. In 1910 Portugal became a republic.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. The territory of Portugal with the islands of Madeira and the Azores constitutes the Portuguese Union of Churches in the Euro-Africa Division. Statistics (1992): churches, 77; members, 7,450; ordained ministers, 33; licensed ministers, 13; Bible instructors, 4; church or elementary schools, 6; secondary schools, 2; teachers, 38. Headquarters are at Lisbon. Official organ: Revista Adventista.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. The first Seventh-day Adventist minister to visit Portugal appears to have been S. N. Haskell, who stopped there in July 1889, while on his world tour. SDA work in Portugal began in 1904, with the arrival of C. E. Rentfro and his family. Rentfro, a 26-year-old licentiate, had been appointed to go to Spain, but on arrival in London had received a cablegram directing him to proceed to Portugal instead. Without knowing the language, the family settled in Caxias, about eight miles (13 kilometers) from Lisbon. In 1906 Ernesto Schwantes, an ordained minister, arrived with his family from Brazil. While waiting at Lisbon before proceeding to his destination, which was Porto, he conducted the first SDA baptism in Portugal on Sept. 21, 1906. The candidates consisted of two men and two women, who were baptized at the seashore at Carcavelos, about 12 miles (20 kilometers) from Lisbon. The service was held at night because one of the candidates was a minor and feared opposition. The following day, Sept. 22, 1906, the first SDA meeting hall in Lisbon was opened by the celebration of the Lord's Supper. Later Schwantes and Rentfro went north to Porto, where they rented a hall and by means of selling and distributing publications interested a half dozen people. In 1907 the first converts in the north were baptized in the sea near Espinho. They were Dias Gomes and his wife—parents of A. Dias Gomes, a later president of the Portuguese Union—and a young man, João de Sá Pereira do Lago, who became the first colporteur in Portugal. By the middle of 1912 these two groups had become two churches with a total of 53 members.

Organization and Growth. After Schwantes and his family returned to Brazil, Rentfro was ordained to the ministry in 1907 in Switzerland, and in the 1913 Yearbook he appears as the first director of the Portuguese Mission, with Paul Meyer, from Switzerland (who had come as a licentiate in 1911), as the second minister. In 1917 Meyer is listed as mission director. In 1924 the beautiful Seventh-day Adventist church, Templo Adventista, was built on Rua Joaquim Bonifacio in Lisbon. The headquarters offices were installed in the same building, and in 1935 a church school was opened. In 1924 the Portuguese Publishing House was established. After J. C. Guenin, a Swiss, H. W. Lowe, a Britisher, and H. F. Neumann, an American, had served successively as directors, A. Dias Gomes, a national, became the director in 1933. On May 26, 1935, the Portuguese Mission was raised to the status of a conference, under A. Dias Gomes as president and Pedro B. Ribeiro as secretary-treasurer.

Until 1926 Portugal had been a part of the Latin Union Conference. From then until 1939 it was joined to the Iberian Union Mission. On Sept. 21, 1939, the Portuguese Union Mission was organized, with A. J. Girou, of France, as president, and P. B. Ribeiro as secretary-treasurer. It incorporated the Portuguese Conference and the Madeira Islands Mission, the Azores Islands Mission, the Cape Verde Islands Mission, and the St. Thomas Island Mission. St. Thomas Island became a part of the Angola Union in 1959. In February 1941 A. D. Gomes became president of the union, followed by Ernesto Ferreira (1950—1957), Pedro Ribeiro (1958), Armando Casaca (1959—1969), and again Ernesto Ferreira (1969—1974). In January 1972 the Portuguese field became a mission in the newly organized Southern European Union Mission. Ernesto Ferreira was president from 1972 to 1975. In 1976 the field became a conference. Antonio Baião was president from 1976 to 1977. He was followed by Ernesto Ferreira (1977—1979), Joaquim Morgado (1979—1992), and Joaquim Dias (1992—). In 1982 the Portuguese Conference became the Portuguese Union of Churches.

Three papers are published monthly: Revista Adventista, a church paper; Nosso Amiguinho (“Our Little Friend”); and Saude e Lar, the health paper. An evangelistic magazine, Sinais dos Tempos (“Signs of the Times”) is published every three months.

A Bible correspondence school has been operating since Apr. 15, 1948, and is presently offering three different courses, two on Bible subjects and one on health. A 15-minute radio program, A Voz da Esperança, is broadcast over 30 different stations covering the Portuguese mainland and the nearby islands. Combined with other local broadcasts, the SDA message is on the radio for an hour and a quarter each day.

Portuguese Publishing House

PORTUGUESE PUBLISHING HOUSE (Publicadora Atlântico, S.A.). A publishing house without printing plant, situated in Lisbon, Portugal, and operated by the Portuguese Union of Churches. Formally established in 1924, it was first called Sociedade Internacional de Tratados (“The International Tract Society”), later Sociedade Filantrópica Adventista (“The Adventist Philanthropic Society”). Its present name was adopted in 1941. It now maintains a reserve stock valuing $382,550. The total retail sales in 1992 was $219,322.

Because of the extraordinary growth of the publishing work in the Portuguese fields, the publishing house was moved in 1968 to new installations in Sacavem, on the outskirts of Lisbon. In 1993 a new property near Sintra was purchased for the purpose of building a new publishing house there.

Seventh-day Adventist publications were issued in Portugal long before the present publishing house existed. The first SDA book published there was O Preceptor da Bíblia no Lar (“The Family Bible Teacher”), containing 124 pages, brought out in 1907. It was composed of 28 Bible studies that had previously appeared in pamphlet form.

Since then more than 150 works on health and doctrine have been published, among which are the following translations of works by Ellen White: Saúde do Espírito (excerpts from The Ministry of Healing); Aos Pés de Cristo (“Steps to Christ”), three editions of O Conflito dos Séculos (“The Great Controversy”); and O Desejado de Todas as Nações (“The Desire of Ages”). The last two, in their first editions, were made possible by Lidia Madsen, a Portuguese-born American residing in California. Many pamphlets on a variety of subjects have also been published.

The oldest Seventh-day Adventist journal to be published in Portugal was Os Sinais dos Tempos (“The Signs of the Times”). The first few numbers came out without a date and occasional issues appeared between 1911 and 1915. It was published again, somewhat irregularly, with the subtitle of Revista Profética Portuguesa (Portuguese Signs of the Times) during the years 1923—1925. From 1980 it has been printed on a regular quarterly basis. In 1986 a new children’s magazine, Nosso Amiguinho (“Our Little Friend”) began to be printed on a monthly basis.

The house at present publishes the adult Sabbath School Lesson Quarterly and Teachers’ Quarterly, also a teenagers’, primary, kindergarten, and cradle roll lesson quarterly along with the Revista Adventista, and Saúde e Lar.

The Revista Adventista, since 1940 the monthly organ of the Portuguese Union, originated as Mensageiro do Advento (“Advent Messenger”), issued 1932—1937 (21 numbers), then appeared in three numbers under the present title in 1938 and 1939. In 1942 the magazine Saúde e Lar (“Home and Health”) was first printed. It appeared every three months at first, then bimonthly, and since 1953 it has appeared every month. In 1993 the circulation of Revista Adventista was 2,000; Saúde e Lar, 25,000; Nosso Amiguinho, 27,000; and Sinais dos Tempos, 55,000. At that time the publishing house was supplying Angola, Mozambique, Cape Verdet, and São Tomé with published materials.

History

History. Beginnings of the Work in the Area. Perhaps the earliest attempt to propagate the Seventh-day Adventist faith in the area of the Potomac Conference occurred in 1873, when Richard Asbury, a Seventh-day Adventist Virginian, returning to Westmoreland County from Wisconsin on a visit, lent SDA books and tracts to friends and relatives. He also offered to pay the expenses of an SDA minister to visit Virginia, but there seems to have been no response.

About the same time, in the Shenandoah Valley certain residents received SDA publications from their relative, Isaac Zirkle, who in 1860 had moved to Indiana and had accepted the SDA faith during meetings held by E. B. and S. H. Lane. Interest developed to the point where some of those who had read the publications asked for one of the Lane brothers to come to Virginia.

E. B. Lane responded and with his wife, Ellen, and J. O. Corliss arrived in New Market in January 1876. They held their first meeting in the Oak Shade rural schoolhouse, their second in Polytechnic Hall in New Market, then obtained the use of a small chapel in the rural community of Soliloquy. Brock, a grocer, secured for them Smith's Creek Methodist Church, in which they also held meetings. They won several converts and received urgent calls to conduct meetings in other places. In the fall they preached for seven weeks in Leaksville, Page County, then visited in homes in nearby towns. In the spring of 1877, when meetings were continued at Mount Zion, Page County, 25 accepted the SDA faith. The meetings in Shenandoah County drew the attention of Blacks as well as Whites.

During the first two years of their ministry in Virginia, Lane and Corliss, like many others who preached in those days, were self-supporting. Some of their meetings at first were conducted in groves: later they obtained a tent. Mrs. Lane assisted in the meetings by giving talks on health and temperance, sometimes to audiences of from 500 to 650.

In Dayton, Rockingham County, tent meetings resulted in the conversion of J.W.S. Miller and his wife, who, when they began observing the Sabbath, closed two stores on that day—one in Dayton and the other in Pendleton County, West Virginia. In Page County a Methodist minister was baptized, with six other people. Disfellowshipped by his church, he preached the SDA faith in that area.

Meetings were conducted also in Mount Jackson, Harrisonburg, Winchester, Woodstock, Quicksburg, Rileyville, and Luray. Converts were organized in companies, in Sabbath schools, and later in churches in a few localities.

One of Corliss' converts several years later played an important part in the beginnings of the work in Washington, D.C. As Corliss afterward related it: He was entertained overnight in a small mountain town in the Shenandoah Valley by "a gentleman who kept a general store," and who found him a vacant storeroom to preach in. At this first meeting, his host, Reuben Wright, and several other men sat in front with revolvers to protect the preacher, if necessary, because a mob had recently tarred and feathered a Mormon preacher.

When Corliss left his room the next morning, his host, not entirely sure of the new preacher's mission, opened Corliss' saddlebags, which were full of papers for distribution, with the intention of investigating the contents. But he got no farther than the tract lying on top, entitled Seven Reasons for Sunday-Keeping Examined. His interest was arrested. He read the tract through, and being convinced by its arguments, went into his store, mounted a nail keg, and read the entire tract to the crowd of men gathered there. Thereafter he closed his store on the Sabbath.

In time he sold out and in 1884 went to Washington (at the invitation of the headquarters Tract Society) to open colporteur work there. Afterward he helped to support the mission established there in 1886 (see the section below on the District of Columbia).

The first Seventh-day Adventist church in Virginia was organized in the Soliloquy schoolhouse, near New Market, on the second Sabbath of 1877. Because only an incomplete record was kept, the church was reorganized in April 1879 and was still the only organized church in the state. I. Sanborn, a minister assigned by the General Conference to work in Virginia, reported 25 to 30 members with a comfortable house of worship. The Soliloquy church, meeting at times in the Liberty church, near Quicksburg, later became known as the Quicksburg church. Eventually established in New Market, it became the New Market church.

After visiting the Soliloquy church, Sanborn held a six-week series of meetings at Marksville and left 28 adherents. On Oct. 30, 1879, a church was organized at Marksville, which eventually became the Stanley church. The church building, erected at Stanley in 1887, is still in use for youth meetings. A new church building was dedicated in 1991.

The early evangelists met with the local groups each quarter in order to strengthen the new converts. As the members of the church would come together from mountain and valley for a long weekend meeting, time was devoted to study, a sermon, and a testimony meeting on the Sabbath, then on Sunday the tithe was received and reports were given of missionary work done.

Virginia Conference Organized. On Mar. 4, 1883, at Quicksburg, in the Shenandoah Valley, the Virginia Conference was organized. J. O. Corliss presided, and A. C. Neff, of Quicksburg, an 1876 convert and the first SDA minister ordained in Virginia, was elected conference president. At that time the conference had 86 members and three churches.

That summer a camp meeting was held at Valley View Spring, one and a half miles (2.5 kilometers) east of New Market, at which I. D. Van Horn, from Michigan, and George I. Butler, the General Conference president, were present. There were 150 SDAs in attendance, with the Sunday audience numbering 1,000 to 1,500.

The second camp meeting was held Aug. 5—12, 1884, at the Neff farm, about five miles (eight kilometers) north of New Market. To accommodate visitors, excursion trains stopped at Neff's Crossing. S. N. Haskell and S. H. Lane, from Battle Creek, Michigan, were present. In 1886 the camp meeting was held in Luray, in 1887, one mile (1.6 kilometers) from Harrisonburg, and in 1888 near Woodstock, where 2,000 were reported in attendance on Sunday, coming by special excursion trains. By the end of 1889 the membership of the conference had grown to 520, with five ministers and 14 churches.

Early in 1887 R. D. Hottel was appointed state agent (canvassing) for subscription books, and gave instruction to beginning colporteurs in the growing conference. Later Charles Zirkle was assigned to go to the New England Conference for two or three months to learn canvassing methods. In 1892 there were 10 colporteurs in Virginia. In 1914 S. G. Burley, upon introducing work in Sussex County, won an entire Russian Baptist congregation to the Seventh-day Adventist faith.

The headquarters of the Virginia Conference and the Tract Society were in Richmond from 1894 to 1900, and then were moved to New Market. In 1894 the conference printed a little paper, Virginia Messenger. In early 1901 the Virginia Conference became a constituent of the new Eastern Union Conference, renamed that year the Atlantic Union Conference.

District of Columbia and Maryland Suburbs. The work in the Washington, D.C., area is discussed here because in 1924 this area united with Virginia to form the Potomac Conference. In 1876 D. M. Canright, on his way to Baltimore, found two families in Washington who were active in distributing tracts. In 1880 I. Sanborn, while spending a week in Washington, found three members and baptized two more. Four years later Reuben Wright distributed publications there, held Bible studies, and after some months reported two converts. But no permanent work was begun until two years later.

In January 1886 Willard H. Saxby, a Vermonter, and his wife, a Bible instructor who had been one of the first converts in Kentucky, were assigned to Washington. Assisted also by Charles Parmele and his sister Julia, of Illinois, and others, including apprentice Bible instructors from time to time, Saxby operated what was called a city mission at 1831 Vermont Avenue NW.

This building, a “row house” with a “double parlor” that served as a “lecture room,” provided living quarters for the personnel, who numbered as many as seven. They sold books and periodicals from house to house to cover running expenses. (Actually Wright, the original colporteur, kept the mission solvent by paying for the publications.) They followed up their sales with visits, Bible studies, and invitations to their Sabbath meetings.

In the first three months they gave 297 Bible studies and gained one convert. In two years they had a Sabbath school of 46, which, having outgrown the parlor, met in Claybaugh Hall, 1630 14th Street NW. In three years they had a church of 26 charter members, which was organized Feb. 24, 1889, by J. O. Corliss, who had come to Washington to present petitions to Congress against the Blair religious legislation.

Other significant events occurred in 1889. In January several denominational leaders, including S. N. Haskell, A. T. Jones, and Ellen White, visited Washington. In February Corliss spoke before a Congressional Committee on the Blair Christian Amendment bill. Also in February the mission was moved from Vermont Avenue to a Southeast site near the Capitol. There, in March, a council of leaders from Battle Creek planned the formation of the Atlantic Conference (organized September 1889), which included the District of Columbia until 1899. Under the new arrangement, it was decided to close the mission, and the Saxbys left in August. The church then had a membership of 41.

J. S. Washburn and Charles L. Taylor held several series of evangelistic meetings in 1890. Hopes were entertained for a time of soliciting general contributions to build a representative church building, commensurate with the importance of its being situated in the nation’s capital. However, in 1893 a small church building was purchased on 8th Street NE., between F and G streets.

This church’s congregation originally had both White and Black members, the latter eventually predominating more than three to one. In the spring of 1902 both a White and a Black evangelist (J. S. Washburn and L. C. Sheafe, respectively) were sent to hold meetings; and in the autumn, because of the difficulty of reaching the White population in a segregated city, some of the leaders advised the establishment of separate congregations.

Thus the Second Seventh-day Adventist Church of Washington was organized by J. S. Washburn with about 40 members on Sept. 22, while the First church retained the majority of the members, including some Whites, and the 8th Street building, with Sheafe as pastor.

In November the Second church purchased a former Methodist church building in Northwest Washington, on M Street at 12th. This building was deemed an adequate fulfillment of the hope for “a memorial for God” in the capital from which contacts might be made with men whose influence extended far (thus it became known as the Memorial church); hence, general contributions were solicited in the Review and Herald. As a result, it was paid for in one year. The third church in Washington was another Black church, established the next year. (This church, not now in existence, was replaced in 1917 by the Ephesus church, which, along with the First church, became part of the Allegheny Conference in 1945.)

After the Review and Herald fire in Battle Creek, Michigan, Dec. 30, 1902, the General Conference and the Review and Herald Publishing Association were moved to Washington, D.C. They occupied temporary offices at 222 North Capitol Street, in a building that overlooked the Capitol grounds, until the new headquarters and publishing house were built in suburban Takoma Park (inside the District of Columbia), and a school (now Columbia Union College) and the Washington Sanitarium (now Washington Adventist Hospital) were established across the line in Takoma Park, Maryland. The churches in the District of Columbia and Takoma Park during this period were assigned to the administration of the General Conference, and were not a part of any conference or union.

After the institutional personnel began to move to the new denominational headquarters, the fourth church in the Washington area was established in suburban Takoma Park in 1904. Two other churches soon grew up, one in connection with the college and later, another with the sanitarium.

In 1909, after six years of General Conference administration, the churches in the District of Columbia and the neighboring counties in Maryland and Virginia were organized into the District of Columbia Conference and made a part of the Columbia Union Conference, which had been separated from the Atlantic Union Conference in 1907. The new conference included Washington (the District of Columbia), the Maryland counties of Montgomery and Prince Georges, and six counties in Virginia. It was enlarged the next year by five more Virginia counties and two more in Maryland (later relinquished). Headquarters at first were in Takoma Park, then in various places in Washington; then again in Takoma Park. During the years that the District of Columbia Conference existed, new churches sprang up in the suburban areas, but a plan of establishing numerous small congregations in the city of Washington was not realized. At the end of that period there were only three churches in the city—two Black and one White—although briefly there had been a fourth, the Capitol Hill church (established 1915), which in December 1923 had united with the Memorial church in the purchase of a building in downtown Washington to be renovated for the combined Capitol-Memorial (later spelled Capital Memorial) church. Not until much later came the addition of the Pennsylvania Avenue church in Southeast Washington (1944) and the Washington Spanish church, near Takoma Park (1957). For a while a racially mixed congregation called Brotherhood existed in the southeast part of the city. Currently there are five churches in the District of Columbia.

Potomac Conference Organized. After the Virginia Conference lost many of its counties to the District of Columbia Conference, the reduction in membership, tithes, and offerings made it difficult for it to keep out of debt. However, in April 1924 the Virginia Conference (with a membership of 677) and the District of Columbia Conference (with 1,523) were combined to form the Potomac Conference, with 2,200 members, 33 churches, and 14 ministers.

A few minor changes were noted in the 1927 Yearbook: the Potomac Conference returned Prince Georges, Charles, and St. Marys counties in Maryland to the Chesapeake Conference, retaining Montgomery County, Maryland. Then the Virginia Conference transferred Accomac (1924) and Northampton (1928) counties on Virginia's "eastern shore" (the tip of the peninsula east of Chesapeake Bay) to the Chesapeake Conference. Other minor changes in the Potomac-Chesapeake boundary were made from time to time after 1950, but in 1957 the boundaries listed at the beginning of this article were established. The transfer of the Black congregations to their newly organized Allegheny Conference in 1945 reduced the membership of the Potomac Conference by nearly 1,000.

The Potomac Conference headquarters remained in Takoma Park for 30 years, then moved in 1955 to Staunton, Virginia, to the Gaymont Estate, purchased at a cost of $46,000. The property included 12 acres (five hectares) of land, a large dwelling, and a three-car garage. Both the dwelling and the second story of the garage were converted into offices and 10 brick dwellings were built nearby for the staff. In 1980 the house was demolished, and in 1981 conference headquarters began operating from a new three-story office building.

The conference operates one boarding school, Shenandoah Valley Academy, New Market, Virginia (established 1908), which has grown with the years, and one day school, Takoma Academy, Takoma Park, Maryland, originally a part of Columbia Union College; since the fall of 1952, it has occupied a new building.

A 200-acre (80-hectare) youth camp was purchased in 1956, at a cost of $11,500, near Montebello, Virginia, in a secluded spot in the Blue Ridge Mountains. In 1976 an additional 74 acres (30 hectares) of adjoining land was purchased. The current facilities include 22 deluxe cabins, a dining hall, an eight-unit motel, two newly renovated meeting buildings, and a 20-stall barn with arena and grandstands. The beautiful setting is enhanced by the Tye River, which flows through the grounds, a five-acre (two-hectare) lake for canoeing, and a number of hiking trails. All buildings are winterized and the main roads and parking area are hard surfaced, as Camp Blue Ridge is used throughout the year by more than 5,000 guests.

Camp meetings are held on the campus of Shenandoah Valley Academy in New Market, Virginia, where permanent camp-meeting housing is available. To replace tents, the first of several 60-unit buildings was erected for the camp meeting of 1963, and by 1969 a total of 244 units were available for campers. Trailer hookup facilities and a camp store are also located on the camp meeting grounds.

A new Adventist Book Center was built in 1961 in Takoma Park. With sales of more than $6 million in 1993, it is the world's largest ABC. The Dorcas Welfare Societies have 11 active welfare centers in the conference.

The Potomac Conference also has in its territory, besides those listed at the beginning of this article, privately owned enterprises, including 16 nursing and retirement facilities, eight day-care centers, rest homes, and two hospitals.

Prayer

PRAYER. An approach to the Deity in which people worship God, acknowledge mercies received, express their desires, confess their sins, submit their will to God, and seek grace to live in harmony with God's will. God, in return, impresses their minds with assurance, truth, and duty. Prayer recognizes the sovereignty of God and the insufficiency of human beings.

Prayer does not change God; but it does change us and conditions us to cooperate more effectively with Him. It does not persuade Him to do, at our request, that which He would otherwise be reluctant to do, or which His infinite wisdom sees is not best. It does, however, place us in the channel of divine blessing, and in that frame of mind in which God can work in us and for us. It brings us into partnership with Him in working out His infinite purpose in us and through us.

Prayer is the arm “by which the human suppliant lays hold on the power of Infinite Love,” which brings man into harmony with God (GW 259). “Prayer does not bring God down to us, but brings us up to Him” (SC 93). In order to be effective, prayer must be sincere, earnest, intelligent, and persevering. Jesus counseled His disciples that they “ought always to pray, and not to faint” (Luke 18:1), and admonished them, “Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation” (Matt. 26:41). He Himself often communed with His heavenly Father in prayer.

“Prayer is the breath of the soul” (GW 254), and is as essential to spiritual life as breath is to physical health. Neglect of prayer results in spiritual anemia. Those who come to God must do so with a sincere heart. They must sense their own need (Isa. 44:3), confess and forsake all known sin (Prov. 15:29), believe that God can and will answer (Mark 11:24), and be right with others (Matt. 6:14, 15). On prayer for healing, see Healing, Faith.

Seventh-day Adventists believe that private devotions, including prayer, are essential to a successful Christian experience, as daily family prayer is to the life of a Christian home. Public prayer brings a congregation corporately into the presence of God. In Bible times various postures were taken in prayer. For example, Hannah stood (1 Sam. 1:26); David sat (2 Sam. 7:18); Elijah threw himself on the ground, placed his head between his knees (1 Kings 18:42); Solomon (2 Chron. 16:13) and Daniel (Dan. 6:10) knelt. Seventh-day Adventists follow the practice of kneeling in prayer, whenever possible, as an appropriate gesture of submission and reverence. Kneeling in prayer is strongly encouraged in the writings of Ellen White (MYP 251; 2SM 311—316; etc.).

Preble, Thomas M.

PREBLE, THOMAS M. (1810—1907). Author, scholar, Free Will Baptist minister of New Hampshire, and Millerite preacher. He was born in Anson, Maine, and in due time became a preacher and pastor. On Nov. 14, 1837, he married Helen M. Eaton, a farm girl from Weare, New Hampshire. While serving a Free Will Baptist church in Nashua, New Hampshire, he was brought into contact with William Miller. From that day he became a devout student of prophecy, and later a lifelong advocate of the “blessed hope.” On Feb. 15, 1842, he was excommunicated from the church in Nashua for his Advent preaching activities. In September 1842 Preble was one of the speakers at a camp meeting in eastern Maine attended by young James White. He accepted the Sabbath in the middle of 1844 (perhaps from Mrs. Rachel Oakes or someone else in Washington, New Hampshire). He was the first Adventist to advocate the Sabbath in print. His article in the Hope of Israel (an Adventist periodical of Portland, Maine) of Feb. 28, 1845, was reprinted in tract form in March under the title Tract, Showing That the Seventh Day Should Be Observed As the Sabbath. This tract led to the conversion of seven families in Paris, Maine. Among those were the Edward Andrews (father of J. N. Andrews) family, the Stowell family, Cyprian Stevens’ family, including the two young women who afterward became Mrs. J. N. Andrews and Mrs. Uriah Smith. It also introduced the seventh-day Sabbath to Joseph Bates, who later wrote his own tract on the Sabbath. But Preble observed the seventh day only until the middle of 1847. It is thought that this was because he considered the Sabbath only a subject of academic discussion and continued his connection with non-Sabbathkeeping churches and leaders. In later years he wrote against the Sabbath in the Advent Herald and World’s Crisis (Advent Christian papers) and against Ellen White and Seventh-day Adventists in general in the Advent-Christian Times. These articles were answered by such men as Uriah Smith, J. H. Waggoner, and J. N. Andrews. Preble seemed to try his hardest to cancel out the good he had earlier done the church, finally writing his book First-Day Sabbath. His wife died while he was writing the book. In 1872, while J. N. Andrews was answering Preble’s arguments, Mrs. Andrews died. Preble’s ministry covered a period of about 70 years. An Advent Christian historian writes, “He was earnest in spirit and full of faith till the last.”

Preceptor

PRECEPTOR. In early Seventh-day Adventist usage, the equivalent of a dean.

Predestination

PREDESTINATION. In the biblical sense, the divine provision for humanity's redemption, foreordained in eternal ages prior to Creation, and the divine desire that all human beings should be saved; in the popular, Calvinistic sense, a supposed divine decree fore-ordaining particular individuals to eternal salvation, and all others to eternal punishment. In Calvinist theology the former is known as election and the latter as reprobation. Seventh-day Adventists accept the biblical definition and deny the validity of the Calvinistic interpretation.

It is commonly accepted by Seventh-day Adventists that God has perfect foreknowledge of all events—past, present, and future. Foreseeing the defection of Lucifer and of our first parents, He devised the plan of salvation, which provided that Christ should become a substitute for guilty humanity (John 3:16; 1 Peter 1:19, 20) and that His grace should be offered freely to all (Titus 2:11; 2 Tim. 1:9). It is God's will that all should accept the pardon offered and the gift of eternal life (1 Tim. 2:3, 4; 2 Peter 3:9; Eze. 33:11).

As a result of his sin, Adam passed on to his posterity a sinful nature, including both the tendency to sin and the natural results of sin. With sin came death (Rom. 5:12), but Christ died that humans might live (John 3:16; Rom. 5:18). On the cross He provided salvation for all, as a free gift; He now invites all to accept the gift, and gives it to all who do accept it (John 1:12; Eph. 2:8; Rev. 22:17). That free will is the determining factor in an individual's personal destiny is evident from the fact that God continually presents the results of obedience and disobedience, and urges the sinner to choose obedience and life (Deut. 30:19; Joshua 24:15; Isa. 1:16, 20; Rev. 22:17); and from the fact that it is possible for the believer, having once been a recipient of grace, to fall away and be lost (1 Cor. 9:27; Gal. 5:4; Heb. 6:4—6; 10:29). See Evil, Origin of; Humanity, Doctrine of; Perseverance.

God may foresee each individual choice that will be made, but His foreknowledge does not determine what that choice shall be. The basic fallacy of Calvinist theology with respect to predestination is that it altogether ignores the consistent and repeated affirmations of Scripture concerning the validity and effectiveness of human choice as the determining factor in each person's salvation. Bible predestination consists in the effective purpose of God that all who choose to believe in Christ shall be saved (John 1:12; Eph. 1:4—10).

In the early Christian centuries, Tatian (c. A.D. 160), Irenaeus (c. A.D. 130—c. 200), and Tertullian (c. A.D. 160—c. 220) taught the doctrine of free will. Origen (c. A.D. 185—c. 254) was an earnest foe of the doctrine of unconditional predestination. In the sixteenth century Zwingli, Luther, and Calvin accepted predestination as earlier taught by Augustine. Arminius (1560—1609) reacted against Calvinism and taught conditional predestination, placing the emphasis on faith. With respect to predestination, Seventh-day Adventists are, in a general sense, in the Arminian tradition.

The Seventh-day Adventist understanding of predestination was ably set forth by Uriah Smith, who, writing as editor of the Review and Herald, remarked: "That the Bible teaches predestination is true; that it teaches what modern theology defines the term to mean, we think is not true. As set forth in the Scriptures, it is a doctrine full of comfort and consolation; as taught in the creeds, it is full of spiritual paralysis and despair. In the Scriptures it is the assurance of salvation so long as we maintain a certain relation to God; in theology it is a relationship determined for us independently of our own will, and a fixed destiny to a life which we cannot lose, or a death which we cannot avert” (Review and Herald 61:264, Apr. 22, 1884).

Ten years earlier Smith had written: “If a person believes in the Lord, while he believes in Him, he is elected; but he can believe or not as he chooses, and he can cease to believe whenever he is so disposed. He is not elected till he believes, and when he ceases to believe, his election ends” (ibid. 43:85, Feb. 24, 1874).

In 1893 Smith wrote: “Predestination is taught in the Bible; but that predestination is all in Christ. Whoever is in Christ, and remains in Him to the end, is sure to be saved. It is impossible for such an one to be lost; but no one, as an individual, is predestined to be in Christ; that is left to the choice and decision of every one for himself” (ibid. 70:24, Jan. 10, 1893).

In a discussion of the subject, M. E. Cornell wrote: “We believe that God did from the beginning decree that all who would obey Him should be saved, and that those who would not should be lost; but he left man perfectly free to make his own election. . . .

“Each individual must decide his own destiny, God having only predestinated and decreed that whoever would do His will should be saved, and that whoever would not should be lost. And in harmony with this general decree, man is exhorted to give all diligence to make his own election sure (2 Peter 1:10). If, therefore, any are lost, it is not because it was so decreed or willed by any but themselves; for God wills that all men should be saved” (ibid. 54:171, Nov. 27, 1879).

Premillennialism

PREMILLENNIALISM. The doctrine that the Second Advent precedes the millennium; this in contrast both to postmillennialism, which teaches that the Advent follows the millennium, and to amillennialism, which makes the “thousand years” a mere figurative expression, referring either to Christ’s kingdom in this age or to no specific time at all. Seventh-day Adventists are premillennialists in the literal original sense of holding that the Advent precedes the millennium, but not in the sense in which the term is now commonly understood, as explained below.

I. Two Schools of Premillennialism in the Nineteenth Century

I. Two Schools of Premillennialism in the Nineteenth Century. The early nineteenth-century British premillennialists were called “Literalists” in contrast to the then-dominant postmillennialists, who “spiritualized” the millennial reign of Christ into the triumph of the church and the gospel (also of righteousness and social betterment) in this world. In America the “Adventists” (or “Millerites”) regarded the Old World Literalists as brethren in “the cause of the Second Advent near,” and as “doing a great and good work, in vindicating the coming of the Lord at hand” (see SB, no. 894) in a common protest against the postmillennialist view that put the Advent a thousand, if not 365,000, years in the future. It was for this message of the “Advent near,” and not for their teachings about the events connected with the Advent, that these Literalists—such as Irving, Wolff, and Lacunza—have been referred to as giving “the advent message” (see, for example, GC 359—363).

But apart from this, between the Adventists and the other premillennialists lay a great gulf that was not apparent at first (SB, Nos. 894, 896, 1085). The two groups differed sharply as to how the prophecies relating to the Second Advent were to be fulfilled in history:

1. Literalists. The literalist type of premillennialists expected Christ to set up on a partly renovated earth a millennial kingdom, a literal kingdom in which the OT prophecies concerning Israel would be fulfilled to the literal Jews as God’s chosen people and as the rulers and evangelizers of the nations. In this kingdom the probation of most of the world would continue; sin and death would exist, though held in check under the “iron-rod” rule of Christ; and rebellion would finally break out at the end of the period. (There were and are differences in details, among the premillennialists of the literalist type, as to the relation between the Jews and the redeemed and between the immortalized saints and the inhabitants of the earthly kingdom.) These doctrines have since developed and proliferated into the present-day futurist and dispensationalist systems.

2. Adventists (the Millerites). William Miller and his colleagues rejected the “temporal” and “Judaizing” aspects of the literalist millennium. The contrast is clearly outlined by Josiah Litch, a leading Millerite writer, in the following extract. After distinguishing the Adventists from the postmillennialists, who “believe in the universal spiritual reign of Christ a thousand years, before his second personal advent,” he separates them from the Literalist premillennialists, whom he calls Millennarians (sic): “The Millennarians believe in the premillennial advent of Christ, and his personal reign for a thousand years before the consummation or end of the present world, . . . while the Adventists believe the end of the world or age, the destruction of the wicked, the dissolution of the earth, the renovation of nature, and the descent of the New Jerusalem, will be at the beginning of the thousand years. The Millennarians believe in the return of the Jews, as such, either before, at, or after the advent of Christ, to Palestine, to possess that land a thousand years, while the Adventists believe that . . . Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, with all their natural seed who have been of the faith of Abraham, together with all pious Gentiles, will stand up together, to enjoy an eternal inheritance, instead of possessing Canaan for a thousand years.

What set off the Millerites from all their contemporaries was not date setting, for others also set dates (some even looked to 1843, 1844, or 1847); it was the Millerites’ expectation that the Second Advent would bring “the end of the world” and leave only the glorified saints alive. The other premillennialists (as did the postmillennialists) expected a continuation of probation, of sin, of mortality, throughout the millennium.

That basic cleavage was continued and even increased in the difference between the SDAs (who are heirs of the Millerites) and the present descendants of the nineteenth-century Literalists—the modern interdenominational premillennialists, whose teachings have become overwhelmingly futurist and largely dispensationalist (see definition of terms below).

II. Modern Classes of Premillennialism

II. Modern Classes of Premillennialism. The earlier premillennialists in general, as well as the Millerites in particular, were historicists; that is, they held that the fulfillments of Bible prophecy, including those of Revelation, were to be seen in the course of history, from Bible times to the end. This was actually the view of the infant church; thus the early Christians were historicists even though, standing at the very beginning of Christian history, they necessarily looked to the future for most of the fulfillments.

The full-blown futurist view declares that the fulfillments of the majority of the prophecies, including those of the antichrist, the beast, the three-and-one-half times of persecution, et cetera, will occur in the future, at the very end of the age, and that the whole Christian Era is an interim period without prophetic fulfillment. While the Adventists remained historicists, the British premillennialists (Literalists) gradually adopted futurism. By the beginning of the twentieth century most premillennialists in the various churches, at least in Britain and America, were futurists; in recent decades the most vocal segment, if not the majority, have been futurists of the dispensationalist and pretribulationist variety.

The dispensationalist premillennialists hold to an extreme separation between “dispensations,” by which they designate successive periods in the history of the world. Among the seven periods they make the “church age” a dispensation of grace, in which the law of God is deemed to be inoperative—an interim period, or “parenthesis,” between an earlier Jewish age of law and a future Jewish dispensation. They expect the Mosaic code, civil and ceremonial, to be in effect in a future Jewish kingdom, which will be a world rule over the “nations” during the millennium.

The dispensationalists also hold a pretribulationist view of the Second Advent, that is, they expect the “rapture,” or taking up, of the saints (the church) from the earth to precede the tribulation under a yet future antichrist. They expect the antichrist to be a tyrant who will persecute the Jews (not the Christians) during the literal three and one-half years, the second half of the supposedly delayed seventieth week. Then, seven years after the “rapture,” they expect the visible return of Christ. Not all these views are held by all futurists, yet there is a widespread impression that these doctrines are part and parcel of all premillennialism. Hence they have sometimes been mistakenly attributed to Seventh-day Adventists.

III. Seventh-day Adventists as Premillennialists

III. Seventh-day Adventists as Premillennialists. SDAs are premillennialists only in the literal, chronological meaning of the word—that they expect the Second Advent before the millennium. They agree with the earlier Adventist (Millerite) view that the coming of Christ ends the world as we know it and that the millennium pertains only to the redeemed, glorified, and immortalized saints; but they hold that this reign of the saints is in heaven, not on earth. See Millennium.

Prescott College

PRESCOTT COLLEGE (formerly Prospect Central School; Adelaide Adventist High School). A coeducational day school on the senior high school level, owned and operated by the South Australian Conference and situated on Koonga Avenue, Prospect, South Australia. It is administered by a school board. Students are able to study for the South Australian Certificate of Education in both publicly examined subjects and school assessed subjects.

The school began in 1906 as a primary school of 15 pupils at the rear of the church on Ballville Street, Prospect, taught by Mrs. H. M. Blunden (née Nellie Mountain). Proceeds from the sale of Ellen White's book Christ's Object Lessons aided in financing the school. In 1936 the school was moved to its present site, where a new building provided two large, well-lighted rooms. The same year P. N. Sheppard, headmaster, introduced studies at the high school level. After a sharp increase in enrollment, two more classrooms were added in 1948, and the high school work, discontinued during the war years, was reintroduced by A. H. Dawson. In the statistical report it is listed as a 12-grade school first in 1952.

In 1955 a woodwork unit was erected. In 1972 a new two-story high school block with office, library, science laboratory, and four classrooms was opened. In 1974 the primary department moved to a new location and a school chapel was built. In 1980 a two-story addition was built. In 1991 the names of all Seventh-day Adventist schools in Adelaide were changed to include the title "Prescott."

Prescott, Sara F. Sanders

PRESCOTT, SARA F. SANDERS (1856—1910). Educator. Married to W. W. Prescott, she studied at Harvard University. She was closely associated with her husband's work at Battle Creek and was a close friend of Ellen White's.

Prescott, William Warren

PRESCOTT, WILLIAM WARREN (1855—1944). Educator and administrator. His parents were Millerites in New England. He was educated at South Berwick Academy, Maine, and Dartmouth College, where he graduated in 1877. He taught Latin and Greek while still in his last year in the academy, and was principal of high schools in Northfield and Montpelier, Vermont, from 1877 to 1880. Leaving the teaching work, he published, with his brother, the Biddeford, Maine, Journal, and then for five years he owned and edited the Montpelier State Republican.

With his acceptance of the presidency of Battle Creek College (1885—1894), he entered upon a career unique in many respects in Seventh-day Adventist history. While still president of Battle Creek College, he helped found Union College and became its first president in 1891. He appointed principals for the two institutions to act while he was absent from one or the other. Then late in 1892 he assumed the presidency of the newly founded Walla Walla College. Thus, he was simultaneously president of three colleges in that year. He also organized the first SDA teachers' institute, which met for six weeks in 1891.

Because of his reputation as a biblical scholar, he was called upon to make a world tour (1894—1895) to hold Bible institutes, as well as to strengthen developing educational interests. During this tour he spent 10 months in Australia helping to found the Avondale school. Soon after his return he took charge of the denominational work in England. Back in America in 1901, he became vice president of the General Conference, chair of the Review and Herald Publishing Association board, and editor of the Review and Herald. On relinquishing this editorship in 1909, he edited the Protestant Magazine for seven years; this gave him an opportunity to use his gift for scholarly research. He had a keen interest in public affairs, and until 1913 fostered the denominational religious liberty work.

He was a field secretary of the General Conference from 1915 until his retirement in 1937. During this time he engaged in many activities throughout the world. After a brief period as principal of the Australasian Missionary College (1922), which he had helped to establish, he served as president and then head of the Bible Department at Union College (1924—1928). He spent the year 1930 on his last trip abroad, visiting the churches and institutions in Europe. On his return he wrote The Spade and the Bible, and then became head of the Bible Department of Emmanuel Missionary College, a post he held until 1934.

Whether teacher, editor, administrator, or secretary of the General Conference Department of Education, Prescott left a strong impression on the entire educational work of the denomination.

“Present Truth”

“PRESENT TRUTH.” A phrase from 2 Peter 1:12. Those to whom the apostle wrote were “established in the present truth,” that is, the truth in which they had been instructed, especially the truth about Jesus Christ as the Messiah of OT prophecy. The revealed truths of former times were of divine origin, and were sufficient for the time in which they were given. But the new historical context, in which Messiah had fulfilled His mission on earth and ascended to heaven, made it vitally important to be “established” in this additional truth. Former truth was no longer sufficient. The expression “present truth” implies truth that is peculiarly appropriate in the present historical situation.

In a similar sense, Seventh-day Adventists sometimes refer to the three angels’ messages (Rev. 14:6—12) as “present truth,” thereby characterizing them as God’s appointed message for the last days, immediately prior to the second coming of Christ.

In 1846 Joseph Bates wrote: “The uncompromising advocate for present truth, which feeds and nourishes the little flock in whatever country or place, is the restorer of all things” (preface to The Seventh Day Sabbath, a Perpetual Sign [August] 1846).

Bates defined “present truth” as being the “shut door”—that is, the doctrine that Christ’s priestly ministry in heaven had ended one phase and entered another (see Open and Shut Door; Sanctuary)—and the Sabbath (A Seal of the Living God [1849], p. 17). In fact, these two points, the sanctuary doctrine and the seventh-day Sabbath, were the mark that distinguished the Bates-White-Edson group, who became the Seventh-day Adventists, from the other Adventists.

James White broadened the meaning of the term when he wrote, in the first issue of his first periodical: “In Peter’s time there was present truth, or truth applicable to that present time. The Church have ever had a present truth. The present truth now, is that which shows present duty, and the right position for us, who are about to witness the time of trouble, such as never was” (Present Truth 1:1, July 1849).

Ellen White wrote: “We have no doubt, neither have we had a doubt for years, that the doctrines we hold today are present truth, and that we are nearing the judgment” (2T 355).

“The truth for this time embraces the whole gospel” (6T 291).

Present Truth [2]

PRESENT TRUTH [2] (1917—1955; semimonthly; RH, 1917—1947, PPPA, 1948—1955; file at RH). An illustrated evangelistic periodical, each issue generally devoted to the presentation of various facets of one doctrinal subject. Over the period of about one year it was designed to present a course of Bible study.

The periodical developed out of supplements to the Review and Herald published at the outbreak of World War I, the first dated Aug. 24, 1914, and called the War Extra, and the next, dated Nov. 16, 1914, called the Eastern Question Extra. From January 1915 to the end of 1916 appeared a series of extras, 24 in all, under the title Present Truth Series. Beginning with Jan. 1, 1917, the series appeared under its own name as a periodical, The Present Truth. This name was chosen in memory of the first publication issued by Sabbathkeeping Adventists. It was a monthly.

Preston, Rachel (Harris) Oakes

PRESTON, RACHEL (HARRIS) OAKES (1809—1868). A Seventh Day Baptist who persuaded a group of Adventists to accept the Sabbath and thus to become, in that sense, the first Seventh-day Adventist. Born in Vernon, Vermont, she joined the Methodist Church, then joined the Seventh Day Baptist church of Verona, Oneida County, New York. Later, she moved to Washington, New Hampshire, to be near her daughter, Delight Oakes, who taught there. When Mrs. Oakes sought to introduce the Sabbath to the company of Adventists in the Christian church there, she found them so engrossed in preparation for the coming of the Lord that they paid little attention to her Seventh Day Baptist literature.

She did eventually gain as a convert Frederick Wheeler, a Methodist preacher. One Sunday while conducting the Communion service for the Christian congregation, he remarked that all who confess communion with Christ in such a service as this “should be ready to obey God and keep His commandments in all things.” Later Mrs. Oakes told him that she had almost risen in the service to tell him that he had better push back the Communion table and put the Communion cloth back over it until he was willing to keep all the commandments of God, including the fourth. The episode set Wheeler to serious thinking and earnest study, and not long after—about March 1844, as he later related—he began to observe the seventh-day Sabbath. After “the passing of the time” in 1844, during a Sunday service in the Washington church, William Farnsworth stated publicly that he was convinced that the seventh day of the week was the Sabbath and that he had decided to keep it. He was immediately followed by his brother Cyrus and several others. And Mrs. Oakes, in turn, soon embraced the Adventist teachings. Thus it was that the first little Sabbatarian Adventist group came into being.

Authorities disagree as to the timing of these events; for example, as to whether the “passing of the time” referred to the spring or the autumn disappointment. For a discussion of the problem, see Washington, New Hampshire, church.

Mrs. Oakes later married Nathan T. Preston and moved away. Not until the last year of her life did she find herself in harmony with what had meanwhile become the Seventh-day Adventist Church.

Price, George McCready

PRICE, GEORGE MC CREADY (1870—1963). Educator, author. Born in New Brunswick, Canada, he early became a Seventh-day Adventist, engaged in colporteur work, and later attended Battle Creek College (1891—1893). He graduated from the Provincial Normal School, Fredericton, New Brunswick (1897), received a B.A. degree from Loma Linda College (1912), and an M.A. degree from Pacific Union College (1918).

Price's teaching career began in New Brunswick in 1897, and in 1903 he became principal of the Farmington Industrial Academy, Nova Scotia. After a period of research work in New York City and Washington, D.C., he taught at the College of Medical Evangelists (1906—1912). He taught English at San Fernando Academy (1912—1913), chemistry and physics at Lodi Academy (1914—1920), was professor of geology at Pacific Union College (1920—1922), and then at Union College (1922—1924). From 1924 to 1928 he did research work in Europe, taught geology at Stanborough College, and was its president for a short time. His next appointment was to Emmanuel Missionary College, where he was professor of philosophy and geology (1929—1933). He held the same position at Walla Walla College from 1933 to 1938.

Price retired from the classroom in 1938 to devote his time to writing. According to Who's Who in America, he produced in all 23 books, his best known being in the field of geology. Some of the titles are God's Two Books, The New Geology, The Predicament of Evolution, If You Were the Creator, Genesis Vindicated, and Common-Sense Geology. He also contributed numerous articles to various journals. As a creationist he was a vigorous opponent of the theory of evolution.

Priest, Mary L.

PRIEST, MARY L. (1823—1889). Lay worker. She and her husband accepted Adventist teachings in 1842, and soon after the disappointment of 1844 began to observe the seventh-day Sabbath. Although in ill health for many years, she led a group of Christian women in South Lancaster, Massachusetts, in ministering to the sick and needy and in distributing tracts. In 1869 this group organized the Vigilant Missionary Society, with Mary Priest as the secretary, an office she held until her death. Records show that at the time of her death she had written some 6,000 letters to persons who had received literature from her.

Priesthood of All Believers

PRIESTHOOD OF ALL BELIEVERS. The concept that every person can approach God directly, without the services of an intermediary human priesthood, is one of the fundamental principles of the Protestant Reformation. It is a logical corollary of belief in salvation by faith alone. The Catholic sacrament of ordination draws a sharp line of demarcation between the laity and the clergy. Protestants' rejection of the exclusive priesthood of the clergy came about, in part, because they renounced the Mass, for the celebration of which a priest is presumed to be necessary. Generally Protestants refrain from applying the term priest to one who administers Communion.

The Catholic Church teaches that one's access to divine grace is, and must be, exclusively through the church. The Protestant, on the other hand, believes that saving grace comes to a repentant sinner by virtue of his or her own direct, personal contact with God, not through the church. To the Protestant, the church announces God's grace and invites the sinner to accept it. To the Catholic, on the other hand, God dispenses grace exclusively through the priests of the church.

Seventh-day Adventists share with Protestants generally the concept of the priesthood of all believers. But whereas Luther, for instance, stressed the idea of universal priesthood, Seventh-day Adventists emphasize the priesthood of Christ, to whom anyone may come directly.

Primary Treasure

PRIMARY TREASURE (1957— ; 16-page weekly; PPPA; 1993 circulation, 35,457; files in AUC, LLU, UC, PPPA). The Sabbath school paper for children 7 to 9 years of age. Initiated as a result of readjusting the age-level slant of Our Little Friend, it contains the Sabbath school lesson for the primary division. Subject matter includes character-building stories written with a positive approach from a child's viewpoint. Simple lessons of life for Christian growth that reflect mainstream Seventh-day Adventist beliefs are emphasized. Reliance on God, positive Christian lifestyle and virtues, and making good choices with God's help are stressed. Children are encouraged to begin personal devotional time. Stories that underscore the aim of the primary Sabbath school lesson appear weekly. Nature stories, poetry, pictures to color, and puzzles are included. In 1990 the magazine grew from 8 to 16 pages, enabling a larger type size for easier reading by early readers. Since 1987 a letters column called "Mrs. Sox's Letter Box" has appeared on the back page. Answers to children's questions also are published in the column.

Prison Work

PRISON WORK. The psychology of the Seventh-day Adventist prison ministry outreach is based on Matt. 25:36: “I was in prison, and ye came unto me.” A unified prison ministry program, covering many aspects of prison ministry, such as counseling, ministry to inmates’ families, rehabilitation of inmates, halfway houses, and worship services, has been developed.

The central purpose of SDA prison ministry is to bring the comfort and hope of the gospel of Christ to lost men and women, and to plant the seed for the Holy Spirit to water. Special literature and guidelines for starting prison ministry are available.

Probation

PROBATION. The opportunity provided humanity in which to accept divine grace and to prepare for eternal life, and the time allotted for this purpose. Seventh-day Adventists believe that an individual's probation closes at death. In addition, they hold that prior to the second coming of Christ, a decree terminating probation for all then living will go forth: "He that is unjust, let him be unjust still . . . : and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still: . . . And, behold, I come quickly; and my reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be" (Rev. 22:11, 12).

This decree marks the close of probation.

During probationary time Christ is ministering as the Christian's high priest in the heavenly sanctuary, applying to each repentant sinner the merits of His vicarious atonement and grace to triumph over the world, the flesh, and the devil. After the close of probation those who have rejected divine mercy will have no further opportunity, or second chance, to accept salvation, nor would they do so if the opportunity were given them.

In the 1840s, the Adventists (see Millerite Movement), unlike other premillennialists, taught that probation for all the world would end with the Second Advent.

Seventh-day Adventists hold that the message of the Advent is divinely appointed as God's last appeal to the world prior to the close of probation and that this message is to go to all the world. When the inhabitants of the earth have had the opportunity to accept or reject this message, Jesus will cease His work as priest, and probation will close. Christ will then return to earth in power and glory, to reward everyone according to his or her just deserts, and begin His eternal reign of righteousness.

The time with reference to other events when human probation would close was a point of considerable interest during the first years of Seventh-day Adventist history (see Open and Shut Door). The conclusion was reached that it comes at the close of Christ's ministry in the heavenly sanctuary, and before the outpouring of the seven last plagues. J. H. Waggoner considered the conclusion that "the privileges of probation terminate with the termination of His [Christ's] ministry" to be irresistible (Review and Herald 8:41, May 29, 1856). In 1891 M. E. Kellogg wrote: "Erelong the work of our great High Priest in the heavenly sanctuary will be accomplished, and the probation of all mankind will at once cease, and the irrevocable decree go forth [Rev. 22:11 cited]" (ibid. 68:739, Dec. 1, 1891).

The reason for this conclusion was set forth by R. F. Cottrell in 1864: "While probation lasts, these plagues are all in the future. . . . While Jesus pleads before the throne of mercy, probation continues and wrath without mixture cannot come. But with the close of this last message [Rev. 14:9—12] probation closes, and then the wrath denounced will surely follow" (ibid. 24:205, Nov. 22, 1864).

Uriah Smith further developed this explanation: "So long as Christ acts as mediator between God and men, mercy is offered. No judgments therefore can be inflicted without mercy till Christ's work as priest has ended. But the seven last plagues are poured out without mixture of mercy, hence they are poured out after Christ has ceased His pleading, and probation has ended” (ibid. 45:164, May 20, 1875).

All SDA writers agreed that there could be no further probation after the beginning of the seven last plagues: “Extending the time of the continuance of probation beyond the beginning of the plagues presents to the people a false hope that there is a possible opportunity to be saved during the time of the pouring out of the first six plagues, at least. This is a most delusive error” (ibid. 76:722, Nov. 7, 1899).

Progreso Adventist Coeducational School

PROGRESO ADVENTIST COEDUCATIONAL SCHOOL (Colegio Mixto Adventista El Progreso). A secondary school located in Guatemala City. Adventist work in Guatemala began in 1908 with the opening of an English school. However, this school was soon closed. For many years there were no educational facilities for Seventh-day Adventists in the Guatemala Mission.

In 1925 paperwork was begun for the establishment of an Adventist school in Guatemala. Two years later, in 1927, the Adventist El Progreso school opened its doors under the leadership of Dorcas Pacheco, a dedicated, God-fearing teacher. Today the elementary and high school complex El Progreso is one of many in the Guatemala Mission, which forms part of the Central American Union Mission.

El Progreso has been a migrating educational facility from its very beginnings. Originally it functioned in the same building as the Guatemala Mission, which at that time was located on Second Avenue 10-44, Zone 1. At this location the school offered elementary level education (six grades). Early in the year 1950 the school was transferred to its own building on Twenty-second Street. In 1965 El Progreso, still functioning in its first building, began offering elementary and junior high school levels (nine grades).

Later, in 1971, because of a significant increase in student admissions, El Progreso was moved once again to a beautiful property located between San Juan Way and Thirty-first Avenue, Zone 7. In this year the school obtained government recognition and received authorization to offer a complete high school program (12 grades).

A few years later the government began construction of a new highway system, which would cause the school to lose the greater portion of its property. At that time the church was able to find and buy a new tract of land, which was paid for by the school, with financial aid and support from the Guatemala Mission. On this new piece of land, new educational facilities were built, and once more El Progreso found itself changing its address. This was the last moving operation necessary for the students and teachers, and the school functions today (1993) in this same spot (Second Street 35-44, Zone 7). The school offers not only the regular high school program but also technical specialties in bilingual secretarial sciences and computer science.

Prohibition

PROHIBITION. Prohibition in reference to alcoholic beverages has always been a goal of the Seventh-day Adventist Church. Ellen White wrote in 1881: “The advocates of temperance fail to do their whole duty unless they exert their influence by precept and example—by voice and pen and vote—in favor of prohibition and total abstinence” (Review and Herald 58:290, Nov. 8, 1881).

The church has encouraged prohibition as one means of protecting society from the ravages of liquor. “Let laws be enacted and rigidly enforced prohibiting the sale and the use of ardent spirits as a beverage” (GW 388).

Seventh-day Adventists took an active, often a leading, part in the campaign in the United States leading up to the enactment of the prohibition amendment in 1919, and have vigorously supported similar measures in other countries.

At the same time, the church recognizes that legal controls do not pose the whole answer to liquor problems. The cause lies deeper than mere law is able to remedy. “Let the appetite for intoxicating liquors be removed, and their use and sale is at an end” (ibid.).

Proper education of the public is necessary before legal controls can be made highly effective. For this reason the temperance program of the church in recent years has been based primarily on developing and presenting educational measures rather than on urging legal measures. However, the church’s program is carried on with the ultimate goal of banning alcoholic beverages. “Let the voice of the nation demand of its lawmakers that a stop be put to this infamous traffic” (MH 346). See Temperance.

Prophecies and Prophetic Interpretation

PROPHECIES AND PROPHETIC INTERPRETATION. Believing that “all scripture is given by inspiration of God” (2 Tim. 3:16), Seventh-day Adventists accept the validity of Bible prophecy (here understood in the limited sense of predictive prophecy). The Bible is replete with instances when God foretold future events to enable humans to cooperate intelligently with His divine purpose for them. However, when SDAs speak of “prophecies and prophetic interpretation,” they refer most often to the prophecies of Daniel and the Revelation and to scattered eschatological passages elsewhere in both the Old and the New Testaments. See Daniel, Interpretation of; Revelation, Interpretation of. For a consideration of the preterist, historical, and futurist patterns of prophetic interpretation, see Historicism; Premillennialism. Prophetic Interpretation, Development of PROPHETIC INTERPRETATION, DEVELOPMENT OF. Seventh-day Adventist interpretations of Bible prophecy to a great extent have their roots in a cumulative understanding of the books of Daniel and the Revelation that developed in the Christian church progressively over the course of almost 2,000 years. Seventh-day Adventists believe that they have recovered and reaffirmed the soundest interpretations of the past and have carried them forward to their consummation today. They hold that as the great outline prophecies and time periods of Daniel and the Revelation have been fulfilled in history, various expositors have recognized the basic features of these fulfillments as each event or development took place through the centuries. This article will trace the ancestry of some of these historical interpretations as they have come down to Seventh-day Adventists.

Holding to the historical method of interpretation, SDAs are the inheritors of 2,000 years of developing exposition, though they have built their own structure, using materials of other expositors and adding what is distinctively their own.

(The most comprehensive and best documented history of prophetic interpretation produced by SDAs, covering the books of Daniel and the Revelation, is the four-volume Prophetic Faith of Our Fathers, by LeRoy Edwin Froom, now accepted as a standard reference work in its field by universities, and seminaries of various faiths. For a brief summary of this work, see SDACom 4:39—78; 7:103—132.)

Vital Role of Prophecy in Church History. Exposition of prophecy played a definite role in the concepts of the early church. Writers on prophecy among the leading Church Fathers included Justin Martyr, Irenaeus, Tertullian, Hippolytus, Julius Africanus, and Eusebius; later, Jerome and Augustine. See Froom, Prophetic Faith of Our Fathers, vol. 1, pp. 205—282.

Prophetic interpretation likewise furnished a rallying cry to the Protestant Reformation. Many of the Reformers, like Wyclif before them, identified the historic Papacy as the great antichrist predicted by Daniel, Paul, and John, that was to sit in the temple of God—the church—and persecute the people of God (ibid., vol. 2, pp. 266—463). In the Catholic Counter Reformation, counterinterpretations were projected by two Jesuits in order to meet this onslaught: Ribera (d. 1656) pushed antichrist forward into the future, as a single individual ruling three and a half literal years at the end—and thus injected a “gap” into the fulfillment of prophecy (ibid., pp. 464—483); Alcazar (d. 1613) pushed antichrist back into the past, as one of the Roman emperors (ibid., pp. 484—505). These countering interpretations later infiltrated the Protestant ranks: Alcazar’s preterism was adopted by the forerunners of the present modernists, and Ribera’s futurism, somewhat later, beginning with Samuel Maitland, in 1826, became dominant in the Fundamentalist wing (ibid., vol. 4, p. 420). (Futurism and preterism are, properly, terms used of the exposition of the Apocalypse, but many of the prophecies of Daniel are interpreted by comparable methods—the fulfillments being sought either in the ancient past or in the end of time.)

The standard Protestant interpretation in the Reformation and for a time after the Reformation was that the prophecies portray the course of history, down through the centuries, to the setting up of God's eternal kingdom.

A. Daniel

A. Daniel

Dan. 2 and 7 the ABC of Prophecy. From the early era Rome was identified as the fourth world power in the four-kingdom outline of Dan. 2 and 7 (the four metals of the image in Dan. 2 and the four symbolic beasts in Dan. 7)—the first three world powers being the Babylonian, Medo-Persian, and Greco-Macedonian empires. Jewish writings, including the Talmud, the Targumim, and the Midrash, named Rome as the fourth kingdom of prophecy and anticipated a tenfold partition of the empire. Church Fathers, beginning as early as A.D. 150 (Epistle of Barnabas), identified the fourth beast (Dan. 7) as the Roman Empire, then in existence, and the 10 horns as 10 kingdoms succeeding it. Among these were Justin Martyr, Irenaeus Tertullian, and Hippolytus in the second and third centuries; Eusebius, Chrysostom, and Jerome in the fourth century; and Augustine a little later (he, however, regarded Daniel's eternal kingdom, the fifth, as the world-embracing Roman Church).

Indeed, the early Christians awaited Rome's division, as Hippolytus and Eusebius testify (Froom, Prophetic Faith, vol. 1, pp. 268—282; 349—372). Sulpicius Severus and Jerome (d. 420) declared the division already under way (ibid., pp. 433—464).

Seventh-day Adventists, along with the majority of interpreters through the centuries, have held to this unbroken sequence of the kingdoms, with the feet and toes of the metallic image (Dan. 2) and the 10 horns of the fourth beast-kingdom representing the divided territory of the Roman Empire, with the “stone,” cut out without hands, as the coming kingdom of Christ, which would supersede all earthly kingdoms.

In Dan. 7, which amplifies Dan. 2, the prominent feature is the “diverse” little horn of v. 25—indicating a religiopolitical power rising among the 10 kingdoms—a power that would seek to tamper with the immutable law of God and violently persecute dissenters—its allotted period being three and one-half times (corresponding to the 1260 days in Rev. 11 and 12), interpreted as 1260 years, according to the year-day principle. In the Middle Ages there was recognition both inside and outside the Roman Church that the predicted antichrist-little horn had already established itself as the Papacy—a declaration made by Archbishop Eberhard of Germany in 1240 (ibid., pp. 540—543; 796—806). This view later profoundly influenced the Reformers and was widely held by prophetic expositors in the New World as well as the Old World (ibid., vol. 3, pp. 33—77).

Time Periods and Year-Day Principle. The “year-day” principle—the formula that in symbolic prophecy a day stands for a literal year—was applied by Joachim of Floris (c. 1130—1202) and other Christian expositors to the three and a half times (the 1260 days), the 1290 and 1335 days, and the 2300 evenings and mornings (ibid., vol. 1, pp. 683—742).

The 70 Weeks and 2300 Days. An anonymous medieval work, De Semine Scripturarum (Concerning the Seed of the Scriptures), then Arnold of Villanova a century later, interpreted the 2300 days of Dan. 8:14 as 2300 years extending from the time of Persia to the last days (ibid., pp. 717—742). Numerous writers later taught this view. The 70 weeks (Dan. 9:25) leading to “Messiah the Prince” were understood, from the early centuries, as 490 years, pointing to the ministry and death of Christ, though the detailed application varied considerably. In the sixteenth century Johann Funck, in Germany, dated the period from 457 B.C. to A.D. 34—from Artaxerxes to the Crucifixion—and this dating became popular.

The next step—the combination of the 70 weeks with the 2300 days—was taken by Johann Petri (d. 1792) of Germany. By beginning the 2300 days jointly with the 70 weeks—the shorter period of 490 years being cut off from the 2300 years—he reckoned the 2300 years from Artaxerxes to 1847 (ibid., vol. 2, pp. 712—722).

Finally, after a widespread recognition of the ending of the 1260 years (discussed in sec. B along with the equivalent periods mentioned in Rev. 11 and 12) in 1798, at the dawn of the nineteenth century a far-flung group of both Old World and New World expositors (ibid., vol. 4, pp. 404, 405) fixed upon nearly the same ending for the 2300—year period—the favorite datings were 1843, 1844, or 1847. (See Twenty-three Hundred Days.) In the early decades of the nineteenth century, on both sides of the Atlantic there seemed to have been worldwide concentration on the application of Dan. 8:14.

The 2300 Year-Days and 1844. In this main stream of interpretation were the Millerites, who in their calculation in the 1830s and 1840s arrived at 1843 for the end of the 2300 years. They based this on the then generally accepted crucifixion date in A.D. 33, at the end of the seventieth week. (See Millerite Movement, II; Sanctuary; Seventh-Month Movement; Twenty-three Hundred Days.) They were disappointed in their expectation because they mistakenly equated the cleansing of the sanctuary with the cleansing of the earth at the Second Advent.

Seventh-day Adventists accept the prophecies of Daniel as compassing both the First Advent and the Second Advent, the two focal points of the matchless plan of salvation. They understand the 70 weeks as leading up to the time of the Messiah, who would be cut off in the “midst” of the seventieth week, in A.D. 31. They accept the joint beginning of the 70 weeks and the 2300 year-days as the master key, and interpret the 2300 years as leading to the symbolic cleansing of the heavenly sanctuary, which act constitutes the beginning of the great judgment hour in heaven.

Seventh-day Adventists are therefore in no sense the originators of the basic interpretation of either the outline or the time prophecies of Daniel.

B. Revelation

B. Revelation

As to the symbols of Revelation in general, Seventh-day Adventists have followed the standard historicist, or historical, interpretation of the Reformation and post-Reformation expositors, along with the chief advances of the early nineteenth-century Old World Advent Awakening and of the New World Adventist (Millerite) movement. They have developed further the SDA understanding of the three angels’ messages of Rev. 14 and important related truths in Rev. 12—20, especially the Second Advent and the millennium.

Seventh-day Adventists hold that Revelation complements the book of Daniel, and that, like Daniel, it presents outline prophecies. These cover repeatedly the period of the Christian Era under the symbolism of seven churches, seven seals, and seven trumpets. The chief prophetic period, variously repeated as 1260 days, or 42 months, or three and one-half times, is common to both Daniel and the Apocalypse. It has been widely interpreted by Christian expositors since Joachim of Floris as 1260 years by the year-day principle of reckoning.

Outline Prophecies of the Christian Era

Outline Prophecies of the Christian Era. The Seven Churches. The Venerable Bede, in Britain (d. 735), hinted at a historical sequence of the seven churches, placing the sixth in the time of antichrist and the seventh just prior to the Second Advent (ibid., vol. 1, p. 612). Two Italians, Bruno of Segni (d. 1123) and Richard of St. Victor (d. 1173), held the seven to extend from the birth of the Christian church to the end of time (ibid., pp. 558, 560). In the light of the Reformation, seventeenth-century interpreters saw the Thyatira church as the period of the medieval persecutions and the Sardis church as the post-Reformation period. In the nineteenth-century Advent Awakening there was widespread agreement that the Philadelphia church was the period of preparation for the second coming of Christ, and the Laodicea church as that immediately preceding the Advent. This series was accepted by the Millerites, later the Seventh-day Adventists.

Seven Seals (Rev. 6; 8:1). Irenaeus of Gaul (d. c. 202) alluded to Christ as the rider of the white horse under the first seal; Tertullian (d. c. 240) regarded the fifth seal as future, and the sixth near the end. These interpretations became rather the standard view in the early medieval period. Pre-Reformation and Reformation writers saw in the pale horse (the fourth) the domination by the papal church, and in the fifth the medieval martyrs. The sixth seal was applied to the Lisbon earthquake, and in the nineteenth century not a few held that it involved the French Revolution. Seventh-day Adventists see the sixth as beginning approximately in the same period, extending into the nineteenth century, and on to the end, which is marked by the opening of the seventh seal.

Seven Trumpets (Rev. 8; 9). From Victorinus onward various writers understood the trumpets as spanning the Christian Era. Many medieval and later writers dealt with one or both of the time periods under the fifth and sixth trumpets (ibid., vol. 4, pp. 1124, 1125), and held that the fifth trumpet symbolized the Saracens as a scourge on the church. From the sixteenth century on, the Turks were seen as the power represented under the sixth trumpet. In the New World as well as the Old, expositors usually saw in the first four trumpets the barbarian invasions of the Roman Empire and in the fifth and sixth the Saracens and Turks. Thus when the Millerites, especially Josiah Litch, wrote of the trumpets, they had behind them 15 centuries of exposition representing many faiths and nationalities. By his published dating of the end of the 391 years (the hour, day, month, and year of Rev. 9:15) in 1840 (ibid., vol. 4, pp. 587, 588) Litch attracted considerable favorable attention when Turkey became prominent in the news about that time.

Rev. 11—The Two Witnesses. The earliest expositors identified the two witnesses of Rev. 11 as two persons—probably Enoch and Elijah—coming back in person (thus Tertullian, Hippolytus, Victorinus, and Ambrose). However, Joachim of Floris thought that they might be two orders that would rise. But Bruno of Segni introduced a new concept—that of the two Testaments of the Scripture, which were witnesses for the Lord (ibid., vol. 1, p. 896). In Reformation times this interpretation was put forth by Johann Funck, of Germany, by Matthias Flaccius, Reformation historian, and by Sir John Napier, Scottish mathematician (ibid., vol. 2, p. 530).

Among the expositions of Rev. 11 in the period preceding the French Revolution some remarkable interpretations were set forth. The prophesying of the two witnesses in sackcloth for 1260 days was equated with the 42 months of the treading down of the holy city, and their death for three and one half years, followed by an earthquake in which the “tenth part of the city” fell, was connected by several writers with the French Revolution. Already in the seventeenth century a few writers had identified the “tenth part of the city” as one of the 10 kingdoms (of Dan. 7), and regarded the “earthquake” as a revolution. In 1639 Thomas Goodwin held France to be the “tenth part” that was to fall, and others followed in this identification. In 1701 Robert Fleming, Jr., an English Presbyterian, predicted that the French monarchy would fall about 1794.

After the French Revolution began, other expositors announced the fulfillment of the earthquake and the overthrow; and the slaying of the two witnesses—the Old and the New Testament—was a natural conclusion in the light of the attempt of the revolutionaries in Paris to abolish the Christian religion.

The 1260 Days (Rev. 11; 12). One of the important elements of the above interpretation of Rev. 11 was the agreement of several time periods in Rev. 11 and 12—the 1260 days and the 42 months in Rev. 11, together with the 1260 days of Rev. 12—the period of the flight of the woman (understood to be the true church) into the wilderness for 1260 days and the equivalent “time, times, and half a time” (vs. 6, 14). The equivalence is three and one-half years = 42 months = 1260 days (at a theoretical 30 days for a month). With this they connected also the three and a half times mentioned by Daniel as the period of persecution of the “saints of the most High” by the little horn (Dan. 7:25) and as the time of the scattering of the holy people (Dan. 12:7). It was these concurrent time reckonings that lent conviction to the expositions of prophecy that looked for the closing fulfillments about the end of the eighteenth century.

From the time of the Lollards, and especially from Luther on, the period was seen as the time of persecution of dissenters by the little horn antichrist—a 1260—year period of papal supremacy, when the true church was hidden in the “wilderness” from the wrath of the persecuting power. The dating of the end of this period, around the time of the French Revolution, was varied—1794, 1789, 1798—but after the capture and exile of the pope in 1798 this last became a popular ending date, with the beginning of the period in the time of Justinian, seen in connection with his decrees recognizing the pope’s supremacy over all the church.

Thus by the time of the Millerite movement there was a widespread feeling that the date 1798 or thereabouts marked a prophetic fulfillment and the beginning of the “time of the end” of Dan. 12, when knowledge should be increased. The 1260 and 1335 days of Dan. 12 were connected (variously by different writers) with the 1260 days as years. The Millerites placed the end of the 1260 and 1290 days in 1798 and of the 1335 days as extending on to 1843.

The Beasts of Rev. 13. From early times the beasts of Rev. 13 were seen as the Roman power and antichrist, or as the antichrist and his “false prophet”; the “number of the beast,” 666, was interpreted as the numerical value of various names, such as Teitan or Lateinos. In Reformation times some took the two beasts as pagan Rome and papal Rome; many others designated the first as papal Rome. Some believed that the number 666 indicated years; others that it stood for a name. (Andreas Helwig in the seventeenth century listed names, including Vicarius Filii Dei [ibid., p. 607].) And some held that the “mark” involved subservience or allegiance to the papal beast.

As early as the seventeenth century Thomas Goodwin, head of Magdalen College, Oxford, suggested that as the first beast symbolized the papacy, so the image evidently typified the Protestant image of the papacy in the Reformed churches. This concept was later to grow in acceptance. Isaac Backus, an American Baptist historian (d. 1806), made the second beast to be Protestant state churches, with the two horns representing church censure and temporal punishment (ibid., vol. 3, pp. 212—215). John Bacon, a Congregationalist judge, in 1799 applied the second beast to the Protestant clergy, though by 1803 he was inclined to assign the two horns of civil and religious liberty to Napoleon (ibid., vol. 4, pp. 74, 75). William Miller saw the beasts as pagan and papal Rome; his colleagues later believed the first to be the papacy, though they had little to say of the second.

The mark of the beast, having been connected in the early church with the antichrist, naturally began in pre-Reformation and Reformation times to be associated with conformity to papal power and decrees (so John Purvey, an associate of Wycliffe, ibid., vol. 2, pp. 98, 99). In the Reformation it was connected by various writers with subservience, allegiance, or obedience to the Papacy. This idea became widespread, but a specific identification of the mark was not made. For the development of the SDA interpretation, see Mark of the Beast.

Three Angels and Their Messages (Rev. 14). The three angels with their successive messages for all nations, calling men to preparation for the judgment and to allegiance to the Creator rather than to the false religions, and describing the saints as having “the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus” were little emphasized until the widespread Advent Awakening in the early nineteenth century. In the early church these symbols were vaguely referred to as preachers of the Second Advent, or preachers against antichrist. Some of the post-Reformation writers saw them as evangelical preachers or movements—for example, as Wycliffe, Huss, and Luther, or as Luther and later preachers. Others considered them all future.

But many of the nineteenth-century expositors felt that the three were flying in their day, symbolizing the Bible societies, missionary societies, and such like. The Millerites unanimously applied the first angel to the great Second Advent movement in which they were active. Seventh-day Adventists consider that whereas the first and second messages were given in the Miller movement, the fulfillment of the third is the special contribution of the Seventh-day Adventists and that the threefold message is to be proclaimed together until the end. See Three Angels’ Messages.

Seven Vials (Rev. 15; 16). The seven vials, or plagues, were considered at first to apply to the last times; then in later centuries the vials came to be considered as progressive, parallel to the seals and trumpets. William Miller placed them partly in the past, and symbolic, but Seventh-day Adventists have always understood them to be literal “seven last plagues” (Rev. 15:1), to fall immediately preceding the Second Advent. See Plagues, Seven Last.

Mystical Babylon (Rev. 17; 19). For many centuries, beginning with the early church, the woman, Babylon the great, seated on a scarlet beast was taken as symbolizing Rome. At first applied to pagan Rome, this symbol came in later centuries to be applied to ecclesiastical Rome, an illicit connection with the rulers of the world and dominating the political power symbolized by the beast. Thus SDAs were by no means the first to apply the term Babylon to an apostate Christian organization. Neither were they the first to include in the family of Babylon the “daughter” churches that had retained some of their mother’s errors (see SDACom 7:124—127).

The call to come out of Babylon, addressed to the people of God who are still in her, is considered to be part of the second of the three angels’ messages of Rev. 14 and hence part of the Seventh-day Adventist message. See Babylon, Symbolic.

Second Advent and the Millennium. The early church expected the return of Christ very soon, as the climax of prophetic fulfillment, to bring the cataclysmic end of the age then present, to take up the redeemed in the resurrection, and to institute the eternal kingdom; they did not expect a millennium to intervene before the Second Advent. Augustine introduced the idea of the Catholic Church as the millennial kingdom, and about 1700 a new postmillennialism came in (introduced by Daniel Whitby), substituting for the literal Second Coming and a literal kingdom a spiritual kingdom of the church on earth, or postponing the personal Advent until the end of that period. This alluring prospect swept Protestantism, particularly intriguing the growing rationalistic wing.

Then, with the opening of the nineteenth century, came a revival of interest in the Second Advent, as expositors—including several Catholics—reexamined the doctrine of the Second Advent. The great Advent Awakening, as it has been called, with its publications, its societies, conferences, and periodicals, spread over many countries, calling for a preparation for “the advent near.” The popularity of the mid-nineteenth-century dating of the end of the 2300 days—though with varying expectations of the coming events—led many to look for the return of Christ, or for developments leading toward that event, in the near future.

Part of this widespread awakening, but forming a distinctive group, was the Millerite movement. Unlike the others, the Millerites held that the Second Advent would bring the end of human probation, the fiery renovation of the earth, and the transformation of the saints to immortality. So the millennial reign would be that of the glorified saints—the first stage of the eternal state, which would be interrupted at the close of the thousand years for the resurrection of the unsaved to receive their final retribution.

Seventh-day Adventists retain the general Millerite view of the Second Advent but place the renewal of the earth at the close of the millennium, during which the saints have been in heaven. After the millennium the new earth will be the home of the redeemed, with its capital the New Jerusalem, in which will be the throne of God and of the Lamb forever. See Millennium; Second Advent.

Thus Seventh-day Adventists have been the inheritors of the truest prophetic interpretations of the centuries, and have enlarged and clarified them into a consistent, systematic exposition.

Public Affairs and Religious Liberty, Department of (PARL)

PUBLIC AFFAIRS AND RELIGIOUS LIBERTY, DEPARTMENT OF (PARL). A department of the General Conference that represents the church in protecting and securing civil rights related to freedom of worship and belief; conducts public education with respect to the principles of religious liberty; coordinates the activities of unions and conferences in the field of religious liberty; and sponsors local, national, and international religious liberty associations. It is staffed by a director, associate directors, and office assistants, and has its headquarters at the General Conference offices.

In the United States, its staff concerns itself with matters such as Sunday legislation, municipal regulations restricting or prohibiting religious activities (for example, Green River ordinances, prohibitions of Ingathering solicitation), discrimination in employment and education arising out of the observance of the seventh-day Sabbath (for example, hiring and discharge, unemployment compensation, and Saturday examinations), labor union relations, censorship of the religious press, calendar revisions that affect the continuity of the weekly cycle, family cases that involve religious freedom for parents or children (for example, adoption or religious training of children), tax exemption for churches and church schools, government subsidies to religious institutions (for example, free bus transportation for parochial school students, subsidies to teachers, free textbooks, grants for capital improvements), immigration and naturalization discrimination because of religious convictions, religious issues in public education, and religious involvements of the government (for example, the appointment of an envoy to the Vatican).

Outside the United States, the role of the department has been largely consultative and educational, although the department has adopted a more proactive stance. In many countries the sensitivity to religious freedom is not so well developed as it is in the United States and some other countries. Efforts have to be made to educate and to persuade government officials, leaders of state or established churches or religions, and frequently the public at large, to relieve inequities and discrimination, and at times to stay penalties imposed on individuals because of their conscientious convictions. Sunday legislation, military conscription, and education in public institutions where a six-day school week is in effect (almost everywhere) are of major concern.

Generally the PARL work is conducted from the division offices, and the PARL Department represents the church in the defense of religious freedom. In all of the divisions there is a departmental director who devotes some or all of his or her time to this purpose. The PARL Department also functions in many unions and conferences. There are several national or regional associations devoted to the protection of religious freedom. Notable among them are the International Religious Liberty Association (IRLA) and the Association Internationale pour la Défense de la Liberté Religieuse.

One subject that has especially concerned Seventh-day Adventists in many countries for a long time, particularly in Europe, is that of their legal recognition as a religious denomination. Wherever there are established churches, or where majority churches have some form of government approval and special privileges, religious minority groups often are restricted in their activities, and are not allowed to hold properties or to perform such religious functions as may require government license, as, for example, hold public meetings, issue publications, perform marriages, or conduct burials.

History of the Department

History of the Department. Early Contact With Public Affairs. Soon after the denomination was organized it was called upon to define its principles with regard to Christian noncombatancy. The occasion was the introduction of universal conscription as a result of the American Civil War. In the summer of 1864 the General Conference drafted a statement of the SDA position and authorized J. N. Andrews to interview members of the government in Washington, D.C., in order to obtain recognition of the church's noncombatancy position. Similar appeals were made to several state governors. The issue was resolved satisfactorily, and for a number of years afterward there appeared little denominational activity in public affairs.

Opposition to Sunday Laws. Attempts to establish by law the religious practices of the majority churches had been made repeatedly, but they met with little success until an organization called the National Reform Association was created in 1863. This organization had as one of its objectives the bringing together of various forces in order to promote the sacredness of the first day of the week, Sunday, and to endeavor to have it established by law as a day of public worship and closing of business activity in the United States. The agitation of this matter stirred up prejudice and led to prosecutions for alleged Sabbath (Sunday) violations under long disused Sunday ordinances dating from the Colonial days or even under newly established Sunday ordinances. (See Sunday Laws.)

Seventh-day Adventists responded to this threat to religious liberty with an attempt to set before the public the Bible teaching concerning the seventh-day Sabbath. In 1883 the General Conference passed the following resolutions: "26. Whereas, We, as students of prophecy, have for years anticipated the present Sunday movement, and understand that there is a conflict before us, the magnitude of which can scarcely be appreciated; and—

"Whereas, Thousands of earnest Christians are laboring sincerely for the enforcement of the Sunday law, who would not do so if the claims of the true Sabbath were placed before them; therefore—

"Resolved, That we remind our people of their duty to place the great light which God has given them upon the Sabbath question before others; and we urge that this be done before the leaders of this Sunday movement have opportunity to represent the issues of this question in a false light.

"27. Resolved, That we need tracts, both large and small, upon the present issues of the Sunday movement.

"28. Whereas, The ever-shifting front of this Sunday question calls constantly for new arguments, and the stealth of their movements calls for constant vigilance; therefore—

"Resolved, That we recommend the publication of a four-page paper, the size of the Review, monthly, whose mission shall be to oppose this Sunday law enforcement, this paper to be conducted by a committee of five, appointed by this Conference" (SDA Yearbook [1884], p. 42, Resolutions 26—28).

In accordance with these resolutions the Review and Herald published the Sabbath Sentinel during 1884. More than 500,000 copies of it were circulated, but, although the General Conference voted to continue the project, publication was suspended at the end of the year because of an insufficient editorial staff.

Enforcement of Sunday laws in the United States reached a peak in the middle 1880s, when a number of SDAs in widely scattered localities were brought to court and penalized heavily for alleged violations of Sunday laws. The church concluded that something more had to be done to check the influence of Sunday law agitators. The church leadership agreed that the public should be educated in the principles and advantages of religious freedom for all citizens, in the historical background of the American Constitution, which prohibited the establishment of religion in the United States, and in the discriminatory nature of religious ordinances, whenever and wherever enforced. To achieve these objectives, in January 1886 the Pacific Press began publishing the American Sentinel.

The next year, 1887, the General Conference recommended that the various conferences form committees for the defense of those charged with violation of Sunday laws, and created a committee of its own to coordinate conference efforts and to direct the denominational work of defending religious freedom.

Press Committees. In 1888, two years after the American Sentinel came into existence, the Sunday proponents succeeded in bringing before Congress a bill to make Sunday a legal holiday (the Blair Sunday bill). A. T. Jones, editor of the American Sentinel and the chief spokesman of the church on the subject of religious liberty, appeared before the Congressional committee to testify in opposition to this bill. The report of the hearings was reprinted and widely circulated.

In a further effort to set the issues clearly before the public, the General Conference appointed a committee of three (C. Eldridge, M. B. Duffie, and W. H. McKee), who were designated a "Press Committee," "for the purpose of devising and carrying out plans for the dissemination of general information to the public, on the question of civil and religious liberty."

Early in February 1889 the committee was enlarged to seven members (C. Eldridge, A. T. Jones, D. T. Jones, W. A. Colcord, J. O. Corliss, J. E. White, and W. H. McKee). The new committee called on the conferences to appoint "State Press Committees" and to select "local agents in every place where a newspaper was published."

J. O. Corliss appeared at the second hearing on the Sunday-Rest bill before the Senate Committee on Education and Labor, and went to Arkansas, where he urged the committee of the legislature at least to retain the exemption clause for non-Sundaykeepers; A. T. Jones addressed committees of the legislatures of Ohio and Indiana, which had under consideration resolutions favoring the federal bill. A pamphlet entitled "Civil Government and Religion" was prepared and sent to all members of Congress. Members of the committee also lectured on religious liberty in several large cities and had articles published in many papers of the country.

National Religious Liberty Association. The work of the committee was successful beyond expectation, and it became apparent that some larger, more representative, and more permanent organization would be advantageous. Accordingly, the committee drafted a declaration of principles and a constitution for a new body, the National Religious Liberty Association, that would have as an object "to protect the rights of conscience; to maintain a total separation between religion and the civil government and by means of the platform and the press to educate the public mind on the relations that should exist between the Church and the State.” This association was formed at a mass meeting held on the evening of July 21, 1889, in the Tabernacle at Battle Creek, Michigan. There were 110 charter members who signed the declaration: “We believe in the religion taught by Jesus Christ.

“We believe in temperance, and regard liquor traffic as a curse to society.

“We believe in supporting civil government, and submitting to its authority.

“We deny the right of any civil government to legislate on religious questions.

“We believe it is the right, and should be the privilege, of every man to worship according to the dictates of his own conscience.

“We also believe it to be our duty to use every lawful and honorable means to prevent religious legislation by the civil government, that we and our fellow citizens may enjoy the inestimable blessings of both religious and civil liberty” (National Religious Liberty Association [tract], p. 1, quoted in M. E. Olsen, A History of the Origin and Progress of Seventh-day Adventists, p. 466).

The officers of the new associations were drawn largely from the personnel of the press committee: C. Eldridge was elected president, W. H. McKee, secretary, and A. F. Ballenger, assistant secretary. It was a working association. Besides educational and representational work, it engaged legal counsel for the defense of those accused of Sunday law violations, and extended financial help to them and to their families if the breadwinner was imprisoned.

Parallel with the activities of the association, the Pacific Press, publishers of the American Sentinel, began in 1889 the Sentinel Library, a selection of religious liberty monographs in pamphlet form issued monthly. This series was merged in 1893 with the Religious Liberty Library (see next paragraph).

For the second year of its operation, 1890, the association reported, among other things, the securing of 250,000 signatures to petitions against religious legislation presented to both houses of Congress, and the distribution of more than 4 million pages of tracts and pamphlets, including 600,000 copies of the pamphlet Sunday and the World's Fair. The association also published in 1890 American State Papers, a compendium of American religious legislation and related documents. In 1892 the association launched a monthly series of pamphlets on the subject of religious liberty under the title Religious Liberty Library.

International Religious Liberty Association. By 1893 the activities of the association had extended beyond the borders of the United States and it assumed the name International Religious Liberty Association (later generally called the Religious Liberty Association). This association undertook to conduct the religious liberty activities for the entire denomination. Its office was moved to New York City in 1896, and beginning with the Sept. 24, 1896, issue of the American Sentinel, that journal carried a note on its masthead that it was the organ of the association, although no formal transfer of the publication from the Pacific Press took place until 1900, when the association assumed the publication of the magazine and renamed it the Sentinel of Liberty. From 1893 to 1901 the association also issued the Religious Liberty Library. In 1898 another move brought the office to Chicago, a more central location.

Toward the end of the century, acts of discrimination against Seventh-day Adventists diminished and the activity of the association and the support given it by the church membership began to wane. Some, overlooking the need for perennial education in the area of religious liberty, even questioned whether there was a need any longer for such an organization, and for several decades the IRLA became dormant. During the next several years religious liberty effort was spasmodic. Also the frequency of publication of the Sentinel was changed from weekly to monthly. The journal was returned to the Pacific Press in 1901 and was renamed the Sentinel of Christian Liberty. In 1903 it passed to the Review and Herald. Because of the heavy expense and small circulation its publication was suspended in February 1904.

Religious Liberty Department. In 1901 the General Conference, in its general reorganization and departmentalization of the work, created a department, with A. T. Jones as its first head, to represent the church directly in the area of religious liberty. That such a department was feasible was proved in Australia, where the Australasian Union had had such a department since 1894, with A. G. Daniells as its first secretary and editor of its religious liberty organ, Sentinel and Herald of Liberty. Upon the organization of the Religious Liberty Department of the General Conference the Sentinel of Christian Liberty became its official organ. The organization of the department, however, did not mature until late in 1904, when it was voted that K. C. Russell become its full-time head.

Soon after the denomination's headquarters were moved (1903) to Washington, D.C., two Sunday bills were introduced into Congress. The department went into action opposing them, and solicited 71,215 signatures to petitions against these laws. During the consideration of these bills, the doctrine of the seventh-day Sabbath was thoroughly discussed in the Washington newspapers. The bills did not pass, and Ellen White credited the defeat of these proposed pieces of religious legislation to the presence of the Religious Liberty Department in the national capital.

In 1906 the department began publication of Liberty: A Magazine of Religious Freedom. From 1909 to 1912 a press bureau (the public relations office of the denomination) was operated in connection with the Religious Liberty Department, but afterward was separated.

The staff of the department was kept busy between 1913 and 1917 taking part in opposing some 20 Sunday bills introduced in the United States Congress and 547 similar bills considered in the state legislatures. Prosecutions of Seventh-day Adventists for Sunday-law violations also continued and the staff took interest in these proceedings. Between 1918 and 1921 there were 10 such cases.

When the events of World War I placed on the denomination the burden of restating noncombatant principles as well as principles relating to Sabbath observance, this work was entrusted, not to the Religious Liberty Department, but to a specially created body, the War Service Commission.

In 1922, when the state of Oregon attempted to close all private schools, SDAs joined in the cases carried by two private schools to the Federal Supreme Court, which declared the Oregon law unconstitutional. When the states of Washington and Michigan had similar proposals on the ballot for referendum, the Religious Liberty Department took a leading part in organizing the church membership in these states to oppose the measures, and the plans were defeated by 60,000 and 400,000 votes, respectively.

During the 1920s the staff of the Religious Liberty Department continued to address Sunday law proposals in Congress. In the Sixty-eighth Congress (1923—1924), three Sunday bills were introduced, and in the Sixty-ninth Congress (1925—1926), six bills were submitted, although none were passed. When one of these bills was reintroduced in the Seventieth Congress, the Religious Liberty Department secured more than eight million signatures to petitions opposing this measure. C. S. Longacre, the secretary of the department at the time, stated that this was “the most vigorous and intensive campaign for signatures to petitions which had ever been launched in our history.” In one year 9,351,000 books, magazines, and leaflets on religious liberty were distributed. A leading newspaper chain printed a full-page illustrated article opposing Sunday laws in their Sunday edition, which had a total circulation of more than 20 million copies.

In 1931, when the question of calendar reform was brought before the League of Nations in Geneva, SDAs secured 220,000 signatures in the United States and 236,000 signatures in other countries against the proposed calendar, which by its blank day would dislocate the seventh-day Sabbath. Because the proponents were claiming that the United States favored calendar change, the Religious Liberty Department secured a letter from the secretary of state that the United States had taken no official position. Four SDAs (A. S. Maxwell, of London; Dr. J. Nussbaum, of Paris; R. A. Anderson, of Australia; and C. S. Longacre, of Washington, D.C.) representing the International Religious Liberty Association were permitted to speak before the League of Nations.

In 1930 a Sunday-closing proposal in a California referendum, which the department helped to oppose, was defeated by a majority of 833,393 votes. In 1932 a referendum for the repeal of all Sunday laws in Wisconsin was won by a 124,650 majority, and a move to place Sunday closing in 800 National Recovery Administration’s codes for various businesses was blocked, with the department’s help, avoiding a precedent in which Sunday observance would have been imposed by an executive order.

In 1936 the secretary of the Religious Liberty Association reported that there had been formed by that time a number of similar associations outside the United States. In Britain one was directed by A. S. Maxwell, and published a magazine under the title Liberty; in South Africa an association was led by J. I. Robison; in Canada, M. N. Campbell headed the Canadian Religious Liberty Association (which later was credited with contributing materially to the preparation and passage of the Canadian Bill of Rights); in Australia the national association had A. W. Anderson as its secretary; and there was one in the Philippines promoted by F. A. Pratt.

In Southern Europe Dr. Jean Nussbaum organized the Association Internationale pour La Défense de la Liberté Religieuse. Upon Dr. Nussbaum’s death, Pierre Lanares became the secretary-general of that organization and the editor of two semiannual bulletins—Conscience et Liberté and Gewissen und Freiheit. The current secretary-general and editor is Dr. Gianfranco Rossi.

When the question of calendar reform was again urged on the League of Nations, the Religious Liberty Department made contact with heads of all the various religious organizations to secure their cooperation in preserving the weekly cycle, and sent a memorial to the governments of every nation with membership in the league, and also a memorial to the league, protesting consideration of the calendar. When the League declined to call a calendar conference, it gave as the reason the religious opposition to the blank-day principle. At the time of the Second Vatican Council (1962—1965), Drs. Nussbaum, B. B. Beach, and G. Rossi were appointed as a watchdog committee to make contacts and encourage opposition to any approval of a blank-day calendar. These endeavors were successful.

A number of Seventh-day Adventists had been denied naturalization in the United States because of their noncombatant position. In the James Louis Girouard case, in which the department took much interest, in 1946, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that noncombatancy could not prevent naturalization (Girouard v. United States, 328 U.S. 61, 1946).

A court decision favorable to freedom to distribute religious literature was gained in 1951 when the Circuit Court for the county of Grand Traverse, Michigan, declared the “Green River” ordinance (Traverse City v. Swett & Thoresen, no. 573, 1951) of Traverse City unconstitutional. Likewise a 1956 decision of the Multnomah County Circuit Court, in Oregon, ruled that the “Green River” ordinance of Gresham, Oregon, violated constitutional guarantees of religious freedom (Wyman v. City of Gresham, no. 228—677, Oct. 8, 1956).

Three important court judgments granting unemployment benefits to SDAs were secured in 1954 and 1956: Swenson et al v. Michigan Employment Security Commission, Supreme Court of Michigan, Sept. 7, 1954 (340 Mich. 430, 65 N.W. 2nd 709); Regina Tary v. State of Ohio Board of Review, no. 33646, Ohio Supreme Court, Mar. 31, 1954 (161 Ohio St 251, 119 N.E. 2nd 56), Miller v. Employment Security Commission of North Carolina, Supreme Court of North Carolina, no. 523, Feb. 3, 1956 (243 N.C. 509, 91 S.E. 2nd 241). Another favorable decision in the matter of unemployment benefits was secured in the Adell Sherbert case from South Carolina, which was delivered by the United States Supreme Court on June 17, 1963 (Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398). On Feb. 25, 1987, in an 8 to 1 decision in the Hobbie v. State of Florida case, the Supreme Court upheld the right to unemployment benefits for a person who had become a Seventh-day Adventist and thus could no longer work on Sabbath. Walter Carson, an SDA lawyer, successfully argued the case.

In the early 1960s a flood of Sunday legislation swept across the United States as a result of the U.S. Supreme Court decisions on the four Sunday law cases rendered on May 29, 1961 (McGowan v. Maryland, 366 U.S. 420; Gallagher v. Crown Kosher Super Market, 366 U.S. 617; Two Guys From Harrison v. McGinley, 366 U.S. 582; Braunfeld v. Brown, 366 U.S. 599), in which Sunday closing was upheld as a social measure apart from religious significance (see SB, Nos. 1669—1674). In the first five months of 1963 alone, 226 bills were considered in 40 states. In most of the instances the department presented its religious liberty views to judges, legislators, and the public.

The United States Congress in 1964 passed the Civil Rights Act forbidding discrimination in employment of any individual with respect to race, color, religion, sex, or national origin. In 1972 Title VII of that act was amended to require an employer to make reasonable accommodation to an employee’s religious observance without undue hardship on the conduct of the employer’s business.

Where no attempt by the employer for reasonable accommodation has been shown, the courts have ordered Sabbathkeepers reinstated in their employment. Riley v. Bendix Corp., 464F, 2nd 1113 (5th Cir. 1972); Reid v. Memphis Publishing Co., 468F, 2nd 346 (6th Cir. 1972); Claybaugh v. Pacific Northwest Bell Telephone Co., F. Supp. (D.C. Ore. 1973).

Between the Annual Council of 1959 and the General Conference session of 1962, the Bureau of Public Relations and the Religious Liberty Department were merged temporarily as the Department of Public Affairs. After the merger was dissolved the present name, Department of Public Affairs and Religious Liberty, was adopted as more representative of the work.

In 1980, after B. B. Beach assumed leadership of the PARL Department, the offices of Congressional and United Nations Liaison were incorporated in PARL with the individuals given these responsibilities serving as associate PARL directors. Interchurch Relations was also assigned to the PARL director. The PARL Department was asked to be responsible for the protocol (entertainment of officials) functions at the General Conference headquarters. During the 1980s the General Conference PARL functions in North America were increasingly turned over to the North American Division. Nevertheless, because of the location of the General Conference in the Washington area and the role of the United States in world prophecy, the General Conference has kept jurisdiction over the Washington scene. Beginning in 1993, Liberty became a North American Division publication. A year after this changeover, Roland Hegstad, PARL associate director, retired after serving for 35 years as editor of the magazine.

In November 1981, after considerable efforts by the church, especially through its Euro-Africa Division PARL Department and the International Religious Liberty Association, the United Nations General Assembly accepted “without a vote” the long-hoped-for “Declaration on the Elimination of all Forms of Intolerance and of Discrimination Based on Religion or Belief.” Article 6, paragraph (h) of the declaration affirms that freedom of religion includes the freedom “to observe days of rest . . . in accordance with the precepts of one’s religion.”

During the years 1945—1989 the General Conference PARL Department was actively involved in dealing with religious liberty problems and church-state issues in the Communist countries of Eastern Europe, in close cooperation with the divisions based in Europe. With the fall of totalitarian Communism, the focus of the department in the 1990s moved in the direction of ensuring equal rights and nondiscrimination for minority religions in the former Communist countries in which the majority church has endeavored, directly or behind the scenes, to check the work and evangelistic outreach of the growing Seventh-day Adventist Church by pushing for repressive government legislation, restrictive immigration practices, and protectionist municipal regulations (e.g., refusing the renting of public halls), and at times even resorting to threats and hate tactics. After the fall of the officially atheistic Communist regime in Albania, in 1992 the IRLA was able to conduct in Tirana the first human rights (religious liberty) conference held in that country.

Beginning with the late 1970s, the GC PARL Department was actively involved in conducting world and regional liberty congresses in Europe, Asia, Africa, and Oceania. The department has collaborated with a number of other organizations such as the International Academy for Freedom of Religion and Belief and the Council on Religious Freedom in promoting religious liberty. The department has also networked with other nongovernmental organizations at the United Nations and the U.S. Capitol in upholding freedom of religion and separation of church and state. In 1985 the General Conference received consultative status as a nongovernmental organization with the United Nations Economic and Social Council.

During the middle 1980s the department led out in opposing the establishment of diplomatic relations between the United States and the Holy See (central government of the Roman Catholic Church). The PARL director appeared on television, including the main evening news, and before committees of the U.S. Congress. Despite strong opposition from those upholding church-state separation, the United States joined the more than 100 countries that have diplomatic relations with the Vatican.

During the 1990s the PARL Department has endeavored to deal with the intricate and difficult religious liberty problems existing in the Muslim world. In this connection, the department helped organize a religious conference for the Mediterranean basin, held in October 1994 on the Island of Malta. See Calendar Reform; Green River Ordinances; International Religious Liberty Association; Liberty; National Service Organization; Religious Liberty Association of America; Sunday Laws; Unemployment Compensation.

Public Affairs, Department of PUBLIC AFFAIRS, DEPARTMENT OF. A department created in 1959 by the temporary merger of the Bureau of Public Relations and the Department of Religious Liberty into one department, with M. E. Loewen as secretary. At the General Conference session of 1962, this provisional merger was dissolved into two sections: the Bureau of Public Relations and the Department of Public Affairs and Religious Liberty. In 1973 the Bureau of Public Relations was incorporated into the Department of Communication.

Public Health Association of Seventh-day Adventists (PHASDA)

PUBLIC HEALTH ASSOCIATION OF SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTISTS (PHASDA). Organized in 1966, incorporation completed in 1967, PHASDA served as a professional association made up of health professionals and other members of the Seventh-day Adventist Church interested in promoting the health program of the church. An affiliate of the American Public Health Association, PHASDA conducted its annual meeting in conjunction with this association's annual convention. Organized into sections and chapters, PHASDA sought to provide strong leadership for its members. PHASDA no longer functions. The annual Healthy People Convention sponsored by the Loma Linda University School of Public Health provides continuing education credit for professionals and enrichment for all concerned with health issues.

Public Relations (philosophy and methods)

PUBLIC RELATIONS (philosophy and methods). Public relations activities in the Seventh-day Adventist Church are based on a simple but definite rationale derived from the Scriptures, from counsels of Ellen White, and from the best of contemporary practice. The increasing complexity of modern society necessitates a systematic effort to keep the public informed about the church's purposes and activities. "If the church does not take steps to be understood, it will be misunderstood" (Howard B. Weeks, Breakthrough, p. 10).

More positively, in evangelism and other church activities touching the public, good public relations can help to create attitudes that will enable people to understand more clearly and to accept more readily the church's point of view.

The program of public relations as conducted by the various headquarters offices of church organization includes two parts: (1) reaching the public through the various media of communication; (2) fostering public relations work in the constituent churches and institutions.

Activities. There is a program of active community relations designed to acquaint groups, as well as the hometown public in general, with the denomination. This program includes community activities, such as sponsorship of a blood-donor drive or assistance in a community anniversary celebration, as well as church events such as a reception or an open house event for a new building or institution, the furnishing of speakers for community organizations, the sponsoring of exhibits at fairs and other expositions, or other forms of participation in community activities.

Information. Basic to the public relations work is the release of Seventh-day Adventist information to newspapers, news magazines, news agencies, radio and television stations and networks, religious publications, and other media. This information may include news of personnel changes, meetings, traveling officials, campaigns (such as Ingathering), activities of various departments, or church involvement in public issues. It may also include feature articles on such subjects as a jeep nurse in the Kentucky mountains or an educational program at the New York evangelistic center. Occasionally non-Adventist authors writing magazine articles or books concerning the church receive assistance from the department. Examples include Booton Herndon's The Seventh Day (McGraw-Hill), as well as William J. Whalen's article on Seventh-day Adventists for the Catholic Encyclopedia and his section on the church in his book Faiths for the Few, as well as material for textbooks on comparative religion.

Correction of Misinformation. Also on occasion there may be an opportunity to furnish accurate information about Seventh-day Adventists and Adventism to correct erroneous accounts in newspapers, magazines, or encyclopedias and other reference works.

Services to Churches and Institutions. Among the most important services of the communication staff in the public relations area are aiding Seventh-day Adventist institutions and organizations in the production of brochures and other material; providing pictures on SDA work throughout the world; furnishing publicity materials for Ingathering and other campaigns; and offering public relations suggestions in the advance planning of events and projects. For specific services to the field offered by the General Conference agency, see Communication, Department of.

Development of Principles and Methods. From the first the aim of Seventh-day Adventist public relations has been “giving publicity to our message and our movement” (Review and Herald 88:9, Dec. 14, 1911). In 1875 Ellen White urged that “wise plans should be laid to secure the privilege of inserting articles into the secular papers” (letter 1, 1875), and made recurrent pleas “to do all we can to remove the prejudice that exists in the minds of many” (9T 238).

The first-known action along these lines was undertaken by James White himself, with a carefully planned program of publicity in a number of camp meetings of 1876. Mary L. Clough, Mrs. White’s niece, serving as the “camp-meeting reporter” wherever the Whites attended, obtained “free access to the best daily papers” from Nebraska to Maine, and “a host of smaller ones, in which have been given brief statements of our history, movements, and doctrines,” with the result that the masses “will no longer inquire—‘Who are the Seventh-day Adventists?’” (Review and Herald 48:124, Oct. 19, 1876). At Ripon, Wisconsin, the local Free Press “started a daily to be published during the [camp] meeting, devoting the space largely to an account of the meeting as it progressed, and to a publication of those leading points of our faith which would best give the people an idea of what we, as a church, maintain” (ibid. 48:20, July 13, 1876).

The General Conference of that year commended White and Miss Clough, recommending that the same plan be followed the next year. This kind of public program was carried out in later years by other persons, such as S. N. Haskell. At his suggestion the General Conference in 1883 recommended that at “all our general gatherings” good reporters be chosen to furnish to newspapers reports of the meetings that are being held.

The issues of temperance and religious liberty drew the denomination into contact with the public throughout the last quarter of the nineteenth century. The church-state issues, especially, were influential in the development of a public relations program. A press committee of three was set up in 1888, led by C. Eldridge, to furnish material to the public press on civil and religious liberty. In 1889 a press committee of seven was appointed, which requested the local conferences to set up state press committees and local members as agents. Two members, J. O. Corliss and A. T. Jones, distributed religious liberty pamphlets to legislators and spoke before state and congressional committees against proposed Sunday legislation throughout America. This program of public action helped defeat the religious legislation proposed.

This committee became (with one change in members) the executive committee of the Religious Liberty Association founded July 21, 1889, and that organization through the next two decades fostered a press relations program as an aid in opposing the passage of Sunday laws and other measures hostile to the principle of church-state separation.

In 1911 the General Conference formed a Press Bureau to coordinate public relations efforts for the whole church. But public relations developed far beyond the “press bureau” function. With the addition of other media and methods, such as radio, TV, and varied activities, the Bureau of Public Relations and its widespread field organizations, down to the local churches, developed into a vast network of lay and professional workers dedicated to keeping the world informed about the message and mission of the Seventh-day Adventist Church.

In January 1973 the Bureau of Public Relations and the Radio-Television Department of the General Conference united, according to Annual Council action, to become the Department of Communication. The union did not mean a diminution of the concerns of either department, but rather provided a setting for forward movement in the world of communication. The first director of the new department was Walter R. L. Scragg.

Publishing Association of the German Democratic Republic Union Conference

PUBLISHING ASSOCIATION OF THE GERMAN DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC UNION CONFERENCE. A publishing house without printing facilities that was situated in the German Democratic Republic. Until World War II the publishing house in Hamburg produced all German Seventh-day Adventist literature. After 1945 the Seventh-day Adventist churches in the German Democratic Republic could no longer have their printing done in Hamburg because of the changed political situation. The Sabbath school quarterlies, a devotional book, and the Morning Watch were printed by a state publishing house.

Manfred Böttcher negotiated with government officials, and the way opened in 1962 to start a regular publishing program. After that, in addition to the periodicals, two or three new books and four to six tracts were printed, including major writings of Ellen G. White.

After the reunification of Germany, the GDR publishing house was integrated once again in 1992 into the Hamburg Publishing House (Saatkorn-Verlag).

Editors: Manfred Böttcher, 1962—1970; E. Hennig, 1970—1975; Günther Hampel, 1975—1987; Konrad Edel, 1987—1992.

Publishing Department

PUBLISHING DEPARTMENT. A department in the General Conference whose officers, a director, and associate directors, in an advisory capacity, coordinate the various phases of the denomination's literature ministry, both production and distribution throughout the world field. These officers are members of the General Conference Executive Committee. The World Literature Ministry Coordinating Board, consisting of all division presidents, publishing department directors, selected publishing house managers, the president, secretary, and treasurer of the General Conference is chaired by a General Conference vice president, with the General Conference Publishing Department director serving as secretary. This board coordinates interdivision publishing products, appropriates funds for special equipment purchase, initiates the translation and printing of Ellen G. White books in French, Spanish, Portuguese, and promotes cooperation between publishing houses in order to prevent duplication of effort.

Each local and union conference or corresponding organization and each division has a publishing director to foster the work of the publishing department within his/her area of operation. The conference publishing director and associate directors supervise the literature evangelists (colporteurs) within their areas.

The General Conference Publishing Department in its present form dates from 1902. But long before there was a General Conference or a local conference organization, or even an organized church, the pioneers of the Adventist movement began to publish "a little paper," then tracts, and later books. As the developing church took shape, the publishing work was considered an integral part of the activities of the body, and it often was referred to as the "publishing department" of the church before organization as such.

The Early "Publishing Department" of the Church. When the Seventh-day Adventist pioneers went forward in faith to set forth in print the reason for the hope that was in them, they were in the line of a great tradition. Ever since the invention of printing and the appearance of the first Gutenberg Bible the printing press had been closely allied with the work of giving the gospel. It was the publication of pamphlets, books, and periodicals that gave strength and solidity to the Millerite movement, to which the early Seventh-day Adventist leaders had belonged.

Five years after the first little group of Adventists began to observe the Sabbath, when the total number of adherents was probably only about 100, and before they ever had a church or conference organization, James White launched a publishing enterprise that was to play an integral part in establishing the members of the new movement in the fundamentals of the developing Seventh-day Adventist faith and in welding these adherents into a strong church. It was in 1848 that Ellen White said to her husband, James: "You must begin to print a little paper and send it out to the people. Let it be small at first; but as the people read, they will send you means with which to print, and it will be a success from the first. From this small beginning it was shown to me to be like streams of light that went clear round the world" (LS 125).

The first publication issued in response to this counsel was the Present Truth, in 1849, whose present successor, the Adventist Review (formerly Review and Herald) (1850), has through the years been the denominational organ. In July 1849 penniless James White took the copy for the first issue of The Present Truth to a Middletown, Connecticut, printer, had 1,000 copies printed on credit, and then borrowed the horse and buggy of Albert Belden to carry the printed sheets home to Rocky Hill. There a little group of pioneers folded, wrapped, and addressed them, then gathered around and earnestly asked God's benediction on the little pile of papers as they went on their initial mission. White then placed the entire edition in a carpetbag and walked the eight miles (13 kilometers) to the Middletown post office to send out the product of his faith. When the people read they sent in means with which to print, as he had hoped, so that little by little the circulation expanded. The Present Truth gave place in August 1850 to The Advent Review and in November of the same year to the Second Advent Review and Sabbath Herald, which has been generally known by its short title, the Review and Herald, now the Adventist Review.

James White's publishing enterprise, although undertaken on his own responsibility, was carried on from the first as an evangelistic project of the embryo church. The local group in Rocky Hill, Connecticut, had helped fold and address the first issues of the Present Truth in 1849. Donations from the scattered members supported the work, for the Review and Herald and the pamphlets were distributed free at first. The publishing work moved with the Whites in succession to Oswego, New York; Auburn, New York; Paris, Maine; Saratoga Springs, New York; Rochester, New York; then to Battle Creek, Michigan.

In Rochester in 1852 the papers and tracts were first printed on equipment owned by the members—a small press and a font of type bought for $652.93, raised by donations. Then quarters were found for the office, which until that time had been in the dwelling in which the Whites and their helpers lived as one family. In 1853 prices were put upon the tracts, which ended the dependence on freewill offerings to defray the operating expenses and furnish the workers with little more than room and board. The next year the Review was priced at $1 a volume.

But the sacrifices made for the cause by the editor and the workers were not sufficient to keep the publishing project going without further fund-raising. Finally in 1855 White appealed for help. Because of failing health, he wished to relinquish his responsibilities to a representative group of men. The publishing office was, he reminded them, the property of the church. In the autumn he accepted the offer of some of the members to furnish a building for the publishing house in Battle Creek, Michigan, and to finance the move.

In October 1855 the Battle Creek committee called a "general" conference to be held on Nov. 16, to which delegates from churches in other states were invited, to choose "those Brethren who shall conduct the Review." This conference voted to repay White for what he had put into the publishing work, above the original donations, and to name a committee to hold the press in trust for the church and to supervise the management of the Review and Herald. It named Uriah Smith as the resident editor, leaving White to act as a corresponding editor and to handle the publication of books. The following year it was proposed that the "book concern be united with the Review, as the property of the church, . . . so that no individual shall have any personal interest in the publishing department" (Review and Herald 7:168, Feb. 21, 1856). Another general conference (1856) voted, in regard to "the Church Book Fund and the Publishing Department,” that the publishing committee of the Review take this over also, and the whole church unite to remove the two debts.

These transactions relieved James White of the burden of management of the publishing house, but not of the legal responsibility for it. Although in the eyes of White and his brethren it was the property of the church as a whole, yet in the eyes of its creditors it was still White’s private enterprise, since the business had been conducted by him personally, and the church had no name and no corporate existence recognizable in law. There was at this time considerable opposition in the church to legal organization.

By 1860 this problem had to be met. “Now is the time,” wrote White, “for those who oppose legal organization, insurance, &c., to come to the rescue of the Publishing Department” (Review and Herald 15:200, May 10, 1860). Not only the publishing house but church buildings also, held in the name of individuals, were in danger of being lost to the church through the death or the possible defection of the legal owners.

As the problem of owning and operating the “publishing department” had induced the Battle Creek church to call several general conferences from 1855 to 1860, which were intended to represent, as far as possible, the church as a whole, so it was the problem of the publishing department that precipitated the church to organize and to take a denominational name.

As a result of the 1860 conference, the name “Seventh-day Adventist” was adopted and steps were taken to create a legally recognized association. The next year, on May 3, after the legal steps had been taken, the Seventh-day Adventist Publishing Association was incorporated. (For the history of this association after 1860, see Review and Herald Publishing Association.) Thus the publishing department was the section of church organization that came into corporate existence first, and was the immediate cause of the organization of the church as a whole under a General Conference, which came a little later, in 1863.

After 1875, when the Pacific Press Publishing Association was formed in Oakland, California, the Review and Herald was no longer the publishing department of the church, and other presses were established in many countries. (See list under Publishing Houses.)

General Conference Publishing Department. One of the most important steps in the development and growth of the publishing work was the organization of the present General Conference Publishing Department. It originated in 1901 as a publication committee to promote interests of production and distribution of publications. W. C. White was chairman of this group; E. R. Palmer was the secretary. Then in 1902 the organization of the Publishing Department added a new and forceful impetus to this branch of denominational work throughout the world territory, and brought about closer cooperation and unity between the fields and publishing houses.

The new Publishing Department was intended to carry the work of the former International Tract and Missionary Society (see Tract and Missionary Societies). However, it was felt necessary by 1913 to have a separate branch of the department, with its own secretary, to promote the lay activity of distributing evangelistic publications. From 1913 to 1918 there was a Home Missionary Branch of the Publishing Department, which became in 1918 the Home Missionary Department. Thereafter, the Publishing Department was concerned with the production and sale of publications through the Adventist Book Centers, Home Health Education Services, and literature evangelists.

Department Directors (the first two called chairmen): W. C. White, 1901—1906; C. H. Jones, 1907—1909; E. R. Palmer, 1909—1913; N. Z. Town, 1913—1930; H. H. Hall, 1930—1936; C. E. Weeks, 1936—1941; H. M. Blunden, 1941—1946; W. P. Elliott, 1946—1949; G. A. Huse, 1949—1966; D. A. McAdams, 1966—1975; Bruce M. Wickwire, 1975—1980; L. A. Ramirez, 1980—1985; R. E. Appenzeller, 1985— .

Publishing Department Director

PUBLISHING DEPARTMENT DIRECTOR. A supervisor of the literature ministry within a conference, a union, or a division. He or she was originally an officer of a conference tract and missionary society and was called a state agent. Such a supervisor in a conference has at different times and places been known also as the provincial agent, canvassing agent, and field missionary secretary.

For the director on the General Conference level, see Publishing Department.

Publishing Development Fund

PUBLISHING DEVELOPMENT FUND. A fund set up by the General Conference administered by the World Literature Ministry Coordinating Board to further special publishing projects around the world. Income to the fund comes from General Conference appropriations and annual donations from denominational publishing houses.

Among the projects funded are development of literature to meet special language or ethnic needs among large non-Christian populations, provide means for international cooperation in developing magazine articles and tracts that can be printed simultaneously in different languages, the purchase of printing equipment, and the construction of publishing houses. All allocations from the fund are matched by the recipient division on a 50-50 basis.

Publishing Houses

PUBLISHING HOUSES. The official publishers of the denomination, which produce the various books, magazines, tracts, and other forms of publications used by the churches and sold by the literature evangelists. A chain of Seventh-day Adventist publishing houses operates around the world field under a general policy, yet each is a separate incorporated body governed by its own board of directors. The 56 publishing houses, in 1993 employing 3,000 persons, issuing 300 periodicals, and printing in more than 200 languages, play an important part in fostering the interests of the publishing work throughout the world field. See articles under the names of the individual publishing houses, listed here in chronological order of their founding and with their present addresses:

Publishing Work

PUBLISHING WORK. In seeking to fulfill Christ’s great commission: “Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature” (Mark 16:15; compare Mark 13:10), Seventh-day Adventists proclaim the gospel not only by means of the spoken word through the “foolishness of preaching” (1 Cor. 1:21) but also by extensive use of the printed word. The publishing work provides a means whereby the speed and effectiveness with which all nations may receive the good news of salvation may be multiplied.

The founders of the Seventh-day Adventist Church early gave strong impetus to the spread of their teachings by the use of the printing press. They began with the Present Truth (1849) and the Advent Review (1850), both replaced in 1850 by the Review and Herald (now known as the Adventist Review and still the denominational organ); this was followed in 1852 by the Youth’s Instructor. James White was the first editor of these. Later, in 1875, came the Signs of the Times, and in 1885 the Pacific Health Journal (which became Life and Health in 1904). Also in 1885 the Sabbath School Worker was begun, and in 1886 the American Sentinel (succeeded in 1906 by Liberty).

But the early SDA publishing enterprise was not limited to periodicals. From the beginning, James White published tracts (many of them reprinted from periodical articles)—one in 1849, five in 1850, six in 1851, and others later.

The small issues were financed by voluntary contributions and until 1853 were distributed gratis. These early tracts on Bible doctrines and related subjects were the first of millions of SDA tracts sent out through the years and, in a way, were forerunners of the Bible correspondence lessons used in connection with radio and television programs.

Following is a list of the earliest pamphlets (under 100 pages) announced in the Present Truth, Advent Review, and Review and Herald through 1854.

1849:	James White. Present Truth, no. 1 (The Weekly Sabbath) . 24 pp.
	[James White, compiler]. Hymns for God’s Peculiar People . 48 pp.
1850:	James White. The Seventh-day Sabbath Not Abolished (Review of J. Marsh). 36 pp.

	J. N. Andrews. The Perpetuity of the Royal Law; or, The Ten Commandments Not Abolished (“Sabbath Tracts,” no. 4). 40 pp.
	[James White and?] Uriah Smith. The Four Universal Monarchies . . . (containing the recent articles in Review and Herald and the tract on the 2300 days and the sanctuary by Uriah Smith). 84 pp.
	The Sabbath; or, Remarks on the Following Subjects . . .

In addition to pamphlets, White began in time to publish longer works, classed as books, the first of which was a 112-page hymnbook (enlarged the next year by the addition of a supplement). His plans late in 1852 for a large doctrinal book of 400 pages were frustrated by a lack of money. The first doctrinal book—if we regard works of 100 pages or more as books—was White’s Signs of the Times (124 pages) published in 1853. The list through 1860 in the order in which the books were announced in the church papers has been compiled thus:

1852:	James White, compiler. Hymns for the Second Advent Believers Who Observe the Sabbath of the Lord . 112 pp.
1853:	Uriah Smith. Time and Prophecy (poem). 120 pp.
	[James White]. Signs of the Times . 124 pp.
1854:	Sabbath and Advent Miscellany (8 tracts bound).
	J. H. Waggoner. The Law of God: Testimony of Both Testaments . 132 pp.
	“Advent and Sabbath Tracts,” Nos. 1—4, in 1 vol. (see pamphlet list for titles). 152 pp.
	J. M. Stephenson. The Atonement . 196 pp.
	D. P. Hall. Man Not Immortal; The Only Shield Against the Seductions of Modern Spiritualism . 148 pp.
1855:	[James White (?), compiler]. Hymns for Those Who Keep the Commandments 352 pp. and 76 pieces of music.
	J. N. Andrews. The Three Angels of Revelation xiv, 6—12 . 148 pp.
	Bible Tracts , Vol. I (containing: “Sabbath Tracts,” Nos. 1—4; The Law of God [Waggoner]; The Sabbath by “Elihu” ; Why Don’t You Keep Holy the Sabbath Day? ; A Word for the Sabbath [Smith]). 386 pp.
	Bible Tracts , Vol. II (containing: Signs of the Times [White]; The Four Universal Monarchies [White and Smith?]; The 2300 Days and the Sanctuary [Smith]; Three Angels of Rev. xiv [Andrews]; Man Not Immortal [Hall]). 402 pp.
	R. F. Cottrell. The Bible Class . 125 pp.

	Annie R. Smith. Home Here and Home in Heaven, and Other Poems . 112 pp.
	J. N. Loughborough. An Examination of the Scripture Testimony . . . [on the nature of humanity]. “Pamphlet of 196 pp.”
1857:	[White and Smith?]. A Brief Exposition of Daniel ii, vii, viii, ix, also the 2300 Days and the Sanctuary .
1858:	M. E. Cornell. Facts for the Times (forerunner of the later Source Book). 137 pp.
	Ellen White. Spiritual Gifts [Vol. I]; or, The Great Controversy . 224 pp.
	Supplement to the Advent and Sabbath Hymn Book . 100 pp.
1859:	J. N. Andrews. History of the Sabbath . 100 pp.
	Uriah Smith. Which? Mortal or Immortal? 132 pp.
	J. H. Waggoner. The Kingdom of God . 172 pp.
1860:	J. N. Loughborough. The Hope of the Gospel; or, Immortality the Gift of God (enlargement of earlier work). 172 pp.
	J. H. Waggoner. Nature and Tendency of Modern Spiritualism , 2nd ed., rev., doubled in size. 144 pp.
	Ellen G. White. Spiritual Gifts , vol. 2. 304 pp.
	Uriah Smith. Which? Mortal or Immortal? 2nd ed., rev., enl. 128 pp.

In the 1860s Ellen G. White’s Spiritual Gifts, vols. 3 and 4 (1864); How to Live (1865), the first large book on health topics, edited by James White from several pamphlets; and Uriah Smith’s Thoughts . . . on the Book of Revelation (1867) were issued. In the 1870s the publishing work branched out with the opening of the Pacific Press in California. In this decade Smith added Thoughts . . . on the Book of Daniel (1873); and Mrs. White completed three of the four volumes of The Spirit of Prophecy (1870—1884), an amplification of her earlier Spiritual Gifts, vols. 1—3. The 1880s saw the development of bookselling to the general public by house-to-house colporteurs (see Literature Evangelist). The first doctrinal book printed for this method of distribution—the combination of Smith’s two books on Daniel and on the Revelation (1882)—is, with some revisions, still in print. Another popular book sold by this method in the eighties was Bible Readings (1885), originally formed from left-over files of a one-volume periodical, Bible Reading Gazette (1884). Another was the fourth volume of Mrs. White’s Spirit of Prophecy, revised and enlarged as The Great Controversy (1888)—the first of the expanded series (Conflict of the Ages) in five volumes, consisting of Patriarchs and Prophets, Prophets and Kings, The Desire of Ages, The Acts of the Apostles, and The Great Controversy. (On the extent of the writings of Mrs. White, see [White, Ellen Gould \[Harmon\], Writings of.](#))

Early in its history, the SDA publishing work branched out into other languages. Plans began as early as May 1856 for a basic tract to be translated for foreign readers in North America. The first tract, printed in German in January 1858 from the translation and stereotype procured from a Cincinnati firm, proved unsatisfactory. About the same time D. T. Bourdeau came to Battle Creek to translate the tracts into French (Review and Herald 11:56, Dec. 24, 1857). Before the revised German translation came out (June 1859), two tracts were published in French and one in Dutch. Seventh-day Adventists regarded these ventures as preparatory to carrying their message to “every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people,” through foreign-speaking members in the United States and Canada, circulating publications among their neighbors and also sending them to their homelands.

In January 1872 the Seventh-day Adventist Publishing Association issued the first number of a Danish monthly, Advent Tidende, which was edited by John Matteson (Review and Herald 39:36, Jan. 16, 1872; 39:53, Jan. 30, 1872). It was the first foreign language periodical published by SDAs.

The first overseas publication was a French periodical, Les Signes des Temps, launched in 1876 in Basel, Switzerland, by J. N. Andrews, the first missionary sent by SDAs outside North America. Publishing houses in several other countries in Europe and other parts of the world soon followed, forming eventually a chain of modern publishing institutions that reaches “clear round the world.” (See list under Publishing Houses.)

The literature produced by these 56 publishing houses in more than 200 languages includes a large and increasing list of devotional and inspirational study helps for church members, biographies, textbooks, songbooks, and children’s books, and also single volumes and sets circulated to the general public by literature evangelists. Popular works in English include the Bible Reference Library (the Conflict of the Ages Series, by Ellen White, in five volumes); a major medical series, You and Your Health; and children’s books in sets such as Bedtime Stories, My Bible Friends, and The Bible Story. These books and others by local authors are printed around the world in dozens of languages.

In recent years a large array of audiovisual aids including Chapel Records, compact discs, videotapes, and audiotapes; also, various teaching and evangelistic aids have been developed.

Seventh-day Adventist publishing houses sell through their own offices to one another as wholesale distributors, and to overseas fields. Those in the United States sell to literature evangelists through the Home Health Education Services in the unions or local conferences and through the Adventist Book Centers to the church members and others.

Lay members distribute tracts by the millions, missionary journals by the hundreds of thousands, educational magazines by the scores of thousands, bound evangelistic books and children’s books by the millions (see Missionary Literature).

Literature evangelists sell doctrinal and health books, children’s books in sets, and combinations on credit, and single volumes and smaller units for cash. Many devote full time to the sale of evangelistic publications as an occupation; every year college and academy students work intensively selling during the summer to earn scholarships; many church members work part-time selling the smaller books and magazines. These direct selling activities are promoted and directed by publishing department directors working in the employ of the local, union, and General conferences.

Growth of the Seventh-day Adventist publishing work is indicated by the value of sales from 1910 to 1992 as follows:

1920	$ 5,682,972
1930	$ 4,715,709
1940	$ 3,784,032
1950	$ 12,602,589
1960	$ 23,543,132
1970	$ 46,882,359
1975	$ 47,689,250
1980	$ 89,911,258
1981	$103,217,078
1982	$ 95,377,989
1983	$ 92,908,531
1984	$ 82,998,797
1985	$ 75,731,252
1986	$ 90,979,120
1987	$ 97,024,875
1988	$ 84,178,095
1989	$ 92,840,012
1990	$104,269,564
1991	$ 96,111,803
1992	$ 91,844,680

(Lower figures may reflect the weakness of the U.S. dollar.)

The three publishing houses in the United States are Review and Herald Publishing Association, Hagerstown, Maryland (incorporated 1861); Pacific Press Publishing Association, Nampa, Idaho (established 1875); Christian Record Services, Lincoln, Nebraska (established 1899 to serve visually impaired individuals).

Puerto Rico

PUERTO RICO. A self-governing commonwealth associated with the United States of America, occupying an island in the West Indies at the southeastern extremity of the Greater Antilles, situated between Hispaniola and the Virgin Islands. It is about 100 miles (160 kilometers) long and 35 miles (55 kilometers) wide, with a total area of 3,423 square miles (8,900 square kilometers). The population (1993) is 3.5 million, composed of three ethnic groups: Spanish, African, and mixed.

Until it was occupied by United States forces in the course of the Spanish-American War in 1898, Puerto Rico was a Spanish colony. Spanish is the language generally used, but English is the second official language, because of the influence of the United States. Recently the island has been developing gradually from an agricultural economy (in which sugarcane, tobacco, and coffee were the principal products) to an industrial economy.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. The territory of Puerto Rico constitutes the Puerto Rican Union Conference, part of the Inter-American Division. Statistics (1992) for Puerto Rico: churches, 252; members, 28,747; church or elementary schools, 17; ordained ministers, 80; licensed ministers, 42; Bible instructors, 3; teachers, 194. Headquarters for the Puerto Rican Union are at 1188 Verona Street, Villa Capri, Río Piedras.

Statistics (1992) for the constituent conferences—East Puerto Rico Conference: churches, 130; members, 14,564; church or elementary schools, 10; ordained ministers, 40; licensed ministers, 21; Bible instructors, 1; teachers, 106. Headquarters: 501 Julio Andino Avenue, Villa Prades, Río Piedras. West Puerto Rico Conference: churches, 122; members, 14,183; church or elementary schools, 7; ordained ministers, 40; licensed ministers, 21; Bible instructors, 2; teachers, 88. Headquarters: Sector Cuba no. 1060, Mayagüez.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. SDA work was opened in Puerto Rico in 1901 when A. M. Fischer and his wife went from Lincoln, Nebraska, to the city of Mayagüez to take care of an interest that had developed among a group of English-speaking Jamaicans who lived there. While working for the Jamaicans, Fischer learned Spanish in order to work among the Puerto Ricans. A year later he died, a victim of typhoid fever, but his wife continued his work singlehandedly until 1903, when B. E. Connerly arrived from the United States.

