Preface

The Seventh-day Adventist Encyclopedia is a compendium of facts about Seventh-day Adventists (in this work sometimes abbreviated SDAs)—their work, beliefs, organization, methods, and philosophies. The work is intended to inform not only church members but non-SDAs as well who may be inquiring about the church's work and beliefs.

The present volume is the church's first attempt to systematize information concerning Seventh-day Adventists in encyclopedic form. The idea of a denominational encyclopedia was conceived in 1959 and was suggested to the Review and Herald Publishing Association by Earle Hilgert, professor of New Testament literature at Andrews University, Berrien Springs, Michigan. The immensity of the undertaking led the leaders of the publishing house to set aside the idea at the time. However, the plan was again suggested in 1962, upon the completion of the Seventh-day Adventist Bible Students' Source Book, volume 9 of the Commentary Reference Series. At that time the publishing house was looking for a suitable volume with which to complete the series, and the conclusion was reached that a denominational encyclopedia would fittingly round out the series and represent a worthy climax to the reference volumes. Action was taken by the board of the house on April 4, 1962, that the project be launched immediately.

Don F. Neufeld, who had been an associate editor on the first seven volumes and the editor of volumes 8 and 9, was asked to be editor in chief; Julia Neuffer, who had been assistant editor and associate editor of the previous volumes, was asked to be associated with him; and Martha Reed was appointed as editorial secretary. Later several assistant editors were added to the staff—Raymond F. Cottrell to edit the articles on theology; Donald E. Mansell; and George A. Selivanoff. There were in addition two part-time assistant editors—Gerald H. Minchin and Virgil E. Robinson.

I. Planning and Production

I. Planning and Production. The project was announced to the church leaders assembled in the Spring Meeting of 1962; they commended the publishing house for its undertaking and pledged their cooperation.

The announcement of the plan to the church at large was made at the General Conference session in July 1962. At that time contacts were made with the heads of conferences, institutions, and the various divisions, whose help would be needed in so large an enterprise. They accepted willingly their assignments of providing articles on their respective areas of administration.

1. How the Articles Were Obtained. The more than 2,000 articles in the present volume were obtained as follows: In the North American Division the articles on the history and development of Seventh-day Adventist work were assigned to writers by the presidents of the various local conferences, who took the responsibility for these articles; the articles on institutions, such as schools, hospitals, and publishing houses, were provided by the institutions themselves. For articles covering the history and development of SDA work in the various countries and institutions of the rest of the world field, the presidents of the various divisions accepted the task of selecting competent writers, who would be responsible to these leaders and would submit their articles to them. These division leaders were L. C. Naden (Australasian), O. Gmehling (Central European), C. P. Sorensen (Far Eastern), C. L. Powers (Inter-American), R. A. Wilcox (Middle East), E. E. Roenfelt (Northern European), J. J. Aitken (South American), R. S. Lowry (Southern Asia), Marius Fridlin (Southern European), and R. H. Pierson (Trans-Africa). They were asked to have the manuscripts widely read and to revise them before submitting them.

The various departments and branches of the General Conference likewise furnished the articles on their work, as did editors of periodicals on their papers. Their contributions are gratefully acknowledged.

These various organizations bore the expense of preparing these articles, enabling the price of the book to be kept within a reasonable figure. Their contributions are greatly appreciated.

In the area of theology, those competent in their fields were chosen to write the various articles. In these articles it was aimed to present not only what the church believes but how it came to adopt these beliefs. This feature of tracing the development of doctrine, where such occurred, in addition to the doctrine itself, is a unique contribution of this volume of the Commentary Reference Series. The range of topics was chosen after counsel with Bible teachers of SDA universities and colleges, who met in convention at Pacific Union College, Angwin, California, immediately after the 1962 General Conference session in San Francisco, California. The selection of writers was made in counsel with W.G.C. Murdoch, dean of the SDA Theological Seminary, Andrews University, and Earle Hilgert, originator of the encyclopedia idea, both of whom contributed a number of articles.

The biographies were written by various writers. The majority were prepared by the editorial staff, who had access to various sources, such as the personnel and retirement files of the General Conference, and to various periodicals. In many instances they sent questionnaires to those who had access to sources not available in the editorial office.

The editorial staff also contributed many articles of a miscellaneous nature.

2. Editorial Procedure. After the manuscripts were received they were carefully checked and rechecked editorially. Then two copies of the material were sent to the division presidents, local conference presidents, heads of North American institutions, General Conference department heads, and periodical editors. They were asked to update the articles and to make any final revisions. All efforts were made to have the material as accurate as possible.

In addition to those who had read various manuscripts before submission to the publishers, two readers were chosen to read the entire volume. These were Walter R. Beach, secretary of the General Conference, and Walter E. Murray, one of the general vice presidents of the General Conference. Their efforts and suggestions are greatly appreciated. Two others were asked to read the articles on theology—Harry W. Lowe, general field secretary of the General Conference, and Merwin R. Thurber, book editor of the Review and Herald Publishing Association. Their contributions too are gratefully acknowledged.

To all who contributed to this project in any way—to the more than 700 authors scattered throughout the world, to those who accepted responsibility for providing the various articles, to those in the division and other offices upon whom the responsibility was placed for collecting, processing, and revising the manuscripts, to the hundreds of readers who read the articles in their various stages, to those in the churches in the North American Division who filled out questionnaires to provide background information for writing the history of Seventh-day Adventist work in the various conferences, and to those who lent encouragement and counsel in a difficult and challenging task—we express our heartfelt gratitude.

II. Contents

II. Contents. This reference work on a worldwide denomination necessarily covers a wide variety of articles, yet the contents may be summarized in a few principal categories—church history, organization, institutions, biographies, beliefs, practices, methods, definitions, and activities.

1. Church History. For the North American Division (the United States, Canada, and Bermuda) each article dealing with the history and statistics of the church covers a conference (the church unit comprising one or a few states or provinces). In the other divisions, covering the rest of the world, each article deals with a country, an island or island group, or other geographical unit. Length of treatment is roughly proportionate to the SDA membership, but there are variations.

For each country a descriptive and historical introductory section has been included—not a comprehensive survey, but a sketch derived from general reference books, intended to furnish a few basic facts on the land, the people, and the historical and religious background that will form an introduction to the story of Seventh-day Adventist work in that country. For more information the reader may consult a general encyclopedia and an atlas.

This pattern has not been followed for the United States and Canada, because most of the readers are presumed to be in those two countries. This is also the reason the church history is dealt with in smaller units—the conferences.

2. Church Organization and Operation. Besides a general article on organization, which describes the history and structure of the denominational organization, there are articles on topics ranging from the local church—its membership, officers, services, and auxiliary organizations and societies—through the conference (or mission, or section, or other unit composed of local churches) and the union (or union conference, or union mission), to the worldwide administrative body, the General Conference. There are also articles on the worldwide territorial divisions of the General Conference, and its functional departments and other bureaus and agencies.

3. Institutions. There are articles on many of the church-owned and -operated colleges, secondary schools, sanitariums and hospitals, publishing houses, health food factories, orphanages, and retirement homes. The clinics and dispensaries are only listed, and with regard to the nearly 5,000 elementary schools, only the number in particular areas is given in statistics on that area. Generally, only schools on at least the senior high school level are included.

4. Biographies. The encyclopedia contains hundreds of biographical sketches of men and women who played a notable part in the work of the church or were “first” in various parts of the world (it does not include any living persons). The list of names was drawn from SDA historical works and accounts in the church papers, and from the lists and data submitted by the various divisions. A few who were not Seventh-day Adventists are included because they have been mentioned or quoted in SDA works and therefore need identification. The length of the sketch is not necessarily an index of the subject's importance. Some who accomplished much seldom took time to write reports to the church papers, and hence little is known of them; some required a longer account because they happened to work in many different places; some of the variation is because of the difference in the style of the authors of the sketches.

5. Beliefs and Practices. Since Seventh-day Adventists find themselves in harmony with other conservative Christians on the basic doctrines, such as salvation through faith, and Christ's preexistence, deity, and atonement, it was not thought necessary to include lengthy articles on these topics. A longer treatment was thought necessary on doctrines on which SDAs differ from the majority—such as the nature of the millennium, immortality only in Christ (not originated by Seventh-day Adventists), or the seventh-day Sabbath (shared with the Seventh Day Baptists, but approached somewhat differently). The Sabbath, for example, is treated at length from different angles. Occasionally a minor doctrine of an obscure or once-controversial nature (such as the “daily” of Dan. 8 and 11) required a disproportionately long discussion to clarify its historical background. Views on the prophecies of Daniel and the Revelation are summarized under Daniel, Interpretation of, and Revelation, Interpretation of. Because this book is a part of a reference series containing a seven-volume Bible commentary, the reader is referred to the Commentary for detailed exposition of Bible doctrines.

6. Miscellaneous Topics. Definitions are required to explain various names or phrases of organizations, methods, and activities—such as church school (a church-operated elementary school), Ingathering (an annual appeal for funds), Bible studies (a method of personal evangelism), Pathfinder Clubs (the SDA equivalent of Scouting, with religious emphasis), and Medical Cadet Corps (those in training for noncombatant medical military service).

Some articles that were planned have been omitted because the historical information is lacking or insufficient, or because of insufficient space.

III. Sources of Information

III. Sources of Information. Except for the descriptive and historical introductions to the articles on the countries, which have been taken mostly from standard encyclopedias and reference works (such as the Encyclopaedia Britannica, World Almanac, and National Geographic Atlas), original sources have been used whenever possible either in writing or in verifying the articles. These sources include everything from personal reminiscences and local church records to newspaper clippings to firsthand accounts in the files of the union or division periodicals and the Review and Herald, also school bulletins, yearbooks, statistical reports, and official minutes of conference sessions or of institutional boards, retirement records, and obituaries. Not surprisingly, in the assembling of thousands of articles from around the globe, written by hundreds of contributors using a wide variety of sources, occasional discrepancies have appeared in spelling, names, dates, and facts. The discrepancy may be genuine, indicating an error, either in one of the articles or in one of various sources used by the several writers. However, it may be only apparent—a difference in date between an individual's appointment and arrival; between the beginning of construction and the completion of a building; or the difference between the founding of an institution as a clinic and of the same institution, later, as a hospital.

The SDA Encyclopedia staff and the Review and Herald copy editors have checked facts as far as possible from the materials available in either the Review and Herald or the General Conference, which includes most of the sources mentioned above except the personal accounts and the local records and local periodicals. Some of the discrepancies have been resolved through checking original sources, and others through correspondence. (Certain authors, correspondents in the division offices, General Conference personnel, and others deserve commendation for service beyond the call of duty for their aid to the inquiring editors.)

The best that the editors could do was to sift with care, taking into account the probable relative trustworthiness of the source material used. Experience has shown that a person's recollections in afteryears (and even more an individual's obituary, written by someone else, probably in haste and under stress) will often disagree with that individual's own firsthand account submitted at the time of the events to the Review and Herald or to some other church paper. Even official contemporary sources can be misleading: a Yearbook, a school bulletin, or the minutes of a conference session may list an appointment that was rescinded before it went into effect. In one case, the contemporary records trace a couple through their appointment to a mission field, their arrival in the country, and their travel en route to their location; yet they never actually served there, for the wife's sudden illness turned them back before they reached their station.

In many articles there is a possible uncertainty of one year in the terms of presidents of conferences or heads of schools because they are based only on the Yearbook listing, from which one cannot always be certain in what year a person is replaced by a successor. (In general, the Yearbook of a certain year gives the information for the preceding year.) Also the date of the organization of an institution or a conference may be recorded differently in two sources because the organization was voted, and the officers elected, late in the year, but the organization began to function the next year.

The editors have in many articles added early historical information derived from contemporary sources, such as firsthand accounts in early files of the Review and Herald, that were not available to the original writer of the article. In some cases, when two conflicting accounts appear in different sources, both have been included and the reader is left to decide between them.

The spelling of place names has in general been determined by the usage in the National Geographic Atlas of the World.

Denominational statistics have generally been taken from the Statistical Report, and the listing of territories under each division article has been taken from the Seventh-day Adventist Yearbook.

1976 Revised Edition

The Seventh-day Adventist Encyclopedia was first revised 10 years after the original appeared in 1966. During those years the work of the church developed rapidly, and many changes took place. The 1976 edition of the SDA Encyclopedia reflected that development and those changes, and presented a picture of the church as it was at the time of the 1975 General Conference session in Vienna. Changes in organization effected at that time appeared in the Revised Edition. Information with respect to all organizations and institutions of the church was also updated. Biographical sketches of outstanding leaders who had died since 1966 were also included. Otherwise the articles remained as they were in the original edition.

For the revised SDA Encyclopedia, copies of the original articles were sent to the leaders in the various fields for reappraisal and updating. Articles on new institutions and organizations were written by authorized individuals in the field and submitted to the editors.

1996 Second Revised Edition

During the past two decades remarkable growth and change has taken place in the Seventh-day Adventist Church. Illustrative of this is the country of Mozambique, which in 1976 had 44 churches attended by 13,236 members. In 1993 nearly 80,000 members attend 473 churches. In the light of what has happened since 1976, General Conference president Robert Folkenberg invited the division presidents and institutional leaders in the worldwide church to submit revisions and new articles to the editors. Nearly all responded with material gathered from officers and leaders in their respective fields. Six hundred fifty men and women contributed to the Second Revised Edition. The youngest was a student of 14 and the oldest a retiree of 80.

Because of the almost overwhelming amount of information received, the editorial process encompassed approximately two years. In the case of the few who did not respond, the editors drew upon the Seventh-day Adventist Yearbook and the World Almanac to update the articles.

After the revised copy was submitted to the publisher, Richard W. Coffen served as in-house editor, and the Review and Herald copy editors carefully checked the material for accuracy and consistency in style.

This edition was done entirely on computer, a method nearly unheard-of at the time of the first revision.

The world field was invited to submit additional biographies of people who made considerable contribution to the church during their lives. Some 200 new biographical sketches are included. There are undoubtedly many others who should have been added, but the editors had no way of knowing of these.

As far as possible, this new edition of the SDA Encyclopedia reflects the changes in the church through 1994. However, even as we go to press, progressive changes are taking place.

Aalborg, Don L.

AALBORG, DON L. (1929—1989). Minister, conference administrator. Born Feb. 2, 1929, at Hurley, South Dakota, he was a graduate of Champion Academy and Union College, and in 1975 he graduated from Georgia State University with an M.Ed. degree in school administration. He was married May 27, 1951, to Viva Carol Ellis.

He served a ministerial internship in the Oklahoma Conference, and began his own first pastorate in Vinita, Oklahoma, in 1954. Continuing pastoral work in Oklahoma, he was ordained there in 1956. In 1959 he became youth director and educational superintendent of the conference.

The Georgia-Cumberland Conference called him in 1965 to be youth director. During the five years he spent in that work, he directed in the rebuilding of the conference's Camp Cumby-Gay. In 1970 he became the conference superintendent of education, and in 1978 he was elected secretary of the conference. During the 10 years of his service in that capacity he coordinated the development of the conference's Cohutta Springs Adventist Center.

Aalborg became president of the Texas Conference in 1988, and served in that capacity until his death Sept. 8, 1989.

ABA Health Centre and Motherless Children's Home

ABA HEALTH CENTRE AND MOTHERLESS CHILDREN'S HOME. A 50-bed facility that serves most of east Nigeria. It was dedicated on March 25, 1984. The East Nigeria Conference had operated a motherless babies' home before the center was opened. After the center was dedicated, it took over the administration of the babies' home.

The Motherless Babies' Home cares for 20—25 children from birth or soon afterward until they become 2 years old; then they are sent to foster homes. The health center contributes part of its profit to add to conference and public donations to cover the expense of running the home.

The center also has used part of its profits to expand the facilities. As of 1993 the center has three buildings for wards, an outpatient clinic, and a laboratory. There also is a mortuary and two duplexes that are being used for medical doctors. In 1992 the center admitted 2,533 patients and treated 17,354 outpatients.

Medical Directors: E. N. Nzotta, 1984; N. P. Mosqueda, 1985—1990; E. E. Enyinna, 1991— .

Abbotsford Adventist Villa

ABBOTSFORD ADVENTIST VILLA. A retirement villa located in Abbotsford, British Columbia, built by the British Columbia Conference in 1981 to provide low-cost housing in the lower mainland for church members. The facility contains six two-bedroom suites and single-bedroom suites. Unlike Okanagan Manor, a personal-care facility operated by the British Columbia Conference, the suites were for sale to church members. Many were sold, but the remainder retained by the conference were rented. Plans called for the development of phase 2 as a personal-care or nursing home that would provide a dining room large enough to serve all the residents. Because the application for government funding was not approved, phase 2 was not completed.

Abbott, George Knapp

ABBOTT, GEORGE KNAPP (1880—1959). Physician, administrator. A graduate of the American Medical Missionary College (1903), he began the practice of medicine in Burbank, California. In 1906 he married Dr. Cora Richards, and the two went to Loma Linda Sanitarium to assist in developing a medical school. He was president of the Loma Linda College of Evangelists (1907—1910), and then dean of the College of Medical Evangelists and medical superintendent of the sanitarium (1911—1914).

After his service at Loma Linda he continued in denominational work for 32 years, serving as medical director of St. Helena Sanitarium, Washington Sanitarium, and Glendale Sanitarium.

Among his many writings are the books The Witness of Science, Hydrotherapy and Electrotherapy for Nurses, and Technique of Hydrotherapy and Massage.

Abella, José (Joseph)

ABELLA, JOSÉ (JOSEPH) (1892—1928). Pioneer colporteur in Algeria, and minister in Portugal. He was born at Grañena de las Garrigas in the province of Lérida, Spain. When he was a young boy his parents moved to the town of Sabadell, where he was enrolled among the first students in the school opened by the pioneer SDA workers in Spain, the brothers Frank and Walter Bond. He and his mother, baptized by B. G. Wilkinson in 1904, were among the first Seventh-day Adventist converts baptized in Spain. After studying at the missionary school at Gland, Switzerland, for a time, Abella was sent from there with Ulysse Augsburgur to Algeria, in North Africa, as a colporteur. About a year and a half later he was sent to Lisbon, Portugal, where he worked with Charles Rentfro until 1910. He then returned to North Africa and worked as a colporteur and evangelist until about 1920. In 1918 he married Antonia Mateu. In 1920 he was ordained to the ministry at the Latin Union session, held in Geneva, Switzerland. Afterward he went to Porto, Portugal, where his dedicated service brought many converts into the church. He died in May 1928 from tuberculosis, only a few months after contracting the disease.

Abernathy, William Earl

ABERNATHY, WILLIAM EARL (1886—1964). Departmental secretary, treasurer, sanitarium manager, missionary. A native of Georgia, he was baptized as a result of evangelistic meetings held by F. C. Webster in Charleston, South Carolina. While employed at the Southern Publishing Company he was called to serve as home missionary and Sabbath school secretary, and treasurer of the Georgia-Cumberland Conference.

During his years of service he was treasurer of the Southeastern and Lake Union conferences, assistant auditor of the General Conference, and manager of two sanitariums. He also did treasury work in the Southwestern and North Pacific unions. After World War II he was sent to China to help in the rehabilitation of the work there, returning to the United States in 1948.

Abomination of Desolation

ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION. A cryptic designation found in Matt. 24:15, borrowed from Daniel (11:31; 12:11), where the corresponding phrase appears as “abomination that maketh desolate.” Daniel predicted a great desecration of the Temple by an alien power in an attempt to substitute a false system of worship for that of the true God. The Gr. bdelugma tēs erēmōseōs, “abomination of desolation,” in Matt. 24:15 is identical with the LXX translation (MS 88) of the Heb. shiqqûš shomem in Dan. 12:11. In Dan. 11:31 shiqqûš meshômem is rendered bdelugma erēmōseōs (MS 88). (Compare the LXX bdelugma tōn erēmōseōn, “the abomination of desolations,” in Dan. 9:27; and hamartia erēmōseōs, “transgression of desolation,” in Dan. 8:13; both of which doubtless are to be identified with the bdelugma tēs erēmōseōs of Dan. 11:31 and 12:11.) The Heb. shiqqûš, “abomination,” is a common OT term describing an “idol deity” (e.g., Deut. 29:17; 2 Kings 23:24; 2 Chron. 15:8; Eze. 37:23). Such idol “abominations” set up in the Temple at Jerusalem in OT times were said to defile, or pollute, it (Jer. 7:30; Eze. 5:11). The Heb. shamem, a form of which is translated “desolation” (more literally, “something that makes desolate”), is used of the devastation caused by an invading army (Jer. 12:11), a scene that creates a sense of horror in a person beholding it (Jer. 18:16). The Heb. pesha‘, “transgression,” in the parallel expression “transgression of desolation” in Dan. 8:13, is used of acts of apostasy and rebellion against God (see Amos 2:4, 6; Micah 1:5).

Interpretation

Interpretation. About 100 B.C. the writer of 1 Maccabees (see 1:54, 59; cf. 6:7) identified the “abomination of desolation (bdelugma erēmōseōs)” as an idol altar erected by Antiochus Epiphanes upon the altar of burnt offering at the Temple in Jerusalem in 168 B.C. Josephus, about A.D. 70, similarly applied Daniel’s prophecy to “an idol altar” built “upon God’s altar” (Jos. Ant. x. 11. 7 [Loeb, 272—276]; xii. 5 [Loeb, 253]). In Matt. 24:15 (cf. Luke 21:20—22) Christ applies it to the Romans, who, 40 years later, in A.D. 70, invested Jerusalem and burned the Temple, and in A.D. 130 ordered a shrine to Jupiter Capitolinus to be erected in its place (Cambridge Ancient History, Vol. xi, p. 313). Medieval Jewish expositors such as Ibn Ezra likewise applied it to the work of the Romans in the first century A.D. (L. E. Froom, Prophetic Faith of Our Fathers, vol. 2, pp. 210, 213). Irenaeus, Origen, and other Christian writers of the early centuries applied it to a future antichrist (ibid., vol. 1, pp. 247, 320, 366), as did later medieval Catholic writers such as Villanova and Olivi (ibid., pp. 752—754, 773). Pseudo Joachim applied it to the popes of his day (ibid., p. 728). Wyclif (ibid., vol. 2, p. 58), Huss (ibid., p. 118), Luther (ibid., pp. 272, 277, 280), and numerous Protestant commentators identified it with the papacy or with doctrines or practices of the papal church. William Miller and probably most Millerite preachers did the same. Most modernist Protestant commentators apply the “abomination of desolation” to the idolatrous worship instituted by Antiochus Epiphanes, while fundamentalist commentators regard Antiochus Epiphanes as a prototype of the man of sin to come in the future.

Seventh-day Adventist Interpretation

Seventh-day Adventist Interpretation. Uriah Smith, pioneer SDA expositor, applied (Review and Herald 37:84, Feb. 28, 1871) the “overspreading of abominations” in Dan. 9:27 to the events of A.D. 70 under pagan Rome, and the “abomination of desolation” to the papacy. Specifically identifying “the daily” of Dan. 8:11; 11:31; 12:11 as “paganism” in the Roman Empire, and the “abomination of desolation” as the papacy, Smith applied the taking away of “the daily” and the setting up of “the abomination of desolation” in its place to the establishment of papal supremacy upon the dissolution of the Roman Empire, a process he considered to be complete by A.D. 538 and a state of affairs continuing for 1,260 years, to the imprisonment of Pope Pius VI in 1798 (on the basis of Dan. 7:25 and 12:7). Smith identified the little horn of Dan. 8 as Rome in its two phases, pagan and papal (Daniel and the Revelation [1882 ed.], p. 202).

Contemporary SDA expositors of prophecy similarly identify the “abomination of desolation” with unscriptural papal teachings and practices—such as the Roman sacrifice of the mass, the confessional, the veneration of the virgin Mary, priestly celibacy, and hierarchical structure of the church—but, while some hold Smith’s view of “the daily,” others understand “the daily,” for which these unscriptural practices were substituted, to refer, in the application of Daniel’s prophecy to Christian times, to the ministry of Christ as our great high priest in the heavenly sanctuary. They equate the “little horn,” or “king of fierce countenance” (Dan. 8:9—14, 23), who sets up the “transgression of desolation,” and the “king of the north” of Dan. 11 and 12, who sets up the “abomination of desolation,” with the “man of sin,” “mystery of iniquity,” or “Wicked [one]” of 2 Thess. 2:2—12; with the “antichrist” of 1 John 2:18; with the leopardlike beast of Rev. 13, and with “mystery, Babylon the great, the mother of harlots and abominations of the earth” of Rev. 17. The “abomination” set up by the apostate power thus referred to consists of its unscriptural teachings and practices that cause a “falling away” (literally, “apostasy”) from the truth revealed in Scripture (2 Thess. 2:3, 9—12); of its “blasphemies” (Rev. 13:1, 5, 6); and of the “wine” of Babylon (Rev. 17:2). In the historic Protestant tradition, SDAs understand that the Church of Rome and its unscriptural teachings constitute the fulfillment in history of these prophecies.

Adelphian Academy

ADELPHIAN ACADEMY. Instituted as a boarding school on the senior high school level, it was a member of the Association of SDA Institutions of Higher Education and Secondary Schools, and was accredited with the University of Michigan. The enrollment in the years before it was closed averaged 250, with a faculty and staff numbering 24. A mill producing garden trellises and outdoor furniture provided student labor. The campus and farm covered 325 acres (132 hectares).

In September 1904 the president and superintendent of education of the East Michigan Conference, E. K. Slade and J. G. Lamson, respectively, were authorized to look for a suitable location for an academy. Their search led to the purchase of a 77-acre (31-hectare) farm near Holly, situated almost halfway between Flint and Pontiac and about 50 miles (80 kilometers) from Detroit. The new academy, named Adelphian, opened with six students in January 1905, in the house that was on the farm. Later that year the enrollment reached 17. J. G. Lamson and his wife, the founders also of Cedar Lake Academy, were the first teachers at Adelphian.

The farmhouse soon filled with girls and some faculty members, a nearby farmhouse was rented as a boys' dormitory, and a temporary tar paper-covered building 20' x 54' (6.1 m. x 16.5 m.) was erected for classes and offices. It became known familiarly as the Black Chapel. In February 1906 the rented home burned, and the boys were forced to crowd into the attic of the Black Chapel until the fall of 1907, when two new buildings were completed, one housing a chapel, classrooms, offices, and a boys' dormitory; the other a girls' dormitory, kitchen, dining room, and guest rooms.

Adelphian Academy reached full 12-grade status in 1917. Growth was slow for the first 25 years. The farm, gradually enlarged, served as the main industry until about 1927, when an industrial program that aided in a rapid development of the school was introduced. In 1927—1928 the principal, John Z. Hottel, established a student woodworking industry in an unused chicken house and in the first year sold $20,000 worth of garden trellises. Later a wood structure was erected for the industry. In 1931 one of the teachers, A. E. Mobley, devoted much time to giving business instruction and to supervising this growing project.

In 1931, when the East and West Michigan conferences were combined, it was proposed that Cedar Lake Academy, in the West Michigan Conference, could be enlarged to care for the enrollment of both schools. In protest, a procession of cars carried to Lansing a delegation from the larger churches in the eastern area, along with the Adelphian principal, George H. Simpson, and members of the faculty and student body. As a result, the Michigan Conference committee decided to keep both schools operating.

In 1934 E. P. Weaver, a 1912 graduate, returned as principal. In 1938, when asked to devote more time to the mill, he gave up his duties as principal and from then until his death in 1956 operated the Adelphian Mill as a successful business enterprise, providing work for increasing numbers of students. A large cement-block two-story mill building was constructed with 35,000 square feet (3,255 square meters) of floor space (enlarged in 1953). Under Weaver's management the production of garden goods increased greatly.

After World War II the following were constructed: (1) two large fireproof dormitories to accommodate a tripled student body; (2) a central heating plant, a modern laundry, the Adelphian Press, and shop and maintenance facilities; and (3), in 1955—1956, the E. P. Weaver Auditorium-gymnasium, seating 1,500. A food services center and cafeteria seating 325 occupied its ground floor.

Another building program was begun in May 1966, when construction of a $500,000 classroom and administration complex was approved. This was followed in 1970 by a new industrial arts building with $30,000 worth of new equipment. The structure consisted of two classrooms, a ceramics lab, and a machine and woodworking shop. During the same period a 30' x 60' (9 m. x 18 m.) greenhouse was erected to provide laboratory facilities for advanced biology classes. In 1970 a new 17,000-square-foot (1,581-square-meter) addition to the mill was begun, which increased production capacity of their redwood products to more than $1 million worth (market value) a year. During that same year a new 2,100-foot (640-meter) airstrip was constructed by the students and staff, who also in the spring of 1974 erected a 50' x 100' (15 m. x 30 m.) metal barn for the school farm. Several pieces of farm equipment and a small irrigation system were purchased, classes in agriculture were added to the curriculum, and the farm reactivated its student work program. During the period from 1966 to 1974 five new faculty homes were also added to the campus.

A special constituency meeting of the Michigan Conference voted on November 2, 1986, to merge Adelphian Academy and Cedar Lake Academy. This led to the establishment of Great Lakes Adventist Academy on the grounds of what was formerly Cedar Lake Academy. See Cedar Lake Academy and Great Lakes Adventist Academy.

Advent Herald

ADVENT HERALD. A Millerite journal (March 1840—February 1844 as The Signs of the Times) edited and published for many years by J. V. Himes, Boston, and considered the leading voice of the majority group of the post-1844 Millerites, who were sometimes therefore referred to as the “Advent Herald party.” This meant, especially after a split in the 1850s, the Adventists who did not accept the doctrine of conditional immortality. (The conditionalists among the non-Sabbatarian Adventists rallied under the banner of the “World’s Crisis party,” and World’s Crisis became the organ of the Advent Christian Church, which originated about that time; see Adventist Bodies.) Early Seventh-day Adventist periodicals often quoted from or replied to articles in the Advent Herald (for example, Review and Herald 7:84, Dec. 11, 1855). Some years later it became Messiah’s Herald, then Herald of the Coming One. Files 1840—1863 in AU.

Advent Mirror

ADVENT MIRROR. A non-Seventh-day Adventist paper, published at Boston in at least one issue, volume 1, Number 1, January 1845, written by “A. Hale and J. Turner, editors” (photostat in Review and Herald). Possibly no further numbers were issued, since this one was devoted entirely to one topic, a controversial view that was not long held by the authors, an explanation of the Millerite disappointment by a new interpretation of the parable of the ten virgins. This explanation was that the coming of the bridegroom to the wedding was not the Second Advent, which they had expected, but Christ’s reception of His kingdom, the heavenly Jerusalem (p. 2), “some change of work or office” “within the veil”; and that His people were to “wait and keep themselves ready till they pass in to the marriage supper” at His “return from the wedding” (p. 3). This mode of independent publication was adopted because both authors were on the editorial staffs of other periodicals that did not share their view—Apollos Hale on the Advent Herald and Joseph Turner on the Hope of Israel. However, the Advent Herald (9:17—19 and 26—28, Feb. 26 and Mar. 5, 1845) published the pro and con on the subject, reprinted in Review and Herald 2:26, 27, Sept. 16, 1851. William Miller’s remarks on the Advent Mirror exposition are quoted in the first issue of the Advent Review 1:10, August 1850.

ADVENT MOVEMENT. A term often used variously to mean: (1) in expressions such as “great Advent movement of 1843—4” (Review and Herald 42:180, Nov. 18, 1873), the Millerite movement, principally in America; (2) the Seventh-day Adventist movement (W. A. Spicer, Certainties of the Advent Movement); or (3) the whole international movement, sometimes referred to as the “Advent awakening,” beginning in Europe during the early decades of the nineteenth century (see Premillennialism), in which thousands of people of varying views and in many countries were expecting the Second Advent and/or the millennium to occur shortly on the basis of certain time periods of Bible prophecies.

Advent Press (Ghana)

ADVENT PRESS (Ghana). A publishing house with printing facilities operated by the Africa-Indian Ocean Division with a staff of 66 national workers. It prints Sabbath school lesson quarterlies, tracts, and books in Twi, English, Ga, and Hausa languages, and some tracts and books in French.

The Advent Publishing House, earlier known as the Nigerian Advent Press, West African Union Press, and Advent Press, began when W.T.B. Hyde, principal of the Ibadan Training School, West Nigeria, purchased a small hand press and began producing vernacular tracts in Ibadan. In 1935 a cylinder press, purchased with the help of the Stanborough Press in England, was erected in a converted garage, where full-time printing operations were begun by the Nigerian Advent Press (after 1937 called the Advent Press). Production included Sabbath school lessons in the Yoruba language, tracts, training booklets, and a Yoruba hymnal. Upon the recommendation of the West African Union executive committee, the press was moved from Nigeria to Accra, Gold Coast (now Ghana) about 1951. Its new building was officially opened Jan. 3, 1954, by Dr. Kwane Nkrumah, who later became president of the republic of Ghana.

During the period 1971—1973, the Advent Publishing House changed from letterpress machinery to litho machines. In 1993 the pressroom was equipped with the following presses: a two-color Heidelberg Speedmaster, a one-color SOR, a one-color SORD, a one-color KORD, a two-color GTOZP, and a single-color GTO. The photo offset department is equipped with one Kodak camera, five printing frames, one layout table, and one platemaker. The composing room has two Intertype machines, one proof press, and desktop publishing equipment. The Advent Press has the best equipped bindery in the country, with two cutters, two folding machines, three sewing machines, two three-knife trimmers, a gathering pony, a gang stitcher, a stitcher, a pressing machine, a casemaker, a bundler, a flowline, an endsheeting machine, and a laminating machine.

In order to keep up with the demand of literature evangelists in both anglophone and francophone countries, the Advent Publishing House has produced more than 12 subscription books over the past five-year period.

Advent Publishers (Switzerland)

ADVENT PUBLISHERS (Switzerland). A publishing firm, without printing plant, the property of the German Swiss Conference, which comprises the German- and Romansh-speaking territory of Switzerland and Liechtenstein.

In 1928 the German Swiss Conference, formerly a part of the Central European Union Conference, under the old European Division, was transferred to the newly formed Southern European Division. Soon thereafter (1929), the Internationale Traktatgesellschaft (International Tract Society) in Basel, which had operated as a branch of the German Advent-Verlag of Hamburg, was transferred to Zurich. In the Statistical Report, it is listed as a depository (1937—1946), then as the Zurich Advent-Verlag, an independent publishing house, in 1947. In 1966 the publishing house was moved to new quarters in Krattigen, overlooking Lake Thun.

In 1944 a literary committee (to select manuscripts) was appointed for the first time, with Robert Gerber, Hans Struve, and H. F. Schuberth as members.

Since the setback of World War II, which seriously handicapped the publishing work in Switzerland, there has been a steady and encouraging growth. In 1992 literature evangelist sales amounted to about 1.3 million Swiss francs. The monthly Leben und Gesundheit (“Life and Health”), published since 1920, has an average edition of 23,000 copies.

Construction was begun in 1953 and the center was opened and dedicated in the summer of 1954. At first the property was used mainly as a site for junior and senior camps, but since 1958 the building has been used chiefly as a retreat, for recreation camps, and as a place for committee meetings and special courses offered by the church.

The Adventhaus also serves the German Health Association (Deutscher Verein für Gesundheitspflege) as a locale for conducting health seminars, and as a rehabilitation health resort.

ADVENTHAVEN. A housing facility for the aged, situated on the campus of the Sedaven High School, five miles (eight kilometers) from Heidelberg, Transvaal, South Africa, that opened on May 11, 1960. Operated by the Transvaal Conference, this institution serves the constituency of the conference, but accepts applicants from other areas in South Africa as well.

In 1993 there were 26 houses, accommodating 40 persons, who provided their own meals. There were also 28 rooms providing accommodation for 54 persons who eat in the dining room.

Adventist

ADVENTIST. (a) Originally, and properly, a member of the Adventist (or Millerite) movement or of any one of the six (now five) Adventist church bodies (SB, no. 6) that sprang from it; (b) in Seventh-day Adventist usage, a short term for “Seventh-day Adventist”; (c) in some dictionaries, any believer in “Adventism,” which they define loosely as the doctrine of the nearness of the Second Advent and the end of the world, or age. The terms Adventist and Adventism were coined by the Millerites (SB, no. 7). Hence these terms are most correctly employed in the framework of Millerite eschatology, which included not only the teaching of the near, personal advent of Christ but also a distinctive body of doctrine concerning the events connected therewith. Understood in this way, Adventism was and is distinct from and should not be confused with other views of the Second Advent; the differences are discussed under Premillennialism.

Defined in the loose sense of believing in the nearness of the Second Advent, “Adventism” originated neither in the U.S. nor with the Millerite movement. In the early nineteenth century in the British Isles and on the Continent there was a great revival of interest in the return of Christ as near, in contrast with the then-dominant view that Christ would come only after a future millennium. The Millerites in America were a distinctive part of this general “Advent awakening,” and looked upon all those who held “the Advent near” as brothers and sisters, despite differences in other areas of doctrine (see Premillennialism). Later, when representatives of the Sabbathkeeping branch of the Adventists in America went abroad, first to Europe, they found others looking for the Second Advent. In many languages, the term Adventist has come to be used by those who do not know the origin of the word, to mean specifically the church that teaches both the keeping of the seventh-day Sabbath and preparation for the coming of the Lord, namely the Seventh-day Adventist Church.

Adventist Agricultural-Industrial Academy

ADVENTIST AGRICULTURAL-INDUSTRIAL ACADEMY (Instituto Adventista Agro-Industrial). A coeducational boarding school situated on 6,250 acres (2,500 hectares) of virgin jungle, donated by the governor of Amazonas, about 47 miles (74 kilometers) from Manaus (pop. 600,000), the capital city of Amazonas, on the first paved highway in the state—opened in 1964. The school is owned and operated by the North Brazil Union, whose headquarters are in Belém, Pará. Students come from all over the northern part of Brazil. All are industrial students, and almost all work their way through school.

The founder, Robert H. Habenicht, a departmental secretary in the Central Amazon Mission, first entered the area in January of 1964. By June a road was opened into the industrial part and a few hired workers and volunteers began clearing land, planting trees and crops, and building thatch shelters, a boys' dormitory, and the first teacher's house.

The first primary classes began in 1967 with a national teacher and 12 boys in one half of the boys' dormitory, which also served as the church. The entire staff, consisting of a Brazilian teacher, Luiza Kettle; the director, Robert Habenicht, and family; the treasurer-agronomist, Marvin Glantz, and family, lived in one house. By 1968 a small house was constructed for a girls' dormitory, and in 1969 a new dining room, part of which was a farinha (mandioca flour) factory, replaced the thatch shelter. A generator provided electricity three hours in the evening.

Official title to the land was granted in November 1970. Construction of simple wood-frame houses continued as more workers were added to the staff.

A simple irrigation system consisting of a series of plastic movable pipes brought water pumped from the small river that runs through the land, to irrigate crops during the dry season. A small seedling house was built but soon was replaced by another twice as large. In 1971 the first plastic-covered greenhouse was put up. Laboriously, almost all by hand, the jungle was pushed back and crops of soybeans, peanuts, corn, sweet potatoes, as well as banana plantations increased. Charcoal ovens began to turn discarded logs into charcoal to sell to a steel factory. The 1970s saw continued growth in enrollment and expansion of the school plant. By 1980 a new campus was in use. In 1993 there was a faculty and staff of 11.

Adventist Atlantic Secondary School

ADVENTIST ATLANTIC SECONDARY SCHOOL (Colegio Max Trummer). A school in Colombia located in Boston, the northern suburb of the city of Barranquilla. It was founded on Feb. 15, 1925. The school has grades from kindergarten through six years of secondary studies and has been approved by the Colombian government. It is owned and operated by the Atlantic Colombia Mission. Beginning with one teacher and 16 students, it had 18 teachers and 460 students in 1993. It previously operated under the names Barranquilla Secondary School, Boston School, Max Trummer School, and Atlantic School.

Principals: Victoria Davila, 1925—1930; Justina Colon, 1931—1933; Sara Escandon, 1934—1936; Graciela Rodriguez, 1937—1938; Elias Garcia, 1939—1943; Ignacio Carrillo, 1943; Jose Pereira del Rio, 1944; Narcisa Moreno, 1945; Ines Mejia, 1946; Ana Teresa Perez, 1947; Lola Escandon, 1948; Judith Escandon, 1949—1953; Zita Robinson, 1953—1956; Rosalbina Hereira, 1960—1961; Conchita Pacheco, 1962; Hernando Sierra, 1963; Augusto Ferrer, 1964; Lola Escandon de Gelvis, 1966—1970; Mariela Miranda, 1971—1972; Jorge Sanchez, 1973; Jorge Robinson, 1974; Trinidad de Leyva, 1975—1976; Eunice Zabarin, 1977; Enoc Iglesias, 1978—1982; Eunice Zabarin de Robinson, 1983—1987; Lixberth Ruiz, 1988—1989; Nelson Utria Avendano, 1990— .

Adventist Bible Seminary

ADVENTIST BIBLE SEMINARY (Teologicky Seminar CASD). A training school for evangelistic workers in Lodenice, near Prague, Czech Republic, that was operated by the Czechoslovakian Union Conference from 1925 until World War II. After the war, plans were made to reestablish and enlarge the school at Prague, and in 1948 the erection of buildings was begun. A new government sequestered the property, and the school was closed. The earlier school is listed in the Yearbook from 1926 to 1935. The postwar school is listed from 1947 to 1955 under the name of Czechoslovakian Bible School.

Reopened in 1968 under the name Czechoslovakian Bible Seminary, it existed from 1973 on as only a correspondence school. In 1990 a new school for training future workers was established under its present name.

Principals: Josef Simon, 1926—1935; T. Zigmund, 1946—1970; Miloslav Sustek, 1970—1983; Alois Barta, 1983—1990; Jiri Moskala, 1990—1994; Miloslav Zalud, 1994—

Adventist Bodies

ADVENTIST BODIES. Denominations derived from the Millerite movement of the 1840s in the United States include:

1. Evangelical Adventists, organized about 1858 under the name American Millennial Association. Originally the main body of the earlier Millerites, by 1858 they constituted those who held the view that the dead are conscious and that the lost suffer eternally, as distinguished from group 2. Their organ was the periodical called the Advent Herald, later Messiah's Herald (originally Signs of the Times). The Evangelical Adventists, dwindling by 1906 to 481 members, soon disappeared as an organized group.

2. Advent Christians, who separated from the main body after the failure of an 1854 expectation of the Second Advent, and were largely composed of those who held to conditional immortality as a principal doctrine. The group was organized in 1860. The World's Crisis was its organ.

3. Seventh-day Adventists, a group that separated from the aforementioned two groups in 1845, and organized as a denomination in 1860 and 1863. It is distinguished chiefly by its observance of the seventh-day Sabbath. It shares with the Advent Christians the doctrine of conditional immortality, but holds a distinctive view of the cleansing of the sanctuary and the millennium.

4. Church of God (Adventist), organized 1866, an offshoot from the Seventh-day Adventist Church, retaining the seventh-day Sabbath, but differing in some other views (see Marion Party).

5. Church of God (Adventist). Unattached congregations.

6. Life and Advent Union, originating from a group led by John T. Walsh and George Storrs. It is differentiated from the other conditionalists by the belief that the unsaved are never resurrected and by holding that the millennium is past.