Shortly after arriving, Connerly began to publish a monthly evangelistic magazine in Spanish called El Centinela de la Verdad (“The Sentinel of the Truth”), the first Protestant religious paper to be published on the island. This magazine was published in Puerto Rico until 1909, when the editorial staff was moved to the Canal Zone. In 1904 C. L. Moulton, a colporteur-missionary, arrived from Jamaica.

By 1905 there were adherents to the Seventh-day Adventist Church in several places, notably in Mayagüez, Arecibo, and Santurce. In that year the first reports of baptisms appeared in the Review and Herald, although it is quite probable that several persons were baptized in 1904, for 19 Sabbathkeepers were reported then (Review and Herald 82:18, Jan. 26, 1905).

Organization and Growth. In 1909 the Puerto Rico Mission was organized, with William Steele as the first president. Until 1924 the territory of the mission included also the Dominican Republic, and until 1926 the Virgin Islands.

The first Puerto Rican missionary-colporteur was Rafael López Miranda, who was converted in 1912. He worked as a colporteur in Puerto Rico, Dominican Republic, and Venezuela, and on May 15, 1922, was assassinated in Venezuela, being one of the first Seventh-day Adventist martyrs in Inter-America. The oldest Puerto Rican Seventh-day Adventist church still in existence was organized at Moca about 1913 or 1914. Among the early churches were those at Moca, Santurce, Cayey, and Aguadilla. In 1913 C. E. Moon began medical missionary work, but no institution was established until some 40 years later (see Bella Vista Hospital). In 1919 the first Puerto Rican, Francisco Megrant, was ordained to the ministry.

In 1920 the first educational institution to prepare national workers, the Colegio Adventista (Academia de Aibonito), was founded at Aibonito. It was closed in 1928. In 1937 the school at Santurce began to add secondary grades. It was later moved to Mayagüez, where it grew into the present senior college known as Universidad Adventista de las Antillas (Antillian Adventist University), which is operated by the Antillian Union.

At the biennial session held in June 1948 the Puerto Rico Mission was reorganized as the Puerto Rico Conference, with 35 churches and 2,627 members. Its first president was S. L. Folkenberg. Two years later, in June 1950, Eloy Acosta became president, the first Puerto Rican to occupy that position. In 1954 the SDA medical work, hitherto carried on by individual doctors, became institutionalized with the opening of the Bella Vista Hospital.

At a special biennial session held in December 1968, the Puerto Rico Conference was reorganized as the East Puerto Rico Conference and the West Puerto Rico Conference. The East Puerto Rico Conference was established with 67 churches and 5,883 members. Its first president was E. C. Santos. The West Puerto Rico Conference was established with 51 churches and 4,514 members. Its first president was J. H. Figueroa.

Pune Adventist Hospital

PUNE ADVENTIST HOSPITAL. A 24-bed medical institution established in 1974 in Pune, India. In 1993 it had a staff of 49.

Medical Directors: C. A. Ninan, 1974—1982; Mrs. E. Moser, 1982—1983; P. Virathajenman, 1983—.

Puni, Fereti

PUNI, FERETI. (1918—1979). Teacher, administrator. He was born in Western Samoa, the son of a chief. He worked in the office of the governor of Samoa until he became a Seventh-day Adventist in 1949, at which time he began distributing the missionary magazine Tala Moni over a wide area of Samoa.

The following year he commenced teaching at Adventist Vailoa Boarding High School and in 1958 entered the gospel ministry. In 1960 he and his wife, Pua, were sent as pioneer missionaries to Ellice Island (now Tuvalu), where they labored for six years. In 1966 Pastor Puni was appointed principal of the Samoan lay training school, and from 1973 to 1975 he worked in the North New Zealand Conference. In 1975 he was appointed as the first Samoan to serve as president of the Samoa Mission, which position he held until his death.

Pur-aliment

PUR-ALIMENT. A plant for manufacturing health foods, operated at Clichy, France, a suburb of Paris, by a corporation under the supervision of the Euro-Africa Division. It was considered a successor to an earlier Seventh-day Adventist enterprise established in Paris at the time of the World Exhibition in 1900. At that time Arnold Roth and A. L. Meyrat, from Switzerland, went there to exhibit the health foods manufactured in Basel, Switzerland; they remained in Paris, and a few months later, with the help of funds from church members, Roth opened a factory on Broca Street under the name of Bonne Santé (“Good Health”), which manufactured mainly the products of Dr. J. H. Kellogg. Meyrat helped him for some time; then, with his wife, he opened a health food store, where, as opportunity came, they shared the SDA faith with the customers. In this way the first converts to the church were won in Paris.

When the factory faced a financial crisis, the conference took it over and appointed Jules Robert manager. However, when World War I posed a new obstacle, the firm passed out of the hands of the SDAs and began operating under the name Bonne Santé.

Meanwhile, Arnold Roth opened a new business in Étampes, near Paris, in his own name, called Pur-Aliment. In 1913 it was moved to Rue du Mont-Cenis in Paris. In 1928 he turned it over to the Latin Union Conference, and Oscar Ganty was appointed manager. After purchasing the business, the conference had no money left for operating expenses, and strikes and the social situation made the prospects appear rather dim. However, the manufactured products found a market, and several church members were given the opportunity to work.

During World War II Paris became an occupied city, and there were many restrictions, but the factory survived and prospered. Oscar Ganty remained in charge until 1947. In that year the former Southern European Division bought a factory in Clichy, a suburb of Paris, and transferred the Pur-Aliment business there.

After World War II the business prospered; a series of dietetic products made “Pur-Aliment” a trademark recognized beyond the frontiers of France.

However, during the 1980s the business declined, and in the early 1990s Pur-Aliment, after being moved to Strasburg, ceased to exist.

Managers: Oscar Ganty, 1928—1947; F. L. Kiehl, 1948—1971; J. C. Brun, 1971—1984; C. Dinsenmeyer, 1984—1989; J. Scippa, 1989—1992.

Pusan Adventist Hospital

PUSAN ADVENTIST HOSPITAL (Pusan Wisaing Byungwon). A general and maternity hospital with a capacity of 300 beds, owned and operated by the Korean Union Conference, at Pusan, Korea. The institution was established March 1951 in response to a request by the president of Korea that Seventh-day Adventists open a hospital for maternity patients. With 2 million refugees in Busan, and with hospital beds scarce, such a center was urgently needed.

In 1952 the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency contributed $20,000 toward the establishment of a permanent plant for the hospital. The several conferences allocated another $20,000, and $20,000 more came from other sources. Subsequently, in the autumn of 1953 land was purchased at the western edge of the city, and in 1954 a 26-bed, two-story ferroconcrete hospital building was erected. A nurses' dormitory was also built in 1954. In April of 1955 medical work was begun in the new hospital.

At that time the institution, hitherto operated as a branch of the Seoul Adventist Hospital, was reorganized as an independent unit. Since that date its patient capacity has been increased. In April 1970 the left wing was expanded to increase the number of patient beds. In 1981 the Department of Dentistry opened and the hospital obtained a license as a general hospital. In March 1984 PAH enlarged to 200 beds and was appointed as an intern education hospital. In November 1985 it was authorized as a training hospital for interns and residents. In October 1987 it was enlarged to 300 beds. In April 1991 the seventh floor was reserved for a cafeteria. In 1991, 206,400 outpatients and 101,450 inpatients were treated, 3,181 operations were performed, 43,310 patients underwent radiological treatment, 3,109 deliveries were performed, and the clinical laboratory tested 287,500 cases.

Qasid Publishing House

QASID PUBLISHING HOUSE. A publishing plant with printing facilities located on Multan Road, Lahore, Pakistan. The literature work in Pakistan began as a nonpublishing branch of the Oriental Watchman Publishing House. Established in Lahore soon after the Pakistan Union's establishment in 1949, it supplied imported publications for colporteurs and church members. The name was changed in 1971 to Qasid Publishing House. In 1974 it was reorganized to publish religious, health, and evangelistic books and periodicals for sale in the Pakistan Union.

A brick building valued at $10,000 was constructed to house the print shop, storage, and administrative office. Equipment valued at $50,000 includes two small offset presses, a typesetting composer, headliner, cutter, gang stitcher, binder, folder, collator, and darkroom and paste-up equipment. Operation began in 1976.

Monthly periodicals in Urdu include Sehat ("Health") and Qasid-i-Jadeed, Urdu mission quarterlies, and Urdu Sabbath school lesson quarterlies (adult and children).

The administrative board is selected by the Pakistan Union executive committee. The board of directors includes the Pakistan Union president as chair and the publishing house manager as secretary.

Qasid-I-Jadeed

QASID-I-JADEED (1948—); monthly; in Urdu; mimeographed. Official organ of the Pakistan Union. Supersedes the monthly Pakistan Union Newsletter, which was mimeographed in English.

Qatar

QATAR. Formerly a British protected state; declared independent in 1971. It occupies the Qatar peninsula extending into the Persian Gulf and has an area of 6,000 square miles (15,500 square kilometers). The population (1994) is 513,000. Most Qataris are Arabs, adhering to the Sunni branch of Islam. Arabic is the official language.

A Sabbath school was conducted in 1965 when several Seventh-day Adventist members lived in Qatar, but none are known to be there as of the end of 1993. Qatar is an unentered territory of the Middle East Union, an attached field of the General Conference. During 1972 and 1973, Kenneth Oster and volunteer Seventh-day Adventist physicians visited Qatar and conducted stop-smoking clinics in the country. There are many Filipino and Indian Seventh-day Adventist members living in Qatar.

Quarterly Meetings

QUARTERLY MEETINGS. In the early Seventh-day Adventist Church period, beginning about 1861, periodic meetings were held (about once in three months) at which the members of the local church and the surrounding area met for mutual encouragement, transaction of any church business, and the celebration of the ordinances of foot washing and the Lord's Supper. Usually a minister (at times a member of the conference committee) presided at such a gathering. In the early period, it seems, members of more than one church gathered together, or perhaps of more than one locality.

After the church had grown and had become better organized, the General Conference Committee in 1877 recommended a plan for regular quarterly meetings: "At each of these quarterly meetings business should be done in the following order:

"1. Sabbath morning, when the church has assembled, let the clerk read each name on the church record. When a name is read, if the person is present, call upon him to relate his present condition, feelings, etc. If any members are unavoidably absent, they should send a letter to be read at that meeting. If they are not present, neither have written, then let the officers of the church inquire after them and immediately either write or visit them. Thus every member of the church will be personally heard from and inquired after every three months. This will save many a soul from apostasy and will keep the record clean.

"2. Then let every church which has an ordained elder celebrate the ordinances. Don't put it off till the minister comes, nor wait till everything is in perfect order, but attend to it then and there. This would be a happy thought, to know that all our people throughout the world were celebrating these holy ordinances at the same time. Surely the Lord would be pleased with such a sight.

"3. On the next day or [in the] evening after the Sabbath, let all come together and pay their S.B. pledges and the one third see [Systematic Benevolence] for the past quarter. If any fail to do so, the treasurer should immediately see them or write them about it. Much depends upon the promptness of the treasurer in this matter.

"4. At the same time have a meeting of the Tract Society for that church, in which each member shall read his or her report for the last quarter, and hand it to the librarian [lay activities/personal ministries secretary]. If any fail to do so, the librarian should see them or write them immediately.

"5. At the close of the meeting let each S.B. treasurer prepare his report to be sent with his money to the state treasurer and secretary the next day, Monday. Also, let the librarian make out his report that day ready to be sent Monday to his director. Thus, every item of business in that church and Tract Society will be regularly attended to at a definite time once a quarter" (*Review and Herald*49:180, June 7, 1877).

In the late 1890s the plan apparently fell into disuse.

Apart from the quarterly meetings of the church, there were also quarterly meetings of the Tract and Missionary societies, district and state.

The quarterly celebration of the ordinances has continued to the present, as has the holding of quarterly church business meetings in some churches; however, individual public reporting on personal standing at these meetings has long since fallen into disuse.

Quarterly Review

QUARTERLY REVIEW (1929—1942, 1948—1976); quarterly; Euro-Africa Division. The South European Quarterly Review first appeared in April 1929, following the fourth quarter 1928 issue of the Quarterly Review of the European Division, after the reorganization of the European Field. It was published as the South European Quarterly Review until March 1935, when the name was shortened to Quarterly Review.

Because of the many languages spoken throughout the Euro-Africa Division the Quarterly Review did not serve as a church paper. It was sent out as a medium of communication to all English-reading workers in the division, especially to missionaries serving overseas, to denominational leaders, institutions, former Euro-Africa Division constituents living in English-speaking lands, and to families, friends, and former workers of the division. Edited at division headquarters, the eight-page Quarterly reported the activities of the SDA Church in Euro-Africa and the march of the work in many European countries and overseas fields.

Quarterly Review of the European Division

QUARTERLY REVIEW OF THE EUROPEAN DIVISION (1912—1928; 1912—1913 as Quarterly Report of the European Division; 1913—1915 as European Division Conference Review; 1920—1922 as Statistical Report of the European Division; quarterly, in English; Eur. Div., Bern, Switzerland; file in GC). Official organ of the European Division. Until World War I, it was edited at Hamburg, resumed at Skodsborg, Denmark, in 1920, and moved to Bern, Switzerland, in 1922, but printed in England.

Quebec Seventh-day Adventist Church Conference

QUEBEC SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH CONFERENCE (Fédération des Églises Adventistes du Septième Jour du Québec). The unit of church organization combining both the French and the English work in the province of Quebec, Canada. Statistics (1992): churches, 29; companies, 6; members, 3,602; ordained ministers, 12. Headquarters: 940 Chemin Chambly, Longueuil (suburb of Montreal). The Quebec Seventh-day Adventist Church Conference is part of the Seventh-day Adventist Church in Canada.

Local churches—English: Abercorn, LaSalle, Montreal (Mount Zion, Westmount), St.-Lambert (South Shore), St-Laurent (Norwood), South Stukely, Waterville; Filipino: Ville Mount Royal; French: Chomedey Laval (Laval-Ouest), Granby, Lacâla Tortue (Grand'Mère), Laval (Laval-Est), Longueuil (Mahanaïm), Montréal (Anjou, Beer-Sheba, Béthesda, Ében-Ézer, Montréal-Nord, Salem), St.-Gorges, St.-Henri, St.-Hubert, St.-Léonard, Sherbrooke, Sillerie (Québec); Spanish: Montréal (Central), Montréal-Nord.

Companies—English: Montreal (Mount Moriah); French: Gatineau (L'Outaouais Québécois), Lac Mégantic, Mont Joli (Rimouski), Repentigny, St.-Lazare (La Banlieue Ouest), St.-Jean, St.-Raymond, Trois-Rivières, Val d'or (Abitibi), Valleyfield; Spanish: Montreal (Maranatha).

The province of Quebec has an area of 523,860 square miles (1,360,000 square kilometers). The population (1991) is close to 7 million, almost half of whom live in or around the city of Montreal. Of this total, less than 15 percent are purely English-speaking. The percentage is higher in the Montreal area. The city of Quebec, with a population of more than 500,000, including the suburbs, is about 98 percent French-speaking.

History

History. For years the work of Seventh-day Adventists had been hindered by militant Catholicism, but the “quiet revolution” of the 1960s, as well as Vatican Council II, has changed the province from a rural Catholic farming society to a modern urban industrial secular society. Quebec nationalism has become stronger in an endeavor to preserve both language and culture peculiar to Quebec. Protestants are now free to preach and proselytize as they please.

Beginnings of the French Work. The first French-speaking SDA evangelists in French Canada were the brothers A. C. and D. T. Bourdeau, who held meetings in Quebec as early as 1859. The first French Canadian convert was Napoleon Paquette, who accepted the SDA doctrines in the United States. Returning home in 1887 to Lachute, Quebec, to share his new faith with his relatives, he was kindly received until his departure from the Catholic Church became known. Then, influenced by the priest, his parents turned him out. He took up colporteur work, later became discouraged and left the church, and 20 years later was reclaimed by L. F. Passebois.

In 1890 R. S. Owen and H. E. Rickard found in Angers three families of French nationality who had become acquainted with SDA teachings through reading denominational publications. A church was organized, known as the Angers and Buckingham church, but it was disbanded within 10 years.

Soon after the turn of the century D. T. Bourdeau, then 65 years old, returned to Quebec. Accompanied by his wife and Oswald Bourbeau, he pitched an evangelistic tent in Namur, Labelle County, preached in both English and French, and won some French converts. Bourdeau established a French-and-English school, which was taught by Oswald Bourbeau, relieved occasionally by Mrs. D. T. Bourdeau and Mrs. Peatment, who with her husband and family had moved there from Montreal. As a result of the work done at that time, a small company was organized.

In 1913 Jean Vuilleumier, from Switzerland (who worked in Quebec from 1911 to 1916), held tent meetings in French in Montreal. Catholic opposers cut down his tent, but when the daily newspapers published pictures and criticized the failure of the police to preserve law and order, the police department had the tent reerected and patrolled it while meetings were in progress. When in the autumn the meetings were moved to a hall, enemies continued to harass: they broke windows, assaulted Benjamin Boisvert, Vuilleumier's assistant, broke the chandeliers, and threw the chairs and benches into the street. Nevertheless, several embraced SDA teachings, and a French church was organized.

In 1915 the earlier company of Namur having apparently disbanded, there were only a few families of SDAs in the province—at Lawrenceville, South Ely, Racine, and South Roxton. Colporteurs, such as Argyle Taylor, Camille Armeneau, and Joseph Fortier, sold Bibles and other religious publications in French, undeterred by repeated arrests and imprisonments.

After Vuilleumier came L. F. Passebois, a dynamic man whose vigorous preaching on sensitive subjects brought him serious trouble. When in 1916 he pitched his tent in the province's capital, enemies pelted it with stones and threatened to tear it down. On the night of a planned raid, several of the would-be assailants, who had slipped into the tent to listen, were so impressed with the speaker's fearlessness that they decided not to molest him further. Later, on a Sabbath morning, his enemies burned down his home after he had left for church. Despite these hardships, he established a church of 19 members in the city of Quebec. Other SDA preachers also faced opposition from priests who made it difficult to rent halls or from parishioners who broke up the SDA meetings. In those days, to accept the SDA faith meant inevitably to undergo fierce persecution from relatives and priests. Because of this, many converts moved to the United States, and the French Canadian membership grew but slowly. Now, however, few emigrate to the States.

Passebois continued in the French work in Quebec until 1920 and after that returned for several summers, holding meetings in a portable tabernacle provided by the General Conference. Other workers in the twenties included Joseph Fortier, Louis Nadeau, and Edmond Sears. During this decade the church organized by Passebois in the city of Quebec died out, and its few remaining members united with the small English company at Rivière aux Pins.

Two projects undertaken to promote the French work in Canada were the operation of a French department from 1915 to 1930 at Oshawa Missionary College, which conducted classes in French and enrolled not only French Canadian students but others from the United States, Haiti, and Europe; and the publication of two French periodicals: Le Messager Franco-Americain (1921—1958; succeeded in 1959 by Mieux Vivre) and Les Signes des Temps (1922—1935).

After the union of the old St. Lawrence (Quebec) and Ontario conferences in 1932, the French work became the responsibility of the new Ontario-Quebec Conference. Passebois returned to Quebec Province for two more years. Sears also was there until 1934, Percy Marsa from 1936 to 1939, and then André LeCoultre.

Mission du St. Laurent Organized. In November 1944 the Canadian Union Conference committee, meeting in Winnipeg, took an important action that resulted in 1944 in the organization of the St. Lawrence Mission, to work for the French-speaking people of eastern Canada. A large building on Laval Avenue in Montreal was purchased and converted into a mission house, with living quarters for the mission director, an office, and a chapel. This building, dedicated on Sept. 1, 1945, provided a permanent meeting place for the congregation, which had met in the homes of the members or in the English church. The first superintendent of the new mission was André LeCoultre, a Swiss minister who had worked some years in Canada and was editor of the French magazine Le Messager. The mission also had one licensed minister, André Rochat, likewise Swiss. There were two churches, with 31 members.

In the city of Quebec, early in 1952, a property was purchased on the Grande Allée in which M. Joseph Bureaud, just arrived from Europe, took up his residence to conduct missionary work. Growth in the city of Quebec was extremely slow; the situation was more encouraging in Montreal.

Between 1953 and 1962 the mission's membership had grown from 51 members to 88. Most of this growth was because of the immigration of French believers from Europe and North Africa. When the quarters in Montreal became too cramped, the mission planned the erection of a new church seating 350 and a church school, at a cost of more than $80,000. A 30,000-square-foot (2,800-square-meter) site was purchased on Valombre Street, in the far east of the French area in Montreal at Saint Léonard. On Oct. 12, 1963, the new church was dedicated in a ceremony attended by W. R. Beach, of the General Conference, and by Mayor Paul-Emile Petit, of Saint Léonard, and his wife.

In 1963 there were two ministers in the Mission du St. Laurent: Erwin Morosoli in the city of Quebec and René Devins in Montreal. In 1964 came P. W. Esveld, a licensed minister.

Beginnings of the English Work. Adventism began in Quebec with William Miller's first visit to the Eastern Townships in 1835. He and other Millerite preachers continued to bring the Advent message to this area until 1845. Joseph Bates was the first Sabbathkeeping Adventist to hold meetings in Eastern Townships in 1848. By the following year he had established a small company of believers there. In the summer of 1850 James and Ellen White traveled through the area, strengthening the faith of the believers there. Through the 1850s and 1860s, several Adventist pioneer workers held meetings in the area. The first Canadian Seventh-day Adventist church was organized in Westbury and Eaton on Feb. 7, 1864, with eight charter members. Other churches made up of Canadian and American members were also established along the border with the state of Vermont. Although early Adventist work was progressing well, during the years 1868—1875 believers in the Eastern Townships were left on their own and had only one visit from a traveling preacher. This neglect resulted in many apostasies and fanaticism. In 1875 Pastors A. C. Bourdeau and R. S. Owen held a tent meeting in the Eastern Townships of Quebec in the township of Bolton.

This resulted in the organizing of the South Stukely church on Sept. 30, 1877. Another church at South Bolton was organized Mar. 15, 1890. It has since been disbanded.

This was really the beginning of the work in Canada. Several English churches have arisen in this area, but have later been disbanded because of members moving away. At one time (1901—1906) a small sanitarium was operated in Bolton. Besides the South Stukely church, there are two other English churches in the Townships—Abercorn and Waterville.

In Montreal Pastor A. C. Bourdeau baptized the first 10 members in that city on Oct. 1, 1899, and the same day organized the Seventh-day Adventist church in Montreal. This church has moved several times and became known as the Westmount Seventh-day Adventist church.

In 1971, following an evangelistic series by G. Vandeman, the English Norwood church was organized in the St. Laurent area.

The Quebec Conference. The Seventh-day Adventist Conference of the province of Quebec (later called Quebec Conference) was organized in 1880. In 1882, on the recommendation of the General Conference, it was enlarged to include the province of Ontario. Apparently it relinquished this addition, for in 1891 it again requested permission to annex Ontario. In 1895 the General Conference assigned to the Quebec Conference that portion of Ontario from Peterborough east. Four years later, when the Ontario Conference was organized, it again relinquished that territory. In 1901 the Maritime and Newfoundland mission fields and the Quebec Conference formed part of the Eastern Union Conference (later Atlantic Union Conference) for a few months, then separated and joined the Ontario Conference to form the Canadian Union Conference.

In 1920, on the recommendation of the General Conference, the eastern Ontario counties of Renfrew, Lennox, and Addington were transferred to the Quebec Conference. Five years later the Quebec Conference was renamed the St. Lawrence Conference.

In Quebec after 1900 the work went forward for about 20 years among both the French- and the English-speaking people. New English congregations were organized at North Hatley (now Waterville), Sherbrooke, Sutton (now Abercorn), and Rivière aux Pins. The membership in Quebec, an area that is predominately French-speaking and Roman Catholic, dropped to 150 in 1909, and 10 years later it was only 195. After 1920 the Quebec Conference concentrated its effort on its newly acquired territory in eastern Ontario. The 1920s were marked by an exodus of members, which affected Quebec also, and by the disbanding of congregations, such as the one at Fitch Bay, because of Catholic pressure. One note of progress in the 1920s, however, was the purchase of the Westmount Baptist church in Montreal. Even with the territorial addition, the membership of the St. Lawrence Conference at the end of 1930 was only 343.

The Quebec Seventh-day Adventist Church Association (“Association des Eglises Adventistes du Septieme Jour du Quebec”) came into being in 1971, combining the French and the English work under one organization. The St. Laurent Mission at that time ceased to exist. The association has now become a conference.

J. W. Bothe, then president of the Canadian Union Conference, and L. L. Bock, associate secretary of the General Conference and former president of the Ontario-Quebec Conference, led out in the organization of the association.

In 1973 plans were carried out under the leadership of P. Moores and S. E. White, president and secretary-treasurer, respectively, of the former Ontario-Quebec Conference (and carrying the same offices in the new association), to produce the It Is Written television program in French. In order to comply with government regulations regarding Canadian content, the program was produced in Montreal, as was a Canadian-English version. As of 1987, 138 programs had been prepared and were being carried regularly over TV stations in the city of Quebec and in Sherbrooke. Then in 1987 Il Est Ecrit was broadcast over a new TV network that enabled it to reach about 80 percent of the French-speaking population. The program was terminated in 1990 for lack of funding.

Between 1974 and 1972 several churches on the Island of Montreal and in the rest of the province were organized.

Directors of the Mission du St. Laurent: André LeCoultre, 1944—1946 (1946—1950 under the union); Henri Drouault, 1950—1952; M. J. Bureaud, 1952—1958; René M. Devins, 1958—1971.

Presidents of Quebec Conference: A. C. Bourdeau, 1880—1884; R. S. Owen, 1884—1893; J. B. Goodrich, 1893—1897; E. Leland, 1897—1899; I. N. Williams, 1899—1901; S. A. Farnsworth, 1901—1903; H. E. Rickard, 1903—1906; D. E. Lindsey, 1906—1908; W. H. Thurston, 1908; William Guthrie, 1908—1910; G. H. Skinner, 1910—1911; W. J. Tanner, 1911—1914; A. V. Olson, 1914—1916; W. C. Young, 1916—1919; F. C. Webster, 1919—1920; D.J.C. Barrett, 1921—1922; F. G. Lane, 1922—1925; C. F. McVagh, 1925—1926; M. V. Campbell, 1926—1928; W. H. Howard, 1928—1932.

Presidents of Quebec Seventh-day Adventist Church Conference: P. Moores, 1971—1974; P. F. Lemon, 1974—1980; C. Sabot, 1980—1988; R.O.A. Samms, 1988— .

QUEMOY. See China, Republic of.

Quimby, Paul

QUIMBY, PAUL (1894—1987). Missionary, educator, author. A graduate of Emmanuel Missionary College (now Andrews University) as president of his class, he determined to dedicate his life of ministry to China. He became fluent in the Chinese language and served as a government education official for Chiang Kai-shek. When he and his wife, Mae, returned to the United States, he became a professor in the Religion Department at Pacific Union College, where he served for many years. His book Messages of the Prophets is considered a classic in the study of the minor prophets, and the book Yankee on the Yangtze, which he and Norma Youngberg coauthored, relates his role in China.

Quito Adventist Academy

QUITO ADVENTIST ACADEMY (Colegio Adventista de Quito). A coeducational secondary institution located into Quito, Ecuador. It was established in 1985. In 1993 it had an enrollment of 154 and a faculty and staff of 22. The principal was Myriam de Pittaro.

Quito Adventist Clinic

QUITO ADVENTIST CLINIC (Clínica Adventista de Quito). A 28-bed general hospital in Quito, Ecuador, owned and operated by the Inca Union Mission and housed in a three-story brick-and-concrete structure built in 1960.

The hospital originated as a private project. In February 1957 Waldo W. Stiles, veteran missionary physician and surgeon, who had spent a good part of his life working in Seventh-day Adventist hospitals in Peru and Bolivia, arrived in Quito at his own expense and began SDA medical missionary work in that city as a personal project. Having revalidated his title of physician-surgeon with the Honorable Cuerpo Médico Ecuatoriano (“Honorable Ecuadorian Medical Body”), he carried on a successful practice in rented quarters, in the meantime using $37,000 of his own funds for the construction of a hospital building. In February 1961 Dr. Stiles and his wife donated the hospital, with all of its equipment, to the Inca Union Mission. The official opening of the hospital, named Clínica Americana Quito, was celebrated in February 1961. N. Biurrun was the first nurse anesthetist and Ruth Rojas the first head nurse.

Connected with the Quito Adventist Clinic and attended by the same physicians is the Dispensario Medico Adventista de Quito, a dispensary at which thousands of patients are treated free of charge every year.

The Quito Clinic sponsors stop-smoking programs in connection with evangelistic series. It also sponsors nutrition courses.

Medical Directors: Waldo W. Stiles, 1961—1972; Antonio Ottati, 1973—1977; Jacinto Alvarado, 1977—1979; Apolo Ruilova, 1980—1983; Guillermo de la Bastida, 1983—1984; Luis Garrido, 1984— .

Administrators: N. O. Biurrun, 1961—1965; Wolfgang von Maack, 1966—1969; Jorge Rivas, 1970—1974; Roberto Rangel, 1975—1976; Mario Soto, 1977—1978; Fausto Salazar, 1978—1979; Arturo Gnass, 1979—1982; Hugo Ramirez, 1983; Fausto Salazar, 1984—1986; Roberto Catacora, 1986—1993; Carlos Rambay, 1993— .

Raft, Julius C.

RAFT, JULIUS C. (1863—1934). Evangelist, administrator. Born on the island of Laaland, Denmark, in 1882 he migrated to the United States and made his home with an uncle in Neenah, Wisconsin. Soon after his arrival he was converted and joined the Methodist Church. From his uncle, who was a Seventh-day Adventist, he learned of the SDA faith and accepted it. In May 1883 he was baptized by O. A. Olsen. At the age of 23 he served as elder of one of the Wisconsin churches. From 1891 to 1893 he was a student in the Danish-Norwegian Department of Union College. While there the General Conference asked him to go to Europe.

In May 1893 Raft landed in Christiania (Oslo), Norway, and during the following 16 months worked in both Norway and Denmark. He was ordained in June 1894 by S. N. Haskell and Uriah Smith. Some three months later he enrolled as a student in the University of Copenhagen. On the completion of his studies he taught school for one year, after which he entered the field as an evangelist. Soon he was recognized as one of Scandinavia's outstanding evangelists. While devoting his main efforts to soul winning, he also served for several years as vice president of the Danish Conference, becoming its president in 1906. Two years later he was elected president of the Scandinavian Union Conference, comprising the countries of Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Finland, and Iceland. At the same time he was also president of the Scandinavian Philanthropic Society. Under his administration the Skodsborg Sanitarium grew into the church's largest sanitarium in the world field at that time. During this period he also wrote for SDA papers, produced several tracts, and authored certain books.

In 1922 Raft was made field secretary of the old European Division. This position he occupied until 1928 when the European Division was divided into four divisions. From that date until he retired at the end of 1932 he served as field secretary and ministerial secretary of the Southern European Division, with headquarters in Bern, Switzerland.

After his retirement at the age of 69, Raft returned, with his wife, to Denmark and made his home near the Skodsborg Sanitarium, for which he had done so much.

Ramos Mexía, Francisco Hermogenes

RAMOS MEXÍA, FRANCISCO HERMOGENES (1773—1828). Argentinean reformer who observed the seventh-day Sabbath and believed strongly in the second coming of Christ. He was born in Buenos Aires of Scottish Protestant ancestry on his mother's side, a fact that may account for his religious convictions. Little is known of his early life, but it is known that he participated in the struggle for independence from Spain. He was a landowner and took a great interest in the Indians who worked on his estates.

Most of what is known concerning his beliefs is derived from the writings of his enemies and from his notations in the margin of the book, La Venida del Mesías en Gloria y Magestad ("The Coming of the Messiah in Glory and Majesty"), by the Chilean Jesuit Manuel Lacunza. These notations indicate that he believed in the nearness of the Second Advent and probably held this belief before reading Lacunza's book. That Ramos Mexía kept the seventh-day Sabbath is shown by the fact that a document in the files of the national archives states that on Dec. 11, 1821, an investigation revealed that it was not only true that he kept the seventh-day Sabbath but that he had induced others to do likewise, to the great scandal of the neighborhood. In 1820 he wrote a treatise, Evangelio de que responde ante la nación el ciudadano Francisco Ramos Mexía ("The Gospel That Is Presented Before the Nation by the Citizen Francisco Ramos Mexía"), in which, among other things, he defended Sabbathkeeping. Many of his religious convictions were at variance with the teachings of the established church; he stood for salvation by faith, for Christ as the Christian's only priest, and against transubstantiation. Because of his beliefs he was dispossessed, and his family destroyed his writings.

It is not claimed that Ramos Mexía was a direct forerunner of the Seventh-day Adventist Church in Argentina or even that he held most of the distinctive SDA doctrines, but on two cardinal points he was a forerunner in the sense that he kept and taught the seventh-day Sabbath and stressed the doctrine of the Second Advent. He was part of the widespread awakening in many lands that called attention to the coming of the Lord and that culminated in the Advent Movement as we know it.

Ranchi Hospital

RANCHI HOSPITAL. An 85-bed general hospital operated by the Northern Union of the Southern Asia Division at the town of Ranchi, southwestern Bihar state, about 200 miles (320 kilometers) east-southeast of Calcutta, India. The hospital was opened in 1949 by Dr. R. V. Shearer, with two untrained national helpers, in the remodeled office buildings of the Northeast Union. By the end of four years the bed capacity had reached 31, the staff had increased to 20, and the hospital had begun operating on a sound financial basis and had become known throughout the Chota Nagpur area. In the succeeding years bed capacity was increased by turning the larger rooms of the buildings into wards and by bricking in the verandas. A new block of six deluxe private rooms, completed and occupied in 1957, brought the bed capacity to 56. Among new buildings erected were a church, which was dedicated in January 1959, and a nurses' dormitory, which was dedicated in December 1961. A Physical Therapy Department was added in December 1957, and a blood bank was opened in April 1961. A new women's clinic and administration wing was opened on July 16, 1972, and a new laboratory on July 26, 1973. The years 1974—1982 saw completion of the Silver Jubilee block, with 14 private rooms; a maternity block; a nursery; a new nursing station; and two treatment rooms. In 1986 the new Eye Department was opened. It provides free eye service to the public, in collaboration with CBN of Germany. A new X-ray machine was installed in May of 1993.

Rangoon Adventist Hospital

RANGOON ADVENTIST HOSPITAL. A 115-bed general hospital operated by the Burma Union in Rangoon, Burma, until nationalized in 1965. During 1962, 37,289 outpatients and 3,411 inpatients were cared for, and 462 major operations were performed. In 1963 six full-time doctors and 180 other persons were employed, and 49 students were receiving training in the Schools of Nursing and Midwifery.

The first Seventh-day Adventist medical work in the city of Rangoon began in 1939 when Dr. I. S. Walker arrived and established a clinic at the corner of Dalhousie and Oliphant streets. Large numbers of patients were cared for in this clinic until the work was interrupted by the Japanese invasion of Burma in 1942.

In 1947 Dr. J. C. Johannes came to Burma to continue Dr. Walker's work. He served until 1949 and again in 1954—1955. In July 1947 a suitable property, which previously had been used as a hotel, was purchased with the proceeds from a Thirteenth Sabbath Offering overflow. This property was remodeled, modern hospital equipment was imported, and a 60-bed hospital was opened in December 1947. U Nu, prime minister of Burma, and the United States ambassador officiated at the opening ceremony on Mar. 1, 1948.

A three-story addition, begun in 1953 and officially opened in January 1955 brought the bed capacity to 100. In 1962 a modern Pediatrics Department was added.

The School of Nursing was opened in June 1953, with Eliada Mann as director. By 1963, 75 nurses had been graduated. The School of Midwifery, opened in November 1956 with Dr. B. Y. Stockhausen as director, had trained 40 students by 1963. On July 5, 1965, the hospital was nationalized by the Burma government (Review and Herald 142:24, July 22, 1965).

Although the loss of this institution was a blow to the organization, in the providence of God we know that "all things work together for good to them that love God." Many staff members who had but a borderline Christian experience stood up for the truth when they came face-to-face with the test. Invited to stay on in the hospital under its new regime with no Sabbath concessions, they chose to lose their jobs rather than violate their convictions. Many of them found posts in different civil hospitals throughout Myanmar and continued to spread the light of the gospel.

Medical Directors: I. S. Walker, 1939—1942; J. C. Johannes, 1947—1949; E. M. Smith, 1949—1952; G. E. Richardson, 1952—1954; J. C. Johannes, 1954—1955; A. E. Geschke, 1955—1956; R. H. Dunn, 1956—1960; H. H. Dupper, 1960—1961; R. H. Dunn, 1961—1962; Heath Rowsell, 1962—1963; R. H. Dunn, 1964—1965.

Rangoso, Kata

RANGOSO, KATA (1902—1964). Minister, administrator, and translator in the Solomon Islands. He was born into the family of a tribal chief. His name means “no devil strings.” When Kata Rangoso (also spelled Ragoso) was about 12 years old, G. F. Jones, a pioneer Seventh-day Adventist missionary to the South Seas, came to the Marovo Lagoon, met the chief, and undertook to educate the boy at one of the mission schools.

At the mission school in Sasaghana, Kata Rangoso was a successful student. For a time he served as a private secretary to the mission director. In 1921 he was assigned as a teacher to the village of Hepa. Because of his proficiency he served for many years as an assistant to mission superintendents. About 1936 he was ordained to the gospel ministry.

When European leaders were evacuated during World War II, he was left in charge of the SDA work in the Solomon Islands. In spite of difficulties and even persecution, he discharged his responsibilities with distinction. Even before the war overtook the Solomons he laid plans for the preservation of mission property, including ships and personal effects. He also organized operations for rescuing Allied servicemen, and according to records, some 200 men owed their lives to his help during that time.

From 1953 to 1957 he was president of the Western Solomon Islands Mission. His outstanding contribution in the field of translation was the help he gave in the preparation of the entire Bible in the Marovo language. He visited America as a delegate to the General Conference sessions of 1936 and 1954 and also toured the Australasian Division, lecturing extensively in conferences, missions, and churches.

For a number of years he suffered from diabetes, finally losing one of his legs as a result of the disease. He died the day after the fiftieth anniversary of the opening of the Seventh-day Adventist mission in the Solomon Islands.

Rankin, Ida

RANKIN, IDA (1880s). Educator, dean. Born to a Wisconsin family that later moved to Nebraska, Ida pursued her education and became a teacher of some prominence. She was the first dean of women at Battle Creek College.

“Rapture, The”

“RAPTURE, THE.” An expression not used by Seventh-day Adventists but common among other premillennialists, meaning, literally, “the catching up,” or “the taking up,” used in a religious sense of the saints’ being caught up to meet Christ in the air as mentioned in 1 Thess. 4:17. It has become (especially in the phrase “secret rapture”) somewhat a technical term of the pretribulationist-dispensationalist form of premillennialism, used to denote a supposed removal of the church to heaven that leaves the Jews and the “nations” on the earth to go through the final tribulation. (See SB, no. 1520 and note.)

The idea of a “secret rapture” does not occur in Scripture. It is a theological concept superimposed upon certain passages in the NT (Matt. 24:40, 41; 1 Thess. 4:17). Christ and the NT writers explicitly affirm that the taking up of the saints occurs at the time of the personal, visible, glorious coming of Christ in the clouds of heaven (see SDACom 7: 884—887). The coming of antichrist and the great tribulation precedes, not follows, the rapture (Matt. 24:21—31; 2 Thess. 2:1—3). See Second Advent.

Rarama Publishing House

RARAMA PUBLISHING HOUSE. A publishing house with printing facilities in Suva, Fiji, formerly operated by the Central Pacific Union Mission. With a staff of 10 nationals (Fijian and Indians) and one expatriate, it prepared Sabbath school pamphlets, tracts, evangelistic periodicals, and small books in the following languages: English, Fijian, French, Gilbertese, Maori (Cook Islands), Motu, Neo-Melanesian (New Guinea Pidgin), Samoan, Tahitian, and Tongan.

The first printing facilities were established in Fiji in the year 1899 by J. E. Fulton. This operation served the Fiji field until growing obsolescence caused the mission to abandon the program in the early 1950s. Printing work was revived in Fiji when B. L. Crabtree installed a Multilith in the basement of the mission youth hall in 1965. In August 1966 R. F. Stokes joined the staff of the Fiji Mission as a missionary from New Zealand and took over the supervision of the infant mission press. This new program rapidly expanded during the years 1967 and 1968, and on Jan. 1, 1969, the publishing house became an institution of the Central Pacific Union Mission to serve the island territories of the Central and South Pacific.

Rarama Publishing House continued to expand until 1978, when because of economic pressures it was forced to close down.

Rasmussen, Steen Emil Marius

RASMUSSEN, STEEN EMIL MARIUS (1888—1941). Departmental secretary, editor. He was born at Aoning, Denmark. He took his high school and a commercial course in Denmark, then spent two years at Stanborough Park Missionary College in England. He was converted in 1906 in an evangelistic campaign conducted by J. C. Raft and was baptized in 1907.

From 1907 to 1912, Rasmussen served as secretary to Dr. J. C. Ottosen, the medical superintendent of the Skodsborg Sanitarium. Shortly afterward he became the editorial secretary of the Danish health paper. From Nov. 1, 1912, to March 1913 he worked half-time in the Hamburg Publishing House while studying German. Then he accepted a call from the General Conference to come to America to serve as secretary to O. A. Olsen, who was then in charge of the foreign language departments in the North American Division. When O. A. Olsen died on Jan. 29, 1915, Rasmussen filled the vacancy. He occupied this position until May 1, 1918, when he was called to the Pacific Press Publishing House as editor of several foreign language papers. In April 1920 he went back to Europe and served as home missionary, Missionary Volunteer, and educational secretary of the Scandinavian Union Conference. There in 1922 he was ordained by L. H. Christian and J. C. Raft. From July 1924 to Dec. 31, 1929, he was home missionary secretary of the European Division, and from November 1927 he also headed the Missionary Volunteer Department. It was while serving in these capacities that he organized the first Seventh-day Adventist youth congress. This was held in Chemnitz, Germany, July 17—22, 1928, for the young people of Europe.

In 1928 when the European Division was divided, Rasmussen became Missionary Volunteer and home missionary secretary of the Southern European Division, and in 1930 he was elected secretary of the division in addition to his other duties. In 1936 Rasmussen was called to Washington, D.C., to head the Home Missionary Department of the General Conference. This position he filled until the time of his sudden death.

Raspal, Marius

RASPAL, MARIUS (1879—1945). French missionary and administrator. In 1903, while serving in the French Army, he accepted the Seventh-day Adventist faith and was baptized. Two years later he attended the Latin Union School in Switzerland and in 1908 entered denominational employment. In 1909 he married Blanche Nathalie Bernard. A large part of his life was spent pioneering new mission territories. In 1921, the year of his ordination, he went to Mauritius and directed the SDA work there. While on Mauritius he made missionary visits to Madagascar, and in 1926 he became the director of the mission on the island and the first SDA minister to establish himself there. In 1929 he went to the Cameroun Mission, which recently had been assigned to the Southern European Division, and established SDA work there, opening a mission and baptizing the first converts. In 1935 he returned to his homeland.

Raymond Memorial High School

RAYMOND MEMORIAL HIGH SCHOOL. A coeducational boarding school on the senior high school level, operated by the Northern India Union of the Southern Asia Division at the town of Falakata, India, 30 miles (50 kilometers) east of Jalpaiguri, in the northern part of West Bengal (near the Bhutan border). In 1992 the enrollment was 510, and the faculty numbered 34.

The beginnings of this school are traced to the close of the past century, when Seventh-day Adventists first began educational work at Calcutta and established an orphanage there (see India). About 1899 the orphanage school was moved to Karmatar, a settlement some 170 miles (270 kilometers) west of Calcutta, and was renamed the Orphanage Industrial School. It was conducted by D. A. Robinson and F. W. Brown, both of whom died of smallpox only a short time after the school was established at Karmatar. The SDA Yearbook did not list this school, but it appears that the orphanage school continued to operate for a number of years and became an English-language intermediate school in 1913. The first mention in the Yearbook of any schools at Karmatar appeared in 1917, with two entries, one for Karmatar Middle English School, described as established in 1915 and offering instruction in Bengali and Hindi, and another for Santali Girls' School, described as established in 1913. The Karmatar Middle English School was succeeded first by the Santali Boys' School and then by Santali-Hindi Boys' School, which disappeared from the listing in 1927 but appears to have merged with the Northeast India Union Training School (established in 1917 at Entalli as Bengali Boys' School and then moved to Ranchi). The Santali Girls' School was succeeded by the Santali-Hindi Girls' School, operated first at Karmatar and later at Babumohal.

In 1937 these schools were combined in one institution at Karmatar, first listed in the Yearbook as Bihar Mission High School of Seventh-day Adventists, then as the Karmatar High School, Karmatar Secondary Boarding School, and eventually as the Robinson Memorial High School. In 1949, under the direction of its principal, M. G. Champion, the school was moved to the present site at Falakata and soon renamed Raymond Memorial High School (Raymond Memorial Higher Secondary School; Raymond Memorial Training School) in memory of Mrs. F. O. Raymond, who had donated a sum of money to establish a school.

For several years staff and students were housed in temporary quarters, but over the years two bungalows and 15 other teachers' homes have been built. In 1964 a new girls' dormitory was completed. In 1963 the school building was extended on the east side, providing four additional classrooms. In 1983 a new wing was added to the boys' dormitory, and in 1990 two classrooms were added on the east side. In 1992 two more classrooms were added on the west side.

Read, Walter E.

READ, WALTER E. (1883—1976). A native of Southampton England, he attended British Union College in its early days under Prof. H. R. Salisbury. In 1902 he entered denominational work as a colporteur. In 1905 he was called to the Welsh Mission, where he served until 1910. He was married to Emily Mary Powell in 1909, and two years later was called to Ireland, where he served for four years. After his election as secretary of the British Union Conference, where he remained for a year, he was asked to manage the Stanborough Press. In 1921 he became president of the South England Conference, and three years later he connected with the European Division. In the ensuing years Read served as secretary of the Northern European Division and president of the British Union and Caribbean Union conferences and of the Northern European Division. His last position was with the General Conference, where he served as field secretary from 1945 until his retirement in 1958.

Reading Rehabilitation Hospital

READING REHABILITATION HOSPITAL. A 100-bed facility established in 1960 to meet the special needs of the disabled in the counties surrounding Reading, Pennsylvania. Drs. Russell Youngberg and Irving Jones came from California in the late 1950s, and their feasibility study clearly defined the need for such a hospital.

In the belief that rehabilitation could best be furthered in a quiet, peaceful setting, arrangements were made to purchase an estate, located on Green Tree Hill along Route 10. This proved to be the ideal location for a rehabilitation hospital. The 263 acres (105 hectares) included formal gardens, fountains, seven other private dwellings, a large barn, and farm buildings.

Reading Institute of Rehabilitation soon became a place for intensive, compassionate rehabilitation care. The mansion was carefully remodeled to accommodate 57 inpatients while at the same time maintaining its classic architectural integrity. The not-for-profit hospital, a member of the Adventist Healthcare System, is owned by the Pennsylvania Conference of the Seventh-day Adventist Church and operates as a public service.

By 1971 the hospital was bursting at the seams. A capital campaign was approved and begun in 1972. Support came from business, industry, foundations, the Seventh-day Adventist Church, and hundreds of Berks County residents. Construction of a new 80-bed facility was completed in 1974.

Five years went by, and again it was evident that if the hospital was going to adequately meet the needs of the disabled, expansion was necessary. In 1979 a four-story wing for ancillary services was added to house the Communications Disorders, Psychology, and Social Work departments; doctor's offices; and a warehouse. The new wing, dedicated to former administrator Jack P. Schleenbaker, was built without an appeal to the community. In 1981 plans were made for the most recent hospital expansion—a special unit dedicated to the care of head injured patients. A capital campaign raised the necessary funds to open debt-free in September 1984. Eight rooms were added.

Growth in the late 1980s reflected a national trend toward increased outpatient services. A chalet on campus was renovated into a beautiful transitional living residence and day program for the head injured (Lifeskills/Lifebound). In 1990 the Pain Program answered the needs of those suffering from chronic pain. At the end of 1990 Clinical Contract Services took three decades of RRH expertise to a wider audience in the community by contracting therapy services to other facilities.

In 1991 RRH's internal restructuring along diagnostic program lines was finalized, providing a more effective continuum of care. Outpatient services were expanded with the opening of off-campus satellites. The three-year-old Workability Program, which provided work-injury prevention services and rehab and occupational health, outgrew its hospital location and moved to the heart of Berks County's northern industrial sector, to be more responsive and convenient to businesses. Day Rehab, introduced in 1993, is for patients who require multiple therapeutic services but who no longer need 24-hour care. This unique program allows patients to return home in the evening and on weekends while being a part of an intensive rehabilitation program during the day.

Reading Rehabilitation Hospital employs approximately 425.

Administrators: Charles Snyder, 1960—1962; Lemar Heydt (acting), 1962; Ray Crissey, 1963—1965; J. P. Schleenbaker, 1965—1979; Landon Kite, Jr., 1979—1980; Stuart Freeman, 1980—1985; Landon Kite, Jr., 1985—1989; Clint Kreitner, 1989— .

REAPER.

Reavis, Drury Webster

REAVIS, DRURY WEBSTER (1853—1939). Propagandist for religious liberty, circulation manager for religious publications. He became a Seventh-day Adventist in his youth and went to Battle Creek College for education in 1875. Between his studies he acted as a tentmaster for J. G. Wood and G. I. Butler, helped to reorganize the Sabbath school work in the Ohio Conference under D. M. Canright, taught public school, and operated a barbershop at the Battle Creek Sanitarium. He had a burden to circulate SDA publications, but the colporteur work had not yet been developed. In 1891 he volunteered to take charge of circulating publications against Sunday laws in Michigan. The task successfully accomplished, he was asked by the International Religious Liberty Association to continue work as its field representative throughout the Eastern and Southern states. For one year, 1898—1899, he served as secretary of the association. In 1901 he joined the staff of the Review and Herald publishing house as manager of the Circulation Department, promoting both books and periodicals at first, then periodicals alone, and from 1914 the Present Truth. He retired in 1933 and wrote a fascinating account of his life and experiences, entitled I Remember, replete with vignettes of early SDA life.

He is credited with buying the very first bound copy of the first Seventh-day Adventist doctrinal book printed specifically for subscription sales by colporteurs, Uriah Smith's Thoughts on Daniel and the Revelation (see King, George Albert).

Rebok, Denton E.

REBOK, DENTON E. (1897—1983). Educator, administrator. Born in Pennsylvania, he served the Seventh-day Adventist Church for 44 years, 23 of which were given to China. He taught at Washington Missionary College and La Sierra College and was president of Southern Missionary College (now Southern College) and the Theological Seminary. He also served as chair of the E. G. White Publications board and was a general field secretary for the General Conference.

Rebok Memorial Library

REBOK MEMORIAL LIBRARY. A computerized reference library serving the General Conference World Headquarters. Opened in 1983, its primary purpose is to be a resource and information center for staff and a cultural and educational center for researchers. It is situated behind the atrium on the first floor of the General Conference building. Funds for refurbishing the library in the new building were from the estate of Denton E. and Marie Opsahl Rebok, and the library was named in honor of the Reboks.

History. As early as October 1870 James White asked for a good library for the benefit of those who write and speak upon the prophecies and the Sabbath, and requested that 200 interested persons donate $10 each. Again in 1889 O. A. Olsen asked for books, pamphlets, tracts, papers, and journals, as well as donations, for a General Conference library in Battle Creek, Michigan. In 1906 the General Conference Committee invited Seventh-day Adventist publishing houses to supply a copy of every new book and to supply copies of books already published that were not already in the library. From 1910 to 1919 various sets of books were purchased from time to time for the General Conference library.

In 1919, because of the condition of the libraries in the various departments and the General Conference library, the officers deemed it advisable to establish a new central library for the use of the General Conference and the Review and Herald. However, these plans did not come to fruition.

In 1931 plans were laid by the Library Committee for the establishment of the library in new, expanded quarters, and requests went out for funds for books and operating costs. Thersa Rose Curtis was assigned to care for the library, along with her work with the Home Commission.

In 1937 the needs for both the General Conference and the SDA Theological Seminary libraries were recognized, and special appropriations to the SDA Theological Seminary library and the General Conference library were made.

In 1942 the Library Committee recommended transferring the General Conference library collection to the SDA Theological Seminary library. This was completed in 1946. The General Conference staff used the seminary's library, headed by Mary Jane Mitchell, from 1946 to 1960.

In 1960 the SDA Theological Seminary moved to Emmanuel Missionary College (now Andrews University), and the General Conference reestablished the General Conference library in the South Building, with Marjorie Lloyd as librarian. From 1961 to 1967 Hazel Olson was librarian; in 1967 the General Conference closed the library and placed the books and supplies in the Review and Herald library.

The Review and Herald library (under Ann Blackney, 1960—1965; Bertha Terry, 1965—1970; and Patricia Hirsch, 1970—1982) served the General Conference staff until 1983, when the publishing house moved to Hagerstown, Maryland.

In 1983 it was agreed to reestablish the General Conference library and to use the Library of Congress classification system, and to implement an automated computer catalog that would include the books from all departments and departmental libraries, as well as the main library. Jim Ford helped design the new computer catalog, and Barbara Hart and Frances Blahovitch input the books from the various departments and began the work of classifying, cataloging, and processing them.

In 1985 Loraine Sweetland was hired to continue the work of reclassifying and building the library collection, and to plan the move to the new General Conference building. The Library Committee was chaired by George Reid, director of biblical research.

Current developments: There are more than 23,000 books in the library collection, including the departmental book collections (more than 11,000 in the central library), and more than 500 journals are available. Resources are shared with other libraries by borrowing and lending electronically with Inter-Library Loans via OCLC. The library has access to on-line searching through DIALOG, Internet, and OCLC. Through the new PC-Term computer catalog (1992) one can access the holdings of the library and departments by title, author, and subject. CD-Rom is also available.

RECORD (1898— ; vols. 1—14, 1898—1910 as Union Conference Record; vols. 15—90, 1911—1985 as Australasian Record; vols. 91—92 as South Pacific Record; superseded The Gleaner; published weekly, 49 issues per year; 1993 circulation, c. 25,500; files in Review and Herald; published at Signs Publishing Company, Warburton, Victoria, Australia). Official organ of the South Pacific Division of Seventh-day Adventists. In 1953 alternate issues were increased from eight to 16 pages, and the subtitle “and Advent World Survey” was added. This increased paging was to permit inclusion of material from the Review and Herald. In March 1968 each issue was increased to 16 pages.

The Gleaner, the first Seventh-day Adventist church paper in the Australasian Union Conference, was a duplicated form, which was issued by the Australian Tract and Missionary Society in 1895, and which was issued as a printed monthly in 1896 and 1897 (vols. 1 and 2). In January 1898 it was superseded by the Union Conference Record.

This publication, which was the denominational organ for the Australasian Union Conference, was at first issued monthly, then biweekly on June 15, 1902, and weekly on Jan. 14, 1907. The Australasian Record reverted to biweekly during World War I, but has been a weekly since 1920. It became the Record in June 1987.

In times past the division secretary was the titular editor, but since 1967 the editor has been the editor of the Signs Publishing Company, with the division secretary named as the associate editor, to tie the division’s official organ into the secretarial department of the division.

Recreation and Amusements

RECREATION AND AMUSEMENTS. Early in their history Seventh-day Adventists devoted little time to recreation or amusements. Three reasons for this may be cited: (1) the Seventh-day Adventist Church arose in New England, an area noted for its Puritan background, (2) the church arose during the Victorian Age, noted for its conservatism, and probably most important, (3) the early SDA pioneers believed that the Lord's coming was so imminent that what little time remained should be occupied in proclaiming the Second Advent and preparing for that solemn event. As time continued and the membership grew, the need to satisfy the social requirements of the young people became increasingly apparent. Efforts were made to set up guiding principles in choice of acceptable forms of recreation and amusements. As early as 1865 the Review and Herald (25:87, Feb. 7, 1865) dealt with the problem: "They [amusements] are not the business of life, but interludes, recreations, refreshments, thrown in at intervals to save us from being utterly broken down by unceasing and perpetual toil. While we study or labor, while we do our part to work or to prepare ourselves for work, it is right, nay it is our duty as well as our privilege, to give ourselves up, from time to time, to amusements.

"But when amusements become the chief thing, when they take the place of the serious duties which God has imposed on every man whom He has created, then they undermine our principles, and impair our faith in whatever is noblest in virtue, or most holy in religion."

In 1868 L. D. Santee described an SDA New Year's party, which indicates the kind of activity that was considered proper for SDAs 100 years ago: "It may perhaps interest some to know how the church in this place [Gridley, Illinois] spent New Year's. It was determined to provide a basket dinner and recreation for the church and Sabbath-school scholars. Some wondered what could be done for amusement, as we do not believe in the popular amusements of the day. . . . The little folks began to gather in good season. . . . They amused themselves in various ways until dinner. One of the Sabbath-school scholars read the 150th Psalm, after which the children gathered around a large table spread with an abundance of healthful food, the older ones being served afterward. Dinner over, another short Psalm was read, when nearly all adjourned to a wide lane and engaged in simple and athletic games calculated to give tone and vigor to the system. . . . After playing a suitable length of time, all returned to the house, where Bro. J. M. Santee addressed us for a short time on the debt of gratitude that we owe to our Creator and Preserver, and on the duty of children to their parents" (Review and Herald 31:83, Jan. 21, 1868).

A few years later, in 1873, G. I. Butler, then president of the General Conference, set forth in the Review and Herald (41:169, 170) certain principles for guiding SDAs in matters of recreation: "In the training of children, that course should be pursued which gives the best assurance of the formation of a right character. We want our children to grow up to manhood and womanhood with characters which will illustrate the principles of justice, truth, faithfulness, and the fear of God, that they may be kind and tenderhearted toward those deserving sympathy; cheerful, hopeful, and earnest in behalf of right; and that they may bear up with courage under adversity and suffering. We want them to have minds, able to discern, quick to detect, and with courage to expose and resist wrong. We want them, also, to have bodies properly developed and hardened by exercise. . . .

“So far, then, as amusements are consistent with and help bring about the proper formation of such characters as we have referred to, so far they should be encouraged, otherwise, they should be discouraged. Proper development, then, of the mental, physical, and moral is the great end to be kept in view in the training of children; the moral being the highest and most important of the three.

“We first inquire, Do children need amusements at all? We believe they do. . . .

“Children must be active and stirring. Any system of training so repressive in its character as to make children like old men and women will dwarf and hinder natural development, sour the disposition, and make the spirits gloomy and misanthropic. . . . Cheerfulness is better than discouragement; hopefulness than despondency; courage than gloominess. Let such a course be taken, then, as will be most likely to produce such results. We think a certain amount of amusement conducive to such an object. . . .

“But while I thus plead for innocent amusements, I would ever guard against giving children the impression that they are the main object of life. . . . That parent who grants reasonable recreation and ‘agreeable entertainment’ to his children will far more easily be able to make the proper distinction appear to the mind of the child than he who always holds him to the same level sameness of useful plodding. . . .

“If it then be granted that some amusements are proper, commonsense would seem to teach us to permit only those which are innocent, and reject those which are demoralizing, or those which will throw our children under bad influences.”

After setting forth the basic philosophy of what he considered constituted proper recreation and amusements, Butler applied these principles to various activities: “Music, in its various forms, seems to be a very proper means of recreation and enjoyment. Within reasonable bounds, it seems to be eminently worthy of cultivation. . . . But when it is made the great object of life, we respectfully submit that it has exceeded those limits. . . .

“Athletic exercises, such as skating, sliding, swimming, playing ball, pitching the quoit, running &c., &c., are all proper and innocent in themselves, when kept within proper limits, and when connected with proper associations. . . .

“I now notice another class, such as marbles, checkers, chess, fox and geese, dominoes, billiards, backgammon, cards, &c., many of them involving games of chance, and games which may lead to gambling. There is such a variety of these that it is impossible to speak definitely of all. Some are far more objectionable than others. How far should these be permitted or encouraged? and how far forbidden? . . .

“I will commence at the most simple, marbles. There can be nothing objectionable in children’s having marbles to roll upon the floor or smooth ground, so far as that is concerned. But it seems to me the idea should be most thoroughly instilled into the mind from the very first that gambling will not be permitted for the smallest amount. . . . Property gotten without giving a fair equivalent for it is not properly gotten. . . .

“It cannot be denied that chess, and checkers, &c., do afford discipline to the mind. The man who can play a game of chess or checkers, successfully, has got to think, and think sensibly. Neither are they ever used to any great extent in gambling. But they become so fascinating to the mind that they are apt to take far more time and attention than they are worth. . . . I therefore think they should be discouraged as amusements.

“Card-playing consists of a mixture of skill and chance, and is so universally associated with gambling and debasing associations that it should be frowned down.”

SDAs today face the problem of evaluating many kinds of entertainment, some completely unknown to their predecessors.

Visual Entertainment

Visual Entertainment. This includes such forms of entertainment as serial cartoons, motion pictures, television, videos, attendance at the theater and commercialized sports. Seventh-day Adventists have been governed in their choices in these types of entertainment by certain general principles that are applicable in varying degrees.

Pictures are known to be one of the most effective means for influencing behavior that humans know. This being true, it is evident that there are great possibilities for good or evil in pictures, depending on the character of what they portray. Because of this, one of the basic criteria Seventh-day Adventists have used in determining what is proper or improper for a Christian to see is the character of the things portrayed.

Serial Cartoons. These are usually a series of drawings in narrative sequence. They may, for example, depict Bible stories; portray wildlife, historical events, or scientific processes; or picture scenes of crime, violence, and immorality. The character of the activity portrayed is what should determine whether the cartoons are proper for a Christian to look at. Seventh-day Adventists make use of serial cartoons for teaching Bible stories and imparting scientific and historical information to children, but regard the “comics” generally as being detrimental to the formation of a wholesome character.

Motion Pictures and Videos. The development of the moving picture, especially with sound, made possible astonishingly realistic portrayals of dramatic productions. Conservative Christians who had previously recognized the evil influences of the theater saw the same effects in the mass-produced movie. It is well known that the influence of the scenes portrayed, especially on children and young people, is powerful, and that the content of most of the dramatic shows is not in the direction of high ideals. These shows often glamorize the banal and tawdry, if not the violent and criminal aspects of life, and glorify unworthy characters and actions.

Seventh-day Adventists have been warned (in the Church Manual [1990], p. 145) “against the subtle and sinister influence of the moving-picture theater,” which is a training school in what to the Christian are false values—worldliness, laxity, and love of pleasure—and at times exposes the young people who attend to harmful associations.

While condemning the motion picture theater, Seventh-day Adventists are not opposed to the viewing of nontheatrical moving pictures, if the character of the activities portrayed is wholesome and instructive and if temperance is exercised in the amount of time spent. Church-sponsored institutions show, for their own groups, selected films.

Television. Through television the decision as to what to see has become a daily problem in the home. The Seventh-day Adventist Church has not condemned TV, but advises members to apply to all programs the same principles as for moving pictures, and further, to avoid spending too much time watching even good programs. The following is part of a statement prepared under the direction of the General Conference Committee and published in 1956 (“What About Television?” p. 4): “Unless viewers are constantly on guard, TV consumes an excessive amount of their time. Christians are stewards of the talent of time, being accountable to God for every moment to improve it to His glory. Time has been given to mankind for self-improvement, for work and physical exercise, for communion with God, for service to God and man, for recreation and enjoyment, and should therefore be employed in a balanced program that would bring honor to God and would fulfill all of life’s needs and duties.”

The Church Manual (1990, p. 145) gives the following counsel on television: “Safety for ourselves and our children is found in a determination, by God’s help, to follow the admonition of the apostle Paul: ‘Finally, brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things’ (Phil. 4:8).”

Attendance at the Theater and Commercialized Sports. Unlike the other forms of visual entertainment that have been discussed in this article, the stage (including drama and opera) and commercialized sports (including commercialized entertainment) employ living performers or contestants, but many of the principles that apply to serial cartoons, motion pictures, and television also apply to them. Ellen White writes concerning the stage: “Among the most dangerous resorts for pleasure is the theater. Instead of being a school for morality and virtue, as is so often claimed, it is the very hotbed of immorality. Vicious habits and sinful propensities are strengthened and confirmed by these entertainments. Low songs, lewd gestures, expressions, and attitudes deprave the imagination and debase the morals. Every youth who habitually attends such exhibitions will be corrupted in principle. There is no influence in our land more powerful to poison the imagination, to destroy religious impressions, and to blunt the relish for tranquil pleasures and sober realities of life, than theatrical amusements.

“The love for these scenes increases with every indulgence. . . . The only safe course is to shun the theater” (MYP 380).

The patronizing of commercialized sports such as baseball, football, and basketball games is discouraged by the church. Thus the Church Manual (p. 146) urges: “Let us not patronize commercialized amusements, joining with the worldly, careless, pleasure-loving multitudes who are ‘lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God.’”

Games and Sports

Games and Sports. Games. Games such as card playing are forbidden by the church because of their association with gambling (see below) and vice. Thus the Church Manual (1990, p. 182) calls for “complete separation from worldly practices, such as card playing.” Other games such as checkers, dominoes, Monopoly, chess, etc., are discouraged principally because of the time they consume and because they may open the door to other evils. Concerning them Ellen White declared: “There are amusements, such as dancing [see below], card-playing, chess, checkers, etc., which we cannot approve, because Heaven condemns them. These amusements open the door for great evil” (MYP 392). Nature card games, Bible games, and certain word games are recognized as being instructive and even valuable, provided not too much time is spent on them.

In general, if the character of the game and the spirit in which it is played are wholesome, the question of whether it is proper for an SDA to participate in it is determined largely by the amount of time spent playing it and the associations involved. Any expenditure of time that tends to rob from a well-rounded development should be avoided; any associations that are likely to lead away from God are to be shunned.

Sports. These include both outdoor and indoor physical activities, often competitive, although they may be purely recreational. The Seventh-day Adventist Church generally encourages the outdoor recreational sports in preference to the indoor competitive sports. The latter are not condemned when they are the best form of exercise available, provided that they are carefully supervised, that they are not carried to excess, and that a spirit of Christian fair play is maintained. But they are recognized as being a second-best form of exercise: “Gymnastic exercises fill a useful place in many schools; but without careful supervision they are often carried to excess. In the gymnasium many youth, by their attempted feats of strength, have done themselves lifelong injury.

“Exercise in a gymnasium, however well conducted, cannot supply the place of recreation in the open air” (Ed 210).

Granted that the character of the sport itself is beneficial or at least harmless, SDAs have adopted several criteria for determining whether a given sport is proper for an SDA Christian. Among these may be cited environment, associations, the spirit in which the sport is played, and the outlay of time and money involved. Thus, for example, while billiards and bowling provide some exercise, they are frowned upon by the church because of the environment and the associations generally involved. In regard to these types of sports Ellen White wrote: “The true Christian will not desire to enter any place of amusement or engage in any diversion upon which he cannot ask the blessing of God. He will not be found at the theater, the billiard hall, or the bowling saloon” (MYP 398).

Gambling

Gambling. In common with most Christian churches, SDAs object to gambling on several grounds. They believe it violates the principle of Christian stewardship of property, it is antisocial, it is uneconomic, since it does not add to the wealth of the community and it tends to make chance the basis of conduct. Gambling is incompatible with the Christian life because it generates and promotes selfishness, covetousness, and greed. Gamblers are not knowingly retained as members.

“Card playing, betting, gambling, horse racing, and theatrical performances are all of his [Satan’s] own inventing, and he has led men to carry forward these amusements as zealously as though they were winning for themselves the precious boon of eternal life” (CS 134).

Dancing

Dancing. Dancing in some form has been a worldwide practice throughout history. The ritual dance is found among the most primitive of peoples. In Bible times religious dances were associated with worship, as when Miriam led the singing and dancing in gratitude for deliverance at the Red Sea (Ex. 15:20, 21), and when David “danced before the Lord” (2 Sam. 6:14).

However, social dancing as it is known today is not found in Scripture, and from the beginning the Seventh-day Adventist Church has objected to it. “The amusement of dancing, as conducted at the present day, is a school of depravity, a fearful curse to society” (MYP 399). Because it is maintained that the dance tends to lessen interest in spiritual life, usually involves unchristian associations, and creates excitements that can lead to immorality, baptismal candidates are instructed to refrain from dancing (Church Manual [1990], p. 182).

Biblical Principles

Biblical Principles. In 1991 the Youth Department published an article, written by Malcolm Allen, world director of Pathfinder and youth evangelism, which identified five biblical principles to be used in the selection and evaluation of recreational activities:

“1. Stewardship of the Gospel. (1 Peter 3:11, 12; 1:15, 16.) A positive, balanced, healthy, happy, and vibrant lifestyle based on sound biblical principles is a strong argument in favor of Christianity. Our choices of recreation and our use of leisure time are an integral part of a practical religion. These should reflect the happiness we experience from a lifestyle molded by the ‘good news of salvation.’ They will confirm and not conflict with the principles of His Word and will help to develop and enhance His image in us. By our choices we will give a practical example of living Christianity that will show to the world our belief in the gospel. . . .

“2. Stewardship of Time. (Ps. 90:12; Eph. 5:16; Eccl. 12:1; Col. 4:5.) Time is the greatest talent and most precious possession that God has given, and it is to be used wisely in work, education, or leisuretime activities that will develop our intellect, strengthen our bodies, improve our health, and develop and strengthen our appreciation of God. . . .

“3. Stewardship of Finance. All things belong to God (Haggai 2:8; Ps. 50:10). It is He who gives us the ability to make wealth. Some of this He asks to be returned as His (Mal. 3:10), but the remainder is ours to be used in a way that may bring the greatest benefit and blessing to us, to others, and to God. In our choice of recreation these demands and principles should be remembered. . . .

“4. Stewardship of Influence. Our behavior and choice of recreation influence others. If we uphold the principles of His Word and ‘walk as he walked’ (1 John 2:6; Eph. 5:1), our influence will also tell, as His did, and we will be ‘known and read of all men’ (2 Cor. 3:2).

“5. Stewardship of Self. We owe our existence to God. He created us (Ex. 20:11; Col. 1:6), and we are made in His image (Gen. 1:27). Our body is the ‘temple of the Holy Ghost’ (1 Cor. 6:19), in and through which He abides and works. His desire is that we care for this physical body and keep both body and mind in the best condition. . . . To do this, we should be concerned with:

- “a. What we put into it—food, drink, drugs, etc.
- “b. How we clothe and adorn it—dress, jewelry, cosmetics.
- “c. What we do with it—the use or abuse of the body itself.
- “d. Where we take it—work, recreation, amusement” (pp. 31—33).

The article also provided several guidelines to be used in the implementation of the five biblical principles (pp. 38—41).

Possibilities for Christian Recreation

Possibilities for Christian Recreation. Seventh-day Adventists have endeavored whenever possible to take a positive attitude toward recreation. Thus local church organizations and the youth departments of the local conferences encourage such types of outdoor sports as hiking, camping, cave exploration, and boating. Local AY Societies may offer opportunities for wholesome fellowship in both service and recreation. Pathfinder Clubs, nature clubs, and hobby clubs sponsor various indoor and outdoor recreations. School entertainments of various sorts—some of them conducted by the students—crafts, collecting, AY class projects, hobbies at home, as well as parties of the wholesome sort offer further opportunities for pleasurable Christian recreation for the youth of the church.

Reed, Hubert V.

REED, HUBERT V. (1912—1989). Pastor, evangelist, conference administrator. Born in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, he gained his education at Southwestern Junior College and Union College. He was married to Evelyn Robinson in 1934 and entered denominational work as a ministerial intern in 1937. He was ordained in 1941.

After six years of pastoral work in Minnesota, he became conference evangelist for the South Dakota Conference in 1944. In a short time he accepted a call to the East Pennsylvania Conference, where he served for five years as a pastor-evangelist, followed by nearly eight years of the same work in Florida.

He was president of the Carolina Conference from 1958 to 1963 and of the Colorado Conference from 1964 to 1973. His last official work for the church was as health secretary for the Central Union Conference.

Rees, David Dee

REES, DAVID DEE (1871—1949). Educator, editor. After graduating from Battle Creek College in 1895, he became secretary-treasurer of the Oklahoma Conference. Successively he was head of the English Department at Union College (1897—1905), at Mount Vernon College (1905—1910), and at Walla Walla College (1915—1917); principal of Forest Home Academy (1910—1913), and Champion Academy (1917—1919). From 1919 to 1927 he was educational secretary of the Central Union Conference. When partial deafness necessitated that he change his work, he became manager of the Christian Record Benevolent Association, and through his energetic leadership did much to develop this publishing institution dedicated to the service of the visually impaired.

Rees, Pearl Lane

REES, PEARL LANE (1878—1966). Teacher, preceptor, dean. In 1898 she completed the normal course at Union College and that fall taught the first church school in Denver, Colorado. Later she served as secretary and bookkeeper in local conference offices. In 1910 she became secretary of the Atlantic Union Conference. In 1917 she accepted the work of preceptor of South Lancaster Academy and three years later took up the same work at Union College, a work that occupied 25 years of her life, broken only by short terms of service at Atlantic Union College and dean's work at Glendale Sanitarium and Hospital.

Reformed Seventh-day Adventists-Rowenite

REFORMED SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTISTS-ROWENITE (1916). An offshoot group led by Margaret W. Rowen, who had been a member of a Seventh-day Adventist church in Los Angeles, California. On June 22, 1916, she began to issue messages purporting to be testimonies from the Lord, claiming to have received the gift of prophecy. Disregarding the warnings of denominational leaders and committees who examined Mrs. Rowen's writings and publicly declared that they contained error and were not messages from God, some church members accepted her as a divinely sent messenger and took the name "Reformed Seventh-day Adventists."

In the autumn of 1919, Mrs. Rowen claimed to have seen in vision a document in the manuscript files of Ellen White, dated Aug. 10, 1911, stating that Mrs. Rowen would be used of God to give messages from Him to His people. When W. C. White and other workers searched the files of Ellen White manuscripts at St. Helena on Dec. 17, 1919, they found a loose sheet that had been slipped into the drawer of the 1911 documents. It purported to be a testimony written and signed by Mrs. White at St. Helena on Aug. 10, 1911, naming Margaret W. Rowen as a future messenger sent of God. The document bore evidence of forgery, but the mystery of how it got into the files remained unsolved for some time.

On Nov. 15, 1919, Mrs. Rowen was disfellowshipped from the South Side SDA Church of Los Angeles.

Mrs. Rowen announced in November 1923 that probation would close on Feb. 6, 1924, and that Christ would come in glory on Feb. 6, 1925. On Jan. 16, 1925, she said that she had been shown "that the 144,000, if necessary, will be taken from their abiding places and transported to the gathering place; and then immediately taken up in the clouds of heaven by the angels on Feb. 6, 1925." Her announcement of the date of Christ's coming was spread by news agencies throughout many lands, and was falsely attributed to the Seventh-day Adventist Church. The report created a sensation even though the General Conference officers released to the press an official statement branding the prediction as false and declaring that the Seventh-day Adventist Church had no part whatever in making it. The falsity of Mrs. Rowen's prediction became painfully apparent to her followers when the date passed.

On Mar. 12, 1926, Dr. B. E. Fullmer, a physician who had been a zealous follower and assistant of Mrs. Rowen, went to SDA leaders in Los Angeles and confessed that while he and others were visiting the office of the Ellen G. White Estate at St. Helena on Nov. 11, 1919, he had opened the drawer of the manuscripts of 1911 sufficiently to slip into it the spurious document to which Mrs. White's name had been attached by Mrs. Rowen. His sworn confession and the confessions of other persons cleared up other mysteries connected with Mrs. Rowen's work.

On Feb. 27, 1927, Dr. Fullmer was called about midnight to give medical aid in a cottage of an auto court near Lankershim. On entering he was struck on the head with a piece of pipe. Police, summoned by neighbors, found Mrs. Rowen and two associates—a doctor and a nurse whom Dr. Fullmer recognized as aides of Mrs. Rowen—there with the unconscious victim. A shovel, burlap, and rope, apparently for disposing of the body, were also in the room. The three were sentenced to serve from one to 10 years in San Quentin prison on a plea of guilty to the charge of “assault with a deadly weapon, with intent to do great bodily injury.” Mrs. Rowen was released on parole after about one year in prison.

REGIONAL AFFAIRS, OFFICE OF, AND REGIONAL CONFERENCES. The North American Office of Regional Affairs was dissolved in 1978. There was no new office to replace it, for its work was channeled to the regional conferences and the Black Caucus. A new office, the Office of Ethnic Relations, was created in 1979; its name was changed to the Office of Human Relations in 1980. Its focus is different from the Regional Affairs mission, but it does maintain statistics and background on not only the regional work but the work of other ethnic groups as well. Thus, for the history, development, and statistics of the North American Regional Affairs Office and of the regional conferences, see Human Relations, Office of.

Regional Literature Ministry Coordinating Boards

REGIONAL LITERATURE MINISTRY COORDINATING BOARDS. These boards serve divisions in compatible language, religion, cultural, or geographical areas and are organized as follows: the African Literature Ministry Coordinating Board—Africa-Indian Ocean and Eastern Africa divisions, Middle East Union Mission, and Southern Africa Union Conference; European Literature Ministry Coordinating Board—Euro-Africa, Trans-European, and Euro-Asia divisions; Asia/Pacific Literature Ministry Coordinating Board—Eastern Asia Committee (China) and Far Eastern, Southern Asia, and South Pacific divisions; Latin America Literature Ministry Coordinating Board—Inter-American and South American divisions.

These boards serve as regional advisory, planning, and coordinating committees for the total literature program and maintain a general overview of the publishing ministry in their territory. It promotes a production marketing and distribution program that results in the lowest possible cost and widest circulation of denominational literature.

Members of the regional literature ministry coordinating boards are the officers of the divisions involved, publishing directors of the divisions, the General Conference publishing director and associates, division secretaries, division treasurers, and publishing house managers as appointed. A General Conference vice president serves as chair.

Reifschneider, Karl Alexander

REIFSCHNEIDER, KARL ALEXANDER (1869—1929). Minister and administrator in Russia and Hungary. He was born in the town of Piatigorsk in the northern Caucasus. His mother, one of the first converts in Urup (an early center of Seventh-day Adventist work in Russia), was later married to I. Kablanov, a strong lay church leader in the Ukraine. Reifschneider was baptized in Alexandrodar, in the Kuban territory, in 1889, and the next year went to the SDA school for missionary workers in Hamburg, Germany. While there he was active in the ship missionary work. In 1897 he returned to Russia, married Tatyana Kusmin, daughter of another church worker, and preached in the cities of Mitau (Jelgava), Libau (Liepāja), Reval (Tallinn), and Riga, in the Baltic provinces, and in Łódź, Poland, and Bendery, Bessarabia (Moldavia) until 1902, when he was transferred to Hungary. He also worked in Transylvania.

In 1905, while in Hungary, Reifschneider was ordained to the ministry. In 1908 he was appointed to lead the mission work in Siberia, south of the Trans-Siberian Railway. Afterward he was president of the Caucasian Conference (1909—1912), and for some time between 1912 and 1923 led the work in the Azov and the South Ukrainian districts. From 1923 to 1928 he preached in the German Volga Republic. In 1929 he suffered a stroke, after which he went to Kiev to live with his daughter, Olga Goncharov (later a translator for Russian publications in North America and head of the Russian Bible Correspondence School at the Voice of Prophecy).

Reimer, Jacob K.

REIMER, JACOB K. (1891—1940). Minister and conference administrator in the USSR. He was one of 13 children born to a Mennonite family in Nikolayevka, on the Donets River in southern Russia. His mother was one of the early Seventh-day Adventists in Russia, and all the children in the family became members also. Jacob Reimer attended Friedensau Missionary Seminary from 1911 to 1913 and afterward entered evangelistic work in the city of Kharkov, in the Ukraine, under K. A. Reifschneider.

During World War I Reimer was drafted into the army and served in the military hospital in Moscow, devoting his spare time to helping the local church. In 1918, while he was in his native area, he married Elisabeth Goossen. In 1920 he worked in Dnepropetrovsk and in 1921 was ordained to the ministry by K. A. Reifschneider. Two years later, in 1923, he went to Leningrad as president of the North Russian Union. In 1925 he returned to the Ukraine as president of the Black Sea Conference, and about 1932 became head of the work in the Ukraine.

During mass arrests in the mid-1930s Reimer was arrested and sentenced to five years in the labor camps, with an additional three-year loss of all civil rights. He was sent to work on the White Sea-Baltic Sea canal and the next year was sent to eastern Siberia, where he served as assistant in camp hospitals. Probably because of his continuous evangelistic work (he baptized converts even in the labor camp), he was denied mail privileges after the first two years and later was sentenced to 10 years in isolation in far northern camps. Many years afterward it was learned that he died of pneumonia in 1940.

In 1941 his wife was also arrested and sent for 10 years to camps in Siberia, where she became crippled and lost her sight temporarily. Their sons left Russia during World War II and went to their aunt in Brazil. About 1962 the mother was allowed to rejoin her one remaining son there.

Reinke, Otto Eduard

REINKE, OTTO EDUARD (1875—1921). Evangelist and administrator in the United States, Germany, Switzerland, and Russia. He was born of Lutheran parents in Germany. While in his teens he was baptized by the Free Baptists, but soon thereafter joined the Seventh-day Adventist Church and began selling SDA publications in Danzig and Berlin. In 1895 he enrolled in the nursing course at Battle Creek Sanitarium, and a few years later he and his wife engaged in city mission work in Chicago, Illinois, and Milwaukee, Wisconsin, and managed the Helping Hand Mission in San Francisco for two years. In 1900 he was ordained and entered evangelistic work in Wisconsin. Later he worked for a number of years in the Greater New York area among the German-speaking people. He also wrote articles for the Christlicher Hausfreund.

About the year 1909 or 1910 he and his second wife (his first wife had died) sailed to Europe, where he was head of the work in the German-Swiss Conference for several years. When the East Russian Union Conference was organized in 1913, he took charge of it. When World War I began, he assumed leadership of the Siberian Union Mission, succeeding G. Perk, who was forced to leave the country. The heavy responsibilities he carried in Russia, together with the postwar famine and revolution, exhausted his health, and he died of malnutrition at Saratov, Russia, where the temporary headquarters of the Seventh-day Adventist Church in Russia were situated at the time.

Reis, José Amador Dos

REIS, JOSÉ AMADOR DOS (1891—1935). First Brazilian to be ordained to the Seventh-day Adventist ministry. Converted from Catholicism at an early age, he studied for the ministry at Colégio Adventista Brasileiro. After leaving college, he served as a colporteur and an evangelist in the states of Rio Grande do Sul and São Paulo, where he established a number of churches. Strenuous work undermined his health, resulting in his early death from tuberculosis.

Religious Liberty (principles and application)

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY (principles and application). Religious liberty may be defined as freedom from coercion in religious matters, by way of either compulsion or interference, in respect to one's choice, profession, or practice of any religion (or no religion); a freedom limited only at the point of infringement on the rights of others.

Article 18 of the 1948 United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights gives a succinct and well-worded definition of religious liberty: "Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience, and religion; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief, and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in teaching, practice, worship, and observance."

Religious liberty is distinguished from religious toleration in that the latter carries the connotation of sufferance that is granted the nonconformist (and hence may be withdrawn) by an established or dominant group; whereas the former is one of the basic human rights—the right of the individual to be answerable only to his God for his obligations to God.

The basis of religious liberty is the dignity of the human person, created originally in the image of God. God can accept an homage only when it is freely given. A corollary of human dignity is equality before the law and nondiscrimination.

The Seventh-day Adventist concept of religious freedom is founded on Scripture; there SDAs find an inspired definition of the Christian's duty not only to God and the church but also to the government under which the Christian lives and holds citizenship. Seventh-day Adventists hold that separation of church and state is best for both. Verses cited in support of religious freedom include: John 18:36; Matt. 6:33; Ex. 20:1—3; Rom. 13:1, 2; Acts 5:29; Matt. 22:16—21; Rom. 13:3—8; 1 Peter 2:13—17; Rom. 14:12; Dan. 3; 6; 2 Cor. 6:14; Matt. 10:28.

Seventh-day Adventist statements on religious liberty date back to the 1850s, when several writers identified the "two horns like a lamb" (Rev. 13:11) as civil and religious liberty (for example, John N. Andrews, "Thoughts on Revelation XIII and XIV," Review and Herald 1:83, May 19, 1851; and Hiram Edson, "The Times of the Gentiles," Review and Herald 7:129, Jan. 24, 1856). R. F. Cottrell spoke of the principle of separation of church and state, and the Christian's relation to the state ("Should Christians Fight?" no. 1, Review and Herald 25:180, 181, May 9, 1865). When the Sabbath Sentinel was launched in 1884, it was issued for the purpose of "sounding the alarm" on the "true bearing of uniting church and state" in the agitation for religious legislation (Review and Herald 61:16, Jan. 1, 1884).

History

History. Seventh-day Adventist views on religious liberty were set forth in 1889 as the "Declaration of Principles" of the National Religious Liberty Association, organized that year in Battle Creek, Michigan. The four resolutions directly related to religious liberty were: "We believe in supporting the civil government, and submitting to its authority.

“We deny the right of any civil government to legislate on religious questions.

“We believe it is the right, and should be the privilege, of every man to worship according to the dictates of his own conscience.

“We also believe it to be our duty to use every lawful and honorable means to prevent religious legislation by the civil government; that we and our fellow citizens may enjoy the inestimable blessings of both civil and religious liberty.”

There are some practical conditions for achieving a full measure of religious liberty on individual, local, and international levels.

Individual persons

A. Individual persons need the right and freedom to:

1. Hold or change or not to have a particular religious faith and join the corresponding religious community of their choice.
2. Teach and communicate their faith through witness and persuasion.
3. Worship privately or publicly, and have places of worship.
4. Educate their children in their religion at home, in church, or in church schools.
5. Receive religious assistance and care wherever they are, including in health-care facilities, military service, detention centers, and retirement homes.
6. Not to be coerced to act against conscience and join groups, associations, or trade unions not in harmony with their religious beliefs.
7. Not to be discriminated against in study, employment, professional, and civic life.
8. Observe days of rest and religious feasts in accordance with the precepts of their religion.
9. Exercise conscientious objection and perform alternative service.

Local religious communities

B. Local religious communities need the freedom to:

1. Operate according to their own internal order.
2. Appoint church or religious leaders without outside interference.
3. Operate educational institutions—including those for the training of ministers—health-care facilities, and other institutions appropriate to their religious mission and needs.
4. Publish literature to nourish the faithful and propagate religious faith and beliefs.
5. Have access to the media of communication.

Religious communities on the international level

C. Religious communities on the international level need the freedom to:

1. Operate world or international regional headquarters or administrative centers.
2. Communicate and have spiritual and administrative relations across international borders with coreligionists.
3. Organize international religious congresses, assemblies, committees, and seminars.

United Nations instruments upholding religious liberty as a basic human right include, in addition to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (Article 18) and the 1981 “Declaration on the Elimination of All Forms of Intolerance and of Discrimination Based on Religion or Belief.” This last document mentions specifically the right to observe days of rest in harmony with the precepts of one’s religion.

An official statement of the basic principles of religious liberty held by Seventh-day Adventists through the years appears in the Working Policy of the North American Division of the General Conference (1992/1993, pp. 227, 228). While this statement of principles was adopted essentially for the United States, particularly paragraph g, it represents the general Seventh-day Adventist thinking, especially paragraphs a-f and h:

“1. In a changing world it is essential to retain in clear focus the unchanging principles that govern the relationships between man and his Creator and between church and state, and to make clear the application of those principles to specific situations as they develop. Seventh-day Adventists believe these fundamental principles to be:

“a. That God as Creator of all things has established the relationships that should prevail between Himself and humanity, and between church and state.

“b. That God endowed humanity with intelligence, with means for obtaining a knowledge of the Creator’s purpose and will for the individual, with moral perception and conscience, with the power of free choice to determine one’s own destiny, and with responsibility to the Creator for the use one makes of these faculties; and that the first and supreme duty is to know and to cooperate with the Creator’s revealed will.

“c. That an individual’s relationship to other human beings rests on the basic principle of unselfish love as illustrated in the words, ‘Whatsoever ye would that men should do you, do ye even so to them’; and that application of this principle involves recognition of the equal rights of others under God and a direct responsibility to God for our treatment of one another.

“d. That the church is a divinely ordained institution, the role of which is to preserve and to proclaim God’s message to humanity, to assist individuals in making His design effective in their hearts and lives, and to unite its members in fellowship, worship, and service.

“e. That civil government is ordained by God; that its divinely appointed function is to protect individuals in the legitimate exercise of their rights to provide a suitable environment in which they can pursue the objectives set for them by their Creator.

“f. That in view of its divinely ordained role, civil government is entitled to humanity’s respectful and willing obedience in temporal matters to the extent that civil requirements do not conflict with those of God; in other words, humanity is bound to ‘render therefore unto Caesar the things that are Caesar’s’ but to reserve for ‘God the things that are God’s’; to exercise an active, personal interest and concern in matters affecting the public welfare, and to be an exemplary citizen.

“g. That humanity’s twofold duty to Caesar and to God, each in his respective sphere, implies a clear distinction between their separate spheres of authority and jurisdiction; that God has delegated to civil government authority and jurisdiction in temporal matters, while reserving to Himself authority and jurisdiction over humanity’s conscience; that in the best interests of both church and state, civil government must observe strict neutrality in religious matters, neither promoting religion nor restricting individuals or the church in the legitimate exercise of their rights.

“h. That religious freedom consists of the inalienable right to believe and to worship God according to conscience, without coercion, restraint, or civil disability, and to practice one's religion and promulgate it without interference or penalty; and of the obligation to grant the same right to others.

“In view of these principles, we hold that religious liberty for all is best achieved, guaranteed, and preserved through the separation of church and state as set forth in the Constitution and the Bill of Rights. . . .

“We recognize that both the church and the state may serve the citizens in certain fields, and that some of these functions may overlap. Remuneration from the state for services rendered properly may be received by church institutions. The church and its institutions may also, without compromising their position, accept from the state certain limited favors, such as tax exemption, and police and fire protection.

“The church recognizes the right of its individual members to accept assistance from the state under such programs as the public health service, school lunches, and similar programs designed for the benefit of both parent and child. Further programs that call for the cooperation of the church will be reviewed as provided below.”

At the 1972 Annual Council, guidelines were established to ensure that separation of church and state not be weakened. These guidelines, applicable in the United States, are summarized here as they now appear with minor editorial revisions on pages 229—232 of the NAD Working Policy (1992/1993):

Primary Objectives Must Be Maintained

“Primary Objectives Must Be Maintained— 1. Every institution of the church—educational, medical, publishing, etc.—is an instrument vital to the realization of church aims and is operated for that purpose.

“2. All involvements of church institutions with governments, business, societies, and individuals which would inhibit the achievement of religious objectives shall be avoided.

“3. Only such support for church institutions and programs as will aid in reaching institutional objectives without subverting their distinctly spiritual goals shall be considered or accepted.

“4. If support jeopardizes the unique purposes of the Seventh-day Adventist Church, its policies, or the emphases of a church institution or the position of the general church body, adjustments must be made to safeguard the purposes of the institution. Failing this, the support must be terminated.

Credibility With the Church, the Public, and the Government

“Credibility With the Church, the Public, and the Government— 1. Policy and practice will cause church leadership to state and to publish its commitment to the God-given principles of Christian education and its uncompromising determination to achieve fully the distinctive goals of all institutions of the church.

“a. To ensure the greatest possible degree of credibility and confidence within the church, the church leadership shall

“1) Inform the church membership fully regarding the basic principles of separation between church and state, the provisions on church policy with respect to this matter, and the guidelines adopted to safeguard the integrity of church institutions,

“2) Make periodic reports indicating the degree of involvement (financial and otherwise) of church institutions with the various levels and agencies of government, and

“3) Fully inform the church concerning the possible problems connected with the acceptance of government funds.

“b. To ensure the highest level of integrity with the government and private corporations, institutions shall file with the granting agency or department the approved statement of the Seventh-day Adventist Philosophy of Higher Education (or the approved abstract) with each application for loans, grants, or other financial favors. When a number of institutions apply for support grants from the same agencies on the federal level, the North American Division shall file the appropriate statement with such agency or agencies.”

The 1972 Annual Council action for North America continues: “The above limitations shall not be construed to prejudice the acceptance of the regular functions of the public health departments, such as nurses’ services, vaccinations, inoculations, or tuberculosis surveys; nor shall it forbid the acquisition, for a consideration, of government surplus; nor shall it prejudice the acceptance of government research grants to, or contracts with, colleges and universities whereby the government pays for specific projects and where said grant or contract is limited to the assigned project and does not interfere with the stated policies, objectives, and programs of the school.

“Any government aid program not specifically covered in the provisions above shall not be accepted unless and until it is approved by the institution’s operating board, and the union and North American Division committee.

“Medical institutions are unique among Adventist institutions, since they serve all individuals irrespective of religious conviction, do not require acceptance of religious instruction, and render a recognized service to the medical needs of the communities in which they are located; therefore, government grants for capital development may be considered. However, it shall be understood that a grant shall be received only after careful study by the operating board, and approval by the unions, and the North American Division Legislation and Religious Liberty Committee, and the North American Division Committee.

“The North American Division Committee shall appoint a continuing representative committee to study general policies on church and state relationships, and particular problems, for early consideration and report to the North American Division Committee.”

Religious Liberty Association

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY ASSOCIATION. A popular name for the several organizations formed by Seventh-day Adventists to promote religious freedom, such as the National Religious Liberty Association (1889—1893), International Religious Liberty Association (1893—1901, 1946—), Religious Liberty Association of North America (1964—). It is also the name of the organization that sponsored Liberty from 1909 to 1955.

Religious Liberty Association of North America

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY ASSOCIATION OF NORTH AMERICA. A Seventh-day Adventist-sponsored association incorporated in 1964 in the District of Columbia for the following purposes: (a) to disseminate the principles of religious liberty throughout the world, (b) to defend and safeguard by all legitimate means and agencies the right of man to worship or not to worship as each shall individually choose, and (c) to receive donations for the carrying out of its purposes.

The association has two types of membership: (1) voting, limited to 100 in number, elected by the board of trustees; and (2) nonvoting, unlimited in number, who become members when their application is accepted by the secretary. (In 1965 there were no nonvoting members in the association.) The affairs of the association are managed by a board of trustees. The headquarters of the association are at the offices of the General Conference.

The association sponsors the publication of Liberty: A Magazine of Religious Freedom, and has on campuses of Seventh-day Adventist colleges a number of chapters, which educate the students in the principles and practices of public affairs in relation to religious freedom. In 1965 there were active chapters at Andrews University, Union College, Walla Walla College, Pacific Union College, Southern Missionary College, and La Sierra College. The students held honorary memberships in the association.

Religious Liberty Bureau

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY BUREAU. The name for the Religious Liberty Department appearing in the General Conference minutes, June 4, 1905, and used in the Yearbooks of 1905 through 1909.

On June 10, 1909, the General Conference Committee voted to change the name from Religious Liberty Bureau to Religious Liberty Department (now the Department of Public Affairs and Religious Liberty).

Religious Liberty Department

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY DEPARTMENT. See Public Affairs and Religious Liberty, Department of.

Religious Liberty Library

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY LIBRARY (1892—1901?; absorbed the Sentinel Library in 1894; monthly, sometimes quarterly; 2nd series, 1899—1901; incomplete file in RH). A series of pamphlets on religious liberty topics, issued as a periodical, published by the National Religious Liberty Association, 1892—1903; International Religious Liberty Association, 1893—1894, 1899—1901; International Tract Society, 1894—1896; RH, 1896—1899. There were occasional extras.

Remnant Church

REMNANT CHURCH. In Seventh-day Adventist parlance, those divinely commissioned to proclaim to the world God's last message of grace prior to the close of probation and the return of Christ in power and glory at His second advent. SDAs understand that the three angels' messages of Rev. 14:6—12, coupled with the message of Rev. 18:1—4, constitute this last message, which summons all people everywhere to worship the Creator in view of the fact that the hour of divine judgment is at hand, and warns against succumbing to the great latter-day apostasy foretold in Rev. 13:11—17. Convinced that the time has come for this message to be given, and in view of the fact that they alone among the bodies of Christendom are giving this message, SDAs believe the term remnant to be an appropriate designation of themselves in their role as God's appointed witnesses to earth's last generation. At the same time they hold that God has loyal people in the other Christian churches.

The term remnant in Rev. 12:17—from which the expression “remnant church” is derived—is based on OT usage of it to describe successive generations of Israelites as being in the line of God's chosen people down through the centuries. This faithful “remnant” was heir to the sacred promises, privileges, and responsibilities of the covenant originally made with Abraham and later confirmed at Sinai. It consisted of Israelites who survived such calamities as apostasy, war, captivity, pestilence, and famine, and were spared in mercy to continue as God's chosen people. (See 2 Chron. 30:6; Ezra 9:14; Isa. 10:20; Eze. 6:8, 9; 7:16.) It was always a relatively small group that remained loyal to the true God, that accepted anew the responsibilities and privileges of the covenant, and that went forth to witness for Him (2 Kings 19:30, 31; Isa. 37:31, 32; 66:19).

The Protestant churches of the Reformation era may be considered God's faithful remnant after more than a millennium of papal apostasy. SDAs hold that various Protestant groups served as Heaven's appointed harbingers of truth, point by point restoring the gospel to its pristine purity, but that one by one these groups became satisfied with their partial concept of truth and failed to advance as light from God's Word increased, and with each refusal to advance, God raised up another chosen instrument to proclaim His truth to earth's inhabitants.

Finally, with the arrival of “the time of the end”—the time when Heaven's last message (Rev. 14:6—12) was to be proclaimed to the world—God called another “remnant,” the one designated in Rev. 12:17 as the remnant of the long and worthy line of heroes of the faith. This is God's last remnant by virtue of the fact that it is the appointed herald of His final appeal to the world to accept His gracious gift of salvation. From early times SDAs have proclaimed the three messages of Rev. 14:6—12 as God's last appeal to sinners to accept Christ, and have humbly believed their movement to be the one designated in Rev. 12:17 as “the remnant.” SDAs hold that no other religious body is proclaiming this composite message, and no other meets the specifications enumerated in Rev. 12:17, that God's faithful ones are now scattered among all the churches of Christendom, but that all who purpose to order their lives in harmony with all His revealed will are potential members of the remnant mentioned in Rev. 12:17.

One chapter in the first SDA pamphlet, A Word to the "Little Flock" (1847), bore the title "To the Remnant Scattered Abroad." This chapter had appeared as a broadside in April 1846, under the title "To the Little Remnant Scattered Abroad." This is the first known use of the term by SDAs. In the Review and Herald for Feb. 28, 1856 (7:176), Uriah Smith replied to a questioner who asked why SDAs claim to be "the remnant," what they were the remnant of, and whether they consider themselves to be Jews. Smith explained that Christians are "heirs according to the promise" (Gal. 3:7, 29), and cited Rev. 12:17 as applying the word beyond the Jewish era, to Christian times. Furthermore, he said SDAs are the only ones who meet the conditions specified in Rev. 12:17 for God's last remnant, for they alone keep all of God's commandments and have the faith of Jesus. He cited Joel 2:28—32 also— "the remnant whom the Lord shall call"—as referring to the church in the last days, and concluded: "That remnant we claim to be inasmuch as we bear their characteristics." The following year James White made a defense of the appropriateness of the term "remnant" as applied to SDAs. He concluded that (1) Satan's war on the remnant is the last link in the prophetic chain of Rev. 12 (the context assigns the "remnant" of Rev. 12:17 to a period of time after the 1260 days of vs. 6 and 14); (2) "the figurative word, remnant, must represent the latest members of the church of Jesus Christ, living just before His second coming"; and (3) as a commandment-keeping people, Seventh-day Adventists meet the specifications given in Rev. 12:17 1 (ibid. 9:76, Jan. 8, 1857).

Early Sabbathkeeping Adventists called themselves "the remnant" by virtue of the fact that they were, at the time, an unorganized and scattered remnant of those who had accepted the Advent message of 1844 and who still believed that God had been, and still was, leading them. The word "remnant" reflected the idea that they were a small group who remained loyal to the Advent hope, that they were the last group of God's chosen people prior to the coming of Christ, and that they alone were complying with the conditions specified in Rev. 12:17. Today Seventh-day Adventists emphasize the scriptural basis and usage of the term (see SDACom, additional note on Rev. 12) as applicable to those whom God chooses to be His witnesses to earth's last generation.

Rentfro, Clarence Emerson

RENTFRO, CLARENCE EMERSON (1877—1951). Pioneer Seventh-day Adventist worker in Portugal. He was born into an SDA family and was educated at Battle Creek College (1897—1898), Union College (1900), and Emmanuel Missionary College (1902), without, however, receiving a degree. At the age of 21 he began to sell SDA publications, and his experiences while in this work led him to determine to become a missionary to Catholic countries. In 1903 he was given a license to preach. In the same year he married Mary Loizette Haskell, a nurse from the Iowa Sanitarium. In 1904 they set out for Spain, but on the way they were diverted to Portugal, where they opened SDA mission work.

In 1907 Rentfro was ordained to the ministry by A. G. Daniells at a council in Switzerland. In 1917 he went to Brazil, where he served as superintendent of the Minas Gerais Mission and the Pernambuco Mission, and taught Bible and history at the Brazilian Seminary. A health problem in his family caused him to return to the United States in 1924. Subsequently he preached in North Dakota and Michigan until his retirement in 1938.

Replogle, George Brumbaugh

REPLOGLE, GEORGE BRUMBAUGH (1866—1955). Pioneer medical missionary in South Africa and Argentina. Before joining the Seventh-day Adventist Church at the age of 21, he had worked as a telegraph operator for the Pennsylvania and Santa Fe railroads and had taught school briefly. He canvassed in his native state, Pennsylvania, for a while, then enrolled for nurse's training at Battle Creek Sanitarium and graduated in 1892. In 1893 he managed the Chicago branch of the sanitarium during the World's Fair. In the same year, he married Anna Stone, also a nurse, and the two went to Cape Town to begin SDA medical work in Africa. In 1898 he began the medical course in England and completed it at the University of Arkansas in 1907. In 1909 or 1910 he joined the staff of the River Plate Sanitarium and served as physician and business manager of that institution until his return to the United States in 1944.

Resistencia Adventist Academy

RESISTENCIA ADVENTIST ACADEMY (Colegio Adventista de Resistencia). A secondary school located in the city of Resistencia, in the Chaco province of Argentina. It belongs to the North Argentine Conference.

Begun as a secondary school in 1990, its first graduation was in 1993. The three first years are unified. The two remaining are diversified. In 1993 there were 286 students and 23 teachers at the institution.

Rest Haven Hospital and Rest Haven Lodge

REST HAVEN HOSPITAL AND REST HAVEN LODGE. Rest Haven Lodge is a 75-bed nursing home in Sidney, British Columbia. The Rest Haven Hospital, built in 1912, was operated briefly as a private hospital, then from 1916 to 1919 as a military hospital. In 1921 it was taken over by the Seventh-day Adventist Church and served the town of Sidney and the Seanch Peninsula with medical and hospital care until 1979. After its official closing in April of 1979, the Ministry of Health invited the church to provide nursing home care for the residents of the area. This resulted in negotiations between the ministry and conference officials for the construction of Rest Haven Lodge. Financing was made available to the conference through a loan of nearly $4 million from a trust company backed by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, a federal government financial institution. The nursing home was completed and officially opened on July 5, 1982, with Daniel J. Rippin, administrator, and Heather J. Switak, director of resident care.

Rest Haven Lodge provides service to persons of the community at the three levels of intermediate care. In 1990 it received its accreditation, a significant accomplishment shared by few nursing homes in the province. The operation of the institution is financed through government-approved monthly charges to residents and the operating appropriations from the Medical Services Plan of the province, leaving no financial risk to the conference. The original board of directors was composed of: Glen Maxson (chairperson), Robert Betts, Reuben Matiko, Claude Brousson, Joyce Schafer, Gary DeBoer, Peter Wheatley, Carol Domkey, Frank White, and Jack Glover.

Medical directors (Rest Haven Hospital): A. W. Truman, 1921—1922; O. S. Parrett, 1922—1928; H. G. Burden, 1928—1930; S. W. Leiske, 1930—1933; H. G. Burden, 1933—1939; A. N. Hanson, 1939—1941; W. H. Roberts, 1941—1954; R. O. West, 1954—1955.

Administrators (Rest Haven Hospital): F. L. Hommel, 1921—1925; O. S. Parrett, 1925—1927; F. T. Balmer, 1927—1929; J. M. LeMarquand, 1929—1931; H. A. Shepard, 1931—1937; W. E. Perrin, 1937—1939; E. S. Humann, 1939—1943; H. A. Munson, 1943—1948; C. M. Crawford, 1948—1954; A. G. Rodgers, 1954—1962; T. J. Bradley, 1962—1971; F. L. Bell, 1971—1975; D. L. Dunfield, 1975—1979; (Rest Haven Lodge): Daniel J. Rippin, 1982— .

Resurrection

RESURRECTION. The resurrection is more clearly set forth in the NT than in the OT. The principal word for resurrection in the Greek NT is anastasis, “a standing up,” “a rising up.” The corresponding verb, anistēmi, is used both transitively “to raise up” (John 6:39, 40, 44, 54; Acts 2:32; 13:34), and intransitively “to rise” (Mark 9:9, 10; 12:25; Luke 16:31; 24:46; John 20:9). Another verb, egeirō, “to awaken,” “to arouse from sleep,” is similarly used in the sense of arousing from the sleep of death (John 5:21; Acts 26:8; 2 Cor. 1:9; Mark 5:41; Luke 7:14, etc.).

The Bible considers humanity as inherently mortal (see Death). Inherent immortality belongs to God alone (1 Tim. 1:17; 6:16). Immortality comes as a gift from Christ, through the gospel (Rom. 2:6, 7; 6:23; 2 Tim. 1:10; John 3:16, 36; 1 John 5:11, 12). Accordingly, a resurrection is necessary if there is to be a future life beyond the grave (1 Cor. 15:18, 19, 32). It is at the resurrection that the gift of immortality is bestowed upon all who are eligible to receive it (Luke 20:36; John 6:39; 1 Cor. 15:51—55).

The resurrection of the righteous dead is closely bound up with the resurrection of Christ (2 Cor. 4:14; Rom. 8:11). Jesus foretold His resurrection (Mark 8:31; 9:31; 10:34; etc.). He gave evidence of His power over death by raising the widow’s son at Nain (Luke 7:12—15), the daughter of Jairus (Mark 5:22—24, 35—43), and Lazarus, who had been dead four days (John 11:24, 25, 43, 44). However, not one of these was clothed in a glorious resurrection body. They were brought back to an earthly life, to endure its toils and perils and eventually to pass again under the dominion of death. But Christ’s body came forth from the tomb a glorious, heavenly body (Phil. 3:21; cf. 1 Cor. 15:47—50).

Several other instances of the dead being resurrected are given in the OT and the NT: the resurrection of Moses (cf. Jude 9; Matt. 17:3), the son of the widow of Zarephath (1 Kings 17:17—23), the son of the Shunammite woman (2 Kings 4:18—37), the man cast into Elisha’s sepulcher (2 Kings 13:21), the saints raised at Christ’s resurrection (Matt. 27:52, 53), Dorcas (Acts 9:36—41), and Eutychus (Acts 20:9—12).

Seventh-day Adventists believe that the resurrection of Christ from the grave is a literal historical fact. The guarded but empty tomb, with the graveclothes left behind in an orderly manner (John 20:6, 7), convinced John of the Resurrection (John 20:8, 9). The theories that Jesus swooned but did not die, that the body was stolen by the disciples, that an empty tomb was mistaken for the one in which Jesus had been placed, or that Joseph of Arimathaea removed the body require more faith to believe than acceptance of the events recorded in the NT. There was, as well, the testimony of the Roman guard (Matt. 28:11^f), the announcement of the angels at the tomb (verses 4—7), and the testimony of those resurrected with Christ (Matt. 27:52, 53). Even stronger evidence is found in the 10 post-Resurrection appearances of our Lord. Five of these took place on the day of the Resurrection—to Mary Magdalene (John 20:11—18), to the other women (Matt. 28:8—10), to Simon Peter (Luke 24:33—35; 1 Cor. 15:5), to Cleopas and a companion on the way to Emmaus (Luke 24:33—34), and to the 10 disciples in Jerusalem (John 20:19—31). Five additional appearances came later—to the 11 in Jerusalem (John 20:26—28), to the seven by the Sea of Galilee (John 21:1—23), to more than 500 on a mountain in Galilee (Matt. 28:16—20; 1 Cor. 15:6), to James (1 Cor. 15:7), and to the 11 in Jerusalem and Bethany (Luke 24:44—49).

A strong indirect evidence for the resurrection of Christ is the impact it made on the disciples. It transformed them from a group of dispirited, frightened men into a valiant band of apostles ready to do and dare for their Lord. The Resurrection became one of their main themes, as their sermons reveal (Acts 2:32; 3:14, 15; 4:11; 10:40—42; 13:30—35). It was the crowning vindication of Jesus' Messiahship (Rom. 1:4), and closely bound up with the believers' justification (Rom. 4:22—25) and a new spiritual life in Christ (Rom. 6:4, 5, 8, 11; Eph. 2:1, 5, 6; Col. 2:13). This great historical event is also the pledge and guarantee of the resurrection and future life of all who believe in Christ (1 Cor. 15:12—17; John 5:28, 29; 11:25, 26; Rev. 1:18).

The Bible teaches that there will be two general resurrections—one of the just, to life; and the other of the unjust, to condemnation (John 5:28, 29; Acts 24:15). These two general resurrections are separated by the “thousand years” of Rev. 20:4, 5. Those who have part in the first resurrection are “blessed and holy” (v. 6) and over them the “second death,” “the lake of fire” at the close of the millennium (v. 14), has no power. The first resurrection—“the resurrection of the just” (Luke 14:14)—takes place in connection with the Second Advent (1 Cor. 15:22, 23; 1 Thess. 4:15—18). (See Home of the Redeemed.) This is a resurrection to life and immortality (John 5:29; 1 Cor. 15:52, 53). Those who have part in it “cannot die any more” (Luke 20:36, RSV), but are united with Christ forever (1 Thess. 4:16, 17).

In his great treatise on the resurrection, the apostle Paul discusses the nature of the resurrection body (1 Cor. 15:35—51), and regards the resurrection of Christ as the type and pledge of the resurrection of all who have died in Him (v. 20). This is true both as to the fact of the resurrection and as to the manner. Even as Christ rose a glorified being, so will the righteous arise (Rom. 8:11). Their mortal bodies will then be changed to resemble His glorious body (Phil. 3:20, 21). As a seed buried in the ground springs forth to new life that far surpasses the dormant seed, so the resurrection body will be glorious and imperishable (1 Cor. 15:42—44). Before human beings can inherit God's eternal kingdom, their mortal bodies must be transformed into resurrection bodies resembling the glorious body of Christ (vs. 50—54).

Speaking of the preservation of personal identity in the resurrection, Ellen White says: “Our personal identity is preserved in the resurrection, though not the same particles of matter or material substance as went into the grave. The wondrous works of God are a mystery to man. The spirit, the character of man, is returned to God, there to be preserved. In the resurrection every man will have his own character. God in His own time will call forth the dead, giving again the breath of life, and bidding the dry bones live. The same form will come forth, but it will be free from disease and every defect. It lives again bearing the same individuality of features, so that friend will recognize friend. There is no law of God in nature which shows that God gives back the same identical particles of matter which composed the body before death. . . .

“A much finer material will compose the human body, for it is a new creation, a new birth. It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body” (SDACom 6:1093).

The wicked are raised at the second, general resurrection at the end of the millennium, which is a resurrection to final judgment and condemnation (John 5:29; Rev. 20:11, 12). (See Hell).

Seventh-day Adventists believe also in a special resurrection a little before the general resurrection of Christ's second coming, at which time some will rise to everlasting life and others to shame and eternal contempt (Dan. 12:2). Seventh-day Adventists understand that those who have been eminent on both sides of the great conflict between good and evil will be raised to life a short time before Christ's return in power and glory to witness the event: Jesus (Matt. 26:64) told the high priest and the Sanhedrin that one day they would see Him return as Son of man, seated at the place of honor beside God, and John (Rev. 1:7) predicted that those who pierced Christ would see Him return. To make this possible, a special resurrection would be necessary. Ellen White interpreted this special resurrection as including not only the enemies of Christ but "all who have died in the faith of the third angel's message" (GC 637, 643). (See Three Angels' Messages.)

The earliest articles in the Review and Herald dealing with the resurrection were reprinted from other sources, as, for instance, one from the Midnight Cry (1843) in the Review and Herald (3:117, Dec. 9, 1852) and another from an unnamed Baptist source in the issue for Apr. 18, 1854 (5:99). A well-developed discussion of the resurrection occurs in a letter from Charles Fitch to Josiah Litch reprinted from the Second Advent Library (no. vii, 1843), in the Review for Sept. 27, 1853 (4:89). Fitch discusses the two resurrections, a thousand years apart as set forth in Rev. 20.

One of the earliest articles on the resurrection written for the Review is one by J. N. Loughborough in the issue for Dec. 11, 1885 (7:81), entitled "Is the Soul Immortal?" Loughborough argues that the Christian's only hope of a future life is through the resurrection—a point of view inevitable for Seventh-day Adventists, believing as they do concerning the state of man in death. Loughborough presents the case for a literal resurrection at considerable length, and for a resurrection of both the righteous and the wicked. J. H. Waggoner (ibid. 9:108, Feb. 5, 1857) developed the Bible evidence for a resurrection of the wicked, citing such passages as 1 Cor. 15:22; Rev. 20:6, 12—14; and John 5:28, 29.

Retirement Homes and Orphanages

RETIREMENT HOMES AND ORPHANAGES. According to information in the 1995 Seventh-day Adventist Yearbook, the following are retirement homes, homes for the elderly, and orphanages currently operated by the Seventh-day Adventist Church. Some of these have separate articles:

Vovo Josephina Children's Home (Lar Infantil Vovo Josephina) (Campinas, Brazil)

Xaxim Adventist Home for Boys (Lar dos Meninos Adventista do Xaxim) (Curitiba, Brazil)

The first Seventh-day Adventist home for the aged was the James White Memorial Home in Battle Creek, Michigan. It was operated from 1894 to 1905 on the same property as the Haskell Memorial Home. Money was donated by the General Conference. This institution had no connection with the later James White Memorial Home, operated from 1921 to 1940 at Plainwell, Michigan, under the Lake Union Conference.

The earliest Seventh-day Adventist orphanage was the Haskell Memorial Home at Battle Creek, Michigan, named in honor of the husband of an early and generous donor, Mrs. C. E. Haskell. It was founded in 1891 and officially opened in January 1894. By March 1902 it had 164 children. It was operated under denominational control until 1904, at which time the trustees of the International Medical Missionary and Benevolent Association, led by Dr. J. H. Kellogg, effectively separated it from the denomination.

Retirement Plans

RETIREMENT PLANS. A Retirement Plan (formerly called the Sustentation Fund) was established by the General Conference at the 1910 Annual Council for the support of sick and aged workers and children of deceased employees.

Each division of the General Conference operates one or more retirement plans for the assistance of retired and disabled employees. The retirement plans are funded by contributions by participating employers based on a percentage of the tithes or payrolls. Each division maintains policies governing the payment of benefits for service earned in that division in harmony with general principles outlined in General Conference policy.

Réunion

RÉUNION. An island in the south Indian Ocean, about 420 miles (670 kilometers) east of Madagascar, governed as an overseas department of France. It has an area of 968.5 square miles (2,508 square kilometers) and a population (1994) of 630,000, composed of varying combinations of French, African, and Asian elements. Agriculture is the principal occupation, with sugar, rum, flowers, and vanilla the chief products. Although discovered by the Portuguese in 1531, Réunion was claimed by the king of France in 1642 after the deportation of French planters in 1638.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. The territory of Réunion constitutes the Réunion Conference, which is part of the Indian Ocean Union Mission and, in turn, a part of the Africa-Indian Ocean Division. Statistics (1992): churches, 17; members, 1,218; ordained ministers, 4; licensed ministers, 3.

As early as 1934 and 1935, SDA colporteurs from Mauritius sold Bibles and SDA publications in Réunion. The Réunion Mission was opened in 1936, when Paul Girard, then a licensed minister, came with his wife and daughter to Port de la Pointe des Galets and began to preach. The first people to become interested were severely oppressed by the state church. In 1937 the first five converts were baptized. Other baptisms followed, and two churches were organized, one at St. Denis and the other at Port de la Pointe des Galets.

In 1939 René Devins came to help the Girard family, and colporteur F. Dick arrived from Mauritius. In 1940 the first church was built in St. Denis, the capital. This was replaced in 1965 by an evangelistic center with office facilities. In 1941 the Girards began work in the region of St. Pierre in the south. Through the years workers from Mauritius and Réunion have assisted in the work. In 1992 the Réunion Mission became a conference.

Revel, Catherine

REVEL, CATHERINE (1830—1930). One of the first Seventh-day Adventist converts in Europe. She was born in a family of Piedmont Waldenses at Luserna San Giovanni, about one hour's walk from Torre Pelice, the Waldensian center in northern Italy. When in 1865 M. B. Czechowski came to that vicinity and preached SDA doctrines, which was the first time such teachings were proclaimed on the continent of Europe, she accepted them and a short time later was baptized by immersion, a Baptist minister performing the rite.

For almost 20 years she was the only Seventh-day Adventist in her community. About 1885 a church was organized at Torre Pelice, partly the result of her witnessing for her faith among her neighbors. Her daughter, Méry, was also baptized, but her son became a Waldensian minister. Throughout the years she maintained contact with the Swiss Seventh-day Adventists and was visited by Andrews, Bourdeau, Haskell, Butler, Whitney, and others. While in Europe, Ellen White visited her on two different occasions. In 1912 she retired to Torre Pelice, where she inspired many to become better Christians in life and service.

Revelation

REVELATION. The self-manifestation of God by which His character, will, and presence are disclosed to humanity through the writings of the prophets, through the illumination of the intellect by the Holy Spirit, through the works of nature, and through providential experiences. The supreme revelation of the divine mind, will, and character came through the incarnation, life, ministry, and teachings of the second person of the Deity as Son of God and Son of man.

God reveals Himself in order that sinful human beings may apprehend Him and be transformed into His likeness by a divine-human communion. Seventh-day Adventists have always held that the Bible in its entirety is the inspired, authoritative, reliable, and true Word of God, though expressed in imperfect human language (see Inspiration). However, Seventh-day Adventists do not hold that special revelation terminated with the closing of the NT canon. They believe that the prophetic gift is the means by which God has communicated inspired instruction to humanity ever since the banishment from Eden, even though the gift may not have been operative at all times, and that it belongs to the church today.

In their unfallen state, Adam and Eve held free and open communion with God. Sin excluded them from the full manifestation of the divine Presence, dulled their cognitive faculties, and marred God's handiwork in nature. However, to the sincere seeker for truth, creation still reveals the existence and character of God, albeit imperfectly. By the Holy Spirit's operation on the minds of the prophets and apostles, the acts of God in history, especially in the histories of the Hebrew people and of the apostolic church, have been illuminated.

At times the divine will has been made known through angel visitation and miraculous signs, but more often by means of visions and dreams. By this method of revelation the recipient apprehends truth that he or she otherwise would not have acquired. Seventh-day Adventists believe that in recording, describing, or interpreting such information human beings are as dependent upon God as they were in receiving it in the first place.

Revelation also occurs when the Holy Spirit acts upon human consciousness. While a person endeavors to understand the records of past revelation, or is nurturing spiritual interests, or is consciously seeking union with God and is obedient to the divine will, the Holy Spirit acts upon the mind by expanding its powers, enlightening its understanding, and inducing flashes of insight and conviction. Often this mode of revelation—usually called illumination—cannot be clearly distinguished from the normal powers of the human mind and must therefore be regarded as subjective, and accepted with caution.

All revelation of God has been, and continues to be, through His Son, the Christ, through whom are manifested the truths, attributes, and character of God. In the broadest sense all true knowledge is a revelation of God, for He is the source of all truth. However, ordinary knowledge is concerned with objective things or observable processes, and results from human discovery. Revelation relates these to the acts of God and relates humanity to the person of God. For the person who exercises faith and obedience as well as the normal intellectual faculties endowed by the Creator, the line of demarcation between the natural and the supernatural is almost nonexistent. God is one. His truth—all truth—forms a unity. For finite beings of limited capacity to apprehend truth, perfect communication of infinite truth is not possible. But despite his finite capacity to apprehend truth, that which has been revealed is sufficient to enable humanity to cooperate with the Maker in this life and to prepare for life eternal. See also Bible; Inspiration of Scripture; Spirit of Prophecy; Visions; White, Ellen Gould.

Revelation, Interpretation of REVELATION, INTERPRETATION OF. The variant interpretations given to the prophecies of the book of Revelation fall into three basic patterns—the preterist, the futurist, and the historical (see Historicism). Seventh-day Adventists are historicists in their interpretation of Revelation.

Seventh-day Adventist Interpretation. The book of Revelation may be outlined thus: (1) an introduction, Rev. 1; (2) the seven churches, Rev. 2 and 3; (3) the seven seals, Rev. 4 to 8:1; (4) the seven trumpets, Rev. 8:2 to 11; (5) the eschatological conflict between good and evil, Rev. 12 through 20; (6) the new earth, Rev. 21 to 22:5; and (7) an epilogue, Rev. 22:6-21. Seventh-day Adventists regard these prophecies as a “Revelation of Jesus Christ” (Rev. 1:1) and interpret them historically, believing that Jesus Christ has been at work in the events of history throughout the Christian Era, with the goal of establishing His righteous reign on earth. Seventh-day Adventists apply the three lines of prophecy—the churches, the seals, and the trumpets—historically to seven periods of history, with the churches and the seals corresponding approximately to each other, and reaching from apostolic times down to the advent of Christ, and the seven trumpets comprehending a somewhat shorter period.

The prophecy of the seven churches has been recognized as applicable, in the first place, to literal Christian congregations in the ancient Roman province of Asia; beyond this, the seven churches are understood as representative of seven consecutive periods of church history: the message to the church at Ephesus is applied to the apostolic period; that addressed to the Smyrna church, to the period of Roman persecution to the time of Constantine; the Pergamos message, to the great apostasy that culminated in the papacy; the Thyatira message, to the period of papal supremacy, from the time of Justinian to the Reformation; the Sardis message, to the churches of the Reformation and after; the Philadelphia message, to the Advent movement of the nineteenth century; the Laodicean message, to the church today. Accordingly, SDAs consider the Laodicean message of Rev. 3:14—22 to be of special importance.

As for the prophecies of the seven seals and the seven trumpets, SDAs have in general accepted the interpretation of earlier expositors as the best explanation currently available. The fourth chapter is understood as providing the setting for the prophecy of the seven seals, introduced in the fifth chapter. The first seal (Rev. 6:1, 2) is applied to the apostolic age; the second (vs. 3, 4) to the period of Roman persecution; the third (vs. 5, 6) to the period of apostasy that culminated in the formation of the papacy; the fourth (vs. 7, 8) to the Middle Ages, the period of papal supremacy; the fifth (vs. 9—11) to the era of the Protestant Reformation; the sixth (vs. 12—17) to the modern era; and the seventh (Rev. 8:1) to the Second Advent. The seventh chapter, inserted between the sixth and the seventh seals, is understood as describing the sealing of God’s remnant people to remain steadfast through the last conflict of the great controversy between good and evil.

Recent SDA scholarship tends to see special last-day significance in the prophecies of the seven churches, the seven seals, and the seven trumpets.

The first four trumpets (Rev. 8:7—13) are interpreted as God's judgments upon the Western Roman Empire, in particular, the invasion of the Visigoths, the Vandals, the Huns, and the Heruli. The fifth trumpet (Rev. 9:1—12) is applied to the invasion of the Eastern Roman Empire by the Saracens, and the sixth (vs. 13—21) to the invasions of the Ottoman Turks. Comparable with the insertion of Rev. 7 between the sixth and the seventh seals, the passage consisting of Rev. 10 and 11:1—14 is inserted between the sixth and the seventh trumpets. Like Rev. 7, it is understood as applying largely to the modern era. The vision of the mighty angel with the little book (Rev. 10) is applied to the unsealing of the prophecies of Daniel during the great Advent movement of the nineteenth century, and Rev. 10:11 to 11:12 to the emphasis on the heavenly sanctuary given by Seventh-day Adventists. The "two witnesses" of Rev. 11:3—12 are considered to be the Old and New Testaments, and the vicissitudes through which they pass, as representing the fate of the Scriptures at the hands of the Papacy, and later of atheism during the era of the French Revolution. Like the seventh seal, the seventh trumpet (vs. 15—19) is applied to the Second Advent.

Chapters 12 through 20 are considered to be a connected prophecy depicting the course of events in the great eschatological conflict between good and evil.

Chapter 12, understood as an introduction to this extended prophetic narrative, depicts Satan's efforts to destroy Christ and his animosity toward the early Christian church (vs. 1—5), the persecution of God's people during the 1260 years (1260 prophetic days, or three and one half times, or 42 months, see Rev. 12:6, 14; 11:2; 13:5) of papal supremacy (vs. 6, 12—16), Christ's victory over Lucifer (the dragon) in heaven (vs. 7—12), and a warning of the great eschatological conflict (v. 17), which is described at length in Rev. 13 to 20. Chapter 12 thus provides the historical setting for the last great conflict in the great controversy of the ages between Christ and Satan.

The leopardlike beast of Rev. 13:1—10, 18 is applied to the papacy, particularly to its contemporary revival from the deadly wound it suffered about 1798; and the lamblike beast (vs. 11—17) (also, the false prophet; cf. Rev. 19:20) to the United States, with emphasis on a yet-future apostate Protestantism symbolized by the image to the beast. The 144,000 described in Rev. 14:1—5 are identified as those who gain the victory over the beast and its image of Rev. 13.

The three angels' messages of Rev. 14:6—12 are understood as representing the great Advent Awakening of the nineteenth century and the message Seventh-day Adventists have been commissioned to bear to the world. Vs. 14—20 picture the coming of Christ in the clouds of heaven and the harvest of the earth.

Chapters 15 to 19 focus on events following the close of human probation and leading up to the second advent of Christ to deliver His people from foes bent on their destruction. Chapter 15 stands as an introduction to the seven last plagues, a series of divine visitations upon the obdurately impenitent, as recorded in Rev. 16. Under the seventh plague (vs. 17—21) God intervenes, shattering the threefold symbolic Babylon in vs. 13, 14.

Chapter 17 is seen to be a further, more detailed description of a great religiopolitical conspiracy, with the harlot Babylon standing for apostate religion, and the seven-headed and ten-horned beast on which Babylon is pictured as being seated as the political powers of the earth subservient to her design to annihilate God's people. Joining battle with Christ, the kings of earth are overcome, and in turn they destroy Babylon (vs. 12—17).

Chapter 18 is a highly figurative description of the final judgments of God upon Babylon the great; whereas vs. 1—4 constitute God’s final appeal (connected with the three messages of Rev. 14:6—11) to His people to separate themselves from Babylon, in order to avoid complicity in her sins and hence a share in her punishment.

Chapter 19:1—6 is a universal paean of praise to God for His victory over Babylon the great, and vs. 7—9 an invitation to the overcomers on earth to the great eschatological banquet in heaven marking the beginning of Christ’s eternal, righteous reign. In highly figurative language vs. 11—21 picture Christ’s defeat of all earthly powers at the time of His second advent.