7. Churches of God in Christ Jesus, sometimes called "age-to-come Adventists," differing from the other bodies in expecting the Second Advent to usher in an age of "restitution" on earth, and a millennial kingdom with the restored "Israelitish nation" in the most favored position, to be gradually extended from Jerusalem to embrace all nations. This was the older "Literalist" view (see Messenger Party; Premillennialism).

Adventist Book Center (ABC)

ADVENTIST BOOK CENTER (ABC). A distribution and service outlet for Seventh-day Adventist publishing house products and other church-approved materials, including Bibles, audiovisual aids, all church department needs, public evangelism supplies, and often special dietary health products. Generally there is one or more in each conference territory, selling either subscription literature wholesale to literature evangelists and/or subscription and trade literature at retail to individuals-subscription literature being the type produced for door-to-door gospel sales by literature evangelists; trade literature, usually with fewer illustrations, being the type of literature produced for Seventh-day Adventist church member home-and-neighborhood evangelism purposes.

North American subscription literature is handled by Home Health Education Service offices, which also finance literature evangelist credit sales to the public. These offices may be conference-, union-, or publishing house-owned. Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, and many European conferences/unions operate a similar plan.

Conference Adventist Book Centers often establish branch book centers in major cities and operate well-equipped bookmobiles, which regularly visit the denomination's churches and all major church gatherings.

Before 1924 the name Tract Society was used. For the origins, see Tract and Missionary Societies. Soon after 1870, when S. N. Haskell organized the New England Tract and Missionary Society, every conference had its own Tract Society, with local churches active in evangelism through the distribution of tracts and papers. For supplying their members the conference Tract Societies soon proved themselves convenient centers for handling not only tracts but also a complete line of books and other denominational publications. They also furnished various types of printed supplies by the churches and the different departments of the conferences, and functioned as wholesale outlets supplying the colporteurs.

The denomination-wide International Tract Society was replaced in 1901 by a publication committee, which a little later became the Publishing Department of the General Conference. The local societies, as important evangelizing agencies, eventually became the church missionary societies, fostered by the Home Missionary Department.

This left the conference Tract Societies with the specialized function of serving as distributing outlets for the publishing houses. In 1924, their scope of influence having long since reached beyond the small literature stage, the name was changed to Book and Bible Houses. In 1972 the name Adventist Book Center was adopted. These agencies are now established throughout North America and in most parts of the world field. Each is operated by an experienced manager elected by the conference constituency, with appropriate personnel to handle the business of the field in which the center is situated. The influence of the Adventist Book Centers extends to all departments of the church through supplying materials for use in every phase of Christian endeavor. Adventist Book Center managers, as spiritual leaders of the church, encourage church members to build a library of good books in their homes as a means of nurturing their Christian experience.

Adventist Chaplaincy Ministries

ADVENTIST CHAPLAINCY MINISTRIES. The denominational agency that provides support and supervision to Seventh-day Adventist chaplains serving in hospitals, prisons, the armed forces, the Veterans Administration, industries, and on campuses. When the matter of Seventh-day Adventist ministers serving in the armed forces of the United States arose early in World War II, the General Conference Committee questioned whether the church should favor such service on the grounds of separation of church and state. However, at the Spring Meeting of the committee in 1942, in response to the urging of some ministers, a compromise action was passed that tended to discourage ministers from entering the chaplaincy, yet allowed that if a person felt the call to serve, the decision be left up to individual conscience. It was subsequently learned that the government would commission only a person who had ecclesiastical endorsement. Thus matters stood until Floyd E. Bresee became the first Seventh-day Adventist chaplain to enter the U.S. Army on Sept. 28, 1942, on the recommendation of the Central Union Conference. W. H. Bergherm became the second such chaplain the next year. Robert L. Mole became the first SDA chaplain in the U.S. Navy in March 1953, while Christy M. Taylor was the first in the U.S. Air Force in September 1953.

Because Army chaplains were of considerable help to SDA service personnel during the war years, the Autumn Council in 1950 voted to place no barrier in the way of those who felt called upon to serve as chaplains. Those who chose to serve in this capacity were to receive their credentials from the General Conference. The National Service Organization was asked to look after the needs of these chaplains who were issued ministerial credentials by the General Conference. The National Service Organization now is part of the Adventist Chaplaincy Ministries. See National Service Organization.

After World War II the various military forces made available openings for chaplains based on the ratio of the church's membership to the population of the country. At the peak of U.S. military strength in 1989, 50 chaplains served in the military in ranks ranging from lieutenant to full colonel, and in assignments including troop units, aircraft carriers, paratroops, and staff assignments at the Pentagon.

There is no general denominational policy respecting SDA chaplains in the armed forces of countries other than the United States. So far as is known, there has been only one such chaplain—a Belgian minister, Daniel Peyffer, who served his country in the Korean War.

Chaplains serve in the U.S. military as part of the uniqueness of the U.S. Constitution, which mandates the free exercise of religion for all citizens, including those serving in the armed forces.

Adventist Communication Network

ADVENTIST COMMUNICATION NETWORK. A live satellite connection begun in 1994. It enables groups in many metropolitan areas to see and hear church-sponsored programs live. Two events were scheduled for March 1994—a VBS workshop and a pastors' planning conference. Beginning Apr. 6, a regular news and information briefing was provided monthly. A total of 20 live events were scheduled for ACN in 1994, with more than twice that number in 1995, including a division-wide evangelistic campaign conducted by Mark Finley and originating in Chattanooga, Tennessee. A growing number of churches and conference offices are obtaining downlink packages.

Adventist Development and Relief Agency International (ADRA)

ADVENTIST DEVELOPMENT AND RELIEF AGENCY INTERNATIONAL (ADRA). An agency established in 1983 after the reorganization of Seventh-day Adventist World Service, Incorporated (SAWS). As the humanitarian arm of the Seventh-day Adventist Church ADRA works in more than 90 countries around the world.

The values that have shaped the agency are the traditional Christian values of the potential of each individual to reflect the image of God, the dignity that is inherent in every person, and the importance of quality in human life. ADRA approaches humanity as an integrated entity comprised of physical, mental, social, and moral facets. ADRA works on behalf of the poor. It regards them with respect, as partners with whom it works in a learning and sharing relationship.

ADRA is legally incorporated in Silver Spring, Maryland, and is one of the largest international nongovernmental organizations distributing food to underdeveloped countries. Independent ADRA offices in nearly 100 countries provide the agency with a network that reaches the world. ADRA is registered with the U.S. Agency for International Development (USAID) of the United States government and is eligible to receive food for distribution to needy people in developing countries. It also receives reimbursement for ocean freight for shipment of food, clothing, bedding, medicines, and hospital and vocational equipment. ADRA's programs include agricultural training, mother/child health care, commodity-supported development, small enterprise development, water resources, and disaster relief.

ADRA also works with other governments and humanitarian organizations around the world, including the Australian Development Assistance Bureau, Canadian International Development Agency, CARE, Church World Service, Danish International Development Agency, the European Community, United Nations High Commission for Refugees, United Nations International Children and Education Fund, and World Vision, among others.

ADRA is also a member of Interaction, an association of U.S. private voluntary organizations engaged in international humanitarian efforts, and the International Council of Voluntary Agencies (ICVA).

ADRA received 1.2 million pounds (450,000 kilograms) of food from the World Food Program and USAID for distribution in 1992. This food was distributed in Russia, Albania, Romania, Yugoslavia, Jamaica, Trinidad, Mexico, Colombia, and Argentina.

More than 15 ADRA offices around the world act as donor countries whose primary goal is to raise and distribute funds for ADRA projects. Donor countries include Japan, Germany, Italy, Australia, Switzerland, the Netherlands, Canada, Sweden, Norway, Denmark, and Ireland. Donor countries work closely with their governments and local relief organizations to deliver donated funds and goods to ADRA projects internationally.

Funding for ADRA comes from several government and international humanitarian agencies and public support. In 1992 ADRA received $41,302,207 from the U.S. government in commodities, excess property, ocean and inland freight, and grants.

ADRA also receives funds from the annual Disaster and Famine Relief Offering, which is collected in Seventh-day Adventist churches around the world each spring. In 1992 ADRA received more than $1,875,000 from the offering.

The board of directors consists of up to 60 members elected from the General Conference Committee including representation from the executive, secretarial, and other departments of the church. The board meets once a year at the time of the Annual Council of the Executive Committee of the General Conference of Seventh-day Adventists.

ADRA maintains warehouses in Germany, Australia, Japan, Canada, the Philippines, and the United States (California and Maryland). These warehouses process, store, and ship supplies such as clothing and food to ADRA projects around the world.

Since the emergence of ADRA from SAWS, development has become the main focus of the agency's work. At the heart of ADRA's development work are projects that benefit mothers and children. These include activities that stress growth monitoring, oral rehydration therapy, breast feeding, and immunization; parent education in nutrition, hygiene, child spacing, and child care; and supplementary food aid for pregnant women, preschool children, and nursing mothers. ADRA also aids in the distribution of food to undernourished schoolchildren.

The development of deep-water wells, water reservoirs, irrigation systems, sewage and storm drainage projects, and potable water projects is part of ADRA's efforts to make abundant water accessible to all.

Small enterprise development projects teach individuals skills that they can use to support themselves. Often ADRA will give them a loan to start a business after they have gone through a training program.

ADRA is involved in agricultural training. Farmers are taught new farming methods intended to increase crop production as well as improve the soil. This not only brings families better nutrition, but can increase family income. These types of development projects give people an opportunity to improve their immediate situation and bring a permanent change to their lives.

The agency's worldwide infrastructure enables ADRA to respond quickly and efficiently to disasters around the world. ADRA has brought relief to victims of natural and human-made disasters in Africa, South Asia, Central America, South America, the South Pacific, and North America.

Whenever possible, ADRA carries out long-term rehabilitation in disaster situations. Once the immediate needs of food, clothing, and shelter have been provided, ADRA often stays in the area to help victims become reestablished in homes, jobs, and life.

ADRA's roots and the beginnings of the church's dedication to humanitarian overseas service were first seen in 1918. A special offering was taken to assist church workers, missionaries, and members in difficult circumstances resulting from the Great War. World War II brought unprecedented devastation to Europe, parts of Asia, and North Africa. Entire nations were threatened by starvation and diseases. In 1944 and 1945 warehouses were established in New York and San Francisco to process materials for overseas shipment.

During the 1940s 2.8 million pounds (1.04 million kilograms) of clothing were shipped to 41 countries and island groups.

In 1956 the General Conference established the Seventh-day Adventist Welfare Service, Incorporated. The agency became known as SAWS. In 1973 the name was modified to Seventh-day Adventist World Service. The total value of all SAWS activities in the three years from 1960 to 1962 is recorded as $5,533,470. The Disaster and Famine Relief Offering was taken every two years during that time. In 1963 the total North American offering for Disaster and Famine Relief was $232,319.

In 1980 the SAWS budget was $19,931,179, and SAWS was active in 26 countries. The total estimated value of all SAWS activities in 1980 was close to $28 million.

In 1983, when ADRA was officially organized by the church, it was in the context of activities that were ongoing between funders in North America, Australia, and Europe, and beneficiaries in the Americas, the Far East, and Africa.

By 1980 the church already had a 20-year history with USAID, with projects dating back to 1960 in South America, and with ASHA grants dating back to 1978 in Haiti and Thailand. The Australian Development Assistance Bureau and the Canadian government also were heavily involved in funding for ADRA. In Europe, Odd Jordal was instrumental in obtaining grants from European funders as early as 1978, with money coming in from Holland, EZE, SIDA, and DANIDA, and going to projects in Inter- and South America. The first grant from European funders to Africa was in 1980 to Rwanda, Ethiopia, and Zambia. Eventually grants were extended to countries in the western part of the continent as well as to other East African countries.

Directors of SAWS and ADRA: C. W. Bozarth, 1956—1962; W. E. Phillips, 1962—1970; Theodore Carcich, 1970—1974; Howard Burbank, 1974—1980; Richard O'Fill, 1980—1983; Robert Drachenberg, 1983—1985; R. S. Watts, 1985— .

Adventist Ekamai School/Ekamai International School

ADVENTIST EKAMAI SCHOOL/EKAMAI INTERNATIONAL SCHOOL. A coeducational day school operated by the Thailand Mission on a five-acre (two-hectare) tract of land off Ekamai in Bangkok, Thailand. There are two separate accredited schools on the campus, one a Thai school called the Ekamai Adventist School and the other an English language school called Adventist English School. The Thai section offers Pratom I through Matayom Sueksa III (10 years of study). The English section offers courses based on the North American curriculum leading to a high school diploma (twelfth grade). In 1974 the total enrollment was 913, about equally divided between the Thai and the English sections, with 48 teachers and staff members in the two sections.

Most of the students are Chinese Thai, with approximately 10 percent of the students coming from Seventh-day Adventist homes. A few of the others come from a Christian background, while the rest are Buddhists.

The Thai and English sections of the school originated separately. The first Adventist church in Bangkok (organized 1921) opened a primary school with 16 pupils, but discontinued it after one year. In 1925 the school reopened in another place. In 1932, when the Chinese church was built, a new school building was erected. The enrollment continued to increase, finally reaching 500. Fires sweeping the neighborhood destroyed the school buildings twice.

An English school, known as the Child Training Center, was opened in October 1946, with four students, who met in the garage of Dr. Ralph F. Waddell, medical director of the Bangkok Sanitarium and Hospital. Mrs. R. M. Milne was the principal for the first year. Because of the great demand for English education, this mission school grew rapidly and became financially self-supporting. By 1951, having outgrown the garage, the school was moved to the hospital compound, first to a mat shed, then to three rooms in back of the church; later it occupied three rooms above the laundry.

In 1956 buildings were erected on five acres (two hectares) of newly purchased land near Ekamai, seven miles (11 kilometers) from the sanitarium. The English classes, together with the upper grades of the Thai school from the Chinese church compound (called thereafter the Ekamai Adventist School), began at the new site in May 1957. By 1959 all classes in Thai and in English were accommodated on the new campus.

The school continued to grow rapidly, and in 1964 the auditorium-library building was dedicated. It was named Milne Auditorium, after the founder of the Adventist Ekamai School. Following this, many changes took place in the next few years: 1965—duplex apartment building; 1968—annex of four new classrooms for the Thai section; 1969—cafeteria and classroom structure; 1970—1971—three-story administrative and classroom building for the English section; 1971—modern Sony language laboratory. In 1993 the English section was upgraded by the Thai government's Department of Education to a 12-grade international school with the legal name changed to Ekamai International School.

The first three teachers hired locally for the English school were Mrs. Paz Peng (1947), Mrs. M. K. Ee (1948), and Mrs. Beatrice Chia (1950). All three have dedicated much of their lives to the Adventist educational work in Thailand.

One of the main objectives of the school is to introduce the Lord and communicate the gospel to the students through English, helping them to apply its meaning to their own life.

When the school was being established, Edwin L. Moore, an English teacher and a student missionary from Andrews University, was called to Jakarta to teach.

A publishing institution founded in 1963 in Basel, Switzerland, near where the borders of Switzerland, Germany, and France meet. The staff of the “Blindendienst” encompasses six associates, including both sighted, sight-impaired, and blind persons. Transcriptions are made from German and French into braille, and printed matter is produced for distribution to those with no sight, with a paper volume output of nearly six tons (five metric tons) per year. As of 1993 braille publications, in the German and French languages, are mailed out to 1,200 readers, in 30 countries, on three continents. Ninety-seven percent of those receiving braille publications are not members of the Seventh-day Adventist Church.

The work began when W. Schenk saw the need for transcribing the adult Sabbath school quarterly into German braille for three blind church members, and met it. Shortly after that, other blind church members from Germany and Austria heard about the work being done in Basel and requested braille Sabbath school lessons. From Elder Schenk’s desire to help his fellow church members a braille publishing service was established with international readership. As requests began to increase over the years, French language braille publications were added to the growing publishing line, first to the French-speaking part of Switzerland and then to other French language areas worldwide.

The publishing technology of the “Blindendienst” has progressed with the increase of readership. From a beginning in 1963, with two manually operated braille typewriters, the typewriters were supplemented in 1969 with a braille Thermoform duplicating machine. In 1973 a second duplication machine was added. In 1975 the continual rise in production surpassed the capability of the equipment. At that time a braille embossing machine was purchased to produce braille dots on aluminum plates. These plates were taken to a commercial printer for duplication. In 1978 a rotation press was purchased and all the printing was again done at the “Blindendienst.” In 1989 the printing process was computerized, and all braille transcription was produced through a new system of computer software. In 1991 a new embossing machine was purchased with the capability of producing 11 braille characters per second.

The following German language periodicals are available in braille: Zeichen der Zeit (“Signs of the Times”), Leben und Gesundheit (“Life and Health”), and Studienanleitung für die Bibel (“Adult Sabbath School Lessons”). Also published in braille for the French language readers are: Signes des Temps (“Signs of the Times”) and Vie et Santé (“Life and Health”). Currently the adult Sabbath school lessons in French are not available in braille, but they are distributed on audiocassette.

Some of the E. G. White publications that have been translated into the German language have also been transcribed into German braille. Currently these include Der Bessere Weg (“Steps to Christ”) and other extracts from translated materials; there are plans for more of these materials to be made available in the future. Der Bessere Weg is also published in large print, in both German and French, for those who still enjoy part of their visual acuity.

Several booklets and pamphlets, as well as courses on various topics, such as Christian education, Bible study, and health reform topics are transcribed into German braille. All literature is given without charge to the blind or visually impaired readers.

Adventist Frontier Missions (AFM)

ADVENTIST FRONTIER MISSIONS (AFM). A supporting ministry developed and founded by Clyde and Cathy Morgan in 1985, along with a small group of seminarians, and mission instructors Russell Staples and Gottfried Oosterwal. At the time, Clyde was a student at the Seventh-day Adventist Theological Seminary.

AFM focuses exclusively on establishing new churches among people groups as yet unreached by the SDA Church and, in many cases, yet unreached by Christianity. It is funded by voluntary contributions, yet works closely with church leadership at every level. Working agreements are signed with each division of the church in which AFM projects are located. AFM also works closely with the Global Mission program.

The first project launched was among the Ifugao people of northern Luzon in the Philippines in April 1987, with Marc and Aunie Scalzi serving as missionaries. A church and several companies were established among this previously unreached group. Other projects in the Philippines, Papua New Guinea, Cambodia, Mongolia, Albania, Guinea, Burkina Faso, and India were started in the late 1980s and early 1990s.

AFM sends out missionaries under several categories. Career missionaries form the backbone of a new project and stay six years or longer until a church is established. Short-term missionaries include student missionaries who help out in an existing project for 9-12 months as well as nonstudent volunteer missionaries who serve for one to two years. Prior to service, all missionaries receive training at the Summer Institute of Frontier Missions conducted by AFM in Berrien Springs, Michigan.

AFM's goal is to establish the work, train indigenous leaders, then turn the work over to the local mission or conference. Missionaries seek to use methods that can be reproduced and maintained by the people they reach.

A monthly magazine, Adventist Frontiers, is published by AFM and sent free to those requesting it. It primarily contains accounts and photographs submitted by the missionaries of the work they are doing.

ADVENTIST GRAMMAR SCHOOL. A boarding school on the secondary level established in 1960 and located at Ede, Nigeria. E. O. Dare was principal in the mid-1970s.

Adventist Health Center

ADVENTIST HEALTH CENTER (Centro Adventista de Saúde). A health center that was officially opened in 1989 and is connected with the Penfigo Adventist Hospital. It is located in the city of Pôrto Alegre, Rio Grande do Sul, in south Brazil. On September 14, 1987, the hospital conducted a How to Stop Smoking in Five Days program. The live-in participants took part in such daily activities as exercises, walks, hydrotherapy and physiotherapy, lectures, and group dynamics. The success of this program led to the development of a new wing of the hospital in which nine beds were consigned to patients developing new lifestyles.

This center is dedicated to reeducation in eating habits, weight control, diabetes control, stress management, and recovery from smoking and alcoholism. It operates uninterruptedly with no vacancies. In addition to the hydrotherapy and physiotherapy services, there is a pool in which patients are trained in exercise hydrogymnastics.

Adventist Health Centre Lilongwe

ADVENTIST HEALTH CENTRE LILONGWE. A dental and optometry practice situated on the Presidential Highway in Lilongwe, the capital city of Malawi. Previously this was an extension of Blantyre Adventist Hospital.

In 1983 Dr. M. A. Rue started the dental practice. One year later he was joined by a second dentist, Dr. E. R. Russell. The dental practice is largely patronized by officials from the various embassies in Lilongwe.

In 1989 Dr. Gary Peterson arrived to start the optometry department. Besides fitting eyeglasses and contact lenses, the optometrist carries out simple eye treatments.

In 1992, 4,800 dental patients and 1,947 optometry patients were treated. Trywell J. Ndoliro has been chief administrator since the separation of the institution from Blantyre Adventist Hospital supervision.

Dental Directors: M. A. Rue, 1983—1988; E. R. Russell, 1988—1990; W. B. Seasly, 1991—1994; C. Aba, 1994— .

Adventist Health Education Foundation

ADVENTIST HEALTH EDUCATION FOUNDATION (Egypt Food Factory). A Seventh-day Adventist vegetarian food factory operated by the church in the Middle East and founded in 1976. It is located in Matariah, on the outskirts of Cairo.

The idea of establishing an Adventist food factory in this area was conceived in 1972 under the leadership of Robert Darnell, then president of the Middle East Union. Dr. Darnell realized that the Adventist health message could serve as a bridge between Seventh-day Adventists and Islam, and believed that an SDA vegetarian food factory could spearhead the formation of such a bridge. The General Conference provided funds for purchasing the land, building the factory, equipping it, and paying the workers.

In spite of financial difficulties encountered in the beginning, it is now a growing business venture with a staff of 33 workers (1993) that facilitates contacts with Muslims and Christians of other churches.

Managers: Habib Banna, 1975—1983; Tom Staples, 1983—1984; Mokhtar Nashed, 1984— .

Adventist Health System (AHS)

ADVENTIST HEALTH SYSTEM (AHS) (Adventist Health Care Association). The Seventh-day Adventist Church's health-care work in the United States, including 60 acute-care hospitals, plus nursing homes, retirement centers, home health agencies, medical offices, walk-in clinics, and many other related activities and diversified businesses.

The first SDA health-care facility opened in 1866 in Battle Creek, Michigan. Founders of the young Seventh-day Adventist denomination saw the need for a health-care work that emphasized physical, mental, and spiritual wholeness. The center stressed prevention as well as scientific treatment of disease.

By the turn of the century, additional SDA health-care facilities were established across the United States and abroad, creating a need for trained medical workers. To meet this need, the church established a training center in Loma Linda, California, in 1905. (See Loma Linda University.)

Health care changed dramatically with the introduction of vaccines, antibiotics, and other medical advances. Health insurance and Medicare brought even more changes in the health-care delivery system. By the mid-1970s the church had formed five regional organizations to manage its health-care work. A system organization gave the church's hospitals the corporate strength of a larger organization's resources and expertise.

A national organization was formed in 1982. The union of five SDA health-care corporations into Adventist Health System/United States (AHS/US) created the largest not-for-profit multiinstitutional health-care system in the country. Donald W. Welch was president of AHS/US from 1982 to 1991.

The system was reorganized in 1991 with regional systems operating independently of a national corporation.

Adventist Heritage Ministry

ADVENTIST HERITAGE MINISTRY. An educational and evangelistic corporation organized in 1981 to assist in preserving the heritage of the Seventh-day Adventist Church through the purchase, restoration, and, where appropriate, replication of properties significant to the denomination's founding and development. Sponsored by the North American Division, Adventist Historic Properties is supported mainly by direct contributions.

Historical Background

Historical Background. Early in the twentieth century interest was first shown in the historic sites connected with the beginning of the Seventh-day Adventist Church. The denomination's first history book, Rise and Progress of the Seventh-day Adventists, by J. N. Loughborough, had been printed in 1892. In 1909 Ellen G. White, on her final visit to Portland, Maine, manifested a keen interest in visiting the various local sites associated with her own childhood. Later M. E. Olsen tried to locate historic sites so they could be photographed to illustrate his thoroughgoing book, A History of the Origin and Progress of Seventh-day Adventists, published in 1925. During the 1930s and 1940s several individuals continued the attempt to locate historic sites associated with early Adventist history. Two men prominent in this endeavor were Elders A. W. Spalding and W. C. White. In 1947 Spalding's research led to the publication of his Footprints of the Pioneers, a helpful guide that provided not only information about the sites, including photographs, but also general directions to help travelers find them.

In the 1950s the Ellen G. White Estate began organizing annual denominational history tours to New England Adventist sites. Later members of the Tabernacle church in Battle Creek, Michigan, began conducting weekly Sabbath afternoon tours to the historic Adventist sites in their city.

In 1956 the Pacific Union Conference acquired Elmshaven in northern California, Ellen G. White's final home, 1900—1915. Later, in 1960, the Australasian (now South Pacific) Division acquired and restored Sunnyside, Ellen White's home in Australia, 1895—1900. In 1966 the Battle Creek (Michigan) tabernacle purchased the Wood Street home, where James and Ellen White lived from 1856 to 1863.

Organization of Adventist Historic Properties

Organization of Adventist Historic Properties. By 1980 several Adventist historians and lay members had become actively concerned about the ever-diminishing number of historic sites. When Garth H. "Duff" Stoltz, an outstanding local historian in Battle Creek, learned that the Battle Creek home of Deacon John White, James White's father, was soon to be demolished, he decided it was time to put a stop to the trend. Duff Stoltz contacted James R. Nix, then director of the Heritage Room at Loma Linda University, and the two men raised the funds needed to buy the property.

Adventist Historic Properties, Inc., was organized on May 8, 1981, in Battle Creek. Shortly thereafter, its motto, “The Past With a Future,” was adopted. Founded by lay members, the organization did not come under church ownership until February 22, 1988. Its first president and board chair was Lawrence E. Crandall, also of Battle Creek.

Almost immediately after Adventist Historic Properties’ organization, the two White homes in Battle Creek were deeded to it. In 1982 what had traditionally been thought to be the J. N. Loughborough home in Battle Creek was purchased. Later it was discovered that this home actually belonged to John N. Daigneau, an early Adventist believer, so in 1992 Adventist Historic Properties purchased the actual J. N. Loughborough home, which still stood next door. In 1982 property adjacent to the Washington, New Hampshire, church was purchased and deeded to the Northern New England Conference.

On September 25, 1984, Adventist Historic Properties purchased 25 acres (10 hectares) that originally were part of William Miller’s farm in Low Hampton, New York. Included in this acquisition were Miller’s house that he built in 1815 and Ascension Rock, where local Millerite Adventists are reported to have waited for the Lord’s return on October 22, 1844.

In 1985 the first issue of AHP Bulletin appeared, containing reports on the activities of Adventist Historic Properties. The following year a Michigan State historical marker, sponsored by Adventist Historic Properties, was erected in Oak Hill Cemetery in Battle Creek near the graves of James and Ellen White. During the years 1987—1990 Adventist Historic Properties worked closely with the North American Division’s Office of Education to promote Seventh-day Adventist history in elementary and secondary schools throughout the division.

Starting in 1988, Adventist Historic Properties began sponsoring volunteer work bees at its various historic sites. Several of these have involved Adventist young people, thus enabling them to learn about their Adventist roots while helping to preserve them.

On January 26, 1989, Adventist Historic Properties purchased 17 acres (7 hectares) that were originally part of Hiram Edson’s farm near Port Gibson, New York. Three years later the organization purchased a barn that originally belonged to Luther Edson, Hiram’s father, dismantled it, and transported it to the Hiram Edson farm to be reerected there.

With sesquicentennial commemoration events planned for the William Miller farm in 1994, extensive restoration work was carried out on Miller’s house during 1993 and 1994. At the same time, and with the encouragement of the city of Battle Creek, Adventist Historic Properties is moving ahead with development of a small Advent village consisting, at least initially, of the two White houses, the Loughborough home, and the surrounding area. In 1994 the organization’s name was changed to Adventist Heritage Ministry.

Adventist Hospital of Haiti

ADVENTIST HOSPITAL OF HAITI (Hôpital Adventiste d'Haiti). A 68-bed medical institution founded in 1978 and located in Port-au-Prince. When started, under the management of Halden Ritz, it had 33 beds and 54 employees. In 1993 157 employees staffed the hospital. Adventist Information Ministry (AIM)

ADVENTIST INFORMATION MINISTRY (AIM). A 24-hour-per-day telephone answering and literature request service operated by the North American Division. Its priorities also include follow-up of interests from outreach telecasts, radiobroadcasts, and literature ministries, and helping such interests become involved with a local Seventh-day Adventist church. AIM also contracts to provide 24-hour registration services for local evangelistic campaigns and Revelation seminars, answers coupons placed in outreach periodicals, and raises funds for church agencies through telephone solicitation.

The follow-up process begins when AIM answers a viewer's call on an 800 number phone line. Most requests are for free literature offered on the program. When a viewer requests Bible studies or a pastoral visit, an AIM chaplain confirms the request, compiles a record of the individual's prior requests, then makes a referral to the nearest Adventist pastor. The chaplain monitors the progress made by the interested person and reports when a baptism occurs.

AIM was established on the Andrews University campus in 1982 by the North American Division as the result of planning efforts by Desmond Cummings, Jr., Robert Dale, and Robert Moon. Approximately half the funds used at AIM benefit the NAD churches three ways. First, they provide a service for the church. Second, they provide seminary and other students contact opportunities and experience in the church's outreach and follow-up programs. Third, they provide students funds to help with educational expenses. A small full-time staff oversees the work of a large number of student employees and volunteers.

Adventist International Institute of Advanced Studies

ADVENTIST INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTE OF ADVANCED STUDIES. An educational institute established in 1987 at Pasay City, Philippines, serving the Far Eastern Division, as well as accepting students from other areas. The school offers limited graduate work in its own name. The 1994 Yearbook listed John C. Pesulima as president, with an administrative staff of 12. Jairyong Lee was listed as dean of the Theological Seminary, with a staff and faculty of 14.

Adventist International Medical Society (AIMS)

ADVENTIST INTERNATIONAL MEDICAL SOCIETY (AIMS). A nonprofit church-related professional organization of Seventh-day Adventist physicians, medical students, and other health-care workers desiring fellowship, scientific exchange, and mutual encouragement in Christian service. Many local chapters have been organized in the Caribbean and Latin America, Europe, Asia, and Africa since the initiation of AIMS at Loma Linda in 1977. A major project of AIMS has been the publishing of the Health Evangelism Study Guide, which was developed as an introduction to a distinctive SDA lifestyle and method of medical practice, and as a beginning guide to work in health evangelism. It has been, or is currently being, translated from English into Spanish, German, Russian, and French. Although affiliated with the LLU SM Alumni Association, AIMS is organizationally separate, as it attempts to serve the many health professionals around the world who are not LLU graduates. Further information is available from AIMS, 11245 Anderson St., Suite 200, Loma Linda, California 92354.

Adventist Layman

ADVENTIST LAYMAN (1972—1986; quarterly). Formerly the official organ of the General Conference Department of Laymen's Activities. It promoted the department's activities, and contained the programs and guidance for the monthly special occasion services, the materials for the weekly 10-minute missionary services, articles and hints on successful lay soul-winning methods and experiences, and other features of Christian service. It replaced GO in 1972.

Editors: L. A. Shipowick, 1972—1973; V. W. Schoen, 1974—1977; George E. Knowles, 1977—1986.

Adventist-Laymen's Services and Industries (ASI)

ADVENTIST-LAYMEN'S SERVICES AND INDUSTRIES (ASI). A church-sponsored organization for the promotion of the interests of Seventh-day Adventist privately owned and operated supporting enterprises in North America, formerly known as the Association of SDA Self-supporting Institutions and as the Association of Privately Owned SDA Services and Industries. It continues to be referred to by the initials ASI.

This organization, originally known as the North American Commission for Self-supporting Missionary Work, was established in 1946 with the vice president for the North American Division, N. C. Wilson, as chair, and E. A. Sutherland, M.D., of Madison Institution, as secretary. Six General Conference representatives were appointed as members of the operating committee.

The Association of SDA Self-supporting Institutions was organized at a special meeting held in Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1947, with 25 charter members. E. A. Sutherland, M.D., was elected president; W. E. Mahlin, M.D., vice president; Wayne McFarland, M.D., secretary-treasurer. This action was ratified at the 1947 Annual Council.

Merger and Reorganization. At its Fourth Annual Convention at Grand Ledge, Michigan, Sept. 3, 1951, ASI voted to amalgamate with the General Conference Commission for Self-supporting Missionary Enterprises (the latter organization had succeeded the Commission on Rural Living, created in 1946 by a merger of the Committee on Country Living and the North American Commission for Self-supporting Missionary Work).

Association Objectives. The purpose of the ASI is:

1. To foster and promote the interests of businesses and supporting enterprises operated by Seventh-day Adventists throughout the North American Division.
2. To encourage Seventh-day Adventist church members in privately owned enterprises of various types to unite their efforts with those of denominationally operated enterprises in the furtherance and extension of the gospel to their immediate communities, and to the ends of the earth, according to their abilities and opportunities.
3. To encourage such businesses and enterprises to commit themselves to work in full and complete harmony with the standards and policies of the denomination in their relationships with conference and church administrations, ministers, and church members, and with the people of their communities.

Membership. The membership of ASI may be classified under the following types of institutions or enterprises: businesses; industries; educational; nursing homes; retirement centers; community and convalescent hospitals; medical and dental clinics; foundations of various types; and personal members. Membership is limited to businesses, personalized enterprises, and institutions operated by SDA church members in harmony with denominational standards and principles, and according to professional and ethical standards, and recommended by local and union conference administrations and their ASI secretaries.

Memberships are subject to a biennial review by the ASI board. An annual membership fee is set for each member according to the size of the enterprise.

Officers and ASI Board consist of a president, a general vice president, four other vice presidents, an executive secretary, and a treasurer, who are elected by the constituency of the association and approved by NADCOM. The ASI board consists of 26 members, consisting of 20 laypersons and six church administrators appointed by NADCOM.

The General Conference provides office space and an annual budget for office, secretarial, and travel expense. It also provides the salary and general expense of the executive secretary and treasurer of the ASI, since that individual is considered a member of the General Conference Executive Committee.

Conventions. Formerly held quarterly, then biennially, conventions are now held annually. Nationwide conventions provide professional training and Christian fellowship for the thousands who attend, all at their own expense.

Statistics: As of July 1993, ASI had 1,021 members.

ASI News and ASI Magazine. In 1947 a mimeographed news bulletin, called News Letter, was founded. In 1951 this publication was issued in printed form and the name was changed to News and Views. In 1953 it became known simply as News; in 1961 the name was changed to ASI News. In 1993 a new four-color bimonthly 16-page magazine titled ASI Magazine was launched, edited by Ralph Blodgett. At that time the ASI News was changed into a two-color newsletter and published on alternating months.

Projects. Lately a program has been instituted whereby various worthy enterprises are chosen as recipients of help extended by special offerings from ASI members. Numerous schools and hospitals in mission lands have thus been aided.

Chapters. Upon vote of the ASI board, any union conference may organize its own ASI chapter. Chapters may call meetings whenever it is feasible and may recruit members as they see fit. The Pacific Union and the Lake Union were the first unions to so organize.

Adventist Media Center (AMC)

ADVENTIST MEDIA CENTER (Seventh-day Adventist Radio, Television, and Film Center) (AMC). A broadcast and film production center that includes radio and television studios, central service departments, and the offices and Bible schools for Breath of Life, Faith for Today, It Is Written, La Voz de la Esperanza, and the Voice of Prophecy, as well as the Adventist Evangelistic Association.

In 1969 study began to determine the advisability of establishing a denominational center for broadcast and film production. During 1970 production problems in New York led Faith for Today to request a transfer to California. The 1971 Annual Council voted the establishment of the center and appointed a board of trustees, with R. R. Bietz, chair, and Walter R. L. Scragg, secretary. Alvin G. Munson was elected president of the center.

The center was incorporated in 1972. Construction of the first building to house services for the ministries began in 1973 on a 19-acre (7.7-hectare) site in Newbury Park, California. Following the death of Munson, the first president, this building was named in his memory.

Two additional buildings were completed and occupied in 1978. These are named in memory of William Fagal, founder of Faith for Today, and H. M. S. Richards, founder of the Voice of Prophecy.

The structure of the center organization maintains a large measure of creative and management independence for the various ministries, but provides centralized services that include video and audio recording studios, printing, computer services, mailing and warehouse, plant operations, human resources, accounting, marketing, trust services, and administration.

The Adventist Media Center includes an in-house advertising agency, TRANSDA, which places Adventist broadcasts on the air on stations around the world, as well as arranging print advertising, billboards, and direct mail. TRANSDA is dedicated to finding the best time periods available for the best price, and has saved the church millions of dollars over the years in airtime and advertising costs.

Television and radio programs produced at the Adventist Media Center are aired not only in North America but also around the world. Persons in nearly every country can tune in an AMC production. The ministries of the center collectively influence more non-Adventists favorably for Christ, every week, than attend all Seventh-day Adventist churches worldwide.

In 1994 the Adventist Media Center included 145 full-time workers, 30 part-time employees (including academy and college students), and 152 volunteers. These workers had come from 20 countries, and represented a wide variety of ethnic origins.

Presidents: Alvin G. Munson, 1971—1976; Robert Frame, 1977—1985; B. E. Jacobs, 1986—1990; Glenn Aufderhar, 1990— .

Adventist Medical Center (Okinawa Medical Center)

ADVENTIST MEDICAL CENTER (Okinawa Medical Center). A 48-bed general hospital at Nishihara, Okinawa, owned and operated by the Japan Union Conference.

The medical center is the outgrowth of a small clinic opened at Shuri, then the mission headquarters, in November of 1953, with a part-time physician and an Okinawan nurse in charge. Shortly afterward a nurse was called from Japan to assist in caring for the increasing number of patients.

On Mar. 1, 1959, the clinic became the outpatient section of a new, modern, 15-bed hospital named the Adventist Medical Center, built on the outskirts of the capital city of Naha. In June of 1960 the inpatient department was ready for service. The physician in charge was George M. Tolhurst, and the director of nursing service was Norma Eldridge, R.N. The hospital was later expanded to 24 beds when a five-room addition was completed in 1965. A dental department was added in 1968, and in 1974 three dentists were employed.

The facilities soon became inadequate for the growing number of patients. In December 1984 a modern four-story 70-bed hospital, five doctor's residences, and a 10-unit nurses' apartment were built on the hilltop at Nishihara.

The hospital has medical, dermatological, surgical, obstetrical and gynecological, and family practice specialties, with a staff of 123 workers. In 1993 there were seven physicians and three dentists. The hospital cares for 110 inpatient admissions and 6,500 outpatients monthly, with emphasis on dermatology.

Medical Directors: George M. Tolhurst, 1960—1961; Ralph F. Meinhardt, 1961—1963; Evert E. Kuester, 1963—1968; James R. Wood, 1968—1985; James S. Miyashiro, 1985— .

Adventist Men

ADVENTIST MEN. A men's service organization that was intended to give direction and strength to church lay leaders, lay preaching, and other lines of Christian service, such as prison ministry, civil defense, and certain types of Community Services projects.

The original society was authorized by the 1937 Annual Council of the General Conference and called the Society of Missionary Men. The name "Adventist Men" was adopted and the service program was recommended at the Lay Activities Advisory Council in 1961. To give guidance to the organization and train the Adventist men for service, an Adventist Men's Seminar program was developed and widely used on the conference level.

Adventist Men's organizations worked within the framework of the former church lay activities program, under the direction of the Church Evangelism Council. Officers were a leader (who was a member of the Church Evangelism Council) and a secretary-treasurer. Membership was open to male members of the church.

Adventist Nurses' Home

ADVENTIST NURSES' HOME. A hostel formerly maintained and operated by the South African Union Conference in Mowbray, a suburb six miles (10 kilometers) from Cape Town, for housing Seventh-day Adventist women who were taking the course in nursing at Groot Schuur Hospital. In the absence of an SDA hospital in South Africa providing training in nursing, arrangements were made with the Groot Schuur Hospital for Sabbath privileges for SDA student nurses. The home, supervised by W. H. Hurlow and his wife, was opened on Aug. 1, 1957, offering accommodations to 15. It occupied the building formerly housing the offices of the Voice of Prophecy. Student nurses came from all the provinces of the Republic of South Africa and from Zambia and Rhodesia. Mrs. A. B. Mayais took charge of the home in 1961 and remained in that position until it closed in 1967.

Adventist Port Academy

ADVENTIST PORT ACADEMY (Cologio Porteño Adventista). A coeducational day academy organized in 1965 at Puerto Cabezas, Zelaya, Nicaragua, by LeRoy Haughton and Peter Wood to provide low-cost education to the coastal population. It last appeared in the Yearbook in the early 1980s.

Principals: Alfredo Ordonez, 1970—1971; Norton Perilla, 1971—1977; Gabriel Jeffries, 1977—1979; Jaime Bordas, 1979—1981.

Adventist Printing House (Madagascar)

ADVENTIST PRINTING HOUSE (MADAGASCAR) (Imprimerie Adventiste) (Trano Fanontam-Printy Adventista). A publishing house with printing plant, established in 1930 in Antananarivo, the capital of Madagascar, by the Indian Ocean Union Mission at Soamanandrany, Antananarivo. The house serves six islands of the Indian Ocean, with a population of about 14 million.

In 1951 the first publication began with five employees. The work made good progress from the start. By 1956 the plant was able to buy a stitcher, and in 1962 a folding machine was purchased. In May 1993 a new modern stitcher was purchased from Germany.

The publishing house operates four presses and employs 25 Malagasy workers. The five volumes of the Conflict of the Ages series have been translated into Malagasy. The plant serves the denomination first. Canvassers are satisfied with the 20 bookshops spread throughout Madagascar that are served by the publishing house. Outside of the church, the Malagasy Bible Society is the main customer.

The press issues the Sabbath school quarterly and the mission quarterly in Malagasy and French. Two other periodicals, Adventist Standard (in both Malagasy and French), and The Witness (in Malagasy), are also published. All materials needed by the churches, schools, and the mission; the manual of religious instruction; hymnbooks; tracts and books; and materials needed for evangelistic work are printed at Imprimerie Adventiste.

The plant is now too small for the challenges. In 1993 it was decided that the publishing house should move to a larger place near the union office, into an enlarged and remodeled building. Workers' homes are to be built.

In 1991 the sales amounted to FMG 118,442,546 (about $65,881), representing more than 15 million pages.

Adventist Professional Health Services in South Africa

ADVENTIST PROFESSIONAL HEALTH SERVICES IN SOUTH AFRICA. Established December 1982 as an interunion organization falling under the South African Affairs Committee of the General Conference with headquarters in Bethlehem, South Africa.

The forerunner organization, Adventist Medical Services, was disbanded and the private practice medical work of the South African Union Conference and the Southern Union Conference was united in one organization under the leadership of W. E. Staples, M.D.

The aims of APHS are:

1. To help finance the establishment of Seventh-day Adventist private medical, dental, and paramedical practices within its territories to serve the church, particularly where the church is struggling.