Chapter 20 carries the sequence of events forward for a thousand years (see Millennium), during which the earth lies desolate and the saints are with Christ in heaven. At the close of the millennium Christ, the saints, and the New Jerusalem descend to earth, and the wicked dead (called Gog and Magog) are raised and attack the city. Finally, Christ sits in judgment over the impenitent of all ages and annihilates them (see Death, Hell). Chapters 21:1 to 22:5 describe the new-earth state as the eternal abode of the saints (see Home of the Redeemed). See also Bible, Interpretation of; Daniel, Interpretation of; Mark of the Beast; Number of the Beast; Plagues, Seven Last.

Revelation Seminars

REVELATION SEMINARS. An evangelism born of an exchange of ideas between John Coltheart, Northern European Division ministerial secretary, and George Knowles, evangelist at the New Gallery Centre in London in 1969. All-day and half-day Sabbath seminars were used as a means of consolidating interests from the evangelistic meetings. These seminars served several purposes, being held in a rented convention facility that provided a “halfway house” between the plush evangelistic venue and the more humble local Adventist church.

George Knowles had experimented in North America with small group evangelism that did not depend on the support of a large percentage of church members for its success. For the evening sessions, which were used to pull together the interests from his TV Bible classes, he used a Genesis to Revelation Bible survey approach. Knowles had developed these studies early in his ministry for use in a pastor’s Sabbath morning Bible class. While at the New Gallery Centre, he wrote and piloted a 26-lesson series on Daniel and Revelation, entitled Revelation Speaks.

The seminar idea lay dormant in Knowles’ mind until 1971 when he conducted an Andrews University Field School of Evangelism in Montreal. The conference purchased a church building to house the converts from the series, but the new church was a considerable distance from the hall where the evangelistic meetings were being held. It was decided to try a New Gallery-style seminar in an attempt to motivate the interested people to travel to the new location. This proved successful, and after the initial all-day seminar, weekly Sabbath morning seminars continued, which gradually evolved into Sabbath school and worship services, which in turn developed into the Norwood Seventh-day Adventist Church. The Maranatha Seventh-day Adventist Church in Toronto came into being through the same method.

Having accepted a call to It Is Written, Knowles found so many requests for George Vandeman to conduct reaping meetings that the requests could not be filled. As he read the many letters of request, an exciting idea came to him. Instead of Vandeman spending weeks in one city, why could he not come for a one-day seminar at which time the television viewers could meet pastors who would conduct follow-up seminars in the nearby towns and cities?

Knowles shared the idea with George Vandeman, who immediately became excited about the possibilities. The plan was to use the Revelation Speaks lessons along with a new doctrinal series that would present a combination of conversion and prophetic subjects.

Vandeman and Knowles held the first It Is Written Revelation Seminar in San Diego at the Shrine Auditorium on Mar. 15 and 16, 1975. The next was on board the Queen Mary at Long Beach on Mar. 29 and 30, 1975.

Pastors followed up the all-day seminars with a series of 18 evening seminars. It was soon discovered that with the new conversion-prophetic lessons, there was not time for the Revelation Speaks lessons. The name Revelation Seminar was retained, applying the word “revelation” in the sense that the entire Bible is a revelation of God’s message to humanity.

The plan was a success from the start. As demand increased, the series was launched with evening seminars as well as all-day seminars.

A number of pastors began conducting seminars without George Vandeman present to get the program started. One of these was Harry Robinson, in Texas, who developed a complete do-it-yourself kit of materials for pastors. Soon it was demonstrated that youth and older laypersons could successfully conduct these seminars.

Robinson kept statistics on seminars conducted, including how many announcements were direct mailed, how many telephone responses, how many attended, and how many were eventually baptized. The Revelation seminars became the most predictable form of evangelism, as it appealed to a sophisticated generation accustomed to business and educational seminars. Pastors who did not have the flair for public evangelism but who did have the gift for teaching discovered that they could win souls through this approach. These developments came at a time when it was becoming more difficult to attract the public as well as church members to conventional evangelistic meetings.

After using the original lessons for three years, Vandeman had Roy Naden write a new Revelation Seminar series. Later Harry Robinson wrote a series of his own. When Robinson transferred his operation to North Carolina, Bill May wrote a new Revelation Seminar series for the Texas Seminar Center.

The South American Division adapted the Revelation Seminar to meet their distinctive needs. By the 1990s virtually every division of the world field had translated or adapted a Revelation Seminar that evolved from the original It Is Written Revelation Seminar.

Revelation Seminars (Seminars Unlimited)

REVELATION SEMINARS (Seminars Unlimited). A popular evangelistic Bible study course focusing on the book of Revelation (see Revelation Seminars). In 1980 Harry Robinson, Texas Conference ministerial secretary, set up a resource center in Keene and began training seminar presenters across Texas and the North American Division. In 1983 a second resource center was established at Mount Pisgah Academy in the Carolina Conference, which later became the Southern Union Resource Center. Former Texas Conference presidents Cyril Miller and Bill May (both lesson series authors) greatly expanded the scope and range of the Revelation Seminar program across the field.

In 1986 the resource center adopted the name Seminars Unlimited, which better reflected its growth in providing numerous soul-winning seminars. In 1990 the Southern Union Resource Center was merged with Seminars Unlimited. This brought in-house printing and mailing capabilities. In 1992 Seminars Unlimited, in cooperation with the General Conference, became the fulfillment and distribution center for the Ministerial Association, distributing pastoral and evangelistic materials for Ministerial Supply, Continuing Education, and Shepherdess International. In 1993 the Small Group Evangelism materials of the Oregon Conference (Homes of Hope: inductive small group Bible studies) were added to Seminars Unlimited's list of offerings. Seminars Unlimited has become a broad-based evangelistic-ministerial resource center serving pastors and laypersons across North America and the world field. Lessons have been translated in numerous languages, and resource centers have been established in various divisions.

In 1992 more than 100,000 people attended about 10,000 Revelation seminars held in Romania, the largest coordinated effort to date in that country, with nearly 10,000 being baptized as a result. More than 150,000 sets of lessons were distributed in the former Soviet Union in 1993. Millions all over the world have attended a Revelation Seminar, and tens of thousands have been baptized as a result, making this simple approach one of the top soul-winning tools worldwide.

Review and Herald Publishing Association

REVIEW AND HERALD PUBLISHING ASSOCIATION. The oldest institution of the Seventh-day Adventist Church, situated at 55 West Oak Ridge Drive, Hagerstown, Maryland; publisher of religious, health, and educational books, periodicals, tracts, and electronically accessed materials. Its constituent territory comprises the Columbia, Atlantic, Lake, Southern, and Southwestern union conferences. Its distributors are the Adventist Book Centers of the United States and Canada and similar denominational agencies overseas. Value of retail sales reached nearly $22 million in 1993; present worth (in 1993) was approximately $19 million.

Facilities: Situated on a 127-acre (50-hectare) plot just outside the city limits of Hagerstown, Maryland, the plant is housed in two main brick structures plus an automotive facility. A two-story, 57,000-square-foot (5,300-square-meter) building contains administrative, business, and editorial offices; an assembly hall that seats 400 people and also serves as a cafeteria dining room; a large boardroom; and an editorial research library of some 40,000 books.

Connected to the office building by a 100-foot (30-meter) gallery is the factory building, covering 220,000 square feet (20,500 square meters) of space, all on one floor. Art, design, typography, lithography, printing, binding, raw stock and finished goods storage, and shipping are all housed in this building. It is served by eight docks for large freight trucks and three docks for a rail spur that leads to the rear of the building.

Prepress work, from design and typesetting up to the making of press plates, incorporates state-of-the-art computer technology. Press equipment includes a four-color Heidelberg sheet-fed press and one four-color web press and one six-color web press. The bindery operates both a perfect-binding book line and a hardcover line. Periodicals are addressed for mailing with an ink-jet labeler.

Publications. Periodicals edited and produced in-house include (see descriptions under separate entries) Celebration, Cornerstone Resource Magazine, Guide, Insight, InsightOut, Junior Teen Plus, Kids' Stuff, Listen, Message, Vibrant Life, Winner, and Women of Spirit, a new magazine for women. A number of periodicals edited and produced at General Conference and North American Division offices are printed and distributed by the Review and Herald. These include Adventist Review, Liberty, Ministry, and various Sabbath school publications and supplies.

Subscription Books. Among the more significant subscription books sold by literature evangelists are Bedtime Stories, by Arthur S. Maxwell (in the process of revision; five vols.); The Bible Story, by Arthur S. Maxwell (revised and reillustrated in 1994; 10 vols.); My Bible Friends, by Etta B. Degering (five vols.); Forever Stories, by Carolyn Byers (also sold as a trade item; five vols.); Bible Readings for the Home; and Free at Last, Exodus, One More River, and Milk and Honey, by E. E. Cleveland, developed especially for African-American readers.

In the late 1980s an economical series of full-color paperbacks called magabooks was developed for use by student literature evangelists to provide an alternative to declining school industries. By the end of 1993 more than 1 million of these books had been sold.

Trade Books. About 40 new trade titles (books distributed through the Adventist Book Centers) are published each year. The publishing house has been stipulated as a resource center for materials for children and youth ministries, health, church ministries, and women's ministries.

Products include the Christian Home Library (25 vols.); Ellen G. White's Review and Herald articles (six vols.), Manuscript Releases (21 vols.), Sermons and Talks (two vols.), and Youth's Instructor articles (one vol.); daily devotional books for adults, juniors, preschoolers, and women; hymnals and songbooks; the multivolume SDA Commentary Reference Series; a biography of Ellen G. White (six vols.); plus cookbooks, inspirational and doctrinal books, and storybooks for all ages.

Electronic publications. Several books are available on audiotape. These include The Bible Story, My Bible Friends, The Best of Guide, and Christmas in My Heart. Videotapes include Evidences: The Record and the Flood, The Kids' Creation Story, and Storytime With Jack and Carmela. Currently in production is the Commentary Reference Series on CD-ROM. This disk also includes two modern versions of the Bible and other study helps to the Bible.

Additional Products. Other significant products include the LIFE series reading textbooks for grades K-9; Bible study guides, tracts, and pamphlets for sharing; Bible and nature games; Vacation Bible School materials; and church bulletins.

Administration. Control of the organization is vested in a board of directors elected at each quinquennial session of the constituency. Consisting of not more than 50 members, the board of directors operates under a chair and a vice chair. It elects the president and vice presidents of the institution and, in collaboration with the General Conference Committee, appoints book and periodical editors. Vice presidents serve the following respective areas: editorial, financial, manufacturing, marketing, and operations.

A management committee, consisting of the president, vice presidents, and several annually appointed employees, cares for current matters requiring administrative action. A book committee of about 45 members, with the president as chair and the acquisitions editor as secretary, is appointed by the board; members are selected largely from personnel of the General Conference, the Review and Herald, and conference institutions within the constituency. The responsibility of the book committee is to evaluate the reports of reviewers of submitted and commissioned manuscripts and to recommend publication or rejection.

Constituency. The membership of the corporation consists of the board of directors; members of the General Conference Executive Committee who reside within the North American Division; 25 percent of the employees of the Review and Herald; six members (president, publishing director, and four others) from each of the following unions: Atlantic, Columbia, Lake, Southern, Southwestern, and British; and five members from each local conference within these unions, with the exception of the British Union.

History

History. Incorporation. Although the publishing work of Seventh-day Adventists was begun in July 1849 at Middletown, Connecticut, the first press was not acquired until 1852, in Rochester, New York. In 1855 a publishing house was established in Battle Creek, Michigan (for the publishing work in the early days, see Publishing Department; Publishing Work). The first steps toward incorporation of the publishing organization were taken at a conference in Battle Creek, Sept. 28, 1860. The first article of the proposed constitution, voted Oct. 1, read as follows: “This Association shall be denominated The Advent Review Publishing Association, the object of which shall be the publication of periodicals, books, and tracts, calculated to convey instruction on Bible truth, especially the fulfillment of prophecy, the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus.”

Incorporation did not take place, however, until May 3, 1861, for there were no Michigan laws prior to that time to implement such a corporation. The corporate name chosen was “Seventh-day Adventist Publishing Association” (by 1884 qualified by the adjective “Central” to distinguish it from the other publishing houses, but commonly referred to as the Review and Herald). It was a shareholding body, its membership made up of those who had purchased shares of $10 each. By 1880 their face value was raised to $25 a share. Voting privileges were in proportion to the number of shares held. It was nondividend stock; all profits made were appropriated toward publications for new fields.

The first officers of the corporation, elected May 23, 1861, were: James White, president; G. W. Amadon, vice president; E. S. Walker, secretary; Uriah Smith, treasurer; J. N. Loughborough, auditor. Its first editors were James White, of the Review and Herald, and G. W. Amadon, of the Youth’s Instructor. Prominent among the pioneers instrumental in its establishment were J. P. Kellogg, J. B. Frisbie, Richard Godsmark, and Dan Palmer.

Buildings. The first building housing the publishing work in Battle Creek was a two-story frame structure on West Main and Washington streets. In 1861 this building was moved, and in its place was erected a two-story brick building 26’ x 66’ (8 m. x 20 m.). A second similar brick building was erected in 1871 on the opposite corner of Main and Washington streets. In 1873 a third building was erected east of the first. Continual expansion of the business made necessary larger plans five years later, and the first and third buildings were united by a three-story central unit. A large pressroom was added in 1881, providing a total plant floor space of 40,000 square feet (3,750 square meters). By 1887 a mansard-style fourth floor had been added to the middle unit and a third floor to the wings in similar architecture. With up-to-date machinery in all departments, the plant had the reputation of being the largest and most complete in that state. The floor space of the main structure was gradually augmented to 80,000 square feet (7,500 square meters) by 1899. A building across the street was necessary to accommodate packing, shipping, sales, and other business needs.

This periodic expansion spoke progress, but there were times when the publishing house had serious financial difficulties. Through the years many calls were made to the church members for support of the work. Much nondenominational commercial printing was accepted to keep the wheels turning. At one time an extensive knitting factory was operated to provide funds to pay off debts. When adverse problems arose from this project, it was discontinued.

Expansion. Substantial growth was made in book and periodical sales from the time of incorporation on. In 1873 sales had reached $15,000 annually. In 1890 they had increased to $500,000 annually. At the same time commercial and job printing was being carried on. These figures become even more significant when the selling price of books then is taken into account. For example, in December 1870 a list of publications featured items from one-half-cent tracts to the Church Hymnal, bound in morocco leather, for $1. A 400-page health book, How to Live, edited by James White, also sold for $1, as did the 342-page volume History of the Sabbath, by J. N. Andrews.

Apprenticeship was in vogue in the various departments in the early years. Board was the payment for the first three months, board and clothing for the second three months, and $1 a day the third three months. Proficiency could boost the pay as high as $10 to $12 a week.

Destruction by Fire. A stubborn fire originating in the boiler room on Feb. 10, 1891, did $2,100 damage in the pressroom area, the first near disaster ever to threaten the plant, but work was resumed the same day.

In November 1901 a solemn warning from Ellen White against the commercial publishing of objectionable material that compromised Seventh-day Adventist teachings and views was read to the Review and Herald board. In the light of subsequent events, this statement in the warning was significant: "I have been almost afraid to open the Review, fearing to see that God has cleansed the publishing house by fire" (8T 91).

On Dec. 30, 1902, the publishing house was totally destroyed by fire of an unknown origin. Within an hour of its discovery, at 7:25 p.m. by employees working the night shift, the entire four-story structure was a mass of blazing ruins. Nothing of value was saved. The machinery, furniture, printed books and periodicals, paper stock, and other materials were a total loss. The $150,000 insurance did not fully cover the building and its contents. The shipping room across the street was still intact, however, and its stock of books enabled the institution to continue business as usual. The chapel of the West Building was immediately converted into a printing room, and new machinery was ordered to keep the periodicals going.

One radical result of the fire was the discontinuance of commercial printing, an activity concerning which earnest appeals for reform had come from Mrs. White. The destruction of the Review and Herald publishing plant by fire and of the Battle Creek Sanitarium, which occurred in the same year, brought sharply into focus the counsel that she had given at intervals, from as far back as the mid-1880s, calling attention to the evils of centering so many institutions in Battle Creek. One statement is typical: "The Lord does not want a second Jerusalem in Battle Creek" (Review and Herald 80:5, Aug. 11, 1903). Subsequently her remarks became more specific, at the Oakland General Conference session of 1903, after the Review and Herald fire: "Let the General Conference offices and the publishing work be moved from Battle Creek. . . . Never lay a stone or brick in Battle Creek to rebuild the Review office there. God has a better place for it" (ibid.).

Transfer to Washington, D.C. After canvassing various Eastern cities, especially the New York City area, the locating committee appointed at the Oakland meeting found a 50-acre (20-hectare) tract in Takoma Park, Maryland, a mile from the District of Columbia, that seemed to fit the general description outlined by Mrs. White as the most desirable site for the new sanitarium and a college. But a suggestion that the publishing house should have a Washington address prevailed. To launch temporary publishing activities in the District of Columbia, a four-story building was rented at 222 North Capitol Street in August 1903. Later a store building at 716 13th Street was rented for storage. In April 1903 resolutions had been adopted at the Oakland, California, General Conference session to dissolve the Seventh-day Adventist Publishing Association and transfer its stock and assets to the new organization. Incorporation was effected under the laws of the District of Columbia on Aug. 11, 1903, under the name Review and Herald Publishing Association. It was a nonstock, nondividend company. A depository and retail branch was maintained for some time at the former Battle Creek site, where some printing was still being done.

To assure a permanent Washington address for the new enterprise, portions of what was known as the Thornton estate immediately inside the District of Columbia line adjacent to Takoma Park, totaling one and seven-eighths acres (three fourths of a hectare), were purchased for $3,050. On May 26, 1905, a drive for $15,000 to erect buildings on the site was launched by the General Conference. The first unit constructed was a three-story-and-basement building 60' x 90' (18 m. x 27 m.), built at a cost of approximately $25,000, occupied in 1906.

Additions to the Building. Expansions of the plant became necessary as business increased, the first being made about 1908. The first major addition was authorized in 1918 and completed in 1919. It was built on the northwest side, three stories high, and cost $56,000. In the same year a rear annex, extending the third and fourth stories, was completed at a cost of $8,000, and a cafeteria was erected for about $15,000.

In 1940 the stucco facade of the original structure was veneered with brick, and the same year central heating was installed from the General Conference heating plant. In 1941, to accommodate the new pressroom, a fireproof wing was authorized, with a basement and subbasement, providing more room for the Maintenance Department and storage. It was completed in 1943. Storage space was maintained for several years in various places outside the main building, but in 1948 a permanent two-story fireproof warehouse was built on a spur of the B&O Railroad line three blocks away.

An extension to the plant known as "the wraparound" was completed in 1949. It added three stories on the Willow Street side and a large addition to the pressroom and book bindery on the southwest and southeast sides. Totalling nearly 34,000 square feet (3,160 square meters), it also provided much-needed extra space for the Art, Composing, and Engraving departments and storage areas.

In 1956 ground was broken for a four-story steel, concrete, and brick addition to the front of the original structure that reached Eastern Avenue on the northeast and Willow Street on the northwest. This provided new offices for the Book, Periodical, Accounting, and Administrative departments, a new chapel, enlargement of the shipping and mailing areas, and permitted adjustments of space in other parts of the plant.

In December 1973 a three-story addition to the main building, with 59,000 square feet (5,490 square meters) of floor space and erected at a cost of $1.2 million, went into use. The periodical bindery was moved to the new building, adjoining the book bindery in the old building. The new building also provided warehouse space for paper and signature storage.

A final addition in 1980 provided more office space for the Adventist Review staff and enlarged the editorial library.

Merger With Southern Publishing Association and Transfer to Hagerstown. On Mar. 20, 1980, the Southern Publishing Association in Nashville, Tennessee, merged with the Review and Herald. On Oct. 16 of that year, the constituency voted to sell the Nashville plant. Inasmuch as the Washington plant could not be enlarged to accommodate the increased workload, efforts were begun to relocate the facility. A farm near Hagerstown, Maryland, was purchased for the purpose from the Roney family. The factory building was inaugurated in 1982, and work began on the office building the same year. The completed complex was officially opened July 24, 1983.

Branch Houses. Before the days of rapid transportation, it was considered an economy measure to establish depositories, or branches, in strategic areas for the more convenient distribution of books. Besides, storage space was at a premium in the main plant. Accordingly, a branch office was established in Toronto, Canada, in 1889. Along with all its accumulated assets, it was donated to the Canadian Union Conference after its organization in 1902. Also in 1889 a branch was established at Atlanta, Georgia. Twelve years later it was passed over to the control of the Southern Union Conference at their request. This site later was chosen by the Southern Union for a sanitarium (Review and Herald 6:20, 1905, p. 11). Branches were also operated in South Bend, Indiana, from 1906 to 1938; in New York City from 1907 to 1922, then at Peekskill, New York, until 1938. In 1918 a Washington branch separate from the main plant was maintained. This was later moved to the main building and absorbed as a part of its business. Although these branches no longer operate as such, records of the unions they served and monthly comparative sales reports are made.

A Canadian branch was established at Winnipeg in 1919 under the name of the Canadian Publishing Association. But the publishing interests of the Canadian field sponsored by the Review and Herald were incorporated Nov. 2, 1920, into the Canadian Watchman Press, with headquarters at Oshawa, Ontario.

Effective Apr. 1, 1970, British Adventist Missions, on behalf of the British Union Conference, leased Stanborough Press, Ltd., in Alma Park, Grantham, Lincolnshire, England, to the Review and Herald Publishing Association. The existing equipment was valued at $220,000, and during the first year the Review and Herald provided approximately $100,000 for new equipment. During a five-year period, 1985—1990, another $250,000 was allocated by the Review and Herald for a new press. The legal board of Stanborough Press, Ltd., is in charge of routine operations, under the general direction of the Review and Herald Board of Trustees. Stanborough Press publishes British Advent Messenger and Encounter, as well as quarterlies and books, and does printing for other Seventh-day Adventist organizations.

Services to the Denomination. As prosperity attended the operation of the business, the Review and Herald had a strong part in building up the publishing interests in other lands, notably in Great Britain, South Africa, Australia, and India. Both money and equipment were donated for this purpose. Typical among such gifts was that from the “Big Day” effort in 1921, in which nearly $25,000 was raised for the publishing house in South Africa; also, the $20,000 given in 1929 to establish headquarters in Paris for the Maison d’Edition “Les Signes des Temps,” and another $2,500 given to the publishing house in Australia to help in liquidating its debts. Hundreds of thousands of dollars have been appropriated to the rehabilitation fund established in recent years.

Many workers trained in the plant of the Review and Herald Publishing Association have been sent out through the years to take charge of publishing and other missionary interests in the homeland and in foreign fields. Perhaps the peak year in this kind of denominational service was 1920, when 14 such workers were released to 6 different fields.

The Review and Herald also played an important role in the establishment of Source of Life Publishing House in Tula, Russia.

Presidents and Managers: From the origin of the Seventh-day Adventist Publishing Association in 1861, James White was its president and manager until his death in 1881, except for the time of his severe illness (1865—1868). The succession of presidents from that time on was as follows:

George I. Butler, 1881—1889; C. Eldridge, 1889—1893; O. A. Olsen, 1893—1895; W. C. Sisley, 1896—1900; G. A. Irwin, 1900—1901; I. H. Evans, 1901—1904; W. W. Prescott, 1904—1909; F. M. Wilcox, 1909—1944; E. D. Dick, 1944—1951.

During the incumbency of Eldridge and Olsen, A. R. Henry served as manager as well as treasurer. In 1911 the president of the board relinquished administrative authority to duly elected managers. In 1951 the position of president was dropped, leaving board chairs and general managers. The managerial succession was as follows:

On Jan. 31, 1984, the position of president was reinstated in place of general manager. The succession of presidents has been as follows:

Harold F. Otis, Jr., 1984—1989; John F. Wilkens, 1989—1991; Robert J. Kinney, Jr., 1991— .

REY, JULES (1883—1962). Swiss evangelist and administrator in Switzerland, France, and North Africa. He had received six years of elementary education and two years of secondary schooling before his conversion to the Seventh-day Adventist faith in 1900. After attending schools for church workers in Geneva and Paris in 1901 and 1902, he began service as an evangelist. In 1910 he was ordained. In 1921 he married Juliette Longhi. From 1920 to 1923 he was president of the French Conference. In 1923 he became leader of the French-Swiss Conference, and in 1928 went to direct the North African Union Mission. In 1936 he returned to Switzerland and served as a minister there.

Ribton, Herbert Panmure

RIBTON, HERBERT PANMURE (d. 1882). Physician and missionary. A graduate of the University of Dublin and probably Irish, he was living in Naples, Italy, when he learned of the seventh-day Sabbath through reading the Sabbath Memorial, a Seventh Day Baptist quarterly from London, England. Through reading Les Signes des Temps and other Seventh-day Adventist publications that came from Switzerland he accepted the Adventist faith, and in 1877 was baptized by J. N. Andrews at Puozzoli (biblical Puteoli, where Paul landed on Italian soil). He was a scholar familiar with Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, as well as French and Italian. He became an active missionary for his faith among the people of Naples and translated several Seventh-day Adventist tracts into Italian. About 1880 he went to Alexandria, Egypt, where a group of Italian Seventh-day Adventists had arisen. Ribton shepherded this group and also endeavored to preach to Arabs and other members of the cosmopolitan community there. On one of his missionary visits in the city he was attacked by a mob bent on killing all foreigners in the land and was murdered along with two of his Italian associates. His young daughter, who was with him, was finally sheltered by an unknown Arab until the riot subsided and then was brought to her mother.

Rice, Mangram Leslie

RICE, MANGRAM LESLIE (1888—1966). Administrator and author. A native of California, he was baptized in 1906 and the following year enrolled at San Fernando Academy. After attending Pacific Union College he became a minister in the Central California Conference. He was ordained to the gospel ministry in 1920 and a year later accepted the presidency of the Nevada Conference. During the next 34 years he served as president of the following conferences: Upper Columbia, Washington, Atlantic Union, and Lake Union.

During his service in the Atlantic Union, he authored four books.

Richard Greenidge Academy

RICHARD GREENIDGE ACADEMY (Colegio Ricardo Greenidge). A coeducational school located in Caracas, operated by the Central Venezuela Conference. It offers courses from preschool through secondary school. It was founded on June 1, 1936, as the Adventist Elementary School of Caracas. In 1956 it was moved to its present place, with a new name: Ricardo Greenidge Elementary School. In October of 1968 it became a secondary school with a beginning enrollment of 28 students. The school has prospered through the years and in 1993 had an enrollment of 450 students.

Directors: N. A. Garcia, 1968—1969; J. J. Suarez, 1969—1971; Socorro Camacaro, 1972—1973; Gonzalo Prada, 1974—1978; Antonio Ceballos, 1978—1983; G. E. Bracho, 1983—1985; Mrs. Guillermina de Hernández, 1985—1989; Alcibíades Manrique, 1989—1993; Mrs. Guillermina de Hernández, 1993— .

Richards, Bertie Capitola Sylvester

RICHARDS, BERTIE CAPITOLA SYLVESTER (1870—1966). Departmental secretary. She was a native of Iowa. In 1893 she married Elder H.M.J. Richards and helped with evangelism in the Iowa Conference. They moved to Colorado in 1899. In 1912 she became secretary of the Sabbath School and Education Departments of the East Pennsylvania Conference and later held similar positions in the Ontario Conference in Canada, and in the Texico and Arkansas conferences. Later the family moved to the West Coast, where Mrs. Richards continued in church work.

Richards, Halbert Marshall Jenkins

RICHARDS, HALBERT MARSHALL JENKINS (1869—1956). Minister and conference administrator. Born in Wisconsin, he accompanied his parents to England at the age of 7, where he was converted as a youth. After his return to the United States at the age of 17, he entered the colporteur work and later preached in the Iowa Conference. In 1893 he married Bertie C. Sylvester. In 1897 he was ordained to the ministry. Two years later he went to the Colorado Conference, where he served as vice president for a time and promoted the establishment of Campion Academy. Later he served as president of the East Pennsylvania (1912—1917), Ontario (1917), Texico (1917—1921), and Arkansas (1922—1926) conferences, and still later as chaplain at the St. Helena and the Glendale sanitariums, and as pastor in Mountain View and East Long Beach, California. He also worked on the staff of the Voice of Prophecy radiobroadcast, which had been established in 1930 by his son, H.M.S. Richards.

Richards, Harold Marshall Sylvester

RICHARDS, HAROLD MARSHALL SYLVESTER (1894—1985). Radio pioneer, speaker, author. Born in Iowa, he determined as a young boy that he would dedicate his life to the ministry, following in the footsteps of his father, Halbert M. J. Richards, and his paternal grandfather.

Very early he helped his father in an evangelistic campaign, and after graduating from Campion Academy in Colorado in 1914, he conducted his first series of gospel meetings in a little hamlet on the side of Pikes Peak.

He graduated from Washington Missionary College (now Columbia Union College) in 1919 and was assigned to work in Ottawa, Canada. There he met Mabel Annabel Eastman, whom he married in 1920 after a brief courtship.

During that year he first conceived the idea of broadcasting the Christian gospel over the airwaves, a dream not to be realized for 10 years. In the meantime his ministry was successful, his presentation of Bible themes often drawing large audiences.

In 1926 Richards and his wife were called to California, where they conducted campaigns in several large cities.

After some experimentation with radio, Richards began a regular broadcast in 1930 when KNX in Los Angeles, along with other stations, aired without charge his and other ministers' Family Worship programs. During a crusade in Huntington Park, Richards' daily live broadcasts of The Tabernacle of the Air went over KGER in Long Beach, and a remote wire from his tabernacle to KMPC in Beverly Hills enabled him to do a weekly program also. His radio headquarters were located in a renovated chicken coop at the back of his garage.

In January 1937 the program expanded over a network of several stations of the Don Lee Broadcasting System, and in that same year the name of the broadcast was changed to the Voice of Prophecy.

Dr. Richards said that perhaps the greatest thrill of his ministry was his first coast-to-coast broadcast over 89 stations of the Mutual Broadcasting System on Sunday, Jan. 4, 1942. Just one month after this the first national Seventh-day Adventist Bible correspondence school was begun. Since then nearly 1 million people have been graduated from the North American headquarters school alone.

Inspired by the example of Richards, dozens of SDA ministers around the world began Voice of Prophecy (or Voice of Hope) broadcasts in 36 languages. Their gospel ministry on more than 1,100 stations is complemented by Bible courses in 80 languages offered by 150 correspondence schools.

Richards was awarded the Honor Citation of the National Religious Broadcasters organization both in 1967 and 1970. In 1960 Andrews University conferred an honorary doctorate on him.

Because of his Spirit-filled preaching, Richards was in much demand as a speaker at camp meetings and other large gatherings throughout the world. He became a role model of Christ-centered preaching for ministers everywhere.

A visit to Pastor Richards' home library revealed a book lover's paradise. The walls were lined with books from floor to ceiling, with a double stack through the middle of the room. Many of the thousands of verses of his poem "Have Faith in God," heard weekly on the broadcast, were written in this library.

In addition to the hundreds of radio sermons printed in booklet form by the Voice of Prophecy, Dr. Richards authored a number of books, including The Indispensable Man, Promises of God, What Jesus Said, Feed My Sheep, Look to the Stars, Why I Am a Seventh-day Adventist, One World, Revival Sermons, and Day After Tomorrow. His own story is told by his daughter in a book entitled H.M.S. Richards: Man Alive!

Righteousness By Faith

RIGHTEOUSNESS BY FAITH. In Seventh-day Adventist terminology, the instantaneous experience of conversion through faith in Christ, often spoken of as “justification by faith,” and the lifelong experience of Christian living, also through faith in Christ.

Seventh-day Adventists believe that the new birth, important as it is, is only the beginning of a lifelong experience of growing up into Christ, of conforming one’s life, point by point, to the perfect example set for the Christian in the life of Christ. The Seventh-day Adventist emphasis is on the fact that the same Christ who saves a person through his or her exercise of faith will also enable that person to develop a Christian character, likewise through faith; that righteousness by faith in Christ is a continuing process. SDA teaching clearly recognizes and stresses that the ability to live a Christian life comes from God, not from our own works or from compliance even with God’s moral law.

Righteousness by faith has been a doctrine of SDAs since their beginning. In 1852 James White declared: “Those who represent Sabbathkeepers as going away from Jesus, the only source of justification, and rejecting his atoning blood and seeking justification by the law do it either ignorantly or wickedly” (Review and Herald 8:24, June 10, 1852).

While this was the accepted view of early Sabbathkeeping Adventists, a study of early Adventist publications reveals little discussion of the subject. This was because of the emphasis on unique denominational beliefs. This relative silence on the subject of righteousness by faith reflects the firm acceptance of all early Seventh-day Adventists with respect to this fundamental Christian belief.

In 1874 the newly established Signs of the Times published a list of the “Fundamental Principles” of the church. This list declares that “regeneration or conversion” is “the special work of the Holy Spirit,” following “repentance and faith.” A broad concept of faith is reflected in the following statement: “We are dependent on Christ, first for justification from our past offenses, and, secondly, for grace whereby to render acceptable obedience to his holy law in time to come” (Signs of the Times 1:3, June 4, 1874).

The Signs of the Times reflects an increasing editorial interest in the subject of righteousness by faith that reached a climax in the mid-1890s.

Ellen White, who had experienced conversion in the Methodist Church, stood for a strong evangelical emphasis, as did her husband. In 1875 she wrote: “Christ perfected a righteous character here upon the earth, not for His own account, but for fallen man. His character He offers to man if he will accept it. The sinner, through repentance of his sins, faith in Christ, and obedience to the perfect law of God, has the righteousness of Christ imputed to him; it becomes his righteousness, and his name is recorded in the Lamb’s book of life” (3T 371).

Speaking of the conversion of John Wesley, in her book The Great Controversy, she says: “He continued his strict and self-denying life, not now as the ground, but the result of faith; not the root, but the fruit of holiness. . . . Wesley’s life was devoted to the preaching of the great truths which he had received—justification through faith in the atoning blood of Christ, and the renewing power of the Holy Spirit upon the heart” (1888 ed., p. 256).

These passages reflect the basic theme of Ellen White’s teaching throughout her life.

During the 1880s a few church leaders, including Ellen White, sensed a growing lack of SDA preaching on themes related to righteousness by faith. Continued emphasis on the unique Seventh-day Adventist doctrinal positions had crowded out what was the basic teaching of the gospel. This question became an issue at the General Conference session held at Minneapolis, Minnesota, in the fall of 1888. At this meeting E. J. Waggoner, editor of the Signs of the Times, gave a series of sermons on the law and the gospel. Parallel to these sermons was a series of discourses by Mrs. White in which she discussed at length the importance of a clear understanding of righteousness by faith. In one of her sermons she commented as follows on Waggoner’s topic—the relation between the law and the gospel: “There is no power in the law to save or to pardon the transgressor. What then does it do? It brings the repentant sinner to Christ. . . . The law points to the remedy for sin—repentance toward God and faith in Christ” (MS 17, 1888, p. 2).

Those at the conference of 1888 who sensed most clearly the need for increased emphasis on righteousness by faith were Ellen G. White, E. J. Waggoner, and his fellow editor, A. T. Jones. There were those who did not share their concern. Waggoner and Jones were relatively young men, and were considered enthusiasts by some of the older men. Some feared that this emphasis on faith might weaken the biblical doctrine of the importance of obedience. Misunderstanding, opposition, and division cloud the record of that meeting. However, many who were reluctant to accept this new emphasis in 1888 later changed their viewpoint. Some continued for a time to oppose it.

After the meeting was over, Ellen White, Waggoner, and Jones traveled from Massachusetts to California, preaching the message of righteousness by faith to the people, by whom it was generally welcomed. An examination of SDA literature published from 1890 to 1900 indicates a great volume of material on righteousness by faith, including Ellen White’s The Desire of Ages, Steps to Christ, Thoughts From the Mount of Blessing, Christ’s Object Lessons, and Patriarchs and Prophets. Throughout these books is a strong evangelical emphasis well summarized as follows: “Our only ground of hope is in the righteousness of Christ imputed to us, and in that wrought by His Spirit working in and through us” (SC 63).

The turn of the century found Seventh-day Adventists involved in a great foreign mission advance that necessitated an emphasis on organization. During the first two decades of the new century emphasis on righteousness by faith was less than it had been in the nineties. Concern over the matter was expressed anew in the 1920s by leaders such as Meade MacGuire, Arthur G. Daniells, Carlyle B. Haynes, and I. H. Evans. This renewed emphasis was a clear restatement of the principles so forcefully enunciated in 1888 by Ellen White and her coworkers, and it exerted a strong influence at all levels.

The Christ-centered ring of this preaching is illustrated by a statement of W. W. Prescott in 1929: “The message of the cross is the good news, the blessed truth, that God in Christ has so dealt with sin that it need not any longer be a barrier between us and God, that the hindrance to the most intimate fellowship with God has been removed, and that the gift of eternal life has been brought within our reach. A crucified and risen Christ has wrought deliverance from both the guilt and the power of sin for every believing soul and from the agony of Gethsemane comes the joy of salvation. What a wonderful gospel! What a compassionate Saviour!" (The Saviour of the World, p. 48).

The doctrine of righteousness by faith is set forth in the four Gospels and in the Epistles of Paul to the Romans and the Galatians. The miracles of Jesus provide object lessons of how men are saved by faith. Many of the parables teach righteousness by faith. The parable of the prodigal son, for example, illustrates the steps in redemption. The parable of the wedding garment is equally eloquent on this point. John's emphasis is that belief brings life: "But these are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing ye might have life through his name" (John 20:31).

Seventh-day Adventists believe that justification comes exclusively through faith in Christ. The concept that a sinner can become right, or just, before God by faith in the vicarious sacrifice of Christ is the very heart of the gospel. God accepts as His sons those who receive and believe in Christ (John 1:12—13; 3:3, 16), "not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy he saved us" (Titus 3:5). Justification is by faith alone because it cannot be attained by works. "By grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God: not of works, lest any man should boast" (Eph. 2:8, 9). No one can be justified in God's sight by works of law, but only by faith in the power of Christ to save an individual from sin and death (Rom. 6:23; Gal. 2:16). "The just shall live by faith" (Gal. 3:11). "Being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ"; by faith we are "reconciled to God" (Rom. 5:1, 10). Faith in Christ releases a sinner from condemnation and makes it possible for that person to stand righteous before God (Rom. 7:24 to 8:4).

Seventh-day Adventists also believe that a person who has experienced justification by faith in Christ must continue to "grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ" (2 Peter 3:18). Justification places a Christian's feet on the pathway of salvation; sanctification is the process of walking along that upward pathway toward the perfection of Jesus Christ. The person who has experienced justification by faith in Christ will not be "conformed to this world," but will be "transformed by the renewing" of his or her mind, as that individual discovers and applies to his or her life "what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect, will of God" for him (Rom. 12:1, 2).

Paul spoke of his own experience in this respect as a pressing forward "toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus" (Phil. 3:14). A born-again Christian himself for many years, Paul declared that he had not "already attained," nor was he "already perfect." He was still earnestly "reaching forth unto those things which are before" and pressing "toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus" (vs. 12—14). This experience SDAs commonly refer to as sanctification, which is the work of a lifetime, in contrast with justification, which requires but a moment. A Christian undergoes the chastening of God, a process of discipline through which His sons and daughters attain to maturity in Christ (Heb. 12:5, 6, 11). In a moment of time, faith restores the believing sinner to peace with God, but a lifetime is required to grow up into the full stature of Christ (Eph. 4:12—15, 22, 24). At the same time justification must be maintained.

Seventh-day Adventist convictions on this facet of the gospel have been appropriately summarized by Carlyle B. Haynes in a pamphlet entitled Righteousness in Christ: "Becoming a Christian, then, is not the acceptance of a body of teaching, nor a mental assent to a set of doctrines, nor believing the truth of the Bible in a mere intellectual way. It is not joining the church and partaking of the ordinances. It is entering into a new personal relation to Christ. . . . Without Him there could be no gospel. He came, not so much to proclaim a message, but rather that there might be a message to proclaim. He Himself was, and is, the message. Not His teachings, but Himself, constituted Christianity” (pp. 16, 17). See also Faith and Works; Law; Law and Grace; New Birth; Sanctification.

Rine, George W.

RINE, GEORGE W. (1859—1938). Teacher and author. He began teaching a public school at the age of 17. In 1883 he graduated from Lockhaven College. In 1886 he became a Seventh-day Adventist, after failing to correct his sister, who had joined the Seventh-day Adventists earlier. Later he taught English at Healdsburg College (1886—1908), Pacific Union College (1909—1917; 1927—1928), and Walla Walla College (1917—1922). He was chaplain of the Portland Sanitarium (1922—1927), and pastor in Berkeley, California (1928—1932). Scores of articles written by him appeared in the Signs of the Times and elsewhere.

Rio Lindo Adventist Academy

RIO LINDO ADVENTIST ACADEMY. A coeducational boarding school on the senior high school level, situated on the Russian River, three miles (five kilometers) from Healdsburg, California.

The school began operation in the fall of 1962 and serves the constituency of the Northern California Conference. The enrollment in September 1992 was 221, with a total school staff of 29. As of June 1993 more than 3,300 students have graduated from Rio Lindo.

The school offers the college preparatory course and the general secondary course for those who do not plan to enter college. Since 1962 it has been accredited by the Western Association of Schools and Colleges (WASC), and by the Board of Regents of the General Conference of Seventh-day Adventists.

The school site is the former 360-acre (145-hectare) Digger Bend ranch, originally a part of an old Spanish land grant conferred on the Fitch family in 1841. The Digger Indians lived in this area before the Spanish occupation. Fitch Mountain, which rises abruptly from the Russian River to the south of the campus, constituted a backdrop to the east of the old Healdsburg College, the first Seventh-day Adventist institution west of the Rockies and the forerunner of Pacific Union College.

On the site stand 10 major buildings constructed of fireproof Basalite block: two three-story residence halls, each accommodating approximately 145 students; the administration building, containing the offices, the career education center, classrooms, the multipurpose room, the library, the chapel, and the music conservatory; the science building for the natural, secretarial, and domestic sciences; the cafeteria; the creative arts-powerhouse building; the maintenance building; the gymnasium; and the industrial arts building. A church facility was constructed in 1988. There are 29 faculty homes. Currently the farmlands are being leased. Students who wish to earn part of their way are given work opportunities on campus.

The school publications are the school annual, El Rio, and the school paper, Rio Currents.

Risk and Insurance Management

RISK AND INSURANCE MANAGEMENT. A complete professional risk management service provided to denominational administrators by the General Conference. This includes risk identification and analysis, risk control and loss prevention strategies, risk financing alternatives such as insurance and self-insurance programs, employee benefit program development and administration, coordination of denominational risk and insurance management programs, design and presentation of risk and insurance management education programs pertinent to denominational entities, and consultation with denominational administrators relative to specifications and parameters of individual risk and insurance management programs. These programs address the full range of potential loss exposures, including property loss exposures, net income loss exposures, liability loss exposures, and personnel loss exposures.

This service is provided by the General Conference Corporation of Seventh-day Adventists, doing business as General Conference Risk Management Services. The organization is commonly known as Risk Management Services, or its abbreviation, RMS. Risk Management Services is directed by a board of management comprised of Seventh-day Adventist professionals working in the insurance industry, and a representative group of denominational administrators. The board chairperson is the General Conference treasurer. Execution of the denominational risk management services is assigned to the executive director of Risk Management Services and appointed staff.

Risk Management Services directs the global risk management program from its home office at the General Conference world headquarters building in Silver Spring, Maryland. Risk management, by its nature, requires close contact with the source of exposure to risks. Therefore, Risk Management Services has established offices in various geographic locations in the North American Division, as well as an office in England. From these offices and the home office, traveling professionals are able to effectively serve the entire world field.

In order to facilitate the retention of income opportunities created by denominational risk financing programs, several business organizations have been established through which risk financing activities are conducted. These organizations are sometimes referred to as “captive” organizations. They exist solely to meet the denominational risk financing objectives.

Gencon Insurance Company of Vermont was incorporated on Feb. 2, 1987. It is a captive insurance company that provides the corporate vehicle for providing denominational self-insurance coverage for various lines of coverage, as well as access to catastrophic insurance coverage from reinsurers. Its predecessor was the International Insurance Company, Takoma Park, Maryland, which was incorporated on Apr. 23, 1936. The original incorporators and board of directors were: W. A. Benjamin, W. H. Branson, H. H. Cobban, W. P. Elliott, I. H. Evans, F. Green, M. E. Kern, C. C. Pulver, J. L. Shaw, C. H. Watson, and W. H. Williams. This was the result of an action at the Annual Council of November 1935, where a committee was chosen to draft a working policy for denominational property insurance. W. A. Benjamin, a Seventh-day Adventist insurance professional, was called to assist in this work. Benjamin later joined the General Conference staff as manager of the General Conference Insurance Service, now known as General Conference Risk Management Services. The International Insurance Company, Takoma Park, Maryland, was sold on Dec. 4, 1992. Gencon Insurance Company of Vermont is periodically inspected and audited by the Insurance Department of the state of Vermont regarding its operations. This is the same rigid inspection given to all insurance companies chartered under the laws of the state of Vermont.

Two captive agencies are also used in the risk financing program of the denomination. Gencon Agency, Inc., was incorporated in 1969. It is a taxable corporation used to facilitate the placement of insurance programs that have a third party as ultimate beneficiary with insurance companies. An example of this type of program would be an employee benefit group coverage. Gencon Insurance Service, Inc., was incorporated in 1958. It is used to facilitate the placement of insurance programs that have the denominational entity itself as the beneficiary with insurance companies. An example of this type of program would be a denominational boiler insurance coverage.

Gencon Self-Insurance Services was organized in 1985 to separate the funds that are administered by Risk Management Services on behalf of other denominational entities from regular operations.

Gencon Financial Services, Inc., was incorporated in 1991. It is a taxable corporation operated as a securities broker-dealership. It is used to facilitate the denominational employee retirement planning alternatives, including tax-sheltered annuity programs. It is subject to the rigorous compliance requirements of the United States Securities and Exchange Commission and the National Association of Securities Dealers.

All the business organizations used in the risk financing function of Risk Management Services are staffed exclusively by professionals who are employees of the General Conference Risk Management Services. They represent part of the team of risk management staff who provide the complete and professional risk management service to their partners in service, the denominational administrators.

Executive Directors of General Conference Risk Management Services (and affiliated organizations): William A. Benjamin, 1935—1955; Virgil L. Sanders, 1955—1957; Jewell W. Peeke, 1957—1978; Charles O. Frederick, 1978—1983; Stanton H. Parker, 1983—1992; Robert L. Sweezey, 1992— .

Rittenhouse, Floyd Oliver

RITTENHOUSE, FLOYD OLIVER (1905—1993). Teacher, administrator. Born in Montana, the oldest in a family of seven children, he attended church school and academy at Mount Ellis Academy, graduating in 1922. After two years at Walla Walla College, he completed his bachelor's degree at Emmanuel Missionary College (now Andrews University) as president of his class in 1928.

His early career was as teacher and dean of boys at Sutherlin Academy in Oregon and at Mount Vernon Academy in Ohio. He was the first principal of Takoma Academy in Maryland, from 1933 to 1938. He once said that at one time or another he had taught every class and held every position a Seventh-day Adventist academy has except dean of girls and home economics instructor.

He was registrar at Southern Missionary College (now Southern College) from 1938 to 1939 and academic dean there from 1948 to 1952. He was academic dean at Washington Missionary College (now Columbia Union College) from 1941 to 1948. He was academic dean and later president of Emmanuel Missionary College from 1952 to 1959. He led efforts to gain full accreditation at three SDA colleges.

When the Seventh-day Adventist Theological Seminary moved from Washington, D.C., to Berrien Springs, Michigan, in 1959, Dr. Rittenhouse helped shape the newly named Andrews University into a seminary, undergraduate, and graduate school. As he had done at previous college assignments, he led the effort to upgrade curriculum and faculty and to gain full accreditation for all three parts of Andrews. He was an energetic fund-raiser for the Michigan Colleges Foundation.

In 1963 Dr. Rittenhouse became president of Pacific Union College and served in that capacity until he retired in 1974. As president he remained active with the Association of Independent Colleges.

He received a master's degree (1932) and a Ph.D. degree (1949), both in history, from Ohio State University. He married Nellie Blair Hubbard in 1937. Mrs. Rittenhouse died in 1991. They had two daughters. In 1992 he married Ellen Gibson Christian.

A tireless storyteller, Dr. Rittenhouse had particular interest in the lore of the American West, the Civil War, and American Indian history. He authored two books: Proving the Promises, a biography of V. T. Armstrong (Pacific Press, 1980), and a devotional book, Show Me Thy Ways.

Rittenhouse, Sidney Noble

RITTENHOUSE, SIDNEY NOBLE (1886—1974). Pastor, departmental secretary, administrator. A native of South Dakota, he received his education at Mount Ellis Academy in Montana and at Walla Walla College in the state of Washington. After graduating, he entered the literature ministry and soon became publishing secretary for the North Pacific Union.

In 1913 he married Lillie M. Nelson. Two years later he began work as a pastor and served in this capacity in several locations in Washington and Michigan for the next eight years.

In 1926 he was elected president of the Illinois Conference, where he served five years. Following this he served in a pastoral capacity in many communities in the eastern United States, retiring in 1951.

River Plate Adventist University

RIVER PLATE ADVENTIST UNIVERSITY (Universidad Adventista del Plata). A coeducational boarding school on the senior college level, with a secondary section; situated on 556 acres (225 hectares) of gently rolling land along Highway no. 132, at Puiggari, 12 miles (18 kilometers) from the port of Diamante, Argentina. It is owned and operated by the Austral Union and serves primarily the Seventh-day Adventist college needs of Argentina, Uruguay, and Paraguay. Most of the students come from Argentina; others from Uruguay, Paraguay, Bolivia, Peru, Chile, Ecuador, and other countries. In 1993 enrollment in the primary section was 341; in the secondary, 357; in the college and university courses, 859; industrial students (who work one year to pay the tuition of the following year), 44, making a total enrollment of 1,601, with a total faculty and staff of 319.

History

History. Beginnings. The school was founded Sept. 26, 1898, at a meeting of the South American Mission, held in Crespo, Entre Ríos. The first director was Nelson Z. Town, who at the beginning of 1899 began classes with six students in his home in Las Tunas, province of Santa Fe. At a general meeting held in Las Tunas July 22 to 24, 1899, “it was decided to purchase 80,000 bricks, and establish a school in the province of Entre Ríos, as quickly as possible” (Missionary Magazine 11:124, March 1900). Early in December the building erected on the present location of the university was under roof, and in April 1900 classes began with 23 students. The term ended Sept. 20, 1900, with 23 students (ibid. 12:120, March 1901). From 1901 to 1908 the school was known as Colegio Camerero (Diamante Academy). In 1907 construction was begun on the building that today serves for administration and classrooms for the Department of Music. Under the direction of Walton C. John, who was director of the school from 1908 to 1912, the educational program was reorganized into six primary grades and four years of secondary work, which constituted the “Curso Misionero” (“missionary course”). In 1926 two years of specialization were added.

Physical Plant. The girls’ dormitory, opened in 1915, was enlarged in 1927 and completed in 1937. A new three-story building with a basement was built in 1975, housing 160 girls in 55 rooms. The boys’ dormitory, built in 1899 and 1900, was replaced by a two-story building erected in 1921 and 1922, that was enlarged in 1925. A new boys’ dormitory with three stories and a basement was inaugurated in 1964. The water tower, providing running water, was begun in 1923 and completed in 1924. Since then two additional wells were added.

In 1929 a storeroom was built, which served as a church and auditorium. Remodeled in 1945, it served from 1950 as an auditorium. In 1974 the building was remodeled again to house the college library, with more than 20,000 volumes. A building occupied by the local German-speaking church was transformed into a library in 1948, and when the library was moved to the theology building, it became a two-room school building, with two small offices. In 1937 the original building, erected in 1899 and 1900, was demolished, and on its site a commemorative marker was erected in 1950. Between 1940 and 1943, plans were made to transfer the college section of the school to Pilar in the province of Buenos Aires, but in 1944 it was decided not to carry these plans into effect.

Other buildings and improvements that have been added include the primary school (1948); the church, with a seating capacity of 900 (1949); the music hall (1956); the theology building (1958); the dining room or food services area (1961); the entrance gate to the college (1963); and the new auditorium-gymnasium, with a seating capacity of 3,500 (1973). The illumination system of the college campus, in which each pole has a mercury lamp and a speaker, was built in 1964. A new elementary school building was inaugurated in 1975.

Industries. From the beginning, the college has operated student industries. The dairy, opened in 1901 with one heifer, was improved in 1912, and in 1922 and 1923, Holstein cows were acquired. In 1927 a model dairy known as the Establo Modelo began operations. Since then, the dairy has won a number of prizes, and many improvements both in the plant and in the quality of the animals were made.

The carpenter shop, begun in 1916, added a large workroom supplied with adequate machinery in 1925. In 1974 it was moved to its present location, its former place being occupied by a modern processing and milk pasteurization plant inaugurated in November of that same year. The bakery (established in 1929) has had several remarkable improvements, with an almost total remodeling and modernization in 1974. The products of the college bakery are well known in a wide area around the college. The power plant, constructed in 1931 and enlarged in 1957, for years supplied the needs of the college, the sanitarium, and the homes in the vicinity. Since 1966 electricity has been supplied through a government agency.

A remarkable industrial renewal began in the late part of the 1960s, climaxing in 1973 and 1974. This development affected all the industries of the college and included a fruit juice and jelly factory, established in January 1971, and a fruit tree plantation begun in the same year. Work opportunities for students are also provided in the store (a new self-service store since 1974), mechanic shop, laundry, printing plant, and bindery; in construction work, in the painting and decorating of the buildings, and in the maintenance of grounds and gardens.

Other aspects of the past years that also affected the life of the institution were a modern asphalt roadway connecting the college to the nearest blacktop road 10 miles (16 kilometers) away, officially opened in January 1969; a central telephone office, providing services to more than 130 homes since October 1966; an internal telephone line connecting the different areas of the college, built in 1911; a post office established in August 1971; and the organization of the local municipality.

After the curriculum was reorganized in 1926, and again in 1946, it included seven years of primary school, five years of secondary school (with official recognition since 1945), and two years of the college course, making it a junior college. In 1953—1954 the teachers' course was added on the secondary level; it received official recognition, the first extended to a school not belonging to the official religion of the republic. In 1954 the theological course was reorganized with an additional year, and in 1958 a new organization was approved, converting the school into a senior college.

In 1962 the college was declared a Facultad de Teología y Educación (School of Theology and Education). During the following year the college published for the first time Programas y Bibliografías ("Plans and Bibliographies"), a detailed description of all the courses offered. The office of counseling and guidance was established in 1960. New courses were added later on: Profesorado de Pedagogía y Filosofía and Profesorado en Ciencias Económicas (two teaching courses, one in education and philosophy and the other in economics). Both are four-year programs. These courses were started in 1967 and obtained official accreditation in December 1969. In 1971 a two-year college course for elementary teachers began, and in 1973 two new courses were added, one in secretarial science and the other in music, both three-year programs, with official recognition.

At the end of the 1970s River Plate College offered a solid foundation in secondary education, with certificates for the regular course in its three areas: business, education, and biology. Also, there is a diversified field of college studies in theology, education, philosophy, and economics, requiring four years of study; in music and secretarial science, requiring three years; a two-year elementary teaching course; and a one-year preuniversity course of theological foundation for Seventh-day Adventist youth going to state universities. By 1990 River Plate College offered 12 courses on the college level.

In addition, since April 1967 a branch of the Home Study Institute (now Home Study International) in Washington, D.C., began to function at the college, but independently of it, under the name Instituto de Estudios por Correspondencia. It serves the Spanish-speaking countries of Latin America, and Spain, offering several Bible courses on the secondary level and about 50 hours of college credit courses.

University. On Dec. 7, 1990, the Argentinean government, through an official resolution issued by the Ministry of Education, granted the River Plate College the status of university. Thus the institution was transformed into the River Plate Adventist University, organized in four schools: School of Business Administration (offering six courses); School of Humanities, Education, and Social Sciences (10 courses); School of Health Sciences (three courses); and School of Theology (five courses).

Publications and Clubs. The students have published the school journal, La Voz del Colegio ("The Voice of the College"), with a special annual number (November or December) since 1923. The Sociedad Misionera Pastoral ("Ministerial Missionary Society") was begun in 1924 and reorganized in 1935 under the name of Sociedad de Estudiantes Misioneros ("Student Missionary Society"). The last reorganization took place at the beginning of the 1973 school year, and a new name was chosen, Misión Estudiantil del Plata ("Student Mission of the [River]Plate"): the Misión is organized according to the pattern of a conference of the Seventh-day Adventist Church and is in charge of several churches and groups in the Central Argentina Conference, providing an excellent training field for theology students and others. Since October 1960 another organization is doing a remarkable work: it started as the Club de Conquistadores ("Pathfinders Club"), but soon changed its name to Club de los Tres C ("C.C.C. Club")-the Cachorros ("Cubs"), the Conquistadores ("Pathfinders"), and the Centinelas ("Sentinels" or "Pioneers"). It owns two comfortable brick and cement-block buildings about half a mile from the university, by the Salto del Para'so Creek. Other clubs are the Asociación Mixta de Internos del Superior, Centro de Varones Internos del Secundario, Asociación Femenina del Internado, and the Club del Personal, which unites, respectively, the college-level students, the high school boys' dormitory, the girls of the girls' dormitory, and the faculty.

Since 1944, and under different sponsors, several publications have been sponsored by the college, mainly on theological subjects. Beginning with the decade of the 1960s, an administrative branch of the college, called Editorial del Colegio, has printed several books, most of them written by members of the faculty.

On Mar. 7, 1994, the university opened its medical school, becoming the third such program offered by Seventh-day Adventist Church institutions, the others being Loma Linda University and Montemorelos University.

River Plate College Food Factory

RIVER PLATE COLLEGE FOOD FACTORY (Alimentos CEAPE). A health food industry promoted by River Plate Adventist University. It belongs to the Austral Union and is located in the town of Villa Libertador San Martín, in the province of Entre Ríos, Argentina.

Its beginning goes back to Sept. 26, 1898, the date in which it was decided to create a Seventh-day Adventist school in the province of Entre Ríos. While an adequate building was being constructed, classes were held at the first director's home in Las Tunas, in the province of Santa Fe. Early records of the school refer to students milling wheat for the manufacture of whole-grain bread. This they sold to the population, which at that time was familiar only with white bread. They also manufactured peanut butter and other products.

It is clear that the model created at Avondale College was the guide for those who were establishing the school that would soon become River Plate College. An article published in the Review and Herald on May 8, 1900, said: "We want to make this an industrial school from the start." The director fulfilled these words by insisting that in the morning the students should study and in the afternoon teachers and students should dedicate their time to work.

The industrial thrust of the school during those first years was carried on particularly during the administration of Jess S. Marshall from 1919 to 1934.

The principal industrial achievements of that time included: the start of agriculture and cattle raising; purchase of land; importation of cattle from Carnation Farms in the United States; promotion of poultry raising using an imported line of hens; the building and installation of a bakery, including bringing in an oven from England and some technicians; and the opening of a retail shop in the city of Paraná.

In 1931 the college industries had seven trucks to transport the merchandise, three tractors for the agricultural work, two harvesters, and other tools. This allowed the school to supply abundant work for students.

In 1935 the factory successfully sold cornflakes under the name of Granix. Later the manufacture of this product was moved to Florida, a suburb of Buenos Aires.

The administration of the industrial plant was directed by the finance management of the college, but in 1987 it was decided to elect an administrative manager so that time could be exclusively dedicated to the management of the factory. This brought with it a better financing of the industrial activity. Working in cooperation with Alimentos Granix has been of great benefit to Alimentos CEAPE.

In recent years the factory has advanced in its organization and growth. At this time the industrial plant is made up of six production modules, which are as follows:

Proteins—with the manufacture of various food products based on texturized soy protein, wheat bran, oats, and other products.

Preserves—with the manufacture of grape juice, tomato sauce, and a variety of jams and jellies.

Pasta products—with the manufacture of various types of pasta products, such as spaghetti, macaroni, spinach pasta, tomato pasta, soy pasta, etc.

Cereals—with the preparation of muesli.

Milk products—with the manufacture of various types of cheeses, packaged milk, cream, and yogurt.

Baked goods—with a diversity of breads, including whole-wheat bread, soy bread, bran bread, etc.

In 1992 production reached 855 tons (950 metric tons), with sales of more than US$4 million.

The plant has achieved its objective of providing opportunity for those who are in the education program to be involved in physical work. Fifty-five students work in the factory, of whom 10 are full-time workers.

Beginning in 1987, the college administration nominated a manager exclusively for the factories as follows: Humberto Lavooy, 1987—1988; Daniel Galante, 1989; Egil Wensell, 1990—1992; Raul Gomez, 1993— .

River Plate Sanitarium and Hospital

RIVER PLATE SANITARIUM AND HOSPITAL (Sanatorio Adventista del Plata). A general hospital situated at Villa Libertador San Martin (Puiggari, Entre Ríos), owned and operated by the Austral Union Conference. The two-story brick and concrete building housing the hospital has a capacity of 175 beds and 20 bassinets. Expansion plans for the future will increase the number of beds to more than 250, with a possibility of 300. The institution is situated on the eastern plains of Argentina, 31 miles (50 kilometers) from Paraná, capital of Entre Ríos province, and 9 miles (15 kilometers) from Crespo, where the first Seventh-day Adventist church in the South American Division was founded. Services are offered in medicine, with specialties in traumatology, urology, neurology, cardiology, nephrology, pathology, hemodynamics, pediatrics, etc.; in surgery, with open heart surgery, neurosurgery, kidney transplant, etc., and in obstetrics and physical therapy. There are excellent X-ray and laboratory facilities, which are among the best in the country.

River Plate Sanitarium and Hospital was founded in 1908 by Robert H. Habenicht, M.D., who had settled in the area around 1903. When he arrived there were many towns that had no physician or hospital facilities, and the Habenicht family received patients into their home. Sometimes the children gave up their beds for patients urgently needing them. This personal work was the basis for the help received to launch the sanitarium. Using his own means, and donations given for the project by neighboring farmers, Dr. Habenicht opened a six-bed hospital in the original school building of River Plate College. Lilian Vooris was the first head nurse and matron, and G. B. Replogle, M.D., was the first medical assistant.

Growth was slow until the 1950s. During the 1930s depression operating and capital losses threatened to close the institution, and it was planned in 1936 to move it to a more favorable site in 1939, but a gradual increase in the number of patients in the meantime made this move unnecessary. In 1953 six additional two-bed first-class rooms, two medical offices, and other facilities were completed; an additional 16 first-class rooms were added in 1958, and eight more in 1963. A new administration building was inaugurated in 1966. It also houses 20 bassinets, the X-ray and laboratory facilities, and a medical auditorium. Two years later an intensive therapy center, with 12 beds, was built. Finally, in 1972 a three-story building was inaugurated, housing the Nursing School, 17 two-bed first-class rooms, and the nurses' dormitory.

In 1908 a nurses' training school was opened, which by 1967 had graduated more than 400 nurses, most of whom have been employed in SDA medical institutions throughout the South American Division. In 1967 a new plan of nursing studies was started on the college level and was officially accredited at the end of 1970.

In 1992 the hospital cared for 7,949 inpatients; the total number of employees was 515.

Medical Directors: R. H. Habenicht, 1908—1923; C. E. Westphal, 1923—1954; M. A. Hammerly, 1954—1967; P. D. Tabuenca, 1968—1978; Hiram D. Rostan, 1978—1986; Gunnar Wensell, 1986— .

Riverside Hospital

RIVERSIDE HOSPITAL. A 134-bed general hospital formerly operated at Nashville, Tennessee, by the General Conference.

Occupying a four-story brick building (erected 1972), it offered medical, surgical, and obstetrical care; and laboratory, X-ray, and physiotherapy services. It was accredited by the American Hospital Association's Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals and was a member of the Seventh-day Adventist Hospital Association, the Tennessee Hospital Association, and the Blue Cross service.

The first Seventh-day Adventist medical institution serving African-American patients was founded in 1901. Treatment rooms were established on Cherry Street, Nashville, with the expectation that this venture would eventually become a sanitarium with a nursing school. Fred M. Young was the superintendent, and his wife, Fannie M. Young, was the matron. A local physician, a professor at Meharry Medical College, was engaged on a part-time basis. In 1902 Lottie C. Isbell, M.D., joined the young institution. She was a graduate of the American Medical Missionary College at Battle Creek, where she had reportedly been at the head of her class. The sanitarium was later moved, but the venture was not successful, and the sanitarium closed its doors because of economic difficulties.

In 1908, upon the recommendation of the Southern Union Conference, a building fronting 107 feet (35 meters) on Foster Street and 210 feet (65 meters) on Stewart Street in Nashville was secured for $3,650. Dr. Lottie C. Isbell Blake and her husband, D. E. Blake (a minister who later became a physician), were called from Birmingham to head the new medical institution. Equipment from the early treatment rooms, including bath fixtures, electric light cabinet, and needle sprays, was installed. This was opened as the Rock City Sanitarium in February 1909.

But the introduction of hydrotherapy, as opposed to drug therapy, seemed to be largely a novelty, and the Black community of Nashville did not respond. Thus both efforts came to naught, and it was almost 20 years before Mrs. Nellie H. Druillard opened the Riverside Sanitarium in 1927.

Riverside Sanitarium and Hospital, which grew to a multimillion-dollar investment in modern health for Blacks, came from a humble beginning as part of a farsighted Scotswoman's dream. Mrs. N. H. Druillard, who had been associated with the development of three other Adventist institutions—Emmanuel Missionary College, Madison College, and Madison Sanitarium—founded Riverside Sanitarium as fulfillment of a pledge made while recovering from an automobile accident.

She purchased 15 rambling acres (six hectares) on a beautiful bluff overlooking the Cumberland River and commanding a view of the Nashville, Tennessee, skyline five miles (eight kilometers) distant. On these acres she built, largely from her own funds, seven small cottages, representing an initial investment of $30,000. Singlehandedly she set about to organize the infant institution and to train its workers. Rest, hydrotherapy, proper diet—the science of assisting nature in recovery from sickness and disease—became a trademark of Riverside.

In 1935, two years before Mrs. Druillard died, she turned over her hospital to the General Conference, which was seeking to establish a hospital to serve Southern Blacks. Riverside was in the vanguard of its time, and consequently attracted patients from across the country. The General Conference purchased adjacent property to enlarge the site to 46 acres (20 hectares) and built a modern hospital building in 1947.

A $3 million contemporary hospital building, adding 50 beds and including ancillary services to handle a 150-bed facility, was completed in 1972.

After continued financial losses, in 1977 the General Conference entered into a five-year management contract with Adventist Health System/Sunbelt Health Care Corporation of Orlando, Florida. Still Riverside failed to be financially successful. In 1981 a new management team was hired, which pursued an aggressive physician recruitment program, but they were unable to turn around Riverside's finances. The health system notified the General Conference of its intent to discontinue the management contract. In turn, the General Conference advised the health system to negotiate a sale. Thus Riverside Hospital was sold in 1983.

Robert, Jules

ROBERT, JULES (1864—1955). Swiss administrator. He was born in Switzerland, and at the age of 20 was baptized at Battle Creek, Michigan. From 1884 to 1888 he worked at the Review and Herald publishing house and then went with H. P. Holser to Europe, where he served on managing boards of the Basel publishing house and the Institut Sanitaire. He was married in 1890 to Elise Vuilleumier, for many years a matron of the Lake Geneva Sanitarium. In 1896 he helped to establish the Hamburg publishing house. Afterward he managed the publishing house at Gland (Société Internationale de Traités, 1902—1911), served as secretary-treasurer of the Latin Union (1902—1916), and managed the PHAG health food factory (1908—1921) and the Lake Geneva Sanitarium (La Lignière, 1908—1926). He retired from active administrative service in 1932, but for many years continued to counsel and assist in the administration of Seventh-day Adventist work.

Robinson, Asa T.

ROBINSON, ASA T. (1850—1949). Minister and administrator. Reared in a Christian home in New Brunswick, Canada, he went at the age of 20 to Cornish Flat, New Hampshire, to convince his brother, Dores, who was keeping Saturday as the Sabbath, of his mistake. He not only failed but was himself convinced.

In 1876 he married Loretta, the twelfth child of William Farnsworth, pioneer Sabbath-keeper in Washington, New Hampshire. Invited by S. N. Haskell to become a self-supporting colporteur in 1882, he and his wife spent several months selling Uriah Smith's Thoughts on Daniel and the Revelation. Their two sons, Erban and Dores, at the time were not yet 5 years old. In 1884, again at Haskell's invitation, they entered city mission work in New Bedford, Boston, and Worcester, Massachusetts, and in Brooklyn, New York. In 1886 Robinson was ordained and the next year chosen president of the New England Conference.

In 1891 Robinson went to South Africa, where he organized the first conference. During his six years in that field the work grew rapidly, and a number of institutions were founded, including a college and sanitarium. It was in South Africa that Robinson instituted a new pattern of responsibility of departmental leaders to the conference that was adopted in denominational organization as a whole after the 1901 General Conference session.

In 1894 Pieter Wessels and Robinson secured from Cecil John Rhodes, prime minister of the Cape Colony and chair of the Charter Company, a 12,000-acre (4,850-hectare) tract, on which the first permanent Seventh-day Adventist mission (Solusi) for the African people was established in 1894. Beginning in 1898, the Robinsons spent six years in various conferences in Australia, then returned to the United States. During the next 18 years he served as conference president in Nebraska, Colorado, and Southern New England. At the age of 71 he was appointed chaplain of the New England Sanitarium, and his wife served as Bible instructor among the patients.

Retired at 80, Robinson lived near Pacific Union College until his wife's death in 1933, and from then until his death at the age of 99 he lived with a daughter. At the age of 95 he preached a sermon entitled "The Blessed Hope" in the college church.

Robinson, Christopher

ROBINSON, CHRISTOPHER (1880—1963). Pioneer missionary in Africa. Born in Haversham, England, on Sept. 20, 1880, at the age of 19 he emigrated to South Africa, arriving in Pietermaritzburg at the outbreak of the Anglo-Boer War. Three years later he attended Seventh-day Adventist meetings conducted by H. J. Edmed and was baptized in 1902. Entering the canvassing work, he spent three years selling SDA publications in those sections of South Africa not affected by the war.

By 1906 he had decided to dedicate his life to mission service. With this in view, he enrolled in the nursing school at the Cape Sanitarium and graduated in 1909 with a nurse's certificate. In the same year he was appointed to assist W. H. Anderson on the Barotseland (later Rusangu) Mission, where he spent two and one-half years. Near the close of 1911 he was transferred to Nyasaland to become the director of Malamulo Mission, a position he held for eight years. In 1916 he journeyed to the Cape, where he married Tersha Page, who returned with him to Malamulo.

At Malamulo, Robinson demonstrated his willingness to explore new methods of work. In 1912 he encouraged Miss E. Edie to begin village work for women and girls. When Irene Fourie, a trained nurse, arrived in 1915, he erected for her use the first permanent hospital building in that field. Sensing that the village teachers needed further training, he began the practice of calling them together at the main station for teachers' institutes. He was also the first to organize Missionary Volunteer Societies in the African churches. In 1918 Robinson decided to see whether the camp meeting, so successful in other countries, could be adapted to the needs of the African members. Meetings lasting three or four days proved a success from the first, and the idea quickly spread to other SDA missions.

Toward the close of 1919 the Robinsons went on furlough to the Cape. In 1920 he went to the Congo, where he opened the Songa Mission. He worked there for three years, living under very primitive conditions. As a result of the hardships endured, his health was undermined, forcing him to leave the country and go to a more healthful climate.

After a year spent at Solusi, the Robinsons moved to Inyazura Mission in the eastern part of Rhodesia. Except for three years (1932—1935) that Robinson spent as president of the Southern Rhodesia Mission Field, he remained as director of Inyazura Mission for the next 24 years. During that time the girls' school operated there under Mrs. Robinson's direction reached a high degree of excellence.

In 1948 Robinson retired and came to the Cape, where he purchased a cottage not far from the slopes of Table Mountain. In this home, Forfar, the Robinsons entertained many missionaries passing through Cape Town, always giving them a warm welcome and answering questions regarding mission work. Although retired from active service, he took a deep interest in some of the smaller churches.

Robinson, Dores A.

ROBINSON, DORES A. (1848—1899). Minister and missionary. He was born in New Brunswick, Canada, but in his youth went to Maine, where he accepted the Seventh-day Adventist faith and was baptized. Shortly afterward he won his younger brother, Asa.

From 1872 to 1874 Dores lived in Battle Creek, learning more of his newfound faith from the leaders there. He then returned to New England and preached for two years, after which he was ordained (1876) to the ministry. He continued working 11 more years in the New England Conference.

In 1887 he and his wife joined C. L. Boyd, Carrie Mace, and two colporteurs who were going to South Africa as the first SDA representatives to that country. On arrival, Robinson remained in Cape Town to hold meetings, while Boyd went to Kimberley. The following year he went to England.

In 1895 the Robinsons left England for India, where the SDA work had only scarcely begun, and where early results were meager. But in the remaining four years of his life, Robinson laid a foundation on which workers who followed him were able to build.

In 1899 he was stricken with a malignant type of smallpox and died on the twenty-ninth of December, just five days short of his fifty-second birthday. He was buried at the Karmatar Mission, and his wife and two adopted daughters returned to the homeland.

Robinson, Dores Eugene

ROBINSON, DORES EUGENE (1879—1957). Secretary, compiler, editor. He was born in Washington, New Hampshire, the second son of Asa T. and Loretta Farnsworth Robinson. At the age of about 7, while his parents were working in the Southern New England Conference, Dores went out on his own initiative and sold copies of the Signs of the Times.

In 1891 his parents went to South Africa, but he and his brother remained at South Lancaster until Claremont Union (now Helderberg) College was established near Cape Town. Traveling out with G. B. Thompson in 1893, Dores rejoined his family, and they spent four years together. In 1897 Dores sailed for Scotland to take the medical course, while his parents went to Australia. The following year he joined them in Melbourne, where he continued his medical studies for a time. On the advice of Ellen White, he dropped medicine because of his health and for several months served as one of her secretaries. Later, after returning to the United States, he reentered her employ after an interval of working in the Battle Creek treatment rooms and teaching for a year in Montana.

In 1905 he married Ella White, Ellen White's eldest granddaughter, whom he had met in Australia. He continued as secretary and compiler for Mrs. White until her death in 1915. Then he spent two years in Colorado in pastoral and evangelistic work and teaching Bible and history at Champion Academy in that state.

After two years on the editorial staff of the Southern Publishing Association, at Nashville, he returned in 1920 to South Africa in response to a call for an editor who could handle both English and Dutch papers. He spent four years with the Sentinel Publishing Company, one year at Spion Kop (now Helderberg) College teaching Bible, and three years in charge of the teacher training work at Rusangu Mission in Northern Rhodesia (now Zambia).

From his return to the United States in 1928 until his retirement 25 years later, with the exception of one year spent teaching Bible at Humboldt Academy, he was on the staff of the White Publications, first at Elmshaven and then in Washington, D.C. While in Washington he wrote The Story of Our Health Message (1943) and took an active part in building up the Spencerville, Maryland, church and school.

Robinson, Loretta Viola (Farnsworth)

ROBINSON, LORETTA VIOLA (FARNSWORTH) (1857—1933). Pioneer Seventh-day Adventist woman Bible instructor. She was born in Washington, New Hampshire, the twelfth of 22 children born to William Farnsworth. When only 10 years of age, she attended a series of meetings conducted by James and Ellen White and J. N. Andrews in the Washington, New Hampshire, church. She and two of her brothers were among the 13 who arose at this meeting and expressed their desire to be Christians and were baptized in a pond from which a thick piece of ice had been removed. (See LS 179, 181.)

In 1876 Loretta was married to Asa T. Robinson. Several years later, while her husband, who was working in a printing firm in Westerly, Rhode Island, was laid up by a fall and deprived of income for many weeks, she was compelled to take in sewing to support the family. It was then that the Robinsons were visited by G. I. Butler and S. N. Haskell, who urged them to sell Uriah Smith's Thoughts on Daniel and the Revelation.

Not long after this Mrs. Robinson went with her husband to Worcester, Massachusetts, where they pioneered in what was known as city mission work. While they were in Worcester in 1884, Mrs. Robinson became, reputedly, the first woman Bible instructor in the denomination.

Through the years that followed, while serving in South Africa, Australia, or in the homeland, Mrs. Robinson's ardent faith aided and encouraged her husband in all his ministry. Although not an ordained minister, she frequently occupied the pulpit; the announcement that she was to conduct a service was certain to bring a good attendance. Her last nine years of ministry were spent as Bible instructor at the New England Sanitarium, where her husband was chaplain. She was a deep Bible student and an efficient teacher of the Word to others.

Robinson, Raleigh P.

ROBINSON, RALEIGH P. (1884—1960). Missionary. Born in Escondido, California, of Seventh-day Adventist parents, he attended the first permanent West Coast church school, which operated in San Pasqual. From 1902 to 1905 he was a student at the San Fernando Academy. During 1907 and 1908 he spent some time canvassing, and was also connected with the Bible training school in Los Angeles.

In 1909 he married Lena Clark, and three years later the couple was called to Africa. Their first station was Solusi Mission in Rhodesia (now Zimbabwe), where Robinson worked for seven years, assisting in the school and taking most of the responsibility for the farm.

In 1921 the Robinsons were invited to work in the Belgian Congo (now Zaïre). Far beyond the railhead, they settled on the Songa station in the southeast part of the Congo. Later they pioneered the work at the Bikobo Hill Mission. Because this station was in a wild region, the family underwent many hardships, such as the children's suffering severely from malaria.

Through the years Robinson was stationed on a number of missions, most of them far from civilization. In fact, he always preferred frontier life, and frequently asked for and received permission to work in difficult areas. He spent many years at Chimpempe and Rusangu missions in Northern Rhodesia (now Zambia).

Because his children had taken up mission service in Africa, Robinson, instead of retiring in America, built a cottage at Chisekesi, about six miles (10 kilometers) from Rusangu Mission. Despite retirement he continued to take an active interest in missionary work. In all, he gave nearly 50 years to the cause of African missions.

Robison, James I.

ROBISON, JAMES I. (1888—1961). Missionary, educator. In 1910 he married Ina Mae Marcus. After several years of teaching church schools in the United States, he taught at Claremont Union College near Cape Town, South Africa, and at Spion Kop College, Natal, when the college was moved there. During furlough time he graduated in 1922 from Pacific Union College, then became principal of La Sierra Academy (1922—1925). In 1926 he returned to the African Division, holding administrative and editorial posts.

In 1936 he became secretary and educational secretary of the Northern European Division. On returning to the United States in 1940, he taught at Walla Walla College and later was acting dean of the School of Theology there. Then for 11 years he was an associate secretary of the General Conference and in 1956 became secretary to the president of the General Conference.

Robson, Henry

ROBSON, HENRY (1894—1976). Missionary. Born in Gillingham, Kent, England, of Baptist parents, he was educated at the local Mathematical School. In 1910 he was appointed to the civilian clerical staff of Chatham Naval Dockyard, but changed his career after attending meetings held by Pastor Nichols. S. G. Haughey, then president of the South England Conference, took a personal interest in the 17-year-old and agreed with his father that he should study the Sabbath question for one year before being baptized. In 1913 Henry joined the staff of the first Seventh-day Adventist sanitarium in England, at Caterham, Surrey, and was soon appointed accountant.

In 1923 he was appointed secretary-treasurer of the South England Conference and was called to overseas mission service in Africa in 1924. He and his wife, Ada, an experienced Bible worker, had married in 1922, and the couple spent several months in London in intensive tropical medicine courses before embarking for Tanganyika (now Tanzania). The work in that country had been left in the charge of comparatively new converts when the outbreak of World War I brought about the internment of the German missionaries. At Ntusu, an isolated mission station, the Robsons revived the work and opened a primary school and clinic. Although he had been called to treasury work, Robson demonstrated a calling to ministerial service and was ordained in 1935.

With the outbreak of World War II, the British government again interned all German missionaries, but allowed two families, the Fenner and the Werners, to continue working if supervised by British personnel. Accordingly, in 1939 the Robsons went to Suji Mission in the Pare Mountains to work with the Wilfrid Fenner family. In 1941, when Tanganyika was administered from South Africa, Robson was appointed secretary-treasurer of the Tanganyika Field, and the couple spent the following 14 years at its Busegwe base on the shores of Lake Victoria. In 1955 Henry and Ada Robson transferred to Kireka in Uganda, where he served as secretary-treasurer for one year before returning to retirement in England.

Rocky Mountain Conference

ROCKY MOUNTAIN CONFERENCE. A unit of church organization that includes the states of Colorado and Wyoming and San Juan County, New Mexico. The headquarters office is located at 2520 South Downing Street, Denver, Colorado. The conference is a part of the Mid-America Union. Statistics (1993): churches, 99; companies, 4; members, 13,985.

Institutions

Institutions. Champion Academy, Mile High Academy, Avista Hospital, Littleton/Porter Hospital, Porter Memorial Hospital.

Local Churches—Colorado: Akron, Alamosa, Arvada, Aurora, Bolder, Brighton (Brighton, Spanish), Burlington, Byers, Champion, Canon City, Cedaredge, Colorado Springs (Central, South), Conifer (Aspen Park), Cortez, Craig, Delta, Denver (First, Korean, Second Spanish, South, Spanish, West), Dove Creek, Durango, Estes Park, Fairplay, Falcon, Fort Collins (Fort Collins, Spanish), Fort Lupton, Fort Morgan, Franktown, Fruita, Glenwood Springs, Golden, Grand Junction, Greeley (Greely, Spanish), Gunnison, Holyoke, Idaho Springs, Julesburg, La Veta, Lamar, Las Animas, Leadville, Limon, Littleton, Longmont, Louisville, Loveland (Eden Valley, Loveland), Monte Vista, Montrose, North Glenn (Chapel Haven), Nucla, Pagosa Springs, Palisade, Paonia, Pueblo, Rifle, Rocky Ford (Arkansas Valley), Rye, Salida, Springfield, Steamboat Springs, Sterling, Trinidad, Woodland Park, Wray, Yuma. Wyoming: Afton, Buffalo, Casper, Cheyenne, Douglas, Evanston, Gillette, Granby (Middle Park), Greybull, Lander, Laramie, Newcastle, Powell, Rawlins, Riverton, Rock Springs, Sheridan, Sundance, Ten Sleep, Thermopolis, Torrington, Upton, Worland. New Mexico: Aztec, Bloomfield, Farmington (Farmington, La Vida Mission), Waterflow.

Companies: Colorado: Brighton Spanish, Buena Vista, Fort Collins Spanish, Meeker. Wyoming: Afton.

The Rocky Mountain Conference came into existence Feb. 8, 1981, when the constituencies of the Colorado and Wyoming conferences voted to merge. The intent of this action was to strengthen the work of the church in this area where population is small and territory is great.

Presidents: William C. Hatch, 1981—1985; Don C. Schneider, 1985—1989; Gordon L. Retzer, 1989—1993; Charles Sandefur, 1993— .

Roda, Alvaro Z.

RODA, ALVARO Z. (1898—1966). The second of the three Roda brothers ordained to the Seventh-day Adventist ministry. He was one of the first Seventh-day Adventist believers in the Philippines and was among the pioneer workers in the Northern Luzon Mission when American missionaries L. W. Finster, Roy E. Hay, and W. B. Amundsen organized the work in the islands.

He became Sabbath school and lay activities secretary of the mission under Elder and Mrs. Frank Chaney. He raised several churches in Northern Luzon Mission while an evangelist.

A strong believer in Christian education, he and his wife, Maxima de la Cruz, saw their 10 children finish their education in SDA schools, from gradeschool to college. He died at the post of duty as a translator in the Philippine Publishing House.

Roda, Leon Zumel

RODA, LEON ZUMEL (1892—1925). Pioneer Filipino evangelist. He was brought up in a devout Catholic family, several of whose members were prominent in the community. When not yet 20 years of age he accepted Seventh-day Adventist beliefs and was one of the first eight Filipinos baptized by L. V. Finster on Mar. 3, 1911, in the city of Manila. It appears that he began evangelistic work immediately in central Luzon while still continuing his education. In 1913 he pioneered SDA work in the Ilocano language area of northern Luzon. In 1914 he graduated from the Manila high school. He married Maria Panis in 1915 and was ordained to the ministry in 1916.

He led in the formation of churches first in the Tagalog area in central Luzon, and from 1916 in the Ilocano language area. He was also a gifted writer and translator, and until his death he supplied the Philippine Publishing House with manuscripts of books and articles. He was also a diligent Bible student, and his fellow ministers at times referred to him as a walking concordance. About the time he reached 30 years of age he became ill with tuberculosis. Unwilling to give up his work, he conducted public evangelistic meetings in the town of Cuyapo, hitherto not entered by SDAs. At the close of these meetings 62 persons were baptized, a church was organized, and a chapel was erected. Later four mission presidents came from the members of this church.

This was his last work, and since his voice had failed him completely, he went into retirement and died a year and a half later. By the time of his death, two of his younger brothers, Alvaro Z. and Antonino, whom he had won to the SDA beliefs, had assumed his burden of preaching the Adventist message.

Roeland, Albert

ROELAND, ALBERT (1900—1973). Administrator. He began denominational work at the age of 18 and served the church for nearly 50 years. He was president of the Belgian Conference during World War II. After his retirement in 1956, he assisted in the Voice of Prophecy work in that country and worked in the Flemish church in Brussels.

Rogers, Harvey Edson

ROGERS, HARVEY EDSON (1867—1943). Statistician. Educated at Battle Creek College, he joined the General Conference secretarial staff in 1888, and in 1903, after the moving of General Conference headquarters from Battle Creek, Michigan, to Washington, D.C., he became General Conference statistician and held that office until his retirement in 1941. He was the author of Rogers' Compendium of the Graham System of Shorthand and The Typewriting and Office Manual.

Rogers, Joel C.

ROGERS, JOEL C. (1864—1960). Missionary to Africa. After graduation from Battle Creek College (1890), he taught at Union College. In 1893 he and his wife went to Kimberley, South Africa, where he served as pastor of the first Seventh-day Adventist church, and his wife opened and taught the first SDA church school in South Africa. In 1894 they accepted a call to join the staff of the Claremont Union College (now Helderberg) in South Africa, then in its second year.

In 1896 Rogers went into the field to push the circulation of the missionary paper The South African Sentinel, and two years later he and his wife went to Basutoland to pioneer the work at Kolo Mission. When the Anglo-Boer War began, they went on overseas furlough. During the next five years Rogers did advanced study and impatiently awaited his return to Africa.

Back in Africa in 1907, Rogers and his wife were sent to Nyasaland to take charge of the Plainfield Mission, which he renamed Malamulo, a word meaning “Commandments.” In the next five years the first publications were prepared and printed in the Cinyanja language; 50 village outschools were established, and teachers were trained to operate them; a new station was established 100 miles (160 kilometers) west of Malamulo. The new mission, now known as Matandani, was established by Mrs. Rogers, who, with some African assistants, traveled to the new site by donkey and remained there alone for six months until her husband could leave the main station and join her.

After a Cape furlough in 1912 they returned to northern Nyasaland and attempted to open a new mission. Here they endured great hardships. The outbreak of World War I made supplies almost impossible to obtain, and broken in health, they were forced to leave in 1917.

Back in the Union of South Africa, Rogers spent some time in colporteur work. In 1919 he pioneered a new station in Swaziland. Then he gave many years to pastoral work in Durban and was especially successful in his work among the Indian population. Mrs. Rogers died in 1948, and four years later he returned to the United States, having spent more than 50 years in mission service in Africa.

Rollett, Maria

ROLLETT, MARIA (1903—1977). Financial administrator, editor, literature evangelist. Born in Vienna, Austria, she became a Seventh-day Adventist at the age of 18, a time when the church in that city was very small. For two years she worked as a literature evangelist and then as an office secretary. During World War II she served as secretary-treasurer of the Austrian Conference and also led the conference office in the absence of the president. From 1948 to 1965 she worked as editor of the Austrian publishing house, writing many articles and also serving as a sound counselor in Adventist theology on many occasions. During her retirement years in the retirement home in Austria, she still preached at times in small churches, where she was a great blessing.

Rolling Clinics

ROLLING CLINICS. The name given to mobile medical units that travel the highways of several South American countries. The work they do is comparable to that carried on by the medical launches that ply the Amazon and its tributaries. See also Clinics and Dispensaries.

Romania

ROMANIA. A republic in southeastern Europe bounded on the north by Ukraine, on the east by Moldova and the Black Sea, on the south by Bulgaria, and on the west by Yugoslavia and Hungary. It has an area of 91,700 square miles (237,500 square kilometers) and a population (1994) of 23.2 million. About 85 percent of the people are Romanian; as for the remainder, about 9 percent are Hungarians, about 2 percent are Germans (both groups being concentrated in Transylvania), and about 1 percent are Jews. In addition, there are small groups of Ruthenians (Ukrainians), Yugoslavs, Russians, Tatars, Turks, and Bulgarians. The language of the country is Romanian, which is based on the Latin, with a small Slavonic influence. The religion of the people is predominantly Romanian Orthodox. Of the other religious groups, those concentrated in Transylvania include Roman Catholics, Greek Catholics (recently absorbed into the Orthodox Church), Calvinists, Lutherans, and Unitarians. Other groups include Muslims in the southeastern regions, Baptists, Seventh-day Adventists, Evangelicals, Pentecostals, and Jews.

The Romanians are descendants from Dacians, old tribes that lived in the area from time immemorial, and from Roman settlers who came to the Danube valley in the second century A.D. They have been strongly influenced by Western European culture, although they adopted Slavonic rites for their Christian liturgy, and in the schism of the church in 1054 sided with the Eastern Church. Because of successive waves of Slavonic, Magyar, and Turkish migrations and invasions, they were unable to establish an independent state of their own until the last quarter of the nineteenth century. Then their two principalities, Moldavia and Walachia, formed in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, were united and freed of foreign domination. (After World War I, Transylvania, an old Romanian province included for years in the Austro-Hungarian Empire, was transferred back to Romania, bringing into the country groups of people of non-Romanian descent and of different religious beliefs.)

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. The territory of Romania constitutes the Romanian Union Conference in the Euro-Africa Division. Statistics (1992): churches, 959; members, 63,300; ordained ministers, 100; licensed ministers, 130. Headquarters: Strada Plantelor 12, 70308 Bucharest.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. Seventh-day Adventist doctrines were first preached in Romania by M. B. Czechowski, a former Polish Catholic priest who had learned of the seventh-day Sabbath and of the imminent return of Christ while he was in America. Returning to Europe in 1864, he preached these doctrines in Italy and Switzerland even though he had not been sent by the SDA Church. In the winter of 1868—1869 he came to Romania and preached in Pitesti. About 12 people accepted his message, among them Thomas G. Aslan and his family. J. N. Andrews, the first missionary sent overseas by Seventh-day Adventists, had established a French language paper in Switzerland, which Aslan read. Making translations of some of the articles, he prepared SDA tracts in Romanian at his own expense. In 1883 he attended the general meeting in Switzerland and stayed for a time to help in launching a journal in Romanian, Adevarulu Present (“Present Truth”). In 1884 G. I. Butler, then president of the General Conference, visited Romania, and after the second European council held at Basel that year, A. C. Bourdeau worked briefly in Romania and organized a church in Pitesti. However, because of persecution, its members soon scattered.

In 1890 SDA work entered Transylvania (at that time a part of Hungary, but after World War I transferred to Romania) when L. R. Conradi came in search of Sabbatarians in that province. According to historical records, these Sabbathkeepers had numbered some 50,000 in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Apparently the remnant of these people, which still existed as late as 1868 in a locality named Bösödöufalu, had been forced to unite with the recognized Jewish community in order to keep the seventh-day Sabbath without molestation from the dominant Protestant churches. Conradi learned that there were five families of indigenous Christian Sabbathkeepers in the area who nominally belonged to Reformed or Catholic churches.

During Conradi’s visit in Romania he met a German Baptist named Rottmaier, who was an agent for the British and Foreign Bible Society at Cluj (Klausenburg), and converted his wife and daughter to the SDA faith. In 1894, 10 Seventh-day Adventists were reported at Cluj. Rottmaier was baptized sometime later. It appears from the records in the Review and Herald (69:773, Dec. 13, 1892; 71:266, Apr. 24, 1894) that sometime late in 1890 or in 1891 the daughter went to Hamburg, Germany, and served as Hungarian secretary at the Hamburg Publishing House, translating Bible readings and tracts into Hungarian and mailing them throughout the country. One of Rottmaier’s colporteurs, Tentosch by name, also joined the Seventh-day Adventist Church and began selling SDA publications printed by the Hamburg house. He found and interested a German-speaking Evangelical Lutheran family in Markschelken in Transylvania. In 1900 J. F. Huenergardt baptized the mother, three married daughters, and three granddaughters.

Another impetus was given to the development of the work in Romania when about 1890 a number of Germans moved there from Russia and settled south of the Danube. Among them were several SDAs. In 1892 these colonists were visited by L. R. Conradi, who organized a church of 17 members. The same year they were also visited by G. Wagner from Russia and later by T. Babienco, who spent some years in Romania. Eventually the SDAs—among them a Seefried family—founded a settlement in Viile Noi, a village near Constanza on the Black Sea. This was the first Seventh-day Adventist church in Romania.

Permanent work for Romanians began in 1904 when J. F. Ginter, an evangelist from Russia, settled in Bucharest, where there were some adherents. While still studying the Romanian language, he opened meetings, and a number of people accepted the faith. Among them was one Jelescu, a musician in the king’s band; Peter P. Paulini, a medical student; and Stefan Demetrescu, an officer in the army. Paulini and Demetrescu went to the Seventh-day Adventist training school in Friedensau, Germany, for study and returned to Bucharest at the end of their course. Meanwhile, J. F. Ginter, meeting strong opposition from the established church, had been expelled from the country. His opponents, who rejoiced at his departure, soon found that his place was taken by nationals who could not be expelled. Fierce persecution from religious leaders and the government ensued. Paulini, who became president of the Romanian Conference (organized 1913), and his few workers were often brought before the authorities, but they kept to the task and won new converts.

When World War I broke out, Paulini and his helpers were conscripted and remained in the army until the end of the war. Seventh-day Adventists called into government service were often punished for their Sabbathkeeping and made to suffer all manner of humiliations. Paulini, however, as he was moved from place to place, found time after time that his superior officer was a former friend or college classmate, and consequently he received every consideration possible under military law and was free to preach. After the war, comparative freedom came, with liberty to hold public meetings.

Union Conference Organized. The Romanian Conference, which had been in the Danube Union Conference, was organized as a union conference in 1919, with headquarters in Bucharest, and with Paulini serving as president. According to the 1920 Yearbook, it was composed of three local conferences: the Muntenia Conference, also with Paulini as president; the Moldavian Conference, with S. Demetrescu as president; the Transylvania Conference (in existence since 1907), with Hermann Meyer-Börtschi as president; and one mission, the Banat Mission, also under the direction of Paulini.

In 1920 a conference was held in Bucharest and attended by A. G. Daniells, president of the General Conference, and L. H. Christian and others from the European Division. At that time there were 2,000 baptized members in the country. Plans were laid for a printing house, a missionary school, and a sanitarium, and for additional personnel from Europe and America to lead in all the branches of the work and to direct the more than 50 churches.

Among those invited by the General Conference to work in Romania in 1920 were P. H. Hermann, who came with his wife and three children from Chicago, Illinois, to join the union conference staff; Oscar Fasnacht, who came with his family from Switzerland as treasurer of the union; Axel Holmes and his wife from the United States; and two nurses, Karen Nielsen and Carentze Olson, from Denmark, who came to establish a medical institution in Bucharest, sponsored by the Skodsborg Sanitarium in Denmark.

Publishing Work. The earliest Seventh-day Adventist publications for Romania were printed in Switzerland or Germany. Early in 1921 Frederic Brennwald and his wife arrived from Switzerland to establish a publishing house. About the same time Cuvintul Evangheliei was created as the legal society for the purchasing and ownership of property. The first property bought housed the union offices and the publishing house. In 1922 a church was built on the same grounds. As early as 1920, periodicals were issued from Bucharest.

For a time books and tracts printed by outside firms or ordered from Hamburg, Germany, were stored in a small attic room lent by a layman named Darie, an early convert in Bucharest. From this small room these were mailed to the churches. When the publishing house moved into the new union property, the house in Hamburg made a gift of presses and other machinery. F. Brennwald installed the machines and managed the house. T. Dresen, from the Hamburg Publishing House, was manager from 1923 to 1932; he was succeeded by Vasile Florescu, a Romanian.

After the organization of the union conference and the establishment of the publishing house, it became possible for the union departmental secretary, P. H. Hermann, to give strong promotion to the colporteur work. He held training institutes in Bucharest, in Jasi, and in Cluj. As a result, 65 men and women entered the colporteur work. When persecution broke out in 1942, the printing plant was closed and the sale of books was prohibited. No permission could be obtained to print denominational literature. After a brief revival beginning in 1944, the publishing house came under government control in 1947, and the printing of religious books was not permitted. The stockrooms were sealed, and the colporteurs could sell only books found among the church members. Finally this work had to close. During the years of Communism the plant existed as a state-controlled institution under the name Graiul Literar (Institute of Art and Graphic Printing). In 1990 a new printing plant was begun, and today the publishing house prints Curierul Adventist ("Advent Herald"), Signs of the Times, and a number of Sabbath school quarterlies in Romanian and Hungarian.

Clinic Attempted. The proposed clinic that was to have been opened after the nurses had become acquainted with the people and had given treatments in private homes never materialized. By 1922 a building had been purchased in Bucharest, but the government required that the institution be supervised by a Romanian doctor. No satisfactory arrangement was reached. The building was sold, the Holmes family returned to the United States, and the two nurses returned to Denmark.

Organizational Changes. In 1927 D. N. Wall, from the United States, became the union president and P. Paunescu the associate union president. In 1928 the union territory was divided into six organized local conferences: East Muntenia, with headquarters in Ploesti; West Muntenia, with headquarters in Bucharest; South Moldavia, with headquarters in Focsani; North Moldavia, with headquarters in Jasi; Banat-Crisana, with headquarters in Timisoara; and Transylvania, with headquarters in Cluj. In 1932 offices were filled by nationals: D. Florea, school principal; A. Vacareanu, union treasurer; and V. Florescu, publishing house manager.

In 1936 Dumitru Florea was elected president; Gheorghe Stanica, secretary-treasurer; Arthur Vacareanu, publishing house manager; and Vasile Florescu, editor. In 1967 the general assembly of the Seventh-day Adventist Romanian Church elected Ioan Tachici president and Dumitru Popa secretary and editor in chief. Nelu Dumitrescu was named treasurer. D. Popa became president in 1974 and Marvin Pirvan, secretary. In 1994 the president was Nelu Dumitrescu; the secretary was Adrian Bocaneanu.

When Transylvania was divided in 1940, the northern part going to Hungary, the Transylvania Conference became the Southern Transylvania Conference, with headquarters in Sibiu (Hermannstadt). In 1944 the boundaries were again changed. Bessarabia and Galicia became attached to the USSR, and Northern Transylvania was returned to Romania. The local conferences were reorganized: Dunarea, with headquarters in Braila; Muntenia, with headquarters in Bucharest; Moldavia, with headquarters in Bacau; Oltenia-Banat, with headquarters in Craiova; Northern Transylvania, with headquarters in Cluj; and Southern Transylvania, with headquarters in Sibiu.

In 1961 the conferences were: Bacau, Bucharest, Cluj, and Sibiu. In 1990 the Cluj and Sibiu conferences were reorganized and became the Brasov, Cluj, and Timisoara conferences. In 1992 a complete reorganization of the conferences occurred, resulting in the present configuration (see below).

Effects of Governmental Changes. At the end of 1941 the government passed a decree disincorporating the Seventh-day Adventist denomination and confiscating all church property. All church buildings were closed and sealed. But despite severe persecution the members continued to meet in secret. When the government fell in August 1944, SDAs again gained possession of denominational properties, and Sabbath services and other public meetings were held in all churches. Of the 24,000 members in the country, all had maintained their faith during this period.

In 1920 there were 99 organized churches and companies in the union, with 2,540 members. At the close of the persecution in 1944 there were 24,000 members and 550 churches and groups, but because Bessarabia and Galicia became a part of the USSR in 1944, the membership in Romania was reduced to 20,000 in 470 churches. Then between 1944 and 1947, the membership increased to 21,500 in 551 churches.

At present (1994), the Seventh-day Adventist Romanian Union Conference has six conferences: Banat Conference, Moldavia Conference, Muntenia Conference, North Transylvania Conference, Oltenia Conference, and South Transylvania Conference. Statistics for the conferences—Banat Conference: churches, 91; members, 6,203; ordained ministers, 8. Headquarters: Timisoara. Moldavia Conference: churches, 142; members, 12,545; ordained ministers, 20. Headquarters: Bacau. Muntenia Conference: churches, 212; members, 19,254; ordained ministers, 32. Headquarters: Bucharest. North Transylvania Conference: churches, 112; members, 7,150; ordained ministers, 12. Headquarters: Cluj. Oltenia Conference: churches, 151; members, 12,351; ordained ministers, 13. Headquarters: Craiova. South Transylvania Conference: churches, 127; members, 8,027; ordained ministers, 15. Headquarters: Tirgu Mures.

In 1993 an evangelistic campaign was held in Bucharest, resulting in 300 baptisms and two new congregations. Revelation seminars and other evangelistic meetings are also proving fruitful.

Romanian Adventist Publishing House

ROMANIAN ADVENTIST PUBLISHING HOUSE (Editura Curierul Adventist). A publishing plant with printing facilities located in Bucharest, the capital of Romania, operated by the Romanian Union Conference. The plant was established in 1920. The typographical equipment was secured from Germany and was installed in an annex of the “Labirint” church, formerly the largest Adventist church in the country.

Seventh-day Adventist publishing activity was carried on in Romania since the first issue of Present Truth in 1884. Since 1908 Signs of the Times and other booklets were printed in the Romanian language through the Hamburg Press. The first Review and Herald appeared in 1914.

In 1920 the Adventist Publishing House was officially established, and since that time it has provided the growing church with thousands of pieces of literature and many books.

Because of the repressive political conditions during World War II, the house had to change its name and its apparent identity, becoming “Graiul Literar Society” (Literary Word Publishing House). After the war the Romanian church faced an enormous need for literature because of the explosive evangelistic activity that resulted in unprecedented church growth.

In late 1947 the publishing house was seized and nationalized by the Communist regime. In spite of this, some publishing activity continued. The Review and Herald, Sabbath school quarterlies, and the Morning Watch never ceased publication, being at times secretly copied by hand.

In the first months of 1990, literature sales surpassed a half million books. These were edited at the Adventist plant and printed in state printing establishments.

In September 1990 a new printing plant was established, with a secondhand press and other typographical equipment provided as a donation from Austria, Germany, and the United States. In 1993 the union committee decided to reorganize the plant. At present there are 40 employees producing literature for more than 60,000 members.

Managers have included Thomas Dressen, Dumitru Florea, Arthur Vacareanu, Vasile Florescu, Dumitru Popa, Dumitru Dan, and Valerin Peterson.

Romanian Adventist Theological Institute

ROMANIAN ADVENTIST THEOLOGICAL INSTITUTE (Institutul Teologic Adventist). A postsecondary training school located in Bucharest, Romania. In 1923 P. J. Gaede and his wife arrived from the United States to lead out in the educational work and to establish a training school. They settled in Focsani, headquarters of the Moldavian Conference, and in 1923 opened the Romanian Union Training School (Institutul Biblic), with a small number of students. In 1926, because of a larger enrollment and staff, the school moved to larger quarters, an estate in Dicio-San-Martin, in north Transylvania. The progress of the gospel was so great that more dedicated workers were demanded and hundreds of young people were enrolled. The school property became too small as a result, and it therefore moved to Brasov (Kronstadt) in 1931, where the union had purchased a larger property just outside the city and had erected a building with sufficient classrooms, dormitories, and apartments for the teachers.

In 1933 D. Florea became principal. In 1941 part of the school building was confiscated by the Germans and made a center for the German Army. When at the beginning of 1942 nationwide persecutions began, the whole school was confiscated. Under the name Marshal Antonescu, in honor of the prime minister, it became a school for the Orthodox Church.

After Aug. 23, 1944, when religious liberty was restored, the school continued to function in Brasnov. From 1950 up to the present, the school operated as the Romanian Theological Seminary, preparing young men for God's work. Only those possessing the university entrance certificate are enrolled for the four-year theological course.

Rore, Sasa

RORE, SASA (c. 1900—1989). Educator, administrator, evangelist. A native of the Solomon Islands, he was born around the turn of the century. Because of conditions in the Solomon Islands at that time, there is no exact record of the date of his birth. He was educated at Seventh-day Adventist mission schools in the islands and entered denominational work as a teacher in 1923. He served as teacher and evangelist for three years and then became a district director in the Solomons until 1949, at which time he became a missionary to Papua New Guinea, serving as field secretary of what was then the Coral Sea Union Mission. In 1952 Pastor Rore returned to the Solomons as president of the Malaita/Eastern Solomons Mission. In 1957 he went once again to New Guinea, this time as assistant president of the Madang Mission, which position he held until his retirement in 1963. During World War II Pastor Rore was director of the Adventist mission on Guadalcanal and became acquainted with many Adventist servicemen from the United States and Australia.

Rosie Le Môme Home

ROSIE LE MÔME HOME. A home for seniors located on the island of Mauritius. It was founded in 1963 and named in honor of Rosina le Môme, the first Seventh-day Adventist on the island. She was instrumental in establishing the church there between 1912 and 1920. The home provides for the well-being of about 50 guests.

Røst, O. J. Olson

RØST, O. J. OLSON (1862—1938). Minister, administrator. He was born in Bö in Vesterålen, Norway. When about 20 years of age he came to San Francisco, California, where he met Seventh-day Adventists and accepted their faith. Soon after his conversion he went to work in the St. Helena Sanitarium. While there the conviction grew on him that he should return to the homeland to share his newfound faith with his own people.

In 1886 he left the sanitarium and returned to his birthplace in Vesteralen and began giving Bible studies. Soon nine people, including three of his sisters and his brother, were converted. This was the beginning of his work in Norway, a work that he carried on for 40 years in many of the cities and towns of Norway. From 1912 to 1920 he was president of the West Norway Conference. Because of age and failing health the last 10 or 11 years of his life were spent in retirement but not in inactivity.

Roth, Arthur

ROTH, ARTHUR (1911—1982). Evangelist, administrator. Born in Missouri, he attended school for a while in Canada, then went to Walla Walla College, where he received his degree in theology. He later earned a master's degree. His first full-time employment was as teacher of the elementary school in Lewiston, Idaho, followed by a year of evangelism in the South Dakota Conference. He married Alice Rosalind Olsen in 1936 and in 1937 was ordained to the gospel ministry. The Roths went to Inter-America, where he served as evangelist in the Panama Conference and as president of the Costa Rica and Nicaragua missions. In 1941 he was invited to serve as director of the Youth and Educational departments of the Inter-American Division, a position he held for eight years.

He served as assistant to two presidents of the General Conference, R. R. Figuhr and Robert H. Pierson, and for 10 years he coordinated the secretariat of the General Conference.

Roth, Louise-Hermine

ROTH, LOUISE-HERMINE (1886—1992). Educator, administrator, editor. At the time of her birth, her father, Georges-Gustave Roth, was completing, at his own expense, the first Seventh-day Adventist chapel in Europe, located near the Roth home in Tramelan, Switzerland. Ellen White inaugurated it on Christmas Day in 1886.

Baptized in 1900, Hermine taught French at Stanbury Park Missionary College, then taught French and English and served as dean of women at the Bible School in Gland, Switzerland. She also taught and served as secretary and editor at Atlantic Union College and taught for a year in Oshawa, Canada.

In 1935 she joined her family in Haiti, becoming the first principal of Seminario Adventiste d'Haiti, where she also taught a full load and translated.

When health problems developed, she lived with her sister Ruth and family in various areas. During these years she directed the Vie et Santé Institute in Algiers, served as secretary in the office of the East France Conference, and was in charge of the correspondence courses at Nanga-Eboko, Cameroon. A statement she often repeated after her 100th birthday was, "The best is ahead of us."

Roundelwood

ROUNDELWOOD (Good Health Association [Scotland] Limited) (originally the Crieff Nursing Home and Health Institute). A medical institution operated by the late Drs. E. H. and G. M. Brown, who sold the premises consisting of three large houses in Crieff, Perthshire, Scotland, to the British Union in 1966. G. M. Brown, who had worked with J. H. Kellogg at Battle Creek, continued as medical supervisor at Crieff until her death in 1974.

In 1972 a large mansion adjacent to the nursing home was purchased and an extension was built to provide 27 extra bedrooms, giving 44 bedrooms in total.

A combination of inflationary increase of expenses, the difficulty of recruiting an appropriate nursing staff, the urgent need for reassessment of structural alterations, and the prohibitive cost of necessary major rebuilding forced the British Union Conference and Northern Europe-West Africa Division in consultation with the General Conference, to advise closure of the Stanborough Nursing and Maternity Home at Watford, Hertfordshire, England. This decision was taken by the British Union Conference by a majority vote on June 19, 1968, and was implemented on Aug. 31, 1968. The medical and nursing services were then transferred to Crieff.

Roundelwood is now registered with Tayside Health Board and provides nursing care to more than 50 patients. It also operates a health improvement program to which clients enroll from all over the British Isles. Facilities include physiotherapy, hydrotherapy, occupational therapy, gymnasium, and toning salon.

Ruble, Wells Allen

RUBLE, WELLS ALLEN (1868—1961). Physician, missionary. He was converted in 1893 and attended Battle Creek College. He married Edith Davies in 1897, and they immediately left to teach at Claremont Union College, South Africa, of which he later became principal. Again in America, he graduated in 1906 from the American Medical Missionary College and was prominent in the founding of the College of Medical Evangelists. In 1910 he became its president and also chairman of the Medical Missionary Council, which in 1913 became the Medical Department of the General Conference.

After World War I he went to Europe for nine years to foster the denominational work. For a time he was superintendent of the Stanborough Park Sanitarium (later the Stanborough Nursing and Maternity Home). Returning to America, he served as medical superintendent of the New England Sanitarium and Hospital until his retirement at the age of 75.

Ruby Nelson Memorial Hospital

RUBY NELSON MEMORIAL HOSPITAL. A 52-bed hospital operated by COS-DAH of the Southern Asia Division at the town of Jallandar in the state of Punjab, about 250 miles (400 kilometers) from Delhi, India. The hospital was started in 1965 on a nine-acre (four-hectare) plot of land in a bungalow that was already constructed. The first medical director was K. P. George, a graduate from Christian Medical College, Vellore. In the beginning the bed strength was 27.

In January 1966 the hospital was officially given its present name in memory of the late Mrs. Ruby Nelson, wife of Dr. Phillip S. Nelson, who was brutally murdered on a car trip on the way from Delhi to Ranchi.

The hospital is well known for its work in ophthalmology. Free eye camps are held each year in villages around Jalandhar.

Medical Directors/Administrators: K. P. George, 1965—1967; G. T. Werner, 1968—1974; S. Moser, 1974—1976; E. Moser, 1977—1980; T. Jonahs, 1980—1985; J. M. Bagga, 1985—1986; C. David, 1986—1988; G. R. Rudge, Edmund Bean

RUDGE, EDMUND BEAN (1886—1960). Administrator, missionary. He was born in Tasmania, attended the Avondale School for Christian Workers from 1898 to 1901, and in 1904 began training as a nurse at the Sydney Sanitarium. Rudge engaged in evangelistic work in New South Wales, South Australia, and Queensland, and became president of the South Australian Conference (1920) and later the Queensland and West Australian conferences.

For 11 years he headed the Fiji Mission and in 1936 was appointed vice president of the Australasian Union, later becoming its president (1938—1946). He was president of the British Union (1946—1951) and secretary of the Northern European Division (1951—1956). Retiring from administrative work, he returned to Australia, where he served as chaplain of the Warburton Sanitarium until 1959.

Ruhling, Richard

RUHLING, RICHARD (1889—1963). Conference administrator. He was born in Germany and accepted the Seventh-day Adventist faith through the teaching of G. Perk, being baptized in 1909. He graduated from the Friedensau Missionary Seminary in 1912 and began his denominational service in Berlin that same year. For several years he was secretary of the East German Union. He was ordained in 1916, and in 1920 was appointed secretary-treasurer of the German Missionary Society. He went to Czechoslovakia in 1922 and subsequently became union president. He returned to Berlin in 1930 as departmental secretary of the Central European Division and in 1932 became its secretary. From 1934 until his retirement in 1950 he was field secretary of the General Conference. For a time he was editor of the German missionary paper Herald of Truth. He translated a number of English hymns into German and wrote many books, including For Faith's Sake (on the early Reformers in Moravia) and At the Crossroads.

Rural Living

RURAL LIVING. Living in the country away from large centers of population is generally recognized as being advantageous for promoting physical, mental, and spiritual health and development. Because of this advantage, Seventh-day Adventists have endeavored, whenever possible, to establish their institutions outside metropolitan areas and have encouraged church members with families to find homes in the country. The advantages of country living, together with the disadvantages of city living, are stressed repeatedly in the writings of Ellen White. The following quotation is typical of her views: “The world over, cities are becoming hotbeds of vice. On every hand are the sights and sounds of evil. Everywhere are enticements to sensuality and dissipation. The tide of corruption and crime is continually swelling. Every day brings the record of violence—robberies, murders, suicides, and crimes unnameable. . . .

“It was not God’s purpose that people should be crowded into cities, huddled together in terraces and tenements. In the beginning He placed our first parents amidst the beautiful sights and sounds He desires us to rejoice in today. The more nearly we come into harmony with God’s original plan, the more favorable will be our position to secure health of body, and mind, and soul” (MH 363—365).

As early as 1890 SDA leaders were pointing out the advantages of country living. In an article entitled “Rural Versus City Life,” appearing in the Jan. 7 and 14, 1890, issues of the Review and Herald (67:9, 10, 26, 27), G. I. Butler, former president of the General Conference, pointed out the advantages of living close to nature and urged SDAs to live in the country. A few years later W. W. Prescott, an SDA educator and administrator, in an article in the Review and Herald (82:3, 4, Mar. 16, 1905) entitled “Country and City,” warned SDAs to resist the trend of moving to the metropolitan areas and pointed out that because of the “corrupting influences of the cities” “we are removing our institutions from the cities to the country.”

Between the two world wars the idea of rural living was not particularly stressed, but during, and especially after, World War II a movement was set afoot to encourage SDAs to leave the cities and find country homes. In 1942 F. M. Wilcox, longtime editor of the Review and Herald, wrote an editorial titled “Leaving the Cities” in the Aug. 27 issue (119:2, 11), in which he urged SDAs to “leave the large cities and find homes in the country” but cautioned against rash, haphazard moves, particularly on the part of those who had no knowledge of farming.

It appears that after the cities of Hiroshima and Nagasaki were bombed the General Conference began to give serious consideration to setting up an organization for promoting rural living for SDAs. In December 1945 E. A. Sutherland, president of the Rural Education Association of Madison, Tennessee, was invited to become the secretary of a commission to be set up under the name of North American Commission for Self-Supporting Missionary Work, of which L. K. Dickson, president of the North American Division, was to be chairman. The commission was to begin functioning July 1, 1946. Among other objectives, this commission was to “stand as a body of counselors to such individuals” as would “decide to locate their families in more rural communities and enter into some form of self-supporting missionary endeavor” (General Conference Minutes, vol. 16, book 8, pp. 2214, 2215, Dec. 10, 1945; ibid., pp. 2327, 2328, Mar. 14, 1946).

Probably early in 1946 a Committee on Country Living was set up as indicated in section 4 of the General Conference action for Mar. 14, 1946. In August of the same year, the General Conference recommended the merger of the North American Commission for Self-Supporting Missionary Work and the Committee on Country Living that had previously been set up to promote rural living. The new organization was named the Seventh-day Adventist Commission on Rural Living and had Sutherland as secretary and C. B. Haynes as assistant secretary. Among other objectives, this commission was to “encourage our church members in cities to study the instruction . . . [from Ellen G. White] about country living and to develop plans whereby they can fulfill this instruction; to provide counsel and information to those who are considering moving to the country; to hold regional institutes for self-supporting missionary workers and individuals interested in country living” (ibid., vol. 17, book 1, p. 140, Aug. 22, 1946).

In harmony with this section, the booklets Country Living (1946) and From City to Country Living (1950) were recommended to SDAs for reading. Between 1947 and 1950 a number of articles written by such Seventh-day Adventist leaders as V. G. Anderson, M. L. Rice, C. B. Haynes, A. W. Spalding, and E. A. Sutherland encouraged SDAs to move out of the cities into the country. In 1949 conferences and institutes on rural living were held in Takoma Park, Maryland; Portland, Oregon; and Seattle and Spokane, Washington. The theme of these meetings was: How can SDAs “who live in rural districts help those in the cities to establish their homes in the country”?

It appears that as people became accustomed to the dangers of the atomic age, and difficulties were experienced by those who moved to the country, a reaction set in. At a meeting at Grand Ledge, Michigan, Sept. 3—5, 1951, the entire structure of the self-supporting work and rural living program was brought under careful scrutiny. Among other things, it was decided at this meeting that the Association of Seventh-day Adventist Self-Supporting Institutions “foster the work hitherto carried on by the General Conference Commission of Self-Supporting Missionary Enterprises,” which included the rural living objectives.

Although from this time on the spirit of country living began to wane, the General Conference sought to bolster the program by appropriate committee action and by calling for promotion of the plan on the union and local conference levels. The first agricultural and rural living workshop was held at Emmanuel Missionary College, Berrien Springs, Michigan, Dec. 29—31, 1954. Expert counsel regarding small farming and allied industries was offered, and other workshops were to have been held in strategic places throughout North America in close proximity to metropolitan areas. However, the general response to the program was negative.

In 1957 an unpublished survey of the North American Division regarding the status of rural living revealed a definite lack of interest in the field, with certain exceptions. As a result, in rewriting the constitution and bylaws of the Association of Self-Supporting Institutions, mention of rural living was omitted. Since this time all inquiries regarding rural living have been referred to local and union conferences.

Seventh-day Adventists believe that at a time yet future, when Sunday laws become oppressive and boycotts of dissenters will forbid anyone to “buy or sell, save he that had the mark, or the name of the beast” (Rev. 13:17), leaving the large metropolitan areas will become imperative for those who wish to keep the seventh-day Sabbath. In this connection Ellen White says: “It is no time now for God’s people to be fixing their affections or laying up their treasure in the world. The time is not far distant, when, like the early disciples, we shall be forced to seek a refuge in desolate and solitary places. As the siege of Jerusalem by the Roman armies was the signal for flight to the Judean Christians, so the assumption of power on the part of our nation [the U.S.] in the decree enforcing the papal sabbath will be a warning to us. It will then be time to leave the large cities, preparatory to leaving the smaller ones for retired homes in secluded places among the mountains” (5T 464, 465).

Rusangu Secondary School

RUSANGU SECONDARY SCHOOL. A coeducational boarding school on the senior secondary level, situated eight miles (13 kilometers) southwest of Monza, 1.2 miles (two kilometers) off the Great North Road, in Zambia, Africa. The plant consists of an administration building, dormitories, classroom buildings, dining hall, science and domestic science buildings, a library, and woodwork classrooms. The school farm plants vegetables, bananas, and cashew nuts. Eight fish ponds are maintained, along with a herd of 40 cattle and eight dairy cows.

The secondary school section opened in 1960 at the Rusangu Mission Station, 2.5 miles (four kilometers) from the present site. In June 1965 building was begun, and classes began in the new buildings in February 1966. The first form 5 class completed its work in December 1970.

Enrollment in 1992 was 700.

Russell, C. P.

RUSSELL, C. P. See Messenger Party.

Russell, Clifford A.

RUSSELL, CLIFFORD A. (1870—1954). Educator, youth leader, and administrator. He had taught in public schools in Michigan for 15 years when in 1906 the West Michigan Conference invited him to take charge of the educational and young people's work in that field. Between 1908 and 1912 he was principal of Battle Creek Academy. He spent the next year in ministerial work. In 1912 he was elected educational and Missionary Volunteer secretary of the Lake Union Conference, and in 1920 he accepted a call to become field secretary of the Missionary Volunteer Department of the General Conference. It was during his years with the Missionary Volunteer Department that plans for the junior program, from which the Junior Missionary Volunteer organization sprang, were worked out. From 1922 to 1936 he was one of the associate secretaries in the Educational Department of the General Conference, leading out in the elementary field. From 1936 to 1942 he was educational and Missionary Volunteer secretary of the Southern Union. In 1942 at the age of 72 and after 36 years in denominational employment, he relinquished his administrative positions, but served another four years as an extension secretary for the Southern Missionary College.

Russell, Riley

RUSSELL, RILEY (1875—1961). Pioneer Seventh-day Adventist missionary physician in Korea. He studied at Battle Creek College and at American Medical Missionary College, and received a nursing diploma from the Battle Creek Sanitarium in 1902. After working in the Battle Creek and Washington sanitariums, he studied medicine, and in 1908 received a medical degree from George Washington University. He then sailed for Korea and opened SDA medical missionary work. In addition to his medical work he also supervised the mission school for boys for two years. In 1910 he was ordained to the ministry. After his return to the United States in 1922, he was on the staff of Glendale Sanitarium in California for two years and then went into private practice.

Russia

RUSSIA. a country in Asia, formerly a part of the now-dissolved Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. Stretching from the Baltic Sea in the west to the Bering Sea in the east, and from the Arctic Sea in the north, to the Black Sea, Caspian Sea, and Sea of Japan in the south, it occupies a larger area than any other nation—about 6,592,800 square miles (17,075,350 square kilometers), and its population (1994) is nearly 150 million, more than 80 percent of which are Russian. Russia is bounded by Norway, Finland, Estonia, Latvia, Belarus, and Ukraine on the west; Georgia, Azerbaijan, Kazakhstan, China, Mongolia, and Korea on the south; the Sea of Japan, Sea of Okhotsk, and the Bering Sea on the east; and the Arctic Ocean on the north.

Russian is the official language; many others are spoken. The largest religious body is the Russian Orthodox Church, which maintains a patriarchate in Moscow, with eparchies through the country and even abroad. The second-largest religious group is Islam. There is also a small number of Roman Catholics in the western areas of the country. The larger Protestant groups are the Evangelical Christian Baptists and the Lutherans. Smaller groups are the Methodists, Seventh-day Adventists, and Molokans (a national Protestant movement). There are many Jews (the western parts of the former Russian Empire had the world's largest concentration of Jews before the World War I), also Jehovah's Witnesses, Buddhists, and animists.

Historical and Religious Background

Historical and Religious Background.

1. Rise of the Russian State. The history of the Russian state is traced from the ninth century, when a permanent principality was established at Kiev by the then-pagan Slavs under the leadership of Varangian rulers (Vikings from Scandinavia). Near the end of the tenth century their prince accepted Byzantine Christianity and ordered his people to be baptized en masse.

Placed between the east and the west, the Russ Slavs were constantly in conflict with their neighbors. In the thirteenth century they successfully stopped the eastward expansion of the Teutonic knights and in this way put a limit to the spread of the Western Roman Catholic Church in Eastern Europe, but only a few years later they were overrun by the Mongols and Tatars from the east. The latter controlled the area for nearly three centuries and left an unmistakable influence on Russian character and culture.

After the Tatars began to lose control, near the end of the fourteenth century, the princes of Moscow undertook the unification of the land and the formation of a monolithic Slavic state. This objective was not achieved until about 1600, when the Romanov dynasty ascended the throne of Russia. About that time the expansion of the Russian state beyond the boundaries occupied by the eastern Slavic tribes began. Stimulated by trade, adventurous Cossacks (frontiersmen) penetrated Siberia and within half a century, by 1639, reached the Pacific Ocean. Gradually, by conquest or by accession, as in the case of the Ukraine and Georgia, the huge empire of Russia was created, and by 1900 it had enveloped one sixth of the earth's land area and enclosed many people speaking diverse languages.

Separated from Western Europe by its adherence to the Eastern rite, which was anathematized by the popes of Rome, and engaged during the first thousand years of its existence in almost continual military struggle, first for its existence and then for its territorial expansion, Russia has developed a culture in which free thought and free community, in a Western sense, have no place. As the unification of Russia as a state brought with it feudalism, the peasants of the country became bound to the land as serfs late in the fifteenth century and were not freed until 1861. In contrast with the Western church-and-state balance of power, the Russian Orthodox Church did not counterbalance the secular government, but tended to work with it, reaching the caesaro-papist ideal of a perfect union between the Russian church and the Russian state. The church never developed great centers of learning where free thought could develop. On the contrary, it appealed to the state to eliminate all questioners of its authority and authenticity.

2. No Protestant Reformation in Russia. The liturgical language of the church, Church Slavonic, ceased to be the language of the people soon after the introduction of Christianity, and until the second half of the nineteenth century there was no Bible that the masses could read for themselves. The Russian Orthodox Church took great pride in the fact that within it there had never developed a strong Protestant movement, and it made certain that all sparks of dissent would be extinguished immediately. For this purpose it maintained for centuries notorious monastery prisons where thousands of honest inquirers after Bible truth met their end.

Nevertheless, some attempted to live in accordance with the teachings of the Bible as best they could discover them. There are brief and sketchy references to Sabbathkeeping Christian groups in Russia beginning from the fourteenth century. The Eastern Church never denied a special position to the seventh day of the week; moreover, the secular name of the day in Slavic languages, subbota, is the same as the name that is found in the fourth commandment.

3. The Molokans. The outstanding early Russian Protestant dissenters (c. 1750) were the Molokans, who called themselves "spiritual Christians." In contrast with the lax morals of the adherents of the Russian state church, the Molokans observed severe discipline and were orderly, temperate, and industrious. They originated probably in central Russia, but continuous persecution and exile scattered them along the Volga and Don rivers, into the Crimea, the Caucasus, and Siberia as far as the Pacific Ocean. It is difficult to trace the history of this movement because it had no organization, and the state church, which made every effort to prevent heretics from propagating their doctrines, sought to obliterate all references to them. Molokans had no elaborate church buildings, but worshiped in private houses; they had no ministry, but chose presbyters. Their religious views were somewhat similar to those held by Quakers.

4. German Protestant Immigrants. Another stream of Protestantism in Russia appeared in the eighteenth century, when thousands of Germans accepted the invitation of Catherine II to settle in southern Russia. Among them were Mennonites, who upon being granted exemption from military service "forever" by the Russian government, came from eastern Prussia, where they had lacked this freedom. In 1853 a Mennonite settlement began east of the Volga River. A fraction (some 100 families) of the Mennonite Brethren Church, persecuted for their differing theology by the mother church and ostracized from the original community around 1860, established Wohldemfürst and Alexanderfeld (later Alexandrodar) along the Kuban River, in the northern Caucasus, in 1863.

5. Spiritual Awakening in Mid-nineteenth Century. The awakening at this time was greatly helped by the intellectual ferment in mid-nineteenth-century Russia. On the one hand, the Russian Orthodox Christians were deeply spiritual, and on the other, in the 1860s and 1870s there was a widespread dissatisfaction with the Russian state church both among the newly freed peasants and among the intelligentsia. Many joined Bible study groups in private homes in meetings called Stunden (“hours”). Soon national evangelists developed from among the Russians. The great Baptist movement alone claimed several million adherents (Robert Torbet, in his History of the Baptists, p. 203, mentions that in 1942 Russian Baptists claimed 4 million members).

The Evangelical Christian, Baptist, and Mennonite movements emerged in three different parts of Russia: the Ukraine in southern Russia, in the Caucasus, and in St. Petersburg.