2. To support and encourage young people to prepare for service in southern Africa and also other mission appointments.

3. To assist in the planning and establishment of medical institutions and clinics where the need should arise.

4. To conduct spiritual retreats for medical, dental, and paramedical workers and students.

5. To assist in the establishment of a blended ministry program with the territory of southern Africa. A number of doctors have been ordained to the gospel ministry and are assisting in the pastoral work of the church.

6. To provide pastoral care for all Seventh-day Adventist medical, dental, and paramedical professionals and students.

Adventist Resource Management Service (ARMS)

ADVENTIST RESOURCE MANAGEMENT SERVICE (ARMS). An agency that matches volunteers in the church with mission and service opportunities. Established in 1992, ARMS serves as a clearinghouse for mission opportunities, providing volunteer resources to fill the needs of ministries and organizations sharing the mission of the church.

The first Global Mission project in North America was initiated by ARMS in 1992, utilizing volunteer resources to establish a new congregation in the inner city of Baltimore, Maryland, and to carry out evangelism in 10 other churches in the surrounding area. Since that time, ARMS has continued to provide new opportunities for mission-minded church members and necessary volunteer resources for a wide variety of ministries.

Although ARMS focuses on the North American Division as its volunteer base, the opportunities for service are worldwide. Many other church entities and supporting ministries utilize the services of ARMS to further the ministry and mission of the Seventh-day Adventist Church.

Adventist Retirement Village, Inc. (formerly known as Kressville Home for the Aged)

ADVENTIST RETIREMENT VILLAGE, INC. (formerly known as Kressville Home for the Aged). A retirement village incorporating Kressville Home Units, Kressville Resident-funded Units, Alton Villas Resident-funded Units, Charles Harrison Memorial Home, and Kressville Hostel. It is owned and operated by the North New South Wales Conference. Because it was once the site of the Avondale Health Retreat, served by Drs. D. H. and Lauretta Kress, the estate on which the homes and hostel stand has been named Kressville.

The first eight self-care units of brick construction were built under a grant from the government. These units were officially opened on Oct. 9, 1960. Over the next 14 years 54 more units were built.

In 1980, 36 resident-funded units were added, bringing the total number of units at Kressville to 98. On Aug. 16, 1964, the 72-bed Charles Harrison Memorial Home was opened on the estate. In 1982 the 35-bed Kressville Hostel was opened, and in 1993 an additional 40-bed hostel was constructed.

In 1990 an additional 32 resident-funded units were completed in Alton Road, Coorabong. By 1993, 18 more resident-funded units were added, making a total of 50 units in the facility known as Alton Villas.

Managers: E. J. Garrard, 1960—1964; R. Craig, 1964—1967; O. H. Twist, 1968—1981; A.W.J. Shirley, 1981—1989; K. A. Allen, 1989— .

Adventist Retirement Villages (South Queensland Conference)

ADVENTIST RETIREMENT VILLAGES (South Queensland Conference). Four modern retirement complexes sponsored by the South Queensland Conference in Australia. These are:

Redlands (Victoria Point). The head office of the care of the aged work in the conference, Redlands is located 12 miles (20 kilometers) east of Brisbane, overlooking beautiful Moreton Bay. The village contains 155 one- and two-bedroom units, a hostel of 54 rooms, a 33-bed nursing home, a chapel, a workshop/hall, and other amenities. A staff of 70 cares for the residents.

Melody Park (Nerang). A partly established retirement complex acquired by the conference in 1992, located 50 miles (80 kilometers) south of Brisbane. It contains 30 units, with manager's residence, pool/spa, and a library/games room. A 60-bed hotel complex is planned.

Capricorn (Yeppoon). Located 375 miles (600 kilometers) north of Brisbane at a coastal resort. In response to the need of a facility for care of the aged in the northern part of the South Queensland Conference, 10 units had been completed by 1993. Altogether, 60 one- and two-bed units are planned.

Caloundra Retirement Village (Sunshine Coast). Located 55 miles (90 kilometers) north of Brisbane. In 1993 this newest of the retirement villages was still in the early construction stage. The first stage planning envisages 50 units.

Two other aged care facilities are supervised and maintained by local churches:

Hervey Bay contains three independent living units.

Toowoomba contains four two-bedroom units and is located 60 miles (100 kilometers) west of Brisbane, in the Darling Downs region.

Adventist Review

ADVENTIST REVIEW (1850— ; successor to Present Truth, 1849—1850; title changes noted below; weekly; published by the General Conference of Seventh-day Adventists, printed by RH; January 1994 circulation, 250,000, first issue of each month; other issues, 40,000; files in RH, AU, AUC; also available in microcard form). It originated as a semimonthly (issued with some irregularities at first), formed by the merging of The Present Truth and The Advent Review.

Background

Background. The historical setting of the Review was in the experiences of a small group of Adventists who had belonged to the Millerite movement, which met deep disappointment on Oct. 22, 1844, the day on which its adherents had expected the prophecy of the cleansing of the sanctuary at the end of the 2300 prophetic days (Dan. 8:14) to be fulfilled by the second coming of Christ. After 1844 those who still retained belief in the basic Millerite teachings divided into two main groups: first, those who felt that their 1844 movement had erred in the prophetic time reckoning; second, those who felt that the error lay not in their expectation of the cleansing of the sanctuary in 1844, but in their concept of what the cleansing of the sanctuary meant. One distinctive group of the latter began to keep the seventh-day Sabbath and became the embryo Seventh-day Adventist Church. This small group claimed to be the true spiritual successors of the Millerites, because the main group was denying its past experience in the 1844 movement. To support their claim they proceeded to publish two periodicals, the forerunners of the Review:

1. Between July 1849 and November 1850 they published 11 issues of a little paper, The Present Truth, which placed a major emphasis on the seventh-day Sabbath but also included an ardent defense of their view of the sanctuary cleansing.

2. After the tenth issue of The Present Truth appeared (May 1850), they issued, at irregular intervals between August and November 1850, vol. 1, nos. 1 to 5, of The Advent Review, a publication so named because it reprinted and reviewed certain views advocated in the Advent movement of 1844. The opening sentence of the first issue reads: “Our design in this review is to cheer and refresh the true believer, by showing the fulfillment of Prophecy in the past wonderful work of God, in calling out, and separating from the world and nominal church, a people who are looking for the second advent of the dear Saviour.” Also carrying the title The Advent Review was an Extra, issued following no. 4, bearing a date of September 1850, and a 48-page reprint of certain articles from earlier issues, bearing simply the date “1850.”

The Church Paper

The Church Paper. In November 1850, from the same printing house, G. L. Mellen & Co. of Paris, Maine, came the last issue of each of these two parent publications and vol. 1, no. 1, of the Second Advent Review and Sabbath Herald. The editor states:

“TO OUR READERS.—The Review and Herald is designed to be strictly confined to those important truths that belong to the present time. We hope to be able to send you this enlarged size of the paper quite often, containing a simple and clear exposition of those great and sanctifying truths embraced in the message of the third angel [embodying the Sabbath in the last-day setting]” (p. 7).

“The paper,” in its “enlarged size,” apparently was considered by its publishers as the continuation of The Present Truth, or perhaps The Advent Review, or possibly both. Certainly it was larger in size than either of the two. Its prime policy, as its name suggests, was to review the Advent experience of 1843—1844, and to herald the Sabbath doctrine. With vol. 2, Aug. 5, 1851, it became The Advent Review and Sabbath Herald. This lengthy name, with minor variations, was employed until May 4, 1961, when it was formally contracted to Review and Herald. The original name was restored on Mar. 18, 1971, but, with the first issue of 1978, the name was changed to Adventist Review, its present name. (In fact, throughout its history the paper has been commonly referred to simply as the Review.)

From the first issue onward until 1939 there appeared under the title on the front cover, or under the name on page 3, the words: “Here is the patience of the saints; here are they that keep the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus.” From 1909 to 1961 the following statement appeared either on the cover or on the masthead: “General Church Paper of the Seventh-day Adventists.” In 1961 this was changed to read “Official Organ of the Seventh-day Adventist Church,” but in 1967 the statement reverted to “General Church Paper of the Seventh-day Adventists.” The paper was changed in format and design with the first issue of 1986 (see below), and since that time has carried “weekly news and inspiration for Seventh-day Adventists,” and the statement “General Paper of the Seventh-day Adventist Church” on the masthead.

Places of Publication. Vol. 1 (November 1850 through June 9, 1851) was published at Paris, Maine; vol. 2 (July 21, 1851, through Mar. 23, 1852) at Saratoga Springs, New York; vol. 3 through vol. 7, no. 9 (May 6, 1852, through Oct. 30, 1855), at Rochester, New York; vol. 7, no. 10, through vol. 80, no. 32 (Dec. 4, 1855, through Aug. 11, 1903), at Battle Creek, Michigan; vol. 80, no. 33 through vol. 166, no. 26 (Aug. 20, 1903, through June 29, 1989), at Washington, D.C.; and vol. 166, no. 27 (July 6, 1989, onward), at Silver Spring, Maryland.

Printing Office Set Up. For the first two years the paper was printed at one and then another printing house. Then, while still at Saratoga Springs, James White set forth a series of reasons for his dissatisfaction with the printing arrangements. He thought it inappropriate to have the journal that advocated the Sabbath printed on the Sabbath day, as might easily be the case. He reasoned that if they had their own office this would not only ensure that the paper would not be printed on the Sabbath, but would also reduce costs. Furthermore, he could hire those “who are keeping the Sabbath, who would take an interest in the paper that cannot be expected of others” (Review and Herald 2:104, Mar. 2, 1852). The publication of the Review was the first collective endeavor on the part of the emerging SDA Church, and the first general offering solicited from the scattered groups of Sabbathkeepers was this fund to establish a publishing office and to purchase a printing press.

In the spring of 1852 James and Ellen White moved to Rochester, New York. There they soon rented a building, at $175 a year, which provided living quarters for them and a printing office—the first office headquarters the denomination had, and for a time, the only one. Nothing could better reveal how closely the church has been connected with our publishing work from the beginning. When the Review office was moved to Battle Creek in 1855, it entered a building erected and owned by church members. From the time the General Conference was organized in 1863, the offices that served as denominational headquarters were situated in a Review and Herald building until headquarters were transferred to Washington in 1903.

The General Conference Becomes Publisher. From 1863 to 1983, the Review and Herald Publishing Association and the General Conference were located together. Throughout this period the Review and Herald Publishing Association functioned as publisher of the church paper. However, during 1982 and 1983 the Review and Herald Publishing Association moved to a new facility at Hagerstown, Maryland, some 70 miles (112 kilometers) away from Washington, D.C. The impending move led to careful consideration of the role of the church paper and who should be its publisher. These discussions resulted in the General Conference's assuming the role of publisher in 1983, with the editorial staff of the Adventist Review located at Washington, D. C., as part of the General Conference. The Review and Herald Publishing Association was assigned responsibility for printing, marketing, design, and list fulfillment.

An Adventist Review editorial board was established at this time to guide the editors in general policy and to handle the hiring and firing of editors. The General Conference president has served as chair of this board from its inception. A large, broad-based Adventist Review advisory council was also set up in 1983 but was discontinued in 1990.

By June 30, 1989, the relocation of the General Conference in Silver Spring, Maryland, was completed. This became the legal place of publication of the Review.

In 1991 a commission of the General Conference was set up to clarify the roles of the General Conference and the Review and Herald Publishing Association with regard to the Review. This commission's recommendation reiterated the division of responsibilities that went into effect in 1983. However, an adjustment to the finances was made so that from Jan. 1, 1993, the General Conference and Review and Herald Publishing Association share equally in any profits from the Review operation.

Size and Circulation. The Review in the early years was eight pages, about 10" x 14" (25 cm. x 36 cm.) in size. In the later years of the nineteenth century the page size was much larger, and the average number of pages per issue slowly increased to about 24, an average rather steadily maintained for years. From 1953 onward the number of pages has varied, usually being either 24 or 32, but occasionally 48, depending on the number of pages devoted to advertising. Page size is 8 1/8" x 10 5/8" (20.6 cm. x 30 cm.). Since 1986 at least 26 issues per year have included four-color pages.

Early circulation figures are not known, though stray news items reveal that 1,000 or 2,000 copies of certain of the earliest issues were printed. This slowly grew, as funds became available, for the Review was at first sent to all who desired it, and the readers were requested to give, as they were able, to support it. After a time the paper was put on a subscription basis. The paid circulation gradually increased, until in the 1940s it passed the 40,000 mark, and in the 1950s it exceeded 50,000. In 1963 because of a drastic cut in subscription price and aggressive promotion, the circulation reached 96,000, but has since declined. The current circulation includes about 280,000 for the first issue of each month (see below), with about 40,000 subscribers to the other weekly issues. The circulation is confined largely to North America, although subscribers are to be found in almost every country of the world, wherever there are Seventh-day Adventists.

Frequency of Issue. As might be expected, the early issues were not published regularly. Lack of funds, lack of time, and frequent changes of residence made any kind of schedule difficult to follow. Vol. 1 had 13 numbers, and ran from November 1850 through June 9, 1851; vol. 2, 14 numbers, July 21, 1851 (the first issue was an Extra; the first regular issue bore the same number and was dated Aug. 5, 1851), through Mar. 23, 1852; vol. 3, 26 numbers, May 6, 1852, through May 12, 1853; vol. 4, 26 numbers, May 26, 1853, through Jan. 10, 1854; vol. 5, 26 numbers, Jan. 24, 1854, through Aug. 1, 1854; vol. 6, 32 numbers, Aug. 15, 1854, through June 26, 1855; vol. 7, 26 numbers, July 10, 1855, through Mar. 27, 1856; vol. 8, 26 numbers, Apr. 10, 1856, through Oct. 30, 1856. Beginning with vol. 9 the volumes ran uniformly for six months each, and almost without exception contained 26 issues until vols. 46 through 58 (July 1, 1875, through Dec. 20, 1881) regularly contained 25 numbers each. Beginning with vol. 59 (Jan. 3, 1882), the volume length was changed from the half year to the calendar year, 50 numbers; from vol. 72 (Jan. 1, 1895) to the present time 52 numbers have appeared annually, with several exceptions as noted in the following paragraph.

Extras and Supplements. Not infrequently through the years, Extras or Supplements have been published, most of them outside the regular sequence of weekly numbers. These have sometimes dealt with some timely issue, such as critical attacks by offshoots or other enemies; often with lay missionary work and distribution of publications.

Then two Extras on current events in 1914 and a series of 24 in 1915—1916 (in addition to the weekly issues but numbered as part of the regular sequence), each on a single doctrinal topic, were published for general distribution. These were continued in 1917 as a separate periodical. (See Present Truth [2], 1917—1955.)

The Review originally published the proceedings of the General Conference sessions, which at first were held annually. Later separate General Conference Bulletins contained these special reports. In 1905 and from 1926 on, the Review again incorporated them, thus making them available to all subscribers. These reports currently require about 10 extra issues.

In recent years the Review has published two or three special issues each year devoted to a single topic, such as last-day events, Adventist women, and the family. These special issues are part of the regular sequence, but usually are undated to provide for longer shelf life.

Special Editions. The first few annual Ingathering magazines (1908—1910, 1913, 1914) were Review specials issued in extra quantities for distribution. The Review has an annual special containing the readings for the Week of Prayer each autumn. From 1948 to 1960 one number each quarter, printed in two colors and presenting a special array of general articles, was issued in increased quantities to provide copies to all SDA families in North America who were not subscribers. The total press runs on these quarterly color numbers, as they were called, averaged about 140,000. The cost of the extra copies for nonsubscribers was borne by the General Conference and local conferences.

In 1985 the editors, in conjunction with design and marketing personnel from the Review and Herald Publishing Association, gave major study to recasting the Review in an endeavor to attract young adult readers. These discussions led to a new format and design introduced with the Jan. 2, 1986, issue. The first of each month was shaped also to fit the needs of a North American Division paper and was labeled “NAD edition.” A cost-sharing plan involving the General Conference, North American Division, and each NAD union and conference was introduced in order to provide this edition free to each Adventist home in North America. Almost all conferences have chosen to participate in this plan, and circulation of the NAD edition has ranged from 240,000 to the current 280,000.

Editions. From 1947 to 1953 a monthly 16-page English language World Edition of the Review was published for countries outside North America. For English-speaking countries the magazine was printed in Washington, D.C., and shipped abroad. For other countries copies of the English language edition were mailed to certain publishing houses overseas for translation and printing. The cost of this World Edition was borne entirely by the General Conference.

In 1971 the monthly edition was revived and placed on a subscription basis. This edition, which was subsidized by the General Conference, was printed at Stanborough Press in England through 1974, but in 1975 was transferred to the Review and Herald Publishing Association. With the introduction of the NAD edition in 1986, the monthly, often referred to as the “Monthly Digest,” was discontinued.

The Review also serves as the church paper for other divisions. As Revista Adventista it is published in separate Portuguese and Spanish editions for readers in the South American Division. The Inter-American Division publishes the Review for English readers, Revista Adventista for Spanish-speaking readers, and Revue Adventiste for French-speaking readers. These editions at first were edited from the Review office, but for some years have been edited in the respective divisions. The Africa-Indian Ocean Division also calls its paper Adventist Review and publishes separate editions in English and French. For all these division papers the parent Review serves as the base: division editors draw upon its doctrinal and inspirational articles, and news of the world church.

In 1990 a quarterly edition in Spanish, Revista Adventista, was introduced for Spanish-speaking readers in North America. This edition, which likewise is built on articles selected from issues of the parent Review, is edited and published at the Pacific Press in Boise, Idaho.

A quarterly braille edition, made up of material selected from the weekly Review, was begun in January 1965. It is published by Christian Record Services in Lincoln, Nebraska.

In 1972 the Columbia Union Conference discontinued its union paper as a separate publication and entered into an arrangement with the Review and Herald to send the Review free to every family in its territory. In 1978 the Southwestern Union Conference began a similar arrangement for its union paper. The Columbia Union discontinued the plan in 1982; the Southwestern Union in 1985.

In 1991 the Review expanded its outreach beyond print with the introduction of a quarterly video magazine, OnLine Edition. Each program consists of six or seven short segments and aims to fulfill through the medium of video the same purposes as the printed Review—news and inspiration for SDAs. OnLine Edition is subsidized by the General Conference and in January 1993 had a circulation of 5,000, with 3,400 copies sent each quarter to churches in the NAD.

The World Edition of the Review was revived in March 1993 in response to several requests from divisions outside the NAD. The current World Edition consists of 16 pages, but, unlike the earlier one, is printed in the divisions from negatives supplied by the Review and Herald Publishing Association. This edition is edited in the Review office and is drawn entirely from articles appearing in the regular issues of the Review. Currently the FED, SAD, EAD, and SPD print and circulate the World Edition.

Editorial Policy and Range. The designation “General Paper of the Seventh-day Adventist Church” suggests both policy and range. From the first the Review has sought in two ways to unify the thinking of the members: by its presentations on doctrine and by its news of the activities of various SDA congregations and individuals. As the church began to grow rapidly overseas the news portion of the journal became increasingly important. From its very beginning the Review has been the church’s one unbroken record of all notable events throughout SDA history, including the life sketches of all who have been leaders in the movement.

The Review is one of the oldest continuously published religious journals in America.

Editors. For most of the years the record is clear as to the editorship. For limited periods, when a group of names is listed under the title “editors,” only the first named is here given—the available evidence indicates that that person was the editor. Beginning with the first issue, November 1850, the list reads: “Publishing Committee” (including James White), 1850—1851; James White, 1851—1855; Uriah Smith, 1855—1861; James White, 1861—1864; Uriah Smith, 1864—1869; J. N. Adventist Seminary (Croatia)

ADVENTIST SEMINARY (CROATIA) (Adventisticki Seminar Dvorac Marusevec; Adventistieko Uciliste Marusevec). An educational institution established for the purpose of preparing youth for the ministry, operated by the Croatian-Slovenian Conference. Seventh-day Adventist leaders in Yugoslavia early on recognized the need for a training school. Circumstances prevented the fulfillment of this goal until 1931, when J. F. Huenergardt established a small school in rented quarters in Belgrade. The next year the school was transferred to a property that belonged to the church in Zagreb. It operated there until 1942, with Robert Schillinger as principal and F. Zupancic, Albin Mocnik, Siegfried Ludewig, Mirko Golubic, Dragisa Stojcevic, and K. Semkovic as teachers.

By the end of the 1934—1935 school year, 55 students had obtained their training there, 15 of whom were employed by the organization. During World War II the school was closed.

Some time after the war, the Yugoslavian Union committee laid plans to reestablish the training school. In 1955 the school was reopened on a small property bought in Rakovica, near Belgrade. Dragisa Stojcevic was the first principal, succeeded by Jovan Slankamenac and Jovan Lorencin. The expansion of Belgrade and the cutting of a road through the property, together with the probable requisition of the estate, caused the transfer of the seminary to Marusevec in September 1974. In this latter area near Varazdin, in the north, a secondary school had been opened in September 1970, in a historic castle. Mirko Golubic was the director, and from an initial enrollment of 67, the number of students in the four secondary grades increased to 142 in 1974. That same year a dormitory for 80 young men and a similar building for 80 young women were constructed on land adjoining the castle. An apartment house for six faculty families was also completed by the time the seminary was merged with the secondary school. Jovan Lorencin was the first president of the seminary at Marusevec, assisted by 10 other full-time teachers and 15 part-time instructors. Successors include Jovan Slankamenac, Jovan Mihaljcic, and, at present, Franjo Wagenhofer, with a faculty and staff of more than 30.

In 1992 the seminary was reorganized, the Adventist Theological Seminary (Adventisticki Teoloski Fakultet) moving to Belgrade. In 1994 its president was Miroslav Pujic, the staff numbered 20. The secondary school (Srednja Vjerska Skola) remained at Marusevec.

Adventist Seminary of Health Evangelism

ADVENTIST SEMINARY OF HEALTH EVANGELISM. A school of public health that served the Tanzania Union area. It was located on the campus of Heri Hospital. It began as a field station, operated by the Division of Public Health and Tropical Medicine of Loma Linda University. Workers and other interested members were brought in for two years of public health training, the first class graduating in 1962.

C. R. Stafford arrived in 1963 as the first permanent director, and was at different times assisted by R. G. Lorenson and J. Thompson and several student missionaries. By 1974 a total of 124 graduates had completed this course, among them pastors, evangelists, nurses, and teachers. The principles of healthful living and preventive medicine were spread through all areas of church influence in Tanzania.

Late in 1974 the school, still under the direction of C. R. Stafford, was moved to Arusha, where it was hoped that the evangelists in training at the seminary would be able to benefit simultaneously from the public health course. By 1993 it was no longer in existence.

Adventist Seminary of West Africa

ADVENTIST SEMINARY OF WEST AFRICA. A coeducational boarding institution on the senior college level, situated in Nigeria, on a 370-acre (150-hectare) tract near the town of Ilishan, midway between Lagos and Ibadan, state capitals in western Nigeria. Under the direction of the Africa-Indian Ocean Division, it serves a constituency of approximately 355,000 in Nigeria, Ghana, Côte d'Ivoire, Liberia, and Sierra Leone. A governing board of 18 members representing the division, West African Union, Nigerian Union, and local conference and mission headquarters is responsible for the operation of the seminary. The president of the division is the chair of this board, and the president of the Nigerian Union is the vice chair.

The seminary has been affiliated with Andrews University since 1975 and offers a liberal arts education leading to the Andrews B.A. degree in two majors (religion and theology) and eight minors (biology, business administration, English, health and wellness, history, computer science, and French). Since 1988 the seminary has offered the Andrews M.A. degree in pastoral ministry and religion. Forty candidates received these degrees in 1992, and 13 in 1993. These students came from all the unions of the division and the Burundi Mission. The Adventist faculty is international.

The campus is situated in the beautiful tropical rain forest region of Nigeria. It receives electricity from government sources, but has its own standby generators, water supply, and plumbing system; church building; plant services building; thriving farm with large agricultural building, storage, equipment offices, and classroom; married students housing; and 22 faculty housing units. A spacious library and assembly complex was begun in 1975. The farm, bakery, and peanut butter industries are successful and greatly assist the public image of the seminary. A 12-bed hospital operated by the Adventist Health Services in Nigeria is located on the southwestern part of the seminary property.

History and Development

History and Development. Plans for the development of the school were first made in 1954 by D. V. Cowin, educational secretary of the West African Union Mission. By June 4, 1958, a definite decision was reached to lease a 370-acre (150-hectare) tract at Ilishan for 99 years. The first classes opened in October 1959, with an enrollment of seven, all ministerial postsecondary students. Until buildings were ready on the new site, classes met in rented quarters in town. Grover C. Winslow, the first president, taught some classes, assisted by Roger W. Coon, later joined by Fred Riley. The college continued to develop curriculum and expand its facilities into a junior college, with a B.A. in theology first offered in 1966. In 1975 it became a senior college. During the 1992—1993 academic year there were 35 teachers and 476 students.

Presidents: Grover C. Winslow, 1959—1961; Howard J. Welch, 1961—1967; Jan Paulsen (acting), 1967—1968; S. P. Berkeley, 1968—1971; K. F. Mueller (acting), 1971;

Adventist Society for Religious Studies

ADVENTIST SOCIETY FOR RELIGIOUS STUDIES. A scholastic society. Its purpose is “to provide intellectual and social fellowship among its members and encourage scholarly pursuits in all religious studies disciplines, particularly with reference to the Seventh-day Adventist tradition.” It was formerly organized in New York City in 1979.

In 1972 Adventist religion scholars agreed to meet in conjunction with the annual meetings of the American Academy of Religion (AAR) and Society of Biblical Literature (SBL). Biblical Research Institute (BRI) agreed to sponsor and plan these meetings. After BRI ceased their sponsorship in 1978, Adventist scholars met informally at New Orleans. AAR/SBL informed the Adventist group that it could not provide meeting rooms nor announce the meetings in its printed program unless the group officially organized and adopted a distinctive name that did not have a denominational identifier. At the New York meeting the group officially organized, selected the name Andrews Society for Religious Studies (ASRS), and elected officers. The name Andrews referred to J. N. Andrews, who is considered to have been the first Adventist religion scholar. In 1993 the society unanimously voted to change its name to Adventist Society for Religious Studies. This became possible when AAR/SBL lifted the restrictions on denominational identifiers.

Presidents: William Johnsson, 1979; Fritz Guy, 1980; Robert M. Johnston, 1981; George Reid, 1982; Walter Douglas, 1983; Richard Coffen, 1984; Doug Clark, 1985; Sakae Kubo, 1986; Alden Thompson, 1987; James Londis, 1988; Richard Rice, 1989; Russell Staples, 1990; Pedrito U. Adventist Theological Society (ATS)

ADVENTIST THEOLOGICAL SOCIETY (ATS). A society formed for the encouragement of Seventh-day Adventists who hold to the divine inspiration of Scripture as the infallible revelation of propositional truth, who have accepted Christ as their Lord and Saviour, who endorse the use of historical-grammatical biblical interpretation, who believe in a literal Creation week of seven 24-hour days and a worldwide flood, who affirm a real sanctuary in heaven and the pre-Advent judgment of believers, who subscribe to the rest of the 27 fundamental beliefs of the Seventh-day Adventist Church, and who are committed to upholding and supporting the church.

Largely the brainchild of Jack Blanco, the society was organized at Southern College in October 1988. Four of those present for this meeting were from Andrews University, and eight were from Southern College. They adopted a tentative constitution that was finalized at the first annual session at Wheaton College in November 1988. At the time of the formulation of the society at Southern College, Jack Blanco was elected president. At the annual meeting in Lincoln, Nebraska, in the spring of 1989, the society voted to publish a scholarly journal known as the Journal of the Adventist Theological Society. Leo Van Dolson was elected editor. C. Mervyn Maxwell was asked to desktop-publish the Journal, and Gerhard Hasel did much to oversee production. Sometime after the first 1988 meeting, then General Conference president Neal Wilson stated that he did not object to the use of the name “Adventist Theological Society.”

The society holds two annual meetings: a general session in the spring or early summer, which includes the annual business meeting; and a “research” or scholarly session at the same time as the Evangelical Theological Society meetings in the fall. The president serves a two-year term. After Jack Blanco’s term, Gerhard Hasel, C. Raymond Holmes, and E. Edward Zinke were elected to that office. In 1994 Richard M. Davidson agreed to serve as vice president and president-elect.

Besides the Journal, the society has published a newsletter, ATS Occasional Papers, ATS Monographs, and the ATS Dissertation Series. In 1991 the society donated $38,000 toward the development of a seminary in Czechoslovakia. Since then $10,000 was donated to Griggs University, and a computer and CD-ROM of Ellen White writings were presented to the seminary at Zaokski in Russia. After the death of Enoch Oliveira, who had been a staunch supporter of ATS, a ministerial scholarship fund was started in his name.

As of 1994, six chapters had been organized: four in North America, one in Europe, and one in Africa. As of 1994, membership was 1,400. Home office: P.O. Box 551, Collegedale, Tennessee 37315.

Adventist Training School (formerly Assam Training School)

ADVENTIST TRAINING SCHOOL (formerly Assam Training School). A coeducational boarding school operated by the Northeast India Union of the Southern Asia Division in the Jaintia Hills of Meghalaya near Jowai. In 1991 the enrollment was 495, and a staff of 41 included 24 teachers. The school prepares students for entrance into Spicer Memorial College.

The students come from a score of language areas, mostly from the northeastern states. More than half the present staff (1993) are alumni of the school. Formerly this school was known as Assam Training School. The name was changed in 1974.

The school is an outgrowth of an elementary church school that was opened in Shillong soon after Seventh-day Adventists came to Assam in 1935 to establish permanent work. In 1942 construction started in the current location.

Adventist University of Central Africa

ADVENTIST UNIVERSITY OF CENTRAL AFRICA (Universite Adventiste d'Afrique Centrale). A coeducational boarding school on the baccalaureate level, situated in Gisenyi Prefecture of northwestern Rwanda on 290 acres (118 hectares) overlooking beautiful Lake Kivu. It is located on the slopes of Mount Karisimbi, an extinct volcano that frequently is crowned with a light blanket of snow. In all directions there is a beautiful panorama of mountains. To the west, across the western arm of the Great African Valley, in which Lake Kivu is located, the Mitumba Mountains in Zaire can be seen. The university is located 77 miles (124 kilometers) from Kigali, the nation's capital, and 19 miles (30 kilometers) by road from the resort town of Gisenyi, on the shores of Lake Kivu.

The Adventist University of Central Africa (AUCA) serves the entire francophone constituency of the Africa-Indian Ocean Division. This includes the French-speaking countries of western and central Africa, Zaire, Rwanda, and Burundi, as well as Madagascar, Reunion, Mauritius, and the Seychelles Islands in the Indian Ocean. The board of directors, made up of 23 members representing the division, each francophone union, the North Rwanda Association, and the Adventist Seminary of West Africa, is responsible for the operation of the university. The president of the division is the board chair, and the president of the Rwanda Union Mission is the vice chair.

The university offers a liberal arts education leading to the B.A. degree. There are five faculties (schools) presenting majors in accounting, information science, education, construction, public health, biology-chemistry, and theology. The university is recognized (accredited) by the Ministry of Higher Education of the Rwandan government. Andrews University is presently offering an M.A. in religion on the AUCA campus each summer. The AUCA faculty and staff are highly international, with five continents being represented. The student body also is quite cosmopolitan in origin.

Even though the university is located about 60 miles (100 kilometers) south of the equator, it enjoys a springlike, tropical climate. Temperatures average 50° F (10° C) every night of the year and 70° F (21° C) each day. Precipitation averages about 55 inches (1,400 millimeters) per year, with rain falling any time of the year except for the big dry season in July and August and the little dry season that normally comes over the year's end. AUCA's rich volcanic soils and mild climate contribute to a thriving farm. Crops such as corn, vegetables of all kinds, and such fruits as oranges, grapefruit, lemons, avocados, mountain papayas, strawberries, and Cape gooseberries thrive. A small dairy and poultry ranch also serve the needs of the institution.

The university receives its electricity (220 volts) from the national grid; however, it has four generators that provide power in emergency situations. Water comes from nonvolcanic mountains some 9 miles (15 kilometers) away. A local purification plant on campus prepares the water for consumption. A campus telephone system provides local communication, and three outside lines connect the school with the rest of the world.

The main buildings on campus are the administration building, one women's dormitory, two men's dormitories, the science building and auditorium, the cafeteria, the chapel, the library, a primary school, and two technology buildings. Thirty faculty homes and 14 married-student houses also are located on campus. A small bakery and food processing plant is attached to the kitchen. A new library was being constructed in 1993. The university also operates an important dispensary on the edge of the campus.

History and Development. The Adventist University of Central Africa was founded on Oct. 17, 1978. On that date President Juvenal Habyarimana approved the creation of the university at Mudende in northwestern Rwanda. Dr. Elton Wallace, the first rector of the university, directed the beginning of construction in 1979. During the five succeeding years a small team of workers constructed most of the homes and major buildings that now make up the university.

On Oct. 15, 1984, the young university opened its doors for the first time. Relations with the Ministry of Higher Education have always been cordial and productive. On Feb. 22, 1988, the ministry sent a team of evaluators to inspect the university. As a result, AUCA was granted recognition (accreditation) by the government of Rwanda. Enrollment reached 445 students in October 1992, and several buildings—a primary school, science building, a duplex, and two dormitories—have since been completed.

Rectors: Elton Wallace, 1979—1990; Robert Pierson, 1990— .

The school opened in 1982 in a remote location on the Atlantic coast and was moved three times before it was located on its present site. From the beginning it received official recognition by the government.

Its excellent farm supplies the school with a large variety of fruits and vegetables. The school has a capacity of 320 boarding students, with two dormitories and a cafeteria that can seat up to 700 persons. A printing shop provides work for the students. The 1993 enrollment was 330.

Adventist World Radio (AWR)

ADVENTIST WORLD RADIO (AWR). An institution of the General Conference devoted to international broadcasting of the gospel, particularly for countries where local broadcasting by the church is not possible.

Adventist World Radio began broadcasting on Oct. 1, 1971, under the direction of the Radio and Television Department of the General Conference, using a 250-kilowatt transmitter leased from Radio Trans-Europa in Lisbon, Portugal. The initial broadcasts were supplemented by leasing time on Radio Mediterranean (Malta) in 1975 and Radio Andorra in 1980; both efforts were short-lived. AWR continued to lease time on Radio Trans-Europa until 1992, when broadcasts from Russia replaced its use.

AWR-Europe releases broadcasts for Europe, the Commonwealth of Independent States, North Africa, the Middle East, and South Asia. On Feb. 2, 1985, AWR activated a 12.5-kilowatt shortwave facility in Forli, Italy. In May 1991 AWR went on the air in Mazara del Vallo, Sicily, using a 300-watt medium-wave transmitter. In 1992 AWR-Europe became the programming partner of the Voice of Hope Media Center in Tula, Russia. Programs from Novosibirsk on Mar. 1, 1992, using a leased 200-kilowatt transmitter were the first Christian broadcasts to originate from within Russia for external broadcast. On May 3, 1992, broadcasts from Moscow, Ekaterinburg, and Samara increased AWR-Europe releases to 238 hours a week from Russia, 32 from Forli, and 84 from Mazara del Vallo, using 19 languages.

General Managers: Allen R. Steele, 1971—1976; Ronald Myers, 1976—1981; Mike Wiist, 1981—1985; Greg Hodgson, 1985— .

AWR-Latin America. On Aug. 17, 1979, the Central American Union began broadcasts from Union Radio in Guatemala City in shortwave, AM and FM. The shortwave operation was transferred to AWR-Latin America in 1979. In 1986 AWR-Latin America headquarters were transferred to Alajuela, Costa Rica, and on Oct. 22, 1986, began transmissions. In 1990 additional transmitters were purchased at Cahuita, Costa Rica, and new antennas installed. AWR-Latin America operates three 50-kilowatt and two 20-kilowatt transmitters at Cahuita, a 5-kilowatt transmitter at Alajuela, and a 10-kilowatt transmitter at Guatemala City, all of them shortwave. It broadcasts 322 hours a week from Costa Rica and 57.5 hours from Guatemala, using five languages.

General Manager: Dave Gregory, 1986— .

AWR-Africa began broadcasting in October 1983 using time on a 250-kilowatt transmitter of Africa One, a station located in Gabon. AWR-Africa has responsibility for the continent of Africa south of the Sahara and broadcasts seven hours a week using French and English.

General Manager: Daniel Grisier, 1985— .

AWR-Asia: In 1985 the General Conference session offering launched a major initiative to begin broadcasts that would reach China. As a result, AWR-Asia was established on Guam, using the call sign KSDA. Broadcasts began on Mar. 6, 1987, using two 100-kilowatt shortwave transmitters and four curtain antennas. In 1993 AWR-Asia purchased a third 100-kilowatt shortwave transmitter. AWR-Asia broadcasts to China, East and Southeast Asia, Burma, and India. The major language used is Mandarin (nine hours a day). AWR-Asia broadcasts a total of 235 hours a week in 19 languages.

General Managers: Allen R. Steele, 1985—1992; Ben Sumicad (acting), 1992—1993; Gordon Retzer, 1993— .

AWR-Russia was established in 1992 to manage the release of programs from Russia. AWR-Russia is a programming partner of the Voice of Hope Media Center located in Tula, Russia (see AWR-Europe above). The Voice of Hope has contracted for the use of two 250-kilowatt and two 200-kilowatt shortwave transmitters. AWR-Russia broadcasts 238 hours a week in 19 languages.

General Manager: Peter M. Kulakov, 1993— .

The Global Mission Committee of the General Conference has requested AWR to assume responsibility for broadcasting in more than 80 languages, each spoken by more than 10 million people. By 1993 AWR was broadcasting more than 900 hours per week in 31 languages and was authorized to increase to 1,100 hours and 43 languages.

Until October 1990, AWR operated in conjunction with the Radio and Television (1971—1972) and Communication (1973—1990) departments of the General Conference, under the control of a board whose membership included all division presidents, North American lay representation, and General Conference leadership. Stations were operated by local boards, with representation from the divisions being served.

In 1990 the AWR board assumed direct control of all its stations, with the AWR director appointed by the board and serving as chief executive officer. Area broadcast committees provide for planning and programming within the divisions. The 1992 Annual Council established AWR as an institution of the General Conference, with a president/executive director appointed by the board.

AWR is funded through General Conference appropriation, an annual worldwide offering, and donations that come largely from North America.

Adventist Youth Book Club

ADVENTIST YOUTH BOOK CLUB. Originally a plan in which book selections were recommended annually for Adventist Youth (AY) Society members and others on senior, junior, and primary levels, paralleling the membership age divisions of 16—30; 10—15; and school age under 10. The local conference youth department issued a certificate to the reader upon completion of the book club selections for any one year. The club (originally called a reading course) was inaugurated in 1907, the year that the Missionary Volunteer (MV) Department was organized.

In 1970 a change was made in the book club plan to allow individual selection of book titles in the three age categories from a selected book list prepared by the publishing houses in North America. Certificates are still issued by the local conference upon the completion of required reading from selected subjects.

Adventist Youth Classes

ADVENTIST YOUTH CLASSES. Attainment levels denoting development in spiritual, physical, mental, and social areas, the dignity of labor, and the nobility of service. The first three classes, introduced by the General Conference Youth Department in 1922 for junior youth (10—15 years of age), were those of Friend, Companion, and Comrade (now Guide). In 1928 a class on the leadership level, Master Comrade (now Master Guide), was introduced for senior youth. In 1930 four preparatory pre-Friend classes (called Adventurer classes since 1979) were developed for boys and girls 6 to 9 years old: Busy Bee, Sunbeam, Builder, and Helping Hand. In 1950, at the same time the Comrade name was changed to Guide, a fourth class, Explorer, was added after the Companion class. In 1968 the classes were revised to include the following classes: Friend, Companion, Explorer, Pioneer, Guide, and for leadership, Master Guide. In 1970 the name Pioneer was changed to Ranger. A complete revision of requirements of the AY classes from Busy Bee to Ranger was made in 1975.

In 1979 the terms Missionary Volunteer (MV) and Junior Missionary Volunteer (JMV) were changed to Adventist Youth (AY) and Adventist Junior Youth (AJY). In addition, the term MV classes was changed to Pathfinder/AJY classes. In 1982 the Voyager class was added between the Ranger and the Guide classes. The Pathfinder curriculum was revised in 1988. Two manuals were produced: Teacher's Resource Manual for Juniors and Teacher's Resource Manual for Teens. The next year the Pathfinder Honors Manual (international version) was revised. These manuals contain all the requirements for the Pathfinder classes and honors.

In 1979 the pre-JMV classes were changed to Adventurer classes, and in 1989 the Adventurer classes were completely revised and the Adventurer Club was started. The new publications included the Adventurer Administrative Manual, with requirements and teachers' resources for the Adventurer classes, and the Adventurer Award Manual, with 46 Adventurer awards to go along with the Adventurer curriculum. The service or ceremony for presenting pins, honors, and awards for the Pathfinder and Adventurer classes is called an Investiture.

Adventist Youth Community Service

ADVENTIST YOUTH COMMUNITY SERVICE (changed from MV Community Service in 1979). The name adopted in July 1957 by the MV Advisory Committee, meeting in Mount Vernon, Ohio, for the wide range of activities by the local AY Society in meeting community needs. Some of the most notable records have been made by youth at SDA colleges: being first on the job after a disaster; participating in, and even initiating, community cleanup and improvement campaigns; and distributing food, clothing, and toys at Christmastime.

Some of the services recommended to young people are visiting shut-ins, the bereaved, the handicapped; using their training in AY Honors to help other young people; giving special services to the aged, blind, and deaf; making scrapbooks for children in hospitals; conducting Story Hours for children; presenting programs in sanitariums, orphanages, old people's homes, and prisons; collecting and distributing food and clothing; making contacts with displaced persons, burned-out families, flood victims, unemployed, and families of prisoners; making home improvements for the needy; distributing evangelistic publications; writing missionary letters; helping existing community welfare organizations; conducting classes in storytelling; and directing a specialized ministry to the underprivileged living in the inner city.

Adventist Youth Service (AYS)

ADVENTIST YOUTH SERVICE (AYS). An organization whose motto “From Everywhere to Everywhere” is demonstrated in its objective of offering opportunities of intradivision and interdivision volunteer missionary service to the youth of the worldwide Seventh-day Adventist Church.

The AYS program began in 1959 as the Student Missionary program for college students. In 1982 the Student Missionary program was expanded to allow all qualified Seventh-day Adventist youth, students or nonstudents, from 18 to 30 years of age to have the opportunity to serve God and others in many of the countries of the world. Most service requests do not require bilingualism, a college degree, or specialized training in a given field.

All applicants must be baptized Seventh-day Adventists in good and regular standing. If they are students in an Adventist college or university, they are approved by the college/university screening committee. If they are students in institutions of higher learning other than an Adventist institution, or if they are nonstudents, they must receive approval from the local church in which they hold membership.

Each year thousands of Adventist youth enter the AYS program from many of the countries located within the divisions of the world church. They commit themselves to a term of service that is agreeable to the call, which ranges from several weeks up to one year in duration. AYS service requests include work opportunities as teachers, assistant dormitory deans, office secretaries, assistant chaplains, teachers of English as a second language in language schools owned and operated by the church, musicians, and maintenance workers, as well as positions in the fields of agriculture, medical services, business, evangelism, youth ministry, and construction.