The young reform movement suffered much persecution. Its prominent leaders were forced to leave the country or move away from the capital; others were jailed, and many were sent into exile. One of the first Baptist leaders, Vasilii Ivanov-Klichnikov, was arrested 31 times. The Union of Russian Baptists, founded in 1884, was classified as illegal for some 20 years, and the Baptists were able to hold their first open congress only after the czar issued the edict of toleration of dissenters in 1905. In 1907 their first journal, Baptist, was published, and in 1908 a Baptist publishing company was founded in the Ukraine. These religious movements prepared the way for the acceptance of the Seventh-day Adventist message.

Early Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Early Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. 1. Beginnings. SDA work in Russia began as a lay missionary movement. The seeds were planted by German colonists who had emigrated from Russia to America in the 1870s and had there become SDAs. After embracing Seventh-day Adventism, they began to send SDA books, tracts, and magazines in the German language (Die Stimme der Wahrheit began publication in 1879) to their acquaintances in Russia. Between about 1879 and 1885, SDA publications began to find their way into the German settlements on the Dnepr River, in the Crimea, on the Volga River, and in the Caucasus.

Interest in the Bible was evident not only among the foreign settlers but also among the native Russians. But the barriers set up by the government and the state church for a long time prevented the Russians from participating in the study of the Bible. Disaffection from the Orthodox Church was treated as a crime of state and punished by banishment to the far corners of the empire. Nonetheless, the interest in the Bible was widespread. One of the early Russian SDAs recounted (Review and Herald 70:762, Dec. 5, 1893) how her father, a Russian Army officer, discovered from his study of the Bible that the seventh day is the Sabbath and taught his children to observe it; and how for keeping it he was exiled to Siberia sometime in the 1860s or 1870s.

Another early Sabbathkeeper was Theofil A. Babienco, of Tarashcha in the Ukraine, south of Kiev. In the middle 1870s he was assisting an Orthodox priest in church services by reading the Psalms. Obtaining permission to take the Bible home, he gathered his neighbors in the evenings to hear him read from it, and through these readings he learned that many doctrines believed and taught by his church were not scriptural. When he asked the priest about this, he was warned that he was in danger of deranging his mind through much reading of the Bible. He was asked to return the Bible. Later at Kiev he purchased a copy of his own. Several others obtained Bibles and began to share Babienco's views.

In 1877 Babienco and a number of these people left the Orthodox Church and organized themselves as "a community of brethren, believers of the Bible," which grew and spread to other towns and villages in the Ukraine. When, about 1883, the "brethren" of Tarashcha decided to erect a church building, they sent their leader, Babienco, to the governor in Kiev to obtain the necessary permission. Babienco never returned; he was arrested and exiled to Stavropol, in the northern Caucasus. Here, while in exile, he secured a Bible and (according to his son's account) after two years of study began to keep the seventh-day Sabbath and to expect the second coming of Jesus Christ to this earth. As yet he had not heard of Seventh-day Adventists. He wrote to those in Tarashcha about his new faith, and as a result some of them also believed in Christ's soon coming and began to keep the seventh-day Sabbath.

Thus by the time SDAs began to work in Russia, there were nationals prepared to accept the teachings of the church and to unite with it. However, the earliest evangelism was not among the Russians, but among Germans living in Russia.

2. First Work Among Germans. At the beginning SDA evangelism was confined to the German settlers, who were exempt from the rule of the leaden hand of the church and had a better opportunity to study the teachings of the Bible without fear.

The first converts appeared about 1882 in several places in southern Russia.

3. First Church Organized by Conradi (Crimea). In July 1886 Conradi, who was sent by the General Conference from the United States to Basel, Switzerland, in January 1886, responded to the many calls that came to the mission office, and met Gerhard Perk at Odessa. They visited interested persons in the Crimea and other places in Russia.

The first Seventh-day Adventist church in Russia was organized with 19 members, among whom was G. Tetz, who later became one of the pioneer workers in southern Russia and elsewhere, including Siberia.

Conradi and Perk were arrested and jailed. Forty days later, through the intervention of the American minister in St. Petersburg (then the capital of Russia), who assured the government that SDAs were Christians, they were released. After the release Conradi and Perk continued their meetings with the converts and interested Protestants. According to their knowledge, there were at that time 45 observing the Sabbath—more than twice the number of church members.

From the Crimea they traveled to Wiesenfeld, the home of Gerhard Perk, and visited most of the Sabbathkeepers there.

4. First Church of Russians (Caucasus). In 1886 or 1887 Theofil Babienco, then in exile at Stavropol in the northern Caucasus, and already a Sabbathkeeper, became one of the first Russian converts. Apparently he learned of the SDAs when Laubhan visited his German Baptist employer. Five of Babienco's local followers were baptized in 1887, and eight more in 1888. A Russian SDA group was established in Stavropol (and organized in 1890 with Babienco as elder), and there were also groups in the villages of Michailovka and Palageyevka, both some distance away.

In 1888 Abram Neufeld, a German from Russia living at Hillsboro, Kansas, visited (at his own expense) the German colonies along the Kuban River in the Caucasus. His diligent Bible studies with German settlers led to the conversion of 12 persons. Abraham Isaac, who for more than 12 years had served as mayor of his colony, subsequently became the elder of the Seventh-day Adventist church established there.

In the latter part of 1888 Jacob Klein, a German from Russia, left the United States with Conradi for Hamburg, Germany, where he attended the newly opened mission school, then was ordained to the ministry and in the autumn of 1889 was sent to his former home in the settlement of Frank, on the Volga River. There he organized a church.

5. First General Meeting. In November 1890 the first general meeting of Seventh-day Adventists was held at Eigenheim in the Caucasus, which was attended by more than 100 members out of a total of 356 adherents then recorded in Russia. Among those attending were a number of Russian SDAs from the Stavropol area who came with Babienco, their leader, and his sister. The group was happy to see them, yet apprehensive at having native Russians in the Protestant meetings. At this meeting Babienco was ordained as a church elder, the first Russian Seventh-day Adventist to be thus ordained.

6. Exiles in the Transcaucasus. The active promotion of the work among Russians brought persecution, sometimes caused by false brethren. Less than a year after his ordination. Babienco and seven members of his church were sentenced to exile at a place called Herusy, beyond the Caucasus Mountains, near Mount Ararat. The German members who had met with the Russians were sent under arrest to their home colonies on the Volga.

The exile of men from Stavropol was a very hard experience for the church there, but its members remained steadfast, and other leaders developed or joined the church, such as Ippolit Pilkevitch, who became a minister and later spent many years behind prison bars for preaching the gospel. Meanwhile, at Herusy, which was the terminus of the 200-mile (320-kilometer) stagecoach route, Babienco talked of his faith to the coachmen, who were Russian Protestants (Baptists and Molokans). Soon interest was aroused in the surrounding villages, and within three years more than 200 persons began to keep the Bible Sabbath in that area.

Early Publishing Work

Early Publishing Work. 1. The First Colporteurs. The Seventh-day Adventist faith entered Russia through the circulation of publications, the first papers being in the German language and being distributed largely among the German-speaking population.

2. Difficulties in Supplying Publications. It was not easy to supply the colporteurs with publications. With the state church extremely vigilant in suppressing every attempt to propagate any doctrine not its own, it was impossible to print SDA publications in Russia. Nothing was allowed to be printed that might unsettle the faith of the Russians. Because of the strict censorship on all publications sent into the country, it was practically impossible to send boxes of books by freight or by mail.

In the first two years after the first Russian tract became available, 2,000 copies were mailed to Russia. These elicited an enthusiastic response. Some 35 persons were converted during 1889 alone as the result of reading these papers, and others were calling for more SDA publications. The company of Russian exiles in the Caucasus, poor though they were, sent a small donation to help defray the cost of translating. At that time Gerhard Perk was conducting the Russian correspondence from Hamburg.

Since no Russian language publications were permitted to enter the country in quantity, SDA publishing work at first was confined to mailing leaflets in letters and to the distribution of pamphlets among the Russians traveling outside the country. The first successful attempt to issue an SDA book in Russia was the publication of the book Christian Temperance, by Ellen White, which passed the censors and proved a boon to the canvassing work. It is not now known in what language it was issued.

3. First Printing. The first SDA printing in Russia was done in Riga in 1899, when tracts in Estonian and Latvian were published. As the Russian masses turned to reading during the Russo-Japanese War of 1904—1905, the demand for Seventh-day Adventist publications increased. In 1905 Russian, Latvian, and Estonian editions of Ellen G. White's Steps to Christ were published in the city of Helsingfors (Helsinki), Finland (then a part of Russia). Early in 1905 the Hamburg Publishing House began issuing a Russian Sabbath school lesson quarterly. In 1906 His Glorious Appearing (a revision of an earlier work by James White) was translated into Russian, and a number of new tracts were printed. In 1908 Maslina ("Olive Tree"), a 16-page monthly evangelistic paper in Russian, was begun by the Hamburg house. It continued publication until World War I. In 1914 I. A. L'vov launched Blagaya Vest ("Message of Grace"), an eight-page monthly, in St. Petersburg.

Development Until the Revolution

Development Until the Revolution. 1. Training of Workers. Early evangelistic workers for Russia were trained at the Seventh-day Adventist training school at Hamburg. From the time it began to offer courses in 1889 until 1899, there were always several students from Russia there.

2. Expansion Into the Cities. For the first 10 years (1886—1896) membership in Russia was confined almost entirely to rural districts around the German settlements on the Volga and Don rivers, in the Caucasus, in the Crimea, and in Bessarabia. In 1895, beginning in the Baltic provinces, SDAs opened work in the larger cities. For this work, tracts were translated into Estonian and Latvian in 1896, and about the same time colporteurs finally succeeded in getting permits to sell these tracts there.

Gerhard Perk, who had had to flee from southern Russia some 10 years earlier, was sent to the Baltic area there and began giving Bible studies in Riga. Conradi organized a church of 20 members in May 1896. Soon thereafter Loeb sack visited the city on his way from Germany to eastern Russia and baptized several more. Johann Perk, brother of Gerhard, began Bible work in the city of Vilnius (Vilna) in Lithuania and formed a group of converts there by 1896. In 1897 a group was also meeting on the Sabbath in Tallinn (Reval), Estonia.

Gerhard Perk began giving Bible studies in St. Petersburg in 1897; soon seven persons were keeping the seventh-day Sabbath. The work in St. Petersburg attracted the attention of other Protestants. Prominent Evangelical Christians showed a keen interest in lectures on the prophecies, and some of them even copied or translated from SDA books. In 1898 a church of 17 persons was organized there. By 1901 there were two churches: one Russian, with 20 members, and the other German, with 50 members. In that year evangelism was begun in Kiev, where later an important center of the work developed.

In 1900 there were more than 1,037 Seventh-day Adventists in Russia in 28 churches and four companies. This number did not include at least 300 others who had belonged to the church in Russia but had later emigrated to the Americas or to European countries, notably Romania; nor did it include those who found it impossible to join with the church in Russia openly but who later united with the SDAs in other countries. After 1900 the membership increased constantly.

3. Expansion Into Siberia. Still the work continued to grow. In 1907 the SDA Church in Russia was organized as a separate union conference, with 2,566 members, 41 churches, and 31 workers, and with J. T. Boettcher as the first president.

In 1908 a church was organized at Novorossiysk, on the southern side of the Caucasus Mountains. In the northern Caucasus in that year there were 820 members organized in 12 German, 13 Russian, three Cossack, and three Molokan churches.

About 1905, adherents were reported in the town of Tashkent, in central Asia. In 1909 J. Ebel went from the Caucasus to Turkestan in central Asia and organized churches at Aulie Ata and Ashkabad. In 1910 the work in Siberia was placed in the charge of H. K. Loeb sack (cousin of the first indigenous SDA evangelist), and two additional workers, K. K. Dueck and one Kurbatov, went there. In that same year J. T. Boettcher from the United States, then president of the Russian Union, organized a church at Kokbektı, in central Asia, near the Chinese border. By 1914 there were six SDA churches, with 107 members, in Turkestan.

In 1911 the Russian Union Conference achieved self-sustaining status, not only paying the expenses of the work in Russia itself but also contributing to the support of the Russian Department at the Friedensau Missionary School. Shortly before World War I, in 1914, the membership in Russia, organized in 240 churches and served by 40 ministers, reached 5,880.

Under the Soviet Regime

Under the Soviet Regime. 1. Seventh-day Adventists During the Civil War, 1917—1922. At the beginning of the revolution in February 1917, the ministers and laypersons exiled since the beginning of World War I were released, and for a while it appeared that considerable religious freedom would be established. But in 1918 the decree that separated church from state and school from church not only deprived all religious organizations of juridical personality but also absolutely prohibited all organized religious instruction of young people under 18 years of age, and restricted religious education of adults to theological schools—of which SDAs had none.

The revolution was followed by five years of civil war, during which the economy and the social fabric of Russian society were thoroughly worn out. The consistent abstinence from political involvement during the civil war prevented any losses of life among the SDAs as a result of military action, but because of the secession of Poland, Finland, Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, and other areas of western Russia, the membership of the church decreased by about 3,300. Further inroads were made by the famine that followed the war in the European part of the land. At times the situation was so desperate that families had to keep their children in bed during the winter because they lacked food, clothing, and fuel. At that time SDA workers received no wages. Nonetheless, they persevered.

In October 1920 a conference was held in Moscow, at which the All Russia Federation of Societies of Seventh-day Adventists, embracing some 11,000 SDAs in Russia, was formed. (The 1921 Statistical Report, presumably based on incomplete reporting, gives 8,185 as the membership in Russia.) H. J. Loeb sack, the president, reported that he had visited many groups of members all through the war, helping in reorganization and encouraging the people. In 1921 the last American worker, Daniel Isaac, left Russia. In the same year, L. H. Christian, then associate vice president for the European Division, visited parts of Russia that were suffering from famine on behalf of the Seventh-day Adventist worldwide welfare program and arranged for relief shipments of food to the people of Russia as a gift from Seventh-day Adventists.

According to the account given by L. H. Christian in the Missions Quarterly for the first quarter of 1927, Russian SDAs continued their Sabbath school work right through the years of famine. As a study guide they used lesson quarterlies prepared 14 years earlier, which they copied by hand after the original supply of printed booklets was exhausted.

2. Early Years of the Soviet Regime. During the first decade of Soviet government in Russia the Protestants enjoyed a degree of religious freedom unknown in czarist times, and the SDA membership more than doubled. This growth was not accomplished without difficulties, for the complete elimination of religion from the social life of the country was the avowed aim of the regime; however, because the main object of suppression was the former state church, the Protestants enjoyed a respite from physical persecution. The government allowed Protestants to restore their meeting houses at their own expense, but then, since all public buildings had been nationalized during the revolution, it retained the property right to the buildings and sometimes canceled their leases, making it extremely expensive and frustrating to maintain public places of worship.

In 1924 the fifth all-Russian congress of Seventh-day Adventists, commemorating the fortieth anniversary of SDA work in Russia, was permitted to be held in Moscow. It was attended by some 80 delegates from all parts of the country, from the Baltic Sea to the Pacific Ocean, and from central Asia to the Arctic Sea. The sessions were held in a former Orthodox seminary rented from the government for the purpose. The evening meetings were attended by the public, and the city newspapers commented on the proceedings. Several government officials were present at the session. At the conclusion of the conference a large baptismal service was held in one of the parks in suburban Moscow.

Soon afterward H. J. Loeb sack, the federation president, traveled across the Soviet Union, visiting all six regular union conference sessions.

3. Publishing and Educational Work in the 1920s. In 1925 the Soviet government also granted permission to publish two church papers: Der Adventbote (“The Advent Messenger”) in German and Golos Istiny (“Voice of Truth”) in Russian. The total circulation of the two papers and the Sabbath school quarterly was under 6,000 copies. An eight-page monthly, Blagovestnik (“Gospel Messenger”), formerly Blagaya Ves't', discontinued in 1919 for lack of paper, was revived as a 32-page quarterly in Kiev, with I. A. L'vov as editor.

In 1926 special permission was given the Evangelical Christians, the Baptists, and the SDAs to print jointly 25,000 copies of a large-format Bible in Russian in the government printing plant in Leningrad. Then another edition of 25,000 pocket-size Bibles was printed in Kiev. The SDA share of each edition was 5,000 copies. This printing marked the first time that a Bible was published in Russia by someone other than the Synod of the Orthodox Church. In addition, permission was granted to import as a gift, from Hamburg, Germany, and Riga, Latvia, 1,000 Bibles and 1,000 hymnbooks in German, 500 each in Estonian, and 200 each in Latvian. Also, the SDAs were allowed to print 5,000 Russian hymnbooks containing 525 hymns with music (until then they generally had used a small hymnal published by the Baptists). At the same time they published a small concordance.

But this privilege of publication did not last beyond 1929. The Russian Orthodox Church was also limited in what it could publish.

4. Sixth All-Russian Conference. In 1928 the sixth all-Russian conference of Seventh-day Adventists took place at Moscow from May 12 to 19 in the Cathedral of Peter and Paul. There were 87 appointed delegates.

As in all public SDA sessions in Russia—union and local—telegrams of appreciation were sent to the People's Commissariat of the Interior of the USSR for permission received to convene the council, and to the local authorities for allowing them to hold the council in Moscow. Some 70 telegrams were received from the unions, conferences, and mission fields, from local churches and from veterans of the work throughout the country, as well as from L. H. Christian, W. K. Ising, and L. R. Conradi, the officers of the European Division from abroad.

The following program of the session was approved by the People's Commissar of the Interior: “1. Reports from the floor.

“2. Reports of the Central Executive Committee . . . including statistics and finances.

- “3. Redistributing territory of the unions and revision of the constitution.
- “4. The spiritual life of the church, family, and members.
- “5. The question of military service by members of SDA Church.
- “6. Publication of literature.
- “7. Re: Bible Institute to prepare workers for the churches and unions.
- “8. Election of an executive committee and other workers of the union.
- “9. Appointment of delegates to the European congress and also to the worldwide session of SDAs.
- “10. Current items.”

Six men were appointed to attend the council of the European Division in Germany in 1928, but only H. J. Loeb sack, I. A. L'vov, and J. J. Wilson received the necessary visas. For the first time in 17 years, SDA representatives from Russia had an opportunity to participate in a church council outside of Russia; that was also the last time until recent years that Russian Seventh-day Adventists were represented in the worldwide councils.

5. Hardships in 1929 and After. With the end of the New Economic Policy and the beginning of the collectivization and industrialization programs in 1929 there was a marked change in the government's policy toward religion. The new law prohibited all educational, welfare, youth, or social activities by religious communities, and permitted these communities to hold worship services only. Teaching religion to anyone under 18 years of age became a criminal offense punishable by corrective labor. Ministers were forbidden to visit isolated members, were restricted to local congregations, and were held accountable for the political reliability of each member. The pooling of church offerings and gifts and the centralized administration of funds by the conferences were also forbidden, and thus local church groups were isolated and left to their own resources. The use of special places of worship was also made difficult by the imposition of extremely high charges for utilities. Furthermore, the congregations had to be registered and sponsored by groups of individuals acceptable to the government. It was impossible to find such a group, because all religiously inclined persons had already been declared undesirable. Religious meetings in private homes were regarded as secret and subversive gatherings, and participants were severely punished. In the end, only the largest congregations could support a minister or have access to a place in which to worship.

In many localities SDAs shared a meeting place with other denominations. The publishing of church periodicals was stopped completely, and the church returned to the methods used in apostolic times—the sharing of the faith by word of mouth. At that time (1929) there were more than 14,000 Seventh-day Adventists in 641 churches in the Soviet Union.

The enforced collectivization brought untold suffering to SDAs because of the demand to work on Saturday. In some cases where farmers could not obtain other employment, they did not have adequate food, and so starved to death. The members living in towns tried to work in small shops and to avoid large factories where the observance of the seventh-day Sabbath would be impossible. Also in force from 1929 to 1940 was an arrangement under which each worker had a five-day working period followed by a sixth day off.

6. Russian Seventh-day Adventist Church Separated. By the end of the 1920s, all official contacts between the Russian SDA Church and the SDA Church in general were cut off. Subsequently some information came indirectly, through Religious News Service, books, or travelers.

About 1930 the government dissolved the local conferences and allowed only the all-union central committee to function. In the “purges” of the early 1930s many SDA ministers and lay members were arrested and exiled, generally without any charges being preferred against them, and some lost their lives. The remaining ministers were denied full civil rights and were not allotted food rations, and their children were not admitted into the higher schools. Furthermore, the ministers had to pay a special “professional tax,” which often exceeded their income, and thus they were forced to leave the work.

Sometime in the early 1930s all the members of the all-union committee, with the exception of its president, were banished from Moscow, and on the arrival of G. A. Grigoriev, whose help Loeb sack had requested of the authorities, Loeb sack was also arrested and exiled. By 1938, according to reports that from time to time reached SDAs outside the Soviet Union, there were no congregational worship services anywhere in the country; and members, who were often deprived of the services of the minister and whose lay leaders were also arrested for their faith and vanished from the community, had to meet in small groups in private homes.

According to scant reports received after the 1920s, the SDA Church in the Soviet Union continued its existence and added to its membership throughout the troublous times despite all the difficulties the believers encountered. There are even accounts of baptisms in the labor camps of Siberia.

7. Changes in the 1950s. In the early 1950s a change appeared in the religious climate in the Soviet Union. The party leader declared in the newspaper Pravda that the party had committed a mistake by treating religious people as enemies of the country. An amnesty was proclaimed, but many SDA ministers and former leaders were dead by then. In the large cities where non-Orthodox churches had been registered formerly, meetings for public worship were allowed again under certain conditions and with reservations. But no new congregations were permitted to be formed, as, for instance, in Siberia or Kasakhstan, where many exiled SDA families and war refugees had resettled.

During the postwar years the number of Seventh-day Adventists increased somewhat, mainly because of reunion with the Soviet Union of such Western countries as Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania a part of western Ukraine, and Moldavia. According to the record of the Seventh-day Adventist All-Union Council at the end of 1958, the membership was 18,595 in 187 officially registered churches. Some churches at that time still remained unregistered; with them the total number of SDAs in the country amounted to approximately 21,000.

The Seventh-day Adventist All-Union Council was dissolved by government decree in December 1960. Guides for church activities in those days were such leaders as A. V. Likarenko, S. P. Kulyshski, V. J. Kyarmas (replacing the leader of Seventh-day Adventist churches in Estonia, E. J. Murd, who died in 1974), E. T. Klotynsh, J. B. Oltynsh, A. F. Parasej, I. S. Bondar, A. T. Shuljga, J. V. Khimenets, V. I. Prolinski, N. J. Yaruta, F. V. Melnik, I. A. Gumenyuk, P. S. Kulakov, M. P. Kulakov, E. A. Rebein. Replacements for these church servants have included: I. L. Kleiman, P. G. Pantshenko, F. I. Andrejtshuk, P. A. Katsel, J. F. Tomenko, D. P. Kulakov, J. G. Shneider, V. V. Teppone, and many others.

Mention should be made also of the deceased veterans of church work in the country: I. A. L'vov died in 1958, A. G. Galladshev died in 1973, and E. J. Murd died in 1974.

The registered churches met without hindrance for divine services in special prayer houses, which they rented from state authorities. If the place for divine service was built by the believers themselves, it was given over to believers without charge, even though considered state property. The government did not interfere in questions of religious doctrine and forms of administering a religious cult, if such did not disturb law and order or contradict the laws of the country.

In December 1971, by official permission, another all-union meeting was held in Moscow. Participants of the meeting worked out an agreement as to the text for the impending Week of Prayer, agreed on uniformity in Bible study on Sabbaths and about a common-for-all Morning Watch. At this meeting, a letter was agreed on, addressed to all members of Seventh-day Adventist churches in the country, under the heading "Seventh-day Adventists in State and Society."

Beginning in 1971, the Moscow church published Morning Watch calendars with Bible texts for daily reading. The calendars were printed in the government printing house. The rotary duplicated prayer readings are distributed to all SDA churches in the country. Some of the Bibles and New Testaments published periodically in Moscow by the Russian Orthodox Church or the Society of Evangelical Christians-Baptists got into SDA churches. Requests have been presented to the authorities for permission to print some literature.

In 1970 an ordained minister, Michael P. Kulakov, of Chimkent, Kazakhstan, central Asia, visited the United States. Greetings were brought from the approximately 150 local congregations registered with the government.

Since there were no educational facilities to train SDA ministers in the Soviet Union, each pastor trained a likely young candidate in the work. This was somewhat similar to Paulí method of training. If the young candidate developed as a pastor, the church membership decided when that individual should be ordained.

In the spring of 1974 Theodore Carcich visited the minister of religious affairs in Moscow. He met with the churches in Moscow, Kiev, and Kishinev. Contacts were made with a number of pastors, among whom were A. V. Likarenko, of Moscow; S. P. Kulizhski; A. F. Parasey, of the Ukraine; I. S. Bogdan; and N. A. Jarute and F. V. Melnik, Kishinev, Moldavia.

The Church in Russia—1970 to 1990

The Church in Russia—1970 to 1990. During this period of time the church had no official organization. In 1975 the Tula congregation initiated the election of M. P. Kulakov, the major preacher of the Seventh-day Adventist Church in Russia. Invitations were mailed to other congregations of the church in Russia to support the initiative. Permission was granted by the Ministry Council of the USSR to conduct the meeting in Gorky on March 12 and 13. Representatives at this meeting approved the election of Kulakov.

On May 27, 1979, a meeting of Russian SDA ministers took place. The main issue was the election of members to the preaching council of the Seventh-day Adventist Church in Russia.

A committee appealed to the Ministry Council for permission to organize interregional unions. The church was given permission to establish five of these. They became the basis of the present organization.

On Jan. 27, 1986, the Tula executive committee adopted the plan of constructing a theological center and seminary in the Tula region. The first group of students began their studies in September of that year.

In 1986 M. P. Kulakov was elected as head of the Republic Council, with M. M. Murga as secretary.

In September 1990 the Russian Union was established and became a part of the Euro-Asia Division; in 1994 the Russian Union was divided into the East and West Russian unions.

Rustad, George Helge

RUSTAD, GEORGE HELGE (1908—1982). Minister, conference administrator. He was born in Minnesota. After serving for a time as home missionary secretary of the Minnesota Conference and the Northern Union Conference, he became president of the South Dakota Conference in 1946. Later he was called as president of the Arizona Conference, where he served from 1950 to 1959, and of the Texico Conference, where he served from 1959 to 1973. Thunderbird Academy was established in Scottsdale, Arizona, during his administration.

After the death of his wife, Rosella, he married Gayle Dunn. In retirement the Rustads moved to Keene, Texas.

Rwanda

RWANDA. An African republic, independent since July 1962. Rwanda was for many years a part of German East Africa, and after World War I it became a Belgian mandate. It has an area of 10,169 square miles (26,300 square kilometers); in early 1994 its population was 8 million. The country is bounded on the north by Uganda, on the east by Tanzania, on the south by Burundi, and on the west by the republic of Zaïre and Lake Kivu, and is extremely mountainous. The European population is insignificantly small. The majority of the Africans are Hutus; between 5 and 10 percent belong to the Tutsi ethnic group. The granting of independence to Rwanda ushered in a period of civil disturbances which have resulted in heavy loss of life, particularly among the Tutsi.

The principal occupation of the people is agriculture.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. The territory of Rwanda constitutes the Rwanda Union Mission, which is a part of the Africa-Indian Ocean Division. Statistics (1992) for Rwanda: churches, 787; members, 265,476; elementary schools, 32; ordained ministers, 161; licensed ministers, 28; teachers, 222. Headquarters: Avenue de la Paix, Kigali.

Statistics for the constituent fields—East Rwanda Field: churches, 147; members, 56,568; elementary schools, 6; ordained ministers, 33; licensed ministers, 2; teachers, 41. Headquarters: Kigali. North Rwanda Field: churches, 324; members, 103,962; elementary schools, 12; ordained ministers, 53; licensed ministers, 10; teachers, 91. Headquarters: Rwankeri. South Rwanda Field: churches, 316; members, 104,946; elementary schools, 14; ordained ministers, 61; licensed ministers, 9; teachers, 90. Headquarters: Butare.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. SDA work in what is now Rwanda was begun by D. E. Delhove, a young worker from Belgium, shortly after World War I. At the outbreak of the war in 1914, Delhove, serving with the British Union missions in British East Africa, was drafted into the Belgian Army. He served during the war years doing clerical work with the Belgian forces in that portion of German East Africa that later became the Belgian mandated territories of Ruanda-Urundi. Impressed by the beauty of the country and the intelligence of its African inhabitants, he became convinced that this would be a fruitful field for SDA mission endeavor. At his suggestion he, with his family and another young man, Henri Monnier, were appointed missionaries to this hitherto unentered territory. For a time Delhove took charge of some Protestant missions, stations that had been abandoned during the war. When the Protestant missionaries returned, Delhove looked for a site on which to erect his own station. He was given a 125-acre (50-hectare) plot 11 miles (18 kilometers) north of the town of Nyanza, on a low ridge known as the Hill of the Skulls, a spot the natives looked upon with superstitious dread, since it had allegedly once been cursed by the Rwandan king. Here the foundations were laid for Gitwe Mission. Being on an elevation of 5,643 feet (1,720 meters) above sea level, the climate is healthful.

In 1920 H. Monnier, of Switzerland, opened the Buganza Mission near Lake Muhazi. When the Great North Road was laid through the mission site, a new site was found near Ruhengeri at an elevation of 7,643 feet (2,330 meters) above sea level, to which in April 1921 Monnier and A. Matter moved the mission. While on overseas furlough Matter took a course in tropical medicine. Upon his return in April 1923, he and his sister, Maria Matter, started the Rwankeri dispensary. Mrs. A. Matter served as midwife.

The first baptism here took place in 1924, with two candidates: Yohana Ruvugihomvu and Petero Lukangalajunga. In 1925 the first woman, Maria Nyirabigwagwa, was baptized. A school was opened in 1925, headed by H. Monnier, with the following teachers: Yohana Ruvugihomvu, Paulo Rwangezeho, Petero Lukangalajunga, Gideon Gakindi, and Filipino Kurujyibgami. In this same year, four outschools were organized: Rubaka, Kaziba, Hesha, and Bihinga. These were taught by Africans who had learned reading, writing, and arithmetic while working for Monnier. Of these teachers Yohana and Paulo were ordained as ministers in 1934.

Monnier remained at Rwankeri from 1921 to 1940. This long stay and his thorough acquaintance with the people and their language qualified him to translate from the Bible large portions, which were accepted by the British and Foreign Bible Society and have been incorporated into the present Runyarwanda Bible. He also wrote a popular Runyarwanda grammar for English-speaking missionaries.

Early Organization and Growth—Ngoma Mission. At first the mission work was under the East African Union. In 1928 the territory was transferred to the African Division, and the East Congo Union was organized to include the territories of Ruanda, Urundi, and Kivu District of the Belgian Congo, with headquarters at Gitwe. C. W. Bozarth was the first superintendent and secretary-treasurer of the new union. Later M. Duploux, from France, who had been working at the newly opened mission at Buganda in Urundi, became secretary-treasurer. In 1931 A. Matter and Dr. J. H. Sturges went to open the Ngoma Mission and Hospital. The station is situated 18 miles (29 kilometers) south of Kibuye, high on the eastern rim of Lake Kivu, at an elevation of 5,905 feet (1,800 meters).

The first school at Ngoma was opened in October 1931, with Petero Lukangalajunga and Barnabas Bisomimbga as teachers. Petero, who had come from Rwankeri Mission with A. Matter, was later drowned in Lake Kivu when the boat in which he was traveling capsized. The first four candidates were baptized at Ngoma on Dec. 20, 1933.

Union Merger. In 1930 the East Congo Union became known as the Central African Union, and in 1932 this union was merged with the Congo Union. In 1947 Ruanda-Urundi was organized into a field, with A. L. Davy as its first president and H. J. Bennett as secretary-treasurer, and with headquarters at Gitwe.

More Recent Developments. In 1954 Rwankeri Station became part of the Northeast Congo Field, leaving the Ruanda-Urundi Field with Gitwe, Ngoma, and Ndora (in Urundi).

In 1956 Rwankeri Station became the headquarters for the East Congo Mission, which included Kirundu and Masisi of the Congo. A. L. Davy was president.

By 1960 the Congo Union had become the largest in the division. Since the greatest concentration of membership lay in the two countries, Rwanda and Burundi, these were organized in 1961 to form the new Central African Union, with W. R. Vail as president. In view of the political developments that took place during the next two years in these two countries, as well as in the republic of the Congo, this proved to be a wise move. The headquarters were set up in Bujumbura, the capital and principal town of Burundi.

At the same time the stations in the Ruanda-Urundi area had become so large that they had to be organized into mission fields. Gitwe was made the South Rwanda Mission, with I. E. Schultz as president. Ngoma was called West Rwanda, with J. C. Mattingly the first president. Rwankeri became the North Rwanda Field, with H. Kotz as president.

The South and North Rwanda fields were separated in 1965 into districts, forming the new East Rwanda Field. The remaining portion of the South Rwanda Field grew so rapidly that it was again divided in 1973. A new South Rwanda Field was formed, with headquarters at Butare. The former South Rwanda Field (Gitwe) was renamed Central Rwanda Field. In the past few years all fields in Rwanda have come under the direction of African field presidents.

At the beginning of 1984 the Central African Union, composed of Rwanda and Burundi, was divided to form the Rwanda Union Mission and the Burundi Association, which was attached to the division. Meanwhile, some administrative changes were wrought for financial reasons: the five fields were reduced to three with the integration of the Central and West fields into the East, North, and South.

Although a comparatively small country, Rwanda contains a large concentration of Seventh-day Adventist membership in southern Africa. Annual camp meetings have played an important part in bringing the people together. Nowhere in the world has attendance at camp meetings by Seventh-day Adventists been larger than at Rwankeri, where as many as 20,000 have been present by actual count. The activities of lay evangelists have played an important part in building up the membership throughout the field.

In mid-1994 a terrible civil war between Hutus and Tutsis resulted in the closing of the college and the disruption of the work in Rwanda. Some 500,000 people, including many Seventh-day Adventists, lost their lives at that time; as many as 2 million fled the country because of the conflict.

Sabah Adventist Secondary School

SABAH ADVENTIST SECONDARY SCHOOL (Sekolah Menengah Advent Sabah). A coeducational boarding school operated at Tamparuli, Sabah, Malaysia, by the Sabah Mission. Until 1966 it was known as Sabah Training School. The 1993 enrollment was 593 and the faculty numbered 25.

The school was opened by M. T. Sibadogil in 1939. After closure during World War II, the school was reopened in 1946 by M. J. Hutabarat. In 1950 an attempt was made to upgrade the school, but the plan was abandoned until 1959 because of the lack of funds, staff, and students. In 1961 nine students graduated from form 3. Form 4 was offered for the first time in 1963, but it was discontinued the following year owing to lack of funds and students, only to be offered again in 1968. A first group of 14 pupils graduated from form 5 in 1969. From 1977 to 1979 the school was upgraded to offer form 6, but it was discontinued because of a change in the medium of instruction. It was opened again in 1988. At the end of 1989, 78 students graduated.

Instruction was in English, but beginning in 1976, in keeping with the state's political status, the national language, Bahasa Malaysia, began to be an integral part of its curriculum. By 1980 Bahasa Malaysia became the medium of instruction for all class levels, but English remained a required subject.

The school is instrumental in providing workers for the mission. Of the total 102 salaried workers of the mission in 1993, 91 had been students of the school, including all of the 22 ordained ministers.

Sabatino, Francesco

SABATINO, FRANCESCO (1910—1962). Radio speaker, editor, and departmental secretary in Italy. He spent much of his youth in Africa, where his father was a Seventh-day Adventist missionary in Eritrea and where he assisted in the mission work. He graduated from the Séminaire Adventiste de Salève in France, having apparently received his primary and secondary education in public schools. In 1935 he married Sara Ernst. He began his work for the church in 1934 as an evangelist. From about 1938 to 1953 he served as editor first of L'Araldo della Verita ("The Herald of Truth") and later of Segni dei Tempi ("Signs of the Times") and Messaggero Avventista ("Adventist Messenger"). About 1945 he joined the staff of the Italian Union Mission as MV and Sabbath school secretary. From about 1954 to 1962 he was the radio speaker of the Voice of Prophecy broadcasts in Italy, also the secretary of the public relations, radio-TV, and temperance departments of the Italian Union. He wrote three books of radio talks: La Voce della Speranza, L'Argine infranto, and Casa Felice.

Sabbath

SABBATH. A distinctive feature of Seventh-day Adventist belief and practice is the observance of the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath, from sunset on Friday to sunset on Saturday, in contrast with the almost universal Christian observance of Sunday. Seventh-day Adventists postulate their belief and practice on the explicit statements of Scripture setting apart the seventh day of the week as a day of rest, on the fact that the distinctive character with which God invested the day is never rescinded in Scripture, on the absence of any recorded transfer of the sacredness of the Sabbath to Sunday or any affirmation of Sunday sacredness, and on the lack of any recorded instance of the observance of the first day of the week as a sabbath by NT Christians.

The fundamental basis for Seventh-day Adventist belief and practice with respect to the seventh-day Sabbath is the fourth command of the Decalogue, God's moral law, which SDAs consider binding upon people of all ages. Inclusion of the Sabbath with nine other precepts whose moral nature is unquestioned implies that the Author of the Decalogue considered the Sabbath as being invested with moral quality, and as being as important and as universally binding as the other nine. The fact that ritual matters, for example, circumcision, the universal sign of the covenant, were not included in the Decalogue, argues conclusively that the seventh-day Sabbath was not designed to be ritual in quality, but moral.

As the fundamental reason for the observance of the seventh-day Sabbath, the fourth command of the Decalogue cites the creation of this world. "In six days the Lord made heaven and earth, . . . and rested the seventh day: wherefore the Lord blessed the sabbath day, and hallowed it" (Ex. 20:8—11).

For this reason people are to "remember the sabbath day, to keep it holy."

In Scripture the command to observe the seventh day as the Sabbath is thus linked inseparably to the act of Creation, the institution of the Sabbath and the command to observe it being a direct consequence of the act of Creation. Furthermore, the entire human family owes its existence to the divine act of Creation thus memorialized; accordingly, the obligation to comply with the Sabbath command as a memorial of the creative power of God devolves upon the entire human race.

By its very nature the Sabbath is thus universal in both time and scope. It is effective for as long as the works it was ordained to memorialize endure, and is binding on all who were thus created, and on their descendants. The focus of the Sabbath command is thus within the orbit of human beings' unalterable moral relationship to their Creator, not of the changing ritual forms by which they worship their Creator.

The Sabbath also supplies a fundamental human need. Said our Lord, "The sabbath was made for man, and not man for the sabbath" (Mark 2:27). According to Gen. 2:1—3, the Sabbath was instituted on the last day of Creation week, when God "rested . . . from all his work. . . . So God blessed the seventh day and hallowed it, because on it God rested from all his work which he had done in creation" (vs. 2, 3, RSV). In other words, the Sabbath was made for human beings and set apart as a holy day—as the climax of the acts of Creation.

Ever since Creation week, then, the seventh day has been the Sabbath of the Lord. Christians generally agree on the desirability of a Sabbath day. But the same Creator, and Author of the Decalogue, who enjoined humanity to keep His holy day, at the same time affirmed that this day was the seventh day of the week. Thus God blended the Sabbathness and the seventh

In the statement “The sabbath was made for man, and not man for the sabbath,” Jesus declared human beings to be the Creator’s paramount concern in ordaining the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath. They needed that which the Sabbath was designed to provide: (1) periodic release from what would otherwise have been an unvarying round of daily toil, and (2) an opportunity to cultivate their higher nature as intelligent moral beings.

Christ taught that human beings were not to consider themselves slaves chained to a Sabbath whose restrictions shackled them and prevented their realizing that which would otherwise be for their good. They were to look upon it as a gracious provision made by an all-wise Creator to prevent them from lapsing permanently into the purely materialistic routine of preoccupation with their physical needs and thus, in effect, debasing themselves to the level of the brute creation.

To be sure, human beings are physical creatures, but in addition—and preeminently—they are intelligent, moral, responsible beings made in God’s image (see Humanity, Doctrine of). The principal function of the Sabbath day in the Creator’s plan was to provide humanity with an opportunity to develop this aspect of their being, in communion with the One in whose image humans had been created. This was not to be omitted from the six working days but, lest the unvarying routine of daily labor stifle the higher part of their nature, the Creator set apart every seventh day as a time of cessation from ordinary pursuits, and protected it from the intrusion of the physical, material considerations of life by forbidding, on it, the common activities of the workaday week. That is what the word Sabbath in the Hebrew means—cessation.

The day was to be devoted exclusively to the nurture of the intelligent, moral aspects of their being, through communion with God.

From this point of view the ancient rabbinical Sabbath restrictions (see SDACom on Mark 2:24; Luke 6:9; John 5:10, 16, 17; 9:6, 14; SB, no. 1373) were not only pointless but actually harmful. In fact, they effectively thwarted the Creator’s purpose in ordaining a Sabbath day, for instead of opening up an avenue of communication between humans and their Maker, they perverted the Sabbath command into a legalistic requirement, made its observance a burden, and thus erected a formidable barrier that resulted in a distorted concept of God. The same effect results today when the Sabbath command is construed negatively, as essentially a prohibition of certain activities.

Only when the Sabbath is understood positively, as an opportunity for the development of one’s higher nature through communion with the Creator is its true purpose achieved. The valid negative prohibitions of the fourth commandment are not an end in themselves, but a necessary means to the realization of the higher, positive values with which an all-wise Creator endowed, that is, blessed, the Sabbath. It is this higher concept of the Sabbath to which Christ directs the Christian’s attention in the affirmation that “the sabbath was made for man, and not man for the sabbath.” God ordained the seventh day of the week as the day on which this dialogue between humans and their Creator should take place.

It is presumptuous to neglect the day God set apart for this purpose, and to substitute in its place a day of our own choosing—the first day of the week—for in so doing we presume to set ourselves above God. The real issue at stake in the observance of the seventh day of the week versus the first day of the week is recognition of the Creator’s transcendent claim to our loyalty versus our innate tendency to substitute our own will for that of the Creator—as Lucifer set out to do in heaven. The principle represented by the Sabbath is thus at the crux of the agelong conflict between good and evil, between Christ and Satan; and true Sabbath observance, in spirit and in truth, is a perpetual affirmation of loyalty to the Creator.

I. Biblical Theology of the Sabbath

I. Biblical Theology of the Sabbath. 1. General Considerations. The sacredness of the Sabbath derives from a divine blessing (Gen. 2:3), and is significant only in the context of humans. Nature knows no Sabbath, and neither do animals apart from their association with humans as beasts of burden (Ex. 20:10). Only human beings are conscious of the Sabbath. Thus constitutive of the Sabbath is an encounter between God and humanity in the context of a divinely blessed time. The Sabbath cannot be transferred to any other day, for no other day is the “seventh day.” Thus it may be concluded that three factors are constitutive of the Sabbath: God, human beings, and time.

2. The Sabbath and the Covenant. To Israel God declared the Sabbath to be “a sign between me and you . . . ; that ye may know that I am the Lord that doth sanctify you” (Ex. 31:13; cf. Eze. 20:12, 20). It was “a perpetual covenant” (Ex. 31:16). That the significance of the Sabbath is to be found in connection with the covenant is clear also from the Decalogue as given in Deuteronomy, which gives as the reason for the Sabbath Israel’s deliverance from Egypt (Deut. 5:15). This freedom from servitude gives meaning to the provision for the freedom of servants and animals from labor on Sabbath (“Remember that thou wast a servant”). However, more important, as a memorial of Israel’s deliverance from slavery it becomes a sign of the salvation promised in the covenant, an ever-recurring reminder of the covenant relation between Jehovah and Israel. Just as the covenant is based on God’s love for His people (Deut. 7:7, 8), so the Sabbath, as the sign of that covenant, is a sign of divine love.

The Decalogue in Exodus relates the Sabbath not to the delivery from Egypt but to Creation (Ex. 20:11; cf. 31:17). This accords with the fact that in the narrative of Genesis 1:1 to 2:3 the Sabbath is the goal and consummation of Creation. In view of the fact that the story of Creation is told as the prelude to and presupposition of, the covenant of salvation, and in such a way that it is fully understandable only in the light of the covenant, we can say that the Sabbath too, as a memorial of Creation, finds its full meaning only in terms of the covenant.

Theologically, the connection of the Sabbath with Creation is particularly significant. In harmony with the basic meaning of the Heb. shabath, “to cease,” God’s action on the seventh day was a cessation from His work of the first six, not a resting for recuperation from weariness (Isa. 40:28). That God could cease shows His freedom—that He is not a blind, ever on-running force of nature, but a God who in His sovereign freedom can will to create and will to cease creating. That God did cease shows that His work of creating was complete, and His satisfaction with what He had done is shown by the statement “It was very good” (Gen. 1:31).

Thus in the Creation, as well as in the redemption from Egypt, is the implication that the Sabbath is a sign of divine love. His sovereign decision to cease creating also involves a self-limitation, and self-limitation is the essence of covenant making (cf. Gen. 9:11). Thus the Sabbath is both the goal of Creation and the act that makes the covenant possible. At the same time divine action on the seventh day sets the pattern for human celebration of the Sabbath. It is God’s invitation to humanity to share with Him; we cannot participate in the work of the original creation, but it is possible for us to share in the divine rest.

Hence, the Sabbath forms a tie between God’s freedom and the freedom He grants us, and, in this sense, it is the one link between the Creation story in Genesis 1:1 to 2:3 and the subsequent story of redemption. At the same time, it is a recognition on our part that God is Creator, and that we are created beings. This distinction constitutes the foundation of the worship of God.

The divine action of “hallowing,” or sanctifying, the seventh day (Gen. 2:3) signifies the Sabbath’s being set apart as a time in which this divine-human relationship may flourish. The action of “blessing” the Sabbath (v. 3) implies that, in turn, the Sabbath becomes a blessing for us.

3. The Sabbath and the Law. The fact that the Sabbath is contained in the law of God as the fourth command of the Decalogue (Ex. 20:8—11; Deut. 5:12—15) is of essential significance. God’s law is a transcript of His character, and the Sabbath command is the only one of the 10 that asserts His authority as lawgiver. This speaks for the perpetuity of the Sabbath. Lying at the heart of the divine law, the Sabbath is particularly revelatory of God’s character of love. In fact, as we have already seen, it is the one of the Ten Commandments that specifically connects the law of God with the covenant of salvation.

4. The Sabbath in the New Testament. The centrality of the Sabbath both to the covenant and to the eternal law of God provides the basis for its significance to the Christian. As with the covenant, so with the Sabbath: the cross, standing at the midpoint of the history of redemption, confirms the hope to which they point, and infuses them with fuller meaning for the Christian (Jer. 31:31—34; Heb. 8:8—12).

The Sabbath becomes a symbol of the rest into which the believer enters by faith: “There remaineth therefore a rest to the people of God.” “We which have believed do enter into rest” (Heb. 4:9, 3). The reference in this context to “another day” (v. 8) parallels the idea of a “new covenant” (v. 8ff.). As the “new covenant” is not a Christian innovation, but is the everlasting covenant of salvation in its full dimension, so “another day” here is the eternal sabbath of cessation from one’s own efforts at salvation, understood and observed in the depth of Christian perspective—the rest in Jesus Christ that issues from the fulfillment of the covenant promise in Him. The Sabbath is now a memorial not only of Creation but of re-creation in Christ. As the pre-Christian Sabbath stood, in terms of the covenant, between the poles of Creation and the cross, so the Christian Sabbath stands, in terms of the same everlasting covenant, between the poles of the cross and the Second Advent.

This means also that the Sabbath in Christian perspective is divested of all legalism. Its observance, like that of the other Ten Commandments, cannot be for the purpose of salvation; rather, the Sabbath is a joyful act of thanksgiving for the gift of faith and life. It can only be kept truly by the Christian as a result of salvation. The Christian's Sabbath is thus a delight and a celebration of his or her entrance into rest in Christ Jesus.

5. The Sabbath in Prophecy. In their understanding of biblical prophecy, especially in the books of Daniel and the Revelation, SDAs have seen the issue of Sabbath observance as crucial in our day.

In describing the war of the little horn against the saints of the Most High, the declaration is made that "he . . . shall think to change times and laws" (Dan. 7:25). Identifying the little horn as the Papacy, Seventh-day Adventists have understood this to foreshadow the papal attempt to substitute Sunday observance for that of Sabbath.

Similarly in the prophecies of Revelation 12 to 14 the Sabbath is understood to play a key role. The dragon, representing satanic forces arrayed against the church, makes war against those who "keep the commandments of God" (Rev. 12:17). In such a struggle, fidelity to the Sabbath command becomes a paramount issue. This struggle is reflected again in the activities of the leopard beast (Rev. 13:1—10) and the two-horned beast (vs. 11—17), the former symbolizing the Papacy, the latter the United States. To the Papacy the dragon gives "his power, and his seat, and great authority" (v. 2). In turn, the two-horned beast, the United States, comes to exercise "all the power of the first beast" (v. 12); makes "an image to the beast" (v. 14), and is allowed to cause those who "will not worship the image of the beast" to be slain (v. 15). It also "causeth all, . . . to receive a mark in their right hand, or in their foreheads" with a "mark, or the name of the beast, or the number of his name" (vs. 16, 17). Seventh-day Adventists have understood this passage to mean that ultimately the United States will champion the cause of the Papacy and will seek to enforce the Papacy's will. The salient issue will be the observance of Sunday in place of Sabbath, and all who do not concur will eventually face the penalty of death.

Thus Sunday observance, in the context of this eschatological struggle, will constitute in the end a distinguishing mark, here spoken of as the mark of the beast. Satan has exalted Sunday as the sign of his authority, while the Sabbath will be the great test of loyalty to God. This issue will divide Christendom into two classes, and will characterize the final time of trouble for the people of God.

The same theme appears in the third angel's message of Revelation 14, which is a call for the endurance of the saints, those who "keep the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus" (v. 12). Here the issue described in Rev. 13:12—17 is seen in the context of the rise of the SDA people, proclaiming the binding chain of God's commandments, including the Sabbath, but from the point of view of faith in Jesus, which is the only valid frame of reference for observing the commandments.

II. Biblical History of the Sabbath

II. Biblical History of the Sabbath. 1. Old Testament. The institution of the "seventh day" as the Sabbath appears at the beginning of the biblical narrative—as the climax of Creation week (Gen. 2:1, 2)—but the term "sabbath" first appears in the narrative of the giving of the manna shortly after the Exodus and before Israel's arrival at Sinai (Ex. 16:22, 23). The fourth command of the Decalogue establishes the observance of the Sabbath (Ex. 20:8—11; Deut. 5:14, 15). It is also mentioned in the covenant code (Ex. 23:12) and in what has been called the "ritual decalogue" (see Ex. 34:21). In fact, of all the Ten Commandments the Sabbath command is mentioned in the Pentateuch more often than any other (Ex. 16:23; 20:8—11; 23:12; 31:12—17; 34:21; 35:1—3; Lev. 19:3; 23:1—3; 26:2; Deut. 5:14, 15).

For a consideration of current theories that propose to trace the origin of the Sabbath to the social and cultural environment of the ancient East, see sec. III.

During the history of the Israelite kingdoms the Sabbath is mentioned only a few times, but in such a way as to throw light on various aspects of its observance. Thus, when the Shunammite's son lay ill, and she asked her husband for a servant and an ass with which to visit Elisha (2 Kings 4:22, 23), he replied with surprise, "Why will you go to him today? It is neither new moon nor sabbath" (RSV). This reply suggests (1) that it was customary to visit the prophets on the Sabbath, and (2) that a journey to a prophet was possible because servants and beasts of burden were free from normal labor on that day.

It was also on the Sabbath that the royal palace guard in Jerusalem was changed (2 Kings 11:5—7), and the high priest Jehoiada took advantage of this fact to stage a coup d'état against Athaliah, since at that time he could have twice the normal number of troops at his disposal without attracting attention. During the reign of Ahaz there seems to have been some kind of "covered way for the sabbath" (2 Kings 16:18, RSV) within the palace. What this was or why it was removed "because of the king of Assyria" is unclear.

At the same time, the prophets were crying out against a formalized and hypocritical observance of the Sabbath. Isaiah declared, "I cannot endure iniquity and solemn assembly" (Isa. 1:13, RSV). Hosea prophesied, "I will put an end to all her mirth, her feasts, her new moons, her sabbaths" (Hosea 2:11, RSV). Amos bitinglly parodied his contemporaries, "When will the new moon be over, that we may sell grain? And the sabbath, that we may offer wheat for sale, that we may make the ephah small and the shekel great?" (Amos 8:5, RSV). These words also suggest that shops were regularly closed on the Sabbath. Jeremiah emphasized the importance of Sabbath observance if Jerusalem was to be saved, and implied that in previous generations the Sabbath had not been respected by the Israelites (Jer. 17:21—27).

The publication by D. J. Wiseman in 1956 of some cuneiform chronicles of the Chaldean kings of the Neo-Babylonian Empire has given a specific date for the capture of Jerusalem and of King Jehoiachin by Nebuchadnezzar—the second day of the month Adar, which is equated with considerable probability, with Mar. 16, 597 B.C. (see SB, no. 906). Some years after this publication it was recognized that this date fell on a Sabbath day. It appears also, from a similar computation, that the end of the siege of Jerusalem under Zedekiah possibly fell on a Sabbath day.

These observations have led to the conclusion that Nebuchadnezzar, like Antiochus Epiphanes, may have made it a special point to attack the Jews on the Sabbath day because they may not have resisted on that day. This cannot be proved as a certainty from the evidence at hand, but the conclusion remains a distinct possibility. (See Alger F. Johns, "The Military Strategy of Sabbath Attacks on the Jews," Vetus Testamentum 13:482—486, 4th Quarter 1963.)

With the coming of the Exile, Ezekiel repeatedly pointed to the neglect of the Sabbath as an indication of Israel's apostasy (Eze. 22:8, 26; 23:38; cf. 20:12—24). At the same time he looked forward in the portrayal of his ideal, restored Temple to a perfect observance of the Sabbath (Eze. 44:24; 45:17; 46:1—12).

This emphasis on the Sabbath as a key indication of Israel's adherence to YHWH's covenant, in both Jeremiah's denunciations before the Exile and Ezekiel's during it, is reflected in the strict concern for Sabbathkeeping evidenced by Nehemiah after the nation was restored.

In Ezra's public prayer before the people, the Sabbath is specifically mentioned: "Thou didst make known to them thy holy sabbath and command them commandments and statutes and a law by Moses thy servant" (Neh. 9:14, RSV). The written covenant that Nehemiah and the leaders of the Jews publicly sealed included a pledge not to buy from the people of the land on the Sabbath day (Neh. 10:31). The account of Nehemiah's reform tells in further detail how he enforced this pledge: When he observed men pressing wine, gathering grain and fruit, and bringing them into Jerusalem on the Sabbath, as well as foreigners bringing in and selling fish and other wares, he forbade this with the warning that in doing so they would "bring more wrath upon Israel by profaning the sabbath" (Neh. 13:18, RSV). Accordingly he ordered that the gates of Jerusalem should be shut at the beginning of the Sabbath and should not be opened until it was past. In addition, he placed guards at the gates to see that this restriction was enforced (vs. 19—22).

Psalm 92, of uncertain authorship and date, is entitled "A Psalm or Song for the sabbath day." It is a psalm of thanksgiving and praise, lauding the steadfast love and faithfulness of God. It reflects the delight of the Jew in the Sabbath and shows that, at its best, the observance of the Sabbath was an occasion of joy, thanksgiving, and exultation. The position of the Sabbath was also reflected in the services of the sanctuary, where it was marked off by special offerings and ritual. Two extra lambs with accompanying food and drink offerings were added to the regular burnt offering (Num. 28:9, 10), and on this day the showbread was replaced (Lev. 24:8).

2. The Intertestamental Period. The trends toward a strict observance of the Sabbath that began to develop during and following the Exile (Ezekiel, Ezra, Nehemiah) became particularly pronounced during the intertestamental period, and later reached their classic formulation in the Mishnah (third century A.D.). The developments of the intertestamental period are particularly significant for an understanding of the Sabbath in the NT and the early church.

a. Jewish Practice at Elephantine, Egypt. In the fifth century B.C. a colony of Jewish mercenary soldiers lived on the Nile island of Elephantine in Upper Egypt. Early in the twentieth century a collection of ancient papyri, and later more papyri and also inscribed ostraca (potsherds), were found there. These were all written in the Aramaic language and script used by the Jews of that period—the time of Ezra and Nehemiah—and many of them were dated to that time. These texts give a picture of the life of the colony on Elephantine, and reveal that these Jews mixed idolatry with the worship of the true God (see SB, Nos. 910, 911).

Because of this, and because the Sabbath was not mentioned in any of the papyri, many scholars believed that the Jews of Elephantine probably did not observe it as a day of rest. However, when the potsherds were studied in the 1940s, it was found that four of them specifically mentioned the Sabbath as a day of rest. For example, one (bearing the excavators' number 152) begins with these words: "Greetings to Yislah. Now look, I shall not send the jar tomorrow. Fasten the ox tomorrow, on the Sabbath, lest he may go astray. As Jehovah liveth!" (published by A. Dupont-Sommer in France; see Review and Herald 127:10, Mar. 23, 1950). It is quite possible that some of the Jews of Elephantine chose to follow the reforms of Ezra and Nehemiah, which involved stricter Sabbath observance (Neh. 10:31; 13:15—22). On the other hand, idolatrous Jews probably had little or no regard for the Sabbath.

b. Problem of Defense on the Sabbath. Repeatedly during this period the Jews faced the same issue they had apparently faced in the days of Nebuchadnezzar: Would they fight on the Sabbath or not? Agatharchides (second century B.C.) is cited by Josephus for the record that around 300 B.C. Ptolemy I chose to occupy Jerusalem on the Sabbath because the Jews would not fight on that day.

This problem became particularly acute during the Maccabean rebellion (168—142 B.C.). At the beginning of the war a group of insurgent Jews took refuge with their families in the caves of the Judean desert.

The Syrians pursued them and attacked them on Sabbath; the Jews refused to resist, and were slaughtered. In the light of this experience, Mattathias, the leader of the revolt, and his colleagues thereafter fought on the Sabbath, but only when attacked.

This problem appeared again in 63 B.C., when the Roman general Pompey marched on Jerusalem. Knowing of the Jews' refusal to fight on the Sabbath except in self-defense, the Romans used these days for raising earthworks against the city walls, which the Jews would do nothing to stop. After a three-month siege, Pompey was able to take the city on a Sabbath day. Again in 37 B.C., when the Romans took Jerusalem from Antigonos in order to install Herod the Great, it was on a Sabbath that the final resistance was crushed.

From the time of Julius Caesar on, the Roman authorities repeatedly issued edicts granting the Jews the right to live by their own laws, and particularly exempting them from military service and lawsuits on the Sabbath.

c. The Essenes. Probably the strictest observance of the Sabbath during this period is found among the Essenes. Of them Josephus reports: "They are stricter than any other of the Jews in resting from their labours on the seventh day; for they not only get their food ready the day before, that they may not be obliged to kindle a fire on that day, but they will not remove any vessel . . . , nor go to stool thereon" (Jos. War 2. 8. 9).

The prohibition of removing "any vessel" on the Sabbath seems to indicate a rejection of the Pharisaic provision of the 'erub—a casuistic procedure by which articles could be moved on the Sabbath. This tendency of the Essenes to observe the Sabbath more rigorously than other Jews is reflected also in the Zadokite Document, which if not Essene is at least closely allied to that kind of sectarian Judaism.

There the following are prohibited on Sabbath: empty talk, collection of debts, lawsuits, planning of or preparation for future work, walking more than 1,000 cubits outside the city, eating food not prepared in advance unless when traveling, wearing soiled clothing, or observing a voluntary fast. Especially in regard to animals the restrictions were specific: a beast was not to be taken more than 2,000 cubits from the city for pasture, was not to be struck with the hand nor forced to go out of doors, nor helped in giving birth. Even if its young were dropped into a pit, they were not to be lifted out. Here the more extreme character of the sectarian restriction is evident as compared with that of the Pharisees reflected in Matt. 12:11.

Similarly the practice of 'erub is forbidden: No one was to remove an article from his house or bring one in. Household activities in general were at a minimum: no opening of a sealed vessel, sweeping of the floor, or carrying of babies about. Slaves and hired servants were not to be constrained to work, and the hiring of a Gentile to take care of one's business on Sabbath was specifically forbidden. Many of these laws are similar to those of normative Judaism, but several are more strict.

d. The Followers of Hillel and of Shammai. Another area of difference in Sabbath practice, in the time of Herod the Great, was that between the followers of Hillel and of Shammai, two prominent Pharisaic teachers who represented liberal and conservative tendencies in the interpretation of the law. Thus, for instance, the Shammaites forbade setting nets for game if the hunter was not certain of having his catch before the beginning of the Sabbath, while the Hillelites allowed it; similarly the former forbade sending one's laundry to a Gentile, unless the work was at least to be begun before the beginning of the Sabbath; the Hillelites, however, allowed any activity as long as the Sabbath had not actually begun.

e. Sabbath Regulations in the Mishnah. The classic expression of Jewish Sabbath regulations is founded in the Mishnah, and particularly in the tractates Shabbath and 'Erubin. Here are found detailed enumerations of what sort of tasks may and may not be performed on the Sabbath, what burdens may and may not be borne, how far one may travel, and in the latter tractate, elaborate rules making possible the transfer of goods from a private to a public place. Much of the tractate Shabbath is concerned with the Thirty-nine Primary Labors prohibited on the Sabbath, and the derivation from these of subsidiary rules for the details of life.

Although these regulations did not reach their present formulation until the third century A.D., a number of their provisions are reflected in incidents described in the NT. Thus the complaint against Jesus' disciples, that they broke the Sabbath by picking ears of grain, rubbing them in their hands, and eating them (Matt. 12:1—8; Mark 2:23—28; Luke 6:1—5), seems to be related to two of the Thirty-nine Primary Labors, threshing and winnowing.

Jesus' retort to the ruler of the synagogue who criticized Him for healing the bent woman on the Sabbath was, "Doth not each one of you on the sabbath loose his ox or his ass from the stall, and lead him away to watering?" (Luke 13:15). This is paralleled in the tractate Shabbath by a series of conditions under which animals may be taken out on the Sabbath.

The condemnation of the healed paralytic for carrying his bed on the Sabbath is related to another of the forbidden Thirty-nine Primary Labors, that of removing an object from one place to another. Jesus' reference to the allowing of circumcision (John 7:22) is paralleled by the general provision that all things necessary for circumcision are lawful on the Sabbath.

At the same time, in some instances the Jewish attitudes reflected in the Gospels appear more severe than those found in classical Judaism. Thus as W.O.E. Oesterley has pointed out, the repeated criticism of Jesus for healing on the Sabbath (e.g., Matt. 12:9—13; Luke 14:1—6; John 5:1—16) seems out of harmony with provisions in the Mishnah, allowing certain healing procedures, although this seeming difference may possibly be explained by the fact that Jesus' healings were performed on chronic cases.

More striking is the abstention of the women from embalming Jesus' body on the Sabbath (Luke 23:54—56), which reflects a stricter practice than that allowed by the Mishnah. The latter declares, "All the requirements of the dead may be done [on the Sabbath], he may be anointed with oil and washed" (Shabbath 23.5). See SB, no. 1373.

3. New Testament.

a. Jesus and the Sabbath. The Gospels contain four sayings of Jesus regarding the Sabbath: Mark 2:27, 28 (= Matt. 12:8; Luke 6:5); Mark 3:4 (= Matt. 12:12; Luke 6:9); Matt. 12:11, 12; Luke 14:5. In Mark 2:27, 28, the declaration “the sabbath was made for man, not man for the sabbath; so the Son of man is lord even of the sabbath” (RSV) is Jesus’ response to the Pharisees’ complaint that His disciples transgressed the Sabbath by plucking grain. Neither in these words nor in His appeal to the example of David in eating the showbread does Jesus claim that His disciples had not broken the Sabbath, as far as the Jewish point of view is concerned. Rather, in Matthew’s words, He declares them guiltless in view of the underlying purpose of the Sabbath—the well-being of humanity. This, no Sabbath proscription can override.

Late in the second century a rabbinic dictum states: “The Sabbath is given to you; you are not given over to the Sabbath.” This dictum, however, is directed only toward situations in which life is in danger, while Jesus takes as His criterion the whole scope of human welfare (see Strack and Billerbeck, Kommentar zum Neuen Testament, vol. 2, p. 15).

In each of Jesus’ miracles of healing on the Sabbath the basic thought is the same: “Is it lawful on the sabbath to do good or to do harm, to save life or to kill?” (Mark 3:4, RSV). This, in the context of the fact that Jesus’ recorded Sabbath healings were consistently performed on chronic cases who were not in immediate danger of death (Mark 3:1—5; Luke 13:10—17; 14:1—6; John 5:1—15; 9:1—17), points to the conclusion that in these actions a dimension deeper than merely a physical healing is involved.

Encounter with Jesus was a matter of life and death. If, as the Jews recognized, the Sabbath might be “transgressed” for the purpose of saving life, then every encounter with Jesus, every healing, whether of a chronic case or not, was a question of life that no Sabbath proscription could supersede. Thus when condemned for healing the man who had been infirm 38 years, He could reply, “My Father is working still, and I am working” (John 5:17, RSV).

From the point of view of their immediate context Jesus’ disputes with the Pharisees over the Sabbath appear to have been attempts to bring a greater humanitarian concern to bear on the Sabbath laws, and a deeper insight into the basic purpose of the Sabbath. Jesus’ custom of attending the synagogue on Sabbath (Mark 1:21; 6:2; Luke 4:16, 31; 13:10) and participating in its services demonstrates His positive attitude toward this institution as a time of worship.

b. Paul and the Sabbath. Paul’s only direct reference to the Sabbath is in Colossians 2:16, 17: “Let no man therefore judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of an holyday, or of the new moon, or of the sabbath days: which are a shadow of things to come; but the body is of Christ.”

Some commentators have suggested that Paul here does not speak of a “ceremonial” sabbath or annual feast day. They infer this from the sequence “festival or a new moon or a sabbath” (v. 16, RSV) representing the yearly, the monthly, and the weekly days of observance, a sequence of terms (or its reverse) that occurs frequently in the OT (2 Chron. 2:4; 8:13; Neh. 10:33; Eze. 45:17; Hosea 2:11). Furthermore, they point out that the ceremonial sabbaths are already included in the word “festival” (Heb. mô‘ed; Gr. heortē). It is true that as observed by the Jews certain ritual requirements were prescribed for the weekly Sabbath (Num. 28:9, 10; etc.). In addition, a long list of rabbinical prohibitions was later attached to its observance. Thus, even if it be understood that Paul here refers to the weekly Sabbath, his concern would be with the ritual observance of the day as part and parcel of the works-righteousness concept of rabbinical Judaism. Even in OT times such observance of the Sabbath was repugnant to God (Isa. 1:11–15).

But the Sabbath antedated the ritual system, and was basically moral in nature. Its later inclusion within the framework of the ritual system did not—in fact, could not—deprive it of its perpetual moral quality, and when the ritual observances attached to the Sabbath in OT times lost their validity at the cross, its basic moral quality and the moral obligation to observe it remained.

Seventh-day Adventists, however, have usually held that since the context deals with ritual matters, the sabbaths here referred to are the ceremonial sabbaths of the Jewish annual festivals “which are a shadow,” or type, of which the fulfillments were to come in Christ; that although the sequence of terms might appear to class the Sabbath with the ceremonial holy days, the rhetorical form cannot outweigh the facts established elsewhere in the Bible, that the types and symbols extending only to Christ do not include the Sabbath of the Decalogue. For the seven annual rest days of the ritual system, which might fall on any day of the week, see Sabbaths, Annual.

A passage closely related to Colossians 2:16 is Galatians 4:10: “You observe days, and months, and seasons, and years. I am afraid I have labored over you in vain” (RSV). The context of this passage, referring to the Galatians’ slavery to the “elemental spirits of the universe” (vs. 3, 9), as well as Colossians 2:18, which speaks of the Colossians’ “worship of angels,” has led some scholars to associate these heresies with some type of sectarian Judaism similar to that of Qumrân, instead of with normative Judaism.

In certain parts of the Qumrân literature (Jubilees, 1 Enoch), much is made of the angels, and particularly of the fallen angels, who are understood to dominate the heathen world. Angels, both good and evil, were also identified with the stars (or planets). There is ample evidence that in the first century the veneration of the planets was widespread among the Jews. W. Rordorf has argued convincingly that from the first century B.C. onward Saturn, considered an unlucky star, was associated in many Jewish minds with the celebration of Sabbath (Der Sonntag, pp. 32, n. 24; 28–37). All this points toward the conclusion that Paul’s declarations concerning the observance of days are probably to be understood in the context of a Judaizing legalism encrusted with an aberrant, sectarian veneration of angels and heavenly bodies.

In his evangelistic travels Paul followed the practice of attending Jewish synagogues (Acts 13:14; 14:1; 16:13; 17:1, 2, 10, 17; 18:4, 19; 19:8). Wherever there was a Jewish community or synagogue, there he went first on the Sabbath to preach Christ. Only when the Jews refused to tolerate him did he move his base of operation elsewhere (Acts 18:6, 7; 19:8, 9). The nature of the synagogue service, in which visiting rabbis were often invited to participate in the Scripture reading and sermon, provided an ideal opportunity for him (Acts 13:14–41), as it had for Jesus (Luke 4:16f.). In this action he seems to have been following the example of Jesus Himself. (Luke’s consciousness of this is probably reflected by his almost identical phraseology in Luke 4:16 and Acts 17:2.) Just as Jesus’ action implied approval of Sabbath worship, so did Paul’s.

c. The Lord’s Day in Revelation. John the revelator declares that his initial vision was given when he “was in the Spirit on the Lord’s day” (Rev. 1:10). Seventh-day Adventists have understood this as a reference to the Sabbath because: (1) It is a unique expression in Scripture, where the only day ever identified with the Lord is the Sabbath (Isa. 58:13; Mark 2:28): (2) the earliest unequivocal reference to the “Lord’s day” as Sunday does not appear till late in the second century (in the apocryphal Gospel According to Peter 9, 12). For a fuller discussion of this problem, see SDACom 7:735, 736.

III. Theories on the Origin of the Sabbath

III. Theories on the Origin of the Sabbath. As a matter of information, the following discussion and evaluation of current theories about the origin of the Sabbath are included.

Following are the main theories on the origin of the Sabbath in Israel’s history:

1. The Babylonian Theory. The view has been proposed frequently that the Sabbath was derived from Babylonian practices revealed in cuneiform documents, and particularly in connection with the Babylonian word šapattu.

A century ago Henry Rawlinson published a Babylonian text listing synonyms in parallel columns: here šapattu is defined as ūm nūh libbi, “a day of rest of the [gods’] heart.” The word also appears in the Babylonian Creation Epic, where it refers to the full-moon day at the middle of the lunar month. Its use is attested in a letter as far back as the First Dynasty of Babylon (eighteenth century B.C.): “The [new] moon, the seventh day and the full moon [ša-pa-at-ta-am] complete as has been shown to thee” (E. G. Kraeling, American Journal of Semitic Languages and Literatures 49:220, April 1933).

In another lexicographical tablet the term šapattu is applied similarly to the fifteenth day of the month. On this day the king was to observe a number of prohibitions: he must not ride in a chariot, make public appearances, eat cooked meat, or wear white garments—lest the gods be displeased. Thus the Babylonian šapattu was an unlucky day on which the gods were to be appeased.

Another Babylonian tablet lists the days of the intercalary month of Second Elul, naming the god to which each day of the month was sacred and the liturgies to be performed that day. On the seventh, fourteenth, nineteenth, twenty-first, and twenty-eighth days of this month the king was to observe the same restrictions of activity as on the šapattu. To many it has appeared logical to conclude that in view of these recurrent days on which the king rested from his usual activities in a cycle of approximately every seven days, the Hebrew Sabbath had its origin in Babylonian religious practice.

An ingenious variation of this theory, worked out by Johannes Meinhold (Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft 29:81—112, April 1909; ibid. N.S. 7:121—138, June 1930), has attracted considerable attention. Recognizing that šapattu, as the fifteenth day of the lunar month, was the full moon, and that “new moon and Sabbath” appear together repeatedly in the OT (2 Kings 4:23; Isa. 1:13; Hosea 2:11; Amos 8:5), Meinhold proposes the view that the Sabbath among the Israelites was originally a monthly full-moon festival rather than one falling every seven days. At a point before the Exile he sees the Israelites having begun to celebrate a weekly rest day during plowing time and harvest (Ex. 34:21), and eventually extending the practice throughout the year. He thinks that eventually, perhaps under Nehemiah, the name “Sabbath” was transferred from the monthly to the weekly festival.

This reconstruction is untenable for a number of reasons: There is no convincing evidence that the Israelites ever called their full-moon festival the Sabbath (the Heb. word for this is kese', as in Ps. 81:3). The transfer of a name from a lunar festival to a free-running weekly cycle is hardly probable, and research has led to the conclusion that the weekly Sabbath can be traced back much too early to fit Meinhold's theory. Furthermore, the recurrence of the mention of new moon and Sabbath together is sufficiently explained by the fact that these two festivals, unlike all the others, were not yearly.

While the Babylonian šapattu may be related in some indirect way to the Hebrew Sabbath, it has been pointed out repeatedly that in character and practice the two institutions are almost diametrically opposed.

The Hebrew Sabbath was devoted always to Jehovah; the restrictions placed on work extended to the whole population and not only to the ruler: the Sabbath was not an unlucky day or one on which Jehovah was to be propitiated (though as North has pointed out, there may be indeed some connection between these ideas and that of holiness). There is nothing of the taboo in the Hebrew restrictions on the Sabbath.

The Hebrew Sabbath was not a lunar festival reckoned in terms of the lunar month as were the Babylonian days of prohibition, but was entirely free from lunar reckoning and ran with complete independence of the monthly cycle. No proof has yet been forthcoming that the term šapattu applied to the fifteenth day or was ever used of the unlucky days in a Babylonian seven-day cycle; nor indeed has a clear etymological relation between Heb. shabbath and Babylonian šapattu been established.

Thus it is clear that whatever historical interrelationships there may have been between the two institutions, the Hebrew Sabbath, in both its observance and its inner meaning, stands completely apart from its Babylonian parallel. It is to be understood entirely from the point of view of Israel's faith in, and covenant with, Jehovah.

2. The Market Day Explanation. A sociological explanation of the origin of the Sabbath has been advanced by Max Weber (Aufsätze zur Religionssoziologie III [1921], 159^f), Eduard Meyer (Geschichte des Altertums II², 2, 318^f; both as cited by Kraeling [American Journal of Semitic Languages and Literatures 49: 226—228]) and others. They see the seven-day cycle as a market week and point to Amos 8:5 and Neh. 13:15 as indicative of attempts to enhance the religious observance of the Sabbath at the expense of its original function as the market day. This explanation is not plausible, however, because there is no clear evidence of a market week in Palestine, and the passages cited may equally well be taken to mean that trading on Sabbath was an innovation in the face of an original prohibition against it.

3. A Calendrical Theory. A calendrical explanation has been offered by Julius and Hildegard Lewy (Hebrew Union College Annual 17:1—152, 1942—1943) and popularized by Julian Morgenstern (Vetus Testamentum 5:34—76, January 1955, and especially "Sabbath," Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible [New York, 1962], IV, 135—137). They posit an essentially agricultural calendar as having been used widely in Mesopotamia, Syria, Palestine, and Cappadocia, particularly during the second millennium B.C. This calendar is supposed to have divided the year into seven hamûstu, or fifties," i.e., periods of 50 days each, which the Lewys have called "pentecontads." Each pentecontad thus consisted of seven weeks plus one day, this final day standing outside the weekly cycle and regularly breaking its continuity. In order to coordinate this with the solar year, which was essential for agricultural purposes, in Palestine two periods of seven days each were supposed to have been intercalated (one following the fourth pentecontad, the other following the seventh), plus one additional sacred day. These are described as festival periods consisting of sacred days (the second period being the Feast of Unleavened Bread). One pentecontad they see reflected in Lev. 23:9—21, the “morrow after the sabbath” (vs. 11, 15) being the New Year’s Day following the seven final days of the year (days of Unleavened Bread); the fiftieth day, “the morrow after the seventh sabbath” (v. 16), on which the first fruits were offered, would be the festival terminating the first pentecontad of the new year.

Morgenstern sees this calendar, based on the number seven in terms of a recurring (though broken) seven-day cycle, as the setting in which both the Hebrew Sabbath and the Babylonian šapattu arose, albeit independently of each other.

The theory of the pentecontad calendar has not met with wide acceptance. It fails to demonstrate how the supposedly broken weekly cycle became an unbroken one independent of any lunar or solar reckoning. However, further investigation has shown that the hamûstu periods, on which the pentecontad idea is predicated, could not have been as long as 50 days.

4. The Kenite Theory. Other scholars have sought the origin of the Sabbath in connection with the seven planets (i.e., the five visible to the ancients plus the sun and moon), and particularly in a supposed worship of Saturn. Amos 5:25, 26 is understood to mean that as far back as the wilderness period the Hebrews worshiped a star god. The context of such worship they find in the Kenites, a branch of the Midianites among whom Moses settled on his flight from Egypt (Ex. 2:15; Judges 1:16), and where—according to this theory—he first came to worship Yahweh (Ex. 3:15; 6:2, 3).

These Kenites met Israel in the wilderness (Ex. 18), and lived on with them in Canaan (Judges 1:16; 4:17), where their descendants, the Rechabites (1 Chron. 2:55), appear both in the time of Jehu (2 Kings 10:23) and of Jeremiah (Jer. 35) as zealous worshipers of Yahweh and conservators of the primitive wilderness way of life.

Those who hold this theory identify the name Kenite with the name Cain, which in Aramaic and Arabic means “smith” (citing Gen. 4:22, where one of Cain’s descendants, Tubal-cain, is said to have been a smith, also Jael, whose husband was a Kenite, and who was in possession of a hammer; Judges 4:17). This, in turn, they relate to Ex. 35:3, where the kindling of fire on the Sabbath is particularly forbidden, and to Num. 15:32, where a man is executed for gathering sticks on the Sabbath (to build a fire). If the Kenites were smiths, it follows that a prohibition to kindle fire would have been tantamount to a prohibition of work. All these evidences are interrelated to suggest that the Kenites were a Midianite tribe of smiths who worshiped Saturn, and as a part of this worship, abstained from work on the seventh day which, as Saturn’s day, was considered unlucky. From them, so the theory concludes, the Israelites received both Yahweh worship and the Sabbath.

This theory, to the extent that it is associated with Saturn-worship, is hardly convincing, because it offers no proof for its basic premise, that the Kenites were worshipers of Saturn, nor indeed that a planetary week (even a week tied to only one planet) existed this early. Actually, not only is there no certain proof of the planetary week earlier than the first century of the Christian Era, but the evidence is against its existence earlier than the Hellenistic period (see SB, no. 1767).

Intriguing as some find it to think that Moses' connections with the Midianites may have had a significant influence on Israelite religion and law as promulgated by him, Rowley's explanation rests on theories of history and literature for which there is no evidence.

5. Evaluation of Theories. Seventh-day Adventists reject the above theories that attempt to find the origin of the Sabbath in the context of the social and religious history of the ancient Near East and point to the divine institution of the day on the seventh day of Creation week.

IV. Sabbath in Church History

IV. Sabbath in Church History. 1. In the Early Centuries. It is assumed by most modern Christians that from apostolic times, if not from the very resurrection of Christ, Sunday replaced the Sabbath. However, the New Testament references to the first day of the week do not bear out this assumption (see Sunday).

The introduction of Sunday as a day commemorating the resurrection of Christ did not preclude the continuance of Sabbathkeeping; in fact, the original Christians observed the Sabbath as a matter of course, and some Christians later adopted Sunday also, observing both. The celebration of both days side by side is attested for centuries after the observance of Sunday began.

Even though Sunday was a prominent day of religious observance, at least by the end of the second century and perhaps earlier (see Present Truth 1:82, Nov. 1850), it was not at first celebrated as a "sabbath." Sunday meetings were held in honor of the creation of the world, the resurrection of Christ, and the "eighth-day circumcision" of the Christian from sin, but not in obedience to the fourth commandment.

New Testament truths were rapidly distorted in the early church. Justification by faith gave way to legalism in the second century, and the doctrines of the nature of humans, the nature of Christ, and the authority of Scripture were seriously deformed. The Sabbath, designed to hold as a reminder of God's creative and redemptive power, suffered similarly. Paul wrote that "the mystery of iniquity" (or "lawlessness," RSV) was already at work (2 Thess. 2:7), and the evidence from early Christian writers confirms his report. Because the truth about the Sabbath is to be found in the Bible rather than in tradition, neither the statements nor the practices of early Christians outside the Bible can alter its binding authority for people today.

Information from documents of that period as to the practice of Christians in the early centuries with regard to the observance of Sabbath or Sunday is extremely limited and scattered, and any interpretation of the data must remain tentative. None of it rules out the possibility that in the second and third centuries large groups of non-Jewish Christians observed the Sabbath in accordance with the commandment and with the gospel; extant source documents neither prove nor disprove this.

Christians who did not keep the Sabbath, even as early as the second century, wrote against it. The heretical Christians who, from around A.D. 140 on adopted Gnosticism, considered the Sabbath to be a memorial of the God of the OT, a God whom some Gnostics held to be evil. Other prominent heretics, the Montanists, who arose in Asia Minor about A.D. 175, seem to have ignored the Sabbath in spite of their enthusiasm for spiritual reform.

In the church also were those who despised the Sabbath. Justin Martyr (c. 150), of Rome, alleged that it had been given to the Jews only, because they were notoriously hardhearted. Irenaeus (c. 185) dispensed with the Sabbath commandment as unnecessary for Christians, as well as for Abraham and the other patriarchs before Moses.

In North Africa, at the beginning of the third century, Tertullian echoed both Justin and Irenaeus. In Syria, in the middle of the century, the Didascalia Apostolorum ordered Jewish converts to Christianity to give up the Sabbath as part of the Mosaic legislation that was done away in Christ. In Petau, at the end of the century, Victorinus urged his readers to fast on Sabbath in order to avoid any appearance of keeping the Sabbath like the Jews. Christ, he alleged, hated the Sabbath and abolished it.

An interesting apocryphal statement attributed to Christ appears in Oxyrhynchus Papyrus 1, published in the 1890s: “Except ye sabbatize the Sabbath ye shall not see the Father” (see Barnard P. Grenfell and Arthur S. Hunt, Oxyrhynchus Papyri, part 1, pp. 1—3). The same saying was found at Chenoboskion, Egypt, about 1945, incorporated into the Gnostic Gospel of Thomas (A. Guillaumont and others, The Gospel According to Thomas, p. 19). Scholars generally hold that the statement originated at least by A.D. 140. If, as indications suggest, it arose among Jewish-Christian congregations in Syria, it would show a strong regard for the Sabbath among these Christians. On the other hand, its occurrence in the Gospel of Thomas is of doubtful historical significance, because the Gnostics had a remarkable facility for allegorizing the plainest scriptures. The same is true of the assertion in the second-century Gospel of Truth, also found at Chenoboskion about 1945, that the Sabbath is the day “on which salvation should not be idle,” because of the strong possibility that it arose among the Valentinian Gnostics, who also spiritualized Scripture.

Justin Martyr, who was the first-known writer to mention weekly Sunday worship, speaks disparagingly in his Dialogue With Trypho (ch.42) of Jewish Christians and their Gentile converts who observed the Sabbath. Tertullian, in the next century, mentions those who insisted on showing the same respect to Sabbath as to Sunday by standing (instead of kneeling) in prayer in church on those days (On Prayer ch.23, SB, no. 1409g).

In the fourth century the so-called Apostolic Constitutions taught that the Sabbath ought to be observed because it is the memorial of Creation, and that slaves should be worked only five days a week, so that on both Sabbaths and Sundays they might have leisure to attend church (SB, no. 1414). At the same time Pseudo-Ignatius taught the observance of both days (SB, no. 1411).

2. Hostility Toward Sabbath Rest. The conversion of Constantine in the fourth century and his legalizing of Sunday as a day of rest in 321 (see Sunday Laws) gave Sunday an advantage, but it did not forbid Sabbath observance. The first prohibition against resting on the Sabbath day came from the church.

The Council of Laodicea (date unknown, but somewhere between 343 and 381) commanded Christians to rest on the “Lord’s Day” if possible, and forbade resting on the Sabbath. Yet at the same time it required that the Gospels be read in public worship on the Sabbath. It also stipulated that during Lent both Sabbath and “the Lord’s Day,” and only these two days, should be considered festal days each week (see SB, no. 1416).

In Egypt, at about this same time, monks in the new monastic movement held religious services on both Sabbath and Sunday—and only on these days—each week.

At the end of the fourth century two leaders born in Asia Minor spoke highly of Sabbath and Sunday: Asterius of Amasea, a bishop in Pontus, spoke of the two days as a beautiful team, the “mothers and nurses” of the church; while Gregory of Nyssa called them “sisters” (see SB, Nos. 1418, 1424).

It is notable that the Ethiopian church, founded in the fourth century, observed the Sabbath as a day of complete rest along with Sunday.

At the beginning of the fifth century Augustine in North Africa preached on Sabbath, as well as on Sunday (see his Sermon 128); and Epiphanius of Constantia observed that in certain places assemblies were held on both Sabbath and Sunday (see SB, no. 1417). By the middle of the fifth century the custom of holding meetings on both Sabbath and Sunday was so widespread that Socrates of Constantinople wrote that it was then being done in “almost all churches throughout the world” except, on account of some “ancient tradition,” in Alexandria and Rome (see SB, no. 1428b).

It is, of course, significant that Socrates had to except Rome and Alexandria. The hostility of the Roman Church to the seventh-day Sabbath was one of its characteristics in the early centuries, as evidenced not only by its ceasing to hold meetings on that day but also by its practice of downgrading the Sabbath by making it a fast day (see SB, no. 1425). Further, about 600, Pope Gregory I denounced as preachers of antichrist those who were teaching in Rome that work should not be done on the Sabbath (see SB, no. 1431).

3. The Sabbath in Later Centuries. There is a hint of Sabbathkeeping in the British Isles in the sixth century, in the time of Columba (A.D. 521—597), who left Ireland and founded a religious community off the western coast of Scotland on the island of Iona (see SB, no. 1460; cf. GC 62).

From the end of the eighth to the twelfth centuries flourished the Athinganoi, “touch nots,” of Phrygia, in Asia Minor, who were accused of being neither Christians nor Jews because they observed the seventh-day Sabbath but did not practice circumcision. The accounts of their heretical practices, which hint of connections with Jews and Cathari, are not clear (Joshua Starr, “An Eastern Christian Sect: The Athinganoi,” Harvard Theological Review 29:93—106, April 1936).

In the twelfth century numerous sects flourished in Western Europe. One of these groups, the Pasaginians (Passagii, Pasagini), observed the seventh-day Sabbath (SB, no. 1461). A Catholic document from about 1200 describes them as “opposing us in general, then in particular, as concerning the observance of the Sabbath, circumcision, the distinction of foods those mentioned in [Acts 16:28] and certain other things” (tr. from Summa Contra Haereticos, ch. 6 A, sec. I; p. 92 in the edition of J. N. Garvin and J. A. Corbett, vol. 15 of Publications in Mediaeval Studies).

The Pasaginians were first mentioned in the condemnation of heretics by the Synod of Verona under Pope Lucius III (1184), but without any statement of their beliefs, and they seem to have survived until late in the thirteenth century, when Clement IV (1267) and Gregory X (1274) directed the inquisitors to punish as heretics Christians who adopted Jewish rites. Some think it probable that the sect originated from the contacts of Christians with influential Jews (O. Zöckler, The New Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge, vol. 8, pp. 361, 362).

In the fifteenth century there were Sabbathkeepers in Norway, and in the next century in Sweden and Finland. The Ethiopians had continued the practice of observing both days and were weaned away from the Sabbath only after the Jesuits arrived in the country about 1600 (see SB, Nos. 1462—1465).

Some of the Waldensians also observed the Sabbath. There is no record of any Sabbath-keepers among the remnant that still survive in the north Italian Alps, but there is record of some in one of the many groups formerly widespread over Europe who bore the Waldensian name. Among the Waldensian Brethren, composed of Waldensian and Hussite elements, there were some who observed the Sabbath (see SB, no. 1469; cf. GC 577).

4. Sabbathkeepers in Modern Europe. The Sabbath was discussed in the Reformation—Eck taunted Luther with the change of the Sabbath as an example of the authority of the church, and Karlstadt, Luther’s coworker, spoke doubtfully about Sunday (see SB, Nos. 1445, 1374). Yet the Reformers retained Sunday as the church’s rest day.

The Seventh Day Baptists of England (see SB, no. 199), who probably rose late in the sixteenth century, were severely persecuted by Protestants, and one of their leaders, Francis Bampfield, died in prison. The first Seventh Day Baptist church was established in America under the leadership of Stephen Mumford in 1671.

According to Schwenkfeld, some of the Anabaptists who were ostracized by the Reformers, and who lived mostly in Germany, the Netherlands, Switzerland, Moravia, and Sweden, held Sunday to be the pope’s invention and called the elimination of the Sabbath “the devil’s work.” In Hungary and Transylvania there were Sabbatarians found among the Unitarians (c. 1571). In 1635 they were enjoined to unite with the major confessions or lose life and property. In Scandinavia councils outlawed Sabbath observance as Jewish and heathenish (see SB, Nos. 1466—1468).

In Russia the Subotniki observed the Sabbath since the fifteenth century. In the eighteenth century they numbered in the thousands. Many suffered persecution in the early nineteenth century, and hundreds were banished to Siberia or the Crimea. Some outwardly joined the Orthodox Church but inwardly continued to believe in the Sabbath. Sabbathkeepers still survived in Russia, as well as in Germany—Silesia, Württemberg, Hesse—into the twentieth century, and some became Seventh-day Adventists (J. N. Andrews and L. R. Conradi, History of the Sabbath, pp. 751, 752).

Count Nicolaus von Zinzendorf observed both days, the Sabbath for rest and Sunday for preaching the gospel (see SB, no. 1470). Spangenberg, Zinzendorf’s successor, relates concerning the count’s visit to the Moravians of Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, in 1741: “He also resolved, with the church at Bethlehem, to keep the seventh day as a day of rest” (August G. Spangenberg, The Life of . . . Count Zinzendorf, tr. Samuel Jackson, p. 302).

Before Spangenberg’s time there were German Sabbathkeepers in Pennsylvania, in the counties of Lancaster, York, and Bedford. They maintained a community at Ephrata in Lancaster County, where they practiced the washing of the feet and trine immersion, and a monastic order.

V. The Sabbath Among Adventists

V. The Sabbath Among Adventists. During the Adventist movement of the 1840s “the obligation of the seventh day as the Christian Sabbath” was discussed, for example, by J. A. Begg, of Glasgow, Scotland, a writer of books on the Second Advent, who wrote letters to the Millerite paper The Signs of the Times. He later became a Seventh Day Baptist.

The Seventh Day Baptists in America, organized as a General Conference in 1802, with a membership of 1,130 members, began publication of the Sabbath Recorder. When that paper called for a revival of the Sabbath in the winter of 1844—1845, it was read by many Adventists, and there were individuals among the Millerites before “the disappointment” of Oct. 22, 1844, who had “their minds deeply exercised respecting a supposed obligation to observe the seventh day” (The Midnight Cry, Sept. 5 and Sept. 12, 1844).

1. Sabbathkeeping in Washington, New Hampshire. Washington, New Hampshire, is generally regarded as the place where Sabbathkeeping was first practiced by Adventist believers. In 1843—1844 most of the members of the Christian Brethren Church in Washington, New Hampshire, were stirred by the Millerite message, and were looking for “their redemption.” It was through the influence of Mrs. Rachel Oakes (later Preston), a Seventh Day Baptist, who distributed Seventh Day Baptist publications among them, that the Sabbath was brought to the attention of this group. Frederick Wheeler, a Methodist (and Adventist) minister who preached in this congregation, began to observe the Sabbath, according to his later account, in March 1844. Then several of the Farnsworth family and a few others accepted the Sabbath, and thus began the first group of Sabbatarian Adventists; this happened either in the spring and summer of 1844 or, according to a differing account, late in the year (see Washington, New Hampshire, Church). In the beginning, these first Adventist Sabbathkeepers accepted the Sabbath from the Seventh Day Baptist point of view, and not until 1850 did they become part of the little group that was teaching the Sabbath as a key doctrine of the “third angel’s message” (of Rev. 14), that is the nucleus of the Seventh-day Adventist Church (see sec. 3 below). Some years later the church building passed into the hands of this Sabbathkeeping group, which was organized as a Seventh-day Adventist church in 1862.

2. Preble and Bates Write on the Sabbath. T. M. Preble, a prominent Millerite minister who frequently wrote for Adventist papers, lived not far from Washington, New Hampshire. It is probable, although not proved, that he learned of the Sabbath through contact with someone in the Washington Christian church. In any case, he began to keep it about the middle of August 1844. His article in the Hope of Israel, later reprinted as a tract, brought the subject of the Sabbath to many Adventists (Hope of Israel, Feb. 28, 1845, as quoted in the Review and Herald 36:73, Aug. 23, 1870).

Preble’s article convinced Joseph Bates that there never had been any change in the day (Joseph Bates, The Seventh Day, a Perpetual Sign [1846], p. 40). Preble’s statement “Thus we see Dan. vii:25 fulfilled, the ‘little horn’ changing ‘times and laws’ especially impressed him, and the comment that “all who keep the first day of the week for ‘the Sabbath’ are the Pope’s Sunday Keepers!! and God’s Sabbath Breakers!!” (T. M. Preble, Tract Showing That the Seventh Day Should Be Observed as the Sabbath, p. 10).

Having heard of persons in Washington, New Hampshire, who had begun keeping the Sabbath, Bates traveled nearly 150 miles (240 kilometers) to Frederick Wheeler, and then to the Farnsworths at Washington, New Hampshire. Then in 1846 Bates presented Sabbathkeeping as he saw it in a 39-page tract, The Opening Heavens (published in May), in which he expressed his deep conviction that keeping the Sabbath was Bible truth (pp. 3, 35, 36). But his most effective testimony came in his 48-page tract entitled The Seventh-day Sabbath a Perpetual Sign, which came out in August 1846 and proved a mighty instrument in the propagation of the Sabbath truth. As J. B. Cook, a prominent Adventist minister, writing on the Sabbath in O.R.L. Crosier's paper, the Day-Dawn, commented: "Brother Bates' pamphlet on the Sabbath is good" (Day-Dawn, Dec. 16, 1846, quoted in Review and Herald 2:11, Aug. 19, 1851). Crosier learned of the Sabbath from Bates, along with Hiram Edson, but observed it only a short time.

3. James and Ellen White Accept the Sabbath Truth. Possibly the first contact that Ellen Harmon had with the Sabbath was in 1846 when, with her sister and James White, she visited Joseph Bates, in New Bedford, Massachusetts (Joseph Bates, "Testimonial," Review and Herald 17:152, Mar. 26, 1861; also LS 95). At that time they did not accept Bates's Sabbath views.

James White and Ellen Harmon were married Aug. 30, 1846, the same month in which Bates's Sabbath tract appeared. The Whites received a copy, and the scriptural evidence led them to take their stand. "In the autumn of 1846," Ellen White wrote, "we began to observe the Bible Sabbath, and to teach and defend it" (1T 75). There were then about 25 Adventists in Maine who observed the Sabbath, and about the same number in other places in New England (1T 77).

It should be noted that Mrs. White kept the seventh-day Sabbath before she had a vision on the subject: "I believed the truth upon the Sabbath question before I had seen anything in vision in reference to the Sabbath. It was months after I had commenced keeping the Sabbath before I was shown its importance and its place in the third angel's message" (Ellen White letter 2, 1874).

This vision on the importance of the Sabbath came to Mrs. White the first Sabbath in April 1847 (EW 32—35), some seven months after the Whites had begun to keep and teach the Sabbath. She sent a description of the scenes of this vision to Joseph Bates at New Bedford in a letter that he shortly afterward published as a broadside. Thus, generally speaking, the seventh-day Sabbath came to the earliest Adventists through earnest Bible study and prayer, and only later did a vision corroborate their belief.

While the Sabbathkeeping Adventists were not organized, they began in 1848 to hold a series of small local conferences, which later came to be called "Sabbath conferences," because they were groups of "friends of the Sabbath" meeting "in the interest of the Third Angel's Message." The first convened in Rocky Hill, Connecticut, on April 20; others were held in New York and elsewhere in New England. Various points of doctrine were studied, especially the Sabbath. From these conferences the Sabbath and the third angel's message (Rev. 14:9—12) emerged as a basic part of the Advent message (see Three Angels' Messages).

4. Time of Beginning the Sabbath. Not yet settled was the matter of the time of day when Sabbath observance should begin and when it should end. Joseph Bates, so prominent in advocating Sabbathkeeping, was of the opinion that "the Sabbath commences at 6:00 p.m. on what is called Friday" (Joseph Bates, in Review and Herald 1:71, Apr. 21, 1851). Diversity of opinion continued for a number of years. Some favored the beginning as of 6:00, but James White wrote in 1855: "We have never been fully satisfied with the testimony presented in favor of six o'clock. . . . The subject has troubled us, yet we have never found time to thoroughly investigate it" (James White, in Review and Herald 7:78, Dec. 4, 1855).

Finally, J. N. Andrews was requested to give the matter thorough investigation. His article in which he demonstrated from OT and NT texts that "even" meant sunset (Review and Herald 7:76—78, Dec. 4, 1855) was read in a "general conference" late in 1855. As a result nearly all accepted his solution to the question. However, Joseph Bates and Mrs. White for a time held to the 6:00 position. At the close of the conference Mrs. White was shown in vision that the Sabbath should begin at sunset and close at sunset. Of this James White wrote in 1868: "This settled the matter with Brother Bates and others, and general harmony has since prevailed among us upon this point" (Review and Herald 31:168, Feb. 25, 1868).

5. Sabbath Related to Prophecy. When Seventh-day Adventists adopted the doctrine of the Sabbath from the Seventh Day Baptists, they also adopted the latter's explanation about the Sabbath being "changed" to Sunday. As long ago as the seventeenth century, Seventh Day Baptists in Europe, such as Dr. Peter Chamberlen and others, had associated the change of the Sabbath with the prophecy of the little horn of Daniel 7 and with mystical Babylon, the scarlet woman, and one of the beasts of Revelation (L. E. Froom, Prophetic Faith of Our Fathers, vol. 4, pp. 919, 908—916). In 1847 the Seventh Day Baptists' American Sabbath Tract Society reprinted George Carlow's Truth Defended, a defense of the Sabbath based partly on historical grounds, which had been issued originally in 1724 (Seventh Day Baptists in Europe and America, 1910, vol. 2, pp. 1339—1341; see extracts in Present Truth 1:70—71, April 1850). In 1852 the society published a bound volume of 17 tracts on the Sabbath, most of which had been issued separately in the 1840s or earlier.

The first Adventist to write on the history of the change of the Sabbath was Joseph Bates. (T. M. Preble, whose Hope of Israel article was earlier, was not a part of the proto-Seventh-day Adventist group, and he kept the Sabbath only briefly.) In his book The Seventh-day Sabbath a Perpetual Sign (1846), Bates expressed his indebtedness to Preble for certain information; namely, that the controversy over Sabbath and Sunday had raged until the time of Pope Gregory I, and that Daniel 7 had foreshadowed these developments, matters that Preble had learned from the Seventh Day Baptists. James White devoted the 11 issues of the Present Truth, during 1849—1850, chiefly to the Sabbath question; in them he reprinted extensive extracts from the Seventh Day Baptist Sabbath Tracts numbers 4, 6, 7, 8, and 12.

Seventh-day Adventist interpretation of relevant prophecies soon advanced beyond that of the first edition of The Seventh Day Sabbath (1846). Bates not only applied Dan. 7:25 to the change of the Sabbath (pp. 41, 42) but also mentioned the three angels' messages of Rev. 14, and, in connection with the third, emphasized the keeping of the commandments of God—especially the Sabbath commandment—and the faith of Jesus (p. 24). In the second edition (preface dated January 1847) he came out clearly in identifying the people called out by the third angel's message as those who have come out of the churches of Babylon and keep the commandments, including the fourth, and who "have been uniting in companies for the last two years, on the commandments of God and faith or testimony of Jesus," a persecuted remnant, keeping the true Sabbath in distinction from the false sabbath, "a mark of the beast" (pp. 58, 59). Later in the same year he discussed Rev. 14:12 at some length in Second Advent Way Marks, pages 68—79. Also in 1847 James White related the Sabbath to the third angel's message (A Word to the "Little Flock," p. 11).

Bates wrote in 1849 that during one of the "Sabbath conferences," in November 1848, at Dorchester, Massachusetts, the group, who had been studying some points of the "sealing message" (Rev. 7:2), were united, through the testimony of Mrs. White on the seal as representing the Sabbath (A Seal of the Living God, pp. 24—26).

Furthermore, Bates added new urgency to the study of the Bible by applying Rev. 13:16 to that “ungodly power from which God’s people have been called out,” which will “enact a law for the express purpose of making all bow down and keep the Pope’s Sabbath” or be forbidden to buy or sell (A Seal, p. 37).

6. Sabbath in Early Seventh-day Adventist Publications. As soon as Sabbathkeeping Adventists began publishing work in July 1849, many articles on the subject of the Sabbath appeared in the periodicals, and by the end of that year the first pamphlet, The Weekly Sabbath, was advertised—a 24-page reprint of White’s articles on the Sabbath, intended as the first of a series of tracts (see Present Truth 1:40, December 1849; for the title, see Review and Herald 1:7, November 1850). Later articles were similarly issued as tracts, for example, The Seventh-day Sabbath Not Abolished, a two-installment reply to Joseph Marsh (Present Truth 1:49—56, 57—59, March 1850).

The early articles on the Sabbath, in the Present Truth, the pioneer Seventh-day Adventist periodical (1849), and early issues of its successor, Review and Herald (1850 onward), dealt with the subject at considerable length. In the first issue of Present Truth (1:6, July 1849) James White set out to prove that passages cited from the Epistles of Paul “to sustain the no-Sabbath doctrine” “do not mean what they are said to mean; and that they do not present the least evidence for the abolition of the weekly Sabbath.” Commenting on Gal. 5:4, he asks whether opponents of the Sabbath really believe what they affirm on the basis of this text—that a person falls from grace by observing the fourth command of the Decalogue—and whether we fall from grace when we keep the other nine commands. In the second issue he proposed “to show that there is a perfect harmony in all the Scripture testimony of both Testaments, in relation to the observance of the Holy Sabbath,” and cited Luke 23:54—56 for NT observance. “Jesus stripped off the traditions with which the blind Jew had covered the Sabbath,” he wrote, “and left it naked, resting on its own Eternal basis, the fourth commandment” (ibid. 1:14, August 1849).

In the third number of Present Truth White discussed the Sabbath as taught and enforced in the New Testament, citing Matthew 24:20 as establishing the validity of the Sabbath command three decades after the Crucifixion. Of the great apostle to the Gentiles he said: “The no-Sabbath advocates make Paul one of the most inconsistent men that ever undertook to preach the Gospel; for they say he taught the abolition of the Sabbath to the Galatians, Romans, and Colossians; and at the same time was preaching to Jews and Gentiles not only in the synagogues but elsewhere on every Sabbath-day! The Jews never accused Paul with departing from the letter of the Sabbath law. This is strong evidence that he strictly kept it. We all know that if the Apostle had taught its abolition, the Jews would have accused him with Sabbath-breaking; for they sought for accusations to bring against him” (ibid. 1:18, August 1849).

As for the relative silence of the NT in regard to Sabbath observance he observed: “There was no necessity for enforcing the Sabbath law, as it was not violated in the days of the Apostles, as the other nine commandments were. The only natural reason why the Apostles did not rebuke the sin of Sabbath-breaking is, that the sin did not exist in the early Church” (ibid.).

Justifying Sabbathkeeping Adventists’ emphasis on the seventh-day Sabbath, White referred (ibid. 1:25, 26, September 1849) to Isa. 58:12, 13 as pointing forward to a restoration of the Sabbath at “the close of time,” and wrote: “We see that the mighty work of repairing the breach in the law of God, by teaching and observing the Sabbath, which has been so long trodden down, belongs exactly here just before the four Angels let loose the four winds, that the Israel of God may keep the whole law, and be sealed with the seal of the living God, which will enable them to ‘stand in the battle in the day of the Lord.’

“The reason why we have more to say on the Sabbath commandment than the other nine, is because this is the very one that is trodden down” (ibid. 1:29, September 1849).

He answered the question “Do you believe there is salvation in the Sabbath?” with the explanation: “We do not believe there is salvation in the Sabbath, any more than in the other nine commandments. Salvation comes through Jesus Christ our Lord. Let me, reader, ask you a question. Do you believe that we can have salvation through Jesus, while violating all or either of the other nine commandments? You answer no. Neither can you have salvation through Jesus, if you reject the clear light of the Holy Sabbath” (The Advent Review 1:57, September 1850).

For historical data on the change of the Sabbath in early church history and the observance of the Sabbath and Sunday in later times, the Adventists continued for a while to depend on the publications of the Seventh Day Baptists. James White published a tract, The Bible Sabbath, in 1851, a reprint from Seventh Day Baptist tracts. In A Refutation of the Claims of Sunday-Keeping (1853) and The First Day of the Week Not the Sabbath (1854), J. N. Andrews quoted extensively from a Seventh Day Baptist work entitled History of the Sabbath. In 1859 Andrews produced the first independent Adventist study of the problem, a 96-page tract entitled History of the Sabbath and First Day of the Week (subtitled: Showing the Bible Record of the Sabbath and the Manner in Which It Has Been Supplanted by the Heathen Festival of the Sun). In 1862 he issued the first edition of a 340-page book with the same name; a second edition, enlarged and slightly revised, appeared in 1873; and a third, almost unchanged, appeared in 1887, after his death. Andrews adhered to basic Seventh Day Baptist concepts, but reexamined the sources and cited scores of Sundaykeeping authors.

In 1891 L. R. Conradi translated Andrews’ History into German, modifying it slightly in harmony with German interests, and in 1912 issued, as coauthor, a greatly revised and enlarged fourth edition. Whereas Andrews cited antipathy to Judaism as the primary cause for the widespread abandonment of the Sabbath by early Christians, Conradi—influenced perhaps by Adolf Harnack—added Gnosticism as a second primary cause. Although now long out of print, the work of Andrews and Conradi has set the pattern for subsequent Adventist publications on the subject.

VI. Sabbath Observance

VI. Sabbath Observance. Manner. Seventh-day Adventists base their ideas of Sabbath observance on the Scriptures. God rested on the seventh day (Gen. 2:2, 3) and enjoined similar rest for the people in the fourth commandment (Ex. 20:8—11). More specifically, regarding the manner of rest, Isaiah called for the people to refrain from doing their own pleasure and speaking their own words on the Sabbath, it was to be a delight and holy unto the Lord (Isa. 58:13, 14). The spirit of true Sabbath observance was stressed by other prophets. Christ always emphasized the spiritual principles involved in true Sabbathkeeping, declaring that it is lawful to do well and to heal on the Sabbath (Matt. 12:8—14; cf. Mark 2:23—28).

The Seventh-day Adventist Church stresses the positive aspects of Sabbathkeeping. While there is a clearly defined understanding of what is appropriate to the Sabbath, Seventh-day Adventists observe the day in a spirit of worship and devotion of heart and not legalistically as a means to divine favor.

Seventh-day Adventists begin the Sabbath on Friday evening at sunset and end it at sunset Saturday evening (see sec. V). They believe that every moment between these points of time is consecrated, holy time, and seek to guard jealously the edges of the Sabbath. As in the NT (Mark 15:42), Friday is often referred to as the “preparation day” because, as the expression suggests, on it preparation is made for the Sabbath.

The Church Manual gives the following counsel with regard to Sabbathkeeping: “The sacred institution of the Sabbath is a token of God’s love to humanity. It is a memorial of God’s power in the original creation and also a sign of His power to re-create and sanctify the life (Eze. 20:12), and its observance is an evidence of our loyalty to Him. The proper observance of the Sabbath is an evidence of our fidelity to our Creator and of fellowship with our Redeemer. In a special sense the observance of the Sabbath is a test of obedience. Unless we can pass that test as individuals, how can we adequately present the Sabbath message to the world?”

“The Sabbath hours belong to God, and are to be used for Him alone. Our own pleasure, our own words, our own business, our own thoughts, should find no place in the observance of the Lord’s day. (Isa. 58:13.) Let us gather round the family circle at sunset and welcome the holy Sabbath with prayer and song, and let us close the day with prayer and expressions of gratitude for His wondrous love. The Sabbath is a special day for worship in the home and in the church, a day of joy to ourselves and our children, a day in which to learn more of God through the Bible and the great lesson book of nature. It is a time to visit the sick and to work for the salvation of souls. The ordinary affairs of the six working days should be laid aside. No unnecessary work should be performed. Secular reading or secular broadcasts should not occupy our time on God’s holy day.

“The Sabbath is not intended to be a period of useless activity. The law forbids secular labor on the rest day of the Lord; the toil that gains a livelihood must cease; no labor for worldly pleasure or profit is lawful upon that day; but as God ceased His labor of creating, and rested upon the Sabbath and blessed it, so man is to leave the occupations of his daily life, and devote those sacred hours to healthful rest, to worship, and to holy deeds (The Desire of Ages, p. 207).

“A rightly directed program of activities in harmony with the spirit of true Sabbathkeeping will make this blessed day the happiest and best of all the week, for ourselves and for our children—a veritable foretaste of our heavenly rest” (1990 ed., p. 141).

The Sabbath, then, is considered a token of God’s love to man, a memorial of His creative act, and a sign of His power to re-create the spiritual life of human beings. The proper observance of the Sabbath is an evidence of loyalty and obedience to Him.

Sabbath Observance in the Armed Forces. With regard to Sabbath observance in the armed forces by Seventh-day Adventists the situation around the world differs.

In the United States all branches of the military forces respect the religious convictions of their respective personnel, and have made provision for these convictions to be carried out as they touch the observance of the seventh-day Sabbath of the Bible. During World War II “Sabbath privileges were granted under Sabbath rulings issued by commanding officers of individual camps, forts, ships and installations, and these applied only to the areas under the jurisdiction of such commanding officers.

“Since the war there have been a number of changes in the Sabbath rulings and today all such rulings are service-wide. These rulings are not mandatory but provide commanding officers with authority to grant military personnel whose religious convictions require them to devote the seventh day of the week, from sundown Friday to sundown Saturday, to religious worship, the privilege of doing so” (Sabbath Rulings in the United States’ Selective Service, National Service Organization of the General Conference, p. 2).

Sabbath and the International Date Line. There is an actual, although rather infrequent, problem in Sabbath observance (and similarly in Sunday observance) to one crossing the international date line in mid-Pacific. Those who live near the line have no problem; they keep the Sabbath (or Sunday) as the day comes to them. Those who cross the line either consider that they have actually left one day and entered another, in harmony with the locality in which they arrive, or do their own adjusting. On ships it is customary for the captain to announce the change of date as occurring at the midnight preceding or the midnight following the crossing of the line, regardless of the exact time of crossing, and to choose between these alternatives, in order to avoid dropping or doubling a Sunday or a holiday. Seventh-day Adventist travelers can, on the same principle, make their own personal adjustment; westbound, they can complete the observance of the Sabbath that they have begun, rather than drop it, or begin the Sabbath at the preceding sunset so as to complete it at the same time as the inhabitants of the area to which they are going. Eastbound, they can conversely adjust their date change so as to observe one Sabbath instead of two successive ones. See SB, Nos. 353—357.

Sabbath Observance in the Arctic. Another problem, apparent rather than real, is the determination of the Sabbath sunset in parts of the world where the sun at certain seasons shines all night or does not appear at all. People in temperate latitudes are accustomed to the fact that sunset time varies from 3:00 or 4:00 p.m. in winter to 9:00 or 10:00 p.m. in summer. In places near the Arctic (or the Antarctic) Circle the variation is similar, but ranges from noon in midwinter to midnight in midsummer.

Near midsummer the sun sets in the northern horizon shortly before midnight and rises shortly after midnight. Finally, when sunset comes at midnight, it is merely a dip to the horizon and a rising immediately after. Thereafter, for a number of days (the time varying with the latitude) that lowest dip comes every midnight, but the sun never goes below the horizon. Later the midnight dip takes it briefly below the horizon, and there is again a visible sunset. Thus, in summer the last visible sunset and the first visible sunset, a number of days or weeks later, is at midnight. Then sunset moves earlier each night through the autumn, and farther toward the south, until, near midwinter, it sets shortly after noon, and finally one day shows only its rim over the southern horizon and disappears—sunrise and sunset at noon. Thereafter, for some time the sun comes every noon to its highest point, and goes down immediately—not visible, because it is below the horizon, but for some time showing a glow every noon. Then one noon its rim appears and sets immediately—a visible sunset again. Thus in winter the last visible sunset and the first visible sunset are at noon. Thereafter sunrise comes earlier before noon every day and sunset later after noon. Thus the sunset cycle changes, but the Sabbath is not lost.

“Sabbath Conferences”

“SABBATH CONFERENCES” (sometimes called “1848 Conferences” because they began in April 1848). A series of meetings of “friends of the Sabbath” held in various places in New England and New York, during the formative period when James and Ellen White, Joseph Bates, and others began the work of “uniting the brethren on the great truths connected with the message of the third angel” (James White, in Review and Herald 3:5, May 6, 1852).

In more modern language, A. W. Spalding speaks of the “Sabbath conferences,” “which began to collect and bind together the believers in the Sabbath truth” (A. W. Spalding, Origin and History of Seventh-day Adventists, vol. 1, p. 191).

The “conferences” of those early days were meetings of believers and interested people who came together from varying distances for a weekend, sometimes for Friday and Sabbath, often Sabbath and Sunday, sometimes from Thursday to Monday. They were at first arranged by letter, later (from 1849 on) announced through the periodicals.

The first of this series, at Rocky Hill, Connecticut, is described by James White in a letter: “We arrived at this place about four p.m. In a few minutes in came Brn. Bates and Gurney. We had a meeting that evening of about fifteen in all. Friday morning the brethren came in until we numbered about fifty. They were not all fully in the truth. Our meeting that day was very interesting. Bro. Bates presented the commandments in a clear light, and their importance was urged home by powerful testimonies. The word had effect to establish those already in the truth, and to awaken those who were not fully decided” (quoted in 2SG 93).

The next conference was at Volney, New York. James White worked at mowing grass to earn money to attend. “There were about thirty-five present, all that could be collected in that part of the state” (2SG 97).

There were six conferences in 1848: Rocky Hill, Connecticut, in April; Volney and Port Gibson, New York, in August; Rocky Hill again in September; Topsham, Maine, in October; Dorchester, Massachusetts, in November. In 1849 there were also six conferences, at least three of which the Whites attended: Paris, Maine, September; Oswego and Centerport, New York, November. In 1850 there were 10 conferences, eight of which the Whites attended.

During some of these conferences, apparently, leading brethren—James White, Joseph Bates, Stephen Pierce, Hiram Edson, and others unnamed—took advantage of their opportunity to study the Bible together to settle questions on various points of doctrine. Speaking of the manner in which “the foundation of our faith has been laid,” Ellen White wrote of how they “searched for the truth as for hidden treasure. I met with them, and we studied and prayed earnestly. Often we remained together until late at night, and sometimes through the entire night, praying for light and studying the Word. Again and again these brethren came together to study the Bible, in order that they might know its meaning, and be prepared to teach it with power” (1SM 206).

This joint study took place “at important meetings” (Ellen White MS 135, 1903) in the early days—presumably the conferences beginning in the spring of 1848. Since conferences of that sort were held during many years thereafter, the duration of this period of study must be deduced from Mrs. White's account: "During this whole time I could not understand the reasoning of the brethren. My mind was locked, as it were, and I could not comprehend the meaning of the scriptures we were studying. This was one of the greatest sorrows of my life. I was in this condition of mind until all the principal points of our faith were made clear to our minds, in harmony with the Word of God. The brethren knew that when not in vision, I could not understand these matters, and they accepted as light direct from heaven the revelations given" (1SM 207).

This condition of mind continued until the time when she and her husband visited the Andrews' home in Maine, at which time "Father" Andrews was healed by prayer. That event can be dated by two letters, the first written by Ellen White to Samuel W. Rhodes (Ellen White letter 6, 1850) shortly after a conference, evidently that at Paris, Maine, Nov. 23, 24, 1850 (see Review and Herald 1:16, December 1850), and the second written to the Lovelands (Ellen White letter 30, 1850), dated Dec. 13, 1850. Thus, the period of "two or three years" mentioned by Ellen White agrees well with the two years and eight months between April 1848 and December 1850, during which the aforementioned "important meetings" took place, and during which, accordingly, the principal points of faith must have been studied out.

Sabbath School

SABBATH SCHOOL. The Seventh-day Adventist equivalent, in general, of the Sunday school of other denominations, but designed for people of all ages, rather than for only children and youth.

The goal of the Sabbath school is the discipling of people for Christ. The four basic objectives of the Sabbath school are faith development, fellowship, community outreach, and world mission.

Adventist Sabbath school work began in 1852 when James White wrote the first Sabbath school lessons, a series of 19 for children and youth published in the Youth's Instructor (see Sabbath School Publications).

The first regular Sabbath school was probably the one organized in 1853 by James White in Rochester, New York; another was organized by John Byington in Buck's Bridge, New York in 1854; and the third was organized in 1855 by M. G. Kellogg in Battle Creek, Michigan.

Early Sabbath schools had only two divisions, one for children and one for adults (the latter called the Bible Class). Teachers placed much emphasis on the memorization of Scripture. Adelia Patten wrote a series of Sabbath school lessons adapted for children in 1863. The same year the first adult Sabbath school lessons appeared in the Review and Herald and were written by Uriah Smith.

There was little organization until G. H. Bell, pioneer teacher in Battle Creek, became editor of the Youth's Instructor in 1869. He introduced two series of lessons, one for children and the other for youth. He also published a plan of organization providing for a staff of officers and regular reports of attendance. He later introduced articles for teachers and officers. After demonstrating success in Battle Creek, Bell traveled to other places organizing Sabbath schools and counseling officers.

In 1877 the first state Sabbath School Association was organized in California followed by one in Michigan the same year. By October 1878 there were 12 such state organizations and a General Sabbath School Association had been in operation since March. At the first annual meeting of the association in October 1878, eight of the associations reported 177 Sabbath schools, with 5,851 members.

In 1878, in Battle Creek, Michigan, the first division for smaller children was formed, called "the Bird's Nest." In 1886 this became the kindergarten division. Also in 1878 the first Sabbath school songbook, The Song Anchor, was published and demonstration Sabbath schools were held at all camp meetings.

In 1879 the first branch Sabbath schools were organized (see Branch Sabbath School).

In 1885 the first Sabbath school mission offering was taken in Oakland, California, for the Australasian Mission. That same year the Sabbath School Worker was launched, giving instructions for Sabbath school workers.

In 1887 the first general Sabbath school mission offering, $10,615, was raised for the African mission station. In 1889 the first Senior Sabbath School Lesson Quarterly was printed. Our Little Friend began publication in 1890 with separate lessons for kindergarten and primary children.

At the General Conference session held in 1901, the International Sabbath School Association (former Sabbath School Association) was reorganized as the Sabbath School Department of the General Conference and state Sabbath school associations were abolished. W. A. Spicer was the first chairperson of the department, and L. Flora Plummer was the corresponding secretary.

In 1901, nearly 50 years after the first Sabbath school lessons were printed, there were 2,675 Sabbath schools, with 59,732 members, who gave $21,979.58 for missions (see Sabbath School Offerings). Four divisions were now in operation: adult, youth, primary, and kindergarten. The five objectives of the Sabbath school in 1901 were (1) every Seventh-day Adventist attending Sabbath school every week, (2) every member studying the Sabbath school lesson daily, (3) every member present and on time, (4) teachers doing personal work for every pupil, and (5) every member giving liberal gifts for missions.

The decade of 1911 to 1921 saw the beginning of primary and junior quarterlies, Picture Rolls, sand table cutouts, the introduction of the Thirteenth Sabbath Special Projects Offering, the beginning of the mission quarterly, and the introduction of awards for perfect attendance and daily lesson study. (This practice was stopped in 1945. That year 180,000 honor cards and 13,000 bookmark awards were earned.) Sabbath school Investment began in 1925.

At the end of 1937, 85 years after James White published the first Sabbath school lessons, there were 13,305 Sabbath schools, with 554,408 members who gave $1,669,833.86 for missions (see Sabbath School Offerings).

In 1952, the centennial of James White's first Sabbath school lessons, there were 17,993 Sabbath schools, with 1,120,998 members who gave approximately $5 million to missions.

In 1956 the first Sabbath School Manual was published. The decade of the fifties also saw the beginning of Guide, Primary Treasure, Junior Mission Quarterly, Vacation Bible Schools, and flannel board cutouts.

In the late 1960s and early 1970s plans were laid to revise the format for Sabbath school lessons in all divisions. The adult quarterly, later greatly increased in size, devoted one page to each day's study. Four-color cover pictures were added to make the quarterly more attractive. The adult teacher's quarterly, produced in loose-leaf form, included an additional page of explanations and helps especially for the teacher.

In 1962 the Earliteen Sabbath School Quarterly was started. In 1970 Insight replaced the Youth's Instructor. Cornerstone Connections began publication in 1982, providing lessons for teens.

The first major reorganization of the Sabbath School Department since 1901 took place at the General Conference session of 1985. At that time Sabbath school became a part of the newly created Church Ministries Department (see Church Ministries Department).

In 1992, 140 years after the first Sabbath school lessons, there were 71,893 Sabbath schools with 8,786,693 members who gave $43,565,123 to world missions. This represents tremendous growth in Sabbath schools, members, and mission offerings in the 40-year period from 1952 to 1992.

In 1992 organized Sabbath schools were operating in 204 of the 233 countries recognized by the United Nations. Twenty-nine nations did not have organized Sabbath schools. In 1992 the Sabbath school lessons were being taught in 687 languages. For comparison, in 1964 Sabbath schools were functioning in 189 countries and Sabbath school lessons were taught in 523 languages. By 1975 Sabbath schools were meeting in nearly 200 countries and studying the lessons in more than 550 languages and dialects.

The Sabbath school today is divided by age groups: adults, young adults (19—30), youth (15—18, or high school), earliteen (12—14, or grades 7 and 8), junior (10—12, or grades 5 and 6), primary (7—9, or grades 2—4), kindergarten (4—6, or through the first grade), and cradle roll (0—3). There is also an extension division including members who cannot attend.

In 1990 small group Action Units were introduced to the Sabbath school program. They combine a personal ministry (lay activity) emphasis with a regular Sabbath school Bible study class in an effort to involve the total membership in the outreach mission of the church and increase fellowship and spiritual nurture.

In 1992 Children's Mission Quarterly was begun to be published for kindergarten and primary divisions. See also Branch Sabbath School; Sabbath School Offerings; Sabbath School Publications; Vacation Bible School.

Sabbath School Action Units

SABBATH SCHOOL ACTION UNITS. A plan introduced to the Sabbath school in 1990. The goal of the Action Units is total involvement of the Sabbath school membership in the outreach program of the church as well as increased fellowship and spiritual nurture.

There are 10 key elements that make up a Sabbath School Action Unit: (1) class of six to eight; (2) care coordinator; (3) outreach plans; (4) one-hour class time; (5) weekly caring for missing members during first five minutes; (6) 20 minutes led by care coordinator to promote class outreach plans and goals; (7) 35-minute lesson discussion and application led by discussion group leader; (8) leader consultations; (9) monthly corporate sharing; (10) monthly home fellowship and evaluation.

The three officers of the Action Unit are discussion group leader, care coordinator, and class secretary. Action Unit officers are elected by the Sabbath School Council.

Action Units were piloted by Calvin Smith first in Michigan and then other conferences in North America before they were successfully implemented on a worldwide basis. The results have included marked increase in warm, caring fellowship, daily lesson study, attendance, missing members returning, all types of outreach, Bible studies, and baptisms. A quarterly journal, Action, provides brief weekly Sabbath school program suggestions and mission stories as well as ideas on tithe and offerings, outreach, and fellowship. Its emphasis is the implementation of Sabbath School Action Units. It replaced the Sabbath School Worker (1885—1985) and Church Ministries Worker (1986—1990). The editor in 1992 was Calvin Smith.

Sabbath School Department

SABBATH SCHOOL DEPARTMENT. In the General Conference, the department that fostered and guided the operation of Sabbath schools, offered training and counsel to officers and teachers, and produced lessons and teaching aids (see Sabbath School Publications) until it was merged into the Church Ministries Department in 1985.

Organization of Sabbath schools began in California in 1877, with the formation of the first state Sabbath school association. The formation of this society was followed in the same year by the organization of the Michigan State Sabbath School Association. In March 1878 the General Sabbath School Association was organized at the third special session of the General Conference. The next October the new association's first report listed 12 state organizations, eight of which reported a total of 177 Sabbath schools with 5,851 members (Review and Herald 51:85, Mar. 14, and 52:129, Oct. 24, 1878).

After the work had spread to countries outside the United States and an association had been formed in 1883 in Switzerland and another in 1886 in England, the name was changed at the General Conference of 1886 to the International Sabbath School Association. At that time there were 813 Sabbath schools, with 23,364 Sabbath school members. The local schools took up offerings for their Sabbath school supplies and paid a tithe of these offerings to the state association, which sent a tithe of their funds to support the general and international Sabbath school associations.

When the General Conference was reorganized in 1901, the International Sabbath School Association became the Sabbath School Department of the General Conference. Under this arrangement the funds of the association went into the General Conference treasury and the Sabbath School Department was given a budget for its running expenses. See Sabbath School Offerings.

Under the new organization the interests of the Sabbath schools were taken over by the Sabbath school departmental secretaries in the General Conference and in the lower organizational levels. The 1901 directory (in the General Conference Bulletin) listed Sabbath school departments or secretaries for four of the six union conferences in North America, and in most of the local conferences and missions; and for areas outside of North America in the three unions and a few of the local conferences and missions. The 1902 directory listed Sabbath school departments in more local conferences and missions but in only two of the North American unions—Lake and Central. (Of the unions the Lake Union Conference alone maintained a department until 1912; then from 1912 to 1920 the Northern Pacific Union had one. After that the Yearbook lists no union Sabbath school secretaries for North America until, beginning in 1937, one after another of the unions begins to list one. The 1945 Yearbook listed one in each union.) After 1913, as the world divisions were organized, each division had its Sabbath school department.

In 1974 the Sabbath School Department restudied and redefined its objectives, as follows: The Sabbath school was developed to teach the gospel of Jesus Christ in response to the command of Jesus, and in the setting of the three angels' messages. In loyalty to this original purpose the Sabbath school continues to communicate the good news with the objective to win, hold, and train for Jesus Christ, men and women, youth, boys and girls, in all the world. This objective is carried forward through the following four areas: faith emphasis, fellowship emphasis, community emphasis, and world emphasis.

The General Conference Sabbath School Department produced various helps for local schools (see Sabbath School Publications).

Presidents of the General [International] Sabbath School Association, according to the minutes of the annual meetings of the association published in the Review and Herald or in the Yearbook were: D. M. Canright, 1878 [1879—1880?]; S. N. Haskell, 1878—1879; G. H. Bell, 1880—1881; W. C. White, 1881—1882; G. H. Bell, 1882—1883; W. C. White, 1883—1886; C. H. Jones, 1886—1899; M. C. Wilcox, 1899—1901.

Sabbath School Department Secretaries (until 1908 called chairmen): W. A. Spicer, 1901—1904; G. B. Thompson, 1904—1913; Mrs. L. Flora Plummer, 1913—1936; J. A. Stevens, 1936—1950; L. L. Moffitt, 1950—1958; G. R. Nash, 1958—1970; Fernon Retzer, 1970—1974.

Directors (after 1974): Fernon Retzer, 1974—1975; H. F. Rampton, 1975—1985.

Sabbath School Offerings

SABBATH SCHOOL OFFERINGS. Weekly and special periodic offerings for the worldwide missionary work of the church, and the expense offering for the local Sabbath school received in Sabbath school. The earliest plan for Sabbath school offerings was introduced in 1878, when the first annual session of the General Sabbath School Association urged the use of penny boxes placed near the door to receive funds for operating expense. Considerable objection was voiced, but through the promotion of Ellen White, J. N. Loughborough, and the association officers, who favored the plan, approval was won.

In 1885 the Sabbath schools made their first gifts to missions. In the first quarter of that year the Oakland, California, Sabbath school gave all its income to aid in the establishment of the Australian Mission, according to a note that appeared in the Review and Herald that year (62:224, Apr. 7, 1885). Flora Plummer wrote later (c. 1910) that also in 1885 the first conference-wide practice of giving all the Sabbath school donations to missions was adopted by the Upper Columbia Conference at its session at Milton, Oregon (Early History of the Seventh-day Adventist Sabbath School Work, p. 16). Mrs. Plummer also reported that the next year Sabbath schools in California raised $700 above their expenses in one quarter for the Australian Mission. However, C. H. Jones, writing 18 years earlier than Mrs. Plummer (Sabbath School Worker 8:8, January 1892), placed this action of the California Sabbath schools in 1885. Several state Sabbath school associations proposed sending part of their offerings to help establish this mission. A little later W. C. White, former president of the International Sabbath School Association, asked the schools to give a portion of their contributions to missions. This was the beginning of an ever-increasing stream of financial support that has flowed from the Sabbath schools to the world fields.

The idea of supporting missions seemed to bring increased life and energy to the Sabbath schools. In 1889 and 1890 the Sabbath schools contributed about $12,000 to build the missionary ship Pitcairn. When the Pitcairn sailed with its first missionaries to the Pacific Islands in 1890, a new era in Sabbath school missions offerings began. Soon a goal of five cents a week per member, instead of one penny, was set. Instead of giving only the surplus offering to missions, it was recommended in 1904 that all the regular contributions, except on one or two Sabbaths in the quarter, reserved for expenses, be given to worldwide mission work.

The Regular Sabbath School Offering for Missions

The Regular Sabbath School Offering for Missions. In 1909 the General Conference recommended that the Sabbath school give all offerings to missions, providing for their expenses in some other way. Goals and devices to record the amounts were introduced to stimulate the missions offerings. By 1913 all regular Sabbath school offerings were going for missions and a special offering was taken for expenses.

Sabbath school offerings began to rise sharply. In 1906 a goal of $1,000 a week for missions was set and reached. In 1909 a goal of $100,000 for the year was passed. By 1911 the Sabbath schools reached their first million dollars for missions after 25 years of giving. In the four years 1912—1915, the second million dollars for missions was raised.

In 1920 the North American Division Sabbath schools accepted a goal of 25 cents a week per church member. The goal was raised in 1923 to 30 cents, then to 40 cents (1951), and 50 cents (1953). In 1929 the Sabbath schools around the world gave nearly $2 million to missions in one year, bringing the total since 1886 to more than $21 million. During the depression of 1930—1934 the offerings declined considerably, but by 1941 they were back almost to the 1929 figure.

In 1943 the total for the year was more than $3 million; in 1946, $4 million; in 1951, $5 million; in 1955, more than $6 million; in 1958, $7 million; in 1960, more than $8 million; and in 1970, more than $14 million. In 1980 the total world mission offering was $40 million, and in 1990 it was nearly $47 million.

However, information presented to the Sabbath School Advisory Committee in 1958 showed that the Sabbath school offerings in North America, which during 1921—1933 had been above 30 percent of the church's tithe income, or 3 percent of the income tithed, had since gradually diminished to 14.3 percent of the tithe, or 1.43 percent of the income. It was voted to present this older figure of 30 percent of the tithe or 3 percent of the income, as a possible and an equitable goal for North America.

Global Assignment (quarterly) cassette tape with two seven-minute programs from the mission field designated to receive the Thirteenth Sabbath Offering overflow, began in 1955.

The Autumn Council of 1963 requested the Sabbath School Department to attempt a 50 percent increase in mission offerings during 1965. The 1964 North American Sabbath School Advisory Committee accepted the challenge and recommended ways of implementation. In 1967 the Advisory Committee voted to discontinue the promotion of 50 cents per week per member as a basic offering goal for North America, and to accept instead a 10 percent annual increase.

In 1970 an audiovisual program called Mission Spotlight was inaugurated, consisting of color slides and cassette tapes of on-the-spot reporting of mission progress and needs. These brief programs were to be circulated among groups of churches each quarter to stimulate wider and stronger financial support of world missions. A mission offering plan called "2X" was begun worldwide in January of 1974, calling for all members to double their customary Sabbath school offerings.

Special Offerings

Special Offerings. Besides the regular Sabbath school offerings there are several special offerings, given on special occasions or for special purposes:

Thirteenth Sabbath Offering. On the last Sabbath, usually the thirteenth Sabbath of each quarter, a special offering is taken, and a certain percentage is applied to certain preselected mission projects.

Birthday-Thank Offering. Members are asked to bring a token of thanks for another year of life or for a specific personal blessing received. As early as 1890 Ellen White wrote: "On birthday occasions the children should be taught that they have reason for gratitude to God for His loving-kindness in preserving their lives for another year."

Again she wrote in 1894: "Not only on birthdays . . . but Christmas and New Year's should also be seasons when every household should remember their Creator and Redeemer. . . . Do not let the day pass without bringing thanksgiving and thank-offerings to Jesus."

Little by little the birthday offering idea grew and before long "a penny a year" became a popular slogan in North America. In 1905 birthday boxes were promoted, and in 1908 J. N. Loughborough championed the Birthday-Thank Offering idea and urged it for adults also. In 1919 this offering was designated for new work and new workers in the mission fields.

Later these offerings were put into the regular mission budget. However, each year the amount budgeted for "specials," such as new buildings, new equipment, and new lands, is from far more than the Birthday-Thank Offering total.

Investment Fund. Members are invited to make an "investment" for missions in some earning project, and give the proceeds as a special offering. The investment idea was followed as early as the 1880s and 1890s when certain church members dedicated such projects as an acre or more of a crop, some cattle, or some cash to provide camp-meeting equipment. In the early 1900s the plan was promoted for various projects in many countries of the world. For example, in 1908 in the Society Islands "missionary gardens" were planted.

In one of these early projects, in 1905, in the little town of Hamilton, Missouri, Lottie Lohman gave five pennies to five children. They bought seeds, planted them, and sold the produce; raised chickens and sold them, until the five pennies grew to $11.52. From 1915 to 1924 numerous articles appeared in the Worker giving reports on how money was earned for missions by giving out nickels to class members to "trade for the work of God," by projects such as selling temperance numbers of the Youth's Instructor, Signs of the Times, and Life and Health. The money earned was put into the Thirteenth Sabbath Offering.

At the Spring Meeting of the General Conference Committee of 1925 the plan was named "Investment Fund" and officially given to the Sabbath School Department to promote, with the understanding that the money received would go into the regular mission budget. Thereafter the Investment Fund was reported separately, and that year it amounted to $21,860.20.

The idea went round the world. In Burma they called it the "Different" offering. In the Solomon Islands they called it "Business belong God." New ideas came up continually. One husband (not yet a Seventh-day Adventist) gave up tobacco and gave his tobacco money to Investment; he walked to work and gave his carfare. Children gathered newspapers, bottles, and junk to sell. Others dedicated a portion of their time, a tree, a calf, or part of their garden.

Statistically speaking, as many as one out of every six converts won through the use of Sabbath school offerings could be credited to the Investment Fund.

Sabbath School Publications

SABBATH SCHOOL PUBLICATIONS. Lessons, teaching aids and program helps, and general promotional material relating to Sabbath schools, either planned, published, or sponsored by the General Conference Sabbath School Department. From the first, Seventh-day Adventist Sabbath schools have had their own lessons and papers, beginning in 1852 in the new Youth's Instructor with a single set of lessons designed for "children," a term including all except adults. The differentiation of materials for various age groups came gradually, until today there are materials for eight separate divisions, from cradle roll through adults.

Sabbath School Lessons. Sabbath school lessons are produced in English by the General Conference Sabbath School Department and are published in quarterlies and some weekly papers given to the children and young people in the Sabbath school. The same lessons are used throughout the denomination. Until 1984 the General Conference Sabbath School Department made available a five-year cycle of simplified adult Sabbath school lessons. This was replaced with the Easy English edition, which follows the regular curriculum. An edition for the deaf in language that could be signed was piloted, beginning fourth quarter 1978, until Christian Record Services began publishing it first quarter 1981. That was replaced by the Easy English edition in the first quarter 1984.

The lesson topics for the cradle roll, running in sequence through the Bible, are repeated on a one-year cycle (although the parent's helps that go with each week's lesson are on a three-year cycle); those for the kindergarten and primary divisions are on a three-year cycle. The juniors and teens study similar subject matter; they began a new four-year curriculum in 1994. The youth division is on a four-year curriculum. The collegiate level is the same as the adult, with some adaptations and variations.

The first Sabbath school lessons were written by James White. He published the first four in the initial issue of the Youth's Instructor, August 1852, only a few months after the Review and Herald publishing house had acquired its first press, at Rochester, New York. But the second monthly issue was delayed until October because, beginning on Aug. 20, White spent more than a month on a tour of conferences in various places between Rochester, New York, and Bangor, Maine. Traveling in a covered carriage with his wife and 3-year-old son, Edson, he often sat down at noon, and while his horse was feeding, used the "dinner box" or the top of his hat for a table on which to write material for the Review and Herald and for the Youth's Instructor (LS 144, 145). At least as early as 1885 (see Review and Herald 62:87, Feb. 10, 1885), the tradition had arisen that on this trip White wrote the first Sabbath school lessons; but if, as is likely, it was at this time that he wrote the lessons for the October Youth's Instructor, they were the second month's lessons, since the first had come out in the August issue, before the Whites left Rochester (see Review and Herald 3:64, Aug. 19, 1852; 3:71, 72, Sept. 2, 1852).

The series begun by White consisted of 19 Sabbath school lessons. In 1853, 17 lessons on Daniel from a publication of J. V. Himes were used. These were followed by eight lessons on the sanctuary doctrine. In 1854 R. F. Cottrell prepared one year's lessons, which were published first in the Youth's Instructor, and in the following year in book form under the title The Bible Class. This series was used repeatedly (1855—1858).

In 1859 William Higley prepared a series of lessons on Daniel. Then for the next three and one-half years there were no new lessons, until in 1861—1862 some lessons for small children appeared in the Youth's Instructor. In 1863 Uriah Smith wrote a series of 32 lessons for the seniors, and Adelia Patten wrote a two-year series of children's lessons. From 1864 to 1888 senior and youth lessons appeared regularly in the Youth's Instructor.

In 1869 G. H. Bell furnished two series of lessons, one for the children, beginning with the Old Testament, and one for the youth on the book of Daniel. These, later enlarged to eight yearly volumes, were used for 25 years.

Quarterlies and Other Periodicals. The development of lesson pamphlets and other periodicals is outlined here in order of origin (most of them in North America):

1885—The Sabbath School Worker, at first offering only instruction in teaching methods, but later including lesson helps for teachers and program helps for readers, enlarged to cover various Sabbath school divisions. In 1971 it reverted to only promotional, statistical, inspirational, and instructional material of a more general nature, with the specific program helps and teaching aids being published in 10 separate publications. In 1985 it was replaced by the Church Ministries Worker, which in 1990 was replaced by Action.

1889—The Senior Sabbath School Lesson Quarterly (preceded in 1888 and 1889 by three lesson pamphlets, each containing lessons for six months), published at the Pacific Press. In 1970 began an enlarged, loose-leaf edition, which included teacher's helps. In January 1973 the name changed to Adult Sabbath School Lessons. These lessons are also translated for use in various countries. As early as the 1880s they were published in the German, Swedish, Danish, and French periodicals, and they are published today in quarterly form in more than 100 languages.

The 1975—1981 series of adult Sabbath school lessons was entitled Daybreak Series. It provided for a broad, balanced, and connected study of the themes proclaimed by the three symbolic angels of Revelation 14. The name Daybreak pointed to the second advent of Jesus. The series was designed to encourage and aid Sabbath school members to prepare to meet Jesus and hasten His appearing.

From 1982 to 1984 the lessons were based on the covenant God has made with His people, beginning with Abraham.

From 1985 to 1999 all of the 66 books of the Bible were systematically studied—along with two quarters on SDAs' fundamental beliefs inserted in 1988 and 14 miscellaneous subjects such as health, the Holy Spirit, and pillars of Seventh-day Adventism.

1890—Our Little Friend, carrying the Sabbath school lessons for primary children under 9 years of age; since 1957 for cradle roll and kindergarten age.

1890—Senior Sabbath school lesson quarterlies in foreign languages (Danish, Swedish, French, and German), published at the Review and Herald.

1911, 1913—Primary and junior quarterlies, begun in Australia; introduced in the United States in 1920 and 1936, respectively.

The name was changed to Junior Bible Explorer in July 1972, and a complete format change came in January 1976. A change in the primary format began with the new cycle in January 1977 and again in October 1992.

1912—Missions Quarterly, containing mission stories for presentation in Sabbath schools to promote giving to missions. The name was changed to World Mission Report in January 1969. It now is called Mission.

1926—Braille Sabbath School Quarterly. Some Sabbath school lessons are available in Braille and in 16 2/3rpm records for blind and physically disabled—distributed through Christian Record Braille Foundation. Beginning in July 1973, a large-print adult quarterly was published—identical to the standard edition except photographically enlarged to 11" by 7 5/8", and beginning with January 1975, the adult Sabbath school lessons are available on cassettes with the content identical to the printed lessons but with a short introduction added. These are narrated by prominent Seventh-day Adventist leaders.

1933—1936—Lessons called Bible Stories for the Cradle Roll, by Rosamond D. Ginther, produced in five volumes for the five-year cycle then in use.

1940—The Youth Sabbath School Lesson Quarterly, published by the Review and Herald. In January 1972 the name was changed to Today's Youth Bible Discovery Guide, in January 1973 to Today's Youth Scripture Guides, and in 1982 to Cornerstone Connections.

1942—Four undated senior lesson quarterlies for branch Sabbath schools. These were discontinued in 1973. The "Profiles of Faith" lessons then became the recommended materials for this purpose and the pastor's class. In 1993 a new set of 27 lessons entitled "This We Believe" was published for this use along with a supplemental book with the same title written by Erwin Gane and Leo Van Dolson.

1945—My Bible Story, a weekly paper carrying the cradle roll Sabbath school lesson, discontinued in 1955.

1948—A series of children's lessons for branch Sabbath schools called Adventures in the Holy Bible. These were discontinued in 1974. For the next decade these sets were available: Neighborhood Bible Club Lessons and Neighborhood Bible Club Program Helps with 13 programs.

1952—The Junior Guide, now Guide, carrying at first the junior lesson; then both junior and earliteen lessons. Beginning in 1976, it began to carry only supplements because of the enlarged format of the lessons.

1953—Primary Lesson Exercises workbook. Discontinued in 1977.

1957—Primary Treasure, carrying the Sabbath school lesson for the primary children, aged 7 to 9. Lessons are also available in quarterly form.

1959—Lessons on doctrines prepared for the pastor's Bible class. These were revised in 1972 under the title Profiles of Faith. They contained 28 lessons and 11 coordinated books for supplementary reading. Since 1993 the two This We Believe quarterlies and the supplemental book of the same title are being used for this purpose.

1962—Earliteen Sabbath School Lesson Quarterly, produced for the young people in grades 9 and 10, changed the next year to grades 7 and 8 (12—14 years of age); these lessons are carried also in Guide.

Until 1990 five teacher training courses had been made available through the General Conference Sabbath School Department (Teaching Teachers to Teach, by Eric B. Hare; Handbook for Sabbath School Teachers, by H. W. Lowe; Teach, by S. S. Will; and Called to Teach a Sabbath School Class, by LaVeta Payne; and Performance in Sabbath School Teaching—student and instructor's manuals, cassette and slides or filmstrips). Also there was one from Home Study International (Teaching in the Sabbath School).

In January 1971 Program Helps and Teaching Aids were begun as separate publications on seven levels from cradle roll through adult. Other aids are available such as memory verse cards and Picture Rolls—published by the Review and Herald for the General Conference Church Ministries Department. Also available are felt materials and miscellaneous items from independent Seventh-day Adventist producers of Sabbath school supplies.

The earliest Sabbath school supplies, the memory verse cards (black and white), were first used in 1906, and changed to color in 1915; also in 1915 there was introduced a series of Eyegate Pictures (no longer used) to illustrate the children's lessons, and the Picture Rolls (now in one-year and three-year cycles of lessons for primary and younger children).

In 1921 sand table cutouts were introduced (purchased then from other publishers); then in 1926 the Children's Color Set (later Child's Home Color Set). Now replaced by felt sets of the Bible.

In 1952 the flannel board cutouts were introduced, followed by various patterns, pictures, and other visual aids. Now replaced by felt sets of the Bible.

In 1961 through 1965 came Program Helps for Kindergarten Leaders in the three-year cycle, and then similar helps for the primary department; also the cradle roll helps in a one-year cycle. These were discontinued in 1971.

In 1964 was issued: Louise Meyer, How to Conduct Cradle Roll and Kindergarten Institutes and Workshops. This was revised in 1974.

In 1965 the following were issued:

William J. Harris, A Manual for Conducting Sabbath School Institutes and Workshops for Leaders and Teachers of the Primary Division. It was revised in 1974 and entitled How to Conduct Primary Institutes and Workshops. R. Curtis Barger, How to Conduct Junior and Earliteen Division Institutes and Workshops.

Ethel Grace Stones, Finger Plays for Tiny Tots, Cradle Roll (revision of Finger Plays for Tiny Tots by same author).

Ethel Grace Stones, Finger Plays for Tiny Tots, Kindergarten (revision of Finger Plays for Tiny Tots by same author).

Louise Meyer, Pointers and Patterns for Teachers of Tiny Tots, Nos. 3 and 4, revised.

Vera Groomer, Illustrating Sabbath Songs for Cradle Roll [© 1967].

Vera Groomer, Illustrating Sabbath Songs for Kindergarten [© 1968].

Also available are Vacation Bible School program and nature materials on three levels (kindergarten, primary, junior) for a three-year cycle and camp meeting lessons on three levels (cradle roll, kindergarten, primary) on a three-year cycle. These were revised in 1976, 1984, and 1993.

A program for collegiate Sabbath school lessons was begun by Union College and taken over by the General Conference in 1986, initiating the Collegiate Quarterly.

1985—five departments—Home and Family, Lay Activities, Sabbath School, Stewardship, Youth—merged to form the Department of Church Ministries.

Books. The department has sponsored a number of books by our publishing houses for Sabbath school workers:

Sabbath Sentinel

SABBATH SENTINEL (1884; monthly; SDA Publishing Association). The earliest Seventh-day Adventist periodical devoted to religious liberty. It was a four-page tabloid-sized magazine established to oppose Sunday laws and to present the seventh-day Sabbath as the true day of Christian worship. In the year of its existence more than 500,000 copies of the magazine were circulated. It was suspended because of the lack of sufficient editorial help.

Sabbaths, Annual (ceremonial)

SABBATHS, ANNUAL (ceremonial). Special rest days in connection with the yearly festival cycle, not related to the seventh-day Sabbath or to the weekly cycle. Each of these other sabbaths, or days of rest, fell on a fixed day of the year, and thus on a different day of the week from one year to the next. They are therefore properly called annual sabbaths, in contrast with the weekly Sabbath. These days, on which work was forbidden “beside the sabbaths of the Lord” (Lev. 23:38), were:

15th day, 1st month—1st day of Unleavened Bread (Lev. 23:6—7).

21st day, 1st month—7th day of Unleavened Bread (Lev. 23:8; cf. v. 11).

6th day, 3rd month—Day of Pentecost (Lev. 23:16, 21).

1st day, 7th month—Feast of Trumpets (Lev. 23:24, 25).

10th day, 7th month—Day of Atonement (Lev. 16:29—31).

15th day, 7th month—1st day of Feast of Tabernacles (Lev. 23:34, 35).

22nd day, 7th month—7th day of Feast of Tabernacles (Lev. 23:36).

In his monumental work History of the Sabbath pioneer SDA scholar J. N. Andrews set forth several reasons for making a distinction between these annual sabbaths and the seventh-day Sabbath of the weekly cycle. The annual sabbaths, he pointed out, were part of the ceremonial system that pointed forward to the life and death of Christ, and ceased to have meaning when He expired upon the cross. Furthermore, he noted finally, the full ritual observance of these annual sabbaths lapsed with the permanent cessation of the Temple services at the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 (1862 ed., pp. 87—92).

This was not, of course, original with Andrews. He himself cited a passage from William Miller (p. 87ⁿ), and probably Miller got the idea from some Protestant writer before him, for standard Protestant creeds have stated that the Ten Commandments were not abolished. In the first issue of the first Sabbathkeeping Adventist periodicals James White had answered the objection with the argument that the Sabbath is not a “shadow” (Present Truth 1:10, August 1849), also at greater length, citing several ceremonial sabbaths (ibid. 1:52, March 1850).

While the weekly Sabbath was ordained at the close of Creation week for all humanity, the annual sabbaths were an integral part of the Jewish system of rites and ceremonies instituted at Mount Sinai, which belonged exclusively to the Hebrew people in OT times, which pointed forward to the coming Messiah, and the observance of which terminated with His death on the cross.

Sacramento Adventist Academy

SACRAMENTO ADVENTIST ACADEMY. A coeducational day school on the senior high school level, with an associated grade school, at 5601 Winding Way, Carmichael, California, serving the Seventh-day Adventist churches of the Greater Sacramento area. It has a total staff of 39 for all 12 grades, 290 elementary students, and 190 secondary students. The secondary school is a member of the Association of Seventh-day Adventist Institutions of Higher Education and Secondary Schools and of the Western Association of Schools and Colleges.

A 10-grade union school was organized in the Sacramento area in 1948 when the church schools operated by Sacramento Central, Fair Oaks (now Carmichael), Roseville, North Sacramento, and Oak Park churches combined. Fifty-three acres (20 hectares) were purchased on the Winding Way site, on which four two-classroom units of frame and stucco were built. School opened with F. Victor Anderson as principal, four teachers, and an enrollment of 120.

Buildings erected later included a cement-block building used as a garage for bus maintenance and as a shop for manual arts training; a duplex for teachers; an addition to the original buildings, comprising two classrooms, a library, administrative office, and an open breezeway centered in the building; a gymnasium-auditorium seating 1,500, music studios, three elementary classrooms, and a science laboratory.

Eleven grades were offered during the school year of 1957—1958. In the fall of 1958 a complete elementary and secondary program was offered, and the name was changed from Sacramento Junior Academy to Sacramento Union Academy.

Thirteen (five hectares) of the original 53 acres (20 hectares) were sold in the summer of 1958 to help provide funds for an additional classroom at each end of the academy unit, for modernizing the office and library space, and for remodeling a cottage to serve as a home economics unit.

In 1964 a new secondary unit was opened. The block-and-stucco building houses four classrooms, a science laboratory, library, administrative offices, and four teacher offices. The auditorium building was remodeled. Locker rooms with showers were installed, a room was given for choir activities, and an enlarged area provided for band.

A 17,350-square-foot (1,600-square-meters), brick and resawn redwood library-administration complex, costing $402,000, was completed in December 1973. This contemporary design structure houses the present library, administrative offices, a multipurpose room with adjacent kitchen, first-aid and conference rooms, teachers' lounge, and workroom. The former academy unit was remodeled to provide two additional classrooms and five teacher offices. Exterior remodeling for the auditorium, outside lighting, new walks, and landscaping were also included during 1973. The constituency voted in 1985 to change the name to Sacramento Adventist Academy. In 1987 a new home economics and science complex was added.

Principals: F. Victor Anderson, 1948—1949; T. R. Waterhouse, 1949—1953; E. Kenneth Smith, 1953—1956; M. Grey Banta, 1956—1959; Perry G. Baden, 1959—1966; Warren Minder, 1966—1970; Erwin Mack, 1970—1972; Shigenobu Arakaki, 1972—1974; Cecil Gemmell, 1974—1980; Myron Whiting, 1980—1985; Eris Kier, 1985—1989; Richard Carey, 1989— .

Sacraments

SACRAMENTS. Religious rites signifying the special bestowal of divine grace upon those who participate in them. In common with most Protestants, Seventh-day Adventists recognize baptism and the Lord's Supper as sacraments. Seventh-day Adventists believe these sacred rites to be outward signs of the inward operation of God's saving grace upon the heart. They do not believe that these rites, in and of themselves, confer grace, but that they accompany the work of grace, and that by participating in them the recipient testifies to his or her faith in, and acceptance of, grace. For this reason SDAs prefer not to use the word "sacrament," which in a technical theological sense is often understood as implying that the rite itself confers grace.

In A.D. 1215 the Fourth Lateran Council fixed the number of sacraments at seven, with the addition of confirmation, marriage, ordination, penance, and extreme unction, and decreed them to be channels of grace. Seventh-day Adventists regard marriage, ordination, and the anointing of the sick as solemn religious rites having a scriptural basis, but prefer to reserve "sacrament"—if, indeed, it is used at all—for those rites that signify the reception of God's saving grace. Seventh-day Adventists find no NT basis for either confirmation (which presupposes infant baptism) or penance (which presupposes that righteous acts a person may perform earn merit before God). In harmony with our Lord's command in John 13:14, SDAs do, however, practice the ordinance of humility, or foot washing. In Seventh-day Adventist polity, only an ordained minister may perform baptism or conduct a wedding or ordination service. In a church in which the individual has been elected to serve and in the absence of an ordained minister, an ordained local church elder may conduct the Lord's Supper or anoint the sick and, under special circumstances, baptize (see Baptism).

Safeliz Publishing House

SAFELIZ PUBLISHING HOUSE (Editorial Safeliz). A publishing firm, without printing plant, operated at Madrid. Seventh-day Adventists in Spain realized from the beginning (1903) the value of publications to help them in their work. Thousands of tracts were sold or given away, and by 1907 there were colporteurs in Spain, and their number has increased through the years.

In 1911 John L. Brown arrived from Mexico to direct the colporteur work in Spain. Printing was done by a firm in Barcelona, where the headquarters of the Spanish Mission were situated. The health book Guia Práctica de la Salud (“A Practical Guide to Health”), by Dr. F. M. Rossiter, was sold with such success that many editions were required. Religious books were also sold.

The Spanish Publishing House was formally organized in Barcelona in 1915 by L. E. Borle under the name of International Tract Society, and so it continued for a number of years. In 1929 the publishing house was transferred to Madrid, the capital, which was also the headquarters of the Iberian Union Mission and the West Spanish Mission. There it operated under the name of Editorial Española (Spanish Publishing House), until it had to be closed in 1936, at the outbreak of the Spanish Civil War.

After reopening in Barcelona in 1951, it returned to Madrid the following year. Since 1953 the publishing house has been operating under the name of “Safeliz, Incorporated” (abbreviation of Salud y Felicidad, “Health and Happiness”). In 1969 a building providing space for offices, stock, and dispatch was purchased at Calle Aravaca 8, Madrid. The printing is done in commercial houses.

In 1988 a new three-floor building was added. In 1992 sales amounted to more than $1.2 million. At that time there were 19 regular employees and 70 regular literature evangelists. The publishing house specializes in SDA health literature, publishing several volumes in this area. Several other Ellen White and doctrinal books have been published. Two magazines being published in 1993 were the 24-page monthly church paper, La Revista Adventista, and Adventus, a 24-page quarterly missionary paper.

Sagunto Adventist College

SAGUNTO ADVENTIST COLLEGE (Colegio Adventista de Sagunto). A school in Sagunto, Spain, offering all levels from preschool through junior college. First known as Alenza Academy, the school was founded as a secondary school in Madrid in 1945 by Isidro Aguilar, who served as its director and also professor for the handful of students who studied there each year in preparation for advanced theological studies in the European seminary at Collonges.

The school was closed by official order in 1958, but in 1967 permission was granted to open a seminary in Valencia. For seven years Jose Lopez presided over the school family at what was known then as the Spanish Adventist Seminary. A department of Spanish for foreigners was added and in 1971 became part of the ACA (Adventist Colleges Abroad) program.

In 1970 Elder and Mrs. Werner Wild joined the staff as professors and counselors. Elder Wild also served as interim director in 1971. Sister Wild passed away in January of 1974 and was laid to rest in the village of Sagunto. Elder Wild continued serving until his death in 1976.

In the autumn of 1974 the school was moved to its first real campus, among the orange groves near Sagunto. The seminary was designated as the training school for both Portugal and Spain, and Pastor Ernesto Ferreira, former president of the Portuguese Conference, became head of the Theology Department. The school year opened with 60 students, under the directorship of Raul Posse.

During this period the school developed rapidly. A department of secretarial studies was added, the secondary school classes were recognized by the government, and to the two original buildings were added two apartment buildings for married students and for staff, a vocational arts building that later housed the Granovita health food factory, sports fields, roads, additional classrooms, and a women's dormitory. Enrollment increased to more than 200 students and included a strong secondary program and a growing elementary school besides the theology program and Spanish courses for foreigners.

From 1982 to 1986 the school continued its growth and development under the leadership of Carlos Puyol, presently president of the Spanish Union of Churches. During this period the women's dormitory was completed and two buildings with a total of six classrooms were built for the elementary school, which was then recognized by the state.

From 1987 to 1991 Jose Lopez was again placed at the head of the school. A new dining hall was built and plans were laid for the third elementary school building. A new maintenance building was constructed and the Granovita food industry became a separate and prosperous institution. An excellent physical fitness room was equipped in the basement of the men's dormitory.

Since 1991 Alberto Guaita has served as president of the school. Additional classrooms have been built for the Music Department and elementary school, and two of the sports areas have been improved.

At present the number of students has stabilized at around 650 during the school year, making CAS the largest European Seventh-day Adventist educational institution. The summer school program is still growing and developing, presently including secondary school classes, Spanish for foreigners, and special courses for lay leaders from churches throughout Spain.

Sahmyook Junior Nursing College

SAHMYOOK JUNIOR NURSING COLLEGE. A coeducational boarding school on the junior college level, operated by the Korean Union Conference. It is located within the Seoul Adventist Hospital compound. The school was established in 1936 by Dr. George Rue under the name Nursing Training School of the Kyung Sung Sanitarium Hospital. Ernestine Gill was the first principal.

Eight students were accepted when school opened and seven were graduated in April of 1939. The school was closed by the Japanese government in May 1943 and reopened in November 1947 as Hospital Nursing High School with Irene Robson as principal. The approval of the Ministry of Health was obtained in June 1948 and the institution was again renamed, this time as Seoul Sanitarium Hospital Nursing High School.

During the Korean War the school moved to Cheju Island, returning to Seoul in September 1951. In January 1958 it received approval from the Ministry of Education as Seoul Sanitarium Hospital Nursing Technical High School. In December 1978 it took the name of Sahmyook Nursing Junior College, offering a three-year nursing course. The college moved to Sahmyook University in March 1984, and then relocated to its present site in 1991. A total of 1,254 students have graduated (76 men and 1,176 women).

Principals: Ernestine Gill, 1936—1939; Mrs. R. S. Watts, 1940—1941; Chung Sa Young, 1942—1943; Irene Robson, 1947—1955; Grace L. Saigon Adventist Hospital

SAIGON ADVENTIST HOSPITAL (Bệnh-Viên Co'-Dôc). A 120-bed general hospital formerly operated at Saigon, Vietnam, by the Southeast Asia Union Mission.

Some time prior to 1940, a sea captain by the name of Thomas Hael donated $4,500 to begin Seventh-day Adventist medical work in Indochina, of which Vietnam was then a part. However, because of restrictions by the French administration, it was impossible to begin such work at that time, and the money was used to help the medical work in Thailand.

In 1952 the Vietnam Mission received permission from the government to open a medical institution. With the help of a $2,500 contribution by the Bangkok Adventist Hospital, a small hospital was opened in Saigon in May 1955. Contributions were received also from friends in the United States and from the Vietnamese.

The mission made its office building available to Dr. E. O. Winton and his wife, who pioneered this project. The hospital was subsequently enlarged to a bed capacity of 38, and a new and larger operating room was added. With Mrs. Edwin Brooks as director, a nursing course was offered.

A new hospital building was begun February 1972 on land owned by the Seventh-day Adventist church on Cach Mang Street. This new building would provide 140 beds when fully occupied.

In 1973 the hospital moved from the original location to the former United States Army Third Field Hospital, which was made available by a contract with the United States Government. At first 120 beds were used. The hospital was scheduled to be moved at the completion of construction. Early in 1975 the construction program was stopped temporarily owing to the lack of construction funds. In April of that year, the hospital was closed.

Medical Superintendents: E. O. Winton, 1955—1958; Edwin Brooks, 1958—1960; F. D. Thoresen, 1962—1967; F. A. Mote, 1967—1969; Jess Holm, 1969—1971; G.H.A. MacLaren, 1971—1972.

Administrators: Vernon L. Small, 1972—1974; H. A. Rudisaile, Jr., 1974—1975.

Saigon Adventist School

SAIGON ADVENTIST SCHOOL. A school originally established at Giadinh. On the opening day, Sept. 30, 1947, 16 students were enrolled with two teachers in charge of all the classes. The following year the school grew to 125 students, with a staff of six teachers. The school functioned until 1952, when it was dissolved.

A new school with 24 students, all from Seventh-day Adventist homes, opened in one of the mission headquarters dependencies at Phu-Nhuan.

It was closed during the 1957—1958 school year, but reopened on Aug. 3, 1959, with the last four grades of elementary education, and the first year of secondary education, staffed with four SDA teachers. Of the 26 students enrolled, 20 came from Seventh-day Adventist homes. The school was constantly upgraded until its completion of the first cycle of secondary education or grade 9, in 1965. In 1966 grade 10, and the following year grade 11, and in 1970 grade 12 were added, making the school a full senior high school. From 1969 the school was administratively detached from the Vietnam Adventist Training School, under the name of Saigon Adventist School, or Truong Co-Doc Saigon, with Le Huu as principal.

A new six-room building was constructed in 1966 to house the high school; and in 1971 a prefabricated structure was erected to accommodate an auditorium, a library, and a science laboratory. In the same year a new building was constructed to house the kindergarten school. The enrollment grew to 1,090 students for the 1974—1975 school year. On Mar. 3, 1975, Southeast Asia Union College Extension School began its first course at Saigon Adventist School with 24 students. Because all young men of military age were being drafted, the enrollment at the extension school dropped to two within a few days. Late in April 1975 the school was closed.

Principals: R. H. Wentland, Jr., 1959—1961; R. K. Tilstra, 1962; W. A. Burton, 1963—1965; Le Huu (acting), 1965—1966; David Gouge, 1966—1967; Ralph Neall, 1967—1968; Le Huu, 1969—1975.

Saint

SAINT. A person set apart, or dedicated, to holy use or service (Heb. qadôsh, Aram. qaddîsh, Gr. hagios, meaning “holy one,” “one separated,” or “set apart.” The KJV also translates the Heb. chasîd, “pious one,” “saint” 19 times). The distinguishing feature of “holiness” in the OT, in contrast with other Semitic religions, is that it was rooted in the person of YHWH, who made His holiness known through His name and His mighty acts for His people (Amos 2:6 ff.; 4:2; Hosea 11:9; Isa. 5:16). Accordingly, His people were “a holy people,” chosen and set apart, and thus “saints” (Ex. 19:6; Deut. 7:6; 14:2). This is particularly notable in Daniel, where the people of God are repeatedly called “saints” (Dan. 7:18, 21, 22, 25, 27). In the NT, Jesus is the “Holy One—(Luke 4:34; John 6:69; Rev. 3:7; cf. John 10:36), that is to say, He whom the Father has especially set apart. Christians, as the “elect of God” (cf. Isa. 65:9; IQS VIII, 6), are also “holy” (Col. 3:12; 1 Peter 2:9), i.e., “saints” (Rom. 1:7; 1 Cor. 1:2; 2 Cor. 1:1, etc.).

The applicability of “saint” to Christians in general derives both from the thought of their being, like Israel, the chosen people, and from their particular act of consecration in baptism. At the same time, hagios has strong ethical implications (1 Cor. 7:34; Col. 1:22; 1 Peter 1:15). In eschatological passages it may refer at times also to angels (1 Thess. 3:13; 2 Thess. 1:10; cf. Dan. 4:13; Zech. 14:5). In the Revelation, as in Daniel, the people of God, particularly in persecution and struggle with evil, are known as “saints” (Rev. 13:7, 10; 14:12; 16:6; 17:6; 18:24; 20:9). Early Seventh-day Adventist literature frequently used “saint” in this apocalyptic context to refer to God’s remnant (cf. Isa. 4:3) who stand true in the time of trouble (see Jacob’s Trouble, Time of) and remain faithful till Christ’s second coming.

St. Helena

ST. HELENA. A small island situated in the South Atlantic Ocean, 1,200 miles (2,000 kilometers) west of the African coast. With its dependencies (Ascension Island and the Tristan da Cunha group) it is administered as a British colony. The area of the island of St. Helena is 47 square miles (120 square kilometers). In 1993 the population was 6,182. The people are of mixed European, Asian, and African descent, most of them members of the Anglican Church.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. The territory of St. Helena, along with Ascension Island and Tristan da Cunha Islands, constitutes St. Helena Island Mission, which in turn is a part of the Southern Africa Union Conference, an attached field directed from the General Conference. In 1994 there was one church, with a membership of 73.

The first Seventh-day Adventist worker on the island was P. F. Fouche, of South Africa, who made a brief exploratory visit early in 1941. An interest was awakened, and A. G. Kohlen from the Cape Field was sent in March 1942 to develop it. He distributed SDA publications and held open-air meetings, but wartime conditions compelled him to withdraw after two months. H. P. Campher established permanent work in 1949, and this led to the organization of a church of 17 members on Nov. 17, 1951.

The church property was purchased in 1950 and the existing buildings reconstructed into a church and manse. In 1988 a hall was built and used as a church until the old church was extensively rebuilt and enlarged to accommodate the increasing membership. This work was completed in September 1990. In 1993 two new Sabbath school classrooms for children were under construction.

Eight pastors have served on the island of St. Helena since the work began. The work is not easy, as there are seven different denominations represented in the small area.

The church has a large group of youth who are well known for their outreach work in the form of gospel musical programs, and also for their Pathfinder activities, which are carried out in full uniform. The youth are often sought by other churches and local authorities to lead out in special services. More than 60 percent of the church members are under the age of 40.

The church conducts occasional epilogues at the close of the day for the local radio station. A radio church service is broadcast every fifth Sunday evening. The current pastor has a live Radio Gospel Hour every Thursday evening at which time gospel music is played.

Because of the size and location of the island, which is serviced by a ship once every 8—10 weeks, and lack of funding needed to maintain the physical plant, outreach is not as effective as it might be.

St. Helena Hospital and Health Center

ST. HELENA HOSPITAL AND HEALTH CENTER. An institution located three and a half miles (six kilometers) northeast of St. Helena and some 70 miles (110 kilometers) north of San Francisco, in Napa County, California. The oldest continuously operating Seventh-day Adventist hospital in the world, SHH is a regional provider of acute-care services for Napa, Lake, Mendocino, Solano, and Sonoma counties. With 188 licensed beds and 42 residential health center beds, the hospital brings to the region diverse specialties such as cardiovascular surgery, pulmonary rehabilitation, mental health, oncology, preventive medicine, progressive women's programs, and complete home health and hospice services.

The site for the institution was selected in the summer of 1877 when J. N. Loughborough and I. D. Van Horn visited W. A. Pratt, a new convert living three miles (five kilometers) from town, to interest him in building a new church in St. Helena. Impressed by the view from Pratt's home, the serenity of the area, and the delicious drinking water from a mountain spring, Loughborough considered this an ideal location for the West Coast health institution foreseen by Ellen White.

Pratt, willing to give a shelf of land 300 feet (90 meters) up the mountainside for the purpose, spoke to Mrs. White about the site. When she said that she had seen the area in vision, Pratt agreed to give 10 and a half acres (four hectares), an interest in the spring of water, and $3,000; while a neighbor, A. B. Atwood, gave $1,000, and Merritt G. Kellogg, a Rutherford physician, gave another $1,000.

Work was begun on the two-story frame building, 28' x 72' (9 m. x 22 m.), in January 1878. Bricks for the foundation were made of local clay, which happened to be of excellent quality, dug from the hillside and burned in kilns in Pratt's yard. The new institution, called the Rural Health Retreat, opened June 7, 1878, and by 1891 was described as the largest sanitarium of the kind on the Pacific Coast.

The institution was renamed St. Helena Sanitarium in the 1890s, and in 1907 a four-story hospital was added. In her dedicatory address Ellen White said, in part: "The great reason why we have sanitariums is that these institutions may be agencies in bringing men and women to a position where they may be numbered among those who shall someday eat of the leaves of the tree of life, which are for the healing of the nations.

"Our sanitariums are established as institutions where patients and helpers may serve God. We desire to encourage as many as possible to act their part individually in living healthfully. We desire to encourage the sick to discard the use of drugs and to substitute the simple remedies provided by God, as they are found in water, in pure air, in exercise, in general hygiene.

"In this place where we have met today, the very surroundings exert an influence in calling us to higher and purer lives."

Mrs. White, always actively interested in the institution, lived for a time in a cottage on sanitarium property; after the turn of the century she settled near the institution, at her Elmshaven home, where she lived until her death in 1915. Her counsel and the large collection of neighborly letters from her are still highly prized.

A modern five-story hospital wing was opened in 1950. In 1968 the original sanitarium building was replaced by a new five-story facility. Soon thereafter the name was again changed to St. Helena Hospital and Health Center. An ancillary wing—housing clinical laboratory, medical imaging, rehabilitation services, the operating rooms and the intensive care unit—was completed in 1980. The newest building on the campus is the Professional Office Building, occupied by physician offices and an outpatient pharmacy. In 1992 “and Health Center” was dropped from the hospital’s identity, because several centers of excellence had emerged that were part of the hospital but not part of the health center.

The institution developed many important projects. The Pacific Health Journal was suggested in 1884 as a joint enterprise with the Pacific Press. Edited by J. H. Waggoner, it began publication in 1885. It later became Life and Health. A nursing school was launched in 1891, one of the first in the West. A health food factory established in 1901 was well known for a time for its widely sold cereal, breads, and fruit crackers.

For a time there were several branch institutions; the 1901 directory lists branches of the St. Helena Sanitarium in San Francisco, Sacramento, and Eureka, California, and in Honolulu, Hawaii.

From the first, the institution has adhered to the standards of the Seventh-day Adventist medical work, emphasizing restorative therapy, preventive medicine, health education, and the directing of patients and guests to the Great Physician. The decade of the 1970s saw a revival of the health center concept upon which the institution had been founded a century earlier. New residential programs were developed to support participants in making positive lifestyle changes. Live-in programs include:

- Alcohol and chemical dependency recovery (ACRP)
- Smoking cessation
- The McDougall program (promoting improved health through exercise, stress-reduction techniques, and a low-fat, no-cholesterol diet)
- Pain rehabilitation
- Pulmonary evaluation and rehabilitation
- PrimeLife Fitness
- Personalized and executive health appraisal

Peaceful valley vistas, clear air, scenic outdoor walks, and vegetarian meals are still among the most effective treatments for participants in Health Center wellness programs.

The vision of what St. Helena could do to help people has broadened through the years. Early in the 1970s two physician brothers—one a cardiologist, the other a cardiovascular surgeon—joined the medical staff. Their dream was to pioneer a sophisticated heart program at this small hospital. On Apr. 9, 1972, the first angiogram was performed at St. Helena. Exactly two years later, in 1974, the first coronary artery bypass was performed. As the North Bay’s leader in cardiac care with an extensive cardiology referral network that spans five counties, St. Helena’s cardiac team performed its five thousandth open-heart surgery in 1992.

The hospice movement in the United States was only 5 years old when visionaries at St. Helena launched a home-based hospice program in 1980. In early 1992 a 23-bed transitional care unit opened for patients who no longer need acute care but are unable to care for themselves at home.

In June of 1992 the hospital opened the Women's Center in the neighboring community of St. Helena, providing state-of-the-art mammography and osteoporosis testing and health education.

Currently a member of Adventist Health System/West, St. Helena Hospital's statement of mission expresses a commitment to creating an effective environment for healing the whole person—physically, emotionally, and spiritually.

St. Helena Hospital is fully accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Healthcare Organizations.

St. John, Hiram Allen

ST. JOHN, HIRAM ALLEN (1840—1917). Minister, writer on church polity, and a member of the first committee selected to prepare a church manual. He began to teach in the country schools in Ohio when he was about 17, and about that time, together with his parents and a group of neighbors, accepted the Seventh-day Adventist beliefs through Bible study and the reading of SDA publications. In 1867 he married Delotcy C. Wolcott and soon after began preaching. In 1872 he was ordained to the ministry. He worked in Ohio, serving as president of the Ohio Conference from 1875 to 1879 and from 1882 to 1883. Later he moved to California, hoping to find relief from asthma. He preached throughout California and for several years taught Bible and history at Healdsburg College. His last appointment was to the chaplaincy of the St. Helena Sanitarium.

St. John's Seventh-day Adventist Academy (Newfoundland)

ST. JOHN'S SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST ACADEMY (Newfoundland). A co-educational day school on the senior high school level, situated in the city of St. John's, Newfoundland.

The school began in 1905 as a church school in the home of Mrs. Anna Pippy, the first Seventh-day Adventist convert in Newfoundland. Originally it was an ungraded school taught by its first teacher, Elizabeth Milley. Shortly afterward it was transferred to the basement of the Cookstown Road church, and in 1923 moved to its present location on Freshwater Road. The school was altered and enlarged in 1931, 1938, 1944, and 1971. In 1931, under John Combden, it became an academy, which in Newfoundland constituted 11 grades only. In that same year the Newfoundland Academy came under government supervision and adopted the provincial courses of study. Despite this governmental supervision and assistance, the academy has enjoyed complete freedom to operate its denominational program and to conduct Weeks of Prayer and Bible classes in each grade.

In 1965 land was purchased and a new school built accommodating grades 3, 4, 5, and 6. A later addition to this building made it possible to house kindergarten to grade 6, thus affording needed space at the original building site for an expanded high school program.

In 1993 the elementary had 86 students and the academy 78, with the twelfth grade being added to the curriculum recently. Scholarships and awards won by the academy students indicate the quality of education given.

Sakshus Old People's Home

SAKSHUS OLD PEOPLE'S HOME. A home for the aged at Hundhamaren, seven miles (11 kilometers) north of Trondheim, Norway. The institution is owned and operated by the East Norway Conference. The home is housed in a wooden three-story building that was erected in 1942 by the German Occupation Army for its officers, purchased on July 1, 1951, by Seventh-day Adventists in Norway for $10,500 (75,000 Norwegian kroner). After improvements were made, the home was officially opened Jan. 27, 1952, with six patients. In 1993 it housed 21 patients, all in single rooms. Half of the patients are SDAs.

Directors: Ole Ranæs, 1957—1958; Ingvald Frantzen, 1958—1976; Arild Hegge, 1976—1980; Else Dekkerhus, 1980—1981; Inger Kvalen, 1981— .

Salabogi Ratu Meli

SALABOGI RATU MELI (d. 1939). Fijian chief and lay worker. His father, Ratu (Chief) Mara, was converted by early Methodist missionaries and became an ardent Christian. Ratu Meli was one of the first Seventh-day Adventist converts in Fiji, and for many years faithfully witnessed to his faith while holding a government position that made him responsible for the civil welfare of his district. Upon retirement he gave himself enthusiastically to mission work throughout Fiji and was everywhere highly respected. He visited Australia on behalf of mission work and in 1926 was a delegate to the General Conference.

Salau, Robert

SALAU, ROBERT (1900—1973). Pioneer missionary, teacher, and administrator. Robert Salau was about 20 years old when the Seventh-day Adventist Mission came to his village on Vella Lavella, Solomon Islands, in 1919. Oti, another Solomon Island teacher, and Salau went with G. F. Jones to set up a mission station at Matupi in 1928. When, because of the ill health of Captain Jones in 1929, Capt. Gilbert McLaren took over the superintendency of the work in New Guinea, Oti and Salau went with him to Mussau and Emirau. Their work on these two islands was so successful that within two years the entire population had forsaken heathenism and become Seventh-day Adventists.

In 1934 when Captain McLaren and 10 Mussau and Matupi teachers went into the Eastern Highlands of New Guinea to establish a mission at Kainantu, Salau was one of the number. In 1935 Oti and Salau pioneered the work on Manus, and during the war became acquainted with many of the American servicemen there. Oti and Salau pioneered on Lou Island, where all the population became SDAs. Salau was ordained to the gospel ministry after the war.

In 1949 Salau was selected to accompany A. G. Stewart on a tour of camp meetings in the United States. There he saw many of the GIs whom he had first met on Manus. On his return to New Guinea he was located on the mainland in administrative positions in the Sepik area, Central Highlands, and Port Moresby. In his later years he was on New Ireland and was in the Western Solomons when he retired in 1967.

Salemba Jakarta Academy

SALEMBA JAKARTA ACADEMY (Perguruan Advent School). A day school operated by the Salemba church under the control of the Jakarta Conference in Indonesia. The school began as a primary school and junior high school. The senior high school started in 1981. Its operation is combined with the elementary and junior high school. The students enrolled in the academy come from Jakarta primarily; however, some come from North Celebes, North Sumatra, Kalimantan, and East Java. In 1993 there were 211 enrollees at the school. More than 71 percent were Seventh-day Adventists.

Salève Adventist Institute

SALÈVE ADVENTIST INSTITUTE (Institut Adventiste du Salève). A coeducational senior college situated at Collonges-sous-Salève, Haute-Savoie, France, across the border from Geneva, Switzerland. Operated by the Euro-Africa Division, the school serves France in particular, but draws students from all Europe as well as from other continents. It is situated on a slope at the base of Mount Salève, overlooking Geneva. The campus originally had two main buildings and two smaller ones. An administration building was erected in 1928; a printing plant was established in 1936; new buildings were bought in 1949; a chapel was dedicated in 1962, then a house for the staff, comprising six apartments. A new dormitory for young men was opened in 1967 and a new elementary school in 1970. A new dormitory for young women was opened in 1975, a library in 1981, and a theology school building in 1987. New apartments for the teaching staff were added in 1992. In 1992—1993, enrollment was 395, and 34 teachers were employed, 26 of them full time.

The seminary has an elementary school with five teachers; a secondary school that prepares for the government examinations (brevet, baccalauréat); a school of modern French for foreigners, preparing for various examinations of the Alliance Française; a music school, and a school of theology offering a four-year course for a Master of Theology degree given by the French government in agreement with the University of Strasbourg. The school gives its own diplomas.

The forerunners of the present institute can be traced to Switzerland, in the early days of Seventh-day Adventist work in Latin Europe. In 1892, as the need of a missionary school was felt, an educational fund was planned. While looking forward to the establishment of a permanent school, short Bible courses were offered with encouraging results: in 1893—1894 in Peseux, near Neuchâtel, Switzerland, under Joseph Curdy; in 1895 in La Chaux-de-Fonds, Switzerland, under E. J. Waggoner; in 1901 in Geneva; and in 1902—1903 in Paris under the direction of B. G. Wilkinson.

The estate of “La Lignière,” Gland, Switzerland, was bought in 1904, and a permanent missionary school (listed in the SDA Yearbook as Latin Union School) was opened there that same year in connection with a school of nursing. The first principal of the school was Jean Vuilleumier (1904—1911). He was followed by Paul Steiner (1911—1917, except for a short interruption, 1914—1915, caused by the war).

When the school at Gland had to be closed, a Bible course was held in Nîmes, France, in 1919—1920 under the direction of J. C. Guenin. While the matter of the purchase of a property in France was under consideration, 50 students followed courses given again at Gland, 1920—1921, under the direction of Alfred Vaucher.

In 1921 the present site was purchased, and the Séminaire Adventiste du Salève was opened by L. L. Caviness, then educational secretary of the Latin Union Conference. It opened with an enrollment of 76 students and nine teachers and employees.

Salisbury, Homer Russell

SALISBURY, HOMER RUSSELL (1870—1915). Educator, administrator, editor. He was born in Battle Creek, Michigan, of Seventh-day Adventist parents. He grew up in Boulder, Colorado, attended Battle Creek College, 1888—1892, and was baptized in 1890. His first position in denominational employment was secretary to W. W. Prescott, the president of Battle Creek College. In 1893 he accepted a call from South Africa and taught in Claremont Union College for three years. In 1896 he went to London, England, to study Hebrew. From 1897 to 1901 he taught Hebrew and church history in Battle Creek College. In 1901, by request of the General Conference, he established a training school for workers in England, and remained with the school for five years. In 1904 he was ordained to the gospel ministry and in 1905 became president of the South England Conference, in addition to his work as head of the school. Three years later, 1907, the General Conference called him to Washington, D.C., to serve as president of the Foreign Missionary Seminary, which post he held until 1910 when he was elected secretary of the General Conference Department of Education and editor of Home and School magazine. He was called in 1913 to the responsibility of the presidency of the India Union Mission.

With the burden of India and its teeming millions resting upon him, he attended the Autumn Council of the General Conference held in Loma Linda, California, in the fall of 1915, and stirred the hearts of the delegates with his earnest and eloquent appeals for his needy field. Eager to get back to his post, he sailed from New York on the S.S. Persia. World War I was raging, and as his boat was sailing through the Mediterranean it was torpedoed and sunk, sending Salisbury to his death. One of the passengers who was rescued reported that he saw Salisbury throw his life belt to a struggling man who had no belt.

Salisbury, Wilbur Dixon

SALISBURY, WILBUR DIXON (1861—1947). Early, perhaps first, manager of Signs Publishing Company; sanitarium administrator. He grew up in Battle Creek, Michigan, where his father was superintendent of the Western Health Reform Institute, and where he attended Battle Creek College for a few terms. In 1878 or 1879 he began working in the pressroom of the Review and Herald, then moved to Pacific Press in 1885, and in 1890 went to England as a factory superintendent. From 1906 to 1909 he was manager of the Signs Publishing Company at Melbourne, Australia. In 1910 he became manager of the Washington Sanitarium, but when the health of his wife made advisable a move to California, he managed Loma Linda Sanitarium from 1912 to 1913. Then he retired from denominational service and established a wholesale cookie business.

Salvation

SALVATION. God's gracious provision for delivering sinners from the penalty and the power of sin, and for restoring them to their original state of perfection. The release of the sinner from condemnation is called justification; the process of character transformation is called sanctification; the restoration of immortality is called glorification. The plan of salvation was conceived in eternity past, and became operative when the first humans sinned and fell from their original state. The conditions of salvation have been the same throughout human history. The OT sacrificial system pointed forward to the cross, the focal point and keystone of the plan of salvation, and was made effective by the perfect life, vicarious death, and glorious resurrection of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ.

Salvation comes as a free gift of God's grace, and is accepted by faith in Christ. It is available to all, but becomes a reality only in the experience of those who, by their own free choice, accept it. It is not irresistible, as Augustine taught. The Seventh-day Adventist concept of salvation corresponds closely to the historic Methodist understanding, especially as set forth by John Wesley.

The ultimate objective of salvation is the restoration of God's image in humans, the eradication of sin from the universe, the confirmation of God's infinite love and justice to the eternal satisfaction of all created beings, and the establishment of universal and everlasting peace and security. See also Faith and Works; Justification; Law; Law and Grace; New Birth; Perseverance; Righteousness by Faith; Sanctification.

Sam Yuk Middle School

SAM YUK MIDDLE SCHOOL. A coeducational boarding and day school in Hong Kong, operated on the junior and senior high school level in English and Cantonese under the direction of the South China Island Union Mission. In 1992 there was an enrollment of 200 students in secondary forms 1—5 and a teaching staff of 15. The school is registered with the Education Department of Hong Kong and is supported primarily by government tuition grants. Ten percent of the students are Seventh-day Adventists. The school shares facilities with Hong Kong Adventist College, which is located on a 40-acre (16-hectare) site on Clearwater Bay Road, Kowloon, Hong Kong.

The school began in 1903 in south China as the first Seventh-day Adventist school taught in Chinese. It was originally located in Canton (now Guangzhou) but moved to Hong Kong in 1937 and then to the present location in 1939. (For a full history of the early years of the school and for principals before 1984, see Hong Kong Adventist College.)

Since 1984 the school has functioned independently from Hong Kong Adventist College, although the president of the college often serves as principal of the secondary school.

Samoa Adventist College

SAMOA ADVENTIST COLLEGE. A coeducational day school situated at mission headquarters in Apia, Western Samoa.

Established to meet the growing educational needs of Seventh-day Adventists in Samoa, Apia Central School was opened in 1951 with 40 pupils grades 1—4, in a room under the Apia church with Saunua Afamasaga as head teacher.

In 1952 the first overseas missionary teacher, C. R. Thompson, was appointed. He supervised 50 pupils in six grades, with two national assistants. Among other subjects, Bible and Samoan and English languages were taught. By the mid-1950s student enrollment reached 500 in nine grades, and a curriculum suitable to the needs of Samoan citizens was established and achievement standards were set.

Nine new classrooms were added, and in 1961 the school enrollment reached a peak of 719. The school gained popular public support through the Home and School organization and also by the high achievement of the students.

In 1979 grades 9—11 were transferred to Kosena (Goshen) College. Classes 1—8 continued in the Apia school, with forms 3 and 4 being added in the mid-1980s. With the closing of Kosena College in the late 1980s, form 5 was restored again, and the name Samoa Adventist College was adopted.

Two double-storied concrete-brick units replaced severely cyclone-damaged single-storied wooden facilities in 1993. At that time 500 students were enrolled in 11 grades.

Principals—Apia Central School: W. G. Litster, 1964—1970; O. L. Hughes, 1971—1973; C. E. Greive, 1974—1979. Kosena College: C. E. Samoa and Tokelau Islands

SAMOA AND TOKELAU ISLANDS. A group of nine islands in the South Pacific about 4,800 miles (7,700 kilometers) southwest of San Francisco and 1,600 miles (2,600 kilometers) northeast of New Zealand, known as Western Samoa, and a group of seven islands, southeast of Western Samoa, known as American Samoa.

The islands are small, with Western Samoa containing an area of 1,100 square miles (2,850 square kilometers), with the highest peak rising more than 6,000 feet (1,800 meters) on Savai'i Island. The seven eastern islands—Tutuila, Manua group, Rose Island, and Swains Island—compose American Samoa, which contains an area of 76 square miles (200 square kilometers). The climate is tropical and pleasant, with an annual rainfall of between 100 and 200 inches (250—500 centimeters). The islands are volcanic in origin. Tokelau, or Union Islands, are about 300 miles (500 kilometers) north of Samoa. They consist of three atolls called Atafu, Nukunonu, and Fakaofu, with a total land area of four square miles (10 square kilometers).

Politically, this area of Polynesia is divided into three sections: the Tokelau Islands, which are part of New Zealand and have a population (1991) of 1,577; American Samoa, a territory of the United States with the administrative capital at Pago Pago, and a total population (1993) of 52,860 (since 1977 American Samoans have elected their own governor); and the independent state of Western Samoa (independent since 1962), administered from Apia, with a total population (1991) of 204,000. The people are nominally Christian. In Western Samoa adherents are mainly Congregational, but also Roman Catholic, Methodist, Mormon, and Seventh-day Adventist.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. The Samoa Mission is composed of the Tokelau Islands and American and Western Samoa. This forms a section of the Central Pacific Union Mission, which is part of the South Pacific Division. Statistics (1992) for the Samoa Mission: churches, 23; companies, 41; combined membership, 6,926 (during the past 40 years, many members have migrated to the United States [including Hawaii], Australia, and New Zealand. Samoan Seventh-day Adventist churches are located in these areas); schools, elementary, 3; secondary, 2; with a total enrollment of 572 (1992); ordained ministers, 9; licensed ministers, 17. Headquarters: Lalovaea, Apia, Western Samoa.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. Ellen White visited Apia Nov. 27, 1891, on her way to Australia. Permanent work was first established by Dr. and Mrs. F. W. Braucht on the arrival of the mission ship Pitcairn, on Oct. 22, 1895. On Nov. 10, Dr. Braucht and Nurse Emily McCoy opened a medical center at Matautu, Apia. In 1896 the medical center moved to the suburb of Tufuiopa. Dr. M. G. Kellogg assisted in the construction of a two-story sanitarium (featured on a 1970 stamp issue). The medical work was highly successful, even treating patients suffering from filaria.

Medical work ceased in 1906 because of lack of personnel. In 1907 J. E. Steed and wife arrived to conduct evangelistic work, and in 1910 H. T. Howse and wife succeeded them. Both Steed and Howse spent several terms in Samoa. Other overseas field workers in later years were L. A. Butler, O. V. Hellestrand, W. R. Litster, R. Reye, J. F. Strange, S. T. Leeder, W. W. Petrie, J. T. Howse, H. A. Dickens, H. B. Christian, R. W. Taylor, J. R. Dobson, G. Helsby, I. W. White, D. I. Jenkins, F. W. Pearce, D. E. Hay, M. M. Kennaway, and G. Satchell.

For 20 years there were no converts among the Samoan people, then in 1915 three women and two men were baptized. During this time several part-European and European people accepted the message.

In 1934 the Samoan Mission was organized as part of what was then the Australasian Union Conference, with R. Reye as superintendent. Iiga Kuresa became the first national ordained minister in 1937. In 1949 the Samoan Mission became part of the newly organized Central Pacific Union Mission, with H. B. Christian as president.

A 30-minute Voice of Prophecy outreach in the vernacular has operated continuously since 1964 from radio station 2AP in Apia.

Delos Lake, a self-supporting missionary from the United States, established the first school in the year 1900. It was located about five miles (eight kilometers) east of Apia. Later schools were established by Mrs. H. T. Howse in 1911 at Apia; by H. W. Larwood in 1917 at Vailoa; by R. Reye in 1930 at Vailoa (Vailoa Missionary School); by Saunoa Afamasaga in 1952 at Apia (an English language school, which reached an enrollment of 719 students in 1961 in 11 grades).

For a number of years Vailoa Missionary School served as a training school for workers in Samoa, but it was closed in 1957 in favor of sending students to Union College in Fiji. A lay training school was begun at Vailoa in 1967, with 15 students enrolled in a two-year course.

Work began on the island of Savai'i, the largest island, in 1936 by Uta and Lautu, after they were joined by Tua and H. T. Howse. The first baptism occurred in Siufaga in 1937. Talosaga opened the first school in 1941.

In American Samoa work began at Pago Pago in 1944 under the guidance of Tini Inu, assisted by Pasi, a volunteer. The first converts were baptized at Pago Pago in 1948.

Literature work began in 1899 with the publication of Christ Our Saviour in the Samoan language.

Vai Kerisome, later Mrs. Head, of Niue Island, translated tracts into both the Samoan language and the Niuean language in 1909.

O le Tala Moni ("The True Story"), a monthly vernacular missionary paper, was first published in 1911. Bible Readings in Samoan appeared in 1915, Steps to Christ in 1937, and Prophetic Guidance in 1971, followed by The Great Controversy in 1991.

A large two-story community center was opened in 1973. A secondary boarding school, Kosena College, opened in 1979 with 96 pupils, but because of a dwindling enrollment, it closed in 1987.

San Cristóbal Adventist Secondary School

SAN CRISTÓBAL ADVENTIST SECONDARY SCHOOL (Colegio Adventista de San Cristobal). A coeducational secondary institution located in San Cristobal, Dominican Republic. The school offers a complete national secondary program, admitting to institutions of higher learning.

The school began with 14 students. It is now situated in a three-story cement block structure and offers a complete K-12 program. In 1993 San Cristóbal Adventist Secondary School had 653 students and 14 teachers.

Principals: Hilda Cordero, 1962—1964; Luz Nina, 1965—1971; Andrea Peña, 1971—1982; Petronila Santana, 1982—1992; Héctor Puello, 1992— .

San Diego Adventist Academy

SAN DIEGO ADVENTIST ACADEMY. A coeducational day school on the senior high school level at 2700 E. Fourth Street, National City, California. Owned by the Southeastern California Conference, it serves the local churches of the Greater San Diego metropolitan area. The academy is a member of the Association of SDA Institutions of Higher Education and Secondary Schools and the Western Association of Schools and Colleges.

The institution began functioning as a 12-grade school in 1930, with Richard B. Lewis as principal. The series of church schools and junior academies that eventually grew into the senior academy had its beginning in 1899. In that year San Diego's one Seventh-day Adventist church, under the pastorship of W. M. Healey and with only 48 members, six of whom were men, determined to provide Christian education for its children. The members rented a store building at 17th and K streets, constructed desks, and purchased old public school textbooks. Robert Sanders and his wife, from Healdsburg College, were employed as teachers for the 17-student school. Later, this grade school occupied successively a cottage across the street from the church, a large two-story building on 16th Street between Market and G (1906—1908), a school building erected in 1908 on 18th Street, south of Market Street (1908—1918), two buildings on a 100' x 100' (30 m. x 20 m.) lot at the northwest corner of 30th and G, in which the ninth grade was offered in 1918—1919, the tenth in 1919—1920, and 12 grades in 1930. The senior academy graduated its first class, four members, in 1931.

In 1932 the school was moved to a site between G and Market and 30th and 31st streets. The academy students numbered 50. Mrs. Belle Carr, matron, furnished and equipped the cafeteria at personal expense. The academy moved to its present location in the fall of 1947.

Principals: R. B. Lewis, 1930—1935; Calvin Pyle, 1935—1938; J. E. Young, 1938—1943; W. V. Albee, 1943—1947; C. C. Cantwell, 1947—1948; P. G. Baden, 1948—1949; J. C. San Fernando Academy

SAN FERNANDO ACADEMY. A coeducational boarding school operated by the Southern California Conference from 1902 to 1923. The school, housed in buildings formerly occupied by a Methodist theological school at San Fernando, opened with 50 students under the principalship of H. E. Giddings. At first called Fernando College, it included, in addition to the “regular” course, short training courses for mature students planning to enter the ministry, Bible work, medical missionary work, business, or teaching (including practice teaching in the elementary grades). Its curriculum varied from 11 grades to a year’s training beyond the twelfth grade.

In 1906 it was renamed Fernando Academy and in 1914 San Fernando Academy. When a separate Southeastern California Conference was organized in 1915, the school was operated by both conferences. However, when the necessity of replacing its antiquated plant was considered in 1920, the search for a site suitable for a new two-conference academy was unsuccessful. In 1922 the Southeastern California Conference opened a separate boarding school, La Sierra Academy. The Southern California Conference operated San Fernando one more year with reduced enrollment, then closed it in 1923. The same year the conference opened two day schools, Glendale and Los Angeles academies.

San Fernando Valley Academy

SAN FERNANDO VALLEY ACADEMY. A coeducational K-12 day school operated by the Southern California Conference. The school primarily serves the constituency of the San Fernando Valley.

Established in 1902 as a training school, it was operated through 1923 as Fernando Academy, then San Fernando Academy (see San Fernando Academy). It later was reestablished and took its present name in 1960 with E. J. Anderson as principal.

In 1993 there was a staff of 20 serving 119 elementary pupils, 47 junior high students and 82 senior high students.

San Gabriel Academy

SAN GABRIEL ACADEMY. A coeducational day school with grades K-12, situated at 8827 E. Broadway, San Gabriel, California. One of four such schools in the Los Angeles metropolitan area, it serves the 27 churches of the San Gabriel Valley.

The forerunner of San Gabriel Academy was the Alhambra church school, begun in 1933. The school moved to its present location in 1937 and in 1947 became the San Gabriel Union School, also serving the El Monte church. During 1954 the Home and School Association sponsored the building of a combined auditorium and classrooms. At the same time, adjoining land was purchased. In 1965 land was purchased for the elementary division one block north of the academy. This was completed in 1972.

A building unit, completed in 1959, including the science building and other classroom facilities, was the first stage of a master plan to provide eventually for 350 to 500 academy students. The ninth grade was first offered in 1955, and in 1957 the eleventh and twelfth grades were added.

A modern two-story building was constructed in 1989 to provide 11 classrooms as well as laboratories for science, home economics, and computer science.

The first twelfth-grade graduating class in 1960 had eight members. The graduating class of 1993 had 49 members.

Principals: W. E. Belleau, Jr., 1958—1962; J. W. Leary, 1963—1968; E. W. Kier, 1969—1971; R. D. Herbert, 1972—1981; K. Christensen, 1981—1987; Lisa Bissell, 1987—1992; Thambi Thomas, 1992— .

San Joaquin Community Hospital

SAN JOAQUIN COMMUNITY HOSPITAL. A 178-bed medical institution established in Bakersfield, Kern County, California, in 1910. After incorporating in the early 1920s, the hospital was purchased by Dr. Joseph Smith, a visionary who saw the future of the hospital as a professional medical and surgical institution.

In 1964 Dr. Smith invited a group of Seventh-day Adventists to form a nonprofit corporation to manage the hospital. The institution, which had been known as San Joaquin Hospital, became San Joaquin Community Hospital.

Meeting an obvious need, the hospital gravitated toward specialized cardiac care. A skilled heart surgical team was formed and SJCH became Kern County's leader in cardiac care. In 1987 the hospital became a member of the Adventist Health System/West, the largest nonprofit Protestant health-care corporation on the West Coast.

San Joaquin Community Hospital employs more than 800 people. In addition to its commitment to the diagnosis and treatment of heart disease, the hospital's programs include West HealthCare home health agency; Tender Touch, an in-home child care service for sick children; an Infusion Center; a Cardiac Rehab and Wellness Center; and a Women's Care Center.

San Marino

SAN MARINO. A tiny republic (area 24 square miles [60 square kilometers]; population [1992] 23,000, of Italian origin) entirely within Italy, near the Adriatic coast about 25 miles (40 kilometers) southeast of Ravenna. It is reputed to be the oldest state in Europe; tradition says that its history goes back to the fourth century. There are no Seventh-day Adventists in the republic. Sebastiano Rossitto went there in 1933 as the first literature evangelist. Literature evangelists go there regularly to distribute SDA publications.

San Marino is assigned to the Italian Union of Churches, a part of the Euro-Africa Division.

San Pasqual Adventist Academy

SAN PASQUAL ADVENTIST ACADEMY. A coeducational boarding high school, opened in 1949, owned and operated by the Southeastern California Conference, and situated on 240 acres (100 hectares) on Highway 78, 10 miles (16 kilometers) east of Escondido, California, and 35 miles (55 kilometers) from San Diego. It is accredited by the SDA Board of Regents and the Western Association of Schools and Colleges. The average enrollment is about 150 students. Buildings include a boys' dormitory, a girls' dormitory, an administration building, a classroom building, a building housing the library, chapel, and music conservatory, a cafeteria, an industrial education building, a church and several industrial buildings. Work opportunities are offered on the 40,000-bird chicken ranch, in the book bindery, cafeteria, dormitories, and packaging plant.

San Pasqual Adventist Academy grew out of the oldest continuously operated church school in California. In 1875 John B. Judson and his family settled in the San Pasqual Valley. He was the first Seventh-day Adventist preacher in southern California and established his first church in San Pasqual. William Potts urged the people of the valley to begin a church school. In 1896 the first school began in the home of Henry Johnson with three students. Alma McKibbin was the teacher. Then Peter Georgeson offered land, and L. O. Johnson and S. T. Bancroft brought lumber for the construction of the first school building. The school opened in 1899 with Loiza Elwell of Battle Creek, Michigan, as the first teacher. Then came Marie Barber, who later became Mrs. Chris Marchus.

The original building of this pioneer school still stands on the grounds of San Pasqual Adventist Academy. In 1943 a cement-block structure was erected, and part of the time ninth- and tenth-grade work was included. Later more land was acquired, buildings were erected, and by 1949 the new academy was opened.

Principals: R. J. Larson, 1949—1951; G. E. Smith, 1951—1954; R. L. Hubbs, 1954—1955; W. T. Weaver, 1955—1960; L. M. Stump, 1960—1965; N. C. Sorensen, 1965—1969; S. D. Bietz, 1969—1972; M. W. Longhofer, 1972—1979; Curtis Perkins, 1979—1989; Carlyle Skinner, 1989—1991; Berit Von Pohle, 1991— .

Sanborn, Isaac

SANBORN, ISAAC (1822—1913). Minister. He was converted in 1855, and was ordained by James White in 1856. Preaching until the time of his death, he worked in 19 states and Ontario, but the greater part of his ministry was in Wisconsin. He was the first president of the Illinois-Wisconsin Conference (1863—1867), which then comprised the states of Illinois and Wisconsin. He was one of the 20 delegates who organized the General Conference in 1863, was one of the committee of eight who drafted the constitution of the General Conference, and was also on the committee of five to recommend a constitution for the state conferences. He was an ardent supporter of the early health reform movement in the Seventh-day Adventist Church.

Sanctification

SANCTIFICATION. The lifelong process of character development subsequent to conversion, in contrast with justification. The latter establishes a right relationship with God, one in which the process of character development, or sanctification, becomes possible. NT writers speak of this process variously as a matter of following after righteousness and fighting the good fight of faith (1 Tim. 6:11, 12), of walking in newness of life (Rom. 6:4), of growing up into Christ (Eph. 4:15), of growing in grace (2 Peter 3:18), of being built up, strengthened, established (Col. 2:6, 7), being transformed (Rom. 12:2), of partaking of the divine nature (2 Peter 1:4), of patiently running the Christian race (Heb. 12:1). The goal of this process is ultimate perfection of character, the restoration of the image of God in the mind and character of God's people. Born-again Christians are perfect before God as a result of their acceptance of Christ's righteousness to atone for their past sins (Rom. 5:1), and of their personal commitment to cooperate with the transforming grace and power of Christ now at work in the mind and life (Rom. 12:1; Gal. 2:20). But this is relative perfection—it is theirs only by virtue of their relationship to Christ by faith. Although we must be continually growing in grace through the power of the Holy Spirit (the process of sanctification), absolute sinless perfection of character—the Christian's hope and ultimate goal—is attained only when the mortal nature puts on immortality (Phil. 3:12—15; 1 John 3:1). See also Faith and Works; Justification; Law; Law and Grace; Righteousness by Faith.

Sanctuary

SANCTUARY. Literally, “holy place”; in the OT, the center of public worship for the Hebrew nation. At first this was the tabernacle erected by Moses in the wilderness (Ex. 25:40), and later the Temple built by Solomon on Mount Moriah (1 Chron. 28:10—20), and, following the Babylonian exile, the second Temple. The sanctuary was God’s dwelling place among His people. The Mosaic tabernacle and its animal sacrifices and priestly ministry were “a figure for the time then present” that pointed forward to Christ, “who was once offered to bear the sins of many” and who became “an high priest of good things to come,” in “a greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands” (Heb. 9:9, 11, 28). “Jesus Christ was the foundation of the whole Jewish economy. . . . The whole system of types and symbols was one compacted prophecy of the gospel, a presentation of Christianity” (Ellen G. White, in Review and Herald 70:177, Mar. 21, 1893). The ritual system given to Israel was an object lesson through which God purposed to reveal the plan of salvation to His people in the long ago.

NT writers describe Christ’s atoning work for sinners in the terms of the OT types and symbols. Christ is “the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world” (John 1:29). He is “the Apostle and High Priest of our profession” (Heb. 3:1). The tabernacle on earth was “a copy and shadow of the heavenly sanctuary” (Heb. 8:5, RSV), “the true one” where “Christ has entered . . . to appear in the presence of God on our behalf” (Heb. 9:24, RSV). He enters into this holy place, taking not the blood of goats and calves but His own blood, thus procuring eternal redemption for us (v. 12). Each sacrifice typified the infinite sacrifice of Christ upon Calvary, and the priest who offered it represented the priestly ministry of Christ in heaven above. In and of themselves, the sacrifices could not atone for sin (Heb. 10:11). Only as penitent sinners grasped by faith the reality of the atonement yet to be provided by the Messiah did they find release from their sins (Heb. 9:15).

The ancient sanctuary service consisted of two distinct phases—the regular services conducted day by day throughout the year, by which repentant sinners were released from the guilt of their sins (for which the sanctuary assumed responsibility), and the yearly service on the Day of Atonement, when atonement was made for the sanctuary because of the sins from which release had been granted during the year.

Seventh-day Adventists see in these daily and yearly ritual services a type of two phases of Christ’s priestly ministry in the heavenly sanctuary. They consider that the various services conducted day by day represent Christ’s ministry for individual sinners, from the time of His ascension until the antitype of the Day of Atonement—the ceremonies of which, they believe, point to a special work accomplished by Christ toward the close of the Christian Era—a work of judgment that results in the blotting out of confessed sins from the record books of heaven, and the blotting out from the book of life of the names of those who have renounced Christ. This final phase they believe has been going on in the Most Holy Place of the heavenly sanctuary since 1844, a date derived from the prophetic period in Dan. 8:14 (see Twenty-three Hundred Days).

The Epistle to the Hebrews presents the ancient sanctuary service as a type of Christ's vicarious atonement on Calvary and His postascension mediatorial ministry. For this reason, Seventh-day Adventists consider a knowledge of the ancient service to be of importance and value to an understanding of the plan of redemption. In fact, a number of the distinctive Seventh-day Adventist teachings can be understood fully only in relationship to the sanctuary service and the ministry of Christ as the Christian's great High Priest as set forth in the Epistle to the Hebrews.

History of the Seventh-day Adventist Doctrine

History of the Seventh-day Adventist Doctrine. Background in Millerite View of Sanctuary. Seventh-day Adventists arose out of the Millerite movement of the 1840s. William Miller, founder and leader of the movement, based his teaching that the Second Advent would occur "about A.D. 1843," primarily on the declaration of Dan. 8:14: "Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed." Miller originally defined the sanctuary as the church (MS to Elder Andrus, 1831, p. 1; Evidences . . . on the Second Coming [1838], pp. 36—38), later as the earth and the church (Cleansing of the Sanctuary [1842], p. 8, cf. pp. 9—14). He concluded that its cleansing would be accomplished by the fires of the last day, in connection with the second coming of Christ. "In accordance with the opinions of all standard Protestant commentators," as he expressed it, he accepted the principle, based on Num. 14:34 and Eze. 4:4—6, that a day in symbolic prophecy stands for a year of literal time (Apology and Defence, p. 11). Accordingly, beginning the 2300 years in 457 B.C., he arrived at what he termed "about the year 1843," that is, 1843/1844, from spring to spring, as the time to expect the Second Advent.

Later an adjustment in Miller's chronology and time computation led to the expectation of the Second Advent in the autumn of 1844 on Oct. 22 (see Seventh-Month Movement).

With this seventh-month movement came an expanded understanding of the sanctuary types and symbols.

This broadened understanding is reflected in the following summary of the fulfillment of the types of the autumnal festivals at the Second Advent: "Thus the blowing of the great trumpet in the year of Jubilee, on the tenth day of the seventh month—a type of the trump of God, the last trump; the release of all captives, the canceling of all debts, and restoration of every man to his possessions, on the same day—typical of the great release; and the atonement of the High Priest for the sins of all Israel, his intercession therefore in the Holy of Holies, and his coming out from thence to bless the waiting congregation—typical of the completion of the intercession which Christ is now making, and of his coming out of heaven itself, to appear the second time unto those that looked for him without sin unto salvation, it was argued, fully demonstrated, that a day thus selected and set apart of God for the observance of so many ceremonials, typical of the greatest of all events, must be honored in the completion of the plan of salvation by the event itself" ([S.] B[liss], in Advent Shield 1:269, January 1845).

On the basis of Lev. 9:23, which is part of the record of Aaron's inauguration to the high priesthood, the Millerites held that at the close of the Day of Atonement the high priest came out and blessed the waiting congregation. Similarly, they held, Christ would come out of the Holy of Holies at His second advent to bless His waiting people. In the subsequent emphasis (in the seventh-month movement) on Christ's coming out of the Holy of Holies, that is, heaven, no one explained how the Holy of Holies—a part of the sanctuary—could be heaven itself, and yet the sanctuary could be the earth, to be cleansed by fire at the Second Advent.

Litch had, immediately after the spring disappointment, raised a doubt concerning the earth as the sanctuary, but this was not followed up, and the earth-sanctuary concept persisted. As late as 1847 Crosier, in the Day-Dawn, felt it necessary to argue this point at length before stating his conclusion: "There is no Scripture authority for calling any thing else the Sanctuary under the Gospel dispensation, but the place of Christ's ministry in the heavens. . . . If there be, let it be produced" (Day-Dawn 2:3, Mar. 19, 1847).

This unresolved paradox of the earth, or Palestine, as the sanctuary to be cleansed by the last-day fires, along with heaven as the Holy of Holies, needing no cleansing, still appears in 1853 in the editorials (presumably of Bliss) in the Advent Herald in controversy with J. N. Andrews in the Review and Herald (2:204, 205, May 12, 1853).

Edson's Idea and Crosier's Articles. The first step toward the Seventh-day Adventist understanding of the sanctuary came the day after the Great Disappointment. On the morning of Oct. 23, 1844, Hiram Edson and a Millerite friend after earnest prayer decided to visit the other Adventists in the neighborhood and encourage them. As they walked across Edson's cornfield, Edson dropped behind as his companion walked on. The conviction had suddenly come to him that "instead of our High Priest coming out of the Most Holy of the heavenly sanctuary to come to this earth on the tenth day of the seventh month, at the end of the 2300 days, that he for the first time entered on that day the second apartment of that sanctuary; and that he had a work to perform in the Most Holy before coming to this earth" (Hiram Edson, MS, "Life and Experience," fol. 9 verso).

It now became clear to Edson that the sanctuary to be cleansed was not the earth or some portion of it, but the heavenly sanctuary; that Oct. 22 marked the beginning and not the ending of the antitypical Day of Atonement.

Edson, Owen R. L. Crosier, and Franklin B. Hahn spent several months studying the subject of the sanctuary. Crosier wrote out their findings, which he published, according to Edson, in 1845 in the Day-Dawn (Canandaigua, New York), then more fully in the Day-Star Extra (Cincinnati), Feb. 7, 1846; also in the Day-Dawn, 1847, as already quoted (see reprint in Review and Herald 1:78—80, May 5, 1851). The 1845 Day-Dawn is extant only as a part of the Mar. 26, 1845, Ontario Messenger, a Whig newspaper published in Canandaigua. These articles discuss various uses of the term sanctuary in several Old Testament books, concluding that it is properly applied to the tabernacle built by Moses and to the Temple built by Solomon. This was the typical sanctuary. They then discuss the New Testament sanctuary as revealed in the book of Hebrews—the true sanctuary being in heaven, of which the Mosaic tabernacle was only a copy. Since, as Crosier reasoned, the heavenly sanctuary was the only one in existence at the end of the 2300—day prophecy, it must be the sanctuary to be cleansed.

Concerning Crosier's article in the Day-Star Extra, Ellen G. White wrote (in a letter to Eli Curtis, Apr. 21, 1847, which was printed in A Word to the "Little Flock") that "Brother Crosier had the true light on the cleansing of the Sanctuary, &c.," and highly recommended the Day-Star Extra.

Seventh-day Adventist View Developed. Crosier's expansion of Edson's heavenly sanctuary idea thus became the basis of the standard position of early Seventh-day Adventists. In one of the earliest extended discussions of the subject of the sanctuary in early SDA publications David Arnold wrote: "But what shall we understand by the cleansing of the antitypical sanctuary?"

"The Mosaic priesthood, sanctuary and services were all types or shadows, here on earth, of a heavenly priesthood, sanctuary and services; yet there is this difference between them. By reason of death the earthly had many priests, the heavenly but one: the earthly had many victims, the heavenly but one; the earthly sanctuary was cleansed at the end of every 364 days, the heavenly at the end of 2300 years. . . .

"In the earthly, sins were daily imputed, or laid upon the altar through the blood of the victims during the 364 days, and then the daily ministration ceased, and the cleansing commenced. In the heavenly sanctuary sins were daily imputed, or laid upon the altar through the blood of Christ, our victim, during the Gospel dispensation, or time of the Gentiles, which ended with the 2300 days, and then the cleansing commenced. In the earthly, when the daily ministration ceased, and the day of atonement came, the high priest prepared for the atonement, or cleansing, by shutting the door of the outer apartment see [Lev. xvi, 17,] and by putting on the holy garments, with the breast-plate of judgment, and opening the door into the inner apartment or most holy place, then proceeded to cleanse the sanctuary as recorded in the sixteenth chapter of Leviticus. So in the heavenly; when the daily ministration for the world ceased, and the 2300 days, and time of the Gentiles ended, and the time to cleanse the heavenly sanctuary came, Christ our High Priest prepared for the atonement, or blotting out of sins of all Israel, and cleansing the sanctuary. . . .

"An objection is frequently raised that there can be nothing in heaven that needs cleansing. But let us hear Paul on this point. Speaking of the same sanctuary, he says, 'It was therefore necessary that the patterns of things in the heavens should be purified with these: but the heavenly things themselves with better sacrifices than these.' Heb. ix, 23. Here Paul gives us clearly to understand that it was necessary that the earthly sanctuary, made from patterns of the heavenly, should be cleansed with the blood of beasts; (for so the law required,) therefore it was also necessary that the heavenly sanctuary, from which the patterns were taken, should be cleansed with better sacrifices. Then there is a sanctuary in heaven to be cleansed 'with better sacrifices,' and the 'Wonderful Number' places the cleansing of this sanctuary at the end of the 2300 days" (Present Truth 1:60, 61, March 1850).

In August 1850 James White began the publication of a new periodical named the Advent Review, of which he issued five numbers. In numbers 3 and 4 he reprinted from the Day-Star almost the entire Crosier article on the sanctuary.

In November 1850 James White began the regular publication of the Review and Herald. This periodical became the recognized organ of the Adventists who accepted the seventh-day Sabbath and the heavenly-sanctuary explanation of the Millerite disappointment. In its pages a continuing debate was carried on with other Adventists who took opposing views. The first purpose of these articles was to prove that the earth is not the sanctuary intended in Dan. 8:14, but the sanctuary in heaven, the sanctuary of the new covenant.

Later the idea was developed that the cleansing of the sanctuary involved a work of judgment. For a discussion of this aspect, see Investigative Judgment.

Sandberg, Thyra Eva Sofia

SANDBERG, THYRA EVA SOFIA (1880—1963). Conference officer in India. She was born in Sweden and later moved to New Zealand. In 1906 she joined the Seventh-day Adventist Church and entered denominational employment as an assistant in a health food store at Wellington, New Zealand. Afterward she began nurse's training, but when her administrative abilities were needed she interrupted her training and took charge of several health food stores and cafés in New Zealand. In 1913 she accompanied Edith Graham to the United States and was employed as a stenographer in the Home Missionary Department of the General Conference. From 1918 to 1923 she worked as a stenographer and a nurse-in-training with Dr. Belle Wood Comstock in California. After graduation from Paradise Valley Sanitarium in 1923, she was invited by Dr. H. C. Menkel to take charge of the physiotherapy department at Simla Sanitarium in India. Five years later she entered administrative work in the Northwest India Union, serving as secretary and leader in the MV, Sabbath school, home missionary, Dorcas, and home commission areas of the church's activities. In 1948 she became an instructor at the Voice of Prophecy Bible Correspondence School at Poona, India. Upon retirement in 1953, she returned to the United States.

Sanders, Floyd O.

SANDERS, FLOYD O. (1904—1993). Pastor, conference president. Born in Gibson County, Indiana, he graduated from Emmanuel Missionary College (now Andrews University). He entered denominational service on June 1, 1927, in the Indiana Conference and that same year was married to Mary E. Bowers. He was ordained to the ministry in 1934 in Indiana, and served as teacher, pastor, and evangelist there for 13 years before becoming president of the conference in 1940.

He labored as an administrator for 30 years, serving as president of Indiana, Carolina, Arkansas-Louisiana, Kansas, and Nebraska conferences.

Sandia View Academy

SANDIA VIEW ACADEMY. A coeducational senior academy operated by the Texico Conference, serving the constituency of New Mexico and west Texas. It is situated on approximately 80 acres (32 hectares) on Corrales Road, on the west side of the Rio Grande River, about eight miles (13 kilometers) north of Albuquerque, New Mexico. The enrollment in 1993 was 75, with a staff of 18.

History

History. The academy had its beginnings as a school for the training of workers among the Spanish-speaking people. In the late fall of 1941 a committee from the General Conference was delegated to decide on a location for the school. In the summer of 1942 the present site was purchased by the General Conference with additional land being purchased later.

The school opened in August 1942 as Seminario Hispano-Americano, with Dan Palmer as the first principal. The first graduation was held May 23, 1943, with Maximillano Martinez the only graduate. He has since served the denomination as pastor, evangelist, and coordinator of Indian work.

In April 1952 the General Conference voted to sell the Seminario Hispano-Americano, since the school at Montemorelos, Mexico, was accepted by the Mexican government and was serving efficiently as a training school for Spanish-speaking workers. After consultation with Southwestern Union Conference officials, the school was taken over by the Texico Conference. The General Conference granted a beginning subsidy of $20,000 plus $3,500 for additional equipment.

The school year 1952—1953 marked the first year of operation by the Texico Conference under the new name of Sandia View Academy. The school was named for its spectacular view of the Sandia (Spanish for watermelon) Mountains, which often end the day with a misty reddish glow to the east across the Rio Grande River.

During the 1980s the Sandia View campus was almost totally renewed with a new boys' dormitory (Chanslor Hall), a new girls' dormitory (Wharton Hall), a new cafeteria, and the exterior remodeling of the administration building. During this decade much debt was eliminated and a trust fund established through the Freedom '84 fund-raising project.

Sandy Lake Seventh-day Adventist Academy

SANDY LAKE SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST ACADEMY. A secondary day school established in 1974 and located in Bedford, Nova Scotia. In 1993 the school had a faculty of seven.

Principals: G. Carey, 1984—1985; G. Proctor, 1985—1988; D. Bennett, 1988—1989; J. Lowry, 1989—1993; G. Lehmann, 1993— .

Sanford, Edward Leroy

SANFORD, EDWARD LEROY (1850—1920). One of the first Seventh-day Adventist workers in Ghana; minister. He enlisted in the army during the last year of the American Civil War and afterward worked on the railroad in Saginaw, Michigan. While there he became an SDA, and soon thereafter entered the evangelistic service of the church. From 1888 to 1894 he was a district director in Michigan, then went to the Gold Coast (now Ghana) in West Africa, but was obliged by fever to retreat from there almost immediately. Recovering about 1902, he was ordained to the ministry, and then worked about 10 years in Southern United States, then two years in Detroit, two years in Maine, and again two years in Detroit. He died from a paralytic stroke.

Sangmelima Adventist Secondary School

SANGMELIMA ADVENTIST SECONDARY SCHOOL (Collège Adventiste da Sangmelima). A secondary day school once owned and operated by the Equatorial African Union of the Euro-Africa Division, situated about 110 miles (180 kilometers) from Yaoundé, the capital of Cameroon, and three miles (five kilometers) from the chief town of the district.

In 1963 Henry Walder, then mission president, called for the opening of the first two years of secondary school, and this was officially recognized on September 2 of that year under its present name, and was granted an annual subsidy from the state. The next year the third year was added and 163 students were enrolled. The fourth year was added by Daniel Mauret in 1969, thus preparing students for the Brevet d'Études du Premier Cycle (BEPC).

In 1971 Liliane Probst introduced nursing care as an additional function of the college, and a dispensary was officially opened in October 1972. A library was added the same year. A carpentry department was introduced in 1973 leading to the four-year Certificate d'État d'Aptitude Professionnelle (CAP). The school was closed in 1989.

Principals: Henry Walder, 1963—1965; Adolphe Laich, 1965—1966; Daniel Mauret, 1966—1969; Jean-Paul Casendai, 1969—1970; Marcel Fernandez, 1970—1973; Claude Villeneuve, 1973—1976; Marcel Pichot, 1976—1979; Bernard Miongo, 1980—1981; Samuel Oyono, 1981—1983; Ambroise Pokam, 1983—1986; Arthur Behounde Ekitike, 1986—1988; Jean-Pierre Mezale, 1988—1989.

Sanitarium

SANITARIUM. A term popularized by Seventh-day Adventists to describe a medical institution that provides for physical therapy and other treatments. It is said that John H. Kellogg, of the Battle Creek Sanitarium, was among the first to use the term and that someone reminded him that the word was not in the dictionary, to which Kellogg is said to have replied, “If it isn’t there, it soon will be.” However, according to The Oxford English Dictionary (1933), the term was already in use with this same general meaning in England in the middle 1800s.

Seventh-day Adventists hold that the way to make the sick whole is to minister to the whole person—body, mind, and spirit; that as a therapeutic procedure, diet, as to both kind and quantity, is important; also that the best of all therapies is that which will stimulate the natural forces of the body. Hence physical medicine, in the form of hydrotherapy and electrotherapy, has been featured in the sanitariums. As modern medicine developed, surgery and other forms of therapy have become more common.

As to therapy for mind and spirit, SDA medical institutions have long put into practice the principle that a person’s relationship to God can affect both mind and body. SDA sanitariums employ chaplains to minister to the patients’ spiritual needs.

In order to give maximum value to more distinctive SDA therapies, sanitariums were rather uniformly located in rural areas, where the patient could enjoy serenity, smog-free air, and the sounds of nature.

In many instances those coming to a sanitarium have been ambulatory persons who were seeking a general rejuvenation in the context of the best of medical care.

Most denominational sanitariums have developed into general hospitals providing a broad spectrum of medical and surgical care. Although health education is part of the care given in many Seventh-day Adventist hospitals, the sanitarium concept of rejuvenation and lifestyle change for ambulatory persons has become primarily an auxiliary program in selected hospitals, although the original sanitarium concept is still practiced in some institutions operated by independent ministries.

Sanitarium Health Food Company (Australia and New Zealand)

SANITARIUM HEALTH FOOD COMPANY. A chain of health food factories, wholesale branches, and retail shops in Australia and New Zealand, operated by the Health Food Department of the South Pacific Division, under a board of directors. Headquarters for the firm are at 146 Fox Valley Road, Wahroonga, New South Wales, 2076, Australia.

Products include Weet-Bix, a flaked-wheat breakfast-food biscuit; cornflakes, and other cereal foods; Marmite, a yeast-extract flavoring; peanut butter; vegetarian meats and textured vegetable protein; and So Good, a nondairy soy milk.

In 1993 the company was operating 11 factories in Australia and New Zealand and seven large wholesale branches. Until 1988 the company operated a chain of retail shops and four cafés scattered in the main cities of the two countries, but because of changing market conditions and declining viability, these were closed or sold. Total net worth was approximately $195 million. Approximately 1,500 workers were employed, and the company's products were stocked throughout the grocery trade in Australia and New Zealand. A growing export trade was also being developed, principal markets being in the South Pacific, most Far Eastern and Middle Eastern countries, Spain, Italy, Croatia, Canada, and the United States.

The gross annual revenue sales were $197 million in 1993. The company contributed an amount equal to 48.5 percent of its annual budget to the South Pacific Division. In addition, nearly half of the general administrative expenses of the division are met by the company as operational costs.

History

History. The motivating influence leading to the establishment of health food work in Australasia is found in an address given by Ellen White at the Brighton, Victoria, camp meeting in 1894. She spoke of different aspects of the work, and urged the leaders to move forward along medical lines, including manufacturing of health foods and establishing vegetarian restaurants. In response the Australasian Union Conference on Oct. 31, 1895, "Resolved that the Executive Committee be urged to take steps to commence such work in the various large cities of these Colonies by the establishment of both houses and depots for the supply of Health Foods, Sanitary Clothing, etc. as the way may open" (Minutes, p. 30).

In 1897 a consignment of granose, granola, oatmeal, and wheatmeal biscuits arrived from Battle Creek, Michigan. A small factory was rented in Northcote, Melbourne, where the production of granola, caramel cereal, and peanut butter was begun. The firm, registered Apr. 27, 1898, was first known as the Sanitas Supply Company and then as the Sanitarium Health Food Agency. Processing was done under the direction of E. C. Halsey, from Battle Creek.

The results of the Melbourne enterprise were not satisfactory, and Ellen White counseled that the factory be moved to Cooranbong to be operated in conjunction with the Avondale School for Christian Workers (now Avondale College), to which the managing committee agreed. Present at the meeting when the decision to move was made were A. G. Daniells, S. N. Haskell, W. C. White, E. R. Palmer, G. W. Morse, and G. B. Starr. At this time the firm's present name was adopted. Operations at Cooranbong began in May 1899.

Mrs. White, who was residing in Australia at the time, began giving important counsels in support of health food work and shared in many of the major decisions relative to the development of the business after receiving guidance on the matter in December 1897. At first all sales of health foods were made through conference tract societies, but a retail shop was opened in Sydney in 1902 in association with the first vegetarian restaurant. However, the business was not financially successful, and by 1904, when the whole health food enterprise was heavily in debt, many of the denominational leaders favored closing it. At this stage G. S. Fisher, of the Echo Publishing Company (now Signs Publishing Company), Melbourne, was invited to lead the health food work, a responsibility he discharged until 1920, when he became manager of the Avondale Industries. Success was achieved, and in 1906 the first donation by the food company for island mission work was made. The sum of £25, contributed by the Sydney Shop and Cafe, was the beginning of the great stream of financial help that has been an important factor in the program of the South Pacific Division.

Between 1907 and 1913 shops and cafés were opened in Melbourne, Brisbane, and Adelaide, followed later by branches in Hobart and Perth. The manufacturing and wholesale sections of the business expanded rapidly in the period 1920—1940, during which new buildings and plants were provided to cope with the rising demand for the products. In 1928 the company began to sell directly to retail grocery stores, bypassing the wholesale merchants. Despite predictions of disaster, this move proved highly successful and is a milestone in the company's history.

Two competing businesses were acquired in 1928 and 1929, respectively—Grain Products manufacturers of Weet-Bix, and the Cerix Company, manufacturers of puffed cereals. These acquisitions widened and strengthened the company's activities.

The development of the health food work in New Zealand paralleled that in Australia. Manufacturing began at Christchurch in 1901 in a small plant operated by E. C. Halsey, who had been transferred from Australia. Shops and cafés were opened in the main cities, and in 1920 a new factory was built in Christchurch under the management of A. J. Dyason. This was the beginning of an era of rapid growth, which has since continued. The Auckland and Christchurch factories of Grain Products, Ltd., were acquired in 1930. A third factory, in Palmerston North, began operation in 1952.

From the time that the health food work first gained departmental status, the following have occupied the position of health food department secretary (later being also the general manager or managing director): G. S. Fisher, 1918—1920; J. H. Camp, 1920—1922; W. O. Johanson, 1922—1926; G. T. Chapman, 1926—1936; G. E. Adair, 1936—1941; C.F.L. Ulrich, 1941—1943; A. W. Dawson, 1943—1946; B. O. Johanson, 1946—1962; W. L. Kilroy, 1962—1970; F. C. Craig, 1970—1982; D. C. Myers, 1982—1986; E. W. Grosser, 1986— .

Santa Fe Academy

SANTA FE ACADEMY (Instituto Adventista de Santa Fe). A coeducational junior and high school situated in Santa Fe city. This school is owned and operated by the Central Argentine Conference and serves nine Seventh-day Adventist churches in three neighbor districts. The curriculum consists of the five-year official secondary course—Bachillerato en Administracion—accredited by the Argentine Ministry of Education of the province of Santa Fe.

The secondary school began as a primary school in 1960. It is owned and operated by the Santa Fe Central church, called “Francisco Ramos Mejía.” It was directed by Yolanda de Posse. The senior school began in 1988, and in 1993 it had a staff of 26 members and 136 students. The school has nine classrooms, the last two built in 1993. It also has a library and two small offices—one upstairs and the other downstairs—and an auditorium. The instruction given qualifies the young people to enter River Plate Adventist University or any other kind of official or private university in Argentina.

Santee, Clarence

SANTEE, CLARENCE (1856—1930). Minister, writer for denominational periodicals, and conference administrator. He was born in the state of New York in a Seventh-day Adventist home, was brought up in Missouri, and began to preach about 1879 in Kansas. He was ordained to the ministry while working in Missouri in 1891. In 1894 he taught in a Bible school in Minneapolis and afterward served as president of the Iowa (1896—1900), California (1900—1901), Southern California (1901—1905), Texas (1905—1908), and Southwestern Union (1906—1907, 1908—1910) conferences. He taught Bible at the College of Medical Evangelists; then was president of the Northern California Conference (1915—1924). Because of failing health, he retired and moved to Loma Linda, California. As a leader of the work in California he was closely associated with the founding of San Fernando Academy, Glendale Sanitarium and Hospital, and Loma Linda Sanitarium.

Santee, Lorenzo D.

SANTEE, LORENZO D. (1845—1919). Minister, writer, and poet. At an early age he became a Seventh-day Adventist, together with his parents. He was educated at Tremont College, in Illinois, and in 1869 married Alice Merritt. In the early 1870s he began preaching in Illinois. He was ordained to the ministry in 1876 by James White. Then he went to Kansas as one of the pioneer Seventh-day Adventist ministers in that state, and later, in 1889—1890, was in charge of a school at Ottawa, Kansas. Afterward he returned to Illinois and for many years served as pastor in Chicago churches. He wrote numerous doctrinal and pastoral articles in the Review and Herald and many of his poems were set to music. One of these poems, “In the Glad Time of the Harvest,” is found in the Church Hymnal.

São Luís Adventist Academy

SÃO LUÍS ADVENTIST ACADEMY. A boarding school located in São Luís, Brazil, and operated under the direction of the North Brazil Union Mission. It occupies property of 118,850 square feet (11,050 square meters) with buildings on 11,300 square feet (1,050 square meters). It also has a library of 491 volumes.

The primary school was accredited in 1983 and the secondary school was accredited on Dec. 12, 1991. The school had 31 students and nine teachers during the 1992—1993 school year.

Directors: Creunete de Oliveira Cardoso, 1991—1992; Valdir Mota dos Santos, 1993— .

São Paulo Adventist Academy

SÃO PAULO ADVENTIST ACADEMY (Instituto Adventista São Paulo). A coeducational boarding and day school on the high school level, situated on 345 acres (140 hectares) of fertile land near the Jacuba railroad station in the town of Hortolândia, 11 miles (18 kilometers) from Campinas, second-largest city of the state of São Paulo, Brazil.

Land for the academy was bought by the São Paulo Conference in 1947. Construction began in 1948 under the direction of Waldemar Ehlers, the school's first director. Classes began in 1949, and the educational program received government approval in 1950. In 1993 there were 550 secondary and 580 elementary students with 50 teachers.

Directors: Waldemar Ehlers, 1949—1950; Arthur Dassow, 1951; Osvaldo Rodrigues Azevedo, 1951—1957; Mario Roque, 1958—1966; Arthur Dassow, 1967—1971; Tércio Sarli, 1972—1980; Jose Iran Miguel, 1980—1982; Moyses R. Prates, 1983—1985; Irineu Rosales, 1986— .

São Paulo Adventist Hospital

SÃO PAULO ADVENTIST HOSPITAL (Hospital Adventista de São Paulo). A medical institution with general clinical and surgical services, owned and operated by the São Paulo Conference. The hospital, with 53 beds, is situated near the center of São Paulo, capital of the state of São Paulo.

The forerunner of the hospital was the Boa Vista Clinic, established in 1939 in São Paulo by Antonio A. Miranda, M.D. A year or two earlier E. H. Wilcox, president of the South Brazil Union Conference, had asked him to lay plans for Seventh-day Adventist medical work in Brazil. Miranda became the clinic's first medical director; Bertha Lipke assisted him as nurse and physical therapist.

In 1942 this clinic was closed in order to strengthen the project for a hospital. After a vigorous fund-raising campaign, launched by Germano Ritter, president of the São Paulo Conference, a property was purchased, and the buildings on it were remodeled into a hospital, which began to serve the public on Mar. 9, 1942. Galdino Nunes Vieira, M.D., served as its medical director, Fernando Luz as its business manager, and Freda Trefz as head nurse. At the end of its first year the hospital showed a profit of about US$1,500.

A nurses' class was organized in 1942 under the supervision of the Brazilian Red Cross Nursing School in order to satisfy the need for trained SDA nursing personnel.

In 1943 a new section was opened for the exclusive treatment of the many cases in a then-current polio epidemic. Soon this section was placed under the direction of Lillian Wentz, a nurse from the United States who had received specialized training in the Kenny method. In 1947 Gideon de Oliveira, M.D., was called to inaugurate surgical services in the new institution.

The present staff (1993) includes more than nine physicians, a staff of registered and practical nurses, nurses' aides, and other staff members.

Medical Directors: Galdino Nunes Vieira, 1942—1949; Carlos F. Schwantes, 1949—1953; Antonio A. Miranda, 1953—1954; Ajax W. Silveira, 1954—1955; Geraldo Leitzke, 1954—1963; Bruno O. São Paulo Old People's Home

SÃO PAULO OLD PEOPLE'S HOME (Centro Adventista de Convivencia para Idosos). A home for the aged situated near Brazil College (Instituto Adventista de Ensino) 12.5 miles (20 kilometers) from downtown São Paulo on the highway of Itapecerica da Serra. It is owned and maintained by the Welfare Department of the São Paulo Conference, under the supervision of the secretary of that department. Plans for the construction of a home for seniors were begun in 1948 at an outing and conference of the various Dorcas societies of the São Paulo area. Funds were raised, and in 1950 the home, with a capacity of 25, was opened. Since 1964 it has been occupied by an average of 17 women and 11 men.

Managers: Germano Conrado, 1950—1955; Fernando Garcia, 1956; Odorino Souza, 1957; Edson Gomes, 1958; Benedito Lisboa, 1959—1960; Benoni Teixeira, 1961; Antonio Torres, 1962—1963; Frida Lopes, 1964—1972; Romualdo F. São Roque Adventist Clinic

SÃO ROQUE ADVENTIST CLINIC. (Clínica Adventista de São Roque). A clinic inaugurated December 1980. It operates on a 667,000-square-foot (62,000-square-meter) area in the district of São Roque, near Ibiúna, and 37 miles (60 kilometers) from the city of São Paulo. The exuberance of vegetation and the mountain climate present an ideal situation for those who desire to recuperate their health or to be rehabilitated after a period of intense fatigue.

There are 26 apartments at the clinic with a 40-bed capacity. The normal daily census in 1993 was 20 patients who were treated with loving care by 51 employees. The department caring for the spiritual aspect of the program maintains a regular schedule of worship services in the clinic chapel and also engages in special evangelism on various occasions. Many patients become acquainted with the Seventh-day Adventist Church through correspondence organized by the chaplain.

The major objective of the São Roque Adventist Clinic, other than the spiritual emphasis, is to prevent illness. To that end, a Total Health Project involves patients in a total health program that includes medical lectures, audiovisual presentations; vegetarian cooking courses; hydrotherapy and natural treatments; occupational therapy, in which the patient is placed in contact with nature through cultivation of medicinal herbs; illness prevention lectures on topics such as obesity, diabetes, cancer, cardiovascular illnesses, stress, tobacco addiction, and alcoholism.

The physicians at the São Roque Adventist Clinic believe in natural treatment and lifestyle change.

Medical Directors: Manfred Krusche, 1980—1987; Hildemar Feliciano dos Santos, 1987—1992; Antônio Ângelo Lovízio, 1993— .

Administrators: João Lotze, 1980—1982; Edson Henrique da Silva, 1983—1984; Marcos Pavinato, 1984—1989; Olevai Aniceto de Souza, 1989— .

São Tomé and Príncipe

SÃO TOMÉ AND PRÍNCIPE. Two islands, forming a democratic republic, lying 125 miles (200 kilometers) west of Gabon. The islands have an area of 372 square miles (950 square kilometers) and a population (1994) of 137,000, nearly all of whom are Catholic. The islands, discovered by the Portuguese in 1471, became a province in 1522. The principal products are cocoa, coffee, coconuts, palm oil, and cinchona.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. The territory of São Tomé and Príncipe constitutes the São Tomé and Príncipe Mission, which is part of the Angola Union Mission, within the Euro-Africa Division. Statistics (1994): churches, 14; members, 647; licensed ministers, 5. Headquarters: São Tomé Island, West Africa.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. SDAs began work on São Tomé Island in 1936, when José Freire, a Portuguese colporteur, visited there. In 1938 he settled as a missionary, and in February 1939 the first baptisms were conducted on the island. The 1940 Yearbook lists the St. Thomas Mission as part of the Portuguese Union Mission, and Freire as a licensed minister connected with the mission. A primary school was opened in 1946 (with Capitolina Grave as its first teacher), which exerted a strong influence for good in the islands. It had an average attendance of 250 students. It was closed by the Communist government in 1975.

In addition to the church in the capital, São Tomé, which was dedicated in 1956, there are groups of adherents in the villages of Trindade, Santana, Bombom, Neves, and on the island of Príncipe. In 1959 this field was transferred to the Angola Union Mission and is now a part of the Euro-Africa Division.

The membership nearly doubled in the seven-year period from 1988 to 1994. In Adelaide, in the interior of the island, the church operates a small farm that produces bananas, cassava, cacao beans (chocolate), and potatoes.

Sargent, Alfred James

SARGENT, ALFRED JAMES (c. 1888—1959). Missionary in Burma, nurse. His parents were among the first Seventh-day Adventists in England and for a long time the only ones on the Isle of Wight, where he was born. He attended Dunscombe Hall College (1902—1905) and while there assisted with tent meetings at his birthplace. In 1907 he went to Battle Creek Sanitarium to take the nurse's course, but later transferred to St. Helena Sanitarium, from which he graduated in 1914. He also obtained a diploma in medical technology from Century College in Chicago. During World War I he went to France as a medic with the American Expeditionary Forces.

For a number of years after his return to the United States, Sargent engaged in carpentry and floor work in Los Angeles, but eventually returned to the medical field and took charge of city medical work in connection with an evangelistic program in San Francisco in 1926. In the same year he married Eda Frances Winslow, daughter of pioneer SDA missionaries to China. In 1929 he and his family went to Burma, where he was placed in charge of the Irrawadi Delta Mission Field. In 1933 he was ordained. However, sickness interrupted their service and they spent the years 1935 to 1940 in America but went back to Burma shortly before the outbreak of World War II in the Pacific. Sargent was among the last SDA missionaries to leave Burma in 1942, and was the first one to reach his station after hostilities ceased in 1945. He retired from leadership of the Irrawadi Delta Mission Field in 1949.

Satan and His Angels

SATAN AND HIS ANGELS. Seventh-day Adventists consider Satan to be a personal being, a fallen angel, who was called Lucifer (Isa. 14:12—14), and who occupied the exalted position of covering cherub (Eze. 28:14). Pride in the beauty and wisdom with which the Creator had originally endowed him led to his fall (Eze. 28:12, 17). He seduced one third of the angelic host (Rev. 12:4), with whom he was cast out of heaven (Rev. 12:8, 9; cf. 2 Peter 2:4; Jude 6).

Entering Eden under the guise of a serpent, he seduced man into sin (Gen. 3:1—6), thus bringing sin and death upon the entire human race (Rom. 5:12; cf. Rom. 3:23). His work ever since has been to ensnare, deceive, beguile, and seduce the human family (2 Cor. 11:3, 14; 2 Tim. 2:26; 1 Peter 5:8; Rev. 12:9; etc.).

He is variously called the devil (Matt. 4:10, 11; Rev. 12:9), Beelzebub (Matt. 12:24), Belial (2 Cor. 6:15), the tempter (Matt. 4:3), the adversary (1 Peter 5:8), “the prince of this world” (John 14:30), etc.

Satan is the leader of all the fallen angels (Rev. 12:4, 7; cf. 2 Peter 2:4).

According to Revelation 20, Satan will be confined to the depopulated earth for 1,000 years following the second advent of Christ (see Millennium). At the close of the millennium Satan will be released from his confinement as the wicked dead are brought to life. He will immediately deceive them, as formerly, and lead them to make one last effort to overthrow the government of God by attacking the Holy City, which will have descended from heaven at the close of the 1,000 years. Fire falls from heaven, and destroys Satan and all who have been allied with him (see Hell).

The angels who accepted Satan’s leadership and were expelled from heaven along with him have been engaged from that time to the present in carrying out the commands of the great deceiver. They continually endeavor to inflict suffering and death upon mankind. These evil angels have the power to impersonate the dead and in so doing deceive the living relatives and friends of the dead into believing that those who have passed away are not actually dead, but are enjoying a higher form of existence. This ability of Satan and his angels to impersonate the dead, coupled with the unscriptural belief in the natural immortality of the soul, has given birth to spiritism.

Early Seventh-day Adventist literature is, for the most part, conspicuously silent with respect to Satan. An editorial note by James White (Review and Herald 7:61, Oct. 16, 1855) stresses that Satan is a real, personal being. Uriah Smith (ibid. 18:125, Sept. 17, 1861) wrote at greater length about Satan as a personal being. He also spoke of the evil angels as working to ensnare the unwary, and of the angels of God resisting them. See also Evil, Origin of; Fall, The; Jacob’s Trouble, Time of; Michael, the Archangel; Miracles.

Sather, Myrtle

SATHER, MYRTLE (1905—1971). Missionary, nurse, administrator. She was born and reared in Minnesota. In 1924 she began work as a secretary in the Wisconsin Conference, continuing in that capacity until called to accounting and secretarial duties at Maplewood Academy in 1931. Eight years later she traveled to Pacific Union College and St. Helena Sanitarium where she studied nursing, graduating in 1942.

In 1945 she was called to Africa, where she served as nursing director of Kanye Hospital in Botswana. In 1959 she was called to heavier responsibilities and wider influence as medical secretary of the Southern Africa Division. She guided in the development of 11 hospitals, 48 clinics, and six schools for nurses, midwives, and medical assistants.

In 1962 she returned permanently to the United States because of illness in her family. The following year she was called to Kettering Memorial Hospital as assistant director of personnel. She held this position until 1969 when illness caused her to retire.

Saudi Arabia

SAUDI ARABIA. An Islamic kingdom occupying most of the Arabian Peninsula in the Middle East, with an area of approximately 870,000 square miles (2.3 million square kilometers) and a population (1994) of 18.2 million. The country is prominent as the home of Islam and also as the producer of a large share of the world's petroleum. The people are homogenous in their ethnic origin (Arabs), and in their religion (Islam), and are divided mainly between the settled agriculturist and nomadic Bedouin tribes.

The Arabian Peninsula contains only a few Christians; most of them are foreigners from Europe, Africa, India, and America who came to work in the oil fields. Seventh-day Adventists have no organized church in Saudi Arabia, but the country is part of the territory assigned to the Middle East Union. In 1963 there was a Sabbath school established at Dhahran on the eastern shore of the peninsula that operated for a short time, and students of the Bible correspondence school were scattered throughout the area. The former King Saud, of Saudi Arabia, served as one of the honorary presidents of the nondenominational International Commission for the Prevention of Alcoholism and in 1955 was visited at his capital, Riyadh, by W. A. Scharffenberg, the executive secretary of the International Temperance Association of Seventh-day Adventists, and Wadie Farag, assistant temperance secretary of the Middle East Division, and, in 1962 by Scharffenberg and Anees Haddad, who was temperance secretary of the Middle East Division. Since 1970 the Middle East Union has made several contacts with Saudi Arabian government officials through holding stop-smoking clinics, which have been enthusiastically received. The Loma Linda Heart Team has visited Saudi Arabia upon the invitation of the kingdom.

In 1991 Patricia Biro from the United States worked in Saudi Arabia and gave Bible studies to immigrant workers, but left in 1993. Many Filipino and Indian Seventh-day Adventists are working in the country and meet whenever possible for worship services.

Savanna-La-Mar High School

SAVANNA-LA-MAR HIGH SCHOOL. A coeducational institution on the senior high school level, operated by West Jamaica Conference at Savanna-la-Mar in the parish of Westmoreland, Jamaica, since 1967. The school offers courses leading to the General Certificate of Education (GCE) of London and Cambridge universities and the Caribbean Examination Council (CXC). The curriculum provides for denominational requirements in courses. It is recognized and accredited by the Board of Regents of the General Conference of Seventh-day Adventists and is entitled to all the privileges and academic recognition resulting therefrom.

The school had an enrollment of 225 students during the 1992—1993 school year and operated a preparatory department, which had 91 students. It conducts an evening institute to assist non-day students and adults who need to further their education. This is well supported by the community.

The school is housed on five and one-half acres (two hectares) of land. An overall plan has been approved to aid the development. A new block was constructed recently that houses the Lunnette Wright Library, which was named in honor of the school's founder. It has more than 3,000 volumes and can accommodate approximately 80 students at one sitting. The school also has a Home Economics Department and is in the process of furnishing a science lab.

Principals: Mrs. L. Wright, 1967—1971; C. R. Perry, 1971—1972; Hugh Dawes, 1973—1976; G. Jobson, 1976—1979; Conrad Grant, 1979—1986; Miss D. Chapman, 1986— .

Scapegoat (“escape goat”)

SCAPEGOAT (“escape goat”). The KJV term for the goat sent away into the wilderness on the Day of Atonement. The term was derived from the Vulgate caper emissarius, “goat sent away.” In Lev. 16:8 the KJV marginal reading for scapegoat is “Azazel,” a transliteration of the Hebrew. The verse may be translated literally as in the RSV: “And Aaron shall cast lots upon the two goats; one lot for the Lord, and the other lot for Azazel.”

Among Christian scholars there have been and still are wide variations of opinion as to the significance of the scapegoat in its relationship to the services of the Day of Atonement, in both type and antitype. One view, among many others, holds that the scapegoat is a type of Christ. Another and opposite view is that the scapegoat is a type of Satan. Although the Adventists in 1844 preached much about the Day of Atonement, they apparently gave little attention to such details as the significance of the scapegoat.

As later Seventh-day Adventists studied the sanctuary, they gave more thorough consideration to the details of the Day of Atonement ritual by which the ancient sanctuary was cleansed. The unanimous conclusion of Seventh-day Adventist scholars has been that the scapegoat, or Azazel, represented Satan.

The many reasons for this conclusion are discussed rather extensively by the early SDA writers. (See Uriah Smith, The Sanctuary [Battle Creek, Mich., 1877], p. 308; J. H. Waggoner, The Atonement [Oakland, Calif., 1884], p. 232.) Inasmuch as the atonement for the sanctuary was already completed before the confessed sins were transferred, in figure, to the scapegoat (Lev. 16:20, 21), they concluded that Christ must therefore have completed the work of atonement before Satan—the antitypical scapegoat—could suffer the fate reserved for him as set forth in Rev. 20:9, 10.

The identification of the scapegoat also involved the meaning of the word “Azazel” (ibid., pp. 234—237). On this point many non-Adventist scholars, such as Jenks, Spencer, Charles Beecher, and Matthew Henry, were quoted extensively. It was pointed out that both the Hebrews and the early Christians considered Azazel as the name of the devil, or a demon, and that the Syriac Azzail paralleled this usage. It was pointed out, further, that the use of the preposition “for,” in the Hebrew of Lev. 16:8, implies that the lots were cast for a person—one for YHWH and one for Azazel. This would rule out Azazel’s being an impersonal name for evil. Also, it was pointed out that the Targums treated Azazel as a proper name, and that the Septuagint rendered it by apopompaios, a Greek word applied to a malign deity. This was also the position of the early Church Fathers. Origen said, “He who is called in the Septuagint apopompaios, and in the Hebrew Azazel, is no other than the devil.”

A brief note in the Review and Herald (32:48, July 7, 1868) cites Irenaeus (c. A.D. 185) as quoting “that divine elder,” who characterized him as “that fallen and yet mighty angel” (Against Heresies 1. 15).

Ancient Jewish writers consistently cast Azazel in the role of an evil spirit being. The pseudepigraphical Book of Enoch, for instance, comments: “Azazel . . . hath taught all unrighteousness on earth” (9:6). “The whole earth has been corrupted through the works that were taught by Azazel: to him ascribe all sin” (10:8).

The first discussion of the scapegoat appearing in an SDA publication was the reprint of O.R.L. Crosier’s treatise on the sanctuary (Day-Star Extra 9:43, Feb. 7, 1846, reprinted in the Advent Review 1:62, 63, September 1850). Probably the first discussion by a Sabbathkeeping Adventist writer was an editorial by James White (Review and Herald 9:28, Nov. 27, 1856), giving essentially the same explanation, identifying the scapegoat as Satan.

In the Review and Herald for July 3, 1883 (60:424), Uriah Smith develops the subject at considerable length, listing reasons for considering Azazel as Satan: “The scape-goat having once been selected, it never after performed any office involving dignity or honor, or calling for any thing which would symbolize perfection of life or character. . . . The atonement is all made, sins are remitted, the records of the evil deeds of God’s people are blotted out, and they are forever freed from them, and these sins are all borne from the sanctuary, before ever Satan is called into requisition at all. God then simply uses him as the vehicle by which to make a final disposition of these sins in the lake of fire. Thus, so far as the work of atonement itself is concerned, the plan and work of mercy by which God’s people are forgiven their sins, Satan has no part to act.”

Years later A. T. Jones emphasized the fact that Azazel must be considered a personal spirit being who stands in opposition to the Lord, and therefore is Satan. He bases this on the fact that lots are cast for two goats, one “for the Lord” and one “for Azazel,” who must therefore be as real a personality as the Lord. Jones cites a number of contemporary sources for this view (ibid. 76:460, July 18, 1899).

Seventh-day Adventist belief (note Smith’s statement above) that the scapegoat represents Satan does not in any way involve him in the atonement for sins. Christ’s atonement was full and complete for all, and He alone bore the sins of the righteous and atoned for them. Even theologians who omit Satan from the picture of the Day of Atonement, and thus restrict the symbolism of both goats to Christ, agree that the expiation was effected by the blood of the first goat and that the ceremony with the other goat appears as a mere addition made for special reasons, a kind of complement to the wiping away of sins that had already been effected by the means of the sacrifice.

In summary, Seventh-day Adventists believe that the scapegoat, or Azazel, is a type of Satan. As, anciently, the sins of repentant Israelites were placed on the head of the scapegoat before it was sent away into the wilderness, so “when the work of atonement in the heavenly sanctuary has been completed, then in the presence of God and heavenly angels, and the host of the redeemed, the sins of God’s people will be placed upon Satan; he will be declared guilty of all the evil which he has caused them to commit. And as the scapegoat was sent away into a land not inhabited, so Satan will be banished to the desolate earth, an uninhabited and dreary wilderness” (GC 658). Scharffenberg, Mimi SCHARFFENBERG, MIMI (1883—1919). A pioneer Seventh-day Adventist worker in Korea. Born in a Lutheran family in Missouri, she joined the Seventh-day Adventist Church at 17 years of age and the next year became a Bible instructor in Wisconsin. In 1907 she went to Korea, where she superintended the Sabbath school work for many years, edited the Korean Signs of the Times, taught school, and translated SDA publications into Korean. She became ill about two years before her death in 1919 and left Korea for medical help in 1918 or early 1919.

Scharffenberg, William August

SCHARFFENBERG, WILLIAM AUGUST (1896—1973). Missionary, departmental secretary, pioneer in Seventh-day Adventist temperance work. A native of Wisconsin, he graduated from Washington Missionary College in 1918. Soon after, he and his bride, the former Katharyn Shirley Fickes, sailed for China, where he conducted the Shanghai Language School for missionaries and businessmen and supervised the Oriental branch of Home Study Institute. In 1940 the family returned to the United States, where he served as lay activities secretary of the Central Union for one year and the following five years was head of the Lay Activities Department of the General Conference. In 1946 he was appointed secretary of the General Conference Temperance Department. He became known as the father of revival of temperance work for the Seventh-day Adventist Church. In 1948 he launched Listen magazine. Two years later he organized the first National Committee for the Prevention of Alcoholism in the U.S. and that same year worked to establish the first Institute of Scientific Studies at Loma Linda. In 1952 he organized the International Commission for the Prevention of Alcoholism. In 1954 he initiated a film program for the church's temperance thrust with the release of One in 20,000. In succeeding years he organized a worldwide campaign for "One Million Names for Abstinence," set up pilot programs across the North American Division to introduce the Five-Day Plan to Stop Smoking, and organized the Temperance Department of the General Conference. He retired in 1964. After his wife's death, he married Alice Ray in 1969.

Scheer Memorial Hospital

SCHEER MEMORIAL HOSPITAL. A 50-bed general hospital at the town of Banepa, Nepal, 18 miles (30 kilometers) east of Katmandu, the capital. It is named after Carolyn and Charles Scheer, of New Jersey, whose son and daughter-in-law made a financial contribution toward the building of the hospital. The hospital staff, using a mobile dispensary, conducts periodic outclinics in surrounding villages.

When formal negotiations with the Nepal government for the opening of a hospital were begun (June 1957), S. G. Sturges, M.D., was already studying the Nepalese language in Mussoorie, India, and before the end of the year moved to Nepal with his family. He chose for a hospital site Banepa (meaning “little Nepal”), situated in a picturesque valley at nearly 5,000 feet (1,500 meters) elevation.

Before the hospital was constructed, a small building made available by the village on its main street was used as an outpatient clinic. The hospital was officially opened May 18, 1960, and serves a large population in the valley and in the surrounding mountains. Besides the Scheer contribution, other buildings and equipment were financed from CARE and regular SDA funds.

Two additional bungalows have been erected and a new obstetrical wing was opened in 1969.

In 1973 a local society known as the Nepal Health Education and Welfare Service was formed.

Medical Directors: S. G. Sturges, 1957—1963; K. W. Sturges, 1963—1967; R. I. Clark, 1967—1971; C. P. Juggi, 1971—1974; R. I. Clark, 1974—1976; J. B. Oliver, 1976—1983; David H. Skau, 1983—1985; L. J. Vigna, 1985—1988; Nestor E. Hein (acting), 1988; Ruben Urrejola, 1989—1991; Dereck E. Binning, 1991—1992; Arthur H. Blood, 1992—1994; Leonardo Vigna, 1994— .

Schilling, John H.

SCHILLING, JOHN H. (1872—1948). Administrator. He was born in Bethlehem, Pennsylvania. After attending South Lancaster Academy, he began to preach in the Pennsylvania Conference. In 1905 he responded to a call from the General Conference to work in Europe. In 1907 he was president of the Silesian Conference and during the next two years leader of the South German Conference. When the West German Union Conference was organized in 1909, he was elected its president. This post he occupied until 1911, when by invitation of the General Conference he assumed the superintendency of the German language work in North America east of the Mississippi River.

On two different occasions he served as president of the Clinton Theological Seminary, Clinton, Missouri. For a time he worked in the Lake Union. In 1918 he began to serve as associate secretary of the Bureau of Home Missions for the miscellaneous language work conducted east of the Mississippi River.

In 1922 Schilling returned to Europe as president of the East German Union Conference. Six years later, when the old European Division was divided into four divisions, he was elected field secretary and ministerial association secretary of the Northern European Division. Returning to America in 1930, he became pastor of the Brooklyn German church and retired a few years later.

Schillinger, Robert

SCHILLINGER, ROBERT (1874—1948). Pioneer worker in Yugoslavia; conference and school administrator. Born and educated in Germany, he became a Seventh-day Adventist at Lausanne, Switzerland, and was baptized by James Erzberger in 1899. After spending a year at Friedensau Training School (Missionsseminar Friedensau), he entered denominational employment and worked as a colporteur in Germany and Switzerland. In 1900 he married Paula Friebe. After her death he married Katarina Kocar in 1928. In 1908 he went to the territory of what is now Yugoslavia to develop SDA work, and remained there the rest of his life, becoming a naturalized Yugoslav citizen. At first he preached at Zagreb, in Croatia, but failing to win any converts there, he moved to Novi Sad, Backa, where he established mission work. Upon the organization of the Adriatic Mission in 1911, he became its director and continued to lead the work in the area until the Yugoslavian Union Mission was organized in 1925.