If applicants know what type of volunteer service project they wish to engage in and the country in which they would like to work, there is a possibility that it can be arranged. The work assignments of the AYS volunteer are compatible with the applicant’s level of education, skills, and talents.

Generally, upon completion of their term of service, AYS volunteers return home or to the campus to visit churches to report about their volunteer missionary experience and the impact it has had on their life, and to encourage other young people to “go . . . and do likewise.”

The comment made by the majority of returned AYS volunteers is “I will never be the same person I was prior to my mission service.”

Adventist Youth Silver Award

ADVENTIST YOUTH SILVER AWARD. A special award presented to high school-age youth who complete a set of requirements dealing with physical and cultural excellence attainments. The award was introduced in 1962 by the General Conference Youth Department and is a silver medallion.

Adventist Youth Societies

ADVENTIST YOUTH SOCIETIES (formerly MV Societies). The young people's organizations, senior and junior, in the local Seventh-day Adventist churches, called Adventist Youth (AY) or Adventist Junior Youth (AJY) Societies, sponsored and guided by the General Conference and union and local conference youth directors.

Youth ministry in the Seventh-day Adventist Church has gone through several phases, always evolving into a more specialized ministry to a narrower segment of the church's population. This evolution has taken the church from the early beginnings, when youth work was blended with Sabbath school, to the present, when youth ministry is divided into clearly defined areas of interest but pursues the same goals.

Three levels of ministry to youth are active in youth ministry today:

Adventurers Ministry. To reach and help children 6—9 years of age.

Pathfinder Ministry. To reach, help, and train youth 10—15 years old.

Senior Youth Ministry. To work with youth and young adults 16—30 years of age.

Activities

Activities. The AY Society's objectives are best revealed by the variety of features in the Seven Modules of Youth Leadership:

Organization. The organization module presents the history and organization of youth ministry in the Seventh-day Adventist Church. The strong emphasis is on youth ministry based in the local church, not a ministry based on conference-organized activities. Responsibilities of the leaders at the local church level are also covered in this module.

Leadership. This module incorporates aspects of training and actual practice of those activities required for senior leadership, and includes both philosophical base and practical practices. Emphasis is placed on qualities of ideal leadership, the psychology of leadership, leadership styles and functions, and practical matters such as how to chair a committee or business meeting.

Commitment. The commitment module primarily revolves around those activities and programs that are devotional in nature and that provide for special affirmation and celebration opportunities. Weeks of Prayer or Weeks of Spiritual Emphasis are outlined in which a seven-day period of time is selected for a concentrated thrust of personal relationships with the Lord through fellowship, intense scriptural study, and communion. Also featured are Bible conferences, with ideas and helps for church and school youth groups.

Discipleship. This module deals with how to help youth become disciples and stay committed to that way of life. Extensive presentation on the psychological aspect of youth leadership is given. Growth and nurture group leaders specializing in the spiritual well-being of their members will find resources in this module to accomplish all that might be desired, whether in youth or family situations. The ultimate objective is discipling others to the Lord and equipping them to share in this experience.

Worship. Worship is not merely attending church. The religious exercise of worship includes learning to live in God's presence and integrating those things learned at church into one's daily living. The purpose of this module is to help SDA young people discover the joy of worship and how to adopt a worshipful spirit while attending church.

Witnessing. Witnessing, the sharing of our own individual experience in the Lord, is among the first and foremost ministries in which the disciplined Christian will want to engage.

Fellowship. This module is designed to guide in finding resources to help provide meaningful recreation for the AY Society. Youth must be guided to discover and take part in meaningful recreation, in addition to learning how to deal with their leisure time. Recreation and entertainment must be defined, and proper practices that reflect the SDA lifestyle adopted.

Aim, Motto, and Pledge

Aim, Motto, and Pledge. The blueprint for AY activities is found in the Aim, Motto, and Pledge. For the Senior Society these are:

Aim. The Advent Message to All the World in This Generation.

Motto. The Love of Christ Constraineth Us.

Pledge. Loving the Lord Jesus, I promise to take an active part in the work of the Adventist Youth Society, doing what I can to help others and to finish the work of the gospel in all the world.

Pledge and Law

Pledge and Law: The AJY/Pathfinders are guided by a Pledge and Law.

The AJY/Pathfinder Pledge: By the grace of God, I will be pure and kind and true. I will keep the AJY/Pathfinder Law. I will be a servant of God and a friend to man.

The AJY/Pathfinder Law: The AJY/Pathfinder Law is for me to—1. Keep the Morning Watch. 2. Do my honest part. 3. Care for my body. 4. Keep a level eye. 5. Be courteous and obedient. 6. Walk softly in the sanctuary. 7. Keep a song in my heart. 8. Go on God's errands.

History

History: AY Societies date from 1907. In that year plans for a Young People's Department were made in a General Conference council at Gland, Switzerland; and later in the same year at Mount Vernon, Ohio, the new department was named the Young People's Missionary Volunteer Department. See MV Societies. This department gave the societies their present organization. However, this was not the beginning of young people's societies in the church; for earlier history, see Youth Department of Missionary Volunteers. In 1972 the name of the department was officially changed to Youth Department of Missionary Volunteers. The term Missionary Volunteers was changed to Adventist Youth in 1979.

In 1985 the General Conference Youth Department was merged with four other departments of the General Conference (Home and Family Service, Lay Activities, Sabbath School, and Stewardship) to form the Church Ministries Department.

Adventist Youth to Youth (AY2Y)

ADVENTIST YOUTH TO YOUTH (AY2Y). An organization begun in Ohio in 1982 as a high school program. Its goal was to support and encourage teenagers to be drug-free. By 1984 the program had received much attention and an overwhelming number of requests for help from all over the United States. In response the first national Youth to Youth conference was developed. The annual conference in Ohio spread to regional conferences in California, Idaho, Ohio, and New York.

Adventist Youth to Youth was first promoted in the North American Division in 1988 in the Southern Union, where the first SDA Y2Y conference was held. That conference was such a success that it led to further conferences throughout North America. In February 1990 the Health and Temperance Department of the General Conference adopted Adventist Youth to Youth as its official prevention program for the 1990s.

AY2Y is a positive program that uses local clubs led by youth supported by adult sponsors to reach other youth and children with a drug-free message from their peers. Clubs are started by participants who have attended a four-day conference and have made a commitment to be drug-free. The program focuses on positive alternatives to handling problems so that the use of alcohol, tobacco, and other drugs is seen as unnecessary and undesirable.

The five elements of the AY2Y program are: information, family groups, fun events, community change and outreach, and leadership training.

Adventist Youth Week of Prayer

ADVENTIST YOUTH WEEK OF PRAYER (formerly called MV Week). A week listed in the church calendar in March, observed in the local churches around the world, during which the church gives its entire interest to the spiritual welfare of its youth. The week is sponsored by the General Conference. It was named Missionary Volunteer Week in 1932. A special Youth Ministry Accent for the Adventist Youth Week of Prayer, containing a complete format of suggestions and sermon materials for use in every church during this special week, is distributed annually. As a result of Adventist Youth Week of Prayer, thousands of baptisms of youth have taken place around the world.

A week of devotions began in 1915 as a spring Week of Prayer in SDA schools. This proved so successful that the Autumn Council of 1920 recommended that each union arrange for an Adventist Youth Week in every church. The first Sabbath of Adventist Youth Week is designated as Adventist Youth Day.

ADVENTTIKIRKON VANHAINKOTI. An old people's home, situated in Tampere, Finland, eight miles (13 kilometers) from the center of the city, in a rural area. The home has a capacity of 45 residents and a staff of 17. The original main building and grounds for the home, situated near a large lake, were part of an estate purchased by the Finland Publishing House. After enlargement and improvements the home was dedicated on May 29, 1956. Additions with modern facilities were added in 1965 and 1968. Residents of the home come from various parts of Finland.

Adventurer Club

ADVENTURER CLUB. A Seventh-day Adventist church-sponsored ministry open to all children ages 6—9, in which the church, home, and school join together to help children grow joyfully “in wisdom and stature, and in favour with God and man.”

The Adventurer Club is offered to assist parents in making the development of their child richer and more meaningful. In some ways the Pathfinder and Adventurer Clubs are similar, but the Adventurer program is to be unique in its own way and should be kept separate. One of the Adventurer Club objectives is to provide a meaningful and exciting experience as the children look forward with anticipation to being a Pathfinder in the future.

Afghanistan

AFGHANISTAN. A republic in central Asia, bordered by Iran on the west, Turkmenistan, Tajikistan, and Uzbekistan on the north, and Pakistan on the south and east. The northeast tip touches China. It has an area of about 250,000 square miles (647,500 square kilometers) and is populated (1994) by about 17 million Muslims of mixed descent, most of whom are tribal villagers (though there are some nomads). The main language spoken is Dari. Another official language is Pushtu, which is spoken particularly in the east and north.

Loma Linda University, in cooperation with Indiana University, supplied medical personnel for the training of Afghans at the medical college in Jalalabad. American physicians Bernard Briggs, Emmett Tetz, Benjamin Herndon, and J. E. Peterson served for varying periods of time. Dr. Gordon Hadley served as project chief of party and O. W. Lange was general administrative officer for the medical team and for the Seventh-day Adventist organization in general. Two Indians, Japes Fowler and R. Sajjano Rao, medical technologists, along with their nurse wives, were part of this mission, as were Zenaida Querol and Rachael Gayoba, nurses from the Philippines. At present no work is being carried on.

The territory of Afghanistan is part of the Pakistan Union Section, which in turn is part of the Trans-European Division.

Africa Herald Publishing House

AFRICA HERALD PUBLISHING HOUSE (formerly East African Publishing House). A publishing house at Kendu Bay, Kenya, owned and operated by the Eastern Africa Division, but having an interunion board because it serves the East African and Tanzania unions. It is situated on land belonging to Gendia Station, which overlooks Kendu Bay of Lake Victoria. In 1993 the staff consisted of four European and 40 African workers. Printing is done in 16 languages, one of which, Swahili, is common throughout East Africa, besides being widely used in Rwanda, Burundi, and Zaïre (formerly the Democratic Republic of the Congo), which territories order supplies from this publishing house. Total sales for 1993 amounted to more than $110,000.

The history of the publishing house goes back to 1913, when A. A. Carscallen returned from furlough late in the year, bringing with him a small platen press and a few pounds of type. Among the workers who had come to East Africa from England in 1912 was L.E.A. Lane, who previously had done some printing. In 1914 the newly arrived press was set up at Gendia, and Lane taught three Africans, E. Nyalando, E. Owano, and E. Singa, to set type. He printed Luo spelling and grammar books, which Carscallen, who was the first to reduce that language to writing, had prepared. He also published a small monthly paper called Jaote Luo ("The Luo Messenger"). The press was first known as the South Kavirondo Press. About 1930 the name was changed to the Advent Press. In 1925 a former cowshed was renovated and adapted, enlarging the press's floor space. A secondhand power press, brought from England by F. H. Thomas, and a Davis typesetter were installed. The African staff was increased to five. From the first, Africans have been trained to do most of the printing work. Some of them have given a lifetime of service to the publishing house. Today (1993) a well-educated group, operating modern machinery, make their contribution to the work of evangelizing their fellow Africans. Funds from the 1937 Missions Extension Offering made possible the addition of another building and more equipment.

In addition to textbooks, hymnbooks, and Sabbath school lessons, the press has produced many small books for sale by colporteurs. These were issued in four main languages (Swahili, Luganda, Gusii, and Luo), some passing through many editions. Colporteur work began in Kenya in 1932 with Y. Odongo as the first colporteur. Sometime later R. A. Carey wrote, "Our chief difficulty in the colporteur work is not finding men, but territory. East Africa has hundreds of square miles and millions of people, but the small percentage of people who can read means that a colporteur cannot stay long in one place with one book." In more recent years opportunities for universal primary education and selective secondary education in East Africa have greatly raised the level of literacy, and at the same time better and more attractive books have been produced. Recent publications include full-color illustrations.

The translation of English books and selections from English books has always been a major task. Much credit for this work must be given to such overseas workers as Grace Clarke and W.C.S. Raitt, and also to many African workers.

In 1956 the press was reorganized and the name changed to the East African Publishing House. Financial help from the General Conference Publishing Rehabilitation Fund made possible the purchase of much-needed equipment. In 1958 R. E. Gardner was called to be the works superintendent. The installation of additional new equipment to meet the demands of a larger colporteur force serving an expanding reading public increased the facilities of the institution. The enlargement of the factory from 4,200 square feet (390 square meters) to 14,000 square feet (1,300 square meters) was completed in 1961. In 1965 the name was changed to Africa Herald Publishing House, with further reorganization taking place in 1968. Since then, $66,000 worth of new equipment has enabled the same number of staff to quadruple production.

The years since 1974 have presented the greatest challenge the publishing house work has faced in East Africa. With the great increase in education there has been a phenomenal demand for literature. In 1992 the Africa Herald Publishing House experienced its greatest loss in sales because of inadequate facilities. Plans are being laid to increase sales.

The division was organized in 1970 with a membership of 124,382 in 662 churches, being formed by uniting the East African Union (which had functioned as a detached union mission under the General Conference in 1969 and 1970), the Ethiopian Union from the Northern European Division, the former Middle East Division, and the Tanzania Union from the Trans-Africa Division, into one organization. In 1981 a territorial realignment of African divisions took place. The Eastern Africa Division was formed, and the Middle East Union became attached to the General Conference.

Agona Seventh-day Adventist Secondary School

AGONA SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST SECONDARY SCHOOL. A coeducational boarding and day school jointly managed by the Ministry of Education and the Seventh-day Adventist Church in Ghana. It was established in 1963 as a four-year teacher training college with an initial enrollment of 80 students. The church provided the initial infrastructure for the opening of the school.

In October 1972 the Secondary School Department was established on the same campus with the training college, until the latter was completely phased out in 1974. The school operates on two campuses: the old site, which is located in the northern part of the town along the Kumasi-Mampong Motorable Road, contains the administrative block, the classrooms, girls' dormitory, dining hall, and residences for the tutors; the new site, which is located on the northeastern part of the town, on the Agona-Effiduasi Motorable Road, houses the boys' dormitory and additional housing for the tutors.

In 1993 the school was running two programs concurrently, namely the General Certificate of Education (GCE), and the Senior Secondary School (SSS) programs. The GCE was to be phased out completely in 1994. The school pursues three programs in the SSS course: general science, general arts, and vocational studies. The subjects taught in the SSS program include: English language, English literature, Bible knowledge, history, government, economics, Twi, mathematics, physics, chemistry, biology, food and nutrition, management in living, clothing and textiles, and art.

The school operates an institutional church with a full-time chaplain. Sabbath afternoon programs include doctrinal teachings; stewardship; and health and temperance studies, such as drug abuse, drug addiction, and sex education.

Åhrén, Emil J.

ÅHRÉN, EMIL J. (1865—1936). Preacher, editor, author. Born in Vermland, Sweden, he became a Seventh-day Adventist about 1880. Arriving in Battle Creek, Michigan, in 1882, he began working in the Swedish department of the Review and Herald publishing house. To earn funds to enable him to attend Battle Creek College, he did colporteur work, being the first Swede to sell SDA Swedish subscription books. On completion of his studies he entered the ministry and was ordained in the late eighties.

In 1890 he returned to Sweden, but two years later came back to America. With a growing conviction that he should work for the people of his homeland he sailed back to Sweden in 1894, and for 38 years was editor of Tidens Tecken (“Signs of the Times”). Two of his brothers were also SDA ministers. Åhrén was a man of culture, humble and sincere. He was a good preacher and an able editor.

Akaki Seventh-day Adventist School

AKAKI SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST SCHOOL. A coeducational 12-grade boarding school operated under the direction of the Central Ethiopia Field at Akaki, near Addis Ababa. The 1973 enrollment was 450 students (about 300 of them boarders), ranging in age from 6 to 18, with 22 full- and part-time teachers for the 12 grades.

Forerunner of the school was a boys' school opened under the leadership of W. Kölling and R. Stein in 1921 on rented land near the village of Addis Alam, about 40 miles (65 kilometers) west of Addis Ababa. Manuel J. Sorensen and his wife, who arrived in Ethiopia in 1922, took charge of the school in 1923 and continued with it till 1929. Carl Jensen and his wife, from Denmark, were there for about a year before moving to western Ethiopia. P. M. Myhre from Norway was there from 1930 to 1933 and made many improvements on the school plant. In 1934, after the school had been without a foreign teacher for about a year, Herbert M. Hanson and his wife arrived. The Italian administration, which took control of Ethiopia in 1936, allowed the Addis Alam school to be operated on a limited scale until 1938, when it was ordered closed. This school is listed in the Yearbook from 1933 to 1940, first as the Boys' Training School, then as Addis Ababa Training School for Boys, Addis Alam Training School for Boys, and Ethiopian Union Training School for Boys.

After the Italians left in 1941, Hanson organized a boys' school in rented quarters in Addis Ababa, but in March 1943 moved it to its present site, about 12 miles (20 kilometers) south of the city near the village of Akaki, where some ground and 15 dilapidated stone and mud buildings, which had housed an Italian dynamite factory, were leased from the Ministry of Education for 51 years with the sanction of Emperor Haile Selassie I. This school was listed in the Yearbook as Ethiopian Mission Training School for Boys.

Known as Akaki Boys' School, the institution opened with about 70 students, mostly boarders, ranging in age from about 10 to well over 21. A few girls attended as day students. Teachers were few, and most of them had a limited education. From about 1950, girls were accepted as boarding and day students, and the school was renamed the Akaki Mission School. By 1954, classes ranged from grades 1 to 11.

In 1955 the secondary section was moved to Kuyera, the secondary school for Ethiopia (Ethiopian Adventist College), leaving Akaki an eight-grade school. But in 1967 the school was upgraded to its present level of 12 grades.

The boarding fee in 1993 was $50 per month. Paying students are required to work 10 hours a week. Some work in the school garden and kitchen; others help to maintain the grounds and buildings; still others care for the plumbing and electrical work. Rugmaking and other handcrafts provide salable articles.

In 1993 the school had an enrollment of 1,500 students and employed 28 teachers. It rates high academically in Ethiopia.

Alaska Conference

ALASKA CONFERENCE. The unit of church organization comprising the territory of the state of Alaska. Statistics (1993): churches, 27; members, 2,498; church or elementary schools, 9; ordained ministers, 15; licensed ministers, 6; church school teachers, 17. Headquarters: 6100 O'Malley Road, Anchorage, Alaska. The conference forms part of the North Pacific Union Conference.

Local churches: Aleknagik, Anchorage (Abundant Life, Community, Jewell Lake, Northside, O'Malley), Craig, Delta Junction, Dillingham, Eagle River, Fairbanks, Gambell, Juneau, Kenai, Ketchikan, Kodiak, Nome, North Pole, Palmer, Safe Harbor, Savoonga, Sitka, Sunshine, Valdez, Wasilla, Wrangell.

Companies: Bethel, Copper Basin, Homer, Korean, Kotzebue, Petersburg. Groups meeting: Selawik, Shungnak, Spanish, Togiak, Toko.

There are nine schools, one offering 10 grades.

Alaska is about one fifth the area of the rest of the United States, stretches across the boundaries of two time zones, and reaches beyond the Arctic Circle. The people are separated by great distances and live in modern cities, in logging camps, in floating villages, on homesteads, on farms, and in native villages. The population (1992) is 580,861.

Principal income is from fisheries, minerals (especially North Slope oil), wood products, tourism, and furs. Military bases also form a significant part of the Alaska economy. Salmon, halibut, herring, cod, and shellfish are frozen and canned.

History of Beginnings of Seventh-day Adventist Work

History of Beginnings of Seventh-day Adventist Work. In 1895 there was in Alaska one known SDA, Mrs. J. W. Young, in Ketchikan. According to the Review and Herald (74:91, Feb. 9, 1897), in 1896 a colporteur, with another layperson, met some Indians in Alaska who requested a missionary to teach them the Bible. The account does not identify either of these. In the 1898 gold rush an SDA miner-blacksmith, Jasper N. Sylvester (grandfather of H.M.S. Richards, Sr., of the Voice of Prophecy), came to Alaska and gave away tracts wherever he went. George E. Henton, a layman who came to Skagway in 1898, wrote to the Review and Herald in 1900 appealing for missionaries to come. He reported one convert and said that SDAs were favorably known.

The first Seventh-day Adventist missionaries to Alaska were A. M. Dart and T. H. Watson, who in 1901 came to Juneau and Douglas (at that time a mining community situated across the Gastineau Channel from Juneau). It is not known how long Watson stayed (he was still there in 1902), but Dart returned to California in 1904 because of poor health. In 1905 J. M. Estes, of Nome, Alaska, reported working among the Eskimos, several of whom had begun to observe the Sabbath (Review and Herald 82:18, Aug. 17, 1905). Possibly it was to this work that John Spoon, the father of an Inuit tribe, referred in 1930 when he told

S. C. Hanson who was teaching in a government school at Ugashik, that he had attended SDA meetings “in Nome years ago” (North Pacific Union Gleaner 25:4, Dec. 2, 1930).

In the summer of 1905 Dart was back again in Alaska, holding meetings in a tent in Ketchikan. He was assisted by R. S. Greaves, a student on vacation from Walla Walla College, and by local lay members “Brother and Sister Sparhawk and Sister [J. W.] Young, who are engaged in mercantile business here” (ibid. 1:8, July 24, 1906). They established a Sabbath school of 11 members. In the autumn a store building was fitted up as a meeting place, and Dart held Sunday night meetings attended about equally by indigenous people and settlers. In the spring of 1907 an SDA Indian preacher from British Columbia, Henry Pierce, came temporarily to work among the interested Indians around Ketchikan. After spending the summer in Skagway and visiting the small number of SDAs in Juneau, Douglas, and other places, Dart returned to Ketchikan for the winter. The work in Skagway, which consisted mostly of distributing publications among the travelers coming through, yielded no permanent results. On this trip Dart visited “Sister Carter,” who had “held the fort at Douglas for about ten years” (ibid. 2:4, Nov. 6, 1907), and therefore must have been one of the earliest SDAs in Alaska.