In 1919 Schillinger established a publishing house at Novi Sad and began issuing a magazine called Vijest Mira (“Message of Peace”). According to one source, he served from 1925 to 1928 as president of the Yugoslavian Union Mission, then was president of the Sava Conference till 1933, when he became the principal of the Yugoslavian Training School, and retired in 1942. However, the SDA Yearbook does not list Schillinger as president of the work in Yugoslavia from 1926 through 1928. The 1929 Yearbook lists him as superintendent of the Croatian Mission, and later as president of the Sava Conference.

Schneider, Chester Clarence

SCHNEIDER, CHESTER CLARENCE (1892—1956). Physician, missionary. He was baptized in 1912, and in 1917 was graduated from Clinton Theological Seminary. On completing a medical missionary course in the College of Medical Evangelists in 1922, he began his missionary career in Brazil. After 12 years of service in various positions, he entered the Rio de Janeiro School of Medicine and Surgery, and was graduated in 1938. He took postgraduate work at the College of Medical Evangelists and in 1941 became director of the Clínica Liberdade in São Paulo. From 1942 until the time of his death he was director of the SDA hospital in Rio de Janeiro, first in Santa Tereza, and from 1948, with interruptions, in the Hospital Silvestre. In order to facilitate his medical work he became a Brazilian citizen.

Scholarships and Student Aid

SCHOLARSHIPS AND STUDENT AID. The denominational practice with regard to aid to students is based essentially on the principle of self-help.

“The youth should have it plainly set before them that they must work their own way as far as possible and thus partly defray their expenses. That which costs little will be appreciated little. But that which costs a price somewhere near its real value will be estimated accordingly” (6T 214).

Student Employment. In accordance with the denominational educational philosophy that the training of the individual should include a harmonious development of physical, as well as intellectual, spiritual, and social aspects of life, and that useful labor has important training value, many Seventh-day Adventist schools above the elementary level operate a vocational department in which students can work at a trade and at the same time earn part of their educational expenses. See Education, Seventh-day Adventist Philosophy of.

The vocational opportunities vary from school to school, but many of the schools situated in rural localities operate cattle, dairy, garden, or grain farms. Schools depend largely on student labor for their regular maintenance work. Many operate one or more industries, such as bakeries, furniture factories, printing shops, laundries, bookbinderies, and food-processing plants.

Educational Aid to Employees in Denominational Service. The denomination has made certain provisions for educational aid to dependents of workers in full-time denominational employment. These scholarship grants apply to students in denominational schools, from the kindergarten through the college level. In addition, institutions follow the practice of assuming the expense of additional training for their employees when such training is required by the nature of work, for example, for mission appointees. Teachers in denominational schools may receive help to improve their qualifications on a basis of specific arrangement between the employing organization and the teacher.

Ministerial candidates upon the completion of the four-year college course receive educational aid while attending the SDA Theological Seminary in accordance with a ministerial internship program administered by the conferences in which they will work upon completion of their training.

Missionaries and mission appointees also receive special aid as a matter of policy. Missionaries on furlough and the children of missionaries educated away from their parents are given discounts on their tuition charges. Mission appointees who have educational debts are given grants in aid up to specified amounts (varying in different categories), which are written off over the period of four or five years, provided the appointees carry out their assignments.

Aid to Prospective Employees. Apart from the ministerial internships, which are a form of employment, denominational aid to prospective employees is also provided to students in medicine and dentistry who are approved deferred mission appointees or medical workers returning to their homeland. Aid is provided by giving assistance in arranging low interest loans or grants.

Literature Evangelist Scholarships. The plan of student literature evangelist scholarships, which involves selling denominational publications during vacations, is the denomination's most important provision for educational aid (see Scholarships, Literature Evangelist).

General Scholarships. Scholarships given by SDA colleges to their students are generally in the form of relatively small tuition credits. From time to time private funds are made available to SDA schools for loans or for scholarship grants as a result of donations, bequests, or alumni contributions, but these amounts are not large. These funds are administered by each college individually in accordance with the terms of the grant and with the school's own policy.

Scholarships for the Visually Impaired. Scholarships for visually impaired undergraduate college students in SDA schools have been established by Christian Record Services.

Scholarships, Literature Evangelist

SCHOLARSHIPS, LITERATURE EVANGELIST. A program that makes it possible for elementary, secondary, college, and university students to earn money for their room, board, tuition, matriculation, music, and laboratory fees by selling denominational subscription books and magazines.

The scholarship plan was first offered at Union College, Lincoln, Nebraska, June 5, 1906. Of the 19 students who went out to work that summer, 16 earned full-expense scholarships. One young woman sold enough to qualify for three scholarships. Some students also worked for scholarships in the Southwestern Union and in a few places on the West Coast during that same summer.

In view of the success that many of the young people had in the Union College experiment, E. R. Palmer, at that time director of the General Conference Publishing Department, recommended to the General Conference Committee on Dec. 9, 1907, that there should be a scholarship policy for the whole North American Division. His recommendation was adopted.

Since 1907 the General Conference Committee has amended the scholarship policy several times, but basically the plan is still the same, except that it now embraces the world field. The publishing house, local conference, Adventist Book Center, Home Health Education Service, and school join in granting a liberal financial allowance for school expenses to all students who meet the stipulated requirements. This cash grant by the contributing organizations represents a percentage on the students' sales of denominational subscription books and magazines.

In order to qualify for a literature evangelist scholarship to a denominational school, a student must work a required number of hours during the vacation period.

A student can also earn a scholarship to a non-Seventh-day Adventist college or university if proper arrangements are made with the conference authorities. When the requirements of the policy are met, the student will receive the same percentages from the participating SDA organizations.

Through the years thousands of SDA young people have been able to earn scholarships through the sale of denominational publications, and also to receive valuable training in evangelism. They develop positive personality traits, and learn to pray with people and to give Bible studies. This type of ministry, which is considered to be missionary activity of the highest order, helps to develop workers and missionaries for the church. In some conferences young men who wish to enter the ministry are required to engage in literature evangelism at least one summer.

More than 7,500 young people around the world participate in this program each year.

Schools, Seventh-day Adventist

SCHOOLS, SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST. The Seventh-day Adventist denomination maintains a church-related system of education embracing schools of all levels from the kindergarten through the university. For the principles on which its curricula are based, see Education, Seventh-day Adventist Philosophy of.

Historical Sketch and Statistics. From 1853 to 1872 in various parts of the United States church-oriented elementary schools were conducted by individual families, groups of families, or local Seventh-day Adventist churches. The first official church school (elementary) was established in Battle Creek, Michigan, in 1872; the first college at that place in 1874; and the first secondary school (academy), at Healdsburg, California (followed closely by another, at South Lancaster, Massachusetts), in 1882.

The growth in educational facilities was slow until the 1890s. During that decade five colleges, many academies, and more than 200 elementary schools were established in the United States. This same period witnessed new SDA schools in Canada, England, Australia, Switzerland, Sweden, Germany, Africa, Argentina, Denmark, and Brazil.

During the present century the growth in the number and size of schools, the number of teachers, and the enrollment of students has been rapid and continuous. The following world statistics are the latest reported (1992): schools of all levels, 5,824; number of teachers, 40,482; enrollment, 778,512.

Elementary Education (primary schools, church schools). Elementary schools (mostly grades 1—8, with at times grade 9) range in size from one-teacher schools with a few pupils to schools with 20 or more teachers and enrollments of 500 or more.

The curriculum is intended to educate the whole person in his or her varied aspects—physical, mental, and spiritual. It varies from area to area and from country to country.

Elementary schools are managed by local church-appointed school boards in cooperation with and under the direction of the local conference. In many areas two or more churches unite to conduct a consolidated school, often employing school buses to transport the pupils. The schools are generally financed by tuition and generous subsidies from the church or churches operating them and from the conference in which they are situated. Professional supervision is the responsibility of the conference department of education and its superintendent and, in the larger conferences, a supervisor of elementary education.

Intermediate Schools (junior academies, junior high schools). Intermediate schools teaching grades 1—10 are considered to be extensions of the elementary school and are so operated except that additional requirements are mandatory and the secondary work (grade 10) is directly supervised by the union conference director of education. The curriculum is similar to that offered in the corresponding year of the senior academies.

Academies (high schools). Four-year academies are operated as both nonboarding and boarding schools. These are financed primarily from tuition, but also from substantial subsidies from churches and/or the local conference. Many have industries that supply self-help opportunities to the students.

Most of these schools in the United States are accredited by the denomination's Board of Regents and/or state and regional accrediting bodies. Various methods of gaining official recognition are followed in other countries. The curriculums vary from area to area and from country to country.

Higher Education (colleges, universities, advanced schools, training schools). There are currently more than 120 colleges, universities, and worker training institutes operated by the Seventh-day Adventist Church. Half of these have valid accreditation status with the Board of Regents.

Curriculum offerings vary from certificate programs through graduate degree programs, depending on the individual college or university. The booklet Where Shall I Study? (available through the General Conference Department of Education) provides a detailed listing from the various schools.

For other discussion of the SDA educational system, see also Education, Department of; Education, Seventh-day Adventist Philosophy of. For accreditation, see Association of SDA Institutions of Higher Education and Secondary Schools; Board of Regents. Also, many of the current (1994) denominationally owned secondary and higher schools listed below are described in separate articles.

Schubert, George William

SCHUBERT, GEORGE WILLIAM (1869—1943). Evangelist, administrator. He was born in Potsdam, Germany, and in his youth joined the Methodist Church. Soon thereafter he met Emil Frauchiger, a German-speaking Swiss book evangelist, through whose influence he became a Seventh-day Adventist. Sensing the call of God to the gospel ministry, he received his first ministerial license about 1897 and with his young bride went to work in Bremen, Germany. He was soon recognized as a successful evangelist. In 1903, when the Rhenish-Prussian Conference was organized, he became its president.

Late in 1907 or early in 1908 Schubert was appointed president of the East German Conference, where he served until 1912, when he became president of the Saxon Conference. From 1914 to 1926 he served as president of the Central European Union Conference. At the General Conference session held in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, in 1926, he was elected field secretary of the General Conference. In January 1934 he was called back to Europe to serve as president of the Central European Division. At the invitation of the General Conference he returned to Washington, D.C., in May 1938 to serve again as one of the field secretaries of the General Conference.

Schuberth, Henry Franz

SCHUBERTH, HENRY FRANZ (1868—1961). Administrator. He was born into a family of well-to-do music publishers in Hamburg, Germany. Being rather frail in health, he decided to leave for the United States to become a farmer. Arriving in Salem, Oregon, in 1888, he hired out to work for a farmer to obtain some needed experience before investing in a farm. This farmer and his family were Seventh-day Adventists, and through their influence Schuberth accepted the SDA faith. At his first camp meeting he met Ellen White and also visited her home in California. On her advice he went to Battle Creek College as student and teacher. After further studies in Germany he came back to the United States to teach in the German Department of Union College.

In 1894 Schuberth was invited to head the newly established training school in Hamburg, Germany. He remained there until 1899, when he was elected secretary of the German Conference. From 1901 to 1908 he was vice president of the German Union Conference, and in 1909 he became its president. When the German Union was divided in 1910, he was elected president of the East German Union Conference, which position he filled until 1922. For a period of five years, 1923 to 1928, he served as field secretary of the European Division. From 1928 to 1933 he was president of the Central European Division. For a brief period after that he served as secretary of the Ministerial Association of the Central European Division, but because of advancing age and declining strength he retired to Switzerland, where he devoted his time to writing and to preaching in the churches as his strength permitted.

Schuberth, Otto Henry

SCHUBERTH, OTTO HENRY (1893—1966). Evangelist, educator, administrator. Born at College View, Lincoln, Nebraska, he attended Union College from 1908 to 1913 and then immediately began work in the office of the publishing house in College View. Later he and his wife went to Europe, where he engaged in teaching and ministerial work for two years. He was a school principal in Germany for 15 years and was asked in 1936 to serve as president of the Arabic Union at Jerusalem. He held this position for one year and then joined the teaching staff of the Theological Seminary in Washington, D.C. In 1946 he became educational secretary of the Southern European Division, a position that he held until his retirement in 1958.

Schultz (Shultz), Henry

SCHULTZ (SHULTZ), HENRY (1843—1926). One of the pioneers of the Seventh-day Adventist work among the German-speaking Americans. He was born in Germany, but as a child moved with his parents to Illinois. He was wounded on the battlefield in the American Civil War and at that time resolved to be a Christian. In 1868 he married Sarah Jane Rouch. He was a prominent lay member in a German Protestant church in Nebraska when C. L. Boyd and A. J. Cudney came to preach in his town about 1872. Urged by his minister to persuade the people that the Seventh-day Adventists were wrong, he studied the Bible, failed to find any scriptural evidence against them, and as a result joined the SDA Church. In 1875 he was licensed to preach and in 1876 was ordained to the ministry by S. N. Haskell. In 1885 he was elected president of the Nebraska Conference, but resigned soon thereafter (1886) in order to devote himself to work among the German immigrants in the United States. From 1884 to 1903 he supervised all the German language work in the United States and afterward worked among the German-speaking people on the Pacific Coast.

Schutt, Cecil A.

SCHUTT, CECIL A. (1900—1950). Educator, college and conference administrator in India and the United States. In 1919, while studying at Stetson University, he attended a debate in which W. H. Branson participated, and as a result became interested in, and accepted, the Seventh-day Adventist faith. After baptism he attended Southern Junior College (1920—1921), and Washington Missionary College (1921—1923), from which he received a B.A. degree. He then taught mathematics and science at a public high school in Philadelphia for two years. In 1924 he married Mabel Florence Killen, R.N., and in 1925 the two were sent to India, where he was appointed principal of the Telugu mission training school (see Flaiz Memorial Higher Secondary School of Seventh-day Adventists). While in India he was ordained to the gospel ministry (1929). After returning to the United States in 1931, he attended the University of Maryland, from which he received another B.A. degree in 1932. The next year he served as principal of Forest Lake Academy and the next two years as principal of Graysville Academy. He returned again to the University of Maryland for further study and while studying there concurrently taught Bible at Takoma Academy. After receiving an M.A. degree, he was principal of the Yakima Valley Academy from 1937 to 1939, and in 1939—1940 served as educational and Missionary Volunteer secretary of the Upper Columbia Conference.

In 1940 Schutt and his wife were in India again. This time he was educational, home missionary, and Missionary Volunteer secretary of the South India Union. In 1943 he was elected president of Vincent Hill College and in 1946 became president of Spicer Missionary College. From 1948 he served also as educational secretary of the Southern Asia Division. He died at the Salvation Army Hospital at Ahmednagar, India.

Schwe (Shwei) Po

SCHWE (SHWEI) PO (1876—1942). Burmese evangelist. Little is known about his early life except that he was educated at Cushing High School at Rangoon, Burma. In 1898 he married Daw Ta Laing. Before joining the Seventh-day Adventist Church in 1931, he was a civil servant. In 1932 he entered denominational service as a teacher-evangelist in the Irrawadi Delta Mission, working as an assistant and translator to A. J. Sargent, the minister who had baptized him. He was ordained to the ministry in 1937. He was shot and bayoneted to death while imprisoned in 1942, in the course of World War II, when Burmese chauvinists instituted persecution of Christians.

Science and Religion

SCIENCE AND RELIGION. Science has been defined as systematized knowledge, as any branch of inquiry concerned with the observation and classification of facts and the establishment of verifiable general laws. Religion is a system of faith and worship, or the profession and practice of religious beliefs. If by science is meant organized knowledge about the material universe; and if by religion is meant organized knowledge about the Designer and Creator of the universe and about His will concerning the relationships of human beings with one another and with their Maker, and the practice of these principles, there is no reason for conflicts between science and religion. Truth, whether scientific or spiritual, whether measurable or beyond the scope of direct human observation and testing, is consistent with itself in all its manifestations. Seventh-day Adventists often refer to these concepts as “true science” and “true religion.”

Seventh-day Adventists recognize the validity of proved scientific principles and data, and believe that an understanding of the natural world contributes, in turn, to a better understanding of the Creator and of His will for humanity. They consider that nature, in its perfect state, is an expression of the divine character, mind, and will, and that the natural world, rightly understood, is in complete harmony with the revelation of the divine character, mind, and will set forth in Scripture. Verifiable science and scriptural truth are always in perfect accord. The following quotations are typical:

“True science and true religion have a common origin” (Dr. [James?] Cumming, quoted in Review and Herald 13:107, Feb. 24, 1859).

“Genuine geology is as true as the Bible and it does not contradict the Bible; for truth cannot contradict truth” (D. T. Bourdeau, in Review and Herald 29:98, Feb. 5, 1867).

“We are not opposed to science, by any means; for we believe its principles to be in perfect harmony with the Bible” (J. O. Corliss, in Review and Herald 55:116, Feb. 19, 1880).

“Science opens new wonders to our view; she soars high, and explores new depths; but she brings nothing from her research that conflicts with divine revelation. . . . The book of nature and the written Word shed light upon each other” (PP 115).

“A knowledge of science of all kinds is power, and it is in the purpose of God that advanced science shall be taught in our schools” (Ellen White, in Review and Herald 68:737, Dec. 1, 1891).

The interaction between the disciplines of science and religion has not always been harmonious and complementary. A consideration of this conflict calls for a broader definition of both science and religion. Science is not simply observation and fact, but a human search for truth, and as such, subject to all human limitations. The great fallacy of the century is the idea, prevalent among those uninitiated in science, that it is “a sort of intellectual machine,” completely impersonal and empirical in its search for ultimate truth, that its thinking is “exclusively and inerrantly logical in the most formidable sense, and its language utterly . . . precise and unambiguous” (Harold K. Schilling, in Science 127:1324, June 6, 1958).

Too often no sharp distinction is made between a theory and a fact, when in actuality, from a preliminary hypothesis to a basic theory or law there is a continuum, with varying degrees of confirmation. “The highest conceit in any field—scientific, religious, or otherwise—is the assumption that there are no assumptions” (Walter E. Stuermann, Logic and Faith, p. 62). All scientific knowledge is only more or less probable, depending on the preciseness of the data upon which it is based. A knowledge of ultimate reality, ultimate physics, chemistry, or biology does not exist in the mind of man. As the philosopher would point out, humans “know” only what they perceive, not objects themselves that occasion these perceptions.

Science cannot proceed otherwise than from hypotheses, from inferences, that, after evaluation and testing, are retained, modified, or replaced. The best that can be hoped for is a high percentage of verifiable knowledge, verifiable as to its usefulness if not its ultimate truth. This method has resulted in phenomenal material progress. The spectacular success achieved by science has tended to arouse in laypersons unwarranted confidence in even the most tenuous theories proposed in the name of science.

The study of religion is likewise subject to certain human limitations. Because of these limitations the study of the written Word is fraught with possibilities of error comparable with those encountered in a study of the natural world. The unfortunate conflict that has arisen in recent times between the study of science and religion is not the result of inherent irreconcilability between revealed truth and scientific truth. The apostle Paul said, “Now we see through a glass, darkly; . . . now I know in part” (1 Cor. 13:12). It is not surprising, then, that since human limitations are present in the study of both science and religion, misunderstanding and conflict should sometimes exist (see PP 114; R. H. Brown, in Ministry 31:19, March 1958).

Issues of the conflict between science and religion are deeply rooted in the historical setting in which the controversy developed. The formative period of the Seventh-day Adventist Church coincided with the crest of a wave of intellectual reaction against the rigid, blind, ecclesiastical authoritarianism of the Middle Ages. The rigid rule of dogma that dominated the medieval mind, and often placed restrictive sanctions against scientific investigation, suffered a severe blow as a result of the persecution of those such as Copernicus, Bruno, and Galileo. It was the dogmatic preconceptions of theologians, based on their blind reliance upon the Aristotelian philosophical system, upon medieval scholastic speculations, and upon their misunderstanding of the meaning of Scripture, that led them to oppose scientific investigation. This blind, dogmatic reaction to early scientific discoveries marked the beginning of one of the most profound changes in outlook the human race has ever experienced—the rise of free, imaginative investigation. When a pendulum breaks loose, it never stops at the middle of its first swing.

Opposition by both Catholic and Protestant clergy to scientific discoveries naturally tended to force science outside of the church, with the result that it developed to a large extent on non-Christian premises. Ecclesiastical opposition, on imaginary biblical grounds, to such things as the rotation and sphericity of the earth, the use of lightning rods on churches (“attempting to control the artillery of heaven”), inoculation and vaccination, the use of anesthetics in childbirth and surgery, chemistry (“a devilish art”), etc., tended to undermine confidence in the church and its sacred Book, the Holy Scriptures.

The medieval practice of invoking a miraculous explanation for any phenomenon not readily explainable set the stage for abandoning the idea of a miracle-working God, as one by one such phenomena were shown to have a rational explanation on the basis of known laws of nature (see Miracles). By the second half of the nineteenth century, science had gained a position of considerable respect, and free thinking had come into its own. But the reaction to ecclesiastical dogmatism often led to extreme positions. At times the dogmatizing theologian found his counterpart in a dogmatic materialist.

While unhesitatingly endorsing the established principles of science and the value of scientific truth, Seventh-day Adventist writers have always opposed any hypothesis that seemed to be at variance with the revealed truth of Scripture (S. Pierce, in Review and Herald 38:121, 122, Oct. 3, 1871). Their attitude has been one of caution either in the acceptance of new interpretations of scientific findings that might at first appear to contradict principles set forth in the Bible, or in the abandoning of earlier interpretations of the Bible in the light of clearly established scientific truths.

In fields as broad and complex as the sciences on one hand, and theology on the other, it would be too much to expect that in the dialogue between the disciplines there would not be some mistaken and unfair charges on both sides. A theologian endeavoring to answer allegations that the “facts of science” disprove the Scriptures may not always fully discriminate between verifiable facts and the speculative conclusions drawn from them, and may for a time oppose both. Sometimes, also, conflict arose from interpretations of Scripture that fuller study showed to be invalid (e.g., the rigid fixity of species versus limited change within basic groups).

From the first, Seventh-day Adventist authors have opposed all theories that construe the days of Creation week as long geologic ages, and also theories that presume to account for the complex higher organisms by evolution from simple ancestors, which in turn were supposed to have originated by spontaneous generation (Review and Herald 13:28, Dec. 16, 1858; 16:49, July 3, 1860; 3SG 91 [1864]; James White, in Review and Herald 55:104, 105, Feb. 12, 1880; Ed 130 [1903]). They actively opposed, on scriptural grounds, the speculations of pantheism, which would reduce God to an essence pervading all nature. Deism, which seeks to separate God from an active concern with the events of this earth, was similarly opposed (Review and Herald 81:4, 5, Feb. 11, 1904; 81:5, 6, Apr. 14, 1904; MH 413; GC 318).

Seventh-day Adventist writers often stressed the limitations of science, the hazards of accepting as oracles hypotheses based on limited or uncritical observation, and hasty generalization in sciences still in a relative state of infancy (Review and Herald 13:28, Dec. 16, 1858; D. T. Jones, in Review and Herald 60:497, 498, Aug. 7, 1883; 60:513, 514; 60:529, 530). The principle that truth as revealed in the Word of God should be taken into account when evaluating scientific data and formulating explanations for natural phenomena has been set forth repeatedly (CT 425, 530; S. N. Haskell, in Review and Herald 75:366, June 7, 1898).

Yet, recognizing that knowledge is progressive, Seventh-day Adventists investigate apparently conflicting evidence. Writing on the general principle of investigation of new views, Ellen White stated: “We cannot hold that a position once taken, an idea once advocated, is not, under any circumstances, to be relinquished. There is but one who is infallible. . . . If the pillars of our faith will not stand the test of investigation, it is time that we knew it” (GW 125—131 [1893]).

Seventh-day Adventist and other writers have applied this same principle specifically to science and religion (H. W. Clark, in Ministry, 19:35, 36, October 1946; R. E. Hoen, in Ministry, 31:4—8, February 1958; cf. D. N. Lord, quoted in Review and Herald 55:98, 99, Feb. 12, 1880).

Order is apparent in the natural world, and Seventh-day Adventists believe that God, as Creator, is the author of both natural and moral law. “God does not annul His laws, or work contrary to them; but He is continually using them as His instruments” (PP 114 [1890]).

Although God created the world and “set” it “to run” by law, “it is not by inherent power that . . . the earth . . . continues its march around the sun,” for He still upholds “all things by the word of His power” (A. W. Peterson, in Review and Herald 105:4, Oct. 4, 1928; MH 416, 417 [1905]; cf. Heb. 11:3).

The oft-repeated charge that to accept God and the supernatural stultifies scientific research (see George Gaylord Simpson, in Science 131:973, Apr. 1, 1960) is groundless unless one holds to the medieval concept that God is a god of caprice. It is as meaningful and challenging to investigate the mysteries of the laws by which the Creator works as it would be to study supposedly self-existent laws.

In harmony with the prophets of ancient times, Seventh-day Adventists have taught that there is a positive relationship between science and religion, that through the book of nature, as through the book of divine revelation, the eye of faith may behold the infinite wisdom and love of the Creator (L. A. Hansen, in Review and Herald 74:194, 195, Mar. 30, 1897).

“Lift up your eyes on high, and behold who hath created these things” (Isa. 40:26).

“The heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament sheweth his handywork” (Ps. 19:1).

“For the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made” (Rom. 1:20).

Seventh-day Adventists consider the universal evidence of design and purpose in both the inanimate and the living world to be “clear and incontestible proof of a Divine Architect and of that counsel and wisdom wherewith He rules and directs the universe” (Stackhouse, quoted in Review and Herald 24:10, June 7, 1864; cf. MH 410—418 [1905]).

The provisions in the environment on this earth that, collectively, make life possible are too numerous to be accounted for by chance (cf. W. J. Byran, reprinted in Review and Herald 100:2, 18, Oct. 25, 1923). The periodic system of the elements, the structure of matter from the atom to the universe, the remarkable intricacy and complexity of living systems, all point to an infinite Mind, a Designer of incomprehensible ability and power (G. M. Price, in Review and Herald 108:8—10, Oct. 22, 1931). In considering the intricacies of the human body, G. K. Abbott concluded that “if it takes personal intelligence to discover the purposes in these structures, there is no escaping the conclusion that it takes a greater intelligence to design them” (Review and Herald 106:17, Jan. 10, 1929).

According to the second law of thermodynamics, the universe is like a great clock that, left to itself, would eventually run down and become uniformly cold, so that no life could exist. The many still-active one-way processes in nature by which energy is changed to less available forms, the existence of suns and stars that are still hot and of radioactive elements that have not yet completely disintegrated, are all strong evidence not only of finite age but of a source of energy whose origin transcends the known laws of nature. It requires more faith not to postulate a Creator than to believe that the precision, order, interdependence, and infinite variety observable in the natural world testify to an infinite, supernatural, ultimate Cause. A Creator seems to be the most reasonable solution (G. M. Price, in Review and Herald 97:5, 6, Dec. 2, 1920; Robert E. D. Clark, reprinted in Signs of the Times 87:21, 22, 30, 31, February 1960).

Science alone can never explain the spiritual forces at work in the earth, the moral nature of human beings, their sense of higher values. “Impersonal forces do not love. Blind energy has no heart” (G. K. Abbott, in Review and Herald 106:18, Jan. 10, 1929).

These are but a few of the evidences from science (see also Creation; Evolution; Flood) that strengthened Seventh-day Adventist confidence in the positive relationship between science and religion. But science alone is not enough. Although many facts of nature point to a Supreme Intelligence in the universe, the true God cannot be fully known by science. One cannot “by searching find out God” (Job 11:7; Ed 133, 134). The revelation recorded in Holy Writ and seen in the person and life of Jesus Christ is necessary in order to know the personal God of Scripture (J. N. Loughborough, in Review and Herald 18:177, 178, Nov. 5, 1861; MH 418, 419; L. A. Smith, in Review and Herald 81:4, 5, Jan. 28, 1904). The revelation contained in the Word of God is necessary for meaning and perspective in science. Revelation in the world of science gives added meaning to religion.

Scott, Helen May

SCOTT, HELEN MAY (1882—1963). Early missionary teacher and Bible instructor in Korea. After graduating from South Lancaster Academy in the class of 1904, she taught school and served as a Bible worker. In 1908 she went to Korea, where she was placed in charge of the mission school for girls at Chinnampo. Afterward she held meetings with the women in the villages. For a few years before World War II she was matron of the Seoul Sanitarium, but increasing international tensions caused her return to the United States, where she retired in 1938. After her return she took some class work at Pacific Union College and canvassed in San Francisco and Los Angeles.

Scriven, C. A.

SCRIVEN, C. A. (1896—1964). Administrator. He was born in Iowa and entered the ministry in the South Dakota Conference in 1916. With the exception of the years he spent taking college work, he served as a minister and administrator in conference work until the day of his death. In 1923 he accepted a call from the Iowa Conference to become home missionary secretary, then was chosen for the same position in the Atlantic Union Conference in 1926. Between the years 1931 and 1964 Scriven served as president of the following conferences: New York, Upper Columbia, Washington, Oregon, and North Pacific Union.

Seal of God

SEAL OF GOD. A brief form for “seal of the living God” in Rev. 7:2. In vision John saw this seal affixed to the foreheads of 144,000 of “the servants of our God,” 12,000 from each of “the tribes of the children of Israel.” An angel “ascending from the east” with the seal calls upon the “four angels standing on the four corners of the earth, holding the four winds of the earth, that the wind should not blow on the earth, saying, Hurt not the earth . . . till we have sealed the servants of our God in their foreheads.” In Rev. 14:1—5 the 144,000 are said to have “the Father’s name written in their foreheads”; evidently the seal of God contains the name of God. The sealed ones are said to be “the firstfruits unto God and to the Lamb” (vs. 3, 4). Rev. 7:15 and 14:3, 4 both place the 144,000 “before the throne” of God, in His immediate presence; in the former they “serve him day and night in his temple,” and in the latter they “follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth.” The 144,000 have remained loyal to God through an experience referred to as “great tribulation,” during which they “washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb” (Rev. 7:14; cf. v. 15); in Rev. 14:3 they sing a “new song before the throne,” one that only those who have experienced the great tribulation can learn. Passing through this experience with characters unblemished, they stand “without fault before the throne of God” (vs. 4, 5).

John’s vision of the sealing (Rev. 7:1—12) is inserted under the sixth seal, which deals with events culminating in the second advent of Christ (see Rev. 6:13—16). This implies that the sealing process here described takes place not long before Christ’s coming, and that the “great tribulation” through which the 144,000 pass is the blowing of the four winds mentioned in Rev. 7:1—3. Mention of the 144,000 in Rev. 14:1—5 (immediately following the crisis described in Rev. 13:13—17, in which a death decree is issued against those who refuse to worship the image of the beast and to receive his mark in their foreheads) implies that the blowing of the four winds (Rev. 7:1—3), the “great tribulation” (v. 14), and the crisis of Rev. 13:13—17 all refer to the same experience through which they remain loyal to God in the face of death. The seal is affixed to them before the crisis as a certificate of God’s approval. God trusts them, and they trust Him.

Equating the words “sign” and “seal” as used in the Bible, early Seventh-day Adventists noted also that the Sabbath is called a “sign” between God and His people (Ex. 31:13—18; Eze. 20:12, 20) and that the Sabbath commandment contains the three elements of an official seal—the name, title, and jurisdiction of the one whom the seal represents. They found that the fourth command of the Decalogue refers to “the Lord thy God” (name), to Him as Creator (title), and to heaven and earth (His jurisdiction). Acceptance of the Sabbath truth, they concluded, is the reception of God’s seal, and acceptance of a counterfeit is the “mark” of the beast’s authority (see Mark of the Beast).

Ellen White identified the seal of God with the Sabbath in November 1848 (Joseph Bates, A Seal of the Living God, pp. 24—26), and Bates wrote his book on the subject in 1849. Also in 1849 Mrs. White wrote that the sealing work was then going forward (Present Truth 1:21, August 1849). In the next issue (1:25, September 1849) James White cited Eze. 13:5 as evidence that the repairing of the breach in the Sabbath (Isa. 58:12—13) immediately precedes the great battle of the day of the Lord.

“So we see that the mighty work of repairing the breach in the law of God, by teaching and observing the Sabbath, which has been so long trodden down, belongs exactly here, just before the four angels let loose the four winds, that the Israel of God may keep the whole law, and be sealed with the seal of the living God, which will enable them to ‘stand in the battle in the day of the Lord’” (ibid.).

He comments further that “the repairing of the breach in the law of God, and the sealing, are one and the same work, just before the day of the Lord.”

In 1850 James White wrote: “God has ever had a test truth, with which to seal his people. . . . But the last sealing truth is the immutable law of Jehovah, of which the Sabbath is the crowning testimony. . . . The Sabbath is the seal, and the Holy Spirit is the sealer” (Advent Review 1:57, September 1850).

In the Review and Herald for June 24, 1852 (3:31), Benjamin Clark spoke of “the sealing time” as “now,” and said that God’s people would be “sealed forever with the love of the truth.” In a series of three extended articles (ibid. 3:65, 73, 81, Sept. 2, 16, 30, 1852) Hiram Edson associated the seal with the fourth commandment, declared that the law is sealed in the hearts of the Lord’s people (Isa. 8:16), and said, “The Sabbath then is the SIGN or seal of the living God.” His argument rests on the fact that the fourth commandment contains the elements of a royal seal. He also contrasts the seal of God with the mark of the beast, and points to the change in the law of God by the Papacy as a sign of its authority that even Protestants recognize. Roswell F. Cottrell wrote (ibid. 7:44, Sept. 18, 1855): “The last message before the time of trouble is the sealing message.” Uriah Smith (ibid. 8:12, 20, Apr. 24 and May 1, 1856) identified the sealing angel of Rev. 7 with the third angel of Rev. 14, and assigned the sealing work to “our own day.” He too acknowledges the Sabbath commandment as containing the seal of God, because it sets forth the distinguishing characteristics between the true God and all false gods. He speaks of the Holy Spirit as “the sealer,” and associates the sealing of Rev. 7 with the affixing of the mark in Eze. 9. Cottrell (ibid. 14:77, July 28, 1859) equates the words “sign” and “seal,” and speaks of the sealing work as the last work to be done for God’s people in their probationary state. The changed Sabbath, he says, becomes the mark of the beast. Ellen White wrote extensively about the seal of God and its importance for the church today. See SDACom 7:968—970; 5T 207—216; TM 444—446; etc. Reference to the seal appears often in Early Writings, which contains her early works (see pp. 38, 43, 44, 48, 50, 58, 67, 71, 89, 279).

Seventh-day Adventists today still consider the sealing work to be most important, but stress also the seal as God’s acknowledgment that His own righteous character is reflected in His children on earth.

Second Advent

SECOND ADVENT. The return of Jesus Christ to the earth as King of kings and Lord of lords. Though the phrase itself does not occur in the Bible, the teaching of Christ's return constitutes a favorite theme of NT writers, who speak, for example, of our Lord's appearance a "second time" (Heb. 9:28). Jesus Himself promised, "I will come again" (John 14:3).

The most frequent NT term for the Second Advent is parousia, meaning "presence" (literally, "a being beside"), and by extension the "coming" and "arrival" that result in "presence." The word occurs 24 times in the NT. In Philippians 2:12 Paul contrasts his presence (parousia) among the Philippians with his absence (apousia) from them (cf. 2 Cor. 10:10). More frequently, however, the context requires the meaning "arrival" or "coming" for parousia. For instance, the arrival (parousia) of Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus from Corinth brought joy to Paul and refreshed his spirit (1 Cor. 16:17, 18). The arrival (parousia) of Titus with good news from Corinth comforted Paul in his concern for the church there (2 Cor. 7:6). While a prisoner in Rome, Paul expressed the hope of being set free and of coming (parousia) again to the Philippians (Phil. 1:26). Hellenistic writers from Ptolemaic times onward, and in the Greek papyri, use parousia as a technical term for the official "visit" of a king or emperor, or other person of authority. Hence, this word was chosen by the NT writers to express the Messianic advent of Christ in glory to judge the world at the end of the age (Matt. 24:3, 27, 37, 39; 1 Cor. 15:23; 1 Thess. 2:19; 3:13; 4:15; 5:23; 2 Thess. 2:1, 8; James 5:7, 8; 2 Peter 1:16; 3:4, 12; 1 John 2:28). In the light of its Hellenistic usage, the word reflects the majesty of our Lord at His return.

Another term used for the Advent is apokalypsis, meaning "revelation," "unveiling," "disclosure" (1 Cor. 1:7; 2 Thess. 1:7; 1 Peter 1:7, 13). At His first coming Christ's glory was hidden, and His deity was shrouded with humanity. But at His second appearing His glory and majesty are to be unveiled for all to behold (Matt. 24:30).

The Advent is also spoken of as an epiphaneia, a "manifestation," "appearing," or "appearance" (1 Tim. 4:1, 8; Titus 2:13). In Hellenistic Greek this was a technical term for the visible manifestation of a divinity. Once in the NT (2 Tim. 1:10) it refers to the First Advent as a manifestation of divine grace. Elsewhere it refers to the great final intervention in human history, the Second Advent.

Although eleusis, "coming," is not used for the Second Advent (except in the variant readings of Codex Bezae in Luke 21:7 and 23:42), the related verb erchomai, meaning "to come," is so used (Matt. 16:27, 28; Mark 13:26; 14:62; Luke 9:26; John 14:3; Acts 1:11; 1 Cor. 4:5; 11:26; Rev. 1:7; 3:11; 22:7, 20). The verb phaneroō, "to make visible" or "to manifest," is also applied to the Second Advent (Col. 3:4; 1 Peter 5:4; 1 John 2:28; 3:2).

Finally, there are the frequent references to "the day" (Rom. 13:12; Heb. 10:25), or "that day" (Matt. 7:22; 24:36; Luke 10:12; 21:34; 1 Thess. 5:4; 2 Thess. 1:10; 2 Tim. 1:12; 4:8); or more specifically, to "the day of God" (2 Peter 3:12), "the day of the Lord" (1 Thess. 5:2; 2 Peter 3:10), "the day of Jesus Christ" (Phil. 1:6), "the day of Christ" (Phil. 1:10), "the day of our Lord Jesus Christ" (1 Cor. 1:8), "the last day" (John 6:39, 40, 44, 54),

“the great day” (Jude 6; Rev. 6:17), “the day of judgment” (2 Peter 2:9), “the day of wrath” (Rom. 2:5), and “the day of redemption” (Eph. 4:30).

As the name indicates, Seventh-day Adventists stress the Second Advent, believing not only that Christ will return, but that He will return soon, though they set no time for this event to occur. Seventh-day Adventists trace their origin to the interchurch Advent movement of the first half of the nineteenth century, from all the leading Protestant denominations of the time, and the one bond of unity that held them together was belief in the nearness of Christ’s return (see Premillennialism). This profound conviction resulted in a great religious awakening in various parts of the world. The SDA founders had belonged to the group originating in America called the Millerite movement, which taught that the Second Advent would end the present world and fix the destiny of every human being. Like the Millerites (and the other premillennialists), Seventh-day Adventists accept the teaching of the NT that the Advent is to be a literal, bodily reappearing (Acts 1:9—11), which is followed by the first resurrection and the millennium.

The coming of Christ the second time is not to be confused with the spiritual presence of Christ with believers since His ascension (Matt. 28:20; John 14:18). According to Acts 9:1—11, this coming is also to be distinguished from the descent of the Holy Spirit as Christ’s representative at Pentecost, or at some other time. It is not to be confused with death (John 21:22). As James White wrote: Christ “is coming as the Life-giver, and the believer’s best friend. Death is the life-taker, and man’s last enemy (1 Cor. 15:26)” (“The Second Advent,” Review and Herald 41:10, Dec. 24, 1872). The Advent is a personal and literal coming, the counterpart of Jesus’ ascension—“this same Jesus” and “in like manner” (Acts 1:9—11); “the Lord himself” (1 Thess. 4:16).

This climactic event of earth’s history will be public, visible to believers and nonbelievers alike (Matt. 24:27, 30; 25:31—46; Luke 17:24; 1 John 3:2; Rev. 1:7). It will be accompanied by an audible shout of command and the summons of a trumpet (Matt. 24:31; 1 Thess. 4:16; 1 Cor. 15:51, 52). There is therefore nothing secret about it.

The NT does not divide the Second Advent into two separate events, one secret and the other public, one a so-called rapture of the saints and the other a revealing of Christ. The chief passage on the translation of the saints (1 Thess. 4:15—17) describes Christ’s coming as attended with “a shout,” with “the voice of the archangel,” and with the sounding of a trumpet. Jesus pictured His appearing in the clouds of heaven as taking place prior to the gathering of the elect, not after, and these events as occurring in immediate succession and as parts of one glorious appearing (Matt. 24:30, 31; Mark 13:26, 27). Christ’s coming will be “with clouds” (Rev. 1:7), “in the clouds” (Matt. 24:30; 25:62; Mark 13:26; 14:62), or “in a cloud” (Luke 21:27; cf. Acts 1:9; 1 Thess. 4:17); as attended by hosts of angels (Matt. 24:31; Mark 8:38; 13:27; Rev. 14:14—16). His coming is spoken of as glorious (Matt. 16:27; 24:30; 25:31; Mark 10:37; 13:26; Luke 9:26; 21:27; 1 Peter 4:13; 5:1), and is compared to a great flash of lightning that illuminates the entire heavens (Matt. 24:27; Luke 17:24).

The NT presents the Second Advent as accompanied by the resurrection of the just (Luke 14:14; John 5:28, 29; 6:40, 44; 11:24; Acts 24:14, 15; 1 Cor. 15:22, 23; 1 Thess. 4:15—18), and this resurrection to life and immortality (Luke 20:35, 36; 1 Cor. 15:52, 53) is the beginning of the millennium (Rev. 19; 20).

The Second Advent will mark the end of the present world order, and is therefore spoken of as the “end of the world” (Matt. 13:39, 40, 49; 24:3; 28:20). The phrase translated “end of the world” might better be rendered “completion of the age” or “consummation of the age.” The NT views time as a succession of ages. Eternity past is referred to literally as “from the ages” (Eph. 3:9; Col. 1:26; 1 Cor. 2:7). Eternity future is described by expressions meaning literally “into the ages” (translated “for ever”; Luke 1:33; Rom. 1:25; 2 Cor. 11:31; Jude 25; etc.), “into the ages of the ages” (rendered “for ever and ever” etc.; Gal. 1:5; 1 Peter 4:11; Rev. 1:18; etc.), or simply “ages to come” (Eph. 2:7). Human existence is thought of as divided into the present age and the age to come (Matt. 12:32; Eph. 1:21). The present is an evil age (Gal. 1:4; cf. Luke 20:34) in which men die. This age will continue until the Parousia and the judgment, when the age to come will begin. The earth will remain, but will later be renovated to remove all traces of sin and death.

Before the Second Advent the destiny of every human being will be forever fixed (Rev. 22:11, 12). (See Investigative Judgment; Probation.) During the “day of the Lord,” which begins at the Second Advent and ends after the millennium, judgment will be executed upon all (Matt. 7:21—23; 13:30—43; 16:27; 25:31—46; Acts 17:31; Rom. 2:5, 16; 14:10; 1 Cor. 3:12—15; 4:5; 2 Cor. 5:9—11; 2 Tim. 4:1; Jude 15; Rev. 1:7). God’s elect will be gathered from the earth to meet the Lord in the air (Matt. 24:31; Mark 13:27; 1 Thess. 4:16, 17). They will be immortalized and glorified, and enter the kingdom of glory, which will then be established (1 Cor. 15:51—55; Matt. 25:31). The desire of Jesus that His people be with Him will thus be fulfilled (John 17:24), and His promise to return and take them to Himself will be fulfilled (John 14:3).

Although no one can determine the exact time of Christ’s return, the Bible speaks of precursors and signs that attest its imminence. Important evidence for the nearness of the Second Advent, for example, is furnished by the convergence on our day of great lines of prophecy from the books of Daniel and the Revelation.

In His Mount Olivet discourse (Matt. 24; Mark 13; Luke 21), our Lord Himself gave a series of signs by which His followers might know when His coming would be near, “at the doors” (Matt. 24:33). This discourse was given in response to the questions of His disciples regarding the time of the destruction of Jerusalem, the Parousia, and the sign of the close of the age. In His reply Jesus mingled the description of these two great crises, and gave signs for both. He also gave an outline of events from His day to the end of human history. There would be signs both in the heavens and upon the earth (Matt. 24:29, 30; Luke 21:25—27), and one sign would be the preaching of the gospel in all the world (Matt. 24:14; cf. Rev. 14:6—14).

The apostle Paul predicted the rise of antichrist, the man of lawlessness, before the Parousia (2 Thess. 2:1—9). He also described the social and religious conditions that were to prevail “in the last days” (2 Tim. 3:1—5). The book of James foretells strained relations between capital and labor (James 5:1—5). Peter tells of the skeptical attitude toward “the promise of his coming” that would characterize the “last days” (2 Peter 3:1—6). The apostle refutes the uniformitarian philosophy of these scoffers by referring to the stupendous changes brought about by Creation and the Flood. He goes on to explain a delay in the coming of the day of judgment: (1) time does not mean the same to the eternal God as to us (v. 8); (2) God is long-suffering and is delaying the judgment to allow time for repentance (v. 9). But the coming of that day is certain (v. 10).

The book of Revelation deals at length with the Advent, and closes with the promise “Surely I come quickly.” True saints in all ages have responded with the prayer “Even so, come, Lord Jesus” (Rev. 22:20).

Second Sabbath

SECOND SABBATH. Formerly, the Sabbath in each month on which the church service was devoted to promoting offerings for foreign mission work. This plan appears to have been recommended as a denomination-wide program by W. A. Spicer as early as 1905, though it had been used by W. J. Stone, of Indiana, before this time (Review and Herald 82:20, Oct. 19, 1905). A few years later the practice of devoting the Sabbath school offerings to the worldwide work became universal, and the Second Sabbath offering unnecessary.

Secret Societies

SECRET SOCIETIES. The Seventh-day Adventist Church from its early days has consistently counseled its members against belonging to secret societies. The reasons for this may be summarized as follows: (1) secret societies lay claim to certain loyalties that properly belong to God and His church; (2) they “yoke” together believers and unbelievers, contrary to the Word of God (2 Cor. 6:14); (3) the secrecy imposed on members prevents them from following Christ’s example of working openly (cf. John 18:20).

As early as June 1860, J. H. Waggoner discussed the matter of membership in secret societies in the Review and Herald (16:36, June 19, 1860). He said that “the Christian is bound by principles of the highest order, to reject their fellowship.” In 1864 John Byington, then president of the General Conference, and the members of the General Conference Committee gave the following reasons Seventh-day Adventists should not belong to secret societies: (1) “Their manner of working disagrees with the Bible teaching, which demands of us an open and frank course, and is explicit in its testimony against working in secret,” and (2) Seventh-day Adventists “would be brought into direct fellowship with the teachings of the world” (ibid. 24:86, 87, Aug. 9, 1864).

In the Mar. 20, 1883, issue of the Review and Herald (60:182) the editor listed 50 reasons Christians should not belong to secret societies. Among the reasons given were that secret societies imposed obligations on members that forced them to resort to dodges and pretenses and even falsehoods to conceal the secrets they were sworn to, and that they often used initiatory ceremonies that were insulting to human dignity. In 1889 L. A. Smith pointed out that “where the object is above suspicion, secrecy is unnecessary” (ibid. 66:361, June 4). Section

SECTION. A unit of church organization constituting a part of a larger unit and subordinate to it. In the General Conference Constitution the continental units of organization are defined as “division sections” of the General Conference Committee. However, these are commonly called divisions, and “section” is virtually unused outside the constitution. In more common usage the term applies, in some areas of the world, to constituent parts of a union or division. In this latter sense, section is the equivalent of mission or conference, in its being composed of local churches.

Sedaven High School

SEDAVEN HIGH SCHOOL. A coeducational boarding school on the senior high school level, operated by the Transvaal Conference on a 700-acre (280-hectare) plot of land, four miles (6.5 kilometers) from the town of Heidelberg, and 40 miles (65 kilometers) southeast of Johannesburg, South Africa. On Mar. 24, 1972, 420 acres (170 hectares) of land was expropriated by the government for the purpose of establishing a nature reserve. In 1993 there was a staff of 16 instructors and an enrollment of 130. The school is completely bilingual, English and Afrikaans being the two languages used for instruction. A primary school with four teachers and about 60 children also operates on the same campus.

The land on which to establish the school was purchased in March 1948 by the Natal-Transvaal Conference. Buildings were erected, fruit trees were planted, and a dairy herd was purchased. School opened January 1951 with an enrollment of 45 boys and 45 girls. The first principal of the school was C. C. Marais. The name Sedaven was coined as an abbreviation of “Seventh-day Adventist,” the word being easily pronounced in both English and Afrikaans.

As the school grew, more buildings were added. And on land belonging to the school a home for the aged church members of the conference was built. The campus has also become the site for the annual camp meeting of the conference, the first being held there in 1953. The school is a feeder for Helderberg College.

Principals: C. C. Marais, 1951—1953; P. J. van Eck, 1954—1956; W. Marais, 1957; G.J.E. Coetzee, 1958—1960; W. du Pleassis, 1961—1970; H. F. Steenberg, 1971—1986; H. S. van der Walt, 1987—1989; P. W. Coetser, 1990— .

Seefried, Johannes

SEEFRIED, JOHANNES (1881—1956). Evangelist and church administrator in Germany. He was born in Macedonia and grew up in a Seventh-day Adventist home. Baptized at the age of 17, he attended the Friedensau training school from 1901 to 1903. After graduation he worked in Switzerland, southern Germany, Hungary, East Prussia, Pomerania, and in Berlin, winning numerous converts and establishing churches in many places. The 1908 Yearbook lists him as a licentiate in the Balkan Mission and the 1909 Yearbook as a licentiate in the South German Conference. The 1910 and 1911 Yearbooks list him as a minister in the Hungarian Conference. The Yearbook in the years indicated lists him as president of the following conferences: Oder, 1912—1918, and Prussia, 1923—1925. He married Emma Radowski in 1909.

Selmon, Arthur Clifford

SELMON, ARTHUR CLIFFORD (1877—1931). One of the early Seventh-day Adventist missionaries to China, physician, evangelist, educator, editor, and administrator. A graduate of the American Medical Missionary College in the class of 1902, he went to China in 1903 in company with three other physicians (his wife, née Bertha Loveland, and H. W. and Maude Miller), all of whom were his classmates, to open Seventh-day Adventist work in central and north China. He himself arranged for the first-year expenses of his mission. He was ordained the next year.

Until 1910 Dr. Selmon engaged in medical and evangelistic work in Honan Province, serving as superintendent of the North China Mission Field from 1906. Later, in succession, he took charge of the publishing house at Shanghai and edited the Chinese Signs of the Times; directed the East China Mission; served as principal of China Missions Training School; served as medical missionary secretary of the Asiatic Division; operated a dispensary and established a sanitarium in Shanghai. In 1924 or 1925 he returned to the United States and entered private employment as director of health services of the W. K. Kellogg Company and as associate medical director of the W. K. Kellogg Foundation.

While working as an editor in China he wrote in Chinese a book called Health and Longevity, on the maintenance of health under primitive conditions. It was translated into several languages and was sold by colporteurs in many countries. The story of his life has been written by his wife, Bertha Loveland Selmon, under the title They Do Meet.

Semarang Adventist Academy

SEMARANG ADVENTIST ACADEMY (Perguruan Advent Semarang). A senior academy operated by the Mataram and Siliwangi Seventh-day Adventist churches under the supervision of the West Java Mission. It is located in Semarang, which is a major city in central Java. The school is situated on the same grounds as the Mataram Seventh-day Adventist Church.

There is an elementary and junior high school at the same location. The senior high has been in operation since 1982, the junior high since 1977, and the elementary since 1966. In October 1989 the government Department of Education granted the high school an autonomous status, which enables the school to give final government examinations independently as a school.

There are 18 teachers in this school. Five of them are full-time and 13 part-time. In 1993 the enrollment of the senior high school was 71 students and the junior high was 62, with a total of 133 students.

Principals: Paul Koes Widodo, Amos Sardiman.

Semmens, Alfred William

SEMMENS, ALFRED WILLIAM (1867—1940). Pioneer Seventh-day Adventist medical worker in Australia. Born in Australia, he became a Seventh-day Adventist in 1888 as the result of reading Ellen White's Great Controversy. Afterward he went to the United States and studied nursing at the Battle Creek Sanitarium. In 1891 he married Emma Martha Pallant, with whom, soon after his graduation, he went to Australia to teach in the SDA school in Melbourne. Later he served as secretary of the local conference. At the urging of Mrs. White he resumed nursing, pioneering in the establishment of SDA medical work in Australia by opening near Sydney the first SDA treatment rooms and others later in Adelaide. Afterward for a number of years he was manager of the Sydney Sanitarium and Hospital. In 1911 he went to Loma Linda, California, and graduated in 1915 as a physician. He then returned to Australia in 1916, where he engaged in private practice. He spent the last years of his life in California.

Senegal

SENEGAL. An independent African republic since Apr. 4, 1960; formerly a French colony. It lies at the western extremity of North Africa, with Mauritania on the north, Mali on the east, Guinea and Guinea-Bissau on the south, and Gambia and the Atlantic Ocean on the west. It has an area of 75,750 square miles (196,200 square kilometers), with a population (1994) of 8.7 million. Of these, 90 percent are Muslims and most of the rest animists. Most of the Christians are Roman Catholics. Agriculture is the principal occupation, the chief exports being peanuts, peanut oil, and oil cake. Senegal also exports phosphates.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. The territory of Senegal constitutes the Senegal Mission, which is part of the Sahel Union Mission and the Africa-Indian Ocean Division. Statistics (1992) for Senegal: churches, 3; members, 159; ordained ministers, 2; licensed ministers, 3. Headquarters: Dakar.

There is a health center at Niaguis.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Seventh-day Adventist work in Senegal began in 1952, when Robert Erdmann and his family arrived from France and settled in Dakar, the capital. About the same time, a young man who had been released from military service began to sell SDA books, with fair success. He was later joined by another colporteur, who sold publications in various parts of the country.

Erdmann's evangelistic work in a rented theater in the African district of the capital proved difficult and slow, but names of interested people were obtained and Bible studies were given. In 1953 the first Muslim was baptized; though he was persecuted by his family, he remained faithful and became a mission worker in the Casamance, the southern part of Senegal.

In 1953 offices were rented in Dakar in which Sabbath services were held. Later a property was secured to serve as a chapel. In 1959 a primary school was opened, with 160 pupils. The next year a new building was completed, which provided three classrooms and a meeting hall. Enrollment rose to 340 in secondary and primary classes of the École Adventiste (Dakar Mission School).

In 1960 Raymond Meyer arrived with his family to head the mission. That same year, a small mission school was opened in Niaguis, eight miles (13 kilometers) from Ziguinchor, the capital of Casamance. Evangelistic meetings conducted there in 1961 proved successful. On a well-situated property, Maurice Fayard constructed a new building for a mission school and erected a home for the missionary. In 1968 Adolf Kinder was named president. He transferred the mission headquarters to Niaguis for two years (1968—1970). During that time a dispensary and other buildings were erected on the property.

In 1972 a new property was purchased in Dakar, and an attractive church building was erected, along with workers' dwellings. The same year the Dakar Mission School was reorganized into a training school for workers. With Ernst Pala as principal, it served this purpose for a while and also served as headquarters for the Senegal Mission.

Beginning in 1962, SDA programs were broadcast weekly over the radio, and educational and religious correspondence courses were offered.

Senior Citizens' Associations

SENIOR CITIZENS' ASSOCIATIONS. An organizational concept formed in the spring of 1981 when the General Conference recognized the need for a new area of service. The administration recognized that there should be some organization created that would fill the needs of retired workers and laypersons for fellowship and service. The creation of senior citizens' associations would fill this need. D. A. Delafield, retired undersecretary of the Ellen G. White Estate, was asked to lead out in the new enterprise. He immediately began organizing clubs throughout North America. The goal was to provide fellowship and service opportunities for people age 60 and older. Thousands of retired workers throughout North America, and later throughout the world, were brought together in these groups, which provided not only psychological support but the challenge to continue to be a viable part of the Adventist witness in the world.

The retirement club idea was not new. Several clubs had been organized, notably in Florida and California. The first club known was probably in Orlando, Florida. Formed in the 1930s, it was led by O. O. Montgomery, retired vice president of the General Conference, and Dr. Daniel Kress, retired sanitarium medical director.

A new push for senior clubs resulted in the creation of the Greater Washington/Takoma Park Retirement Association in 1981, with Bruce Wickwire, retired publishing secretary of the General Conference, as the first president. Next a senior workers' club was formed in Berrien Springs, Michigan. With the help of publicity in the Adventist Review and a general enthusiastic response from senior workers throughout North America, clubs sprang up in many places, including Texas, Massachusetts, Oregon, Arizona, Virginia, Ohio, Nebraska, Washington, and Ontario, Canada.

At first the organization of clubs involved retired employees of the church only, but within a few years they expanded to include retired laypersons. Many clubs are still largely composed of beneficiaries of the General Conference Retirement Plan, but more and more clubs are composed of general retirees.

Officers are chosen by the local club. Terms of tenure are generally one year. A membership fee of $5 is usually collected to defray costs annually and to provide for club expenses. Each association is more or less autonomous.

Each retirement club is service-oriented, with annual projects providing financial assistance to mission programs, church-building projects, tuition to students, and joint programs with local churches and conference-wide programs of service.

In 1982 a division-wide convocation of seniors met at Southern College for a long weekend. More than 400 attended. In 1983 more than 1,500 seniors converged on the La Sierra campus of Loma Linda University. To date (1994), there have been 12 North American Division annual meetings, with an average attendance of about 1,200. A banquet is held during each convocation, at which an offering is taken, with beneficiaries chosen from both North America and the world field. More than $250,000 had been donated through 1993.

Hundreds of seniors have been recruited as volunteers for short-term overseas service. In North America senior workers and laypersons are selected by local churches to serve as elders, deacons, deaconesses, Sabbath school officers, and welfare directors. Their financial support is a stabilizing factor in all conferences. Their liberal gifts aid Global Mission and the operation of the worldwide church.

Participation in denominational programs has greatly expanded since the early days of the organization. Retirees are recognized more and more as a positive force for the growth of the Seventh-day Adventist Church.

James E. Chase, former communication director of the General Conference and for five years associated with Delafield in North American activities for seniors, became the successor to Delafield as coordinator for retirees' affairs in January 1993.

Senson, Roman R.

SENSON, ROMAN R. (1901—1983). Educator, evangelist. Born in the Philippines, he was the first convert of the first mission academy in the islands. He served as academy teacher, evangelist, and educational and young people's secretary. He was the first master guide in the Philippines and became the first Filipino academy principal. After completing a five-year course through Home Study Institute, he was ordained to the ministry. He served as the first religious liberty secretary of the Philippine Union and became dean of the school of theology at Philippine Union College. In retirement he continued to serve as dean of the School of Liberal Arts.

He and his wife, Josefa, eventually retired to Hot Springs, Arkansas, where he died.

SENTINEL LIBRARY (1889—1894; semimonthly 1889, monthly 1890—1891, quarterly 1892—1894, with occasional extras; absorbed by the Religious Liberty Library, 1894). A series of pamphlets on the then-current religious liberty issues, devoted, as stated in the pamphlets, to “the defense of American institutions, the preservation of the United States Constitution as it is . . . , and the maintenance of human rights, both civil and religious.” W. N. Glenn was chair of the editorial committee.

A magazine devoted to the defense of the principles of religious liberty in the United States. It was intended to educate the public in the principles and advantages of religious freedom for all citizens, to review the historical background of the American Constitution, which prohibited the establishment of any religion, and to disclose the discriminatory nature of religious ordinances whenever and wherever introduced and enforced.

Beginning with the Sept. 24, 1886, issue, the magazine carried a note on its masthead that it was an organ of the International Religious Liberty Association. Later it became the organ of the Religious Liberty Department of the General Conference. Because of the heavy expense of production and the small circulation, its publication was suspended in 1904. In 1906 it was superseded by Liberty.

Seoul Academy

SEOUL ACADEMY (Seoul Sahmyook Joongkodeung Hakkyo). A coeducational boarding school on the junior high and senior high levels operated near Seoul, Korea. It is fully accredited by the Seventh-day Adventist Board of Regents as well as by the Korean government. In 1993 the enrollment was 1,941, with a staff of 81.

The first school, Kyungsung Sahmyook School, was established in April 1938 at Myunmok-dong, Seoul. It was closed at the end of Japanese rule of Korea. The school reopened as Sahmyook Junior Academy in 1947. During the Korean War the school moved to Cheju Island and stayed there for a few years. The institution returned to Seoul in 1952.

In 1956 the school moved to Hoiki-dong, Seoul, and operated as a junior high school. Operation as a senior high school began in 1961.

Because of the expansion of the city of Seoul in 1970, the school was relocated in Kyomun-dong, Kuri-city, Kyunggi. The 32-acre (13-hectare) campus consists of a four-story administration building with 26 classrooms, an auditorium, two dormitories, a dining hall, and 21 faculty homes.

The middle school was separated from the high school in March 1992.

Principals: J. M. Lee, 1947—1953; Kim Chang Soo, 1954—1955; Kang Chin Ha, 1955—1959; Lee Eung Choon, 1959—1962; Choi Myung Hwon, 1962—1963; Kim Chong Hwa, 1963—1965; Kim Yung Do, 1965—1967; Han Ki Cho, 1967—1973; Kwon Hyuk Chong, 1973—1978; Ko Chan Yeown, 1978—1984; Kim Dae Sung, 1984—1990; Ko Chan Yeown, 1990— .

Seoul Adventist Hospital

SEOUL ADVENTIST HOSPITAL (Seoul Wisaeing Byungwon). A 450-bed general hospital with a School of Nursing, operated in Seoul, Korea, by the Korean Union Conference.

Seventh-day Adventist medical work in Seoul began in the autumn of 1931 in two rented rooms in a downtown building. In October 1932 the work was moved to larger quarters, near the Pagoda park, where there was room to care for nine inpatients. This clinic continued to operate until late in 1937.

In 1933 10 acres (four hectares) were purchased seven miles (11 kilometers) from the center of Seoul and about one mile (1.6 kilometers) beyond mission headquarters, on which a two-and-a-half-story ferroconcrete building for a sanitarium-hospital was completed in December 1935, and the first patients were seen on Jan. 6, 1936. The School of Nursing was opened that same year.

Also, in 1936 a small building was erected, with funds given by a missionary of another denomination, for the care of tubercular patients. A nurses' dormitory was constructed in 1937. The main building, with beds for 25 patients, and the tuberculosis ward, with eight beds, provided a total of 33 beds for inpatients. By the end of 1949, the inpatient capacity was 125 beds. In 1939 exercises were held for the first students to be graduated from the School of Nursing.

Early in 1941 all foreign missionaries were advised to leave Korea, but the work was carried on by national workers until December 1943, when the hospital was taken over by the Japanese government. Late in 1946 medical work was begun again. It was several months after the return of foreign workers early in 1947 that the property was officially recognized as belonging to the mission.

The Nursing School was reopened in 1947, but because of the Korean War, graduation exercises for the classes of 1950 and 1951 were not held until March 1952, but annually thereafter. The School of Nursing is coeducational and requires a high school diploma as prerequisite to the three-year course. By February 1974 a total of 533 nurses had been graduated. The three-year diploma program at the hospital is now being coordinated with a four-year collegiate program of nursing, which began in 1974 at Korean Union College.

When the Korean war began on June 25, 1950, all American personnel were quickly evacuated. In the first few days of the war extensive fighting near the hospital shattered most of the windows and caused other damage. The national workers were scattered. When Seoul was being retaken by UN forces, toward the end of September that same year, the buildings were miraculously saved from destruction. The workers gradually returned, and on Oct. 18, 1950, American medical personnel returned. Then in December, when the Communists came south again, the hospital workers, experiencing extreme hardship, were sent to Pusan and from there, on Jan. 15, 1951, proceeded to the island of Cheju, where work for refugees was carried on. Seoul was retaken by the Communists and again in March by UN forces, after which no work at the hospital was permitted for three months. The loss of medicines, surgical supplies, and equipment, and damage to the buildings, including the burning of the nurses' dormitory, was conservatively estimated at more than $150,000.

To meet the need for larger and more representative facilities, plans for a new hospital building were drawn in 1968 and construction was begun. The outside and inside walls of the new 150-bed hospital building were completed, but by the end of 1970 the money available was depleted and the building program was temporarily suspended. The building was completed by July of 1976. In 1985 it was enlarged to 406 beds and in 1992 to 450.

During 1992 a total of 306,415 outpatient visits were made to 120 physicians and specialists and eight dentists, who are salaried and maintain offices in the hospital building. Physicians and nurses also regularly conduct charity village clinics and health-education programs in Seoul and in the surrounding area. The Dental Department was separated from the hospital and elevated to a dental hospital in December 1992.

The old and new hospital buildings are located on a 47-acre (20-hectare) compound.

Seoul Adventist Hospital Orphanage

SEOUL ADVENTIST HOSPITAL ORPHANAGE (Sung Yuk Won). A home established in 1951 for victims of the Korean War, housing about 38 children, operated by the hospital and the Korean Union. It provided for many orphaned children who were brought to the Seoul Adventist Hospital suffering from malnutrition and various diseases such as tuberculosis, and who had no place to go. The orphanage was located on three-fourths acre (three-tenths hectare) of land that has three one-story red brick homes built around a lawn. The playground was at one end of the compound, and the whole compound was enclosed by a cement-block wall. Each home had its own kitchen, cook, and house parents.

Additional children were not accepted after 1967, except for adoption. About 800 children have been adopted in America and Europe. The orphanage was closed in 1981.

Directors: Mrs. G. Rue, 1951—1967; Miss F. Welter, 1967—1973; E. Y. Kim, 1973—1974; Mrs. R. W. Ringer, 1974—1981.

Serna, Marcial

SERNA, MARCIAL (1860—1935). The first Spanish-speaking Seventh-day Adventist minister of Mexican ancestry to work in the United States. He was born in Texas and for 17 years served as a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church in New Mexico and in Mexico. About 1898, as a result of the preaching of W. L. Black in Tucson, Arizona, Serna and many members of his congregation became SDAs. Joining the SDA ministry, he preached in Arizona, New Mexico, and California. He retired in 1916, but continued to take part in gospel work in the Texico Conference until 1930.

Services, Church

SERVICES, CHURCH. In general, the services in the Seventh-day Adventist Church are similar to those conducted in other Protestant churches. However, SDA weekly services are held on Saturday. Among their important services are the following:

1. Sabbath School. In most churches this service is conducted on Saturday morning; in a few, on Saturday afternoon (For the type of service, see Sabbath School.)

2. The Regular Worship Service. This is the main service of the church for preaching and worship, and is usually held at 11:00 Saturday morning, following the Sabbath school. It is conducted by the minister or elder. The Church Manual (see 1990 ed., pp. 75, 76) suggests the following alternative orders of worship:

Longer Order of Worship:

Organ Prelude
Announcements
Choir and Ministers Enter
Doxology
Invocation
Scripture Reading
Hymn of Praise
Prayer
Anthem or Special Music
Offering
Hymn of Consecration
Sermon
Hymn
Benediction
Congregation Standing or Seated for a Few Moments of Silent Prayer
Organ Postlude

Shorter Order of Worship:

Announcements
Hymn
Prayer
Offering
Hymn or Special Music
Sermon
Hymn
Benediction
Congregation Standing or Seated for Silent Prayer.

Larger congregations conduct two worship services, with the Sabbath school between.

3. Baptismal Service. Seventh-day Adventists practice baptism by immersion. Baptisms are often conducted in connection with the regular Sabbath morning services in baptistries, with which many churches are provided. Sometimes baptisms are conducted away from the church in a lake or stream.

4. Communion Service. The Communion service is sometimes called the quarterly service because it is generally conducted once every three months. The partaking of the symbols of the bread and the wine in the Lord's Supper is preceded by the preparatory service called the ordinance of foot washing, for which the men and the women separate, then reassemble for the supper.

Seventh-day Adventists practice open Communion. Christians of other denominations are free to join in the service if they so desire.

5. Evangelistic Services. These meetings for the public for the purpose of reviving inactive members, reclaiming former members, and winning converts are conducted by the pastor, with local assistance, or by an itinerant evangelist. They may be held in the church, but are often held in halls, tents, or other places of assembly. (See Evangelism, Public.)

6. Prayer Meeting. This service is usually held on Wednesday evening for the purpose of prayer and Bible study. After song, prayer, and a short talk or Bible study, there is opportunity for successive prayers offered voluntarily by members of the congregation. Often there is, in place of or following the series of prayers, a testimony service (called in earlier times a social meeting), in which members of the congregation rise and speak briefly concerning their experiences and feelings.

7. Youth Meeting. This meeting is a component of youth ministry in the local church. Youth, with the guidance and support of adult sponsors, conduct these events on Friday evenings or Sabbath afternoons, focusing on the needs and interests of young people. The gatherings vary widely in content and format. Program ideas may be found in Youth Ministry Accent (General Conference Youth Ministries) and Cornerstone Connections Youth Resource Magazine (Review and Herald Publishing Association).

8. Vesper Services. Services at the beginning or the end of the Sabbath are conducted in certain churches at sundown on Friday or preceding sundown on Saturday. Services vary in form, but usually include music, Scripture reading, prayer, and a sermonette or devotional talk. In SDA schools the vesper service sometimes includes a testimony service.

9. Church Dedication Service. After all debts incurred in the purchase or erection of a church have been liquidated, a dedication service is held. It may be a part of the regular weekly worship service, but more often it is held separately on a Sabbath afternoon. It may include a statement regarding the history of the church, a dedicatory sermon, sometimes an act of dedication read responsively, and a dedicatory prayer (see Seventh-day Adventist Minister's Manual [1992], pp. 203—209).

10. Revival Services. These are services held, usually in a series and often in connection with evangelistic meetings, to revive the church spiritually.

11. Week of Prayer Services. These services are held nightly for a week, including two Sabbath morning services, in a designated period in the autumn. The meetings are more or less informal, similar to a typical prayer meeting, except that the principal feature is a reading—one of a series of articles published for these services from the Review and Herald. Usually the reading is accompanied by comments.

12. The 10-Minute Missionary Service. Between the end of Sabbath school and the beginning of the worship service the personal ministries leader promotes and reports the various activities of the church in lay evangelism, such as literature distribution, Ingathering, temperance, missions, and Community Services.

Settergren, Anders Johan

SETTERGREN, ANDERS JOHAN (1864—1942). Evangelist and administrator in Sweden. He was converted and baptized near the age of 20 during evangelistic meetings held by J. G. Matteson. After working as a colporteur for some years, he became an evangelist in 1892, but when the Frederikshavn Mission School opened in Denmark in 1894, he went there as one of its first students. After spending some time at the school, he returned to the ministry and was ordained in 1902. In 1915 he became treasurer of the Stockholm Publishing House and later manager, a post he held until his retirement in 1933.

Seventh-day Adventist (SDA)

SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST (SDA). The descriptive name adopted as a denominational title in 1860 by one branch of Adventists—those, specifically, who keep the seventh day as the Sabbath. (For the circumstances of the adoption of the denominational name, see Organization.) The people who first took the name in 1860 were already Adventists, not only in the broad sense of believing in the nearness of the Second Advent—for many in various parts of the world in the 1840s and earlier had believed that—but also in the restricted sense of having developed from the Millerite movement, which had called itself Adventist. By adopting the name, the Sabbathkeeping Adventists distinguished themselves from the other descendants of the Millerite movement.

Thus the popular explanation that the name was selected as denoting one who believes in the Second Advent and observes the seventh day is an oversimplification. First, there are non-Adventists who observe the seventh day—the Seventh Day Baptists. Second, the term Adventist does not include all who believe in the Second Advent (for example, the Apostles' Creed professes belief in the Second Advent) any more than the term Presbyterian belongs to all whose churches are governed by elders (presbyters) or the term Baptist to all who limit baptism to the immersion of believers (both of which would apply to Seventh-day Adventists).

The full title “Seventh-day Adventist” (or the equivalent title in various languages) is the official name of a specific Christian denomination with a specific body of doctrines, of which the Sabbath and the Second Advent form only a part. It does not apply to those (mostly in small groups) who observe the seventh day and hold to the nearness of the Advent but who differ on other doctrines and hence are not part of the denomination. On the other hand, it is not denied to those of like faith who are separated by circumstances from organizational connection with the whole body of Seventh-day Adventists.

(This encyclopedia uses Adventist and, on occasion, Seventh-day Adventist for individuals and groups who before 1860 were developing and holding in common the doctrines that were to characterize the body now called by that name.)

Seventh-day Adventist Church

SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH. A conservative Christian body, worldwide in extent, evangelical in beliefs, and professing no creed but the Bible. It places strong emphasis on the Second Advent, which it believes is near, and observes the Sabbath of the Bible, the seventh day of the week. These two distinguishing points are incorporated into the name Seventh-day Adventist. The church is administered by a representative organization ranging from the local churches, through the conferences (or missions, or sections, the terminology varies in different countries) and unions, to the General Conference, with its 11 divisions in various parts of the world.

The worldwide membership of 7,498,653 in 1992 was distributed approximately as follows: one third each in Latin America and Africa; one sixth in Asia; one tenth in North America; and one thirtieth each in the South Pacific and Europe.

Doctrines and Standards

Doctrines and Standards. The Seventh-day Adventist Church has consistently refused to adopt a creed or confession, preferring to base all beliefs on the Bible. However, several statements of general beliefs have been published. (See Doctrinal Statements; also, names of specific doctrines.) Church membership, granted by vote of the local congregation, is based on conversion and baptism by immersion, following instruction in and acceptance of the doctrines of the church and standards of behavior, including total abstinence from liquor and tobacco (see [Church \[local organization\]](#)).

The distinctive SDA message may be summarized as “the everlasting gospel”—the basic Christian message of salvation through faith in Christ—in the special setting of the threefold message of Rev. 14:6–12—the call to worship the Creator, “for the hour of his judgment is come,” and to take a stand for God in the crisis. This message is epitomized in the phrase “the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus” (v. 12). See Remnant Church.

Polity and Organization

Polity and Organization. The Seventh-day Adventist form of church government came to have characteristics of several systems—particularly the congregational, with its emphasis on local church authority; the presbyterian, which provides for government by elected representatives; and in some points the methodist, in that it has conferences as organizational units and in that the conference assigns ministers to the local churches. However, these features were not conscious imitations, but grew out of situations and needs of the developing Seventh-day Adventist groups.

The local church administration is partly on a presbyterian pattern, though ministers are not chosen by the congregation, but are assigned by the conferences (or missions, or sections), composed of a number of churches. Groups of conferences form union conferences, and these are the constituents of the General Conference, the worldwide administrative body.

The General Conference Executive Committee functions not only through geographical administrative divisions but also through advisory departments, committees, and commissions. (For an explanation of the administrative system, see General Conference Constitution; Organization; also, names of specific departments or area units.)

The church organization is representative of its international composition. The General Conference Executive Committee includes members from all the divisions. Each division has its president (who is a vice president of the General Conference), its officers, its executive committee, and its representatives, who belong to the General Conference Executive Committee, serving somewhat as a subcommittee operating in its own section of the globe. The Seventh-day Adventist Church operates in 204 countries and islands, using 687 languages.

History

History. Forerunners. Seventh-day Adventists are, doctrinally, heirs of the Adventist, or Millerite, movement of the 1840s, but they are heirs also of an earlier widespread awakening in many countries of interest in the Second Advent, of which the Millerite movement was a part (see Premillennialism).

Development of the Denomination. The denominational name and basic organization were adopted between 1860 and 1863. However, the group that arrived then at the point of organization had for some years—since 1844—formed a distinctive and well-defined body of individuals, groups, and local churches, who were developing and holding in common doctrines that distinguished them clearly from others. Thus in this book the term Seventh-day Adventist (abbreviated SDA) is sometimes used for this earlier period also, to designate those who were giving shape to the future denomination.

By about 1850 the fusion of scattered groups of Sabbathkeeping Adventists in New England and New York was assured by the series of conferences (see “Sabbath Conferences”) under the leadership of James and Ellen White and Joseph Bates. During the period from 1848 through 1850, differences were resolved and the main outline of doctrines held in common was laid down. Thus was formed the nucleus of the Seventh-day Adventist Church years before the name or the church organization existed.

In 1848 James White, urged by his wife, began to publish the Present Truth in Middletown, Connecticut; the next year the Advent Review, in Auburn, New York; and later, in 1850, the Review and Herald, at Paris, Maine—later at Rochester, New York, where a small publishing house was established. The Review and Herald became the official denominational organ. In all this Ellen White’s counsels furnished the inspiration and James White the leadership and much of the preaching, the writing, and the promotion.

The publishing house, operated at first in Rochester, New York, was moved to Battle Creek, Michigan, in 1855. Battle Creek soon became the headquarters for the denomination.

During the 1850s the elaboration of doctrines was developed, mostly in articles on various biblical subjects, often called forth as answers to opponents. J. N. Andrews, a young man in his 20s with a scholarly bent, wrote numerous expositions on the Sabbath, the sanctuary, the beasts of Rev. 13, and other prophetic topics. His articles, closely reasoned and forcefully expressed, formed the basis for later pamphlets and books on these subjects. Uriah Smith, later best known for his Daniel and the Revelation, began to write on the prophecies.

In a general meeting at Battle Creek in 1860, the denominational name was adopted and a committee formed to incorporate the publishing house. The SDA Publishing Association was incorporated in 1861. In 1861 also the churches of Michigan were organized into a “conference” (in the methodist sense of the word); later other conferences were formed. In 1863 a General Conference met and a constitution was framed. (See Organization.)

Numerous institutions were established at the Battle Creek headquarters—in 1866 the Western Health Reform Institute, which in 1877 became the Medical and Surgical Sanitarium and later the Battle Creek Sanitarium; in 1874 Battle Creek College; and in 1895 the American Medical Missionary College.

Expansion into the Midwest swelled church membership to 3,500 by 1863. In 1868 evangelists went West and launched a thriving work on the Pacific Coast. In New England lay evangelism was fostered through tract and missionary societies, begun in the late 1860s and organized on a denomination-wide basis in 1874. Publications in different languages were printed for use among foreign-speaking people in the United States, and the influence of this evangelism spread. In the late 1860s SDA teachings were carried to Europe (Italy and Switzerland) by a missionary not sent by the denomination (see Czechowski, Michael Belina), and groups of adherents to the beliefs were formed without contact with the original group.

In 1874 the General Conference sent J. N. Andrews to Europe. This was the beginning of a worldwide expansion. As SDAs entered other lands, they found people who were already looking for Christ’s return, and some who were observing the Sabbath, who joined the movement—in Germany, Russia, Argentina, Brazil, and elsewhere.

In the later 1870s was inaugurated the house-to-house selling of SDA publications, which led in the early eighties to the printing of subscription books on Seventh-day Adventist doctrines for sale to the general public. This innovation was so successful that it became one of the standard methods of evangelism (see King, George Donald; Literature Evangelist).

In the 1880s there were Seventh-day Adventists in Europe scattered from the British Isles to Russia and from Scandinavia to Italy, with the center in Switzerland. There was even a small beginning in Turkey. On the opposite side of the world, Australia and New Zealand were entered; also, distant Pitcairn Island in the mid-Pacific. A beginning was made in South Africa. (See names of specific countries.)

In the 1880s evangelism reached Central America (Honduras) and parts of South America (British Guiana). In the 1890s the missionary ship Pitcairn opened up contacts with various Pacific islands, and India and Japan were entered. Although one self-supporting missionary worked at Hong Kong, China proper was not entered until after the turn of the century.

In the early years of the twentieth century the church was rounding out its worldwide expansion and also turning its attention to administration in order to facilitate the work in the areas where it had already become established. Local conferences were brought together in areawide or nationwide union conferences during the 1894—1901 period; in 1913 divisions were formed on a continental basis.

In 1901 the planning and control over the various phases of work of the church became more centralized with the formation of the first General Conference departments in place of several independent organizations, and an enlarged and more widely representative General Conference Executive Committee assumed the guiding role (see Organization).

In 1903 world headquarters were moved to Washington, D.C., and in 1989 to Silver Spring, Maryland.

In later years, as all parts of the globe were assigned to the various divisions, new territories were entered and in turn became bases for further expansion as indigenous leadership was developed. The church became truly worldwide in spread, though always challenged by further unentered regions. Its growth is shown on the preceding table of historical statistics.

This growth is pictured in detail in Emma E. Howell's Great Advent Movement, M. E. Olsen's Origin and Progress of Seventh-day Adventists, Arthur Spalding's four-volume Origin and History of Seventh-day Adventists, R. W. Schwarz's Light Bearers to the Remnant, Jerome L. Clark's 1844, C. Mervyn Maxwell's Tell It to the World, and the Department of Education textbook The Story of Our Church.

Recent developments include the increasing internationalization of the world headquarters staff and meeting places, with Annual Councils being held in Mexico City (1972), Manila (1982), Rio de Janeiro (1986), Nairobi (1988), Perth (1991), and Bangalore (1993). Overseas General Conference sessions were held in Vienna in 1975 and in Utrecht in 1995.

Evangelistic outreach, quite strong in public evangelism between World War I and World War II, became strongly lay-oriented personal evangelism in many parts of the world. Highlighted by such slogans as "One Thousand Days of Reaping" (1980—1985) and "Harvest 90" (1985—1990), evangelistic thrust shifted from church growth to church planting in unentered areas under the sponsorship of "Global Mission," beginning in 1990 and focusing on the end of the present millennium in the year 2000.

Seventh-day Adventist Church in Canada

SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH IN CANADA (formerly Canadian Union Conference). The unit of church organization embracing the territory of Canada and the French islands of St.-Pierre and Miquelon, and composed of the following local organizations: Alberta, British Columbia, Manitoba-Saskatchewan, Maritime, Ontario, and Quebec conferences; and the Seventh-day Adventist Church in Newfoundland and Labrador. Statistics (1992): churches, 328; members, 42,083; church schools, 77; ordained ministers, 216; licensed ministers, 45; Bible instructors, 5; teachers, 330. Headquarters: 1148 King Street East, Oshawa, Ontario. Official organ: Canadian Adventist Messenger.

Institutions

Institutions. Canadian Union College; Cariboo Adventist Academy; Chinook Winds Adventist Academy; Crawford Adventist Academy; Fraser Valley Adventist Academy; Heritage Green Senior Centre; Kennebec Manor; Kingsway College; North York Branson Hospital; Okanagan Academy; Pacific Publishing Association (Maracle Press); Park Manor Personal Care Home; Parkview Adventist Academy; St. John's Seventh-day Adventist Academy; Sandy Lake Seventh-day Adventist Academy; Sherwood Park Nursing Home; Sunnyside Nursing Home; West Park Manor Personal Care Home.

The conferences in the SDA Church in Canada have opened a number of institutions. The Manitoba-Saskatchewan Conference established the Sunnyside Nursing Home in Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, in 1960, with 70 beds. In 1968 this was expanded to 106 beds. In 1965 a 70-bed facility was opened in Swift Current, Saskatchewan. In 1967 the Park Manor Nursing Home was opened in Winnipeg, Manitoba, with a capacity of 100 beds, followed in 1973 with the West Park Manor Nursing Home, offering 150 beds. The Alberta Conference established the Sherwood Park Nursing Home in 1969. Sherwood Park is a suburb of Edmonton, the capital city of the province. This institution has a capacity of 100 beds.

The Maritime Conference operates Kennebec Manor, a 170-bed nursing home that opened in 1980.

The Ontario Conference operates a senior retirement community that includes a 110-apartment complex, a 20-bed retirement lodge, and an 87-bed nursing home located in Stoney Creek, Ontario.

In the British Columbia Conference, the Fraser Valley Adventist Academy was organized in 1971 as a consolidation of three church schools. It offered 10 grades in a new, open-area school building. In the 1974—1975 term this academy was raised to senior status, offering 12 grades on a day-school basis in an enlarged facility. Students are bused from Chilliwack, Mission, Abbotsford, Aldergrove, Langley, and White Rock.

History

History. The first union conference in Canada comprised eastern Canada only. It was formed late in 1901, when the Canadian territory of the new Eastern Union Conference and the province of Ontario were formed into a new union. The territory then was made up of these conferences and mission fields: Ontario, Quebec, Maritime, and Newfoundland, and the name was changed to Eastern Canadian Union Conference in 1913 to make it descriptive of its territory. In 1907 the Western Canadian Union Conference was organized, comprising the following conferences: Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and British Columbia. In 1932 east and west united to form the Canadian Union Conference.

For the first time the work of the church in Canada was extended beyond provincial boundaries when David Bartsch was sent to the Northwest Territories in September 1969.

In 1973, 150 volunteer laypersons sponsored by Maranatha Flights International flew to the Territories and built a multipurpose complex to provide a sanctuary, a youth center, and a pastor's home in Yellowknife, the capital. A plane was provided to serve the needs of outlying communities.

The Yukon Territory was assigned to the British Columbia Conference in 1974.

In June 1971 the English-speaking churches in Quebec united with the Federation du St. Lawrence to form the Quebec Seventh-day Adventist Church Association. In 1989 the Quebec SDA Association was formed into a conference.

In 1986 the Canadian Union Conference became incorporated as the Seventh-day Adventist Church in Canada.

History

History. Beginnings of the work. The Seventh-day Adventist faith was first brought to Newfoundland in 1893 by two lay missionaries from Battle Creek, Michigan—E. A. Parker, colporteur, and L. T. Ayres, schoolteacher—and their wives. The first woman convert was Mrs. Anna Pippy, the wife of a St. John's businessman, with whom Mrs. Ayres had become acquainted on board the vessel en route to Newfoundland. Edward Butler was the first male convert. When because of his refusal to work on the Sabbath he was dismissed from his position as checker of ship's cargo at Harvey's Wharf, he became a self-supporting lay worker, continuing in this service until his death in 1950. His son, George, was a minister in denominational work for 42 years in Canada, Australia, and the United States.

The Newfoundland Mission Founded. In 1895 S. J. Hersum was sent to Newfoundland to baptize the converts and establish a mission. A church school was opened in 1905 in Mrs. Pippy's home, taught by Elizabeth Milley, a new convert. Church services and public meetings were held in Jackman's store building until a new church was built on Cookstown Road in St. John's. The first church was organized in 1896, with 18 charter members.

H. J. Farman continued the work, with tent meetings in various outports in Conception Bay. Four new converts entered the colporteur ministry in the areas of Bonavista and Notre Dame bays. Literature distribution was widespread, with shipments of tracts and papers sent to outports by dog teams.

H. C. Giles held public and cottage meetings in Grand Bank and Fortune Bay on the Burin Peninsula. C. A. Hansen was sent and supported by the Iowa Conference to assist in the fast-developing interest on the Avalon Peninsula. In 1901 the Newfoundland Mission field joined with the Ontario and Quebec conferences and the Maritime Mission to form the Canadian Union Conference (listed as the Eastern Union Conference in the General Conference Bulletin, 1901).

From 1902 to 1904 Dr. A. E. Lemon and his wife, Dr. Carrie Lemon, from Battle Creek, operated a clinic and treatment rooms in downtown St. John's, known as the Newfoundland Health Institute. Dr. Carrie Lemon was the only woman doctor practicing in Newfoundland. Of widespread interest were her lectures sponsored by the WCTU to large audiences in Victoria Hall, St. John's.

C. H. Keslake, while traveling to isolated outposts on board Dr. Wilfred Grenfell's coastal vessel, became acquainted with the skipper, James Dower, who accepted the SDA teachings. Several of Captain Dower's children became denominational workers. A native Newfoundlander, F. W. Johnston, son of a charter member of the St. John's church, assisted Keslake in outpost evangelism in Twillingate and other areas; later he became a prominent evangelist in Canada and the United States.

A Franklin Gordon treadle printing press, purchased by the mission and operated by George H. Morgan in his home, printed a publication known as The Advent Messenger from February 1909 to July 1911.

R. A. Hubley and his wife held public meetings at Bay Roberts, where a church was organized and a building erected in 1914. They also worked at Catalina, Trinity Bay, where a church was organized and a building erected in 1915 (later disbanded). Other churches later disbanded as the members moved away were Port Lemington (established 1921) and Spencer's Cove, in Placentia Bay (built 1937).

In 1914 a headquarters building was erected on Freshwater Road in St. John's to house the mission office and living quarters. In 1920 the building was remodeled and subsequently several times enlarged to accommodate the school, moved from Cookstown Road church, which developed into the Newfoundland Academy, teaching 12 grades.

Elder B. E. Manuel returned to his home village of Cottrell's Cove and began the work there in 1919 with a church and school. A newly renovated building continues to serve as a church at this present time.

Two mission boats were used by colporteurs—the Hope on the north coast, and later the Messenger on the south and west coasts.

Radio station BSL (Bible Study League) was started in 1929 by H. N. Williams, mission superintendent. It has subsequently been operating with the call letters VOAR (Voice of Adventist Radio). In 1991 a million-dollar project was completed with financial help from many parts of North America. The project included new studios occupying the lower floor of the conference headquarters building in Mount Pearl, with all new equipment, nine-acre (3.6-hectare) tower site with twin directional towers, and miraculously, approval by the Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission (CRTC) of a power increase from 100 to 10,000 watts, enabling coverage of the east coast of Newfoundland, with many responses from different countries in Europe. The new frequency is 1210 AM.

Depression and unemployment in the city of St. John's during the 1930s gave opportunity for the SDA Welfare Association to operate a welfare soup dispensary for adult unfortunates.

A new church was organized in 1938 in Corner Brook, on the west coast of the island, and a two-room school was built in which church services were held until 1959, when a new church building was completed. The first teacher was Hazel Avery. The school outgrew its facilities as a five-teacher school. A choice tract of land was purchased on Philip Drive in the center of a large housing development, and a new church and school complex was erected in 1987.

In 1947, under the direction of Pastor Clarence Goertzen, a church was built, with a school on the lower floor, in Botwood. The members included families who had moved their church school and houses across the bay from Indian Point. A new two-room school building was erected on the church property (1958—1960) under the direction of Pastor John Graham. The school grew to five rooms, but because of declining enrollment and an outdated building, a four-room school was erected in 1987 adjoining the former gym. In 1993 there were four teachers.

The Newfoundland Mission Conference Organized. In 1949, the year Newfoundland became the tenth province of Canada, the Newfoundland Mission was officially designated the Newfoundland Mission Conference and was included in the sisterhood of conferences comprising the Canadian Union Conference. The president of the mission became a member of the executive committee of the Canadian Union Conference. A treasurer and part-time publishing secretary were employed, with one other ordained minister located in Corner Brook and a pastor-teacher in Botwood.

Subsequent History. A new mission boat named Maranatha was added, which has made colporteur trips to Labrador. In 1952 a junior campsite of 20 acres (eight hectares) on Adams Pond, 15 miles (25 kilometers) west of St. John's, was purchased, on which a dining hall and a dormitory have been erected and equipped. In 1969 this camp was sold and a new campsite was developed on the west side of South West Pond, about 35 miles (55 kilometers) west of St. John's on the Trans-Canada Highway. The present campsite consists of three dormitories and three other buildings, with 29 cabin units, auditorium, and two separate cabins, plus other small buildings and tent and trailer sites. In 1991 a large ball field was completed. Camp meeting is held there each year. The camp is also used for other youth activities, including a camp for the visually impaired.

During the year 1955 Dr. Eugene Hildebrand established a practice in St. John's, and Dr. Arthur Moores established a practice in Brigus. Both graduated from Loma Linda University Medical School.

In the 1950s Mrs. Richard Stagg, from Cape Freels, was a patient in the TB sanitarium in St. John's. She listened to radio station VOAR and requested Bible studies, and was baptized by Philip Moores. Upon being released from the hospital, she went home and began sharing her faith. When the Staggs moved from Cape Freels, they encouraged someone to follow up the interest. In the summer of 1960 Mrs. Arthur Moores and Mrs. Eugene Hildebrand assisted a teacher, David Crook, in holding Vacation Bible School during the day and public meetings at night. Later Phyllis Stokes began a branch Sabbath school, resulting in a small company that continues to this day. There have been several baptisms, and some of the young people have become denominational employees.

In 1957 the original Cookstown Road church in St. John's moved into the former Queen's Road Presbyterian church building. This was sold in 1979 and a former Pentecostal church building on Aldershot Street was purchased, which is used at this present time. At Bay Roberts a new church building was built, with a two-room school on the lower floor. In 1983 the school moved into a new four-room school building that was erected on the church property.

In 1961 a beginning ministerial intern, David Crook, held a series of meetings in Lethbridge, Bonavista Bay. This resulted in 15 newly baptized charter members, and a new church building was dedicated 12 months later. A one-room school was built and opened

Sept. 1, 1963, with Edward Reimche as the first teacher. This grew to a five-room school, but with declining enrollment, the school was closed in 1991.

In 1963 Pastor and Mrs. David Crook held a series of meetings and a Vacation Bible School in Glovertown, which created much interest. A double-wide trailer was placed in Glovertown, and Lyndon DeWitt and Gordon Miller held a series of meetings with a number of baptisms. Thus a church was established there. A new church building was constructed and dedicated in December 1982.

In 1966 David Crook and two Canadian Union College theology students held a series of meetings in Bonavista, which created considerable interest. Later Olavi Orpana and David Crook held another series of meetings, resulting in 17 baptisms, which was the beginning of the church there. Later a small church building was erected.

In 1967 at St. John's, new office facilities were built and added to the front of the academy. Besides providing space for offices and the Adventist Book Center, this new section also provided space for station VOAR. The radio station was completely separate from the academy. In 1965 there was a fire in the academy, and a new three-room brick school was built at 154 Freshwater Road. In 1968 the old academy was completely renovated throughout and the outside covered with brick, making the building more attractive. The Adventist Book Center ceased operation in 1979.

In the 1970s Victor Gill was sent to open new work in Marystown by building a medical clinic, thus attracting Seventh-day Adventist medical professionals. The clinic was sold in 1978—1979. Two buildings were erected, one as a church and school for lower grades, and a small building for upper grades. Evangelist Lawton Lowe held a very successful series of meetings enabling a functioning church to begin. In 1985 a Maranatha group, along with members from across Newfoundland, erected two new buildings—a four-room school and a church sanctuary.

A group of people from the Conception Bay South area who attended a series of meetings held in St. John's by Lawton Lowe were baptized and joined the St. John's church. After holding membership there for several years, it was their desire to have a church building in Conception Bay South. A building was purchased and renovated in 1993, and on Sept. 11, 1993, it was dedicated.

In February 1990 the conference headquarters moved into a new building that had been purchased and renovated at 1041 Topsail Road in Mount Pearl, providing accommodation to station VOAR on the lower level with ground-level back entrance, and the main floor with ground-level front entrance for four offices, board room, receptionist area, and workroom.

Newfoundland has had the highest Ingathering per capita in the North American Division for years.

Seventh-day Adventist Cooper Hospital

SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST COOPER HOSPITAL. A 40-bed general hospital owned and operated by the West African Union Mission in Liberia, West Africa. It was purchased from the family of the late Dr. H. Nehemiah Cooper on Sept. 7, 1986, and is located in the heart of Monrovia.

In 1989 civil war broke out in Liberia, forcing the hospital to cease its services for almost three years. The building was looted and left in a poor condition. Efforts to rehabilitate the hospital were made by ADRA/AID, and a cash donation from a friend in Sweden made it possible to carry out the general repairs and to purchase supplies and medicines. The government of Denmark donated hospital equipment and instruments.

The hospital reopened on Apr. 12, 1993.

Administrator: P. L. Llaguno, 1986— .

Seventh-day Adventist Dietetic Association

SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST DIETETIC ASSOCIATION. A nonprofit church-related professional organization organized in 1954 whose active membership is composed largely of registered dietitians and nutritionists. Other Seventh-day Adventists who have suitable academic training in the field of nutrition and/or home economics and who have successful experience teaching food and nutrition on the college level, or who have administered in food service, are eligible for associate membership. The government of the association is invested in an executive board and a house of delegates. Much of the work is done by appointed committees under the guidance of the executive board. Headquarters are at Loma Linda, California, where printed materials produced by the association are available.

General meetings of the organization are held yearly in conjunction with the national meeting of the American Dietetic Association, or at such other time and place as determined by the executive board. The general purpose of the association is to assist its members in enhancing their professional contribution as leaders in food administration, clinical dietetics, and nutrition education in church-related medical and educational institutions.

An equally important objective is to make more effective the participation of its members in the health ministry of the church. To this end, its members interact with other health professionals and ministers to teach the nutrition principles and practices of the church as set forth in the writings of Ellen White, as well as to integrate up-to-date scientific nutritional findings into the evangelizing efforts of the church. The association is not only involved in the preparation of nutrition education materials for churches, institutions, and community health programs, but it makes its services available for reviewing manuscripts prepared by others, with the objective of maintaining high scientific standards in all nutrition materials published by the church.

Seventh-day Adventist Global Centre for Islamic Studies

SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST GLOBAL CENTRE FOR ISLAMIC STUDIES.

An organization founded July 1, 1989, as the first institution resulting from the Global Strategy plans inaugurated by Neal C. Wilson, then president of the General Conference, at the Annual Council in Rio de Janeiro in 1986.

The rationale for the decision to establish an Islamic study centre was the fact that although the church is making rapid numerical progress in its worldwide missionary activities, growth among the Islamic peoples—perhaps 18 percent of the world’s population—was minimal, and the time had come to focus attention on Islamic evangelism, with in-depth studies of the world’s Muslims, who and where they are, and what they believe.

The nine main objectives of the centre can be stated as follows:

1. To study ways, means, methods, and approaches meaningful for winning Muslims in their varied cultural and social contexts.

2. To coordinate different attempts made by Seventh-day Adventists in the different divisions and attached unions to win Muslims.

3. To train national Adventist workers in soul-winning approaches to win Islamic peoples.

4. To provide orientation for expatriate Adventist workers called to work in Islamic areas in their demanding task, instilling in them a cultural sensitivity necessary for their involvement in the missionary work and acquainting them with varied approaches.

5. To map the Islamic world in regard to people groups, unreached populations, and receptive sections.

6. To focus attention on, and develop methods to win, minority “pockets” of non-Muslim peoples living in Islamic areas.

7. To be a resource center for all institutions, ministers, and workers involved in Islamic work.

8. To be involved in field evangelism, personal or public, where the aim is not only soul winning but also testing models for Islamic approaches.

9. To publish to the Adventist world church the results of research and field work.

The Centre for Islamic studies is located in offices at Newbold College, Binfield, England. This location was chosen for several reasons, the most important being that in the current volatile situation of fundamentalist tendencies, independent and objective studies into Islam must be conducted in neutral surroundings. Heathrow Airport near London (and the centre) has the most frequent inexpensive air connections to the Islamic world; Britain has both a sizeable Muslim population and also a concentration of the best Islamic study centers in the world. The location of a General Conference entity outside the United States was a natural link in the then-desired decentralization of the General Conference offices.

The study centre is involved in promoting an awareness among Seventh-day Adventists of the tremendous challenge Islam is to Christian traditions in general and Seventh-day Adventists in particular. This is done by Muslim Awareness seminars conducted in areas of the world where there is a Muslim presence by both SDA workers and laypersons. In addition, the centre is holding workers' meetings in a variety of locations, lasting from 10 to 30 hours, where Islamics and Muslim evangelism are taught intensively. The centre has introduced Islamics as a course offering in SDA seminaries and colleges in different parts of the world on both undergraduate and postgraduate levels.

One of the main tasks of the Islamic centre has been to draw the attention of Seventh-day Adventist leaders and laity not only to the challenge of the unreached millions of Muslims but also to the uniquely differing evangelistic approaches that should be applied to this world religion, which is, by definition, the most gospel-resistant. These sensitive promotional activities comprise not only the above-mentioned seminars and workers' meetings but also the use of the printed word. Articles on Islamic work supplied to church papers around the world have been numerous, wide-ranging, and printed in many languages.

The centre began with a newsletter that has developed into a biannual 32-page magazine, the Adventist-Muslim Review. The editor is Jack Mahon.

A symposium for Seventh-day Adventist Islamicists was conducted in 1992. Participants and observers from the world field attended, and the main lectures were printed in a reader entitled The Three Angels and the Crescent. The centre also has printed a 48-page manual for personal evangelism to Muslims, entitled Your Muslim Neighbor and You.

Director of the Islamic centre is Borge Schantz, a former missionary to the Middle East and Muslims in northern Nigeria.

Seventh-day Adventist Health Centre (Lilongwe)

SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST HEALTH CENTRE (Lilongwe). A dental and optometry practice situated on the Presidential Highway in Lilongwe, the capital city of Malawi. Previously this was an extension of Blantyre Adventist Hospital.

In 1983 Dr. M. A. Rue started the dental practice. One year later he was joined by a second dentist, Dr. E. R. Russell. The dental practice is largely patronized by officials from the various embassies in Lilongwe.

In 1989 Dr. Gary Peterson arrived to start the optometry department. Besides fitting eyeglasses and contact lenses, the optometrist carries out simple eye treatments.

In 1992, 4,800 dental patients, and 1,947 optometry patients were treated. Trywell J. Ndoliro has been chief administrator since the separation of the institution from Blantyre Adventist Hospital supervision.

Dental Directors: M. A. Rue, 1983—1988; E. R. Russell, 1988—1990; W. B. Seasley, 1991— .

Seventh-day Adventist High School (Khunti)

SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST HIGH SCHOOL (Khunti). A coeducational boarding school operated by the Northern India Union of the Southern Asia Division, at Khunti, Bihar, about 26 miles (50 kilometers) south of Ranchi. The school property consists of 63 acres (25 hectares) of cultivated and grazing land, with administration building, dormitories, dining hall, auditorium, a small press, play fields, and 10 homes for teachers. There is also a farm and a small dam. In 1993 there was an enrollment of 606 students, with 23 teachers and 10 ancillary workers.

The school was opened in 1937 on an eight-acre (three-hectare) mission property near Khunti by C. J. Jensen, from Denmark, with one teacher and four students. There were then two dwellings, one for the principal and the other for the teacher, his family, and the students. When the school fees, paid in kind, proved inadequate, the school was closed. However, in 1938, with a subsidy from the local mission, it was reopened, with an enrollment of 12 boys, averaging 14 years in age, in the second and third grades. By the labor of students and church members a boys' dormitory was erected a short time later. W. B. Votaw, appointed principal in 1940, procured more land for orchard and rice cultivation. Later the school was upgraded to class 6 and was made coeducational. Until 1961 the school was listed in the Yearbook as Khunti Elementary Boarding School.

In 1971 action was taken by the East India Section to upgrade the school by two standards, making it a junior high school. In 1972 a sprinkler unit was purchased, which greatly increased the output of the farm and garden. A large number of the students are also receiving assistance from the Christian Children's Fund.

In 1984 the school was upgraded to a boarding high school. In 1985 it was affiliated to the Council for the Indian School Certificate Examinations, New Delhi, giving it government recognition.

The school celebrated its golden jubilee on Oct. 14 and 15, 1988. In the fourth quarter of 1989 Khunti received the Thirteenth Sabbath Offering overflow, and a new school building with administrative block was built. It was inaugurated on Dec. 15, 1991. The building houses six classrooms, a science laboratory, a library, a computer room, a staff room, and offices for the principal, headmaster, and treasurer/cashier.

The school prepares candidates for both the denominational examination and the ICSE examinations at tenth level.

Principals: C. J. Jensen, 1937—1941; W. B. Votaw, 1941—1945; M. G. Champion, 1945—1947; B. Nowrangi, 1947—1948; W. B. Votaw, 1948—1951; D. S. Laursen, 1951—1953; P. D. Kujur, 1953—1955; A. K. Seventh Day Adventist High School (Khurda)

SEVENTH DAY ADVENTIST HIGH SCHOOL (Khurda). A school situated 15 miles (25 kilometers) from Bhubaneswar, capital of Orissa state, India. In 1975 M. D. Moses, director of Orissa region, opened the school with nine students to serve this constituency.

Between 1975 and 1993 the enrollment increased from nine to 273. The school was recognized by the ICSE Council in 1990. The Thirteenth Sabbath Offering overflow enabled the institution to build the school building, girls' dormitory, and dining hall. The Asian Aid Organization under the leadership of Ellen Eager, had a pivotal role in the development of the school and in sponsoring students, as well as providing resources for such projects as the Vocation Training Centre.

The students come from various tribal backgrounds and are enthusiastic at the prospect of being trained as workers for God's service. A number of graduates of this school are serving the constituency as well as other institutions.

Directors: M. D. Moses, 1975—1976; Dev Prasad, 1976—1978.

Principals: James Rathanam, 1978—1979; K. Jesurathanam, 1979—1980; J.S.C. Barla, 1980—1986; Stevenson Kelly, 1986—1988; K. Johnendra Prasad, 1988—1993; Davy Sudhakar, 1993— .

Seventh-day Adventist High School (Roorkee)

SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST HIGH SCHOOL (Roorkee). A coeducational boarding school on the senior high school level, operated by the Northern India Union of the Southern Asia Division near the town of Roorkee, in northern Uttar Pradesh, India, 22 miles (35 kilometers) east-southeast of Saharanpur.

The present Roorkee school, established in 1927, is a successor to the North India Christian Training School, operated first at Hapur under Floyd W. Smith's direction from about 1920 to 1925, then transferred to Lucknow, and moved to Roorkee about 1927. It offered theological and normal training in English, Urdu, and Hindi.

In 1929 students from the United Provinces School for Boys, at Hapur, were brought to Roorkee, the staff was enlarged, and J. M. Steeves was appointed principal. The combined school, which included standards 1 to 10, was listed in the Yearbook as the Northwest India Union Training School.

In 1935 the school became coeducational with the admission of 14 girls from the Punjab Mission Girls' School, Chichoki Mallian, Punjab (see Pakistan Adventist Seminary). In the late 1930s the name of the school was changed to Roorkee Secondary Boarding School. In 1949, two years after the partition of India, students whose homes were on the Pakistan side of the border were transferred to the Pakistan Union High School at Chuharkana, but in 1950 Chuharkana students in standards 3 to 6 whose homes were in East Punjab began attending the Roorkee school.

Since 1964 many changes have been made in the plant. The following new buildings have been constructed: administration building with offices, laboratory, auditorium, library, and classrooms; cafeteria with kitchen unit; two industrial buildings; and two teachers' duplexes. The old administration building was renovated to house the younger boys. A part of this improvement was made possible by a Thirteenth Sabbath Offering overflow. The school has recently been recognized by the Council for Indian School Certificate in India. Since 1988 further improvements of the plant, with the construction of many additional buildings, have made this institution one of the best in the Southern Asia Division.

SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST HIGH SCHOOL (Tiruchirapalli). A secondary school located in Tiruchirapalli, India. It started as a church school in 1962 under the direction of Ketziah Samraj. The classes were first conducted in the church vestry, with eight children attending. In 1968 because of increased attendance, the school was moved to a rented building on Alexandria Road. In 1972 a campus with a bungalow on it was donated for school use by W. G. Thomas. By 1980 the school had become a high school, with an enrollment of 1,400. In 1984 more land was purchased nearby and a three-story modern building was erected for high school use.

Principals: Mrs. Y. R. Samraj, 1962—1965; Rathnabai Pakianathan, 1965—1968; E. S. James, 1968—1969; V. Christian, 1969—1970; Mrs. Y. R. Seventh-day Adventist Higher Secondary School (Kottarakara)

SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST HIGHER SECONDARY SCHOOL (Kottarakara). A coeducational English language boarding school on the senior high school level, operated by the South India Union, at Karickam Hill, two miles (3.2 kilometers) east of Kottarakara Junction in Kerala, southern India. The school, which is government accredited, had a faculty of 40 in 1993.

The school was established in 1925 by H. G. Woodward as the Malayalam Intermediate School. At first, all classes were conducted in the open air, but substantial buildings have since been erected. In the 1930s it was listed in the Yearbook as Malayalam Secondary School and Malayalam High School, then in the 1940s and early 1950s, as Kottarakara Secondary Boarding School.

In 1972 a two-year Malayalam ministerial seminary course was started, with 18 students. In 1993 there was an enrollment of 36.

The school's property of approximately 120 acres (50 hectares) is under cultivation, raising coconuts, cashew nuts, rice, tapioca, and various fruits and vegetables. Some 45 acres (18 hectares) have recently been planted to rubber trees.

Principals: R. L. Wilson, 1926—1931; E. L. Gardner, 1931—1936; E. R. Osmunson, 1936—1937; L. J. Larson, 1938—1944; A. F. Jessen, 1944—1947; W. F. Storz, 1947—1948; A. F. Jessen, 1948—1952; O. S. Seventh-day Adventist Higher Secondary School (Lasalgaon)

SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST HIGHER SECONDARY SCHOOL (Lasalgaon). A coeducational boarding school on the senior high school level operated by the Central India Union of the Southern Asia Division, serving students from two western Indian states, Maharashtra and Gujarat. The medium of instruction is English. It is situated on 31 acres (13 hectares) of land at Lasalgaon, a village 150 miles (240 kilometers) from Bombay. The elevation is about 2,000 feet (650 meters) above sea level, and the climate is healthful and moderate. For industrial training the school operates a printing press and a farm.

The school was founded in 1920 by R. E. Loasby at Kalyan, 30 miles (50 kilometers) northeast of Bombay, but was relocated at Lasalgaon in 1921. It began as a full high school under the names of Marathi Boys' Boarding School and Marathi Training School. During the 1930s it was known as Bombay Union Training School and as Western Indian Mission Training School. It later underwent several changes, both in curriculum and in name. After 1956 it was known as Lasalgaon High School.

In 1944 the high school section was transferred to the newly established Spicer College campus at Poona, leaving the Lasalgaon school as an elementary boarding school. In 1951 the Western India Union Committee voted to build it up to full high school level again. In 1959 a course for training teacher-evangelists was added in the Marathi language.

Student enrollment in 1974 was 321, with a teaching staff of 24. Since 1960 six new living quarters for teachers have been constructed. A new dining hall and a remodeled girls' hostel were built in 1972 with funds from a Thirteenth Sabbath Offering overflow. The boys' hostel was enlarged and modernized in 1973, making the school the only one in the division with such a unit.

The school gained government recognition for its academic program in 1975. Since 1981 the school has been affiliated to the Council for Indian School Certificate examinations. During the 1993—1994 school year the enrollment was 300, with a teaching staff of 25.

Principals: R. E. Loasby, 1919—1927; Melvin Oss, 1927—1930; C. C. Cantwell, 1930—1933; F. E. Spiess, 1933—1937; C. C. Cantwell, 1937—1942; R. S. Lowry, 1942—1944; S. B. Seventh-day Adventist Hospital (Bangalore)

SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST HOSPITAL (Bangalore). A 27-bed hospital established in 1978 at Bangalore, Karnataka, India.

In 1993 the hospital had a staff of seven physicians and nine nurses.

Medical Directors: W. D. Borge, 1982— .

Seventh-day Day Adventist Hospital (Ile-Ife)

SEVENTH-DAY DAY ADVENTIST HOSPITAL (Ile-Ife). A medical institution operated by the West African Union Mission in the Osun state of Nigeria. The hospital has a capacity of 158 beds and a laboratory and X-ray facilities. It operated a school of midwifery until 1969 and conducted a school of nursing accredited by the Nursing Council of Nigeria in 1949.

The institution was built on a 40-acre (16-hectare) jungle site leased to the mission for a shilling a year by the Oni of Ife (religious leader of 10 million Yorubas), who, in 1960, became the first national governor to be instated in Nigeria. Nine buildings, all of mud-brick construction, were erected: two wards having a total of 42 beds, an administration building, a laundry unit, one doctor's house, and a duplex for two European nurses. W. G. Till, director of the Northwestern Nigerian Mission, supervised the building. The foundation stone was laid in 1940. (See Madgwick, George A. S.)

When the hospital was almost completed, the British Army commandeered it and used it during much of World War II. Near the end of the war the hospital was returned to the mission and was formally opened in the fall of 1944. Dr. G. W. Allen was medical director and Phyllis Crocker was nursing sister.

By 1948 about 60 acres (24 hectares) had been added to the original property to allow for expansion. In 1993 the plant comprised 34 buildings, the more recently erected ones being of a permanent type of construction. There are plans to replace the old units with new buildings also of a permanent type of construction. These will contain modern facilities to keep abreast of the rising standard of living and medical practice in the country.

The Nursing School was begun by Phyllis Crocker and Letitia Ashley. It has graduated many nurses and a few midwives. The denominational medical institutions were unable to employ all the graduates of the schools. Several moved into communities where no SDA work had been established and have helped to develop churches and companies.

The hospital staff supervises a number of outstations where nurses trained at Ile-Ife conduct nursing evangelism. At the request of the leaders of the Inisha community, 52 miles (83 kilometers) from Ife, Dr. S. A. Nagel and personnel from the hospital held a monthly clinic in a school building made available by a local Christian church. A clinic was opened in 1950 at a cost totaling $15,000; fees cover its operating costs. With a daily capacity of 100 patients, the clinic in 1973 received 36,000 patient visits, including more than 2,000 prenatal visits and 300 deliveries. In 1973 it was operated by J. Fakaye and his wife, assisted by 11 other national workers.

Other clinics conducted by personnel from the hospital include those at Ondo and Adventist Seminary of West Africa.

The original thatch-roofed chapel with mud pews at Ile-Ife Hospital has been replaced by a stone church with a seating capacity of 600 (dedicated in 1955). Services in the church are transmitted to loudspeakers in the hospital wards for the benefit of patients. Because in recent years the stone church has not been able to accommodate all the youth, children, and adults, Sabbath school services for youth have been held each Sabbath in two small youth pavilions.

The hospital operates a junior high school, offering the equivalent of grades 1—9 to approximately 900 students.

The school was begun in 1958 and since 1959 has been housed in a modern building of permanent construction. The building belongs to the church; the school operates independently of government subsidy or aid. During 1968 a modern two-story hospital block known as Ward Six was constructed. The ground floor comprises a male surgical ward of 29 beds with facilities for intensive-care nursing and a theater suite with major and minor rooms.

The first floor has a complete private patient facility, with consultation and examination rooms, four semiprivate, two private rooms, and a kitchen. It also houses the hospital's first dental unit, fully equipped and capable of handling three patients at any one time.

The dental unit was set up by Dr. F. C. Port, opening its doors to the public in January 1970 and was self-supporting within the first year of operation, although it was temporarily closed in August 1973, awaiting the arrival of another unit.

In 1975 the Western state government took over all missionary hospitals in the state. Since the state owned the Ife University, they allowed the university to use the hospital as a teaching unit for medical work. Before the end of that year the federal government took over all universities; therefore, the Ile-Ife Hospital, as a university teaching hospital, came directly under the Ministry of Health from 1975 to 1987.

The hospital was returned to the church on Sept. 30, 1987, in a rundown condition. Dr. S. Daniyan arrived from Loma Linda in time to head the medical work. He joined M. A. Popoola, a retired head of service for Ondo state, who accepted a call to be administrator of the hospital. They prepared the hospital for reopening on Jan. 3, 1988. In 1992 the hospital had 19,786 visits to the Outpatient Department and 498 major and minor surgeries. During the same year 2,066 were admitted as inpatients. The hospital is self-supporting in its operation, but there has been great support in donations from within and outside the church for needed equipment and expansion. A dental unit and another ward will soon be functional.

Even though the university hospital staff moved out in 1987, the nursing students did not move out until 1992. The hospital administration is now planning to reactivate the Nursing School; the Nigerian Nursing Council has given assent to this plan.

Seventh-day Adventist Language Institutes, Korea

SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST LANGUAGE INSTITUTES, KOREA. A network of 15 language institutes throughout South Korea, offering conversational English, Japanese, Russian, and Bible, operated by the Korean Union Conference.

Dean Hubbard established the first institute in September 1969 in Seoul, and a second in Pusan in 1971. Maurice Bascom, who originated Adventist English Language Institutes in the Far East, opened the third in Kwangju in 1973. David Scofield added three more: Young Dong, Taegu, and Taejeon. Since Han Sang Woo became director in 1986, nine institutes have been added: Nam Young, Suhmyun, Incheon, Chun Cheon, Chungu, Cheju, Shil Lin Cheon Ju, and Taegunambu.

A Korean director manages the general operation of the institutes, while Western missionaries oversee the curriculum and other volunteer concerns. In 1993, 113 volunteers from five continents were teaching a total of nearly 10,000 students comprised primarily of university students and some businesspersons. Student missionaries were the first volunteers; today 65 percent are graduates.

Evangelism is conducted largely through Bible classes and Bible studies. Other methods include conducting vespers, Sabbath school and church services, chapel meetings, evangelistic series, and children's Bible schools on Sabbath afternoons. Two language institute students were baptized in 1970, and the number has increased steadily throughout the years. In 1992 a record 260 students were baptized, for a total of 2,730.

Many of the converts study theology and enter the ministry, becoming pastors of local churches or chaplains at Seventh-day Adventist Language Institutes or at Korean Sahmyook University. Others serve as student missionaries to China, Russia, and the Philippines. Seventh-day Adventist Language Institutes, Korea, also operates an elementary school on the grounds of Seoul Adventist Hospital for the children of Western missionaries.

Seventh-day Adventist Reform Movement (German, 1915)

SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST REFORM MOVEMENT (German, 1915). An offshoot movement beginning in Germany in 1915, which has had a following also in the Baltic states, Russia, Australia, and in the United States, mostly among persons of German stock. Although the original issue was over visions and time setting, the bone of contention through the years has been the stand taken by the Seventh-day Adventist Church concerning the duty of its members in military service.

The military question came to the front when the conflict between Austria-Hungary and Serbia exploded into World War I in early August 1914. At that time Seventh-day Adventist activities in all of Europe were under supervision of the denomination's European Division, with headquarters in Hamburg, Germany, although most of the members of the division executive committee were then residing outside of Germany—in Denmark, England, France, Hungary, Russia, Switzerland, and Turkey. The European Division, as an administrative organization, was largely disrupted by the war and the consequent obstacles to travel and communications.

On the German mobilization in August 1914, the Seventh-day Adventists of that country were faced with the necessity of making an immediate decision concerning their duty to God and country when called into the armed forces (see Noncombatancy). After counseling with the few SDA leaders locally available at the time, the president of the East German Union Conference informed the German War Ministry in writing, dated Aug. 4, 1914, that conscripted SDAs would bear arms as combatants and would render service on the Sabbath in defense of their country. Most of the members, when drafted, acted accordingly, although many of them requested and were given assignments in noncombatant service in the medical corps or Red Cross units. Many declared themselves conscientious objectors, and in some cases suffered severe treatment for having done so.

One man, Joh. Wieck, drafted into the German Army, proved to be an extremist, claiming to have been shown in vision that probation for all would end that spring. Several other persons also made time-setting predictions. These alleged prophets denounced the SDA leaders for not giving credence to their predictions and for refusing to publish them.

As a result of unfavorable statements against the German government made by some of the fanatics, Seventh-day Adventist churches in the state of Saxony were closed by the public authority. Only when three SDA leaders at Hamburg, in a letter to the government in Berlin on Mar. 4, 1915, reasserted their stand on combatancy was the ban against Seventh-day Adventist churches in Saxony lifted.

Subsequently an SDA church elder in Bremen, who had aligned himself with the cause of the extremists, made this reassertion an occasion for accusing these denominational leaders of apostasy and for encouraging extremism and dissension among the believers.

Admittedly, the three SDA leaders in Germany took a stand concerning the duty of SDAs in military service that was contrary to the historic stand officially maintained by the denomination ever since the American Civil War (1861—1865). They took this stand on their own responsibility in a time of emergency, sincerely thinking that they were doing what was best under the circumstances, but it has never been approved or endorsed by any other committee or council of the Seventh-day Adventist Church.

In 1919 representatives of several factions of the dissidents met together in Switzerland in order to achieve a semblance of unity and to prepare to present their demands at the Seventh-day Adventist council to be held in Germany in 1920.

When the "Reformist" delegation presented their case before the General Conference delegation at Friedensau Missionary Seminary, Germany, in July 1920, the first question asked was: "What stand does the General Conference take concerning the decision of the leaders here in Germany in regard to Sabbathkeeping in war, also in regard to the bearing of arms?" A. G. Daniells, president of the General Conference, replied that it did not approve of that declaration because "in it we find expressions that we greatly regret to see." Moreover, during the subsequent workers' meeting the three SDA leaders who had made the declaration publicly acknowledged that they had made an error and expressed their sincere regret for having done so.

They also voted with the others when, on Jan. 2, 1923, the committee of the reorganized European Division, in council at Gland, Switzerland, officially issued a "Declaration of Principles" in which the committee unanimously declared that they were fully in harmony with the worldwide denominational stand concerning the duty of Seventh-day Adventists serving in the armed forces. Besides, a special statement was made the same day by the representatives of the German Union conferences, affirming their assent.

Most of the individual "Reformists" returned to the Seventh-day Adventist Church, although some did not, objecting to the fact that the Seventh-day Adventist Church had never made its stand concerning military service a test of fellowship, but had granted to each church member the liberty to serve his or her country at all times and in all places in accord with the dictates of his or her personal conscientious convictions.

The Seventh-day Adventist Reform Movement never had a large following, and by 1937 it was divided into some 25 splinter groups in Europe alone. In the United States there are a few little groups. One of them, a remnant of the Reform movement, has its office in Denver, Colorado, and an offshoot that started from it in 1948 has its center in Sacramento, California. Their following is small.

Seventh-day Adventist Retirement Village

SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST RETIREMENT VILLAGE. A retirement village incorporating Sherwin Lodge Hostel, Freeman Nursing Home, and residential units. Sherwin Lodge Hostel is a home for the aged, situated at Rossmoyne, Perth, Australia, owned and operated by the Western Australian Conference. Its predecessor was the Elmshaven Home for the Aged, opened in rented premises at 21 Tower Street, Perth, in June 1952, with Mrs. Louisa Bailey as matron in charge. In 1960 a site of 9.5 acres (four hectares) at Rossmoyne, on the Canning River, eight miles (13 kilometers) from Perth, was acquired by grant from the Crown. A residential lodge for 15 occupants and three staff members was begun in October 1962 and financed by the Seventh-day Adventist constituency, with liberal assistance from the Commonwealth and state governments. It was opened on July 7, 1963, and named after Thomas A. Sherwin, a Seventh-day Adventist physician who gave many years to denominational service at Sydney and Warburton sanitariums. The lodge-type accommodation has now been increased to a total of 47 beds.

Freeman Nursing Home, named after Dr. M. M. Freeman (wife of T. A. Sherwin), with current capacity of 33 beds, was dedicated on Oct. 18, 1970.

The village has 61 self-contained cottage units and six bed-sitting units that were built in 1973.

Seventh-day Adventist School (Singapore)

SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST SCHOOL (Singapore). A coeducational mission full school operated by the Seventh-day Adventist Mission of Singapore. It was established in 1907 as the Eastern Training School and shared the same history as Southeast Asia Union College until 1961 when it took on its present name because of government regulations. Physical facilities and finance were still shared.

However, in March 1972 the Southeast Asia Union Mission executive committee gave its approval for Southeast Asia Union College to function separately from the primary and secondary sections, an arrangement that has remained until this day.

The six-year primary school prepares students to take the government Primary School Leaving Examination (PSLE), while the secondary school conducts arts and science courses leading to the GCE “O” level examination from Cambridge, London. In addition to the basic syllabus set by the Singapore Ministry of Education, the school has also implemented Bible knowledge classes at every level and for every student. Chapels are held twice a week.

In 1992 the school built a four-story block of new classrooms, offices, laboratories, and a canteen to meet its physical needs.

Principals: James Wong, 1972—1974; Wu Chook Ying, 1975—1977; Yeo Lee Chiang, 1978—1985; Samuel Teo, 1985—1986; Michael Lim, 1987— .

Seventh-day Adventist Training College (Ihie)

SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST TRAINING COLLEGE (Ihie). Two separate schools formerly situated on the same campus at Ihie, east Nigeria.

The forerunner institution was the Ibadan Teacher Training School, a school for boys that was an outgrowth of the boarding section of the elementary school at Oke Bola. Its first principal was W.T.B. Hyde, from England, who was assisted by J. Hamilton, of Sierra Leone. The first class consisted of six Yoruba and six Ibo students. In 1932 the three-year elementary teacher certificate course was first offered. At this time classes met in a rented house across the road from the mission compound in the city of Ibadan. Within a short time a building was erected, providing both classrooms and dormitory space. Of the first class to finish the three-year course, 10 passed the government examination. The first national worker to become an instructor and assistant to Hyde was John Oyedokun Oyelese. Later another national worker, Ezekiel Esiaba, joined the instructional staff of the school.

When the Ibadan compound, within the city, became overcrowded, a new site was selected for the school, 500 miles (800 kilometers) away at Ihie, in eastern Nigeria. About 123 acres (50 hectares) of land overlooking the Imo River was leased to the mission for one shilling a year by Dan, Isaac, Alexander, and Matthew, four of the local chiefs. Construction on the new site began in the latter part of 1946 under the new principal, Adam Rudy.

With the move to eastern Nigeria in 1947, the school was named Nigerian Training College, with L. R. Downing serving as principal. The 27 students in the first class at the new site began their course of study in January 1948. A portion of one of the 1948 Thirteenth Sabbath Offering overflows helped finance the construction of two classroom blocks and two dormitories. In 1948 Dr. E. Forsythe, of Orlando, Florida, donated funds for building the Forsythe Memorial chapel, planned and constructed under Downing's direction. The chapel was dedicated on Aug. 1, 1953.

In 1950 a ministerial training program was begun. Shortly afterward the higher elementary teacher training course, which went two years beyond the elementary teacher training course, was introduced. Between 1952 and 1954 the following buildings were constructed: a dining hall, two additional dormitories, a senior staff house, six junior staff cottages, a vocational building, and the administrative block.

In February 1953 the secondary school was opened, with an initial enrollment of 27, under the headmastership of W. G. Fitcher, assisted by Young Dickay. In that year coeducation was introduced under the direction of Amanda S. Nukka, when eight girls were admitted to the elementary teacher training course. This was the first attempt in the entire country to teach boys and girls together on the teacher-training level. Though she lived in the dormitory with the girls taking teachers' training, one girl was allowed to take regular secondary subjects that year; then in 1954 five girls enrolled in the secondary school. This was a great step forward, for it was difficult to persuade parents to send their girls for advanced schooling.

In July 1956 M. A. Moses, the first national worker to return with a degree, assumed the position of assistant principal. In July 1957 E. B. Christie became headmaster of the secondary school. In January 1957 the first girls were enrolled in the higher elementary teacher training course, and in December of the same year the first school certificate examination was taken by the finishing class of the secondary school.

A new plan of organization was drawn up in January 1958, with H. E. Rieseberg as the first principal-manager, M. A. Moses the head of the Teacher Training Department, and E. B. Christie continuing as headmaster of the secondary school. In January 1959, when Christie assumed the principal-manager's position, Dr. W. F. Riley became the headmaster of the secondary school, while M. A. Moses continued as principal of the teacher-training college.

Between 1956 and 1962 other new buildings were added: three laboratories, a new dormitory, houses for six senior staff members, and a domestic science block. The secondary school grew until by 1966 each class had two sections.

Further physical expansion took place between 1963 and 1967: a new classroom block; a new dormitory block for male students, with a student administrative unit; and a home economics staff house were added to the training college property, while the high school added a new classroom block, an extension to the dining hall, a new dormitory for men and another for women, and five intermediate staff houses.

The Nigerian civil war years (July 1967 to January 1970) and the period immediately after the cessation of hostilities (1970—1972) were difficult years at Ihie. The adoption of the name Seventh-day Adventist Training College became necessary in 1967. The destruction and looting associated with the war robbed the institutions of both water and light. Most of the buildings were left in a poor state of repair, and there were little or no tools and equipment for rehabilitation and reconstruction. Nevertheless, both the training college and the high school experienced phenomenal growth.

The school was nationalized in 1972 and has been administered by the government since that time.

Principals: L. R. Downing, 1947—1954; B. A. Roberts (acting), 1955—1956; H. E. Rieseberg, 1956—1958; E. B. Christie, 1959—1961; K. F. Mueller, 1962—1963; M. A. Moses, 1963—1965; S. E. Gooden (acting), 1966; M. A. Moses, 1967—1972.

Seventh-day Adventist Yearbook

SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST YEARBOOK (1883—1894, 1904— ; printed annually by RH for the General Conference; file in Seventh-day Adventist libraries and archives). The church's world directory of organizations, institutions, and workers, containing these sections: fundamental beliefs of Seventh-day Adventists; General Conference Constitution and Bylaws; organizational listings of the General Conference and its departments and miscellaneous services, of all church units throughout the world, and of institutions; necrology; directories of institutional workers and general workers; and listings of GC presidents, secretaries, and treasurers.

The first Yearbook resulted from an action of the General Conference Committee at its twenty-first session in December 1882. A later announcement of its issuance stated that it "contains the statistics of our denomination, the proceedings of our General Conference, T. and M. [Tract and Missionary] Society, and other associations, the financial condition of our institutions, our General and State Conference constitutions, a good calendar, and full directories of all our Conferences and various societies throughout the country." This 72-page paperback book also contained postal information and a catalog of the publications of the Seventh-day Adventist Publishing Association.

Succeeding issues brought some changes in content. At first the proceedings of the GC Committee appeared as minutes; later the actions were summarized by category. The 1884 Yearbook was the first to contain a ministers' directory. From 1884 to 1886 the Yearbook contained major articles on the history of the church; later editions emphasized the activities of the organizational units for the preceding year. The 1887 edition was the first to use engravings of institutions.

From 1895 to 1903 the General Conference Bulletin replaced the Yearbook, carrying such features as statistical reports, directories of workers and organizations, lists of periodicals, and financial statements, as well as other materials. At its resumption with the 1904 edition, the Yearbook no longer contained GC Committee proceedings, appearing essentially as it has in succeeding years. Statistical reports terminated with the 1964 edition.

Responsibility for gathering the data and editing the Yearbook was first given to the Publishing Committee of the Seventh-day Adventist Publishing Association. Later three-member committees undertook the annual task. From 1904 to 1975 the Yearbook was a production of the GC statistical secretary, with infrequent exceptions. From 1975 it has been the responsibility of the director of the Archives and Statistics Department.

Seventh-Month Movement

SEVENTH-MONTH MOVEMENT. The climactic phase of the Millerite movement, occurring during the summer and autumn of 1844, in which the proclamation of the “definite time” (Oct. 22) for the expected Second Advent, the tenth day of the seventh (Jewish) month, lent a heightened enthusiasm.

William Miller had not set a specific day for the Advent, but expected it at some time during the “Jewish year 1843,” that is, the year 1843/1844 from spring to spring (see Millerite Movement). This new definite date, which Miller did not preach and did not accept until shortly before it came, was calculated by several of his colleagues.

The year 1844, instead of 1843, was arrived at by Apollos Hale, Sylvester Bliss, and others through the correction of a one-year error in computation from B.C. to A.D. dates. The month and day, worked out chiefly by Samuel Snow, were selected because (1) the expectation of the Advent was based chiefly on the calculation of the 2300 days (counted as years), according to the prophecy, “Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed” (Dan. 8:14); (2) the annual ritual cleansing of the ancient Hebrew sanctuary took place on the tenth day of the seventh month, called the Day of Atonement (see Lev. 16:16—19, 29—34); and (3) this Jewish calendar date was computed—not according to the current Jewish calendar, but according to an older form attributed to the Karaite Jews—as the equivalent of Oct. 22 in 1844.

This interpretation was developed principally by Snow out of Miller’s suggestion (letter of May 3, 1843) that just as the ancient Hebrew spring festivals (Passover, Pentecost) were types of the death and resurrection of Christ, so the autumn festivals (Day of Atonement, Feast of Tabernacles) typified the Second Advent.

Miller had mentioned several events occurring on the tenth day of the seventh Jewish month (the Day of Atonement), such as the cleansing of the sanctuary, its furnishings, and its worshipers; the sounding of the jubilee trumpet signaling the release of all Israelites in bondage, a type of the final redemption; and the atonement made on that day, followed by the coming of the high priest out of the Holy of Holies, typical of Christ’s priestly ministry ending at His second coming. Thus many looked to the autumn of 1843 “with much interest.” Then, as Himes relates: “Snow fully embraced the opinion that, according to the types, the advent of the Lord, when it does occur, must occur on the tenth day of the 7th month; but he was not positive as to the year. He afterwards saw that the prophetic periods do not actually expire until the present 1844; he then planted himself on the ground that about the 22nd of October—the tenth day of the seventh month of this present year—must witness the advent” (Advent Herald 8:93, Oct. 30, 1844).

The autumn expectation was based on the idea that the 70 weeks of years (beginning synchronously with the 2300 years) began and ended in the seventh month; and on the application to Christ of the types of the ancient Mosaic festivals. The date was based on the following reasoning: Since Christ, our Passover, was crucified on the fourteenth of the first Jewish month, the day prescribed for the slaying of the Passover lamb, and because He rose again on the day of the wave sheaf (the sixteenth of the same month), it was logical to expect that Christ our great High Priest would fulfill the antitype of the Day of Atonement by coming from the Holy of Holies, or heaven, on the tenth day of the seventh month to bless His waiting people and to announce the beginning of the year of jubilee—the millennium.

It was in February 1844 that both Hale and Snow published their revised reckoning, ending the 2300 years in 1844, and soon afterward Snow fixed on the tenth day of the seventh month, 1844. But acceptance was slow. Not until after midsummer, when Snow began to preach on the subject, notably at the camp meeting at Exeter, New Hampshire, in August, did the movement catch fire.

In addition to the Day of Atonement type, Snow used the parable of the ten virgins in a new way as evidence for his dating. The Millerites had expected the Second Advent at least by the spring of 1844. Between that first expectation (in the spring of 1844) and the second (in the autumn) there were six months—half a year, or half a prophetic day. This, said Snow, was the “night” of waiting, when the Bridegroom delayed His coming; and at midsummer, the midway point of this interval, corresponding to midnight, came the seventh-month message, representing the cry, “Behold, the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him.” The Millerites had called their message the midnight cry, but this new message was called by its adherents the true midnight cry, to which the other had been preliminary.

As the date approached, enthusiasm mounted, though not all the Millerites joined the seventh-month movement. One by one the Millerite leaders, who had been the last to take part in it, accepted the seventh-month message. William Miller and J. V. Himes, his lieutenant, came to the conclusion early in October that the movement must be the Lord’s doing, and they too looked for the Advent on that October day. (For a description of this period, see Millerite Movement.)

Just as the great surge of enthusiasm over the October date separated the Millerites most completely from the world at large, so after the Great Disappointment, when that day passed, it was the question of the significance of this seventh-month movement, the “true midnight cry,” that drew the sharpest line of cleavage between the Millerites themselves. Had it been a colossal blunder, or had it been truly a fulfillment of prophecy—though not the fulfillment they had expected—and had God indeed been leading them in it, testing their devotion and their readiness to meet Christ?

In the aftermath (see Millerite Movement) the majority, including most of the leaders, came within a few months to the conclusion that it was “not a fulfillment of prophecy in any sense,” that their prophetic chronology had been wrong, and that the fulfillments were yet in the future. Those who held that the movement had been led of God concluded that the timing was right and sought other explanations of their disappointment.

From the latter came the little groups that later became the Seventh-day Adventists. These refused to “deny their past experience,” as most of the others seemed to them to have done. They sought another meaning in it and arrived at the conclusion that the cleansing of the sanctuary was not the return of Christ, but involved another phase of His priestly ministry before His return to this earth (see Sanctuary).

Sevrens, Oliver Fisk

SEVRENS, OLIVER FISK (1887—1927). Teacher, administrator, and cofounder of the school that is now Philippine Union College. He was a nephew of Mrs. George A. King and of Mrs. John I. Tay. A graduate in science from the University of Maine (1910), he taught for a year at a private school in Connecticut before teaching at Bishop Brent's School for Boys at Baguio in the Philippine Islands. After one year there he worked for the Bureau of Science at Manila. While there he received from his Seventh-day Adventist relatives copies of the General Conference Bulletin. Reading these papers, he became interested in SDA beliefs and studied them further with E. M. Adams. Returning to the United States soon thereafter, he spent some time on the campus of Pacific Union College and joined the church in 1914. In 1916, three days after he was married to Hazel Blackenberg, the couple sailed to the Philippines in company with I. A. Steinel and his wife, in order to establish an SDA training school there. From 1922 to his death he was principal, treasurer, and business manager of the Philippine Seventh-day Adventist Academy (later Philippine Union College). In addition to his school responsibilities he also served at one time or another as young people's and educational secretary of the Philippine Union Mission. He died at his post of service.

Seychelles

SEYCHELLES. A group of 156 tropical islands and islets listed in the 1993 Seychelles Constitution lying immediately south of the equator, about 600 miles (1,000 kilometers) north of Madagascar in the Indian Ocean. Seychelles became an independent republic in 1976. The total area is 176 square miles (450 square kilometers). The population (1994) is 72,000.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. The territory of the Seychelles constitutes the Seychelles Mission, within the Indian Ocean Union Mission, which in turn is a part of the Africa-Indian Ocean Division. Statistics (1992) for Seychelles: churches, 4; organized groups, 1; members, 276; ordained ministers, 1. Headquarters: Saint Louis, Mahé, Seychelles.

Seventh-day Adventist work in the Seychelles began in 1930 when Daniel Ignace, an evangelist from Mauritius, was sent there. In spite of difficulties, an interest developed rapidly, and in 1931 the first baptism of 21 persons took place near Victoria, capital of Mahé. A church of 23 members was organized, with D. Ignace as elder.

In 1933 a church building was dedicated. Despite strong opposition, at times endangering the life of the missionary, the work went forward. Karl Sturzenegger, who arrived from Switzerland in 1936, established a school that enjoyed government favor. R. Jayram, from Mauritius, served as the teacher.

The Seychelles Mission, organized in 1947 as part of the Indian Ocean Union Mission in the Southern European Division, was a part of the Afro-Mideast Division from 1965 to 1973. Resumed air communications made it possible to return the field to its former union in the Euro-Africa Division. The Seychelles Mission became part of the Africa-Indian Ocean Division in 1980.

In 1953 the school was transferred to the newly acquired mission property at Bel Eau. The mission headquarters were also moved to this new location from Bel Air. The school developed well under the capable direction of Miss Hermence Calais. Part of a section for a secondary school was added.

The mission station was taken over by the government in 1979, which ended Seventh-day Adventist educational work in the Seychelles. Property at St. Louis was given as compensation. A church was built on this site in 1981, and the mission headquarters settled in existing buildings.

A chapel was built for the group of believers on Praslin Island in 1970. The Anse Royale church building was dedicated in 1991.

Shady Grove Adventist Hospital

SHADY GROVE ADVENTIST HOSPITAL. A 253-bed not-for-profit hospital located in Rockville, Maryland, a suburb of Washington, D.C. Shady Grove, which operates under the auspices of the Columbia Union Conference, opened in 1979. Hospital services include: kidney transplant surgery; the busiest emergency department in Montgomery County; a same-day surgery and laser center; family-centered maternity care; coronary-, intensive-, and intermediate-care units; a catheterization lab; hyperbaric oxygen treatment; wound management service; a sleep disorders center; and a hospital-affiliated nursing and rehabilitation center. More than 2,000 employees and volunteers, including an all-RN nursing staff, serve at the hospital along with approximately 1,000 physicians representing more than 60 medical specialties.

The hospital has grown rapidly since it opened, and much of this success can be attributed to the vision and commitment of Bryan Breckenridge, Shady Grove's president. Born and raised on the West Coast, Breckenridge came to the Washington, D.C., area in 1970 to serve as assistant director of the Health Care Administration Branch of the U.S. Army. Two years later he became a vice president at Washington Adventist Hospital.

In 1974 Montgomery County civic and community leaders invited the Seventh-day Adventists to build a hospital to serve upper Montgomery County. Washington Adventist Hospital was selected for the assignment of building the hospital because of its more than 70 years of experience in providing quality health care in the county. Breckenridge, then just 27 years old, was put in charge of the project.

In March 1975 the state of Maryland approved a certificate of need, and construction for a four-story 224-bed acute-care hospital began in September 1977. The hospital opened in December 1979 with 41 beds. By 1993 Shady Grove had grown to serve more than 110,000 patients each year, including 50,000 Emergency Department visits and nearly 5,000 babies born annually. Another 10,000 community people register for the hospital's extensive offering of health education classes.

Philanthropy has been an important part of the hospital's success. Community friends and local businesses have contributed nearly $5 million to the hospital. This includes contributions totaling $716,000 in 1992, a record year for voluntary support at Shady Grove.

The treatment philosophy at Shady Grove Adventist Hospital incorporates what is called "the ministry of kindness." This begins with hospital employees who share the responsibility of creating and communicating an atmosphere of love and kindness. Patients and their families are treated as guests of the hospital family, and employees strive to understand patients' physical, emotional, and spiritual needs, and impart supportive love.

The Pastoral Care Department, with a staff of nearly 50 employees and volunteers, serves the spiritual needs of patients and their families, as well as hospital employees.

Shady Grove became the first hospital in Montgomery County, and one of the first in the Washington, D.C., area, to implement a formal Continuous Quality Improvement (CQI) program. This program began with the hiring of a CQI director in 1989. The CQI process involves using tools such as benchmarking and goal setting to continually improve services and to meet and exceed the needs and expectations of patients and other hospital customers.

Shady Grove is part of Adventist Healthcare Mid-Atlantic Corporation, a system that also includes Washington Adventist Hospital; Hackettstown (New Jersey) Community Hospital; Adventist Healthcare, Inc., which consists of three nursing homes in Montgomery County, Maryland; Adventist Home Health Services; Home Assistance, a private-duty nursing agency; and several smaller health-care related businesses. Bryan Breckenridge also serves as president of Adventist Healthcare Mid-Atlantic.

“Shaking Time”

“SHAKING TIME.” In Seventh-day Adventist parlance, a period preceding the second coming of Christ when many members leave the church because of indifference, satanic deceptions, and the pressure of circumstances. The expression is apparently derived from Heb. 12:26, 27, especially the phrase “that those things which cannot be shaken may remain” (cf. “the shaking of an olive tree” [Isa. 17:6]; “a great shaking in the land of Israel” [Eze. 38:19]; “as a fig tree . . . shaken of a mighty wind” [Rev. 6:13]). This period is also sometimes referred to as a sifting time or testing time (5T 80, 47).

Ellen White speaks of the shaking time as a “time when everything that can be shaken will be shaken,” including those who know the truth but do not obey God (6T 332; cf. 7T 219; 9T 15, 16). This shaking will be “caused by the straight testimony called forth by the counsel of the True Witness to the Laodiceans. This will have its effect upon the heart of the receiver, and will lead him to exalt the standard and pour forth the straight truth. Some will not bear this straight testimony. They will rise up against it, and this is what will cause a shaking among God’s people” (EW 270).

This “shaking” has been taking place since the early days of the SDA Church, but it will become more severe as the end of time approaches. In 1850 Ellen White wrote: “The mighty shaking has commenced and will go on, and all will be shaken out who are not willing to take a bold and unyielding stand for the truth and to sacrifice for God and His cause” (EW 50). Among those “shaken” will be some of the leaders of the church, as well as laypersons: “Many a star that we have admired for its brilliancy will then go out in darkness” (5T 81).

Shalom Nursing Home (Higashikurume)

SHALOM NURSING HOME (Higashikurume). A nursing home for the aged, established in May 1992 in Higashikurume, Japan, from funds from the Japanese government, the Seventh-day Adventist Church, and the two cities of Higashikurume and Tanashi.

The institution has a total of 80 beds for physically and mentally handicapped people. Sixty-five persons were employed in 1992.

Director: Yuriko Takahashi, 1992— .

Shalom Nursing Home (Yokosuka)

SHALOM NURSING HOME (Yokosuka). A nursing home for the aged, established in 1984 at Yokosuka, Japan, from funds donated by a non-Christian businessman who was a patient at Tokyo Adventist Hospital. Funds were also received from the government.

There are two buildings, one for physically handicapped people and the other for mentally handicapped people. Each building has 50 beds.

In 1992 the home employed 81 workers. The institution is managed by funds from the government of Japan and from Yokosuka City.

“Share Your Faith”

“SHARE YOUR FAITH.” A youth evangelism slogan that encompassed every facet of evangelistic endeavor formerly conducted by MV Societies. The slogan originated in connection with the North American Youth Congress conducted in the summer of 1947 in San Francisco, California. In the youth evangelistic program several large-scale methods that proved to be successful in winning souls were developed:

MV Voice of Youth. As the call spread to “share your faith,” many senior MVs decided to conduct evangelistic meetings. It became apparent that such young people were capable of organizing and successfully conducting a series of evangelistic meetings when properly directed. A special council composed of evangelists, pastors, youth directors, and conference presidents, which was called by the General Conference Youth Department and which met in Denver, Colorado, in 1954 was commissioned to draw up a complete plan that dealt with every responsibility and covered every step of the evangelistic meeting from its conception to the decision for baptisms.

The material produced was published in loose-leaf notebook form under the title MV Voice of Youth Guidebook, as authorized by the Youth Department Advisory Committee in 1955. A set of sermons was prepared, also published in loose-leaf notebook style, and arranged so that a given sermon could be presented by a group of four to six young speakers.

Friendship Teams. This was another of the MV soul-winning methods, in which a team of two senior young people visited the discouraged or former members of the church as well as prospective members. The team members, demonstrating kindness and attitudes of Christian love, were to reveal their concern for the spiritual welfare of the persons visited and convey the feeling that the church loved these people.

Friendship Teams were most successful when employed just before an MV Voice of Youth series or an evangelistic meeting conducted by the pastor or evangelist.

Witnessing teams comprised of musical groups, personal Bible workers, and sometimes youth gymnasts became effective in evangelistic outreach after 1970. Sponsored by the General Conference Youth Department in 1972, the Gymnairs for Christ toured the North American Division, witnessing to thousands of persons in the U.S.A. and Canada.

Shaw, John Luis

SHAW, JOHN LUIS (1870—1952). Missionary, educator, treasurer. He graduated from the scientific course at Battle Creek College (1893) and became dean of men and a teacher at Union College. He married Bessie L. Owen in 1893.

In 1897 he became principal of Claremont Union College in South Africa. In 1901 he was ordained and sent to India, where he was in charge of the field from 1901 to 1912. For a time he was also editor of the Oriental Watchman. Having suffered from poor health much of the time, he returned to the United States in 1912 and was appointed principal of the Washington Foreign Mission Seminary. From 1913 to 1915 he was secretary of the General Conference Department of Education and edited Home and School magazine, then for a time served as one of the assistant General Conference secretaries. From 1922 to 1936 he was treasurer of the General Conference. During retirement he served for a time as board chair of the Loma Linda Medical School.

Shawnee Mission Medical Center

SHAWNEE MISSION MEDICAL CENTER. A 383-bed acute-care hospital in Shawnee Mission, Kansas, that came under the direction of the Central (now Mid-America) Union Conference in 1972. The beginning of the institution dates back to 1955, when members of the New Haven Seventh-day Adventist Church in Overland Park, Kansas, physicians from the Johnson County Medical Society, and key community leaders joined forces to meet the health-care needs of Johnson County's growing communities.

The first element of the Shawnee Mission Medical Center opened in 1961, with 102 long-term-care beds. Shawnee Mission Hospital opened to serve the communities of Johnson County in May 1962 with 65 acute-care beds. In 1966 an additional 70 acute-care beds were added, as well as additional space for expanded diagnostic and therapeutic services. By 1972 the bed complement was 241, and in January 1975 these became acute-care beds because of the pressing need for acute care. By 1982 the acute-care bed total reached the current licensed bed level of 383. In 1991 and 1992, new maternity, women's services, cardiac care, and outpatient facilities were added.

The medical center is located in the southwest suburban area of Greater Kansas City, Missouri. It has become a major facility in Johnson County and is its second largest employer. The facility has 800 employees, is served by a medical staff of more than 500, and has in excess of 800 volunteers providing service to the patients.

In 1992 more than 73,500 patient visits were cared for and more than 27,000 emergency patients were treated. Shawnee Mission's emergency service, the Special Additions Maternity Center, and the Center for Surgical Services are leading programs.

The medical center participates in several community education programs for nursing personnel, pharmacists, surgery and family practice residents, inhalation therapists, and physical therapists. Johnson County Community College, Kansas University Medical Center, Mid-America Nazarene College, Penn Valley Community College, as well as the University of Missouri at Kansas City give their students practical clinical experience in the hospital.

Shelton Academy

SHELTON ACADEMY. See Platte Valley Academy.

Shenandoah Valley Academy

SHENANDOAH VALLEY ACADEMY. A coeducational boarding school on the senior high school level, established in 1908, and situated one mile (1.6 kilometers) west of New Market, Virginia, in the heart of the Shenandoah Valley, between the Massanutten Mountains to the east and the Alleghenies to the west. The New Market area is the home of the first organized Seventh-day Adventist church in Virginia.

The academy was first envisioned by Charles D. Zirkle, son of Mrs. John P. Zirkle, the first convert baptized when J. O. Corliss and E. B. Lane came to the Zirkle farm in 1876 to begin evangelistic work in Virginia. Charles D. Zirkle attended Battle Creek College, became one of the first colporteurs in the South, and for 20 years served the denomination as a conference publishing secretary, conference treasurer, church school teacher, and associate evangelist in the Middle Atlantic states and the state of New York. When a chest injury caused by a fall led to tuberculosis, he returned with his wife to New Market and built a home on his father's farm. He taught for a few years, but his health failed rapidly. On Mar. 27, 1905, Charles D. Zirkle lay dying on a couch in his home near New Market. He requested that his share of his father's property be donated to the Virginia Conference for the purpose of building a school for the instruction of Seventh-day Adventist youth. Thus a 42-acre (17-hectare) tract of land, then valued at $3,000, became the permanent home of Shenandoah Valley Academy.

Two years later the building of the academy began with the erection of the original main building. The original building included 12 rooms for students and teachers, two classrooms, a small dining room, a kitchen, and a chapel. By September of 1908 the school was ready to open its doors. Originally called Shenandoah Valley Training Academy, the 10-grade school had an opening enrollment of 15 students. In 1911 the first four students were graduated.

Like every fledgling institution, Shenandoah had its dark years. Since little financial help could be given by the Virginia Conference, funds were obtained by numerous sales and auctions of handiwork by teachers and students. Donations from solicited relatives and donations of furniture, bedding, and canned goods from valley residents helped supplement the $12 a month charge to students for room, board, and tuition. The fund-raising efforts of R. D. Hottel and A. C. Neff were largely instrumental in keeping the school solvent in its first several years.

A damaging fire forced the school to close near the end of 1913. When the conference president urged that the school be moved to Doswell, Virginia, near Richmond, the valley constituency voiced strong opposition. The next year W. C. Moffett became president of the conference. He was advised by conference officials and educational leaders to close the school permanently. When he arrived, the situation was dismal. There were only 15 students in the dormitory and five in the community. Furthermore, the school was heavily in debt and the principal was planning to leave. Moffett, however, soon learned that the school fulfilled a dying request of Charles D. Zirkle, the man who had befriended him some years earlier when he had been driven from home for accepting the Seventh-day Adventist faith.

A compelling inspiration seized him to expand the school rather than disband it. He and R. D. Hottel, New Market church pastor, divided the conference field and went in search of funds furniture, and students. There is little doubt that the dedicated efforts of these men saved the academy from being closed.

In 1916 H. M. Forshee, who had been principal of the school from 1910 to 1911, was asked to return. For five years his stable leadership brought growth to Shenandoah Valley Academy. During his administration a new boys' dormitory and administration building were built. During the building of the boys' dormitory (1918), a flu epidemic paralyzed the school, costing one life, that of the 13-year-old daughter of Professor and Mrs. Forshee.

Other dedicated leaders such as J. P. Neff, educational secretary of the Columbia Union Conference from 1921 to 1946, and F. H. Robbins, president of the Columbia Union, took an interest in the small rural Virginia school. John Z. Hottel, a former graduate of Shenandoah, returned as principal from 1921 to 1926 and began the academic strengthening of the school's program. In the fall of 1927 W. C. Hannah became principal of SVA, a position that he would occupy for 26 years. "The reign of Hannah" (1927—1953) brought marked progress to the campus, despite a fire in a boys' dormitory in 1934. In those years Shenandoah Valley Academy became a secure institution, developing from a small unaccredited school to a fully accredited boarding academy (1931). Shenandoah remained a rather small school, however, until the last year of Principal George H. Akers' tenure. In the 1958—1959 school year the enrollment increased substantially from 177 students to 283 students.

In the years since the academy was first established, numerous building projects have changed the appearance of the campus. Today only the administration building, begun in 1935 stands as a reminder of earlier years. Beginning in 1954, a book bindery was completed, which signaled an era of new building. In 1971 the bindery was renovated into a math, science, home economics, and maintenance complex. A beautiful gymnasium was completed in April of 1955. By the fall of 1958 a new girls' dormitory was ready for occupancy. It was not until 1965, however, that the last vestiges of the original campus were erased with the destruction of Zirkle, Elliot, and Jensen halls; the latter, which had been converted into a dormitory annex, was formerly Charles D. Zirkle's home. Also that year a new boy's dormitory was finished, matching the similarly styled girls' dormitory.

In 1975 a junior-sized swimming pool, complete with shower and locker facilities, was completed. In 1976 a new church, with a seating capacity of 750, and a new administration building were completed. While the physical appearance of the campus has been changed throughout the years, its purpose for existing has not. Today, as Charles Zirkle envisioned it almost 85 years ago, Shenandoah Valley Academy is a secondary, coeducational boarding school designed to educate the youth of the Seventh-day Adventist Church to carry on the work of God.

Shepherd, Anna Eliza Stewart

SHEPHERD, ANNA ELIZA STEWART (1846—1919). Educator, musician, dean. Born in Kentucky and educated at the University of Indiana, she married William A. Shepherd, a Seventh-day Adventist, and moved with him to Nebraska in 1865. She disapproved of her husband's doing chores on Sunday, and he challenged her to prove Sundaykeeping from the Bible. She began to study, read the Bible through, and ordered publications from the Review and Herald. She kept the Sabbath for 10 years before hearing any sermons or attending SDA meetings.

When George I. Butler and R. M. Kilgore held meetings in Nebraska City, Anna was baptized. She was left a widow in 1891 and became the first music teacher at the newly opened Union College. In 1892 she became dean of women, and served in this capacity for 10 years. In 1902 she became "Mama Shepherd"—the dean of men at Mount Vernon Academy in Ohio. The following year she also became dean of women. Later she served as dean at Sheyenne River Academy in North Dakota. Here she contracted Bright's disease, but was anointed and healed. She was called back as dean to Union College, and during 1915 and 1916 she was in charge of the nurses' dorm at Nebraska Sanitarium. She gave 23 years of service to young people.

Shepherdess International

SHEPHERDESS INTERNATIONAL. A church-sponsored organization to assist the minister's spouse in personal and spiritual growth; clarification of her role as a minister's spouse; development of a team ministry with her husband, uniquely suited to her own interests and abilities; training as a paraprofessional in the ministry; finding fellowship and a support system; and developing closer home relationships" (Organizational Guidelines for Shepherdess Chapters).

Organized in 1984 as a pilot program under the direction of Marie Spangler as coordinator and Ellen Bresee as associate coordinator, Shepherdess International (SI) was officially voted as a regular part of the General Conference Ministerial Association at the 1987 Annual Council. By 1992 approximately 316 chapters were organized worldwide in the various conferences/missions. All divisions except one had selected a coordinator.

An SI advisory council, advisory board, and executive committee, with a broad spectrum of ministers' wives and others, meet regularly for the purpose of giving overall guidance to SI development.

Materials include (1) a quarterly Shepherdess International Journal; (2) Organizational Guidelines for Shepherdess Chapters, which contains a model constitution for SI chapters, job descriptions for division and union coordinators, and information on the quarterly SI Journal; (3) home-based continuing education courses in videos, tapes, and books; and (4) three resource packets for sponsors and presidents, newsletter editors, and interns' spouses.

Meetings of local conference SI chapters are held regularly as well as meetings held at the time of workers' meetings, Annual Councils, and General Conference sessions. Authorized women's meetings, attended largely by workers' wives, were planned and conducted by GC SI leaders for the 1985 and 1990 GC sessions. The World Ministerial Conferences at the GC preessions plan special seminars for ministers' wives.

Leaders

Leaders. Upon Marie Spangler's retirement in 1987, Ellen Bresee was appointed General Conference SI coordinator and shared her responsibilities with Sally Streib. Streib later became the acting SI coordinator for six months when Bresee retired in early 1992. At the Annual Council in 1992, Sharon Cress was appointed SI coordinator.

History of SI Development

History of SI Development. Following the 1966 GC session, Dollis Pierson, wife of General Conference president Robert Pierson, was invited by N. R. Dower, secretary of the Ministerial Association, and J. R. Spangler, associate secretary and Ministry editor, to solicit articles for a regular feature, By His Side, for Ministry. Under her leadership, the book By His Side was compiled and published for ministers' wives. After Mrs. Pierson resigned, Kay Dower joined her husband in a team ministry. She traveled extensively with him, holding meetings for the wives of ministers in various conferences/missions around the world. She also prepared special bulletins and sponsored the Shepherdess section of Ministry. Both Pierson and Dower, on their own initiative, planned and conducted meetings for the wives of workers at Annual Councils and GC sessions. Dower led out in planning and conducting the first major meeting in the history of the Seventh-day Adventist Church for ministers' wives, at the 1970 GC session in Atlantic City, followed by meetings at the GC sessions in 1975 and 1980.

J. R. Spangler, secretary of the General Conference Ministerial Association, along with W. B. Quigley, associate ministerial secretary, presented the need for a worldwide support system for ministers' wives to the GC officers. At that time a pilot program was authorized, with Enoch Oliveira, GC vice president, as first chair of a committee that promoted the development and expansion of SI.

Sherwood Park Nursing Home

SHERWOOD PARK NURSING HOME. A 100-bed extended-care center for the aged, owned and operated by the Alberta Conference and formally incorporated under the laws of Alberta as a charitable organization. It is situated on a five-acre (two-hectare) tract of land in the residential subdivision of Sherwood Park, immediately adjacent to the provincial capital of Edmonton, Alberta, Canada.

On Nov. 27, 1966, the conference committee, meeting at the Edmonton Central church, under the leadership of conference president A. W. Kaytor, voted to build a 100-bed nursing home in the Edmonton area. This culminated previous discussions of such a project that were started under the administration of Philip Moores. President Kaytor advocated establishing a Perpetual Revolving Development Fund to finance the construction. The proposal was accepted, and in the spring of 1967 a call was placed for Allen Fowler from the Manitoba-Saskatchewan Conference to take charge of assembling the fund. Fowler had just completed a similar task for the Swift Current Nursing Home. During the next two years a comprehensive appeal was successfully conducted throughout the constituency. Construction began in April 1969, and the building was officially opened on Sept. 28, 1969.

The institution is accredited as an extended care center by the Canadian Council on Hospital Accreditation. It maintains membership in the Seventh-day Adventist Nursing Home Association (Canada); Adventist Hospital Association; Alberta Hospital Association; and Alberta Long-Term Care Association.

Administrators: S. J. Clifton, 1969—1970; Allen Fowler, 1970—1986; D. L. Dunfield, 1986— .

Sheyenne River Academy

SHEYENNE RIVER ACADEMY. A former coeducational boarding school on the senior high school level, situated at Harvey, North Dakota, overlooking the Sheyenne River. The school was owned and operated by the North Dakota Conference, under the jurisdiction of the Northern Union, until 1977 when it was closed and replaced by Dakota Adventist Academy.

The school was established in 1903, with the first term beginning on Nov. 3, 1904. For at least two years it was called the Harvey Industrial School. The original school farm of 160 acres (65 hectares) was donated by the citizens of Harvey. In 1976 the property totaled more than 800 acres (325 hectares), including approximately 350 acres (150 hectares) under cultivation, with the rest used as pasture.

The buildings evolved through a series of replacements and improvements. The first main building was a three-story frame structure with a basement that contained the kitchen. In 1916 an addition was made on the east side to provide for a chapel, cafeteria, and students' room. The boys originally lived in the main building, but in 1916 some were transferred to a three-story cottage south of the main building. This cottage had been used by girls until 1915, when a two-story building to the north of the main building was completed. This building burned to the ground on Dec. 13, 1917, and was rebuilt. In 1927 two large brick dormitories were completed, the boys' dormitory south of the main building, and the girls' dormitory north of it. A modern three-story main building was constructed in 1948, then a gymnasium and cafeteria in 1950. Also erected were a modern steam plant and a good set of farm buildings. The school owned seven faculty houses. A major improvement in 1957 was the laying of an eight-inch (20-centimeter) water line connecting the school with the city water system.

The academy plant was used by the North Dakota Conference for its camp meeting sessions. A large auditorium erected expressly for camp meeting purposes was situated on the academy grounds.

In the early days of the academy, students could choose from curricula taught in Russian, German, or English, and they could take such subjects as blacksmithing and hydrotherapy. Early graduates often went on to Clinton Theological Seminary, but more recent graduates attended Union College, which is the college serving the area.

The first graduation in 1912 had only one graduate. By the time the school closed, more than 1,000 had received diplomas. Sheyenne River Academy took pride in the large number of graduates who entered the organized church work.

During the 1960s it became evident that new buildings, particularly dormitories, were needed in order to meet state fire codes. Several times programs were launched to raise funds to build these dormitories. However, with the low price of farm products, it seemed impossible to raise the funds. In 1970 a plan to build a completely new academy was introduced to the constituency. Even before the North and South Dakota conferences merged, South Dakota Conference agreed to support the new school jointly. The conference would be responsible for one salary in the Bible Department, $10,000 for equipment and supplies, $75,000 and half of the income from the sale of the “West” farm capital improvements. Most of the property and equipment at Harvey was sold at auction in 1977, and the new school began its operation in September. (See Dakota Adventist Academy.)

Shireman, D. T.

SHIREMAN, D. T. (1834—1920). An early Seventh-day Adventist worker in North Carolina. He was born in Shiremanstown, Pennsylvania, and learned the trades of brick mason, carpenter, and general mechanic. Although lacking a formal education, he joined the SDA workers in several states, among them Iowa and Kansas, as a self-supporting evangelist and colporteur, and for a while was connected with a city mission in Chicago. In 1890 he went to North Carolina, where he organized churches, established schools, and later founded an orphanage at Hildebran. He was ordained to the ministry while in North Carolina, probably in 1892, for his name is listed among ordained ministers for the first time in the 1893 Yearbook.

Shull, Howard L.

SHULL, HOWARD L. (1894—1970). Missionary, manager, treasurer. He was a native of Burlington, New Jersey. In 1920 he married Verna Stowe, and soon after they sailed for China, where he served as manager of the Chiao Tou Tseng Training Institute and Shanghai Publishing Association for 20 years. At the outbreak of World War II the couple returned to the United States, where he served as manager of Southwestern Junior College for more than six years. After a year as treasurer of the Hawaiian Mission, he became business manager of Pacific Union College, serving in that capacity for 12 years. Upon retirement he was invited to connect with the Pacific Union Conference as associate auditor. He served in this position for two years.

Shultz, James Earl

SHULTZ, JAMES EARL (1884—1957). Editor and minister. After studying at Mount Vernon Academy, he served as a minister and departmental secretary in the Ohio Conference. In 1907 he presented a paper on the organization of conference MV societies at the Sabbath school and young people's convention held at Mount Vernon, Ohio, in which the MV Society was first organized. After a brief term as a missionary in Korea, he served as pastor of the Capital Memorial church in Washington, D.C., then as educational secretary for the Columbia Union Conference. In 1913 he went to China and there edited the Chinese Signs of the Times magazine. Returning to the United States about 1920, he preached in the Columbia and Atlantic unions. Later he edited the Watchman (1936—1942) and was a member of the committee that republished Thoughts on Daniel and the Revelation in 1944. From 1945 until his retirement because of poor health in 1949, he taught Bible at Washington Missionary College.

Si Jo

SI JO (Korean Signs of the Times, 1908— , published monthly by Korean Publishing House in Seoul, Korea). A periodical begun in 1908. At that time it was called Three Angels' Messages. Quite early in the publishing work it was decided to print this eight-page missionary journal. By 1983 it had increased to 44 pages, and 122,600 copies are printed monthly for believers in Korea and 16,000 for Korean-speaking believers living in the United States.

Publication was suspended during the Japanese occupation, but began again soon after independence.

Si Jo is one of the oldest continuously published magazines in Korea, in both the religious and secular fields. It has contributed much to Koreans in various areas of modern Korean history. The magazine also spreads the Christian ideals, promotes health consciousness, popularizes the Korean language, as well as campaigning for enlightenment of Koreans and their education in etiquette, and practical life.

Sierra Leone

SIERRA LEONE. A republic that received its independence from the British Commonwealth of Nations on Apr. 27, 1961. It has an area of 27,925 square miles (72,000 square kilometers), and a population (1994) of 4.6 million. Freetown is the capital. Sierra Leone is bounded by the Atlantic Ocean on the southwest, by Liberia on the southeast, and by Guinea on the north. The people are Muslim, Christian, and animist. Agriculture is the principal occupation, with palm kernels, raw coffee, and cacao the principal cash crops. Diamonds and iron ore are mined.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. The territory of Sierra Leone constitutes the Sierra Leone Mission, a part of the West African Union Mission, which is part of the Africa-Indian Ocean Division. Statistics (1992) for Sierra Leone: churches, 50; members, 9,919; ordained ministers, 10; licensed ministers, 4.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. During a General Conference field trip Lawrence C. Chadwick, the president of the International Tract Society, became the first Seventh-day Adventist to visit Sierra Leone. This happened in 1892. As a result of his visit, an appeal was made at the 1893 General Conference session that a missionary be sent to Sierra Leone.

This vision was realized 12 years later when Mr. and Mrs. Hyatt, a Black American couple, arrived in Freetown to pioneer the work in Sierra Leone. Hyatt excelled in his profession as a dentist and became known as the strange man who did not work on Saturdays.

Before the end of the year, the General Conference sent another American, David C. Babcock, to join the Hyatts. Babcock became the first public preacher of the SDA message. Through his lectures R. P. Dauphin was converted and became the first African worker. Babcock was also the first to introduce the process of making concrete block in Sierra Leone. These were used for the erection of the first church building in West Africa. It was built in 1907 on Circular Road in Freetown. Mrs. Babcock began the first elementary school in Freetown, and her husband built the first mission house and office on Pandemba Road. Pastor Babcock also started the first sanitarium, next to the mission house. It was under the supervision of Dr. E. W. Myers.

Professor T. M. French arrived from America in 1907. He organized the school at Waterloo into a ministerial training center. Several young men received training for the ministry in this institution.

By 1911 an industrial workshop, fully equipped, was in operation along with the training school. In 1912 the arm of the work was extended into the interior when Pastor Dauphin was sent to Matotoka in the north and I. W. Harding to Gbangbama in the south. Shortly after, the mission headquarters was moved from Freetown to Waterloo, where it remained until the 1940s.

By 1914 Sierra Leone had become a personnel resource center for the work in West Africa. Local pastors were sent as missionaries to help strengthen the work in Liberia, Ghana, and Nigeria. When Elder Babcock left to start the work in Nigeria in 1914, he was accompanied by two Sierra Leone workers, Dauphin and Morgue.

World War II had a detrimental effect on the work in Sierra Leone. The ministerial training institution at Waterloo was converted into a military training camp. After the war the mission headquarters was moved to Bo.

In 1961 Peninsular Secondary School was opened in Waterloo. It grew into a large SDA day school. In order to develop a predominantly Seventh-day Adventist boarding facility where future workers could be better trained, the Yele Seventh-day Adventist Secondary School was opened in 1965.

In the same year, the government of Sierra Leone handed over the operation of the Masanga Leprosy Hospital to the church under special contract with the Ministry of Health. The 140-bed hospital catered to the needs of 15,000 lepers. Presently the prevalence of leprosy has been reduced considerably, and the hospital now treats 1,000 cases a year. Services have been widened to provide effective care for tuberculosis patients.

In 1973 permission was granted to the mission to set up a radio communication system between the mission office in Bo, Yele School, Masanga Hospital, and Freetown, the capital city. Daily use of the system made communication easier and eliminated delay. About this time Walton Whaley succeeded in putting the Voice of Prophecy and Faith for Today on national radio and television.

In 1973 the work in Gambia was attached to Sierra Leone, and the two became the Sierra Leone and Gambia Mission. The first recognized work in Gambia was begun by Brother Cudjo, a Gambian literature evangelist. In 1976 Gambia became a mission station.

A new office complex is presently under construction at Waterloo. The spirit of progress and dynamism that marked the beginning of the work in Sierra Leone is still alive.

Sierra Vista Hospital

SIERRA VISTA HOSPITAL. An institution operated since 1980 by the Adventist Health System/Sunbelt in Truth or Consequences, New Mexico. Originally called St. Ann's, it was purchased in 1981 and its name was changed to Sierra Vista Hospital.

The hospital has 43 beds (including 11 skilled nursing facility beds), operating rooms, delivery room, Radiology Department, clinical laboratory, physical therapy, respiratory therapy, emergency room/trauma center, Home Health Agency, and an attached physicians' office building. Sierra Vista Hospital is the sole provider of acute health care services in Sierra County, New Mexico, a region larger than the state of Connecticut. It serves a population of approximately 10,000 living in the Truth or Consequences area along the Rio Grande. The population consists of ranchers, farmers, and a large group of retirees who have chosen the pleasant climate, scenic view, and advantages of Elephant Butte Lake and the Gila Wilderness area, both adjacent to the town. During the summer holiday weekends the population expands to more than 100,000, becoming the second-largest city in the state as visitors come to the lake to camp, fish and boat.

Sierra Vista Hospital is accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Health Care Organizations and is a member of the American Hospital Association.

The pastor of the local Seventh-day Adventist church serves as the hospital chaplain and conducts an active health education and community outreach program.

Signes des Temps

SIGNES DES TEMPS (“Signs of the Times”). The French 24-page monthly missionary journal, first published in July 1876 at Basel, Switzerland, edited by J. N. Andrews and D. T. Bourdeau. Signs was not only circulated in Switzerland and France but also in other French-speaking areas in Europe and around the world. The magazine was printed in Basel, Switzerland, on Seventh-day Adventist presses from 1885 to 1895, when the publishing house was closed because of Sunday laws. Signes des Temps was then printed by outside firms until 1914, when the French publishing house was established at Dammarie-les-Lys. Since 1922 it has been published at this location. In 1972 the French journal Mieux Vivre (“Better Living”), which had been published by the Pacific Press, merged with Signes des Temps, and since then has been the missionary journal for all the French-speaking areas of the world.

Signs of the Times

SIGNS OF THE TIMES. An expression in Matt. 16:3, used in referring to the specific signs foretold in Scripture as preceding and portending the Second Advent. While giving emphasis to these signs, Seventh-day Adventists insist that the signs indicate merely the imminence of the Advent and cannot be used in an attempt to set a specific date for it, for “of that day and hour knoweth no man . . . , but my Father only” (Matt. 24:36). (See Second Advent.)

Signs of the Times (Nampa, Idaho)

SIGNS OF THE TIMES (Nampa, Idaho) (1874— ; monthly; PPPA; 1965 circulation, 265,000; file, lacking vol. 17, 1891, in Pacific Press). A journal subtitled “The World’s Prophetic Monthly; a Magazine of Christian Living, Presenting the Bible as the Word of God and Jesus Christ as Man’s Redeemer and Coming King.”

The Signs of the Times (The was later dropped from the title) was founded as a weekly in 1874 at Oakland, California, by James White, who had twice been president of the General Conference (1865—1867 and 1869—1871). In 1873, during a vacation in the Rockies, White had conceived the idea of issuing a publication on the Pacific Coast similar to the Review and Herald, published at Battle Creek, Michigan, although there were fewer than 500 Seventh-day Adventists in California at that time. Encouraged by his wife, Ellen, he issued the first number of eight pages, 17¼" x 11¾" (44 cm. x 30 cm.) in size, on June 4, 1874, in Oakland.

The purpose of the new journal was indicated in an editorial note in the second issue, where James White stated that Signs of the Times was “to be not only an expositor of the prophecies, a report of the signs of our times, but also a family, religious and general newspaper for the household.” In the July 23, 1874, issue he wrote: “Through The Signs of the Times we wish to erect thousands of pulpits more especially in the Pacific Coast States and Territories, where we can appeal to the people weekly . . . upon the exhaustless themes . . . necessary to a fitness to receive the dear Saviour at His second advent.

“The subscription price was $2.00 a year to those who choose to pay a subscription price and free to all others as far as the paper is sustained by the donations of liberal friends of the cause.”

The first seven issues, between June 4 and Oct. 22, 1874, carried on the masthead the name of James White as editor and proprietor. Then having been reelected president of the General Conference, Aug. 10, 1874, he returned to Battle Creek; but he urged the California members to continue the journal. He proposed that they raise sufficient money to set up a publishing enterprise to print the Signs of the Times “under the supervision of the General Conference Committee.” His message was read to a camp meeting held in Yountville, California, Oct. 1—12, 1874, by G. I. Butler, the outgoing president of the General Conference. On the afternoon of Oct. 11 the camp meeting congregation—between 300 and 400 persons plus many weekend visitors—responded with great liberality. One brother started the list with $1,000, others followed, and gifts ranging from hundreds of dollars down to $10 totaled $19,414.

Alma E. McKibbin wrote of this historic meeting in the Signs of the Times of June 6, 1944, as follows: “When the people were asked to contribute to this contemplated enterprise, my father, looking about over the assembled congregation, said to himself: ‘These people will not give enough to buy the ink for the first edition.’ But the hands that went into the pockets of blue jeans or the folds of print dresses brought out not silver, but gold-gold coins and, more amazing still, unminted gold in bars and wedges. Soon thousands of dollars lay heaped upon the rostrum—the gifts of a humble people moved by a great faith.”

With the money raised, a lot was purchased at Twelfth and Castro streets in the city of Oakland, where a building was erected and named the Pacific Press, the first home of the Signs of the Times. Here the journal was printed until 1904, when the publishing house was moved to Mountain View, California.

In those early days, with the circulation around 3,400, the maximum salary for workers was $12 a week. By 1876 the carpetbag in which the papers originally were carried to the post office was replaced by a “large market basket,” as reported by W. E. Whalin, who worked for the Signs as a boy.

On Aug. 5, 1908, a new volume was begun and the format was changed to 7¼" x 9½" (18 cm. x 24 cm.) with the accompanying announcement: “The first number in each month will contain from 48 to 64 pages, with cover in colors. . . . Each following week in the month it will contain 16 pages.”

After seven issues of this sort, on Sept. 23, 1908, the page size of the regular weekly issues was enlarged to 9¾" x 14½" (14 cm. x 37 cm.), with the following explanation: “The small shape, with only sixteen pages of matter, makes the Signs of the Times look too much like a child’s paper.”

All this experimentation led to the publication of two journals: the original weekly and a Signs of the Times monthly.

Beginning January 1909, the monthly edition (from Apr. 1912 called Signs of the Times Magazine) continued in the smaller size until Jan. 1, 1917, when the size was increased to 8 3/8" x 11 3/8" (21 cm. x 29 cm.). It continued in this size until Jan. 1, 1922, when the monthly was merged again with the weekly.

By 1935 the average weekly circulation (including special issues) had reached 60,618. In 1941 it passed 100,000. Two years later it passed 200,000 and in 1946 exceeded 300,000. The highest total for the weekly edition, 340,812, was reached in 1947.

Urgent requests from the field for modernization and color led to the abandonment of the black-and-white 16-page weekly in favor of a 36-page monthly with four-color cover, the change taking place on Jan. 1, 1957.

The average monthly circulation of these color issues from 1957 to 1962 varied between 250,000 and 275,000.

The continuing trend toward color resulted in full-color pictures on alternate spreads inside beginning December 1972. The paper shortage forced a size reduction to 8½" x 11" (22 cm. x 28 cm.) starting January 1975.

A notable shift in editorial policy in the first half of the 1970s was the inclusion in each issue of three or four articles on a selected theme such as the Second Coming, evolution versus Creation, and righteousness by faith. The layout became “conservative-modern,” and non-Whites were pictured frequently both on the cover and inside.

The subscription list was put onto a computer in 1972. By 1974 most subscriptions generated by the annual subscription crusade began not with the September issue, as in the past, but with June.

For the Signs centennial, the June 1974 issue was oversize, with 52 pages printed in full color throughout; 450,000 copies were distributed. Pacific Press employees and their families returned as a group to the site of the 1874 camp meeting to “recapture the spirit of Yountville.” Circulation reached an all-time high, exceeding 351,000 going to 106 countries.

Circulation remained flat through the rest of the decade, however—because, at least in part, of the rapidly rising cost of the magazine. In 1972, for instance, a 12-month subscription cost $6; this was only 50 cents more than it had been in 1968. By 1977, however, the price had soared to $9.95.

In an attempt to triple circulation to 1 million, the price was reduced in 1978 to less than a third of what it had been—only $2.95. Circulation never rose much above 400,000, however, and the price cut, in addition to costing Pacific Press a great deal of money, severed an understanding that Signs of the Times had long enjoyed with These Times.

Always before, Signs of the Times had acted in concert with These Times to set both the price and the size of their respective journals; this could be done because neither was allowed to compete with the other. West of the Mississippi River, only Signs of the Times could be promoted; east of the Mississippi, only These Times. As long as the two offered roughly the same product at roughly the same price, the arrangement had worked fairly well. But clearly those days were over.

As a result, the General Conference decided to allow a “free market” in missionary journals, beginning with the spring 1979 campaign. Signs of the Times could now advertise itself throughout North America as the church’s affordable missionary journal—a claim made possible by reducing the magazine from 32 pages to 16, beginning with the July 1979 issue. These Times, on the other hand, retained its old format (and price) in an attempt to reach a more “upscale” readership.

But economic recession, along with other factors, limited the appeal of even a low-cost missionary magazine. And Pacific Press, the parent company of Signs of the Times, was in no shape to sustain a financial loss on its “flagship journal.”

As a result, the General Conference decided to merge Signs of the Times with These Times, beginning with the April 1984 issue. Great care was taken to make sure this was a merger and not a takeover; discussions of the considerations involved were complex, difficult, and sometimes even quite painful. (At one point there was serious discussion as to whether the name of the “new” magazine should be Signs of These Times). At last, however, a compromise was reached: the magazine would adopt the 32-page format (and editor) of These Times, while retaining the name and publisher of Signs of the Times.

The merger proved to be a mixed blessing. Kenneth Holland was a well-respected editor, both within and without the church. During his tenure at Signs of the Times, the magazine won three Awards of Merit for General Excellence—the highest honor given by the Associated Church Press. The magazine also won seven Angel awards for excellence in Christian journalism, and had many articles reprinted in the Reader’s Digest.

But 1984 was also the year that Pacific Press moved from Mountain View, California, to Nampa, Idaho. And the confusion of that move (as well as the difficulties encountered in implementing a new computer billing and listing program) led to a great many delays in the production and mailing of Signs of the Times.

There was also a problem with maintaining the traditional sponsor-based method of funding subscriptions. Many church members who had supported These Times never made the switch to the new magazine. Overwhelmed by the number of other programs they were being asked to promote, many churches deemphasized the Signs of the Times’ spring subscription campaign. And younger church members, by and large, just never formed the habit of sending a subscription to a friend or neighbor. In one survey of sponsors, the median age of those responding was 65!

The result was a troubling drop in subscriptions—from 300,000 in 1985 to 230,000 in 1989.

During the next few years, however, the fortunes of the paper improved, with circulation climbing to 260,000 in 1993. More than 400,000 copies of a special “Portraits of a People” edition were mailed to every house in Indianapolis just in time to greet delegates to the 1990 General Conference session. A newsletter for sponsors—Behind the Scenes at Signs of the Times—was begun in 1991. By 1993 the Signs news box program, begun in 1992, had placed more than 1,000 news boxes in grocery stores, post offices, and bus stations, with the potential to distribute more than 30,000 copies of the magazine every month.

Signs of the Times Publishing Association (Taiwan)

SIGNS OF THE TIMES PUBLISHING ASSOCIATION (Taiwan) (Shih Chao Ch'u Pan She). A publishing organization with a printing plant, operated by the South China Island Union Mission at Taipei, Taiwan.

History. The publishing house was founded in 1956 and developed under the leadership of E. L. Longway, who devoted much time and attention to the institution and assisted in the translation of some of the books of Ellen White. Previously, printing for the South China Island Union Mission had been carried on in small denominational printing plants at the South China Training Institute at Kowloon, Hong Kong, and the Taiwan Training Institute at Taipei, Taiwan. The plant was housed in a small two-story rented office adjacent to the union compound, where the number of employees has increased from two workers in 1969 to 21 in 1993. It has erected a two-story building for the publishing work, including a printing plant and office. The building is within the union compound.

Publications. Mo Shih Mu Shang ("The Last-Day Shepherd's Call"), the general Seventh-day Adventist Church paper of the Chinese over the entire world, resumed publication in 1954: circulation, 2,500 monthly; editor, Hanson Cho. Shih Chao ("The Signs of the Times"), was first published in 1905 by Harry Miller in mainland China: circulation, 13,000 monthly; editor, Hanson Cho. Senior and junior Sabbath school lesson quarterlies and missions quarterlies are also published, along with Chinese equivalents of Our Little Friend and the Sabbath school children's program helps.

Books. Between the years 1954 and 1993 the following works from Ellen White were printed in the Chinese language: Gospel Workers, Christ's Object Lessons, Thoughts From the Mount of Blessing, Messages to Young People, The Adventist Home, Early Writings, Christian Experience and Teachings of Ellen White, Counsels on Sabbath School Work, morning watch devotional books (16 volumes), and the Conflict of the Ages series, including 25,000 copies of The Great Controversy and 50,000 copies of Steps to Christ.

Among the more significant books translated and completely reillustrated are volumes 1—6 of Uncle Arthur's Bedtime Stories, by Arthur S. Maxwell. There were also elementary and secondary SDA school textbooks and 8,000 copies of the Church Hymnal, translated and published in the Chinese language.

Signs Publishing Company

SIGNS PUBLISHING COMPANY. A publishing firm with printing and bookbinding facilities, owned and operated by the South Pacific Division and situated in Warburton, 48 miles (75 kilometers) east of Melbourne, Australia. The territory served by the company consists of the entire South Pacific Division, comprising Australia, New Zealand, Papua New Guinea, and the islands of the Pacific south of the equator and to the east of Australia. The majority of the publications are in the English language, but some have been produced in Pidgin English, Fijian, Samoan, Marovo (for the Solomon Islands), Tongan, and other languages.

Major items of equipment include a large MAN four-color press, a smaller Komori four-color press, two large two-color Roland offset presses, a two-color Aurelia press, a single-color Fuji press, one platen press, one Heidelberg cylinder press, folding machines, guillotines, collating machine, sewing machine, three-knife trimmers, and a full bookbinding line.

In the Camera Lithographic Department there are two modern darkroom cameras, film processing units, platemaking equipment, color scanner, color proofing equipment, automatic plate processors, and contact rooms. In 1993 about 64 workers were being employed, most of them full-time.

Publications. In 1993 the company published the following periodicals, here listed with their respective circulation figures: Signs of the Times, 42,500; Good Health, 7,000; Record (weekly) 26,000; Channels, an Advent Radio Television Production's publication, is printed quarterly.

From 1886 through 1993, 98 subscription book titles were printed. Of these, the following were being sold in 1993: The Desire of Ages, Happiness Digest, and Steps to Christ, by Ellen G. White; My Bible Friends, vols. 1—5 and 6—10 plus coloring book, by Etta B. Degering; Nature's Way Cookbook, by K. Nelson; The Bible Story, vols. 1—10 and coloring book, Today, Tomorrow and You, Your Bible and You, Uncle Arthur's Best Stories, vols. 1—4, Uncle Arthur's Short Stories, vols. 1—5, by A. S. Maxwell; Everything a Married Couple Should Know, Everything a Growing Child Should Know, Family Medical Care, vols. 1—5, Vital Facts for Boys, and Vital Facts for Girls, by Dr. J. R. Wright; How to Survive the Nineties, by L. R. Walton and H. E. Douglass; Meatless Microwaving, by N. R. Rice and B. M. Johanson; and Modern Medical Guide, by Harold Shryock.

The company imports a large number of trade books from the two Seventh-day Adventist publishing houses in the United States. These books are sold mainly to SDA Church members through nine Adventist Book Centers covering all local conferences.

Subscription books for all literature evangelists in Australia and New Zealand are supplied direct from the publishing house to each individual literature evangelist.

General printing work is undertaken for all departments of the South Pacific Division, for Advent Radio Television Productions, for local conferences, for the Sanitarium Health Food Company, and for many other SDA institutions. Each year magazines are produced for the Appeal for Missions program. In 1993, 1.5 million Appeal for Missions magazines were printed.

History. Publishing work in Australia began some six months after the arrival in Melbourne on June 16, 1885, of the first SDA missionaries: S. N. Haskell; J. O. Corliss and M. C. Israel and their families; Henry L. Scott, a printer; and William Arnold, a colporteur. Regular publishing of the periodical The Bible Echo and Signs of the Times began in January 1886. (A trial number of the paper had been issued Nov. 2, 1885.) The Bible Echo Publishing House was housed in a leased two-story building on the corner of Rae and Scotchmer streets, North Fitzroy, Melbourne. Equipment consisted of one large and one small press, a stitching machine, a guillotine, and some hand type. The periodical, a monthly at first, became a semimonthly in 1889, a weekly in 1894, and in 1959 a monthly again. In 1903 the name of the periodical was changed to Australasian Signs of the Times.

In harmony with the counsel of Ellen White that as far as possible the church's business interests should be removed from the cities, the Echo Publishing House, as the firm was known, which in 1888 had transferred to Best Street in North Fitzroy, was transferred in February 1906 to the Warburton hills. The name of the house was then changed to Signs of the Times Publishing Association, later shortened to the more convenient name, Signs Publishing Company.

The pioneer leaders at Warburton included W. D. Salisbury, manager; H. Stockton, secretary; N. D. Faulkhead, accountant; A. W. Anderson, editor; J. M. Johanson, field secretary; and L. A. Romero, R. L. Bond, W. Bowes, and E. Parkinson, assisting as departmental supervisors.

The first publishing house in Warburton, which was built on low ground, was subject to periodic flooding by the Yarra River. No serious loss was sustained, however, until 1934, when flood damage to machinery and stock totaled £A10,000. It was then decided to move to higher ground, and in 1938 the first section of the present brick building was erected above flood level, on its present site in a lovely parkland setting. Three major extensions to the factory building have been made: one in 1957; one in 1962, providing 40,000 square feet (3,700 square meters) of floor space for offices, modern printing and bookbinding machinery, raw material stocks, and finished books; and the last in 1981, increasing the floor space by more than one third.

Managers: W. D. Salisbury, 1906—1909; J. M. Johanson, 1909—1916; W.H.B. Miller, 1916—1919; J. M. Johanson, 1919—1926; W. O. Johanson, 1926—1934; J. J. Potter, 1934—1944; E. J. Johanson, 1944—1946; T. A. Mitchell, 1946—1948; J. C. Craven, 1948—1950; C.F.L. Ulrich, 1950—1962; R. E. Pengilley, 1962—1980; D. D. Woolley, 1980— .

Silvestre Adventist Hospital

SILVESTRE ADVENTIST HOSPITAL (Hospital Adventista Silvestre). A 125-bed hospital, owned and operated by the East Brazil Union Conference, offering general medical and surgical service, backed by an efficient laboratory and X-ray service and a modern center of hemodynamics and cinecoronariography.

The hospital is located on 16 acres (six hectares) of land with abundant vegetation and is surrounded by the Tijuca National Park, one of the greatest urban forests in the world. It is located near the center of Rio de Janeiro.

The hospital has a School of Practical Nursing that is officially recognized and has graduated hundreds of students, some of whom remain at the hospital or serve on medical launches and in other medical institutions of Brazil.

The Health Insurance Department provides attention to thousands of people. In addition to private patients, the institution takes care of heart surgery patients under a special agreement with the state. The present staff consists of more than 30 physicians in various specialties.

Medical Directors: C. C. Schneider, 1948—1949; Galdino N. Vieira, 1950; C. C. Schneider, 1951; R. Ermshar, 1952; Edgard M. Berger, 1956—1971; Zildomar Deucher, 1972—1985; Gideon de Costa Marques, 1986— .

Simi Valley Hospital and Health Care Services

SIMI VALLEY HOSPITAL AND HEALTH CARE SERVICES. A 215-bed health-care provider serving approximately 100,000 residents in southeastern Ventura, 38 miles (60 kilometers) from Los Angeles, California.

With approximately 500 employees, 300 volunteers, and 240 physicians representing all major medical specialties, Simi Valley Hospital provides a full range of inpatient, outpatient, and home-care services, on several campuses. These include the 102-bed main hospital and the state-of-the-art Aspen Outpatient Center. The hospital's centers of excellence include emergency medicine, women's services, behavioral medicine, rehabilitative care, and outpatient services.

The hospital is active in the community through its free ASK-A-NURSE health-care information telephone line and participation in numerous health-screening events, community education classes, speakers, support groups, and referrals. It is also one of southern California's top three tissue-donating facilities.

Simi Valley Hospital and Health Care Services was developed as a result of the community's asking Seventh-day Adventists to undertake the project. The hospital opened in August 1965 as 50-bed Simi Valley Community Hospital. In 1967 the hospital changed its name to Simi Valley Adventist Hospital to reflect its affiliation with the worldwide health-care mission of the Seventh-day Adventist Church. In the early 1970s 95 beds were added, encompassing pediatrics, coronary care, rehabilitation, intensive care, and skilled nursing care. In 1985 the hospital again expanded its services by constructing a new $17 million addition to house the Emergency, Radiology, Laboratory, and other support departments. In 1987 the hospital purchased the South Campus facility, which houses behavioral health programs, and became a general partner in the Aspen Outpatient Center. In 1991 the hospital changed its name to Simi Valley Hospital and Health Care Services to reflect the broad array of services available to the community. A year later the hospital acquired the Aspen Outpatient Center.

Together with Glendale Adventist Medical Center and White Memorial Medical Center, Simi Valley Hospital and Health Care Services is part of the Southern California Healthcare Network, established in February 1992 to provide a comprehensive health-care delivery system in Los Angeles, Orange, Riverside, San Bernardino, and Ventura counties. Simi Valley Hospital and Health Care Services and the Southern California Healthcare Network are members of Adventist Health System/West, a nonprofit Seventh-day Adventist health-care system that owns, leases, and/or manages 18 health-care organizations in 10 Western states.

Administrators: W. H. Gosse, 1965—1976; James D. Roberts, 1976—1984; Darwin Remboldt, 1984—1989; Alan J. Rice, 1989— .

Simla Sanitarium and Hospital

SIMLA SANITARIUM AND HOSPITAL. A 77-bed general hospital and sanitarium operated by the North India Section of the Northern Indian Union in the Southern Asia Division. Located in the town of Simla, India, at the southern edge of the Himalaya Mountains, about 200 miles (320 kilometers) north of Delhi, the hospital is equipped with Physiotherapy, Surgical, and General Medical departments and has a mobile unit.

In 1914 H. C. Menkel, one of the pioneer Seventh-day Adventist physicians in India, opened treatment rooms at Simla (for many years Simla was the summer capital of India) and in New Delhi, in which he combined medical work with his evangelistic service. He operated these rooms for 28 years, working in Simla during the hot season and in New Delhi during the winter months. Many government officials, including the British viceroy of India, were patients in the Delhi and Simla institutions. The medical work carried on there was often referred to by the names “Hydro” and the “Good Health League.”

Between the spring of 1916 and July of 1933, the treatment rooms in Simla were in a place called Belvedere, and after that were moved to Carton House, on the Mall (the present location), and the institution became known as the Simla Sanitarium. When Menkel retired and returned to his homeland in 1943, the sanitarium was closed.

In June 1950 Carton House was remodeled, a surgery unit was added, and the institution was reopened as the Simla Sanitarium and Hospital, under the direction of Dr. I. R. Bazliel.

In 1973 an X-ray plant was purchased and housed in a new building, which also accommodated a new laboratory. The hospital is recognized by the local government and is reimbursed by the government for treatment to the staff of government agencies. Besides the building owned by the denomination, private rooms are rented in the annex of the nearby Cecil Hotel.

Medical Directors: H. C. Menkel, 1914—1943; I. R. Bazliel, 1950—1970; P.M.S. Chandrasekhar, 1970; I. R. Bazliel, 1971—1972; Mrs. G. R. Bazliel, 1972—1982; G. R. Bazliel, 1984—1985; M. S. Moses, 1986—1989; Bobban Thomas, 1989—1991; J. Devanand (acting), 1991; Nalli Prabhudas, 1992— .

Sin

SIN. The act, attitude, or condition of rebellion against, or apartness from, God on the part of a morally free person. The Bible terms for sin characterize it as a missing of the mark, a failure, a fault (Heb. chatta'th and related words, Gr. hamartia); rebellion, or deliberate unfaithfulness (Heb. pasha', cf. Gr. anomia, “lawlessness,” and asebeia, “impiety”); evil (Heb. ra', Gr. kakos); wickedness or unrighteousness (Heb. 'awen, Gr. adikia); guilt (Heb. 'awon); and transgression (Gr. parabasis).

Sin originated in the universe before the creation of human beings, when an angelic being, Lucifer, deliberately chose to become Satan, the adversary (see Eze. 28:12—17 and Isa. 14:12—14). At some time subsequent to the creation of the human race, Satan, in the guise of the serpent (Gen. 3:1—6), incited Eve and Adam to rebel against a specific divine command designed to symbolize the sovereignty of the Creator. (See Evil, Origin of; Satan and His Angels.)

The supreme self-revelation of God in the life, death, and resurrection of Christ is the divine response and solution to both the universal and the personal problem of sin. By accepting Christ's sacrifice on the cross, sinners acknowledge their own sinfulness, recognize God's justice in condemning sin, and dedicate themselves to a life of obedience to the divine will (see Conversion; Justification; New Birth). The plan of salvation demonstrates before the universe, once and for all, divine justice in utterly condemning sin, and at the same time, divine mercy in providing that persons who have sinned may nevertheless enjoy eternal life if they repent and accept the divine provisions.

In traditional Christian theology, “original sin” is the personal moral guilt for Adam's transgression presumably inherited by every human. Seventh-day Adventists do not stress the idea that personal, individual moral guilt adheres to Adam's descendants because of his sin. They stress, instead, that his sin resulted in the condition of estrangement from God in which every human being is born. This estrangement involves an inherent tendency to commit sin. In a state of sin a person's life is self-centered; however, conversion reorients the life and centers it in Christ.

Seventh-day Adventist literature has been concerned with the problem of sin primarily on the practical level; on the theological level, concern has been chiefly with its relationship to God's moral law, as “the transgression of the law” (1 John 3:4). From this point of view J. N. Andrews wrote (Review and Herald 33:66, Feb. 23, 1869): Sin “is armed rebellion against the Almighty. It is high treason against the government of God. It is the principle of wrong contending with right for a place in the universe.” Interest in the origin of sin in a good universe has been reflected in such articles as “God Is Not the Author of Sin,” by J. N. Andrews (ibid. 34:28, July 20, 1869), and “Origin of Evil,” by Roswell F. Cottrell (ibid. 45:164, May 20, 1875).

The Seventh-day Adventist concept of the origin of sin, and of God's way of dealing with it, is best set forth in the chapters “Why Was Sin Permitted?” in Patriarchs and Prophets, and “The Origin of Evil,” in The Great Controversy, both by Ellen White. Mrs. White defines sin as selfishness: “Sin originated in self-seeking” (DA 21). As to its origin, she wrote: “God did not ordain that sin should exist, but He foresaw its existence, and made provision to meet the terrible emergency” (ibid. 22).

“Sin originated with him, who, next to Christ, had been most honored of God. . . . Little by little, Lucifer came to indulge the desire for self-exaltation” (PP 35).

“It is impossible to explain the origin of sin so as to give a reason for its existence. . . . Nothing is more plainly taught in Scripture than that God was in no wise responsible for the entrance of sin; that there was no arbitrary withdrawal of divine grace, no deficiency in the divine government, that gave occasion for the uprising of rebellion. Sin is an intruder, for whose presence no reason can be given” (GC 492, 493).

Mrs. White accounts as follows for the purpose in permitting sin to run its course: “It was therefore necessary to demonstrate before the inhabitants of heaven, and of all the worlds, that God’s government is just, his law perfect. . . . [Satan’s] own work must condemn him. . . . The whole universe must see the deceiver unmasked. . . . The inhabitants of heaven and of the worlds, being unprepared to comprehend the nature or consequences of sin, could not then have seen the justice of God in the destruction of Satan. . . . For the good of the entire universe through ceaseless ages, he must more fully develop his principles, that his charges against the divine government might be seen in their true light by all created beings, and that the justice and mercy of God and the immutability of his law might be forever placed beyond all question. Satan’s rebellion was to be a lesson to the universe through all coming ages—a perpetual testimony to the nature of sin and its terrible results. . . . Thus the history of this terrible experiment of rebellion was to be a perpetual safeguard to all holy beings, to prevent them from being deceived as to the nature of transgression, to save them from committing sin, and suffering its penalty” (PP 42, 43).

Singapore

SINGAPORE. An island republic about 27 miles (45 kilometers) long and 14 miles (22 kilometers) wide off the tip of the Malay Peninsula in Southeast Asia, separated from the mainland by the Johore Strait, less than a mile wide. Its area, including adjacent islets, is about 224.5 square miles (580 square kilometers) and its population (1994) is 2.9 million—about three quarters Chinese, about one sixth Malay, and about one twelfth Indians and Pakistanis, plus a considerable number of Europeans. Its focal position on the international shipping routes and its excellent docking and bunkering services have made it one of the four busiest ports in the world. There are numerous industrial complexes, the biggest of which is Jurong Industrial Estate. In 1992 Singapore welcomed 5,989,940 tourists.

Singapore was founded as a trading station by the British East India Company in 1819. Several years later the settlement was incorporated into the newly organized colony of Straits Settlements (together with the island of Penang, the town of Malacca, and some territory on the Malayan mainland called Province Wellesley) and became the seat of the British administrator. From 1959 to 1963 Singapore was a self-governing state of the British Commonwealth. In 1963 it joined with the Federation of Malaya, Sarawak, and North Borneo (then renamed Sabah) to form the Federation of Malaysia. In 1965 Singapore seceded from the federation and became an independent republic in the British Commonwealth of Nations.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. The first Seventh-day Adventist to visit Singapore may have been Abram La Rue, who is reported to have been there sometime between 1888 and 1903. According to the records published by the Mission Board of Seventh-day Adventists in Outline of Mission Fields (1915), the first to bring the SDA teachings to Singapore was H. B. Meyers, an early convert in India, who sold SDA books in English throughout the Malay states about 1900. In 1902 E. H. Gates, one of the pioneer SDA workers in Oceania, wrote in the Review and Herald (79:13, Aug. 19, 1902) that when he passed through Singapore on his way from Sumatra he held the first SDA baptism in the area, baptizing a British soldier in the waters of the China Sea. He urged the establishment of a mission, especially a medical one, in that cosmopolitan city. In 1904 the Australasian Union Conference sent G. F. Jones and his wife, pioneer workers in Oceania, and Robert Caldwell, a colporteur, to open work in Singapore. At the 1906 session of the Australasian Union Conference, the Malaysian Mission, composed of the East Indies (now Indonesia) and Singapore, was organized, with its center at Singapore.

In 1910 the entire field (mainly Singapore, Sumatra, and Java) was transferred from the Australasian Union to the Asiatic Division, and in 1912 the field was organized, with F. A. Detamore as superintendent (called in the Yearbook the Malay Missions, then the Malaysian Mission, later the Malaysian Union Mission). For the next 20 years the Singapore Mission functioned as a local mission, with offices at the same address as the union mission, 12 Dhoby Ghaut, in Singapore. By the end of 1931 the Singapore Mission was merged with the Malay States Mission, with headquarters at Kuala Lumpur. In 1936 the Far Eastern Division office was moved from Baguio, Philippines, to Singapore, where it has been ever since.

The membership increased from about 50 in 1909, when the first church building was erected and dedicated at 5 Penang Road, Singapore, to four churches with a reported membership of 332 in 1932, when the Singapore Mission was merged into the Malay States Mission. The original church building at 5 Penang Road, until 1952, housed three congregations: Chinese, English, and Malay, all meeting at different hours each Sabbath. The building was temporarily used as a Health and Welfare Center, until the land was reclaimed by the government and the building torn down about 1970.

Because of its separation from the Seventh-day Adventist Church of West Malaysia and Singapore (WMSM) on Jan. 1, 1988, the Seventh-day Adventist Mission of Singapore was officially formed, with its headquarters at 90 Jurong East St. 13, Singapore 2260. A church with office building that houses the mission office, the kindergarten, the Jurong English church, and the Jurong Chinese church was completed in 1986.

In 1915 Singapore Training School (now Southeast Asia Union College/Southeast Asia Adventist Seminary) was founded; in 1917 a publishing house was begun (see Southeast Asia Publishing House). Until 1928 the training school and publishing house in Singapore served the East Indies (Indonesia) field as well as Southeast Asia. In 1948 medical work was begun (see Youngberg Adventist Hospital).

The Far Eastern Division has headquarters in Singapore at 800 Thomson Road. The division compound includes the headquarters office, dwellings for workers, and the Far Eastern Academy, a coeducational boarding high school for overseas workers' children of the Far Eastern Division and the Southern Asia Division.

There are eight organized churches and one company on the island of Singapore: Balestier Road, Chuan Hoe, Dunman Road, Jurong Chinese, Jurong English, Southeast Asia Union College, Thomson Road Chinese, Youngberg, and the Tamil Company.

Singapore San Yu High School

SINGAPORE SAN YU HIGH SCHOOL. A coeducational day school operated by the Singapore Chinese church as a mission school under the guidance of the Singapore Mission, Southeast Asia Union Mission, and Far Eastern Division. The school currently offers secondary 1, 2, 3, and 4, after which the students take the GCE “O” level examination. If they pass the examination, they can continue on in the pre-university classes 1, 2, and 3, then sit for the GCE “A” level examination.

The Singapore San Yu High School was registered with the Ministry of Education in December 1957. The pre-university program in the arts stream was recognized in January of 1970. In addition, the commercial stream in the pre-university level was granted recognition in January of 1980.

In 1978 a four-story classroom building was built. During 1985 the school expanded, with the addition of another four-story classroom building.

The total student enrollment is about 370 each year, with a faculty of four administrators, 11 full-time teachers, and eight part-time teachers.

Most of the students are of Chinese origin, but other ethnic groups are present from India, Thailand, Malaysia, and Indonesia. English is the medium of instruction, with Chinese being offered as a second language.

Skodsborg Physiotherapy School

SKODSBORG PHYSIOTHERAPY SCHOOL. An institution earlier owned and operated by Skodsborg Badesanatorium, now a self-supporting institution in cooperation with the Danish Union of Churches.

The school offers a four-year graduate program of physical therapy and has a capacity of about 100 students. Most of the students come from Scandinavian countries, but other countries have been represented.

The educational program has changed radically through the years, and Skodsborg Physiotherapy School is now an integral part of the Danish Physiotherapy Program and is under the supervision of the ministries of Health and Education. It is also a member of the World Association of Physical Therapy.

Thirty teachers and instructors are connected with the school. The entrance qualification is a student examination equal to a university entrance examination.

Nearly 2,000 physiotherapists have been trained at the Skodsborg Physiotherapy School since its establishment in 1898. Many of these have served as missionaries. Others have established private rehabilitation clinics in Scandinavia. Many Skodsborg graduates are holding responsible positions in public hospitals.

Skodsborg Sanitarium

SKODSBORG SANITARIUM (Skodsborg Badensanatorium). A pioneer Seventh-day Adventist medical institution at Skodsborg, a suburb of Copenhagen, Denmark. It was originally owned and operated by the Seventh-day Adventist Church. The institution is still being operated as a medical center under the name Ny Skodsborg Sanatorium, but it no longer belongs to Seventh-day Adventists. The Skodsborg Physiotherapy School, however, is still operating on the premises as a self-supporting institution in cooperation with the SDA church.

The sanitarium was opened in 1898 by Carl Ottosen, M.D., a Danish physician inspired by J. H. Kellogg at the Battle Creek Sanitarium. Some of the original plant at Skodsborg had been built by King Frederik VII. Here between Oeresund and the beechwood forest the patients could rest peacefully while treated with hydrotherapy, massage, and special diet. The institution opened with 20 patients and had reached a capacity of 260 when it was sold.

The Skodsborg Sanitarium has been the inspiration for 10 subsequent sanitariums and hospitals in northern Europe. Through its graduated physiotherapists it has become the mother institution of numerous physiotherapy clinics, many of which are privately owned.

Medical Directors: Carl Ottosen, 1898—1937; A. Andersen, 1937—1958; Eskild Hansen, 1958—1971; Axel Milholt, 1971—1977; Roland Nielsen, 1977—1981; Uffe Jorgensen, 1982—1986; Allan Wiik, 1986—1990; Uffe Jorgensen, 1990—1992.

Administrators: Carl Ottosen, 1898—1937; Chr. Hansen, 1937—1948; H. Westerlund, 1948—1970; A. Falk Nielsen, 1970—1975; Johannes Pedersen, 1975—1978; Bjorn Kofoed, 1978—1982; Reijo Rouhe, 1982—1985; A. Falk Nielsen, 1985—1989; Bent Nielsen, 1989—1992.

Skogli Health and Rehabilitation Center

SKOGLI HEALTH AND REHABILITATION CENTER (Skogli Helse-og Rehabiliteringssenter). A 150-bed medical institution situated near Lillehammer, a town in the south-central part of Norway. It has full-time physicians, 20 physiotherapists, and 85 other workers.

The institution was established in 1946 with the purchase of two wooden buildings that had been used as a recreation home. In 1951 a two-story building for the staff was completed. Other additions to the plant were made in 1952, 1958, 1968, and 1979. There are modern rooms for physical therapy and exercise, a swimming pool, and other facilities.

In 1974 a new church was built, with a seating capacity of 300. The original capacity of the institution was 25 beds. The daily average occupancy during 1992 was 148 inpatients.

Slade, Edwin K.

SLADE, EDWIN K. (1865—1952). Conference administrator. After being manager of the Chicago city mission, then an evangelist in Michigan, he was president of the East Michigan Conference (1905—1912). He then held administrative positions in the Ohio (1911—1918) and West Michigan (1919) conferences. He was president of the Atlantic Union Conference (1919—1931) and of the North Pacific Union Conference (1931—1939).

Slovakia

SLOVAKIA. A country in central east Europe, bounded on the north by Poland, on the east by Ukraine, on the south by Hungary, and on the west by the Czech Republic. It has a territory of 18,867 square miles (48,866 square kilometers) and a population (1994) of 5.4 million. Ethnically, 85 percent are Slovaks and 15 percent are Hungarians, Poles, and Ukrainians. Sixty-four percent of the people belong to the Roman Catholic Church; 26 percent are Protestant, Orthodox, and Jewish; and 10 percent are unchurched. The capital city is Bratislava.

The Slavs in the territory of present Slovakia (former Czechoslovakia) had established a great empire by the ninth century. About that time Christianity was introduced there by the Greek missionaries Cyril and Methodius, who not only preached but also gave the Slavs their written alphabet, the Cyrillic, and translated a large portion of the Holy Scriptures into the language of old Slavs. Control by the Roman Catholic Church eventually caused the adoption of Latin script in Slovakia, but the Cyrillic was retained as the script of the countries of Russia, Bulgaria, and Serbia.

From the tenth century the combined pressure of Magyars and Germans gradually eroded the Slavic state, and Slovakia was dominated for almost 10 centuries by the Magyars (Hungarians). After the First World War, Slovakia, together with the ancient Czech principalities (Bohemia, Moravia, and part of Silesia) formed the Republic of Czechoslovakia. Following political changes in central and Eastern Europe at the beginning of the nineties, the former Czechoslovakia split into two independent states, and Slovakia (the Slovakian Republic) was constituted in 1993.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. The territory of Slovakia constitutes the Slovakian Conference, which is a part of the Czecho-Slovakian Union Conference, which is in turn a part of the Euro-Africa Division. Statistics (1992) for Slovakian Conference: churches, 38; members, 1,867; ordained ministers, 9; licensed ministers, 3; Bible instructors, 3. Headquarters: Bratislava.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. The work in Slovakia began in 1904 when a number of Slovaks who had become Seventh-day Adventists in America returned to their homeland and shared their faith with their neighbors. At first the adherents were mostly of Hungarian or German origin, but gradually native Slovaks also responded to the message of these witnessing Adventists. Many Slovak young people who were trained in the school in Lodenice became efficient workers in their homeland.

In 1919 the Slovakian mission was organized as a part of the then-newly organized Czechoslovakian Union Conference. In 1968, after the reorganization of the union, the Slovakian Conference was formed.

Slovenia

SLOVENIA. A republic located in southeastern Europe whose neighbors include Italy, Austria, Hungary, and Croatia. It has an area of 7,821 square miles (20,250 square kilometers), and a population (1994) of just under 2 million. The principal languages are Slovenian and Serbo-Croatian; the religion is predominantly Roman Catholic.

For more than 600 years Slovenia was under Austrian rule. In 1918 Slovenia became part of the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, which became Yugoslavia in 1929. Slovenia declared independence from Yugoslavia in 1991.

Smith, Annie Rebekah

SMITH, ANNIE REBEKAH (1828—1855). Poet and editorial assistant. At the early age of 10 she joined the Baptist Church, and became a Seventh-day Adventist in 1844. She had to give up teaching in 1850 because of eye trouble. In 1851, while attending a meeting conducted by Joseph Bates, she was convinced of the Seventh-day Adventist faith. After she sent a poem, “Fear Not, Little Flock,” to the Review and Herald, White employed her. She read proof, edited copy, and had charge in White’s absence.

In November of 1854 she was stricken with tuberculosis, which took her life the following July. She wrote many poems; 10 of her hymns appear in the Church Hymnal.

Concerning one of them, “The Blessed Hope” (no. 371), Seventh-day Adventist tradition has it that the first stanza refers to Joseph Bates, the second to James White, and the third to either J. N. Andrews or Annie’s brother, Uriah. Yet Smith was not yet an SDA when the poem was published (August 1852); and Andrews could not have “honor, pleasure, wealth resigned”—only the prospect of acquiring them (he chose the SDA work instead of accepting his relatives’ offer to put him through college). Nearly a century later an acquaintance of the Smiths said that the third stanza referred to Annie herself (see A. W. Spalding, Origin and History of Seventh-day Adventists, vol. 1, p. 404). The personal application, if any, of all three stanzas is uncertain; considerable poetic hyperbole would have to be assumed to apply the terms to any of those to whom they have been traditionally applied.

Smith, Uriah

SMITH, URIAH (1832—1903). Editor and author, who gave 50 years of service to the Seventh-day Adventist cause. He was born in West Wilton, New Hampshire, and was impressed in childhood by the Advent movement of 1843—1844. When about 13 years of age, because of an infection, his left leg was amputated above the knee.

From 1848 to 1851 he attended Phillips Exeter Academy, then declined an attractive invitation to teach in Mount Vernon Academy, New Hampshire. In the hope of earning money to attend college, he worked briefly in a business that soon failed. In 1857 he married Harriet Newall Stevens. About the end of 1852 he became a Sabbathkeeping Adventist. His first contribution to SDA literature was a 35,000-word poem, entitled “The Warning Voice of Time and Prophecy.” It was being published as a serial in the Review and Herald in 1853 when he joined his sister, Annie, as a worker at the office of the Advent Review and Sabbath Herald in Rochester, New York. He maintained an almost unbroken connection with the institution until the time of his death.

In 1855 the Review and Herald moved to Battle Creek, Michigan, and that same year, when Smith was 23 years of age, his name appeared for the first time as editor. In the first number printed in Battle Creek he wrote: “I do not enter upon this position for ease, comfort, or worldly profit; for I have seen by my connection with the Review thus far, that neither of these is to be found here.” The primitive equipment in use would have daunted a lesser spirit. In helping prepare the first tracts he used a straightedge and a pocketknife to trim the edges. “We blistered our hands in the operation, and often the tracts in form were not half so true and square as the doctrines they taught.”

In the early years severe financial problems faced the youthful editor, but he managed so well that the Review and Herald flourished and grew. Since for a time Smith was editor, proofreader, business manager, and bookkeeper, he found his physical resources taxed to the limit. As a result, in 1869 he was given a year’s leave to recuperate, and J. N. Andrews edited the paper during his absence. The next year James White was elected editor, with Smith as associate, but 12 months later Smith was again editor. In 1873, following a disagreement with White over administrative policies, he was relieved of his editorship. He left Battle Creek and worked at his trade as an engraver, but in six months Smith was recalled to his former office, and a cordial relationship between the two men was reestablished and maintained from then on.

Smith had considerable mechanical aptitude. Because his artificial leg gave him insufficient freedom of movement, he patented in 1863 an improved model with fully flexible knee and ankle joints. In 1874 he patented a school desk with an improved folding seat. For this he received $3,000, which enabled him to build a new home. He served as treasurer of the General Conference in 1876—1877.

By 1890, with competent editorial help, he was able to devote more time to writing. He traveled extensively, speaking frequently at camp meetings. In 1894 he visited many European countries and the Near East. Alonzo T. Jones was made editor of the Review and Herald in 1897, with Smith as an associate; but once again Smith returned as editor in 1901.

In addition to his editorial duties, he assumed other responsibilities. He was the first secretary of the General Conference (organized 1863) and held that position on five different occasions. He was also an instructor in Bible at Battle Creek College for many years.

Smith taught the semi-Arian view held by Joseph Bates, James White, and certain others, and denied the personality of the Holy Spirit. His views on certain aspects of the law placed him in opposition to E. J. Waggoner, A. T. Jones, and others in 1888. At times his relations with Ellen White were strained to the point where he questioned the nature of her visions and made a distinction between her “testimonies” and her “visions.” After 1888, when she supported the new emphasis on righteousness by faith, he even declined to accept some of her counsels to him. Smith opposed the new trend during this period, thinking that the sanctity of the law of God was being imperiled by the place given to faith and grace. In 1891 Smith admitted his wrong attitude, and harmony was again restored. Never at any time had he considered giving up his beliefs, nor had Mrs. White at any time thought of him as unfit for his office. She always held him and his work in high esteem. It is of interest that while the discussion was in progress, he reported impartially the views of Waggoner, Jones, and Ellen White. Some of his editorials, however, were sharply pointed.

Smith was one of the most fluent writers the denomination has had. In debate his pen could be incisive. His talent for satire often found expression when he dealt with fanaticism, faultfinding, and extremes in health and dress reform. In his later years his writing became more mellow and meditative, with a fine sense of form and words. Although a creative writer, he also borrowed from contemporary and early expositors for his materials, especially in his interpretations of prophecy.

He is best remembered for his book generally known by the short title Daniel and the Revelation. It received the warm endorsement of Ellen White and had an unrivaled influence on Seventh-day Adventist prophetic teaching. Thoughts, Critical and Practical, on the Book of Revelation was published in 1867, and Thoughts, Critical and Practical, on the Book of Daniel, in 1873. These books, combined in one volume, were first sold by George King, thus marking the beginning of the sale of doctrinal subscription books in the colporteur work of the Seventh-day Adventist Church. This work, now entitled The Prophecies of Daniel and the Revelation, was revised several times during Smith’s lifetime and later, and still has a wide circulation. Among his other works are The United States in Prophecy (later rewritten as Marvel of the Nations), Here and Hereafter, and Looking Unto Jesus.

Smith strongly urged the separation of church and state, advocated noncombatancy, vigorously opposed slavery, did not approve of SDAs seeking political office, and campaigned tirelessly against Sunday laws.

Smith was a handsome man of charming manner, more powerful in pen than in speech. The last words he ever wrote, directed to the General Conference in 1903, epitomize his lifelong purpose: “I am with you in the endeavor to send forth in this generation this gospel of the kingdom, for a witness to all nations. And when this is completed, it will be the signal for the coronation of our coming King.”

Smith, William Robert

SMITH, WILLIAM ROBERT (1876—1967). Missionary. Born near Howard, Kansas, into a family of 10 children, he completed the ministerial course at Walla Walla College in 1900 and began work in the Upper Columbia Conference. He married Addie Carnahan in 1903, and in 1905 the couple with their 9-month-old daughter set sail for Korea, the first Seventh-day Adventist missionaries to that country. They stayed for 20 years, with Smith serving in many capacities. He was instrumental in starting the Soonan Euimyung School (predecessor of Korean Sahmyook University), the Korean Publishing House, the Korean Mission, and many churches, crossing and recrossing Korea and Western Manchuria on foot, bicycle, and sometimes on pony.

Smoke Signals

SMOKE SIGNALS. A former monthly journal published by Pacific Press for Narcotics Education, Inc. Its aim was to help interpret in a popularized way the extensive current research on tobacco and to encourage healthful living in the light of today's findings. Especially effective was the frequent personal stories of those who had quit the smoking habit, also the appeal to teenagers of many of its articles.

A quarterly until January 1963, it was first issued in response to the need for a regular periodical on smoking to follow the release of the anti-tobacco film One in 20,000. In addition to its general circulation, it was widely used in local and state fairs in connection with the showing of anti-tobacco films and in connection with the Five-Day Plan to Stop Smoking. It attracted considerable attention across the nation as an educational aid in school programs to discourage smoking.

An edition was produced for the South Pacific Division. Special issues were brought out in Spanish, French, German, Portuguese, and other languages.

Smyrna Hospital

SMYRNA HOSPITAL. A 100-bed acute-care hospital operated by Adventist Health System/Sunbelt in Smyrna, Georgia. The hospital is located in the suburbs of Atlanta. Established in 1974 by a group of physicians, Smyrna Hospital became part of Adventist Health System/Sunbelt in 1976.

The 88-bed acute-care medical-surgical and 12-bed skilled nursing facility offers many of the sophisticated medical procedures usually found in larger hospitals. The medical staff of nearly 200 includes a wide variety of specialties such as orthopedics, internal medicine, cardiology, otolaryngology, pulmonology, and many surgical subspecialties.

Specialized centers of care include the area's first hospital-based skilled nursing facility, a sinus center, podiatry services, and an occupational medicine program. Smyrna Hospital is a local leader in cataract surgeries and lens implants.

Snow, Charles Miles

SNOW, CHARLES MILES (1868—1933). Editor. Educated at South Lancaster Academy, he became private secretary to the president of the California Conference in 1892. He later joined the editorial staff of the Signs of the Times, continuing in that office until 1906, when he became an associate editor of the Review and Herald. In 1909 he assumed the editorship of Liberty magazine.

He was called to Australia in 1915 to take the editorship of the Australian Signs of the Times and also of Life and Health. Besides numerous articles and poems, he wrote two books, Religious Liberty in America and On the Throne of Sin.

Snow, Samuel S.

SNOW, SAMUEL S. (1806—1870). A Congregationalist, then a skeptic, later a Millerite minister; initiator of the “seventh-month movement.” Beginning with an article written Feb. 16, 1843, he emphasized the tenth day of the Jewish seventh month, Tishri, the Jewish Day of Atonement, as the true ending date of the prophetic 2300 years. Later he set forth the specific day as Oct. 22, 1844, our calendar equivalent of the tenth day of the seventh month in that year according to the old Karaite Jewish calendar. At first there was but little interest or response, but when Snow preached on July 21 in the large Boston Tabernacle on the text “Behold, the bridegroom cometh [on the tenth day of the seventh month]; go ye out to meet him,” some began to be roused.

Then soon after, at a large camp meeting held at Exeter, New Hampshire, Aug. 12-17, Snow’s presentation was wholeheartedly received. But the prominent leaders elsewhere regarded his message with marked reserve. Nevertheless, the “seventh month” message spread with seemingly irresistible power.

Snow published the True Midnight Cry (four pages) at Haverhill, Massachusetts, on Aug. 22. It was filled with brief but convincing arguments. His preaching of the “definite time” was soon taken up by hundreds of Millerite preachers, while Snow himself lectured continuously throughout the East. One by one the outstanding leaders joined in the swelling chorus.

In common with all Adventists, Snow was deeply disappointed in the failure of the Bridegroom to descend from heaven on Oct. 22. For a brief time he questioned as to whether a mistake had been made in the prophetic reckoning of the year.

However, he soon began to preach strange doctrines and published a paper, the Jubilee Standard, from March to August 1845. Sharp conflicts developed between him and the Millerites, as he went on into extreme fanaticism and finally proclaimed himself to be Elijah the prophet. He soon separated himself from Adventism in every form.

Snyder, Elwin Winthrop

SNYDER, ELWIN WINTHROP (1865—1919). Pioneer Seventh-day Adventist missionary-colporteur in Argentina, Brazil, Uruguay, Paraguay, and Cuba. He grew up in an SDA home and at the age of 19 became a canvasser and Bible instructor in the New England Conference. Four years later, in 1888, he was placed in charge of the colporteur work in Pennsylvania. In 1891 he led the first group of SDA colporteurs to South America and began work first in Argentina, then in Brazil and Uruguay. In 1895 he married Estelle Jane Ketring. In 1900 when no ordained minister was available to go to Paraguay, he was ordained and sent there. Upon returning to Argentina, he took charge of the mission office in Buenos Aires. A few years later, in 1905, he organized the SDA mission work in Cuba, where he remained until the tropical climate undermined his health, making it necessary for him in 1912 to return to the United States. Going to California, he took charge of the work among the Mexican people in the Los Angeles area and later attempted to resume pastoral work in Georgia, but an attack of influenza took his life.

Soamanandrarinny Adventist Secondary School

SOAMANANDRARINY ADVENTIST SECONDARY SCHOOL (Collège Adventiste de Soamanandrarinny). A coeducational boarding school on the junior college level operated by the Indian Ocean Union Mission on a 107-acre (43-hectare) site at Soamanandrarinny, four miles (six kilometers) from Antananarivo, the capital of the republic of Madagascar. The total enrollment is 600, one third of this being on the primary school level. The total teaching staff is 21. The secondary teaching follows the pattern of the system established in 1972. Since 1992 classes have been taught in French.

Studies toward an official teaching certificate and courses leading to the baccalaureate diploma, which gives its possessor entrance to the university, are available on the campus, as well as a training course for future evangelists. Plans are being laid to provide for future workers a more thorough preparation on biblical and religious matters at the level of the second cycle.

A forerunner of the school was a Bible course organized in 1935 by Roger Guenin and H. L. Henriksen. The property at Soamanandrarinny was bought in 1938, and after the first school building had been constructed, M. J. Bureaud established the Indian Ocean Union Training School. In 1946 the women's boarding unit was built; in 1947 a carpenter shop was constructed; in 1948 a farm was added; and in 1949 a printshop, which is now the Imprimerie Adventiste. In 1952 the French government donated about $10,000 to enlarge and equip the carpenter shop. A special offering raised by the MV Societies made possible the construction of a chapel seating 1,200, and additional classrooms (1956—1958).

Efforts have been made to enlarge progressively the facilities on the campus in an effort to meet the growing needs of the institution. These include the construction of a commodious dining room, a building that houses the library and an adjacent reading room, a laboratory and a spacious classroom, and a greatly enlarged dormitory for the men, much of the cost of the latter coming from the French government through the Help and Cooperation Funds Organization. The other facilities were made possible through the worldwide generosity of the Seventh-day Adventist brotherhood.

Principals: M. J. Bureaud, 1938—1939; Werner Ruf, 1939—1946; J. R. Zürcher, 1946—1951; Henri Long, 1952—1953; J. R. Solomon Islands

SOLOMON ISLANDS. A group of volcanic and coral islands in the southwestern Pacific Ocean lying east of Papua New Guinea. The largest islands are San Cristobal, Malaita, Guadalcanal, Santa Isabel, New Georgia, Kolombangara, Vella Lavella, and Choiseul. The total area is about 11,500 square miles (29,800 square kilometers), and the population (1994) is 386,000.

The climate is hot and humid; the large islands are covered with tropical rain forests and abound in birds. Wild dogs, pigs, rats, and large crocodiles are found among the animals. The islanders grow bananas, breadfruit, coconut, taro, and yams for food, and earn cash by selling copra. The people—for the most part Melanesians, with some Micronesians and Polynesians—speak some 40 different languages and dialects. They use pidgin English as their common speech, and the use of simple English is encouraged. Formerly the inhabitants were headhunters and cannibals, but Christian missions have been working among the islanders since the nineteenth century.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. Pioneer SDA missionaries to the islands were G. F. Jones and his wife, sent by the mission board of Australasia. Landing on the island of Gizo on May 29, 1914, Jones obtained a local crew for his auxiliary ketch, the Advent Herald, and sailed for Viru on the west coast of New Georgia, where he established headquarters of the mission work and opened a school. In January 1915 O. V. Hellestrand arrived, and in April of the same year D. Nicholson and his wife came to work on the island of Gatukai, where there were 200 inhabitants. In December David H. Gray came to Marovo Lagoon. In 1917 Nicholson opened work on Telina, and S. R. Maunder and his wife went to Ughele, Rendova. Also in 1917 a larger vessel, the Melanesia, built in Sydney, brought R. H. Tutty, J. Radley, D. Woolston, and W. G. Mitchell. Soon after this a church was organized in the islands, at first composed of the 10 Europeans. In 1918 Tutty began work at Dovel, on the northern side of Vella Lavella Island.

In 1920 mission work was opened on the island of Ronongo by a national evangelist by the name of Pana. His converts numbered 200 within the first year and 300 within two years, which represented nearly all the islanders.

Also in 1920 the headquarters were moved to Telina, a small island off the New Georgia shore, and Jones was succeeded by H.B.P. Wicks as superintendent of the mission. By that time there were five central stations and 17 outstations, with a Sabbath school membership of more than 1,100 in the Solomon Islands group. A church was organized on Telina in 1923.

In 1921 a national worker, Jugha by name, pioneered on the island of Choiseul, and worked alone until a European worker arrived seven years later. By 1932, 160 converts had been baptized and more than 500 were attending church services.

In 1922 a printing press was established in the Solomon Islands to prepare publications in the languages of the people, with a complete printing unit donated by the Signs Publishing Company of Australia.

In 1924 J. D. Anderson and his wife went to Malaita Island, the first SDAs to work there. To train indigenous workers, a school was established at Batuna, on the island of Vangunu, under the principalship of A. R. Barrett, and was named Batuna Training School. Headquarters of the work were established on the school site. The printing press at Batuna published the Gospel of John and a set of hymns in the Marovo language. In 1924 R. H. Tutty and two evangelists, Nano and Rongapitu, both Solomon Islanders, sailed on the mission ship Melanesia to Lavilai, on Bougainville, and established a station there.

Two years later, in 1926, in response to a call for a teacher from the village of Talisi, on the south coast of the island of Guadalcanal, the evangelist Jugha began Seventh-day Adventist work. He carried on by himself for about six years, until 1932, when N. A. Ferris came. Within 14 years after Jugha's arrival on Guadalcanal there were some 600 converts.

In 1927 A. J. Campbell worked for some months on the island of Bougainville. The next year the first two local converts were baptized there.

In 1929 the first Solomon Islanders went outside the archipelago as evangelists. Two teachers, Oti and Salau, began work on the island of New Britain, in the Bismarck archipelago. In the Solomons two Sabbath schools were opened near Inus, on the northern side of Bougainville, by David H. Gray and eventually left in the charge of national evangelists.

A year later, in 1930, the island of Santa Isabel saw the first SDA workers, two national teachers, but apparently the work there was not continuous, for it was reported later, in 1939, to have been reopened. Also in 1930 stations were opened at Cherovai, Rarutue, and Rumba. At the last-named station, situated on the island of Bougainville, some 45 miles (70 kilometers) from Inus, Gray established a school in 1936, with H. R. Hiscox as teacher. Its graduates later went as missionaries to other islands and to New Guinea.

In 1937 the island of Kolombangara was entered, and in the same year the Amyes Memorial Hospital was established there, with Dr. E. W. Finkle, of Canada, as superintendent. On Bougainville another station was opened at Kobum, about three miles from Inus.

Some of the islands in the area were closed to missionary penetration by government regulations, but on two of them, Rennell and Bellona, a national, Moa by name, carried on work without appointment by the SDA mission, gathering about 80 converts, according to the first report in 1940. During that year also, three national teachers went to the island of San Cristobal.

The Japanese invasion (1942—1945) hindered the progress of the mission work, but did not stop it. National workers, under the leadership of Kata Rangoso, carried on until in 1946 the European missionaries returned.

In 1950 Seventh-day Adventists began working on the island of Buka. Haning and his wife were the first converts there. In 1953 the Bougainville Mission was organized, with C. Pascoe as the leader and a national, Tati, as his assistant. In the mid-1950s the Bougainville Mission led the world church in the offerings-to-tithe ratio.

After the war, in 1949, the work in the Solomon Islands came first under the direction of the Coral Sea Union Mission, but in 1954 the Bismarck-Solomons Union Mission was organized, embracing the Solomon Islands and the Bismarck Archipelago.

Atoifi Hospital was established on the island of Malaita in 1966, with a bed capacity of 90. During the same year, Brian Dunn, the first expatriate nurse appointed to Atoifi, was fatally speared on the site. Since its opening, the hospital has expanded and now conducts a nurse's training program.

In 1972 the three union missions in the Australasian Division (now the South Pacific Division) were reorganized, Bougainville Mission coming under the direction of the Papua New Guinea Union Mission, and Eastern and Western Solomons and Malaita missions under direction of the Western Pacific Union Mission.

During 1972 to 1974, new administrative headquarters were constructed for the Western Pacific Union Mission at Honiara, and the union staff transferred from Rabaul in 1973.

Solusi Adventist Secondary School

SOLUSI ADVENTIST SECONDARY SCHOOL. A coeducational boarding school operated by the Zambesi Union as a vocational secondary school situated 35 miles (55 kilometers) northwest of Bulawayo in Solusi College Farm east of the college campus. In January 1993 there were 235 students and 17 teachers.

History

History. Formal education started at Solusi Mission when missionaries brought together 30 Matabele children who had survived the famine of 1897. The elementary school developed gradually, and by 1912 the school had 120 students in eight elementary grades. This development necessitated the establishment of a teacher training program in 1933. Junior secondary school classes were first offered in 1948, and by 1954 the teacher training program was moved from Solusi Mission to Lower Gwelo, making way for expansion of the school to senior secondary level. Solusi Adventist Secondary School was replaced by Solusi Adventist Vocational Secondary School in 1992 upon completion of construction of a new campus adjacent to Solusi University. Prior to 1981 Solusi Secondary School was administered by the mission director, who also held the position of college principal.

Headmasters: G. Solomons, 1981—1982; J. Nxumalo, 1983—1984; G. Magee, 1985—1986; S. Ndimande, 1987—1990; J. Nxumalo, 1991— .

Solusi University

SOLUSI UNIVERSITY. An institution of higher learning operated by the Eastern Africa Division. It is situated on a 8,800-acre (3,500-hectare) farm, 32 miles (50 kilometers) west of Bulawayo, Zimbabwe, at an elevation of 4,350 feet (1,300 meters). The constituency of the college is the Eastern Africa Division, and students come from many countries outside the division as well. In 1993 students in the university numbered 355.

Solusi Mission, the site of Solusi University, was established in 1894 on 12,000 acres (4,900 hectares) of land granted by Cecil Rhodes, the prime minister of Cape Colony, to Pieter Wessels and Asa T. Robinson, representing the Seventh-day Adventist Church in Africa, which had raised £500 for the purpose of opening a mission among the Matabele people. July 5, 1894, Pieter Wessels and N. H. Druillard, accompanied by Fred Sparrow, A. Goepf, E. J. Harvey, I. B. Burton, and J. Landesmann, arrived in Bulawayo from Vryburg by ox wagon to select the land and open the station. Dr. Leander Starr Jameson, the administrator of the British South Africa Company in Rhodesia, acting on a letter from Cecil Rhodes, gave the missionaries the privilege of choosing any site they thought suitable. Having selected the land, built some African-style huts, and bought 200 head of cattle, they returned to Cape Town, leaving Fred Sparrow to develop the mission station.

On Jan. 10, 1895, the mission farm was registered with an annual quitrent. A title deed, issued in 1907, stipulated a continued quitrent. At the present time the college pays taxes to the Bulalimamange Rural Council in lieu of quitrent.

During July 1895 a second party of missionaries arrived with their families at the site: G. B. Tripp, superintendent, Dr. A. S. Carmichael, and W. H. Anderson. The work of erecting buildings and planting crops was interrupted in 1896 when the Matabele rebellion forced the missionaries to flee to Bulawayo for protection. Seven months later the missionaries returned to carry forward their interrupted work. The rebellion was followed by an outbreak of rinderpest, which destroyed all the mission cattle, and by a severe famine, during which thousands of Africans died. The missionaries provided for and educated about 30 children whom the famine had left destitute. These formed the nucleus of the first school at Solusi. From this school came the first converts, as well as the first workers, for the Matabele field.

In 1902 the first Seventh-day Adventist mission church in southern Africa was organized at Solusi by G. W. Reaser with a membership of 24.

Malaria was a serious threat in the early days (though virtually unknown today at Solusi). In 1898 five deaths occurred among the White missionaries: Dr. A. S. Carmichael; G. B. Tripp; his son George, age 12; Fred Sparrow's little daughter; and Mrs. Armitage. In 1901 F. L. Mead died while traveling to attend meetings at the Cape.

The elementary school, which began with about 30 pupils in 1897, had an enrollment of 120 by 1912. In 1933 teacher training was introduced, and the school took the name of Solusi Training School. Secondary schoolwork was first offered in 1948, and pupils were thereafter entered for external examinations on the junior and senior high school levels. In 1954 the name of the school was changed to Solusi Missionary College. In 1952 all the teacher training work was transferred to Lower Gwelo. Classes in shorthand, typing, and bookkeeping were introduced in 1960. At the beginning of 1958, when four men enrolled in a four-year theological course and three in a tutorial course leading to the examination for a B.A. degree from the University of South Africa, Solusi became the only private college in the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland to offer postsecondary school courses.

Farming began early under Fred Sparrow, with butter, eggs, maize, and peanuts as the main produce. In 1910 Solusi gave back to the government about 4,000 acres (1,600 hectares) in exchange for an equal amount of land near Umtali, on which Inyazura Station now stands. By 1912 Solusi had become fully self-supporting and remained so for a number of years. As many as a thousand bags of maize were raised in a single year.

The first buildings were the usual mud-and-pole huts with grass roofs, supplemented by the tents and wagons of the missionaries. By 1920 there were three brick buildings under iron roofing—two houses and a women's dormitory. The young men were still accommodated in huts. A third house, a school hall, and a new dairy with a cool cellar were built by H. M. Sparrow. The first church, a mere hut, was replaced in 1922 by a large hall with two wings. The hall was used for religious and secular gatherings and the wings as classrooms. This building is still in use, but a church seating 1,000 was dedicated at the end of 1960. A substantial classroom and office block, built in 1936 to house the teacher-training classes, is now the secondary school building. There are a new elementary school and a college building (that contains the administrative offices), a large modern kitchen, a dining room seating 450, a well-equipped store, women's and men's residences, a mill for grinding maize, farm buildings, staff houses, cottages for married students, and an electric light and power system.

A seven-mile (11-kilometer) pipeline from Mananda Dam ensures an adequate water supply. Solusi College had abundant water during 1992 when the worst draught in living memory ravaged the southern part of Africa.

In 1969 a business course on the junior college level was added to the college curriculum. In 1984 Solusi was granted an affiliation with Andrews University. Under the affiliation agreement, Andrews University approves the curriculum and faculty, and graduates receive Andrews University degrees.

Somalia

SOMALIA. An East African republic formed in 1960 by the union of former Italian and British Somaliland protectorates. It is situated on the eastern “spur” of Africa facing the Gulf of Aden and the Indian Ocean, and is bordered on its land side by Djibouti, Ethiopia, and Kenya.

The population (1994) of 6.7 million consists mostly of nomadic Somalis of Arabian origin. Languages include Somali, English, Arabic, and Italian.

The ancient Egyptians came to Somalia for incense and aromatic herbs. By the tenth century A.D. Arabs established settlements along the coast. In the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries the Portuguese attempted to colonize the area. In the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries the sultans of Oman and Zanzibar controlled the country, but finally by the end of the nineteenth century the northern part of the area came under British and the eastern part under Italian administration. During World War II the Italian territory fell to the British, and after the war ended, it was administered by Italy under a UN trusteeship agreement.

The territory of Somalia has been assigned to the East African Union Mission in the Eastern Africa Division. By 1992 SDA work has made an impact there through ADRA programs even though the country is predominantly Muslim. Richard and Jean Hall were assigned to work in Somalia by ADRA for six months. Since then a number of ADRA volunteers have been assigned duties there. One lawyer who studied in Frankfurt, Germany, was converted from Islam and now has returned to his homeland to work. He is the only known Somalian Seventh-day Adventist living there.

Songa Adventist Hospital

SONGA ADVENTIST HOSPITAL (Hôpital de Songa et Leproserie). A 120-bed general hospital situated on 1,400 acres (570 hectares) at the Songa Mission, near Kamina and 400 miles (650 kilometers) northwest of Lubumbashi, the capital of the Shaba province of the republic of Zaïre. The hospital, owned and operated by the Zaïre Union Mission, offers care for medical, surgical, and obstetrical patients, and has X-ray and laboratory facilities. Patients with leprosy are treated in a leprosarium.

Mission work among the Baluba people was established in 1921 on a 500-acre (200-hectare) plot at Songa, and medical work began June 8, 1927, with the arrival of Dr. J. H. Sturges and his wife, who treated patients at first on the veranda of their thatch-roofed house. Because of fear and superstition, few patients came, and many village people even fled from their homes. In 1928 Lee Ferguson erected a four-room structure, which remained in use for 30 years, until 1958.

The first nurses to work at Songa were Sybil de Gourville and Lydia Delhove. Sheshetta Monga worked for more than 30 years as a nurse's aide. In 1933 hospital wards and a dispensary built by H.G.S. Pratt were opened, and a maternity unit was opened in 1940. In 1948 Dr. O. Rouhe began a one-year training course for African nurse's aides, which was increased to a two-year course in 1960.

In 1956 Dr. M. H. Schaffner built the administration block containing offices, surgeries, pharmacy, classrooms, and a ward. Resurveyed in 1956, the mission was granted an increase of about 900 acres (365 hectares). A hydraulic ram, installed in 1957, furnishes abundant water for the hospital and mission, ending many years of water carrying by porters. In 1958 new wards and a maternity block were begun.

The leper dispensary was built in 1931, and a leper colony was opened in 1932. This work grew until more than 500 were being treated. A church for the lepers, built by Dr. C. J. Birkenstock, was finished in 1954, but was later destroyed by a storm.

In the last year of normal operations before 1959, the staff included two doctors, two overseas nurses, and 40 other employees. There were 792 major and 694 minor operations, 2,747 admissions, 98,950 outpatients, and 383 lepers under treatment. Because of political unrest in the area, the hospital was closed in December 1961 (except for the dispensary), but was reopened in September 1963.

Although the hospital was reactivated, unrest still prevailed in large areas of the country to the north, preventing the movement of patients from the interior to Songa. A Union Cessna 180 was used occasionally to facilitate medical visits to Bigobo dispensary, but on one occasion medical supplies had to be dropped from the air.

By 1970 the bed capacity was increased to 100. Newly arrived X-ray equipment has strengthened the medical services. A two-year nurse's assistant course was offered. Because of continuing crises and interruptions of service, the General Conference thought of closing the hospital. But in 1985 a Zairian, Dr. Nsugula Nwambayi, was called upon to reorganize medical service until Dr. E. Wilfredo Delgado arrived in October of 1988. Since then the hospital has been gradually reactivated and has gained recognition as a surgical unit in Shaba province.

A new clinic building has been constructed that includes two surgery rooms. New diagnostic and surgical equipment has been acquired, and a solar energy system has been provided by generous donors to provide electricity for the hospital.

In 1987 the nursing school was granted authorization by the state to extend its program to a four-year course. In 1991 the first 22 nurses graduated. In 1993, 110 students were in training.

Songa Institute

SONGA INSTITUTE (Institute de Songa). A teacher training day and boarding school operated by the North Shaba Field in the republic of Zaïre at Songa Mission, about 50 miles (80 kilometers) east of Kamina, and 400 miles (650 kilometers) northwest of Lubumbashi.

Songa (established 1921) was the first Seventh-day Adventist mission station opened in Zaïre. In connection with it, a primary school was operated, from which students went for teacher training to the Séminaire Adventiste du Congo, a training school near Lubumbashi. When the institute moved to Gitwe in Rwanda (see Gitwe Adventist Secondary School) in 1935, the students from Katanga and Songa stations, after having completed the sixth year, went to Gitwe to receive their training. In 1940 G. A. Ellingworth, mission superintendent, reported that at Songa G. Hiten was training teachers for the field (this training was begun in 1938) and that a boarding department had been opened and a small women's school added (South African Division Outlook 26:2, May 1, 1940).

The training school was conducted for a time (1949—1959) at Lulengele, a more central place, and offered secondary work through the tenth year. It is listed in the Yearbook first as the Kasai Training School, then as the Lulengele Training School. In October 1959 the Zaïre Union Committee voted to move the school to Songa. The present school dates from 1960.

Two years of secondary work were offered in addition to six of primary. The third year was added in 1967, but in 1972, because of staffing problems and the development of the school in the Kivu, the program was held to four years of secondary work. A new cafeteria has been completed.

In 1993 the institute was providing a complete curriculum for teacher training (six years of secondary school). The enrollment was 450. The examination results of the students completing the course were excellent. There were 15 teachers on the secondary level and 10 on the primary level.

Sonoma Adventist College

SONOMA ADVENTIST COLLEGE. A coeducational postsecondary training institution serving the Papua New Guinea Union Mission and the Western Pacific Union Mission, situated on 320 acres (130 hectares) of volcanic soil, about 27 miles (44 kilometers) by road southeast of Rabaul, on the island of New Britain.

The college was established on a cocoa plantation purchased for the purpose. It took over the training courses being conducted at Kambubu and Kabiufa, allowing these two schools to concentrate on secondary education.

Much of the construction work was done by a volunteer team of tradespersons from Australia under the direction of R. J. Elliott during the vacation period 1967—1968. Ministerial training began in 1968 under A. S. Currie, and teacher training in 1970 under W. McClintock. A Commerce Department under A. R. Butler was established in 1974.

Principals: M. P. Cozens, 1970—1971; R. K. Wilkinson, 1972—1976; R. Anderson, 1977—1983; W. Bidmead, 1984—1986; M. J. Ward, 1987—1991; E. Pieterse, 1991—1993; R. M. Hobson, 1993— .

Sonora Community Hospital

SONORA COMMUNITY HOSPITAL. A 143-bed general acute-care medical facility at 1 South Forest Road, Sonora, Tuolumne County, California. The institution has 72 active physicians and nearly 500 employees. It serves a population base of more than 50,000. The average daily census in 1992 was 91.9. It has a three-year accreditation granted by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Healthcare Organizations, and is licensed by the state of California.

The hospital dates back to 1900, when it was the Bromley Sanitarium. It became Sonora Hospital in 1910 and was operated by a Dr. Wrigley until 1951. At that time Dr. Ben R. Boice purchased the facility and was joined by Dr. Paul Anspach in 1954. The facility was housed in a three-story building (without an elevator) in downtown Sonora. In 1957 a new single story, 43-bed hospital was opened at its present site on Forest Road. The institution was presented as a gift to the Central California Conference in 1961. Adventist Health Systems/

West assumed ownership and management in 1973. Another local facility, Sierra Hospital, was purchased by Sonora and converted to a birth center. Darwin Remboldt became president in 1980, followed by Stan Berry in 1984. In 1989 Lary A. Davis became president.

The hospital also operates facilities away from its main campus, including Family Medical Centers in Arnold, Groveland, and Twain Harte. It maintains an urgent-care center in east Sonora. Allied health programs include a home oxygen and medical supply business, a day-care center, and physical therapy facilities in two offsite locations. The hospital enjoys a reputation for being both high tech and high touch. This is demonstrated through the development, with physicians, of the Sonora Cancer Center, which contains the area's only linear accelerator. Mobile MRI services are available on campus. The hospital has purchased 22 acres (nine hectares) of property in east Sonora for the development of a replacement facility.

The mission of the hospital is "to provide programs and services that are responsive to the needs of our community, in the spirit of the healing ministry of Christ."

The community is well reminded of the institution's heritage. An active pastoral care program is in place. Through a unique "Town Hall Forum," the hospital maintains contact with Seventh-day Adventist Church members. A closed-circuit television channel provides 3ABN programming 24 hours daily. Church programs are also available on weekends. Through a one-hour Friday evening broadcast on KADV-FM in Modesto, the hospital reaches out with Sound Assurance to a Christian audience. A steering committee regularly reports on ways to integrate mission into all aspects of hospital operations. The hospital has a reputation for aggressively recruiting committed Seventh-day Adventist physicians. Another important aspect of mission is the hospital's intense outreach through health education programming. A full menu of services is available.

Soonan Academy

SOONAN ACADEMY. See Korean Sahmyook University.

Soonan Hospital

SOONAN HOSPITAL. The earliest Seventh-day Adventist medical institution in Korea, opened in 1908 at Sunan, a town about 10 miles (16 kilometers) north of Pyongyang. It was operated by the Korean Union Mission until World War II, but after the war its control was taken over by the government of North Korea.

The first Seventh-day Adventist medical missionary in Sunan was the wife of W. R. Smith. A trained nurse, she treated the sick who came to her home. When the first SDA physician-evangelist, Riley Russell, arrived with his wife in Sunan on Sept. 25, 1908, the sick were waiting for him at the railway station, and he treated his first patients on the porch of the mission house. Later he set up a clinic in a section of the mission school building, situated on a hillside overlooking Sunan. In September 1909 the clinic was moved to the foot of the hill into a 103-year-old thatch-roofed building measuring 8' x 24' (2 m. x 7 m.), which cost only $20. In 1913 a Washington, D.C., newspaper carried a story headed: "Twenty Thousand Patients Treated in a Twenty-Dollar Building!" In 1913 a Thirteenth Sabbath Offering overflow made possible a new brick dispensary building measuring 24' x 36' (7 m. x 11 m.).

Being a minister, Dr. Russell itinerated much among the churches—preaching, distributing tracts, dispensing medicines, treating the sick, and baptizing. During his absences his wife served in the dispensary.

In 1920 the dispensary building was enlarged into a two-story structure so that hospital work could be carried on. The first Korean doctors at Soonan Hospital were K. R. Chang and P. C. Kang; the first Korean nurses were B. H. Kang and C. S. Lee. Other Korean helpers were employed.

After the Russells returned to the United States in 1922, several American physicians, among them H. E. Scoles, Clyde Haysmer, and L. H. Butka, worked intermittently at Sunan until 1929, when Dr. G. H. Rue arrived. Rue was transferred to Seoul in 1931 to begin SDA medical work there, and the work at Sunan was left under the supervision of Korean physicians until 1938, when George G. Innocent arrived at Sunan. After he left in 1940, the medical work in Sunan was again carried on by national doctors with occasional help from Rue. In the course of World War II the hospital was taken away from denominational control and never returned.

Sopas Adventist Hospital

SOPAS ADVENTIST HOSPITAL. An 85-bed general hospital situated at an elevation of 7,300 feet (2,200 meters), five miles (eight kilometers) west of Wabag, Papua New Guinea, one mile (1.6 kilometers) south of the Wabag-Laiagam road. It is owned and operated by the Papua New Guinea Union Mission. The plant consists of a main building housing surgery, sterilizing, X-ray, hydrotherapy and physical therapy facilities, offices, and a store; three wards; an outpatient building; a laboratory and classroom; a building housing a food store, kitchen, boiler room, and laundry; a sawmill and shop; homes for the hospital staff and maintenance person; several homes for indigenous workers and laborers; and a hydroelectric plant, which supplies electricity for the hospital.

The hospital, dedicated Sept. 18, 1963, was built with the funds from the Thirteenth Sabbath Offering overflow for the third quarter of 1960. It has averaged more than 50 inpatients a day, and outpatient visits have run as high as 4,000 a month during epidemics.

In 1963 an extension school of the Division of Public Health and Tropical Medicine of Loma Linda University, headed by Robert Wood, M.D., was opened with 10 students. It offered instruction to teachers, ministers, and other church workers in village hygiene, water conservation and supply, building construction, agriculture, nutrition, general health, physiology, disposal of waste and sewage, better houses, and ventilation. Dr. Wood was director of the public health extension school until 1965 when he was succeeded by Saleem Farag, Ph.D., M.P.H.

Centered at Sopas is an infant and maternal welfare program serving a population of about 20,000.

A School of Nursing offering a three-year course was begun in 1965 and is fully accredited. In 1993 Dorothy B. Bowd, R.N., was the head of the School of Nursing.

Medical Superintendents: Robert Wood, 1965—1969; Charles Hammond, Jr., 1969—1971; Donald Kelly, 1972—1973; Paul Truscott, 1974—1976; H. Driscoll, 1977; H. Rainda, 1978—1981; R. Wat, 1982—1984; K. Nemba, 1985; E. Q. Nailatikau, 1986—1989; J. Wallace, 1990—1991; J. H. Watts, 1992— .

Sorenson, Christian Martin

SORENSEN, CHRISTIAN MARTIN (1874—1965). Teacher and pastor. A native of Denmark, he came to the United States in 1892. He became a Seventh-day Adventist by reading church literature and was in the first graduating class of the academy at Keene, Texas. After his marriage to Hattie White in 1898, he was employed by the Texas Conference. Later he was called as an evangelist to the Oklahoma Conference.

After some university work, he became Bible and history teacher and dean of boys at Keene Academy and also served as principal for a time. In 1911 he moved to Takoma Park, Maryland, to connect with Washington Missionary College. In 1920, after taking advanced work at Columbia and George Washington universities, Elder Sorenson was called as history teacher at Emmanuel Missionary College. In 1932 he joined the faculty of La Sierra College. Then followed 10 years of pastoral work. After 51 years of service, he retired from active denominational work.

Soul

SOUL. The Hebrew and Greek terms translated “soul” have several shades of meaning. An early occurrence of the Heb. nephesh is in Genesis 2:7: “The Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath [neshamah] of life; and man became a living soul [nephesh].” “Soul” is the most common translation of the Heb. nephesh (from naphash, “to breathe”) and of the Gr. psyche. Inasmuch as breath is the most conspicuous evidence of life, nephesh basically designates man as a living being, a person. In this sense man is a soul, as for example, in Num. 19:18, where the plural of nephesh is translated “persons.”

Frequently nephesh means “life” (1 Sam. 20:1; 22:23; 1 Kings 3:11; etc.) and is so translated in the KJV 119 times. Commonly, nephesh is used in place of the personal pronoun, meaning “I,” “you,” “he,” etc. (1 Kings 20:32, “me”; and Jer. 17:21, “yourselves”; etc.). Nephesh is also applied to animals (Gen. 1:20, 21, 24, translated “creature”; etc.). In the NT the Greek word psychē (“soul”) has a similar meaning, although often stressing the conscious self or personality.

Neither nephesh nor psychē connotes an immaterial, immortal entity or part of humanity capable of independent, conscious existence apart from the body. At death an individual ceases to be “a living soul.” The “spirit” (Heb. rûach) returns to God, who gave it (Eccl. 12:7; see Spirit). “In that very day his thoughts perish” (Ps. 146:4). Conscious existence ceases at death, for “the dead know not any thing” (Eccl. 9:5).

The concept of an immortal soul surviving at the time of death as a sentient, intelligent spirit being with an existence separate from the body entered Jewish thought during the intertestamental period through the influence of Greek philosophy. During the first three centuries after Christ, Christian theologians adopted the idea from the same source, especially from Plato. According to the Greek historian Herodotus, the Greeks borrowed this concept from the Egyptians (History of the Persian Wars 2. 123).

This wholly pagan concept eventually replaced the original biblical meaning of nephesh and psyche so completely as to impregnate these terms with an import wholly foreign to that set forth by the Bible writers. This popular concept is the basis for various nonbiblical doctrines, such as the idea that at death men go to heaven, purgatory, or hell, and that the wicked are to be consigned to an eternally burning hell.

The Scriptures teach that God “only hath immortality” (1 Tim. 6:16), that humans can attain to immortality only in Christ (John 3:16; 2 Tim. 1:10), that humans receive title to this gift when they accept Christ (1 John 5:10—12), and that immortality will be bestowed upon all the saved simultaneously at the resurrection and the second coming of Christ (Rom. 2:7, 8; 1 Cor. 15:20—26, 51—54).

From the first, Seventh-day Adventists have rejected the pagan concept of the natural immortality of the soul, together with the doctrines derived from it and based upon it. (See Death; Eternal Life; Immortality; Resurrection; Spirit.)

South Africa, Republic of SOUTH AFRICA, REPUBLIC OF. An independent republic occupying the most southerly part of Africa. The country is bounded on the north by Namibia, Botswana, Zimbabwe, and Mozambique; on the west by the Atlantic Ocean; and on the south and east by the Indian Ocean. The area is 472,359 square miles (1,223,420 square kilometers), with a heterogenous population (1994) of 44 million. The main languages include Afrikaans, English, Ndebele, North Sesotho, South Sesotho, Sauzi, Tsonga, Tswana, Venda, Xhosa, and Zulu. The main churches are Dutch Reformed, Anglican, Roman Catholic, Islamic, Hindu, Black Independent, Presbyterian, and Apostolic groups.

South Africa, the most highly industrialized country in Africa, produces a large assortment of various manufactures. Mining likewise holds an important place in the national economy, for it is on mineral exports (gold, diamonds, uranium, manganese, iron, and coal) that South Africa's prosperity is founded. Agriculture makes up a third important segment of the South African economy. The country produces large quantities of maize, sugar, wheat, and fruit.

The administrative capital is Pretoria, in the Transvaal; the legislature meets in Cape Town, and the Supreme Court in Bloemfontein. Other important cities are Johannesburg, Durban, Port Elizabeth, East London, and Kimberley.

The earliest European colonists to settle in South Africa were the Dutch, who established a settlement at the Cape of Good Hope in 1652. After the country became a British possession in 1814, British immigration began. In 1910 the country became a self-governing dominion as part of the British Empire and was known as the Union of South Africa. In 1961 a republic was established. In the early 1990s South Africa repealed the last of its apartheid laws and extended voting rights to all races. A new constitution created the provinces of Eastern Cape, Eastern Transvaal, Kwazulu-Natal, Northern Cape, Northern Transvaal, North-West, Orange Free State, Pretoria-Witwatersrand-Vereeniging, and Western Cape.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. The territory of the republic of South Africa consists of the Cape, Good Hope, Kwazulu-Natal Free State, Southern, Trans-Orange, and Transvaal conferences, which are part of the southern Africa Union, an attached field of the General Conference. Statistics (1992) for South Africa: churches, 476; members, 53,681; elementary schools, 17; ordained ministers, 156; credentialed missionaries, 291; licensed ministers, 71; licensed missionaries, 243. Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. The first Seventh-day Adventist in South Africa was William Hunt, a miner from Nevada who had arrived on the diamond diggings in Griqualand West, bringing with him a supply of tracts and papers, which he began to distribute. As early as 1878 Hunt had convinced some South Africans that SDAs were correct in their interpretation of the Scriptures, and one of these interested people, J.H.G. Wilson, wrote a letter to the Review and Herald in which he spoke of reading copies of the Signs of the Times that led him to acknowledge that “the truth is with you; and I have, since that time, taken a stand for the truth, and am determined, with the help and blessing of God, to keep all His commandments.” Nothing more is known of Wilson, and whether he became a member of the Seventh-day Adventist Church is uncertain.

People ridiculed Hunt. One day in 1885 G. J. Van Druten, a Beaconsfield businessman, while driving through the town with his wife in their horse-drawn buggy, passed William Hunt walking on the street. Van Druten said, “See that old man? People say that he is lazy because he keeps two Sundays.” His wife replied, “He looks like an old saint to me.” His curiosity aroused, Van Druten visited Hunt in his little backyard room and began to ask questions. When Hunt explained the Sabbath, Van Druten was convinced that it was right and began to keep it.

Also in 1885 a young man by the name of Pieter Wessels began to keep the Sabbath, not knowing of another Protestant in the world who was doing so. He was led to its observance by an interesting series of circumstances. A member of a large rural Dutch family of moderate prosperity, he found himself at the age of 29 in poor health, confined to his bed with a severe attack of what was described as “inflammation of the lungs.” In his affliction his mind turned to the Bible with a longing to know whether God was real and the Bible true. Impressed by the promise in James 5:14, 15, he threw himself on the mercy of God and pleaded for forgiveness and healing. His prayer was miraculously answered. Arising the next morning, he dressed and left the house, eager to tell his parents and the world what God had done for him.

Shortly after this he tried to persuade his brother John, a deacon in the Dutch Reformed Church, that a man ought to rely wholly on God for healing. John contended that the Bible was not to be taken so literally, pointing out that if Pieter really intended to follow the Bible exactly, he would have to keep the Sabbath. When Pieter protested that he was keeping it, John pointed to the calendar, which indicated Sunday was the first, not the seventh, day of the week. Jolted, Pieter began to search the Bible to discover what it taught about the Sabbath. He soon became convinced that he should keep the seventh day holy and began its observance.

Among many whom Pieter Wessels influenced to keep the seventh-day Sabbath was his brother-in-law, Gert J. G. Scholtz. After winning his wife, Scholtz, fired with enthusiasm, went to the Transvaal and discussed the Sabbath with the president of the South Africa Republic, Paul Kruger. Kruger admitted that the Sabbath was right, but claimed that his position made it impossible for him to keep it. Returning to the Free State, Scholtz won two prominent De Beer families, who with their children and grandchildren later served the church with loyalty and devotion. On the farm of Nicholas de Beer, one of these families, diamonds were found, and subsequently the farm was sold to the diamond magnates of Kimberley.

Not long after this, Pieter Wessels and G. J. Van Druten met at Pieter's farm when Annie, the youngest child of Pieter Wessels, was born. As they visited they discovered that both were keeping the seventh-day Sabbath. Van Druten told Wessels about Hunt, and later they went to visit him in his shack on the Wessels farm. Pieter was happy to learn he was not alone, that there were some 30,000 Sabbathkeepers. Eager to increase their knowledge, the two men wrote to the General Conference, requesting that a Dutch minister be sent to teach and baptize them. They enclosed £50 (at that time about $250) to assist in the expense. This was the 1886 "Macedonian call" from South Africa. When the letter was read at the 1886 General Conference session in the Battle Creek Tabernacle, its contents electrified the assembled delegates, who rose and sang the doxology.

In response to this call, D. A. Robinson and C. L. Boyd, with their wives; George Burleigh and R. S. Anthony, colporteurs; and Miss Carrie Mace, a Bible instructor, were sent to Africa. They sailed on May 11, 1887, from New York and arrived in Cape Town in July. Robinson remained at the Cape, while Boyd proceeded to the diamond fields, where he found about 40 keeping the seventh-day Sabbath, including a number of children.

Within a month a baptism took place and a church of 21 members was organized. A month later others were baptized, and the movement began to spread. The first Seventh-day Adventist church building in South Africa was erected in Beaconsfield. It was built of wood and iron and is now a historical monument.

In Cape Town, D. A. Robinson began his work by giving lectures on nondoctrinal subjects in various churches. In the meantime colporteurs sold copies of Uriah Smith's Daniel and the Revelation. In January 1888 a tent, sent from America, was pitched in a sheltered spot in the city for evangelistic meetings. In February Ira J. Hankins and his family arrived to assist the evangelists. As a result of meetings held in this tent, a church was organized in Cape Town. Among the early converts at the Cape was a young man named Herbert J. Edmed, who later became a pioneer evangelist and administrator, contributing to the establishment of many churches in various parts of South Africa.

At this time all supplies were transported by ox wagon from the Cape. Among the transport riders were some English-speaking farmers from the Grahamstown area. Two of these, Albert Davies and D. Fletcher Tarr, arrived with their wagons at a farm near Kimberley late one Friday afternoon. Davies, introducing himself to the young farmer, Wessels, asked about arranging for pasture for the oxen. Wessels refused to discuss business, saying, "Let the oxen graze; we will come to terms another day," and immediately began to advance the claims of the seventh-day Sabbath. Impressed, young Davies returned to camp and began to tell what Wessels had told him. Tarr, a lay Methodist preacher, felt shocked that a man could be so misguided as to keep Saturday for the Sabbath.

As Dr. Harry Hankins tells the story, on Sabbath morning Wessels invited the two campers, Tarr and Davies, to his house for a Bible study. Tarr refused to go, but Davies went, returning more than half convinced that the seventh-day Sabbath was right, and bringing a tract, Elihu on the Sabbath. On a later visit to the camp, Pieter tactfully invited Tarr to speak at a meeting being held Saturday night in the Salvation Army Hall in Kimberley. This Tarr did.

Sunday morning a fine-looking young man arrived at the camp and asked Tarr for biblical support of Sundaykeeping. Tarr reasoned with him for more than three hours, realizing as he did so how weak his case was; then the stranger left, still unsatisfied. Now thoroughly aroused, Tarr spent several days reading The History of the Sabbath, by J. N. Andrews, with the result that 13 days after first meeting Wessels he began to keep the seventh-day Sabbath.

Because of his new interest, Tarr returned to Kimberley. When C. L. Boyd arrived, Tarr assisted him in holding a series of meetings. The following year, hearing that I. J. Hankins was proceeding to Grahamstown to hold meetings, Tarr went to that city to assist the evangelist. A series of meetings they conducted at nearby Rokeby Park resulted in the Rokeby Park church, organized in 1889, the third Seventh-day Adventist church in South Africa. On the clerk's book of this church appear the names of the Willmore, Sparrow, Tarr, Davies, Pittaway, and Staples families. Many of the descendants of these pioneer believers have served the cause as administrators, evangelists, pastors, teachers, and missionaries. Tarr himself later studied at Battle Creek College in the United States, and returned to pioneer the work in many centers in South Africa.

When in 1888 D. A. Robinson went to England, C. L. Boyd took general charge of the work in South Africa until 1891, when he returned to the United States. In 1889 S. N. Haskell paid his first visit to South Africa, spending five months traveling, visiting converts, and preaching.

Early Expansion. In January 1892 A. T. Robinson and his wife arrived to take the leadership of the work. He organized the five South African churches, with their 138 members, into the South African Conference in the same year. The organization of this conference ushered in a period of expansion. Shortly before Robinson's arrival, Pieter Wessels' father had sold his farm near Kimberley, on which a rich diamond deposit had been found, to the De Beers Company for £350,000. Father Wessels carefully handled this fortune as long as he lived, advancing sums to help the struggling church. Shortly before his death in 1892, he gave £3,900 to erect a building housing the Cape Town church and the conference offices. At one time or another, most of his children visited the Seventh-day Adventist headquarters at Battle Creek, Michigan, and some of them attended Battle Creek College.

Returning to South Africa, the Wessels brothers urged that institutions be erected there similar to those in Battle Creek and offered to bear the major portion of the cost. In 1892 Claremont Union College (see Helderberg College) was built and fully equipped at a cost of £67,000. Treatment rooms and a printing plant were opened in Cape Town and an orphanage in Plumstead. The most ambitious project of all was the Claremont Sanitarium, a 51-room medical center near Cape Town costing about £50,000.

At the time these institutions were being erected, the church membership did not exceed 250. However, because of a substantial tithe income mainly from the Wessels family, the General Conference had not found it necessary to make regular financial provisions. Consequently, when the local source of funds dried up, the conference and these institutions found themselves in financial difficulties, and the General Conference was in no position to give them much assistance for many years. It was chiefly because of this large burden on the small constituency that the missions opened among the non-Christian Africans in the early years had to be self-supporting.

The first SDA converts in South Africa were from among the White population. These were closely followed by some from the Coloured community and later by some from the African.

The first Coloured ordained minister was D. C. Theunissen, who in his youth had been employed by Pieter Wessels and later by A. T. Robinson. His ministry was blessed, and before his death he was privileged to see thousands of his own people organized into 40 churches, with several schools. This Coloured constituency formed the Cape Field in 1933 (later it included the Indian members also). In 1942 the first SDA worker in the island of St. Helena was sent by the Cape Field. The Cape Field is now the Good Hope Conference.

Among the Africans, the first convert (also the first ordained minister) was Richard Moko, an educated member of the Fingo tribe, a teacher by profession, who was baptized into the SDA faith in Kimberley in 1895. A license to preach was granted to him in 1897. He later pioneered among the Xhosa-speaking tribes of the eastern Cape. The first Basuto convert was David Kalaka, who became an SDA shortly after Moko.

The early work among the African peoples of South Africa and the protectorates included the establishment of schools, mission stations, hospitals, and mission fields. Groupings for administrative purposes have varied through the years.

In 1936 the work was consolidated, and all the African churches and believers were organized into two fields, the South Bantu Field, with headquarters in East London, and the North Bantu Field, with headquarters in Johannesburg. In the early years most of the responsible positions were occupied by missionaries. Under the new organization the work grew, developing a strong African ministry and constituency. In a 1965 reorganization, the African work came under a new union, the Southern Union, and the White, Coloured, and Indian work came under the South African Union Conference.

Early Organization and Growth. The South African Conference was organized on Dec. 4, 1892, with A. T. Robinson, president; I. J. Hankins, secretary; and Mrs. N. H. Druillard, treasurer. The administrative headquarters of this conference were in the Roeland Street church in Cape Town. In 1897 Robinson was called to Australia and was succeeded by W. S. Hyatt, who continued as president until 1901. During the nine years it existed, the South African Conference administered all Seventh-day Adventist work in southern Africa, including not only the state of South Africa but also the mission fields in Rhodesia (now Zambia and Zimbabwe) and Basutoland (now Lesotho). The membership in 1901 was 715 in 15 churches.

In harmony with the policies adopted at the 1901 General Conference session, the South African Conference became a union conference in 1902, with W. S. Hyatt continuing as president. He was succeeded by R. C. Porter (1907—1913), who in turn was succeeded by W. B. White, who served until the formation of the division in 1920. The new union conference was composed of two local conferences, the Cape Conference and the Natal-Transvaal Conference. The territory of the Orange Free State was divided between them until 1913, when it was made a separate conference, with H. Elffers as the first president. Until 1917 the South African Union Conference administered all the mission fields not only within the four provinces of the Union of South Africa but also in Rhodesia (now Zambia and Zimbabwe), Basutoland (now Lesotho), and Nyasaland (now Malawi). Then the Zambesi Union Mission was set up to care for the missions north of the state of South Africa. By 1920, at the time the Southern African Division was set up, the baptized membership had increased to 2,705. In 1929 the Orange Free State Conference was reabsorbed into the two larger conferences.

Conference Reorganization in the 1950s. From 1929 until 1958 there were only two conferences within the South African Union: the Cape Conference and the Natal-Transvaal Conference. However, there was the Cape Field (composed of the Coloured constituency in South Africa), and there were the missions among the Africans. The increase in membership, particularly in Transvaal, made it advisable in 1958 to divide the Natal-Transvaal Conference. This was done by forming all the churches and institutions within Natal and the Orange Free State with East Griqualand into the Oranje-Natal Conference, with headquarters in Pietermaritzburg. The churches of the Transvaal were united into a conference of their own, with headquarters in Johannesburg.

Late in 1959 the Cape Field was reorganized as the Good Hope Conference, comprising the Coloured constituency in the Union of South Africa. A minister of that constituency, K. Landers, took office as its first president in January 1960.

The Indian Field was organized in 1956, composed of the Indian constituency in Natal and the Transvaal (which had been for a time part of the Cape Field), to serve the Asians of South Africa. The headquarters were in Durban, Natal. Since the organization of this field the Indian membership growth has been accelerated. This field was incorporated into the Oranje-Natal Conference in 1978.

Reorganization of 1960—Groups I and II. In December 1960 representatives from the General Conference, the Southern African Division, and the South African Union Conference met with those from these two fields and planned the reorganization of the work, with the object of laying more and greater responsibilities upon the African ministry and membership. With this in mind, the South African Union was divided for purposes of administration into two groups of organizational units. Group I comprised the organizations, both conference and field, serving the non-Bantu population of the union's territory, while Group II comprised the organizations serving the Bantu population of the same territory. To serve Group II, which was organized with headquarters in Johannesburg, a union vice president, secretary-treasurer, field secretary, and auditor (along with White and African departmental secretaries) were elected to administer the work of the African fields in the Republic of South Africa, Basutoland (now Lesotho), and Swaziland. The African constituency was divided in 1960 into nine fields, each headed by an African president and secretary-treasurer. The years that followed have demonstrated the wisdom of placing responsibility upon the African ministry.

Because of a growing conviction that too many workers were absorbed in administration at the expense of the departments, the number of the fields was reduced at the close of 1962 to five. Those released from executive positions became departmental secretaries, greatly strengthening the departments. The five fields were: (1) Cape Western Field, with headquarters at Langa, Cape Town; (2) Cape Eastern Field, with headquarters at East London; (3) Natal-Swaziland Field, with headquarters at Durban; (4) South Sotho Field (Basutoland and the Orange Free State), with headquarters at Leribe, Basutoland; (5) Southern Transvaal Field, with headquarters in Johannesburg.

The territory covering the Transvaal and Orange Free State was organized into the Trans-Orange Conference in 1980. Three primary schools serve the conference-Balebedi, Maranatha, and Orlando West. There is one secondary school-Marfanatha Secondary.

The Cape province territory was reorganized in 1984, with headquarters in East London. It was named the Southern Conference and was to serve the Black section of the population in the region. In 1993 this conference attained a membership of 13,625 in 108 churches and 110 companies. Shepherding this flock is a workforce of 19 ordained ministers and 17 licensed ministers.

The Southern Conference operates two high schools (Cancele and Themba) and six primary schools, with 42 teachers and administrators. The presence of these schools has done much to advance the gospel message in their localities.

In November 1965 it was decided to dissolve Groups I and II and form two separate unions, namely, the South African Union, with responsibility for the work among the White, Coloured, and Indian people; and the Southern Union, to care for the Black work exclusively. These unions, with their 11 conferences and fields, ministered to approximately 15 million people in five languages.

In December 1991 these two unions, at one time part of the Trans-Africa Division and, more recently, attached fields of the General Conference, merged to form the Southern Africa Union, also a GC attached field.

Departments

Departments. Publishing. The distribution of SDA publications in South Africa began when two colporteurs, R. S. Anthony and George W. Burleigh, arrived in 1887 with the first missionaries, Boyd and Robinson. They lost no time in scattering SDA publications through the urban centers of South Africa. Local converts soon joined the work. In 1890 E. M. Morrison came from Australia to give instruction and to hold institutes. In 1892 there were 10 active colporteurs, whose total annual sales exceeded £3,000. An English language evangelistic paper called The Sentinel (later The Signs of the Times) was launched in 1892, and a Dutch paper, De Wachter (later Tekens van die Tye). About the same time, a church paper was issued, called the South African Missionary, which became the African Division Outlook and later the Trans-Africa Division Outlook. In 1951 a bilingual paper, The South African Union Lantern, made its appearance. (See [Southern Publishing Association \[South Africa\]](#).)

Medical. The first SDA medical institution in South Africa was the Claremont Sanitarium, which was operated by the church from 1897 to 1901 and privately to 1905. In 1904 the Cape Sanitarium was opened in the remodeled buildings of the Plumstead orphanage. The sanitarium closed in 1934.

Another feature of the SDA health program was the operation of treatment rooms, modeled on the methods of the Battle Creek Sanitarium. Carnarvon House in Cape Town was fitted up at a cost of £7,000. Other treatment rooms on less ambitious scales flourished for a time in Durban, Bloemfontein, Pretoria, Port Elizabeth, East London, Pietermaritzburg, and Kimberley. The Kimberley Baths became well known to the public for the care given the sick and wounded during the siege of Kimberley during the Anglo-Boer War, and later for the owners' flower-growing enterprise, which enabled the institution to care for many charity cases.

For many years SDA medical work in the Republic of South Africa has been confined to the operation of hospitals and clinics in connection with mission stations catering to the Black and Coloured populations.

Educational. During the early years of the Seventh-day Adventist Church in South Africa, a number of young men and women went to the United States to attend Battle Creek College. When in 1892 it was decided to have an SDA college in South Africa, land was purchased and buildings erected near Claremont, a suburb of Cape Town, and there Claremont Union College (later commonly called Union College) was opened in February 1893.

Plagued with heavy indebtedness, the college was closed in 1918 and moved to a farm in Natal, where it became Spion Kop College. In 1928 the school was moved again, this time to Somerset West, a rural site about 30 miles (50 kilometers) from Cape Town. (See Helderberg College.)

The first elementary school was opened in Beaconsfield in 1893, of which Mrs. Joel Rogers was the first teacher. The following year Sarah Peck took over this school and Mrs. Rogers opened an elementary school in Claremont. As the work grew, other church schools were opened in various South African cities, such as Johannesburg, Durban, and Cape Town.

Homes for the Aged

Homes for the Aged. In recent years homes for the aged have been provided: Sunnyside Lodge, situated in Plumstead, about eight miles (13 kilometers) from Cape Town, was opened in 1959; Adventhaven, on the campus of Sedaven High School, near Heidelberg, Transvaal, began operation in 1960; and Anerley Place, on the shore a few miles south of Durban, was opened in 1962. In the ensuing 30 years several more homes opened their doors to aged citizens, including Esda Home for the Infirm Aged, Heather Court, Magnolia Haven, and Pieter Wessels Home for the Infirm Aged.

SOUTH AFRICAN UNION LANTERN (1951—1991; monthly; Sentinel Publishing Assn.; file in GC). Official organ of the South African Union Conference. Two separate editions, in English and Afrikaans, were furnished free to the constituency of the union conference. When the two unions merged in December 1991, a new official organ was published under the name Maranatha.

South American Division

SOUTH AMERICAN DIVISION. A large unit of church organization to which is allotted the territory of South America (except Colombia, Venezuela, French Guiana, Guyana, and Suriname, which are in the Inter-American Division), including the adjacent islands in the Atlantic and Pacific oceans.

Statistics (1992): churches, 4,056; members, 1,176,026; church elementary schools, 824; ordained ministers, 1,325; licensed ministers, 562; credentialed missionaries, 1,842; teachers 6,565. Headquarters: Brasilia, Distrito Federal, Brazil. There are church papers in Spanish and Portuguese, both called Revista Adventista.

The division was organized in 1916 from two formerly unattached organizations: the South American Union Conference (which became the Austral Union Conference and the Inca Union Mission) and the Brazilian Union Conference. The division began with a membership of 4,903, with 88 churches.

Constituent Organizations

Constituent Organizations. The South American Division comprises four union conferences, three union missions, and two attached missions.

1. Austral Union Conference (organized 1906; reorganized 1966). Territory: Argentina, Paraguay, and Uruguay. Statistics (1992): churches, 366; members, 74,885; church elementary schools, 74; ordained ministers, 176; licensed ministers, 62; credentialed missionaries, 358; teachers, 536. Headquarters: Florida, Buenos Aires, Argentina.

Constituent organizations and their territories—Buenos Aires Conference (organized 1906; reorganized 1921, 1961, 1972, 1985): the city of Buenos Aires and part of Buenos Aires province; Central Argentine Conference (organized 1921; reorganized 1972): Cordoba, Entre Rios, La Rioja, Mendoza, San Juan, and San Luis Provinces and part of Santa Fe province; North Argentine Conference (organized 1906; reorganized 1948, 1988): Chaco, Corrientes, Formosa, Misiones, and North Santa Fe provinces; Northwest Argentine Mission (organized 1988): Catamarca, Jujuy, Salta, Santiago del Estero, and Tucuman provinces; Paraguay Mission (organized 1948): Paraguay. South Argentine Mission (organized 1985): Chubut, La Pampa, Neuquen, Rio Negro, Santa Cruz, South Buenos Aires, Tierra del Fuego, and Malvinas and South Atlantic Islands; Uruguay Mission (organized 1906): Uruguay.

2. Central Brazil Union Conference (organized 1907; reorganized 1986). Territory: Federal District and the states of Goias, Mato Grosso, São Paulo, and Tocantins. Statistics (1992): churches, 594; members, 150,809; church or elementary schools, 122; ordained ministers, 285; licensed ministers, 113; credentialed missionaries, 555; teachers, 1,485. Headquarters: Artur Nogueira, São Paulo, Brazil.

Constituent organizations and their territories—Central Brazil Conference (organized 1927): Federal District and the states of Goias and Tocantins; Central São Paulo Conference (organized 1922; reorganized 1978, 1989): the state of São Paulo, excluding the capital city, the coast, the Paraíba River and Ribeira River valleys, and the western region; East São Paulo Conference (organized 1982): São Paulo's Capital East and North regions, Paraíba River valley, and north coast; Mato Grosso Mission (organized 1921; reorganized 1980): the state of Mato Grosso; São Paulo Conference (organized 1922; reorganized 1978, 1982, 1991): São Paulo's capital, west cities, Santista coast, and ABCD region; South São Paulo Conference (organized 1992): South São Paulo's capital and Ribeira River valley; West São Paulo Conference (organized 1922; reorganized 1978, 1989): the western region of the state of São Paulo.

3. Chile Union Mission (organized 1966) territory: Chile. Statistics (1992): churches, 377; members, 74,396; church elementary schools, 36; ordained ministers, 99; licensed ministers, 55; credentialed missionaries, 106; teachers, 469. Headquarters: Santiago, Chile.

Constituent organizations and their territories—Central Chile Conference (organized 1907; reorganized 1966): the Sixth, Seventh, and Metropolitan regions; North Chile Mission (organized 1966): the First, Second, and Third regions; Pacific Chile Mission (organized 1988): the Fourth and Fifth regions; South Chile Conference (organized 1950): the Eighth, Ninth, Tenth, Eleventh, and Twelfth regions.

4. East Brazil Union Conference (organized 1919). Territory: the states of Alagoas, Bahia, Espírito Santo, Minas Gerais, Paraíba, Pernambuco, Rio de Janeiro, Rio Grande do Norte, and Sergipe. Statistics (1992): churches, 843; members, 194,420; church or elementary schools, 129; ordained ministers, 253; licensed ministers, 87; credentialed missionaries, 227; teachers, 1,097. South American Division Health Food Company

SOUTH AMERICAN DIVISION HEALTH FOOD COMPANY. A chain of health food factories operated by the Health Food Department of the South American Division, under the direction of an executive committee representing the division, the unions, and the various factories. It was organized in 1971 for the purpose of promoting, manufacturing, and selling health foods throughout the territory of the South American Division. The company is made up of the following factories: Productos Alimenticios Superbom, Brazil; Alimentos Granix, Argentina; and Fabrica de Productos Frutigran, Uruguay. In 1975 a new factory was constructed in Chile. Despite the fact that they are supervised and under the control of the Division Health Food Company, the factories operate under the legal organization of the church in each country.

Buenos Aires Health Food Company (Alimentos Granix). An industry located in Buenos Aires, Argentina. It is actually two industries, located 80 miles (130 kilometers) apart.

In 1937 the first machinery was acquired from England in order to make cornflakes, but it was not until 1938 when the “certificate of birth” for Alimentos Granix was really dated. At that time production was based on wheat flakes, rice flakes, and cornflakes, as well as peanut butter and honey.

In 1939 the industry started manufacturing puffed wheat and rice. Between 1946 and 1956, fruit preserves were added to the list of products manufactured.

During 1962 the first rotating molder was installed in an automatic gas oven measuring 40 feet (12 meters) long. This was the start for the production of cookies and crackers. From there on, 13 different kinds of cookies and crackers were manufactured.

In 1965 the actual production plant was built, with 43,000 square feet (4,000 square meters) of covered surface. By 1969 Alimentos Granix had 70 employees.

The new decade brought with it new challenges and new machinery. By the end of the 1970s, the industry was working three shifts and had 280 employees.

During the 1980s Alimentos Granix was recognized as a leader in the industry. With the construction of a plant in Baradero, 60 miles (100 kilometers) from Buenos Aires, there are now two health food production plants. In addition, there is a huge distribution warehouse of more than 53,800 square feet (5,000 square meters), and four additional warehouses throughout the country. In 1993 there were 550 employees and a monthly production of approximately 1,000 tons (907 metric tons), a total of three production plants, and five distribution warehouses.

Managers: Jorge Norris, 1938—1946; René Dobanton, 1946—1955; Alfredo Bellido, 1956—1961; Lucas Schulz, 1962—1971; Norman Trubey, 1971—1975; Emilio Wanderleben, 1975—1979; Benjamin Reichel, 1979— .

Frutigran Products (Fabrica de Productos Frutigran). A food factory, operated by the South American Division Health Food Company, under the legal entity, Corporacion Uruguaya de los Adventista del Septimo Dia (Uruguay Corporation of Seventh-day Adventists). The manufacturing of health foods began at Uruguay Academy in 1956 with the construction of a bakery, with an area of 2,700 square feet (250 square meters), and the products were sold in nearby towns and in Montevideo. In 1961 the plant began producing fruit juice, marmalades, and canned fruit on a small scale. In 1971 the factory was incorporated into the South American Division Health Food Company, and in 1972 a building was constructed with an area of 8,600 square feet (800 square meters) for use in the production of fruit juice, canned fruit, and jelly. There were 18 employees in 1993. At fruit harvesttime as many as 60 workers are employed.

Manager: Daniel Iuorno, 1968—1973; Julio Godoy, 1973—1975; Alejo Pizzaro, 1975; Oscar Sena, 1976—1977; E. Wandersleben, 1977—1978; Alexis Piro, 1978—1982; Benjamin Reichel, 1982—1986; Amadeo Rolando, 1986—1987; Mario Gutierrez, 1987— .

Brazil Food Factory (Productos Alimenticios Superbom). A food factory situated 12 miles (20 kilometers) from the center of São Paulo, Brazil, operated under the legal name of “Productos Alimenticios Superbom, Instituto Adventista de Ensino, Departamento Industrial.” It is one of the factories under the direction of the South American Division Health Food Company.

The processing of food by Brazil College began in 1925, when the school began to process grape juice for the use of students. In 1935 Adolpho Bergold, the college farm manager, stepped up the production and developed the sale of grape juice as a financial aid to the institution. In 1940 other products such as berry juices, grape and other jellies and jams, whole-wheat flour, peanut butter, and honey were added to the industry. On Jan. 11, 1944, under the management of Ernesto Bergold, the Brazil Food Factory became legally incorporated, and in succeeding years has expanded and made rapid progress.

More than 30 different products are processed, including grape, pineapple, passion fruit (maracuja), and tomato juices; pineapple, strawberry, grape, apple, and fig jellies and marmalades; tomato extract; and honey.

During 1973 the factory opened the first vegetarian restaurant operated by the Seventh-day Adventist Church in South America. Later others were added. But all were forced to close because of economic problems during the last part of the 1980s.

Superbom established a plant in the state of Santa Catarina for the production of fruit juices. In 1991 it took on the production of breakfast cereals, which in 1993 represented 45 percent of its total production. The company employs 380 people.

Managers: Adolpho Bergold, 1940—1943; Ernesto Bergold, 1944; Arno Schwantes, 1945—1951; Germano Ritter, 1951—1952; D. Stockler de Lima, 1953—1960; Pirajá Dias Pinto, 1961—1962; D. Stockler de Lima, 1963—1967; Siegfried Genske, 1968—1970; Ardoval Schevani, 1970—1974; Alejo Pizarro, 1974—1975; Japhet Leme, 1975—1976; Joel Zukovski, 1976—1980; Mario Fehlberg, 1981—1984; Lourival Cruz, 1984—1987; Paulo Stabenow, 1987—1988; Lauro Grellmann, 1988— .

Division Managers: Alejo Pizarro, 1971—1978; Geraldo Bokenkamp, 1978—1982; Roberto Gullon, 1982—1983; Paulo Stabenow, 1983—1989; Floriano dos Santos, 1989—1990; Benjamin Reichel, 1990— .

History

History. Beginnings in Georgia and North Carolina. Many early Black ministers and teachers in the territory of the South Atlantic Conference were trained, sponsored, and encouraged by the missionary group that took the boat Morning Star to Mississippi and opened schools from 1895 on (for their story, see Southern Missionary Society) or were products of Oakwood College, established in 1895 by the General Conference. But the earliest seeds were sown among the Black people in the South Atlantic states many years earlier-only five years after E. B. Lane's railroad station evangelistic meetings of 1871 at Edgefield Junction, Tennessee (which led to the organization in the 1880s of the first Black Seventh-day Adventist church; see South Central Conference). The evangelist was C. O. Taylor, who late in 1876 entered the south Atlantic states and preached to Whites and Blacks at Quitman, in south Georgia. He reported preaching in a local church one Sunday where about a third of his hearers were Black people "occupying the same house with the Whites, only sitting by themselves," according to the customary practice in preemancipation days (see Human Relations, Office of). The next August, when he went 240 miles (380 kilometers) north to Griffin, he "spoke three times to the colored people." However, the first Black converts mentioned were in Houston County, south of Macon, where he had stopped en route to Griffin. The first was a preacher-sharecropper on the plantation of a White convert named Killen (March 1878). He was followed by others; the next year there were nine freedmen (April 1879).

About the time when Taylor went to Georgia, the New England Tract Society was sending papers into North Carolina. Among the readers' replies published in 1877 in the Review and Herald appear two from Black people in North Carolina, one from a self-taught traveling preacher who asked for tracts to distribute to his congregations and who told how he had studied at night in his slave cabin.

The work was difficult and moved slowly, as indicated by J. O. Corliss' report at the 1883 General Conference session for the "South Atlantic Mission," as the Southeastern states were designated, in which he stated that there were now in that field 267 White Sabbathkeepers and 20 Black. Sydney Scott, noted early evangelist, wrote, in the Gospel Herald in July 1907: "Fifteen years ago there were not over twenty colored Seventh-day Adventists south of the Mason Dixon line, but today there are seven hundred. Twelve years ago there was only one colored Seventh-day Adventist church; today there are fifty, not counting those in Africa or the West Indies. Fourteen years ago there were only two colored ministers; today there are forty-five in the United States, counting those in Africa and the West Indies the number will reach sixty. The tithes of the colored people last year in the United States amounted to $5000; fifteen years ago it was not over $50. One year ago there was no sanitarium for colored people in the whole denomination where modern methods were used; today there is one in Birmingham Ala., with Dr. L. C. Isbell as chief physician. Thirteen years ago, we had no colored Seventh-day Adventist physician; today we have five practicing using modern methods" (p. 26).

Schools. The early method of evangelism was to open schools first and then introduce doctrinal teachings. Thus the schools paved the way for the establishment of churches. In 1907—1908, after it had been made a department of the Southern Union, the Southern Missionary Society operated 18 mission schools, including two in Georgia, one in South Carolina, one in North Carolina, and two in Florida. These missionary schools were manned by teachers who understood their venture and gloried in its sacrifices. Wilda Wilson taught 20 eager children in a small barn at Daytona, Florida. From her school at Fernandina, Florida, Mrs. M. W. Porties wrote, "Oh, Brother Bollman, the Lord is good, isn't He? I have been so confined to my school that I've had little opportunity to get out among my people, but the Lord is sending them to our home to inquire concerning this truth" (Gospel Herald, July 1908, p. 26).

Evangelism in Florida. In the 1890s the Review and Herald carried reports from Florida of laypersons conducting house-to-house evangelism among both Whites and Blacks—George Smith at Lawtey (1891) and I. C. Bunch at Milton (1897). According to a letter from Carrie Furman Smith, Thomas Furman, the first Black SDA in Tampa, had accepted the faith at Bartow and been baptized in 1896. By 1896 Florida had one Black preacher, M. L. Ivory, who was ordained in 1899. In that year he reported evangelism in a number of towns, including Orlando, Sanford, Palatka, Windsor, Gainesville, Waldo, Jacksonville, and Punta Gorda; also, Sabbath schools were reported in Oakland, Windsor, and Orlando; and a church was organized in Orlando. Beginning about 1904, camp meetings were held for the Black members at the same time and in the same city as the White camp meetings, so that the conference representatives could preach to both.

A report from Florida in the June 11, 1908, issue of the Review and Herald tells of trouble—a White evangelist's tent was cut down, and at Morriston “our only colored minister's” tent ropes cut and the minister himself forced to leave by order of the town council because his Black converts refused to work on the Sabbath. This minister was John Manns, who was ordained the next October and who was responsible for the organization of a church at Palatka. At Plant City a church was organized and a church school established.

In 1911 meetings conducted at Jacksonville by J. W. Manns and John Green resulted in 11 converts. Three sons of this church are listed in denominational leadership: H. D. Singleton, former secretary of the Regional Department of the General Conference; W. S. Lee, former secretary of the Regional Department of the Pacific Union; and V. L. Roberts, former president of Southwest Region Conference.

Also in 1911 evangelistic meetings were held in Miami by M. C. Strachan and J. F. Green, and a church was organized in 1912. In time there were five thriving congregations in the metropolitan area: Miami Trinity Temple, Pisgah at Opa-locka, Miami-Bethany, Miami-Liberty City, and Hollywood.

In Tampa, where a Sabbath school met in the Furman living room, a church of 26 was organized in 1915. In 1921, after a major evangelistic campaign by G. E. Peters and others, 232 members were baptized.

South Carolina. Late in 1896 I. E. Kimball, former president of the Vermont Conference, went to Charleston. He made contacts with the White churches through the WCTU and also spoke in Black churches and distributed the Signs of the Times, mostly among Blacks. Bringing volunteer teachers from the North, he operated night schools for Blacks during several winters, also a welfare mission for underprivileged Whites.

About the beginning of 1900 he organized a church of 17 of both White and Black members, all of them recipients of “Christian help work.” However, by the end of that year Kimball left South Carolina, and the Charleston mission, church, and mission school disappear from the record. By October of 1902 the Peace Haven Industrial School for Colored at Blackville was claimed as the only school in the state teaching Black people the SDA doctrines.

Apparently there was no church in Charleston in 1904, when South Carolina was organized as a mission. But a Black mission school was opened in Charleston in the autumn of 1907, and a church was organized in December 1907, with nine members, some of whom had been keeping the Sabbath since the time Kimball had been there. But nearly two years earlier there was a church of about 20 at Spartanburg, reported in April 1906 by D. E. Blake, then a lay evangelist (later a physician). Late in 1907 Sydney Scott came from Alabama to succeed Blake as the Black evangelist for South Carolina. Before the end of 1908 he had won 25 converts in Greenville, and the Black membership in the state was doubled. The next year there were 20 more converts at Greenville and a church school; also, a church at Sumter.

In Columbia in 1907 a White colporteur had worked in the city and awakened an interest among Black people that resulted in seven converts. Scott, sent to take care of the interest, opened a Sabbath school and then conducted tent meetings (May-October 1910). In September 1910 the first Black SDA camp meeting in South Carolina was held there. From those baptized in these first tent meetings a church was organized.

Among those baptized during these early meetings in the Carolinas were B. W. Abney, who gave 48 years of service, and F. S. Keitts, in whose mother's home the first Sabbath school was organized and who gave 45 years of service. Other ministers associated with the beginnings of the work in the area were W. H. Maynor, O. S. Osterman, and A. L. Crichlow.

By 1916 the South Carolina statistical report showed more Black members than White in the state. When the South Atlantic Conference was organized in 1946, it took in 24 churches in the two Carolinas.

North Carolina. In January 1899 the Southern Missionary Society sent Frank H. Bryant (one of the converts connected with the missionary boat Morning Star) from Mississippi to work among Black people at Hickory, North Carolina. He soon reported that he was giving Bible studies and that suitable rooms for a school had been secured. In 1901 there was an organized church at Winston-Salem. There was a church at Asheville and a school headed by Page Shepard in 1910. After several years had elapsed, during which the field was without a minister, Shepard was appointed to serve the field of North Carolina. At that time there were churches or companies at New Bern, Greensboro, and Winston-Salem. In the vicinity of the Mountain Sanitarium, at Fletcher (founded 1910), the sanitarium workers held classes in first aid and home nursing, and organized a Good Neighbor Club among Black people, promoting gardens and poultry raising. In 1920 a church of 50 was organized at Raleigh, the state capital.

Georgia. Between 1900 and 1902, three Black ministers were assigned to Atlanta—L. C. Sheafe, M. C. Sturdevant, and C. A. Hall. In January 1901 Sturdevant reported the arrival of a teacher from Vicksburg and plans for a school. In 1907 a school was opened at Brunswick.

In January 1907 W. H. Sebastian and his wife were sent to Atlanta. At that time there was no Black church in Georgia. Meetings were first held in the front room of the Sebastian home. In April he reported plans to open his first tent meeting on the first of August, assisted by S. G. Dent, a former Baptist minister from Brunswick, Georgia (whose grandson, Dr. Carl A. Dent, served for many years as head of the medical staff at Riverside Sanitarium and Hospital).

In 1908 meetings conducted by Scott and Sebastian resulted in a number of converts. A church, two schoolrooms, and treatment rooms with quarters for eight patients were erected on Greens Ferry Avenue. Also, Anna Knight (whose biography, Mississippi Girl, tells of her pioneer school in Mississippi and her mission service in India) came to Atlanta to work as a Bible instructor (see South Central Conference). Having become well known in the Black colleges of Atlanta through her lectures on India, she organized in 1910 a Black YWCA, with offices and dormitory in connection with the treatment rooms at the church. John W. Manns held meetings in Savannah in 1912. The same year, a church of 44 new members was organized. Later he baptized 125 persons.

South Atlantic Conference. At the General Conference session of 1909 action was taken to organize the work for Blacks in the Southern, Southeastern, and Southwestern union conferences on a mission basis in each union. On June 15—21, 1909, the Southern Missionary Society was absorbed by the Southern Union as the Southern Union Mission, and the Southeastern Union had its union mission department for Blacks, and each conference had a Black minister. In the 1910 Yearbook these were listed: Florida, John Manns; South Carolina, Sydney Scott; North Carolina, Page Shepard; Georgia, S. G. Dent. In 1932, when the Southern and Southeastern unions were reunited, there was one union department for Blacks.

In December 1945 constituency meetings were held for the purpose of organizing the mission department of the Southern Union into two conferences. The South Atlantic Conference was organized as a Black conference embracing the eastern section of the Southern Union, with the territory of North and South Carolina, Georgia, and all of Florida except that portion lying west of the Apalachicola River. The meeting was presided over by E. F. Hackman, president of the Southern Union, and represented were 398 delegates, with 19 delegates at large. The first officers elected were: president, H. D. Singleton; secretary-treasurer, L. S. Follette; educational and MV secretary, F. H. Jenkins; home missionary and religious liberty secretary, H. D. Singleton; publishing secretary, Richard Robinson. R. B. Hairston was elected as the first secretary of the conference Jan. 1, 1973. At its organization the conference consisted of 62 churches and a membership of 3,614. By the end of 1963 that number had grown to 76 churches with a membership of 8,547. In 1949 a campsite was purchased at Hawthorne, Florida, where camp meetings and junior, senior, and friendship camps are held annually. Its development cost amounted to $224,471.82.

The constituency of the South Atlantic Conference requested that study be given to dividing the territory of the South Atlantic Conference into two conferences. It was voted to do so, and in 1981 the new Southeastern and South Atlantic conferences were created from the former conference territory. Tithe received in 1992 amounted to $7,652,692. (See Southeastern Conference.)

History

History. Beginnings of the Work in the Area. One of the earliest African-American converts in the South was Harry Lowe, a Baptist minister who in 1871, after having attended one of the first Seventh-day Adventist meetings held (by E. B. Lane, a layman) in Tennessee (see Kentucky-Tennessee Conference), received a copy of The Signs of the Times and became convinced that he should keep the Sabbath. Later he served as local pastor for a congregation of Black believers organized as a company in 1883 at Edgefield Junction, near Nashville, Tennessee. On Nov. 9, 1886, this group was organized as the first Seventh-day Adventist church composed entirely of African-Americans, with a membership of 10. Among the charter members were the John F. Allisons, whose two sons, Thomas H. and Jonathan W., later became ordained ministers and served in several responsible capacities in the church. A grandson, Jonathan W. Allison, Jr., also became a minister.

The first camp meeting to bring together the Black Seventh-day Adventist membership was held at Edgefield Junction in the fall of 1901. There were similar camp meetings the following year in Birmingham, Alabama, and Jackson, Mississippi.

The second church of Black believers in this field was organized at Louisville, Kentucky, in 1890 through the work of A. Barry. It was later pastored by C. M. Kinney (Kinny), a young man who had become an SDA in Reno, Nevada, and was reputed to be the first Black worker to be ordained to the Adventist ministry. The third Black church was also in the present South Central Conference, at Bowling Green, Kentucky, organized in June 1891, as was also the fifth, at Nashville in September 1894.

In 1892 the General Conference appointed a special agent, Henry S. Shaw, to superintend and foster the work among Black people. Although Shaw was a White man, he was dark enough to pass as one of the numerous fair-skinned Blacks in the South, and was therefore able to work with great effectiveness. Being earnest and dedicated and of a genial personality, he contributed greatly to an upswing in the work for African-American members. He worked from the Ohio River down through various cities of the South where he could find a hearing.

Morning Star and Southern Missionary Society. The best-known effort to win Black adherents in the South Central territory was that made by James Edson White with his Mississippi River steamer Morning Star. With him were numerous dedicated volunteer helpers from the North—colporteurs, teachers, nurses, and mechanics. In 1895 the group reached Vicksburg, Mississippi, in their quaint boat and were consistently successful in persuading crowds to come aboard to hear James Edson White preach. The workers established mission schools where children and illiterate adults were taught the rudiments of education, health and hygiene, and basic Bible doctrines. Out of this evangelistic and education movement in Mississippi grew churches at Vicksburg, Yazoo City, Columbus, Natchez, Jackson, and Greeneville. The work of White's Southern Missionary Society greatly influenced the founding of Oakwood College, Riverside Sanitarium, and the Southern Publishing Association. The original wooden star emblem from the Morning Star is still preserved on the campus of Oakwood College.

T. B. Buckner, A. Barry, Peter M. Boyd, J. H. Laurence, G. E. Peters, W. H. Sebastian, M. C. Strachan, Franklin Warnick, and Thomas Murphy were all at one time either workers in the Southern Missionary Society or persons whose salaries were subsidized by the society.

One young woman who was baptized as a result of the Morning Star meetings was Etta Littlejohn, who was among the first students at Oakwood. After completing the nurse's course at Melrose Sanitarium she married Robert L. Bradford, later an ordained minister. Their son Charles E. Bradford became the fourth president of the Lake Region Conference and president of the North American Division. Another Vicksburg convert was Cynthia Gertrude Johnson, who attended school at Vicksburg and later at Oakwood. One of her sons, Garland Millet, became a president of Oakwood College and later served as an associate director of the General Conference Educational Department.

Other Pioneers. One dedicated convert in Mississippi, not connected with the Morning Star enterprise, was Anna Knight. As a girl she read SDA papers mailed to her by a correspondence band, and eventually joined the church. About two years later (1894) she went to Mount Vernon, Ohio, to attend the academy. After completing the nursing course at Battle Creek, Michigan, she returned to her home community to open a school, which she subsequently left when she went to India as a missionary in 1901. Upon her return to the United States, she found her school building burned by hostile neighbors; she rebuilt and reestablished it, meeting the opposition with Christian fortitude. She left this work under the supervision of a younger sister when she worked as a Bible instructor and operated treatment rooms in Atlanta, Georgia. Later she served many years as secretary of several departments for the Black constituency of the Southeastern and the Southern unions, and supervised the Black church schools of the area.

A somewhat later convert who joined the church in Mississippi, Eugenia Isabella Cartwright went to Oakwood College in 1912. While there she married Lewey Cunningham, but was widowed soon after a son was born. Remaining at Oakwood, she served in various capacities as a staff member and an adviser to students for a total of 51 years. Her son, Charles C. Cunningham, became a teacher and a conference departmental secretary.

Franklin Warnick was a former Baptist minister who accepted the Sabbath truth as the result of his study. He served as a teacher and minister with Edson White during the troubled beginning days in Mississippi. His son, Raphael, pastored in a number of churches north and south, and his daughter, Naomi, taught church school in Yazoo City and Hattiesburg, Mississippi. Six of his grandchildren, named Simons, served in denominational work. Norman was a conference home missionary secretary, treasurer, and administrator of Riverside Hospital; Donald, a conference president and missionary to Sierra Leone; John, a builder, minister, and conference treasurer; Richard, a missionary to Liberia and Nigeria, and conference secretary; Ray, a photographer for Message magazine and Riverside Hospital; and Lois, a registered nurse who served with her husband, Dr. George Benson, as medical missionaries in Libya and Ethiopia.

George E. Peters, who began his pastoral work in Gadsden, Alabama, later worked as a successful evangelist in other cities of Alabama; Tampa, Florida; Atlanta, Georgia; Chicago, Illinois; and New York City. In New York City he helped stabilize the membership and reclaim many who had been drawn away from the church. Peters was twice selected to head the General Conference Negro Department (see Human Relations, Office of): 1929—1930 and 1941—1953. For a part of this time he was also a field secretary of the General Conference.

Another early convert in the south was Taswell B. Buckner, who joined the SDA Church in 1889. He became a Bible worker and then one of the early Black ministers, beginning his work, as far as can be ascertained, by organizing a small church in Selma, Alabama. In 1899 W. G. Buckner, a prosperous White Adventist, seeing T. B. Buckner's name in church papers and supposing that this might be one of his distant relatives, invited him to Montgomery to assist with the founding of a church and church school. W. G. Buckner had erected a large building on Early Street, which he called Charity Mission. The T. B. Buckners responded, and the color difference posing no problem, in a few months they organized a church school. In the spring of 1899 a congregation was organized in Montgomery consisting principally of two families, the Fountains and the Fraziers. Several members of the Frazier family have made contributions to the denomination in the fields of business, education, and nursing. From the Fountain family came one church school teacher and one ordained minister, Thomas M. Fountain, who became a president of the Lake Region Conference.

In east Tennessee the work among Blacks began with the lay efforts of Dr. J. E. Caldwell, apparently the only White SDA in that field who devoted his full time to work in the Black community. One church at Knoxville and another at Greeneville resulted partially from his pioneer work. SDA work in the Black community of Memphis began in December 1898 with a branch Sabbath school conducted by V. O. Cole, a colporteur, and Ben Parker in the home of Mrs. Ella Gray (whose grandson Charles A. Gray spent more than 35 years in SDA educational and institutional work). Afterward a Bible instructor was assigned to Memphis, followed by a minister, Henry Balsbough. A church was organized there in 1905. Two years later the first evangelistic meeting was held by a former Baptist minister who brought his congregation into the church and N. B. King, a former public school teacher.

Southern Union Mission Replaces Society. In 1909 the Southern Missionary Society was incorporated into the union organization as the Southern Union Mission, with a full slate of officers and workers and an executive committee.

Evangelism in the South Central area from 1909 to 1920 was carried on by Joseph H. Laurence, Taswell B. Buckner, George E. Peters, and John S. Green.

In Pensacola, Florida, in 1909 Laurence held meetings, assisted by Peters. Among the converts was Frank L. Peterson, age 14, who went on to SDA schools and became first a teacher and then a minister. Later he served as president of Oakwood College, secretary of the General Conference Regional Department, associate secretary of the General Conference, and a general vice president of the General Conference. Another Pensacola convert, Otis B. Edwards, who attended SDA schools and earned a doctorate at the University of Nebraska, filled teaching posts and later became academic dean of Oakwood College.

Not to be overlooked in the development of the South Central Conference is the city of Huntsville, Alabama, and Oakwood College (founded 1895), an institution that from its inception has provided most of the Black ministerial recruits for the nation and the world. It was in 1913 that a tent meeting was held by George E. Peters in the city of Huntsville and a church organized in 1916. This was for many years the only Seventh-day Adventist church in Huntsville.

In the Huntsville area lived the William Clevelands, who became SDAs in Chattanooga. Three sons, all alumni of Oakwood, have become SDA ministers: Harold, former president of Allegheny West Conference; William, former president of Southwest Region Conference; and E. Earl, former associate secretary of the General Conference Ministerial Association.

Harvey W. Kibble, born near Huntsville, joined the church as a result of the college influence. Later he entered the ministry and was president of the Lake Region Conference for several terms.

The Calvin E. Moseley family in Brandon, Mississippi, who became SDAs under the preaching of Frederick S. Keitts, sent their two sons, Calvin, Jr., and Ernest, to SDA schools. Calvin Moseley, who entered the ministry and for 17 years was chair of the Department of Religion of Oakwood College, afterward became associate secretary, then secretary, of the Regional Department of the General Conference, and in 1958 a field secretary of the General Conference.

In the Morning Star movement, among the persons invited into the South in 1902, was Dr. Lottie C. Isbell, a medical graduate of Battle Creek, Michigan. She established a pioneer practice first in connection with the Nashville Colored Sanitarium and later with the Rock City Sanitarium (see Riverside Hospital). Dr. Isbell married David E. Blake, who afterward graduated at Meharry Medical College. The two took up residence in Panama.

In 1927 Mrs. N. H. Druillard, one of the founders of what was later Madison College, invested her funds in the Riverside Sanitarium, which she turned over in 1935 to the General Conference. Many people of means and influence have had their first contact with SDAs through Riverside, the first SDA hospital to gain a national reputation among Blacks.

The South Central Conference Organized. The work for the Black membership in northwest Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Kentucky, and Tennessee progressed until at the close of 1945 there were 2,456 members. When the General Conference, in its spring meeting at Chicago, Illinois (1944), voted to form conferences of the Black constituents (see Human Relations, Office of), the Southern Union Committee voted to establish two regional conferences within its borders. The eastern portion was organized into the South Atlantic Conference, with Harold D. Singleton, Southern Union evangelist, as president and Lyle S. Follette as secretary-treasurer. The western portion, Alabama, Mississippi, northwest Florida, Kentucky, and Tennessee, was organized into the South Central Conference, with Herman R. Murphy, evangelist of the Alabama-Mississippi Conference, as president and Vongoethe Lindsay secretary-treasurer. After occupying a dwelling at 1410 Hawkins Street in Nashville, the South Central Conference purchased and renovated a house at 1914 Charlotte Avenue, but later built a modern structure in the suburbs, opposite Riverside Sanitarium.

In March of 1964 E. W. Moore was called to be the director of lay activities for the South Central Conference, and he brought with him a unique burden for the poor and disenfranchised people of the area. A survey of Alabama, Mississippi, and Tennessee revealed a startling lack of health care and social services to the poor. Discussing the problems and needs with C. D. Joseph, then pastor in Jackson, Mississippi, Moore initiated the idea of a mobile medical unit that would deliver health care and social services to both urban and rural poor who had been denied this care since birth.

With no funds available, Moore and Joseph set out across the country to raise money through the "Mississippi Story" for a medical van. This venture raised $13,000, with which a new medical mobile unit was purchased and equipped. In July of 1967 the first national call for help came from the Detroit riot, where medical and ambulance service and food delivery were given by the van. The next national mission was Hurricane Beulah, Harlingen, Texas, in October 1967. Then tornadoes the same year in Gulfport, Pensacola, and Huntsville.

In March of 1968 the unit was ordered to Memphis, where Martin Luther King, Jr., was leading demonstrations in support of the sanitation workers. The unit was in Memphis at the time of King's assassination and patrolled the streets, helping to restore order. In May of 1968 the medical van joined a caravan of 11 Greyhound buses from Marks, Mississippi, and Memphis, Tennessee, in the Poor People's March to Washington, D.C. An elective with Riverside Hospital, Dr. T. M. Herring, took care of physical ailments during the four-day trip to the nation's capital. In Washington, D.C., the medical unit was designated as the only medical station within the confines of "Resurrection City," the temporary home of thousands of poor of every ethnic group from all over the United States. Senators, mayors, representatives, actors, ministers, and social leaders came to the van and praised the Seventh-day Adventists for their humanitarian services. As a result of the medical van in Resurrection City, the federal government gave a $49,000 grant for a feasibility study on mobile units.

Hurricane Camille was the next major disaster to receive the services of this unit, followed by health examinations during E. E. Cleveland's tent meetings in New Orleans and in Oakland, California.

Between disasters, the mobile units have been used to give screening tests for sickle-cell anemia, blood pressure, hematocrit, hemoglobin, ocular tension, visual acuity, urinalysis, and ENT examinations.

In 1968, while at Resurrection City, Moore was asked to meet at General Conference headquarters with C. E. Guenther, lay activities leader, who reviewed in detail the medical van idea, now used by other conferences. It was at this meeting that Moore suggested changing the name from Health and Welfare to Community Services.

Because of debts, storms, and crop failure, the first years were difficult financially. In the first decade new church buildings were erected in Louisville, Birmingham, Mobile, and Nashville. Evangelism has been productive. In spite of the moving of Black Americans from the South, the membership has doubled in the past 10 years. In the 31 years of C. E. Dudley's presidency, land for campsites were purchased, 98 church buildings and one new school building were constructed or bought, six housing projects, with a total of 355 units, were erected under conference sponsorship, a doctor recruitment program overseen by Dr. C. A. Dent brought 66 new doctors to this field, and dark-county evangelism brought many churches into the conference.

South Dakota Conference

SOUTH DAKOTA CONFERENCE. A former unit of church organization comprising the territory of the state of South Dakota. Statistics (1981): churches, 25; members, 1,932; church schools, 10 (plus a home school); ordained ministers, 9; licensed ministers, 5; church school teachers, 14. Headquarters: 217 North Grand, Pierre, South Dakota. The conference formed a part of the Northern Union Conference.

History

History. Beginnings of the Work in the Area. According to extant sources, Seventh-day Adventist teachings reached several areas of South Dakota as early as 1873, through Scandinavian members who migrated to the Dakota Territory. Within a few years the SDA faith spread to the English-speaking people, and later, in 1881, to the German and Russian segments of the population.

According to O. F. Frederikson, of Swan Lake (reporting in the Review and Herald, Jan. 1, 1875), Adventist doctrines were spread near Swan Lake in 1873 through the Scandinavian paper Advent Tidende, which had been established the year before. Since the seed sown by this foreign-language paper had aroused the interest of many, Frederikson called insistently for ministerial help. Early in 1874 the first minister was sent to the Dakota Territory—John F. Hanson, a former Baptist minister and a convert of John G. Matteson, who worked in the Scandinavian tongues. Hanson found four families keeping the Sabbath at Swan Lake. Among the first candidates he baptized was Frederikson, who continued to lead in the work in the area after Hanson departed. On Feb. 3, 1876, when Hanson returned to Swan Lake, 14 new members were added, bringing the total to between 40 and 50. These people adopted the plan of systematic benevolence, promised $100 for the coming year, and gave Hanson $25 for his services. This meant a sacrifice in view of their circumstances. A correspondent by the name of E. M. Frederikson reported in the Review and Herald in 1876 that he was the only American among this Scandinavian group and that he hoped the work could soon be conducted in English.

Meanwhile the work also developed elsewhere. In 1873 the Gipsons, an SDA family who had moved to the Elk Point-Pleasant Grove vicinity, scattered tracts and prepared the minds of the people for the spoken word. By 1876 a class of 16 had been organized at Pleasant Grove.

G. W. Pond, of Elk Point, reported that since 1874 the Review and Herald had been received there regularly and that one man had been convinced that the SDA doctrines were true and that several others were deeply interested. Members of another Protestant church became interested in Seventh-day Adventism as a result of their pastor's sermon falsely accusing the SDAs of continually setting a time for the world to be burned. An article in the Review and Herald convinced them that their minister had misrepresented SDA beliefs.

Pond's appeal for ministerial help was answered on June 30, 1876, when the first English-speaking ministers, R. M. Kilgore and E. W. Farnsworth, pitched what was probably the first gospel tent in South Dakota, at Elk Point, for a series of meetings. The novelty of a tent meeting caused many to attend. When Farnsworth and Kilgore moved from Elk Point on Aug. 20 they left a group of 24 adherents. The Elk Point church was organized on Feb. 2, 1877, with a membership of 26.

Among the early converts was a member of the Dakota Legislature. In the Mar. 22, 1877, number of the Review and Herald he reported, "In our legislature this winter, the day for holding school-meetings was changed from Saturday to Tuesday, that those who observe the seventh day may have the privilege of attending" (49:95).

About 1875 some German families in Dakota had learned of the SDA views by reading a few tracts put in their hands by Danish and American SDAs, and a few of them began to keep the Sabbath. No minister came until in 1881 L. R. Conradi was sent to Dakota to work especially for the Germans. On Apr. 9, 1881, he organized the first German Seventh-day Adventist church in America, at Milltown, with a membership of 19, and established others at Brotherfield and Immanuel Creek the same year. To these German converts in Dakota can be attributed the planting of SDA teachings in Russia. Having come from the Crimea, they began to send SDA tracts and papers to relatives and friends there, and in 1883 one of them, Philip Reiswig by name, returned to the homeland to follow up personally the interest aroused by the printed page.

On Jan. 13, 1879, the Dakota Tract and Missionary Society was organized, with S. B. Whitney as its first president. During the early months of 1879 Whitney visited SDA churches and groups in Dakota and formed local tract societies. This organization helped in the early development of the local churches and led to conference organization. The first camp meeting held in Dakota Territory (July 1879) was held at Sioux Falls on a wooded island of 10 acres (four hectares) in the Sioux River. There were 200 in attendance (approximately half Scandinavians). Besides the big tent for congregational meetings, there were 15 family tents and 15 covered wagons used for sleeping quarters. James and Ellen White attended this meeting.

Dakota Conference. The Dakota Conference was organized under the supervision of James White, president of the General Conference, on July 14, 1879. The churches at Swan Lake, Sunnyside, Elk Point, and Big Springs were formally admitted to membership in the new conference; companies at Finley, Milltown, Maple Grove, Emmanuel Creek, Madison, and Wolf Creek were "taken under its watchcare." The Dakota Conference included the present state of South Dakota except the Black Hills region. Theoretically it included North Dakota also, since the Dakota Territory was still undivided; but the SDA work was centered in the South. After ministers were sent to begin systematic work in North Dakota (1884), that area was made a mission and was sponsored by the Minnesota Conference. S. B. Whitney served as the first president, and he, D. T. Biggs, and Jorgen Poulson comprised the first conference committee. At the annual session of 1880 the churches at Sioux Falls, Tyndall, and Springfield and the organized company at Valley Springs were added.

Early colporteurs encountered many difficulties. They loaded their covered wagons with books, took their families along, made camp at a convenient spot, then while the family carried on the usual activities of life they walked or rode horseback about the country selling their publications in the German, Danish, and English languages. One colporteur, R. H. Peters, who rented out his farm to devote full-time to the work, reported in 1886: "I have worked . . . at Grand Forks, and have taken 120 orders for the Marvel of Nations and the Life of Christ, in Danish.”

The congregation at Badus (organized 1885) met in a sod church until 1894, when a frame structure was built. With the addition of the Huron church in March 1887, the Dakota Conference claimed some 600 members. The congregations at Bouwdle and near Custer were formed in 1890. Valentine Lehr and Conrad Reiswig, on Apr. 6, 1891, organized a church of 15 near Leola. In 1894 a sod church was erected 12 miles (20 kilometers) south of the town; this was replaced in 1907 by a wood frame and in 1925 by a new frame building. A church school was opened in 1916, with an enrollment of three, taught in the homes by Alfreada Mortenson. The church of Alexandria was organized on Jan. 1, 1895, as a result of six months' work by Luther Warren.

Changes in Conference Organization. From 1889 (when the Dakota Territory became the states of North and South Dakota) until 1895 the Dakota Conference became known as the South Dakota Conference. In July 1895 the constituency in North Dakota, which had been designated as a mission of the Minnesota Conference, voted to unite with the South Dakota Conference, which then became known as the Dakota Conference. This arrangement operated until 1901, when the Dakota Conference (1,824 members in 52 churches) was divided into the South Dakota Conference and the North Dakota Conference, effective in 1902. The South Dakota Conference at its beginning did not include the Black Hills area, which was at that time a part of the Nebraska Conference and later of the Wyoming Mission. With the exception of the depression years 1933—1937, when the Northern Union was merged with the Central Union, South Dakota Conference remained a part of the Northern Union Conference.

Growth. The Dakota membership was 1,824 in 52 churches in 1901. The new South Dakota Conference had 893 members in 26 churches in 1902. In its first year the conference opened an intermediate school, Elk Point Academy, which became Plainview Academy. The conference membership slowly rose, reaching a high in 1920 of 1,258 members in 33 churches. With the coming of the severe drought and low farm prices in the 1920s, the membership dropped steadily to a low of 1,178 in 1924. In 1925, with the addition of the Black Hills region and two North Dakota counties, Adams and Bowman (returned to the North Dakota Conference in 1928), the constituency was increased to 1,482.

Despite the low farm prices, devastating drought, and the merciless depression of the 1930s, which caused an unprecedented exodus from the state, the membership held up and even made a gain of 168 in the decade 1929 to 1939. Since that time the membership has held fairly steady, with a slight loss in the 1960s. In 1963 the 31 churches had a membership of 1,746.

South Dakota shares with Iowa some of the credit for the early beginnings of the Ingathering work. Jasper Wayne, the originator of the idea, although a resident of Iowa, had a nursery at Elk Point, South Dakota, where he raised fruit trees for sale in South Dakota, and it was during these trips that he developed the Ingathering idea. As early as 1905 he encouraged the students at Elk Point Academy to go Ingathering, in what seems to have been the very earliest student endeavors of this kind.

In the decade following 1900 medical missionary work was initiated for the Dakota Indians in the vicinity of Geddes. This was deemed the most effective way of reaching these people sorely in need of medical care. Because many of the older Indians could not understand English and even fewer could read, colporteur work and preaching were ineffective. Through the medical work, pioneered by Ray and Effie Jewett, much suffering was alleviated, the church principles became better understood, and the ground was cultivated for further evangelistic endeavors.

The increase and growth of the South Dakota Conference also brought an increase in conference facilities. On Sept. 2, 1922, at Watertown a two-story brick structure was dedicated, housing the conference headquarters on the first floor and the Watertown church on the second floor. This building, valued at $15,000, served as the conference headquarters until 1960.

Later Developments. In the earlier history most of the conference membership was in the farming portion of the state, but by the middle of the century there was an increasing concentration in the Black Hills region. This was reflected in the move of the conference office from Watertown in 1960 to Pierre, the state capital, now a more central point with respect to the conference membership. J. E. Cheek, a member of the Pierre church, made his $110,000 home available to the conference at less than half its original cost. This home provided conference offices and a branch Adventist Book Center. Three new homes were purchased in Pierre for the office staff.

In 1962 property was purchased at Eagle Butte, the new location of the Cheyenne River Indian Agency, for the purpose of erecting a church and parsonage to serve as an evangelistic center for the Indians there. The evangelistic center for the Dakota Indians was moved to Pine Ridge in 1969, and the school staff was increased in 1971 to two full-time teachers. A full-time cook was added in 1972 to have charge of the food program of two meals a day for the entire student body. With the help of a group of volunteer craftsmen from Colorado, a sizable addition to the school building was constructed in 1974. A new kitchen and dining room was in operation, plus public laundromat services for the community. The former kitchen-dining room area has been remodeled for the welfare center. Enrollment at the elementary school was 48 in 1974. In 1977 the Pine Ridge Mission started work on a new industrial arts building. When finished, there was a woodworking shop in the upper story and a mechanics and welding shop in the basement. The basement also had garage space.

Plainview Academy, located at Redfield, closed its doors in 1965 because of diminishing enrollment. In 1974 the constituency voted to join the North Dakota Conference in the operation of a new academy to be built near Bismarck, North Dakota. The school, which was named Dakota Adventist Academy, served both the South Dakota and North Dakota conferences starting with the 1977—1978 school year. In 1978 the South Dakota Conference agreed to help support the academy by paying one salary in the Bible Department, $10,000 for equipment and supplies, and $75,000 plus half of the sale of the west farm capital improvements.

In 1964 Mr. and Mrs. Joseph T. Reynolds donated an 80-acre (32-hectare) wooded property in the Black Hills, near Hill City, to serve as a youth camp. In 1968, 40 acres (16 hectares) were purchased, making a total of 120 acres (50 hectares). Flag Mountain Camp now consists of two large family cabins, a craft and storage building, a two-unit staff cabin, a four-unit staff cabin, and a spacious lodge that includes a dining hall and a kitchen. The four-unit staff cabin was built by volunteers in 1978. Other improvements also made in 1978 included a new water system and a 5,000-gallon (18,900-liter) holding tank to protect against fires.

The 1970s witnessed the remodeling of the churches in Bison, Madison, Yankton, Custer, Rapid City, and Platte. The Hurley congregation built a modern church that was dedicated on July 13, 1974. To facilitate the centralization of the church work in Bennett County, the church was moved from Batesland to Martin in 1973. A new church was organized in Belle Fourche in 1976, and a company started in Winner during 1977. Unfortunately, because of declining membership, the Colman, Tolstoy, McLaughlin, and Camp Crook churches were disbanded from 1974—1976. The year 1979 marked the 100th anniversary of the conference. During the triennium preceding 1979, 38 public meetings were held; there were three conference evangelists, 22 ministers and office workers, 15 elementary teachers, seven Pathfinder Clubs, and 11 elementary schools, including four new schools at Aberdeen, Hot Springs, Mobridge, and Yankton. Elementary school enrollment was 150 in 1978, and 46 students attended academies. Outreach ministries were also growing during this time. In 1977 the conference had three branch Sabbath schools and 18 Dorcas societies. The South Dakota Conference was the only conference in the union to have an Ingathering increase in 1977. Listen subscriptions doubled to 1,079 subscriptions in 1978.

In 1980 a new church was built in Redfield. Prior to that, the members had met in the Sunrise church school, which was established in 1911.

Camp meetings were held for a few years at the South Dakota State Fairgrounds in Huron and then college facilities in Huron were rented for the annual summer meetings.

In 1963 the 31 churches had a membership of 1,746. This number increased to 1,762 in 1965, after which it slowly dropped to a low of 1,508 in 1969. Since then, each year showed a slight increase until 1978, when the 25 churches registered 2,803 members. On Apr. 26, 1981, the constituency voted to merge with the North Dakota Conference. The merger took place in the fall of that year. At the time of the merger there were 25 churches and a membership of 1,931. (See Dakota Conference for facts about South Dakota after the merger in 1981.)

South India Observer

SOUTH INDIA OBSERVER (1940—1943; 1951—1971; monthly; in English). Official organ of the South India Union. Before 1953 it was mimeographed; thereafter printed. It was semimonthly in 1955 to 1962; monthly from 1963 to 1971. From 1972 it again was produced as a bimonthly. Since the vast majority of the union membership does not read English, its function has been largely replaced by the vernacular language monthlies—Malayalam Messenger and Tamil Messenger. Its chief function presently is to keep workers and those members reading English informed of denominational happenings and to encourage them to a deeper commitment in Christian experience and service.

South Lancaster Academy

SOUTH LANCASTER ACADEMY. A coeducational day school on the senior high school level in South Lancaster, Massachusetts. The academy offers advanced college preparatory and a general diploma course. It is accredited by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and the Seventh-day Adventist Board of Regents. In 1962—1963, when South Lancaster Academy was still a boarding school, there were 12 full-time teachers on the academy staff, with five of the college teachers as instructors in the Music and Art departments. The yearly enrollment was nearly 300, with about 70 seniors graduated each year. In 1965, after its boarding facilities had been replaced by Pioneer Valley Academy, New Braintree, Massachusetts, the South Lancaster Academy had an enrollment of 141 and a staff of 17 (15 teachers).

The “New England school,” yet unnamed, opened Apr. 19, 1882, with 19 students the first day and five more a few days later. S. N. Haskell, more than any other person, could be considered the founder and builder of the school. Goodloe H. Bell, formerly head of the English Department of Battle Creek College, became the first principal; Edith Sprague was his assistant. The courses offered were Bible, English, physiology, arithmetic, and missionary methods. The first term lasted 10 weeks.

Among the 80 students in 1882—1883 were many well-known names: Orville Farnsworth, F. M. Wilcox, A. E. Place, Joseph Mace, Carrie Mace, May Taylor, Fannie Dickerson, and K. C. Russell.

The “New England school” was incorporated in 1883 as South Lancaster Academy. A campaign for funds raised $25,000 for the erection of new buildings, the first two of which were the academy and the student home. Since Bell emphasized manual and physical education as well as academic, many vocational subjects were soon taught. In 1884 Mrs. Sara J. Hall joined the academy staff to teach English and continued with the school for 25 years. In 1885 South Lancaster Academy became a secondary school with a college preparatory course. School activities were scheduled from 5:00 a.m. to 9:00 p.m.; the chief diversions were hikes, winter sports, an occasional picnic, field trips, and a weekly literary society meeting.

E. E. Miles, head of the Bible Department, established the Miles Student Bindery, where hundreds of students have earned part or all of their school expenses. In 1888 four girls—Sadie Graham, Sadie Snyder, Ella Graham, and Rowena E. Purdon—were the first graduates of a full secondary course. Beginning in 1889, the enrollment increased and more advanced courses were offered.

From 1907 to 1909 a number of students and teachers went as foreign missionaries: Robert Beckner, Cuno Crager and his wife, Mary Cobban, Roy F. Cottrell and his wife, Pauline Schilberg, and William Robbins and his wife; Benjamin Machlan, three times the principal, went to the Australasian Missionary College.

Teacher training, first given in the academy in 1886, became an important project in the “normal school” (named the J. T. Browning Missionary and Industrial School), built in 1912—1913. Mrs. Jessie Osborne was the first director.

Advanced work was given in the Theological, Teacher Training, and Business departments for some years before the school name was changed to Lancaster Junior College in 1918. Thereupon the name academy was lost until the school began to operate on the senior college level in 1922.

After the beginning of Atlantic Union College, South Lancaster Academy gradually developed a separate organization with its own staff. Both academy and college continued to occupy the same campus until 1968, using the same buildings and facilities except for the academy dormitories—East Hall and West Hall (the old student home), accommodating 100 girls, and Thayer Hall, the former Thayer mansion, housing 75 boys. In 1968 the academy moved into its own building on George Hill Road, completely separating itself from Atlantic Union College.

The academy has its own Associated Student Body, which has a Student Council that plans student activities in the Sabbath school, Adventist Youth activities, and Friday vespers. It has its yearbook, Footsteps, and its paper, The Pioneer (the earlier journal, The Student Idea, now The Lancastrian, became the college paper).

In 1965 Pioneer Valley Academy at New Braintree, Massachusetts, became the boarding academy for the conference and South Lancaster Academy became a day school. In 1983 Pioneer Valley was closed, and in 1994 South Lancaster Academy introduced mini dorms for six boys and seven girls.

South Pacific Division

SOUTH PACIFIC DIVISION (formerly Australasian Division). A large unit of church organization to which is allotted the area of Australia, New Zealand, Papua New Guinea, and the islands of the South Pacific. Statistics (1992): churches, 1,452; members, 261,313; primary and secondary schools, 275; ordained ministers, 672; licensed ministers, 291; teachers, 539. Headquarters at 148 Fox Valley Road, Wahroonga, New South Wales, Australia. Official paper: South Pacific Division Record.

The South Pacific Division is comprised of three union missions and two union conferences. It embraces a vast territory in the South Pacific, from Pitcairn Island in the east to Perth in Western Australia, and from Kiribati, north of the equator, to Stewart Island, New Zealand, in the south.

During the 1980s the membership in the three island unions exploded significantly under the One Thousand Days of Reaping and Harvest 90 initiatives, reaching 76 percent of the total division membership. The division, which had taken 87 years to reach 100,000, in 1972, doubled in 15 years to pass the 200,000 mark in 1987. The ratio of church members to population in this division still remains the highest in the world—1 to 105 (1993 Yearbook).

History

History. The Australasian Union Conference was organized in 1894, and until 1901 it consisted only of Australia and New Zealand. It was the first union conference to be organized in the developing structure of the world church. In 1901 the South Pacific Islands (Tahiti, Pitcairn, Cook Islands, Samoa, Tonga, Fiji, Norfolk Island) were added to the union territory. In 1905 Singapore and Sumatra were attached; in the following year Java and the Philippines, and New Guinea in 1908. (However, in 1910 Singapore and the Philippines, and in 1911 Java and Sumatra, were allocated by the General Conference to the Asiatic Division.) The Australasian Union Conference became part of the Asiatic Division in 1915 and returned to its separate union status in 1919, when the Asiatic Division was split into the Far Eastern Division and the two unions of India and Australasia. The latter was organized as the Australasian Division in 1922, although it was composed of only one union and retained the name Australasian Union Conference.

Although the official Statistical Report of the General Conference has given the Australasian Union Conference the status of a division since 1930, it still operated under the name of a union conference and as a union conference until 1949. At that time the territory was divided into two union conferences and two union missions, operating under the title of the Australasian Inter-Union Conference. In 1956 it dropped the name Inter-Union Conference and was designated merely as the Australasian Division. On Dec. 2, 1958, the name was changed by official action to the Australasian Division of the Seventh-day Adventist Church.

As already noted, there were two union missions when the Australasian Inter-Union Conference was organized in 1949. However, the phenomenal rate of growth in membership in the Coral Sea Union Mission for the year 1952 (37.5 percent) and the difficulties involved in administering this large, scattered island territory indicated the advisability of dividing this union into two. Thus the Bismarck-Solomons Union Mission came into being in 1953. In 1972, because of political and other changes in the South Pacific, it became advisable to unite all islands belonging to the now-independent nation of Papua New Guinea under one denominational administration. So the islands of the Bismarck Archipelago (New Britain, New Ireland, etc.) and Bougainville were placed, along with the former Coral Sea Union Mission, under the control of the newly created Papua New Guinea Union Mission. The remaining territories of the Bismarck-Solomons Union (Solomon Islands Missions) and the island territories in the western section of the Central Pacific Union (Vanuatu, New Caledonia, Kiribati, Tuvalu) were formed into the Western Pacific Union Mission, with headquarters in Honiara. Later because of its ethnic relationship with Polynesia, Tuvalu returned to the Central Pacific Union.

In 1985 the Australasian Division became the South Pacific Division.

Constituent Organizations

Constituent Organizations. The South Pacific Division comprises two union conferences and three union missions:

1. Central Pacific Union Mission (organized 1949; reorganized 1972). Territory: American Samoa, Cook Islands, Fiji, French Polynesia, Niue, Pitcairn, Tokelau, Tonga, Tuvalu, and Western Samoa.

Statistics (1992): churches, 194; members, 31,215; church schools, 30; ordained ministers, 65; licensed ministers, 75; teachers, 59. Headquarters: 357 Princes Road, Tamavua, Suva, Fiji.

Constituent organizations and their territories—Cook Islands Mission (established 1892; organized 1923): Cook or Hervey Group and adjoining islands; Fiji Mission (formerly East Fiji Mission and West Fiji Mission; established 1895; organized 1921; reorganized 1951, 1958, 1965): Fiji Group, including Rotuma; French Polynesia Mission (established 1892; organized 1916): Australs, Gambier, Marquesas, and Society islands, and Tuamotu archipelago; Pitcairn Island Mission (established 1890): Pitcairn Island; Samoa Mission (established 1895; organized 1921): American and Western Samoa, and the Tokelau Islands; Tonga and Niue Mission (established 1895; organized 1921): Tonga and Niue; Tuvalu Mission (formerly part of Gilbert and Ellice Island Missions; established 1947, organized 1954, reorganized 1986): Tuvalu.

2. Papua New Guinea Union Mission (organized 1949; reorganized 1953, 1972; formerly Coral Sea Union Mission). Territory: Papua New Guinea. Statistics (1992): churches, 573; members, 140,455; church schools, 78; ordained ministers, 187; licensed ministers, 122; teachers, 152. Headquarters: 11 Memorial Ave., Lae, Papua New Guinea.

Constituent organizations and their territories—Central Papua Mission (established 1908): Central province of Papua New Guinea; Eastern Highlands Simbu Mission (organized 1953): Eastern Highlands and Simbu provinces of Papua New Guinea; Madang Manus Mission (organized 1949; reorganized 1953, 1972): Madang and Manus provinces of Papua New Guinea; Morobe Mission (organized 1953): Morobe province of Papua New Guinea; New Britain New Ireland Mission (established 1929; organized 1953; reorganized 1961, 1972): East and West New Britain and New Ireland province of Papua New Guinea; North East Papuan Mission (formerly North Papuan Mission and Milne Bay Mission. Organized 1953; reorganized 1972): Northern and Milne Bay provinces of Papua New Guinea; North Solomons Mission (formerly Bougainville Mission. Established 1929, organized 1953); North Solomons and adjacent islands; South West Papu Mission (Papuan Gulf Mission. Organized 1954; reorganized 1960): Gulf and Western provinces of Papua New Guinea; Sepik Mission (organized 1953): East and West Sepik provinces and Western Islands of Papua New Guinea; Western Highlands Mission (organized 1953): Enga, Southern, and Western provinces, one third of Sepik province, and one half of Western province of Papua New Guinea.

In 1990, because of political unrest and revolutionary forces, North Solomons Mission was transferred temporarily to the South Pacific Division for direct administration as an attached mission.

3. Trans-Australian Union Conference (formerly Trans-Commonwealth Union Conference. Organized 1949). Territory: the Federal Capital territory, the states of South Australia, Tasmania, Victoria, Western Australia, Cocos and Christmas islands, and the part of the state of New South Wales lying to the south and the west of a straight line from the entrance of Lake Illawarra to, but not including, Yerranderie, then due north to the Capertee River, following the river west to the 150th meridian of east longitude, then north to and including Cassilis, then to a line running northwest from Cassilis to a point just west of the town of Coonabarabran, but east of the 149th meridian of east longitude, and then direct west to the South Australian border, parallel with the Queensland border. In 1974 a minor territory adjustment between the North and South New Wales conferences is reflected in consequent changes to union territory boundaries.

Statistics (1992): churches, 188; members, 20,420; church schools, 36; ordained ministers, 112; licensed ministers, 23; teachers, 79. Headquarters: 3 Norfolk Road, Surrey Hills, Victoria, Australia.

Constituent organizations and their territories—South Australian Conference (organized 1899): South Australia; South New South Wales Conference (organized 1895; reorganized 1920, 1949): the Australian Capital territory and that portion of the state of New South Wales lying to the south and to the west of a straight line from the entrance of Lake Illawarra to Yerranderie but excluding the town of Yerranderie, then due north to the Capertee River following the river west to the 150th meridian of east longitude, then north to Cassilis and including the town of Cassilis and then a line running northwest from Cassilis to a point just west of the town of Coonabarabran, but not including Coonabarabran, but east of the 149th meridian of east longitude and then direct west to the South Australian border parallel with the Queensland border; Tasmanian Conference (organized 1901; reorganized 1926): Tasmania and adjacent islands; Victorian Conference (organized 1888): the state of Victoria, excluding the municipality of Wodonga adjacent to the city of Albury; Western Australian Conference (organized 1902): Western Australia, Cocos Island, and Christmas Island.

4. Trans-Tasman Union Conference (organized 1949). Territory: New Zealand with adjacent islands; that part of New South Wales lying to the north and to the east of a straight line from the entrance of Lake Illawarra to and including Yerranderie, then due north to the Capertee River, following the river west to the 150th meridian of east longitude, then north to but excluding Cassilis, then a line running northwest from Cassilis to a point just west of the town of Coonabarabran, but east of the 149th meridian of east longitude, and then direct west to the South Australian border parallel with the Queensland border, including Queensland, the Northern Territory, and the Norfolk and Lord Howe islands.

Statistics (1992): churches, 291; members, 37,524; church schools, 56; ordained ministers, 183; licensed ministers, 31; teachers, 152. Headquarters: 738 Pacific Highway, Gordon, New South Wales, Australia.

Constituent organizations and their territories—Greater Sydney Conference (organized 1949): that part of New South Wales bounded on the south by a straight line bearing westerly from the entrance of Lake Illawarra to Yerranderie, on the west by a straight line bearing due north from Yerranderie to the Capertee River, on the north by the Capertee, Colo, and Hawkesbury rivers to the sea, and on the east bearing southerly by the coast of New South Wales to the entrance of Lake Illawarra; Lord Howe Island; and Norfolk Island; North New South Wales Conference (organized 1920): that part of New South Wales north of the Hawkesbury and Capertee rivers as far as the 150th meridian of east longitude, then east of the line running north to Cassilis, but excluding the town of Cassilis, to a point just west of the town of Coonabarabran, but east of the 149th meridian of east longitude, and then directly west to the South Australian border parallel with the Queensland border. North New Zealand Conference (organized 1889; reorganized 1915): North Island of New Zealand; Northern Australian Conference (established 1929; reorganized 1955; 1984): that portion of Queensland north of a straight line parallel with the 22nd degree of latitude beginning at the coast at a point immediately south of St. Lawrence and running due west between Winton and Muttaborra, and north of Boulia to a point on the border between the Northern Territory and Queensland; the Northern Territory, and all islands off the coast of the above named that are part of Australia; South New Zealand Conference (organized 1915): South Island of New Zealand; South Queensland Conference (organized 1899; reorganized 1929): that portion of Queensland situated south of a straight line parallel with the 22nd degree of south latitude, beginning from the coast at a point immediately south of St. Lawrence, and running due west between Winton and Muttaborra and north of Boulia, to a point on the border of the Northern Territory.

5. Western Pacific Union Mission (formerly part of the Bismarck-Solomons Union Mission and part of Central Pacific Union Mission. Organized 1953; reorganized 1972 and 1986). Territory: Kiribati, Nauru, New Caledonia and Protectorates, Solomon Islands, Vanuatu, and Wallis and Futuna Islands.

Statistics (1992): churches, 206; members, 31,699; church schools, 75; ordained ministers, 73; licensed ministers, 39; teachers, 63. Headquarters: Palm Drive, Burns Creek, Honiara, Solomon Islands.

Constituent organizations and their territories—Eastern Solomon Islands Mission (established 1914; organized 1950; reorganized 1964): Bellona Island, Central Island, Guadalcanal, Rennel Island, and Isabel, Makira, and Temotu provinces; Kiribati Mission (formerly part of the Gilbert and Ellice Islands Mission; established 1947; organized 1954): Kiribati and Nauru; Malaita Mission (organized 1964): Malaita and adjoining islands; New Caledonia Mission (established 1925; organized 1954; reorganized 1984): New Caledonia, Isle of Pine, Loyalty Islands, and Wallis and Futuna islands; Vanuatu Mission (established 1912; organized 1924): Vanuatu; Western Solomon Islands Mission (established 1914; organized 1950): that portion of the Solomon Islands west of east longitude 159°.

Institutions

Institutions. The following institutions function in the South Pacific Division.

Southeast Asia Publishing House

SOUTHEAST ASIA PUBLISHING HOUSE (Nangyang Shi-zhao Bao-guan). A publishing organization with its own printing plant, operated by the Southeast Asia Union Mission at Singapore. It issues various Seventh-day Adventist publications in Chinese, English, Malay (English romanized), and Tamil, including the Far Eastern Division Outlook (in English) and The Messenger (in English).

The Southeast Asia Publishing House began in 1919 as the Malaysian Publishing House. Since then it has changed names three times: to Malayan Signs Press, Malaysian Signs Press, and Southeast Asia Publishing House. The first manager was Walter E. Gillis, one of the pioneer missionaries to China. Roger Altman arrived in August 1920 to serve as editor, and in 1921 H. I. Smith, the first permanent superintendent, arrived.

The first subscription books printed were Zaman Kita (“Our Day”), by W. A. Spicer, and a health book, Kitab Kesehatan. Other early publications were the monthly magazine Pertandaan Zaman (“Signs of the Times”), a hymnal, Lagoe Zion, and several different tracts and pamphlets. The publications were printed in the Dutch romanized Malay, with the exception of one or two in Jawi (Arabic Malay) and an occasional title in Batak, the language of north central Sumatra. In the 1930s L. I. Bowers, the third manager of the press, pioneered in issuing publications in the Annamese (Vietnamese) and Siamese (Thai) languages.

During the Japanese occupation of Singapore the press was closed, but the plant was completely reequipped and a new story above the factory was added to the building after World War II. In 1950 part of the equipment of the Signs of the Times Publishing House at Shanghai, China, was transferred to the Malaysian Signs Press, and the publication of the Chinese overseas edition of Signs of the Times began, with Samuel Tsai as editor.

Books are stocked in Chinese, English, Malay, and Tamil. While the bulk of the English books are imported from sister publishing houses in the United States, Chinese, Malays, and Indians are served by the publication of books in the national languages.

In 1988 house editor Win Turambi began to edit Malay books in standard Malaysian.

The management, with the assistance of the Publishing Expansion Fund of the General Conference, is making every effort to update plant equipment in keeping pace with modern printing techniques.

Managers: Walter E. Gillis, 1919—1921; H. I. Smith, 1921—1932; L. I. Bowers, 1932—1941; Y. F. Choo, 1942—1948; V. D. Bond, 1948—1952; E. N. Wendth, 1953—1957; Y. F. Choo, 1957—1972; Samuel Tsai, 1972—1975; Lim San Hoe, 1976—1984; John Ho, 1985—1990; David Tan, 1991—1992; Wong Yew Seng, 1993— .

Southeast Asia Union College/Southeast Asia Adventist Seminary

SOUTHEAST ASIA UNION COLLEGE/SOUTHEAST ASIA ADVENTIST SEMINARY. An educational institution that began as a small church school on Dhoby Ghaut Road in Singapore in 1905. In 1907 it was relocated to a site off of Thompson Road and became known as the Eastern Training School. The Eastern Training School became the Singapore Training School in 1915 and was moved to its present location at 273 Upper Serangoon Road, Singapore, in 1920. The first permanent buildings were completed by 1921 and are still used as classrooms and dormitories. During the past 80 years of its history, the school name was changed several times. Known as the Malaysian Union Seminary in 1923, it became the Malayan Seminary of Seventh-day Adventists in 1929, the Malayan Union Seminary in 1948, Southeast Asia Union College in 1958, and Southeast Asia Union College/Southeast Asia Adventist Seminary in 1976.

A major expansion of the curriculum was begun on June 30, 1950, when the Seventh-day Adventist General Conference Board of Regents gave approval for the seminary to offer two years of work beyond the secondary level and established the seminary with the rank of a junior college. With this authorization, the training program was reorganized in 1953 to provide regular junior college courses that could be transferred to degree curricula in Seventh-day Adventist colleges elsewhere. With this expanded curriculum, the initial mission of the institution was broadened, and in 1958 the name Southeast Asia Union College was adopted.

Up to 1970 the college was accredited as a junior college that offered two years of training. The General Conference Board of Regents extended the authorized offerings and in 1970 approved three years of instruction in education and theology. When the needs of the field demanded further expansion, full accreditation as a senior college to offer the B.Th. and B.Ed. degrees was granted by the General Conference early in 1971. The first four-year seniors were graduated in 1971. The next year the college board approved the upgrading of the business and secretarial science programs from two years to four years, and the addition of a four-year program in consumer science. Although these curricular offerings were approved, the college was not fully accredited.

These developments created a surge of interest, and more than 190 students were enrolled in 1972. This trend continued until 1976, when the college enrollment reached nearly 200. A dramatic reversal followed, and by 1979 enrollment had dropped to below 100.

From September to November 1979 the college conducted a major study to determine its future direction. The recommendations from a special ad hoc committee on the future of SAUC were used at the November 1979 Southeast Asia Union College board of directors meeting to make key decisions for the future of the college.

Because there appeared to be no possibility for the college to receive approval or accreditation by the Ministry of Education of Singapore to offer degrees in fields other than religion and theology, a decision was made to seek an affiliation with an SDA college in North America.

Walla Walla College was selected by the Southeast Asia Union College administration as the college in North America that would be contacted concerning affiliation. Administrators and academic personnel from Walla Walla College visited the Southeast Asia Union College campus during the years 1980—1983 and assisted in planning programs to meet criteria set by Walla Walla College so that Walla Walla College degrees could be offered on the Southeast Asia Union College campus. By August 1983 a draft of an affiliation agreement between the two colleges was presented for discussion on both campuses. This document was adopted after revision and has served as the formal contract governing the affiliation between the two colleges since 1984. The affiliation was formally inaugurated on Jan. 1, 1984, and has been operational since that time.

That year was historic for Southeast Asia Union College. In 1984 the college received full accreditation from the Board of Regents of the General Conference as well as from the Association of Theological Education in Southeast Asia (ATESEA).

The affiliation program with Walla Walla College was formally endorsed by the Northwest Association of Schools and Colleges (NWASC), a regional accrediting agency in the United States in 1986. In 1992 Southeast Asia Union College conducted a major self-study in preparation for an evaluation by a visiting team of educators from the Northwest Association of Schools and Colleges. The association team approved the programs of study affiliated with Walla Walla College, and this accreditation and affiliation allows students to earn degrees awarded by Walla Walla College while studying at Southeast Asia Union College. Accreditation by the Northwest Association of Schools and Colleges provides recognition and validity for the affiliation. Southeast Asia Union College has consolidated and strengthened its curricula to meet the requirement of the affiliation and adopted a curriculum model that ensures curricular compatibility with academic programs at Walla Walla College and other colleges and universities in North America.

Affiliated programs as of 1993 are business administration, education, English, office administration, and religion. Student enrollment in 1993 was 200, with a staff of 25.

Although changing needs and circumstances have altered the scope of the college's services, Southeast Asia Union College has continued to serve as an educational center as well as an agency for educational support of the Southeast Asia Union Mission of Seventh-day Adventists. Throughout the years of its operation, the college has continued to produce workers who now form the backbone of church work in Southeast Asia.

Southeast China Union Junior Academy

SOUTHEAST CHINA UNION JUNIOR ACADEMY. An educational institution operated at Kulangsu, suburb of Amoy, Fukien province, China, from 1909 to about 1950 (the date when it ceased operation is uncertain because of lack of communication with China). Opened by B. L. Anderson, it functioned first as an elementary school, then as an intermediate school, grades 4—12 or 7—12 (c. 1918—1921), a complete 12-grade school (1922—c. 1930), again as a 10-grade school (c. 1933—1940), and then as an elementary-junior high school (1946—c. 1950). It probably was closed during World War II.

The capacity of the school changed several times, ranging from 30 pupils to 400 students in grades 1 to 10 immediately before World War II. During most of its history it occupied four buildings on a lot of about five acres. Its enrollment kept up with its capacity, and at times exceeded it. The number of teachers averaged about 12. For many years it served as a training institution for national workers.

It was listed in the Yearbook under several names, not always the same as in the Statistical Report: Fukien Training School, Fukien Intermediate School, Sino-American Middle School, Bee Hoa or Bee Hwa Middle School, Bee Hwa Training Institute.

Southeast Hospital

SOUTHEAST HOSPITAL (Hospital del Sureste). A 46-bed medical institution established in Villahermosa, Tabasco, Mexico. It is one of four such institutions representing the Seventh-day Adventist Church at the national level in that country.

In 1959 the decision was made to build a welfare center, which began its services along with three medical consulting offices and a waiting room. The center operated for 15 years. In 1974 the welfare center was demolished, and the first and second floors for a clinic were constructed.

Since 1975 there have been many changes both in the physical plant and in personnel. A third floor was constructed, making it possible to add 23 more beds as well as space for the administrative offices, Accounting Department, and board room.

History

History. The first church in what is now the Southeastern California Conference (then the California Conference) was organized at San Pasqual, in San Diego County in 1884. Later, in 1900, a company was organized in the home of Noah Joseph. In 1902 C. E. Knight and his wife opened work in Riverside County, and as a result of public meetings in Riverside, baptized six before going on to Corona to build the work there. During the same year W. M. Healey reported a church of 140 members in San Diego, with a church school of 20 pupils and an active Young People's Society. In San Diego SDAs operated a restaurant, a health-food store, and treatment rooms directed by T. S. Whitlock, M.D.

The Ontario church came into being in 1905 as a result of interest created by house-to-house sales by P. P. Adams of Ellen White's Christ's Object Lessons, and evangelistic meetings in October 1904. In 1904 the Paradise Valley Sanitarium was established in National City, a suburb of San Diego, not by the conference, but as a stock company enterprise. This was later turned over to the Southern California Conference. In 1905 property at Loma Linda was purchased for a sanitarium, and in 1909 the College of Medical Evangelists was chartered by the state. The medical college was reorganized in 1961 as the School of Medicine of Loma Linda University, with campuses in Loma Linda and Los Angeles.

Prior to 1915 the work in the counties that now comprise the Southeastern California Conference was under the Southern California Conference, with offices in Los Angeles. Because of growth in membership and institutions in the southern California field, it was recommended at a meeting of the Southern California Conference committee, held Feb. 18—23, 1915, that for the sake of efficiency, the Southern California Conference be divided into two conferences: the Southeastern California Conference and the Southern California Conference.

The new Southeastern California Conference was assigned the territory of San Bernardino, Riverside, Orange, San Diego, and Imperial counties, and $35,379 in title funds. W. F. Martin was elected president, and John C. McReynolds secretary-treasurer. The newly formed conference began with 27 churches and 1,645 members. Offices were established at 617 East Fifth Street, Santa Ana, California. In 1916 they were moved to Riverside and in 1927 to Arlington.

In 1922 a Black church of 30, named Beacon Light church, was organized in San Diego as a result of pioneer self-supporting work by J. E. Johnson, a recent convert, followed by meetings by Sidney Scott.

In 1922 a boarding academy was opened 10 miles (16 kilometers) southwest of Riverside, near Arlington. The school, operated jointly by the Southeastern and Southern California conferences, became a junior college in 1927 and in 1939 became La Sierra College.

By 1932 the population in the Southeastern California Conference territory had grown to 604,160. Membership had reached 4,929, and there were 48 Sabbath schools. A laymen's evangelistic program gained 323 converts to church membership from 1928 to 1931, and public evangelism gained 1,362. Twelve new churches were organized during the quadrennium. Also by 1932, 22 church schools were in operation, with 54 teachers. Besides the junior college in Arlington, two academies were being operated: one at Loma Linda and another at San Diego.

On Apr. 9, 1932, at a constituency meeting held at Phoenix, Arizona, the Arizona Conference and the Southeastern California Conference were united, and C. S. Prout was elected president of the combined Southeastern California-Arizona Conference. Four years later the Arizona Conference was again separated. The Santa Ana Spanish church was voted into the conference. During this four-year period there had been 969 baptisms.

When an interest in the manufacture of health foods developed, Glenn Calkins was asked to visit Australia to study the health food work there and to recruit help. Subsequently, in 1938 the Loma Linda Food Company opened a factory on property adjoining the La Sierra College campus in Arlington, California.

Growing emphasis on youth evangelism led to the purchase in April 1932 of property for a junior campsite in the San Jacinto Mountains southeast of Riverside. In 1961 the conference purchased 320 acres (130 hectares), called Pine Springs Ranch, near Idyllwild, California, to provide better facilities for growing camp attendances.

In 1938 the Southeastern California Conference organized the Calexico Mission School on the United States side of the Mexican border, where in 1964 there was an enrollment of 314 students, most of whom came from Mexico. The school has served as an evangelistic enterprise, with a number of students being baptized each year.

One of the major challenges by 1993 was the dramatic increase in immigration as reflected in the great increase in foreign language churches. Together with the African-American congregations, the minority membership of the conference constitutes more than one third of the total. To nurture this large minority membership, the conference has elected three vice presidents, one each for African-American, Asian-South Pacific, and Hispanic affairs.

Another major challenge is the nurture and education of youth. In 1993 the conference executive committee established Education Summit as a continuing commission to study needs and devise ways and means to provide adequately for the nurture and education of youth.

A third major objective is full gender equality in recruitment, training, appointment, ordination, and remuneration of ministers.

Presidents (for presidents of the Southern California Conference before the Southeastern California Conference was separated from it, see Southern California Conference): W. F. Martin, 1915—1919; J. L. McElhany, 1919—1920; B. E. Beddoe, 1920; J. J. Nethery, 1921—1926; P. E. Brodersen, 1926—1927; Glenn A. Calkins, 1927—1930; C. S. Prout, 1930—1934; E. F. The conference came into being on Jan. 1, 1981, with approximately 8,500 members and 51 churches. There were 20 pastors, with five church schools and 24 teachers. J. A. Edgecombe was asked to give leadership as the first president of the new conference. D. A. Walker was elected secretary-treasurer, a position he had held in the South Central Conference.

From the beginning evangelism has been a major thrust in the Southeastern Conference. The membership more than doubled in the first decade of its existence. The spectacular growth has been divided among Hispanics, French, and English churches. In 1993 Southeastern was the fifth-largest conference in the Southern Union. During that year there were 69 English-speaking churches, with 14,474 members; 19 French-speaking churches, with 3,438 members; and 9 Spanish-speaking churches, with 940 members. Conference property is valued at more than $29 million.

The campsite at Hawthorne, Florida, where camp meetings and junior and senior camps are held annually, was shared by South Atlantic and Southeastern from 1981 to 1983. In recent years Southeastern has paid off its financial obligation and become the sole owner of the camp.

Presidents: J. A. Edgecombe, 1981—1988; J. M. Doggette, 1988—1994; R. R. Brown, 1994— .

Southeastern Union Conference

SOUTHEASTERN UNION CONFERENCE. A former North American administrative unit comprising the following local conferences: Cumberland, Florida, Georgia, North Carolina, and South Carolina. Headquarters were first in Atlanta, Georgia, then from 1920 in Chattanooga, Tennessee. The official organ was Field Tidings.

This union conference was organized in January 1908 from part of the territory of the Southern Union Conference. Beginning in 1910, there was a union mission department for Blacks, and thereafter the various conferences had their own such missions (or departments, or committees). These might be considered the forerunners of the later South Atlantic Conference. In 1932 the Southern and Southeastern union conferences recombined to be called the Southern Union Conference.

Presidents: W. A. Westworth, 1908—1909; Charles Thompson, 1909—1912; C. B. Stephenson, 1912—1913; O. Montgomery, 1913—1915; W. H. Branson, 1915—1919; W. H. Heckman, 1919—1932.

Southern Academy

SOUTHERN ACADEMY. A coeducational day school on the senior high school level, situated in San Fernando, Trinidad. It is under the direction of a general board of management, meeting annually to make the policies and take major actions, and an executive board, which usually meets monthly to care for routine school business. The academy serves the Seventh-day Adventist Church members in and around San Fernando. The school meets in a large building across the street from the San Fernando Seventh-day Adventist Church.

Southern Academy opened in April 1953 as the secondary section of the San Fernando school, with 57 secondary students and two teachers. During the next term a third teacher was added and the enrollment reached 69. In 1954, when the elementary section was separated, the name Southern Academy was given to the secondary section.

Because of the increasing enrollment, the school, which at first had operated in the San Fernando church, was moved to rented quarters. Since October 1957 it has used a two-story building erected by the South Caribbean Conference.

After being under the control of the local church for six years, the academy came under the direct control of the South Caribbean Conference in 1958. In 1992 it was accredited for three years by the Inter-American Division Commission on Accreditation and the General Conference Board of Regents.

Southern Asia Division

SOUTHERN ASIA DIVISION. A large unit of church organization to which is allotted the territory of the Andaman and Nicobar islands, Bhutan, India, the Maldives, and Nepal. Statistics (1992): churches, 920; members, 190,177; schools, 185; ordained ministers, 373; licensed ministers, 167; teachers, 2,243. Headquarters: Jeevan Jyothi, Hosur, Tamil Nadu, India. Official organ: Southern Asia Tidings.

The territory was first organized in 1910 as the India Union Mission, then as a part of the Asiatic Division from 1915 to 1918. It was reorganized in 1919 as a separate union, and then in 1920 it became the Southern Asia Division, with 26 churches and 978 members.

In the division year-end meetings of 1970 a major reorganization realigned the unions of India. The division territory was again realigned in 1986, when Bangladesh, Burma, and Sri Lanka were attached to the Far Eastern Division, and Afghanistan and Pakistan were added to the Trans-European Division.

Constituent Organizations

Constituent Organizations. The Southern Asia Division is composed of four union sections and two attached fields.

1. Central India Union Section (organized 1929; reorganized 1956, 1970). Territory: Andhra Pradesh, Gujarat, Maharashtra, Orissa, and the territory of Dadra and Nagar Haveli. History

History. Organization, 1901. Because of the growth of the work in the California Conference the separation of a Southern California Conference was recommended at the 1901 Oakland camp meeting and effected soon after (for the earlier period, see California Conference).

The territory of the new conference included that portion of California lying south of the summits of the Tehachapi and Santa Ynez mountain ranges. The conference was organized with four ordained and six licensed ministers, and with Clarence Santee as its first president.

Prior to the organization of the Southern California Conference, churches had been established in Los Angeles—one on lower Fifth Street near the Los Angeles River and another on Carr Street near Hill and Twelfth. The Carr Street church has since moved to its present site adjacent to the Harbor Freeway and is now known as the Central church. In the course of time, other churches sprang up in and about Los Angeles.

In the early years of the new conference, the sparse working force depended much on the laity. To inspire and train laymen for missionary work, in the spring of 1903 a series of missionary conventions was held in Pomona, in Santa Ana (which is now part of the Southeastern California Conference), and in the first church erected along the southern California coast at San Pedro.

Institutions. Church schools played an important part in the early development of the work in the conference. The church school organized in Centralia, southeast of Los Angeles, taught by Alma E. McKibbin in 1898 and 1899, was followed in 1902 by schools conducted in Santa Ana, Pasadena, Norwalk, at the Carr Street church in Los Angeles, and in other cities. The conference also opened Fernando “College” at San Fernando in 1902 (see San Fernando Academy).

The first medical institution established by the conference was the Glendale Sanitarium, founded in 1905 and moved to its present site in 1925. Preceding this, a group of Seventh-day Adventist stockholders had established the Paradise Valley Sanitarium in 1904, which the conference acquired several years later. In November 1905 Loma Linda Sanitarium was opened. (The last two institutions are now in the Southeastern California Conference.)

At Loma Linda, in the fall of 1906, the Loma Linda College of Evangelists was opened (now the Loma Linda University School of Medicine). Medical evangelism was conducted in neighboring cities and towns by S. N. Haskell and his wife and Dr. Lillis Wood Starr. Later a small clinic, begun on East First and Boyle streets in Los Angeles, became the White Memorial Hospital (1918).

Evangelism. During 1904 William Ward Simpson with Ernest Lloyd as song director held tent meetings in what is now downtown Los Angeles. Other evangelists were Luther Warren in 1908—1910, J. W. McCord, Fred Paap, Milton St. John, E. J. Hibbard, C. E. Ford, and others. About 1912 Phillip Knox began public work with good results.

In 1906 Jennie Ireland, a graduate nurse of Battle Creek Sanitarium, began doing medical missionary work among the Blacks in Los Angeles. Asking a Black postman whether he knew of any of his people who would be interested in studying the Bible, she was referred to his wife. Eventually, in August 1908, the Furlong (later Wadsworth) Seventh-day Adventist church was organized with 23 charter members, the first Black church west of Ohio. Membership grew to 100 before the church had a pastor. The first African-American full-time employee was Amy Temple, a Bible instructor. In the conference today there are 14 Black churches, with 9,804 members and 24 ministers.

Interest among the large Spanish-speaking population in the conference began from a cottage meeting held by a layman in 1905. In 1906 E. S. Ballenger baptized eight. The conference then hired Augusta E. De Angeles as the first full-time Hispanic worker. By 1907 the first Spanish company was organized, and in 1909 the Los Angeles Gless Street church, which until 1928 held its meetings in a hall. Evangelism was promoted by Francisco Westphal and S. Nicolas. From the one Spanish American church that later moved to its present site at Boyle and Michigan streets, 36 churches have been formed, with a total membership of 14,259, served by 35 ministers. In 1993 there also were 22 Asian/South Pacific churches with 5,429 members and 20 ministers. They worship in nine languages.

The Southern California Conference grew steadily. By June 30, 1910, the church membership reached 2,750; and 17 church schools were being operated. By January 1915, when the membership had increased to 3,764, the conference was divided into two (the Southern California Conference and the Southeastern California Conference). The reorganized Southern California Conference, with B. E. Beddoe as president, had 29 churches and 2,163 members, with $40,728 tithes. Its territory embraced Los Angeles, Santa Barbara, and San Luis Obispo counties, plus the part of Kern County lying south and east of the Tehachapis. However, a single tract society operating from the Southern California Conference office served both conferences. At the close of 1931 there were 31 ordained ministers, 12 ministers holding ministerial licenses, and 43 church school teachers in the conference.

In 1923 the Fernando Academy was closed and two nonboarding schools—the Glendale Academy (which began in 1907 as an elementary school) and the Los Angeles Academy at 3131 Pasadena Avenue in Los Angeles—took its place. In 1924 an academy was opened at Long Beach. In 1938 Lynwood Academy (now Los Angeles Adventist Academy) replaced Long Beach and Los Angeles academies. In 1948 Newbury Park Academy, 50 miles (80 kilometers) north of Los Angeles on Highway 101, was opened as the conference boarding school. Since then two day academies have been added: San Gabriel Academy in 1959 and San Fernando Valley Academy in 1960.

In 1941 the conference purchased 160 acres (65 hectares) in the San Bernardino Mountains and established a youth camp, named Cedar Falls Camp. In September 1959, on 20 acres (eight hectares) adjacent to the Newbury Park campus, a half mile (.3 kilometers) from Highway 101, it opened Ventura Estates, a home accommodating 122 senior citizens. This is now a million-dollar investment.

In the early days camp meetings were held at different places, such as at San Fernando, in Glendale at Glendale Avenue and Verdugo Road, and in Los Angeles at Washington Street and at 80th and Vermont streets. However, after 1938 the conference conducted the annual camp meeting on the campus of Lynwood Academy for many years.

In 1932 the conference membership exceeded 7,242, in 51 churches; the conference church school enrollment had reached 915, with 43 teachers, and the academy enrollment reached 309; literature sales for 1931 were $8,000 more than the high for any previous year. The tithe during the depression quadrennium was $204,866 above the previous four years.

A unique form of evangelism was pioneered and developed in Southern California Conference by H.M.S. Richards, who began broadcasting from Long Beach in 1930. From this nucleus sprang the worldwide Voice of Prophecy radiobroadcast, with its headquarters at Glendale. Another new form of evangelism was introduced in 1960 with The Adventist Hour telecast on which Sabbath worship services from different Southern California churches were televised for general viewing.

The development of the work in Southern California Conference is reflected by its expansion of office facilities. From a small conference office at San Fernando, the headquarters moved to five different sites in Los Angeles until the present building in Glendale, housing a staff of 58, was occupied in 1952.

Southern College of Seventh-day Adventists

SOUTHERN COLLEGE OF SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTISTS. A coeducational senior college situated at Collegedale, Tennessee, near Chattanooga. The organization is directly responsible to the Southern Union Conference, and serves the Seventh-day Adventist constituency of Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, Florida, Georgia, and North and South Carolina.

The 1992—1993 college faculty numbered 134 (including 45 part-time teachers), of whom 45 had doctoral degrees. The staff also included 120 hourly employees.

Graysville Academy. Southern College traces its beginnings to the Seventh-day Adventist church in the small village of Graysville, Tennessee. In the fall of 1891 the pastor, R. M. Kilgore, invited G. W. Colcord and his wife from Oregon to open a school to train Christian workers. For a classroom, Colcord rented a room above J. W. Clouse's general store. While preparing an outside stairway to the classroom and making benches, Colcord announced classes to be held in the church. In the spring of 1892 the school opened with 23 students, each paying $4 a month. At the close of the term the enrollment had increased to 32 students. To further the work of education, Colcord put his own money into the project, and the pastor raised funds and donated labor. In 1893 a boxlike structure 45 feet square (four square meters), with two stories above a 10-foot (three-meter) basement, was erected on a nine-acre (four-hectare) campus, the entire property valued at approximately $3,000. The school became known as Graysville Academy.

Although the establishing of Graysville Academy had been encouraged by the Southern Seventh-day Adventist leaders, it remained a private venture until 1895. In that year the title to the Graysville property was given to the General Conference, and on Sept. 9, 1896, the school opened as a General Conference institution. The enrollment was 75, of whom 24 were boarding students. In 1897 the name was changed to Southern Industrial School, and four years later to Southern Training School.

Soon after the turn of the century, medical work was begun, temporarily in two cottages, while plans were developed for the Graysville Sanitarium and Hospital (opened in 1903). This institution was closely affiliated with the school and gave work opportunities to students. In 1907 the main academy building was enlarged, and three years later a men's dormitory was erected. But from 1912 and on there was a feeling that the school should be moved. The land area held by the school was limited; more acreage was needed to allow the development of agricultural and vocational training facilities. Furthermore, the village restricted the campus and created certain social problems. When fire destroyed the women's residence hall on Feb. 18, 1915, it was decided not to rebuild at Graysville but to seek a more suitable and larger site.

After several weeks of investigation of sites in Georgia, Alabama, and Tennessee, a committee selected the James Thatcher farm in Hamilton County, Tennessee, priced at $11,000, and chose "Collegedale" as a name for the anticipated community.

Indebtedness at Graysville totaled approximately $14,000 in May 1916. The North American Division stipulated that this indebtedness must be paid and that there must be cash on hand before the committee was to proceed with purchasing property in a new location. Within a few months sufficient funds were raised to pay off the debts and the new property was secured.

Southern Junior College. With the move in October 1916, the school became known as Southern Junior College. The first staff at Collegedale consisted of 13 teachers and work supervisors, and the student body was composed of 57 students. Leo Thiel served as the first president of the new college, and A. N. Atteberry, the last principal of the academy, served as the first business manager.

The first major structure erected was the women's residence hall, built in 1917. The men's residence hall was constructed in 1919, and the administration building (later named in honor of President L. H. Wood) was built in 1924. Several industrial and agricultural buildings, a normal (teacher-training) building, and a number of faculty cottages were also constructed during the first decade at Collegedale.

During the 1930s a new building was erected for elementary teacher training, and a number of small industries—a broom factory, a hosiery mill, a dairy refrigeration plant, a chair factory, and a cereal puffery—were operated to help students earn their expenses.

One of the benefactors of the college was John H. Talge, a furniture manufacturer of Indianapolis, Indiana, who gave thousands of dollars' worth of furniture, flooring, and fixtures at the time when shortages were most critical. In appreciation for his help on Collegedale's first dormitory, the name Talge Hall was given to two successive men's residence halls.

The college enrollment surpassed 100 for the first time in the 1934—1935 term. The junior college, accredited in 1936, graduated 24 in that year and 33 in 1938, the high mark before the upsurge in enrollments after World War II.

In 1944 the Spring Council of the General Conference approved the request of the Southern Union Conference to raise the status of the Southern Junior College to that of a senior college.

Southern Missionary College. With his assumption of the presidency in 1943, K. A. Wright laid immediate plans to provide for the anticipated increased enrollments and to achieve senior college accreditation. The board of trustees voted $300,000 to be spent largely for new buildings and equipment. The library (the A. G. Daniells Memorial), the science building (Earl Hackman Hall), the music building (Harold Miller Hall), a general store, and a post office were built. In May 1946 a class of six participated in the first senior college graduation. During 1950 the Southern Association of Colleges and Schools granted accreditation to Southern Missionary College as a liberal arts college.

The college enrollment increased from 177 in 1944 to 258 in 1945, and to 503 in 1946. This was followed by a decline during 1947—1950, but in 1951 the enrollment stood at 575, a figure not surpassed until 1958 when the enrollment reached 597. It passed the 1,000 mark during the 1964—1965 school year and reached its all-time high of 2,079 in 1980.

From 1955 to 1963, the college added a cafeteria building, a new women's dormitory, an addition to the science building, the Collegedale Book Bindery, and a new shopping center. The net worth of the college at the end of the fiscal year 1960 was $2,391,669.37. By 1965 it was $4,070,091.62.

In 1961—1962 and every decade thereafter, the college conducted a self-study reevaluation program in preparation for reaccreditation by the Southern Association of Colleges and Schools. It was fully reaccredited as a member of the association in 1962, 1972, 1982, and 1992. In addition, the Nursing Department is accredited by the National League for Nursing and the state of Tennessee. The teacher education programs are accredited by the state, and the Music Department is affiliated with the National Association for Schools of Music.

The following buildings were constructed between 1962 and 1976: Thatcher Hall (women's residence hall), Talge Hall (men's residence hall), McKee Library, Wright Hall (administration building), Physical Education Center, Summerour Hall (originally built for home economics; now used for education and behavioral science), Ledford Hall (industrial education building), broom shop, Collegedale Interiors building, Collegedale church, Herin Hall (nursing education), totally new academy complex, two housing complexes for married students, a 100-unit mobile home court, student center-cafeteria complex, and the college shopping plaza. In addition, both dormitories and several other campus buildings were enlarged.

Southern College of Seventh-day Adventists. Buildings completed during the 1980s include J. Mabel Wood Hall (music) and Richard Brock Hall (business and humanities). In addition, alumni sponsored the renovation of Miller Hall (for the religion department) and Lynn Wood Hall. Another major project completed in the 1980s was the construction and installation of the Anton Heiller memorial organ in the Collegedale church. It is the largest organ of its type built in this century in North America. Construction of a new science building began in 1993. As of May 31, 1992, the net worth of the institution, since 1983 named Southern College of Seventh-day Adventists, was $23,369,573.88.

The college offers 36 baccalaureate degrees, 14 associate degrees, and a one-year certificate in auto body repair.

Southern European Division

SOUTHERN EUROPEAN DIVISION. A large unit of church organization that functioned from Jan. 1, 1929, to Dec. 31, 1971, during the last 18 months under the name of Trans-Mediterranean Division.

Organized at the European Division council, held at Marienhöhe, Darmstadt, Germany, August 1928, when the former European Division was divided into four separate divisions, the Southern European Division began functioning on Jan. 1, 1929. Five union fields were assigned to the SED: the Latin Union, the Iberian Union Mission, the Yugoslavian Union Mission, the Romanian Union, and German Switzerland, comprising the countries of Algeria, Belgium, France, Italy, Morocco, Portugal, Spain, Switzerland, Yugoslavia, and Romania. Cameroon, Madagascar, and Mauritius were assigned to the Southern European Division as mission territories. Membership, excluding the missions, stood at 14,101, and headquarters were located in Berne, Switzerland. A. V. Olson served as the first president (1929—1946).

Growth was steady and encouraging until the war, when communications were interrupted and organizational activities curtailed. After 1946 the church experienced new growth. As the result of the war and of reassignment of border boundaries, other fields were added to Southern European Division territory: the Hungarian Union in 1940; Austria, Czechoslovakia, and Greece in 1946, and Israel in 1955. In 1950 Angola and Mozambique were also assigned to this division as additional mission territories.

At the 1970 General Conference session, the delegates in attendance adopted the name “Trans-Mediterranean Division” to better designate their territory. This was used until Jan. 1, 1972, when the TMD was joined to the Central European Division to become the Euro-Africa Division. Other presidents were W. R. Beach (1946—1954); M. V. Campbell (1954—1958); Marius Fridlin (1958—1969); W. E. Murray, acting (1969—1970); C. L. Powers (1970—1971).

Southern Mindanao Academy

SOUTHERN MINDANAO ACADEMY. A coeducational boarding school on the senior high school level operated by the Davao Mission at Camanchiles, Matan-ao, Davao, in southern Mindanao Island, in the Philippines. In 1964 the school property comprised about 49 acres (20 hectares) of land and six permanent buildings situated in an agricultural area; the school farm produces corn, sugarcane, mangoes, avocados, jack fruit, coconuts, as well as a variety of vegetables.

Southern Mindanao Academy began operation in Digos, Davao, in 1950 as an elementary school under the direction of Mrs. F. M. Decolongon. The school became a junior academy in 1952, at which time there were 236 students enrolled. Salvador Miraflores was the first academy principal. Soon overcrowded conditions necessitated a move to a larger area. About eight acres (three hectares) of farmland were purchased at Camanchiles, Matan-ao, Davao, at a cost of 7,000 pesos, of which 6,000 pesos was contributed by Frank R. La Sage and his wife, and the remaining 1,000 by the Southern Mindanao Mission (now the Davao Mission). The Far Eastern Division allocated 40,000 pesos and the South Philippine Union Mission 20,000 pesos, derived from Ingathering funds for the construction of school buildings. In addition, a Thirteenth Sabbath Offering overflow provided funds for two dormitories.

Early in 1958 work began on the dormitories, a kitchen-dining hall, and the principal's cottage. The academy transferred to its new site for the 1958—1959 school term and at that time a third year was added to the curriculum. In 1959—1960 the school became a full academy. Government accreditation of the elementary grades and of the junior academy was given in 1958, and the third and fourth years of high school were accredited by the government as they were added. By 1964 the academy had six permanent buildings—two dormitories, two teachers' cottages, a kitchen-dining hall, and an administration building. Late in 1968 Bowen's Hall was erected to house the elementary grades, and early in 1973 another teacher's cottage was added to the existing buildings.

Principals: Salvador G. Miraflores, 1952—1954; Jose M. Atil, 1954—1963; D. B. Alsaybar, 1963—1965; R. Z. Bartolome, 1965—1966; A. G. Gensolin, 1966—1967; D. B. Alsaybar, 1967—1968; E. A. Southern Missionary Society

SOUTHERN MISSIONARY SOCIETY. An organization that operated for more than two decades and promoted mission schools and evangelism among the Black people in the Southern states. It was a volunteer project supported by the sale of publications and by contributions from the church at large; later it merged with conference organizations. It was founded by J. Edson White and composed originally of the group of missionary recruits whom he gathered and transported down the Mississippi on his riverboat Morning Star. The founders of the Southern Missionary Society reached Vicksburg, Mississippi, in January 1895 under the instruction of, and bearing the credentials of, the General Conference. After about two years the Morning Star moved to Yazoo City, Mississippi, and work opened there. From that time on, the society carried on its work at Vicksburg and Yazoo City and intermediate river points, and aimed to give greater unity and solidity to the work in the South, particularly among Blacks. The object of the society, as stated in the Gospel Herald, was “to carry the principles of Christian education to the people of the South” (December 1899, p. 105). To avoid costly mistakes and provide for greater efficiency the society, begun informally by these missionary workers, held regular councils, in which plans were laid for different lines of work.

Although the boat was used as a base, it was necessary to purchase land for children’s homes, industrial schools, and church buildings; and because of prejudice against the Northern White person who came to teach the Southern Black, it was necessary to buy land and build homes to house the workers. In order to hold and manage such properties, the society became a corporation in 1898, chartered by the state to hold all necessary property under its name and to conduct all business operations through its regularly elected officers. The incorporation was approved by Ellen White, who counseled the society that men whom God had led to pioneer a new work should organize so as to place the work under the management of those who had borne its burdens and who understood its necessities (ibid., p. 104).

F. W. Halladay, F. H. Schramm, C. W. Smouse, J. E. White, and F. R. Rogers formed the first Board of Directors. J. E. White was elected president. In 1899 they added two new directors, E. A. Sutherland and P. T. Magan, and appointed F. H. Schramm business manager for the health food enterprise to be known as the Dixie Health Food Company. Stock in the corporation, limited to 10,000 shares, was made available to all at $1 a share. Some 3,200 share certificates were printed by the spring of 1900.

The sale of stock, however, was far from adequate to support the work. From time to time urgent appeals in behalf of various missionary projects were made in the columns of the organ of the society, the Gospel Herald. (For the two successive journals of that name, see Gospel Herald.) White produced several books especially for the support of the activities of the society, from which all royalties were donated to its projects. These books, which sold widely, were The Gospel Primer, by J. E. White and W. O. Palmer; Christ Our Saviour, by Ellen White; and The Coming King, Best Stories From the Best Book, and The Story of Joseph, all three by J. E. White. Some of these were published in four languages. About the end of 1900 the society headquarters and the Herald Publishing Company were established in Nashville, Tennessee.

The educational work was headed by F. R. Rogers, from the Pacific Coast. At Yazoo City the work was carried on in a movable chapel and a school built in sections. Rogers and his wife began the school there with 200 to 240 elementary pupils, including adults. In this school, which was known as the "holy school," the pupils studied the ABCs, The Gospel Primer, The Gospel Reader, Christ Our Saviour, Patriarchs and Prophets, and the Bible. When because of local opposition the White teachers were replaced by Blacks, Rogers became the superintendent of instruction for the Southern Missionary Society in the state of Mississippi.

Other society workers in Mississippi included J. W. Darner, who directed a school for the Blacks at Columbus, Mississippi, in 1902; at Yazoo City W. H. Sebastian, who did house-to-house missionary work, while Mrs. Sebastian and a man named Murphy directed the school; M. C. Strachan and his wife, who worked for the Blacks in Jackson, where a school was begun also in 1902, with one child, but in one year the enrollment reached 25 to 30 and a company of 11 converts was prepared for organization; N. B. King and Mrs. L. C. Roby, who were in charge of the Black schoolwork at Vicksburg at this time (both former public school teachers at Yazoo City who became SDAs there). The schools resulted in the formation of a number of churches. At Brookhaven one man, who had accepted the SDA message by reading, gained a following of 12, whereupon Strachan came to help at Brookhaven.

When, at the General Conference in April 1901, nine Southern states, known then as the General Conference District no. 2, were organized into the Southern Union Conference, the Southern Missionary Society was accepted as a branch of the new union. This secured for the society additional moral support and cooperation, though the infant union conference, not even self-supporting, was unable to provide financial help. In 1906, when White retired, the society was incorporated more closely with the union, with G. I. Butler, the union president, as board chair.

The society, which had begun in Mississippi and had extended its activities to Tennessee, became responsible for the Black work in all the territory south of and including Kentucky and east of the Mississippi River. The ministers were to be supported by the tithe in the local conferences, and the mission schools by the society's funds, received from contributors throughout the country. In practice, since only three of the Southern conferences were self-supporting at that time, the society furnished ministerial help also.

The society's work prospered. In 1908 F. R. Rogers reported in the Gospel Herald that there were 18 schools, averaging nine-month terms, in nine different states, employing 27 teachers and enrolling a total of 600 pupils. A later issue of the same journal (October 1908, p. 38) observed that the society maintained 28 mission schools with an enrollment of nearly a thousand pupils, a number exceeding "that of the students in the three great colored universities of Nashville, viz., Fisk, Roger Williams, and Walden." These schools aimed at giving a practical education to children and older illiterates, teaching them to read the Bible and paving the way for the direct presentation of Seventh-day Adventist doctrines in Bible studies.

The society was worth $16,211.26 in 1908; its indebtedness at that time was only $2,684.32, consisting almost entirely of trust funds. It held all its school and church buildings free from debt, and was able to establish treatment rooms and a mission home in Nashville for Blacks, replacing earlier treatment rooms there (1901—1903).

When in 1909 the General Conference established the North American Negro Department, it was recommended that the work for Black people be organized on a mission basis on the union level. The Southern Union Conference, from which the Southeastern Union Conference had been separated in 1908, set up the Southern Union Mission, operating under the name of the Southern Missionary Society. This took “over all work and workers for the colored people heretofore maintained by the several local conferences and by the Union Conference, excepting the school at Oakwood,” and received the tithe and other funds from all the Black churches in the area (Gospel Herald, June 1909, p. 27; cf. November 1909, p. 45). In the Southeastern Union Conference, the Union Negro Mission Department was organized. These were forerunners of the present South Central and South Atlantic conferences.

The society’s mission schools were eventually replaced by church schools, in which the SDA faith was taught more directly, and the work of the society was gradually absorbed by the regular conference organizations. However, the groundwork done by the Southern Missionary Society prepared the way for today’s progress in the South.

History

History. Beginnings of the Work in Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut. The first advocate of the Sabbath doctrine in the territory that is now the Southern New England Conference was Joseph Bates. When Ellen Harmon visited New Bedford in 1846, she met Bates, who presented the Sabbath doctrine to her. She did not see its importance at first, but shortly after her marriage to James White in August 1846, she and her husband restudied the subject and both accepted the Sabbath. It was in Dorchester (now a part of Boston) in 1848 that Ellen White urged her husband to begin printing a paper. Three of the six important “Sabbath conferences” of 1848 listed by A. W. Spalding were held in Connecticut and Massachusetts. The publishing of the first Sabbathkeeping Adventist journal, Present Truth, was begun in Middletown, Connecticut, in July 1849.

The work in Lancaster, Massachusetts, developed early. The first Seventh-day Adventists were Lewis H. Priest and his wife, Abigail, both Millerites, who had come from Marlborough, Massachusetts, and had learned about the Sabbath probably from Joseph Bates prior to 1851. J. N. Loughborough held meetings in the Priest home and organized the church in South Lancaster in 1864 with eight charter members. Stephen N. Haskell, a soapmaker by trade, was chosen local elder. John Nevins Andrews spent more than a year at South Lancaster revising his book, History of the Sabbath, before he became the first Seventh-day Adventist overseas missionary. In 1869, a year after the first Seventh-day Adventist camp meeting was held at Wright, Michigan, the first SDA camp meeting in New England was held on a site that Haskell selected near South Lancaster.

New England Conference Organized. At the 1870 camp meeting, held also at South Lancaster, the New England Conference was organized with Stephen N. Haskell as first president. This conference embraced the present Southern New England Conference area plus New Hampshire.

In 1870 the Tract and Missionary Society of the New England Conference was organized. This society was the outgrowth of the Vigilant Missionary Society organized at South Lancaster in Haskell’s home in June 1869 as a local church group that soon became well known for its activities in distribution of denominational publications and writing of hundreds of letters to interested persons. The conference organization became so successful that in 1874 Haskell was commissioned by the General Conference to travel in every conference, organizing missionary societies like the one successfully launched in Massachusetts.

On Apr. 19, 1882, a little school was opened that was destined to become South Lancaster Academy, and later Atlantic Union College. There were only 19 students the first day. The principal was Goodloe Harper Bell, who had been a pioneer SDA educator in Battle Creek, Michigan. Enlargement of facilities in 1898 made possible the school’s being used as the meeting place of the General Conference session of 1899. Prominent denominational workers who were associated with the school were Frederick Griggs, B. F. Machlan, and Charles S. Longacre.

Although from about 1850 various Adventist pioneer preachers had visited Boston (Samuel Rhodes, Joseph Bates, Frederick Wheeler, George W. Holt, A. S. Hutchins, and J. N. Loughborough), in 1867 there were in the city only about a dozen scattered members. After visits from J. N. Andrews, S. N. Haskell, and James and Ellen White, and evangelistic meetings by Merritt E. Cornell in 1869 the Boston church was organized with 17 charter members in 1871.

In 1899 the New England Sanitarium was founded on the site of the former Thayer Bird Museum in South Lancaster, Massachusetts. It was moved to Stoneham, Massachusetts, in 1902.

Southern New England Conference Formed. In 1903, when many conferences were being reorganized along with the establishment of union conferences, the New England Conference was divided into two smaller conferences: the Southern New England Conference, composed of Connecticut and Rhode Island with headquarters in Hartford, Connecticut, and with C. H. Edwards as president; and the Central New England Conference, composed of Connecticut and Rhode Island with headquarters at South Lancaster, which continued through 1909. In January 1910 New Hampshire was taken from the Central New England Conference and added to Vermont to form the Northern New England Conference. Massachusetts, left by itself, became the Massachusetts Conference the following October. In 1926 the Massachusetts Conference united with the Southern New England Conference (Connecticut and Rhode Island), and the Southern New England headquarters were thenceforth at South Lancaster, Massachusetts. The first Yearbook published after the reorganization of Southern New England Conference, in 1926, reported the membership at 3,082. There were 13 ordained ministers, seven ministerial licentiates, 15 missionary licentiates, and 21 church school teachers.