Alaska Mission Church

Alaska Mission Church. By 1907 the Yearbook names Dart as superintendent and minister of the Alaska Mission, which had a membership at that time of 25. For the next three years no worker is listed, but the 1911 Yearbook names Fred W. Temple, in Ketchikan, as missionary licentiate for Alaska. In June 1909 he and William Furber had been sent from Walla Walla College as student colporteurs by the North Pacific Union Conference. The two purchased a launch, the Evangel, and used it to travel among the islands until winter set in. In 1910 Temple, who stayed on until 1913 or 1914, had a larger boat built, a 36-foot (11-meter) cruiser called Searchlight, and used it as a “marine relief ship” on emergency missions. In 1915 and again in 1916 the Yearbook names no missionary for Alaska, but in 1916 D. H. Hanson, a minister from Montana sent by the North Pacific Union Conference, arrived at Juneau in April. Visiting Skagway and Eagle River, he held meetings at the latter place and established a Sabbath school of 11. At that time there were two SDA nurses working in the Juneau hospital and “a sister living at Ketchikan.”

In September came another minister, William T. Hilgert, with his wife and Dorothy Rice. Shortly afterward he organized a mission church of 10 members. Evangelistic meetings at Ketchikan resulted in six converts. Before the end of the year, work had begun among the Indians, and one convert, a Tsimshean from Metlakahtla, had been won. Weekly meetings were held at a native Thlinglet village where “sister Young, who has been in Alaska for many years, taught . . . a number of years ago” and where the villagers asked the missionaries to return in the autumn (North Pacific Union Gleaner 11:1, Jan. 25, 1917). In the spring and summer of 1917, meetings at Skagway resulted in five converts. The secretary-treasurer of the North Pacific Union Conference, S. J. Lashier, came during the summer of 1917 and assisted Hanson with meetings at Douglas.

By early 1918 Hanson reported that in the entire mission field there was only one church, with 16 members, who were widely scattered (all of them in southeastern Alaska). Some had moved to the continental United States. There were three Sabbath schools, at Ketchikan, Douglas, and Skagway (ibid. 12:2, Feb. 14, 1918).

By the summer, W. T. Hilgert had returned to Oregon, and F. A. Lashier was assisting Hanson in holding evangelistic meetings at Haines. Late in 1919, after Hanson had returned to the continental U.S., O. W. Herwick, from North Dakota, went to Alaska. He assisted Lashier in evangelistic meetings at Sitka. The Lashiers returned to the continental U.S., while Herwick remained until 1963, though retired from the active ministry in 1929. In the spring of 1921 T. H. Watson, who had spent some time in Alaska at the beginning of the century, returned to work among the natives, but first assisted Herwick in evangelistic meetings in southeastern Alaska and in organizing a church at Ketchikan, which met in the home of Mrs. Young (ibid. 16:3, May 26, 1921). That same year Herwick, with the help of a few members, began to erect a small church building at Ketchikan, a two-story structure with the chapel on the upper level.

In 1922 the North Pacific Union Conference bought a boat for the Alaska Mission, the 50-foot (15-meter) Dixie. The decision to purchase was made when H. W. Cottrell, president of the union conference, and S. J. Lashier, treasurer, came to Alaska at the request of Herwick to plan for mission work for the Inuits and Indians as well as the settlers.

Work in Western Alaska

Work in Western Alaska. Watson traveled among the islands of southeastern Alaska, meeting with natives and other fishers. In 1923 he worked far to the north and west of the SDA base in southeast Alaska. He established and taught in the government school at Kulukuk, and worked in an outpost station among primitive natives untouched by Christianity. By his example he taught Christianity to the Inuits living around Bristol Bay, in western Alaska, even though he could not teach his religion formally in a government school. “It is said that when he was first asked to go to Alaska, Ellen G. White talked with him about the work in that vast territory and advised him, ‘Let no man take you from that field’” (Fern Royer Owens, Sky Pilot of Alaska, p. 48). He continued working for Inuits and Indians, with periodic returns to California for his health, until his death, in January 1927.

From time to time (1924—1927) the North Pacific Union Gleaner mentions several SDA members who did lay missionary work among the Inuits at the Kananak orphanage and elsewhere in the Bristol Bay area (Watson, the L. D. McGhees, the Howard Hansens, and Josie Moody). The V. P. Dicksons worked in a school at Shishmaref, in the far northwest. In 1929 S. F. Nance worked in Valdez, Fairbanks, and Anchorage. As a result, in that year one woman was baptized at Valdez and two men at Anchorage.

Mission Organization

Mission Organization. In 1929 H. L. Wood was sent to superintend the Alaska Mission and to organize the mission as nearly as possible like the organized conferences in the continental U.S. He was appointed secretary-treasurer, Book and Bible House manager, Sabbath School Department secretary, and Home Missionary Department secretary. He soon repaired and remodeled the Dixie, which he renamed the Messenger. Assuming the role of captain and his wife that of deck hand, they followed the fishing fleet “fishing for men,” and sailed from village to village holding meetings and preaching the gospel.

According to the records there were 24 members in Alaska at the close of 1928, and four Sabbath schools, with five members of the extension division scattered throughout the territory. Wood set up the mission office in his home in Ketchikan; his wife handled the correspondence. Letters were sent to the isolated members each quarter.

After evangelistic meetings were held at Juneau in 1931, 10 were baptized. A church was organized there the same year under the leadership of Vernon Gyes and his wife, who came to Alaska in 1930.

Through the influence of Frank Waskey (Alaska’s first delegate to the United States Congress, and a convert of L. D. McGhee and T. H. Watson), Ray Smith with his family of 10 left Washington in 1930, moved to the Bristol Bay area, and settled at Mosquito Point on Lake Aleknagik, near Dillingham. As the years went by, relatives and friends moved in, until the Aleknagik church was established in 1934, with 25 charter members, the first in the Bering Sea region.

In 1935 the mission headquarters were moved from Ketchikan to Juneau, and an old trading post in the downtown area was purchased and remodeled into a church. A later addition housed the mission offices.

Wood broadcast on Sunday evenings over the Juneau radio station, with the Gyeses helping with the music. The following year M. J. Jackson preached on the radio at Anchorage, in south central Alaska, where in 1934 there had been only one known SDA (North Pacific Union Gleaner, Dec. 11, 1934), and where he organized a Sabbath school in April 1936. In 1974 this old church was replaced by a new one.

With the opening up of Matanuska Valley to homesteaders, there soon was a small group of believers at Palmer. Through the efforts of Jackson, a church of 23 was organized and a new log church building was dedicated there Apr. 19, 1936. This was the first church of any denomination in the Matanuska Valley. This church was sold in 1971 and replaced by a new one, which was completed early in 1975.

The first Alaskan general meeting was held in April 1934 at Ketchikan. Fifty of the 91 members were present, and 10 converts were baptized.

At this time the Messenger was sold and a coast guard patrol boat was purchased from the government and named Messenger II. Later, during World War II, when invasion threatened Alaska, the Navy requisitioned Messenger II, leaving the mission without transportation. On Wood’s appeal the North Pacific Union Conference purchased an airplane for the mission. On his fifty-second birthday, May 1, 1942, Wood enrolled as a student pilot. On one two-month trip around the field he logged 11,000 air miles. But death came suddenly on Sept. 24, 1944, apparently from a heart attack, as he flew over the inland waters of southeastern Alaska, approaching the Owens logging camp.

In 1924 Sam Hance canvassed southeast Alaska, covering Ketchikan, Petersburg, Juneau, and Sitka. In 1925 he took Harold Peckham from Walla Walla College with him across the Gulf of Alaska to Kodiak Island, then back to Anchorage, Valdez, and Seward; then they hiked the approximately 500 miles (800 kilometers) from Seward to Fairbanks to reach the men building the Alaska railroad. They found a small group of men about every 12 miles (19 kilometers). After reaching Fairbanks, they canvassed about three weeks before they were told to obtain a $200 permit or desist. So Hance hiked another 380 miles (600 kilometers) over Chitna Creek and on to Cordova, while Peckham hiked to Valdez and on to Cordova, where they took a boat to southeast Alaska and canvassed the islands from the mission boat.

In 1926 Harold Peckham and Robert Wirth, from Walla Walla College, canvassed in southeastern Alaska, then went north. They hiked 150 miles (240 kilometers) inland to the head of the Yukon River, then traveled by boat down the river, and later hiked the more than 500 miles (800 kilometers) from Seward to Fairbanks, selling SDA publications. In 1927 Wirth returned with Edd Norwood and covered the same territory.

Elmer Henderson, called a veteran colporteur, lost his life in 1930 on the Shismaref Shoal when the mailboat Good Hope was wrecked in a storm.

In 1948 A. L. Zumwalt, in Alaska since 1946, became the first president of the Alaska Mission. He concluded that church schools were the answer to the problem of helping the Alaska Mission grow. New members who moved into the territory or who were baptized locally would soon leave in order to secure a Christian education for their children. In the summer of 1953 the mission office was moved to the Anchorage church building, and two years later to a new office at 718 Barrow Street. Before Zumwalt's retirement in 1961, every church had a church school, as did the company on Vank Island.

In 1946, while Jack Provonsha served as pastor at Fairbanks, a church was organized there. A new building was erected in 1960, but it was severely damaged by the flooding of the Chena River in 1967. This building was replaced by a new church at College, near the University of Alaska, under the leadership of Dr. A. V. Pflugrad and Pastor James Stagg.

Evangelism Among the Inuits

Evangelism Among the Inuits. Work among Inuits in the north above the Arctic Circle began in 1949. Interested people were found at Selawik by Marvin Troutman, Merle Smith and his wife, and the mailing band of the Dillingham church. Beginning in 1955, Glenn Murphy and his wife lived and worked there for seven years. With Inuit help, Murphy logged with dog teams in the winter and by summer floated the logs 80 to 100 miles (128 to 160 kilometers) down the rivers to build the church and apartment at Selawik. In 1962 John Topkok and his wife, Naomi, became the first Inuit workers, traveling among their own people for hundreds of miles around the Selawik area in their own small airplane.

At Gambell, on St. Lawrence Island, Frank Daugherty and his wife were lay members stationed there from 1938 to 1945. Because of this couple's personal Christian witnessing, Wood came and baptized Robert Tungiyon and John Walunga on June 20, 1944. Two years later, on Aug. 29, 1946, 12 young people and adults were baptized by Fred Wagner. A church building was erected at Gambell by Glenn Murphy. In 1970 Pastor and Mrs. Bernie Willis were assigned as the first permanent workers at this most isolated place. In March 1972 a church was organized at Gambell. This was the first Inuit church in the North American Division.

Village Work. Mr. and Mrs. Clyde Harris made funds available in 1965 for the establishment of chapels in Inuit villages. Later a year-round student missionary program was begun in Shungnak, Selawik, Savoonga, and Togiak. Each village has a chapel and adequate housing for arctic conditions. At the small town of Craig, in southeastern Alaska, the mission owned an abandoned church building and school. Seeing the success of the arctic student missionary work, Murray Gildersleeve renovated the Craig property in 1971. A year later work was begun by David Brown, a colporteur, and his wife. The Craig church building now serves as a central meeting facility for the community. A full-time pastor is located there.

Messenger III. In southeast Alaska SDAs are scattered in many logging camps and villages. There are also Indian villages in the area. To serve this area the people in the camps raised funds to build a 53-foot (16-meter) motor vessel. In 1970 the Messenger III was launched. It serves as a parsonage, chapel, and mobile evangelistic outreach center.

New Groups. Laymembers have established the work at Valdez, Kodiak, and the Kenai Peninsula. In 1959 Milford Taylor moved to Valdez and served the community as a schoolteacher and later as a principal. He established a Sabbath school that grew, and in 1973 a small group organized into a company. The town of Valdez was completely demolished by the tidal wave following the great Alaska earthquake in 1964. The town has been completely relocated and is the terminus for the Alaska oil pipeline. The church in Valdez was completed in 1972 under the direction of Glen Mills. Dr. A. V. Pflugrad, of Fairbanks, was also one of the motivating influences encouraging the building.

In 1972 Douglas Cooper and his family moved to Kodiak for the purpose of establishing a church in Alaska's fifth-largest city. He began by canvassing to find interested people. Families were also encouraged to move to the area. In 1973 a company was officially organized and land purchased for a building site. There now is a new church/school combination building that houses 12 students and 55 church members.

In 1968 Bert McCool moved his family from Palmer to the Kenai Peninsula. At that time there was no organized work on all of the peninsula. The McCools held Sabbath school in their home and gradually gathered together other interested people and Sabbathkeepers. By 1973 the group was officially organized as a church to serve the twin cities of Kenai-Soldotna.

In 1982 the Alaska mission officially became the Alaska Conference.

Youth Camps. Because of the immense size of Alaska and the scattered membership, the conference operates three youth camps: Camp Tukuskoya, to serve south central Alaska; Camp Polaris, to serve the west; and Camp Lorraine, to serve the southeast. A new lodge was built at Tukuskoya, near Anchorage, during the summer of 1974. Elder Harold Dawson began work on Camp Lorraine, on Vank Island, in 1970 and completed seven cabins and a four-story A-frame lodge. The camp was dedicated the summer of 1974. Much of the work and material was donated by people living in the city of Wrangell and area logging camps. The camp is also used in community service for the young people and adults of that area.

Albania

ALBANIA. A republic in the western part of the Balkan Peninsula, having an area of 11,100 square miles (28,750 square kilometers) and a population (1994) of 3.4 million. Albanians are considered to be descendants of the ancient Illyrians, who may have migrated into the Balkans even before the Greeks. The area was later controlled by the Romans, Slavs, and Normans. Then in the fifteenth century came the Turks, who introduced Islam. In 1912 the country was proclaimed independent. The people of the country are predominantly Albanians, but there are small groups of Greeks, Vlachs, Bulgarians, and Serbs. The Albanians speak a language not related closely to any other European language. Their religions are: Muslim (more than 70 percent), Greek Orthodox (about 17 percent), and Roman Catholic (about 10 percent). All public worship and religious institutions were outlawed in 1967. In 1990 the right to practice religion was restored.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. Perhaps the first Albanian converts (who lived, however, in an area now in Greece) were three of the Brakas family, who became SDAs through reading denominational publications and were baptized in 1909 by R. S. Greaves. There was no development of the work in Albania itself for many years.

In 1932 E. Hennecke, director of the Grecian Mission, who was forced to leave Greece, moved to Tiranë, the capital of Albania, hoping to continue to direct the mission from there. He sought and obtained permission to establish medical work in Albania, and received authorization for two trained nurses from Germany to enter the country. This experiment lasted less than a year, for in a few months all the foreign workers had to leave the country. However, as the result of some meetings held during that year, one woman was baptized.

In 1938 D. C. Lewis, an Albanian returning to his country after having learned the SDA message in America, was baptized en route in Saloniki, Greece. After settling in Albania, he shared his faith, with the result that four converts were baptized in 1940 by C. A. Christoforides, director of the Grecian Mission, who had the responsibility for members in Albania.

During World War II contact with Albania was lost. D. C. Lewis, as was learned later, died soon after the end of the war.

When contact was reestablished in 1991, it was discovered that there had been two believers who had remained faithful during this period of isolation. ADRA and the Communication/Public Affairs and Religious Liberty departments of the Trans-European Division were the entering wedge in reestablishing contact. They developed a good working relationship with the government and local authorities.

In the spring of 1992 a team of evangelists under the direction of David Currie, Ministerial Association secretary of the Trans-European Division, began a series of evangelistic campaigns in Tiranë and Korçë. This resulted in the first baptisms in Albania in 50 years.

In a special ceremony on Oct. 10, 1992, the first church was formally organized in Tiranë. A prominent feature of the church program is its children's ministries. More than 100 enthusiastic children attend each week. By the end of 1992 there were 124 baptized members in Albania.

In 1993 ADRA was able to lease a portion of land (approximately 1.25 acres [5,000 square meters]) from the local council in Tiranë for the future development of a warehouse, community center, health center, and micro industrial units.

The territory of Albania is a part of the Trans-European Division.

Albanian Mission Organized

Albanian Mission Organized. Just three years after Albania opened its doors, Seventh-day Adventists formally established church organization in that country. Seventy delegates representing believers from Tiranë, Korça, Shkodra, and Elbasan, convened April 14—16, 1994, in Tiranë and voted to adopt a church constitution and form the Albanian Mission.

The international church made its first contacts with Albania in decades during April 1991. Today there are 155 baptized members in Albania. According to Ron Edwards, mission president, the number worshiping on Sabbath is much greater. They are now preparing 80 for baptism and have an objective of tripling their membership by 1997.

History

History. Beginnings of the Work. Seventh-day Adventist teachings were introduced into Alberta in May 1895 by two colporteurs, Thomas Astleford and George W. Sowler. Astleford, preceding Sowler by two weeks, began working in Edmonton. Sowler sold 200 copies of Bible Readings in Calgary. He also canvassed north of Calgary and in the towns along the Canadian Pacific Railroad to the east, and among the ranchers from Calgary to Fort MacLeod, and from the Bow River to the foothills of the Rockies. On one trip he traveled in the saddle 25 miles (40 kilometers) without seeing a house.

Astleford, working in Edmonton and in the towns along the railroad to the south, was responsible for the first converts in the province. These included Gustave Litke of Leduc (the Northern Union Gleaner [1:1, Aug. 14, 1906] calls him John), and Dr. Menzel and his family, of Stony Plains. Litke shared his new faith with his German friends, and soon H. J. Dirksen was sent from Manitoba, who organized a church at Leduc on May 14, 1898, the first Seventh-day Adventist church in the Northwest Territories.

The first SDA pastor to settle in Alberta was Henry Block, who arrived in October 1899. His charge was the German congregation at Leduc. Next came J. W. Boynton, who made his headquarters in Ponoka in the summer of 1901. He estimated that in all there were some 35 German-speaking and 12 English-speaking members in Alberta. He held meetings about 15 miles (24 kilometers) west of Olds, a community in which a few SDAs had settled, which resulted in the Harmattan church.

Persecution came to Seventh-day Adventists in Alberta as early as 1902 and 1903. J. L. Hamren, of Wetaskiwin, was fined $2 and costs for doing farmwork on Sunday, even though the law prohibiting work on that day was not applicable to farmers. Later a blacksmith in Leduc named Gebanus was fined $10.70 for operating his shop on Sunday. Hamren appealed his case and won a dismissal. Later the attorney general at Regina, the center from which the Northwest Territories were then governed, ordered the Royal Canadian Mounted Police not to disturb SDAs or Jews doing work on Sunday.

Alberta Mission Organized. The first general meeting in Alberta was held in July 1903 at the home of J. H. Lowry in Ponoka, and a year later, also in Ponoka, the first camp meeting was held, with about 50 present, reported Boynton. At that time Alberta, which had formed a mission field of the Northern Union, was organized into a mission, with J. W. Boynton as first superintendent. There were then in Alberta one German, one Scandinavian, and two English churches. In the next two years two more churches were organized, one at Leavings (July 1905) and the other, an English congregation, at Leduc (Feb. 23, 1906).

Alberta Conference Organized. By the time of the third camp meeting, held in Red Deer in July 1906, the number of churches had risen to six. At this meeting, with R. A. Underwood, Dr. P. T. Magan, and C. A. Burman present, the Alberta Mission was made a conference, with C. A. Burman as president, J. W. Boynton, vice president, and Stella B. Lowry, secretary-treasurer. After remaining more than a year longer under the Northern Union Conference (Minnesota, the Dakotas, Manitoba, and Alberta), the Alberta Conference joined with Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and British Columbia in October 1907 to form the Western Canadian Union Conference (since 1932 part of the SDA Church in Canada). During the first decade of the conference's history, almost 800 members were added and 20 new churches were organized. Contributing to this rapid growth were immigration of SDAs from the U.S. and the establishment in 1907 of an industrial school at Leduc (see Canadian Union College).

In 1907 new congregations were established in Calgary (May 26) and Edmonton (Apr. 28) and one at Vermilion Lake (Sept. 1), composed almost entirely of English-speaking SDAs from the U.S. who had taken advantage of land available at low cost in this country of opportunity. In 1908 one such group, consisting of 13 German families from North Dakota, came on an immigrant train, with their livestock and equipment on a special freight train, to settle in virgin territory in what is now Rosebud. They arrived so late in the year that they were forced to spend the winter in tents and to subsist on frozen potatoes and beef. As they met for Sabbath services they expressed their feelings in one of the old German songs, "Gäste und Fremdlinge sind wir" ("We Are Guests and Strangers"). Later C. A. Burman, conference president, and Henry Block, another minister in Alberta, organized the group into a church with 20 charter members, over which H. H. Humann was elected local elder. The congregation met in the home of Henry Kindopp. In 1910 they founded a church school of which some of the first teachers were C. C. Neufeld, Teddy Roth, A. C. Harder and his wife, and Dan Ochs. Neufeld taught his 55 students in German in the morning and in English in the afternoon.

Work in the Peace River district began in 1904 or 1905 with Cornelius D. Holdeman, a colporteur. The first converts, the Knutsons and Keillors, were won through papers distributed by a former SDA, Doc Chase, who operated a stopping place on Lesser Slave River. In May 1918 H. A. Niergarth opened a series of public meetings at Clairmont. In August Calvin D. Smith and his wife settled in the town of Peace River. In September E. S. Stanley (later well known for his column Dad's Philosophy in the Peace River Record) arrived in Swan River and established a school. During the influenza epidemic the Smiths went from place to place ministering to the sick. When they moved to southern Alberta the next year, Peter Rick, Mrs. Smith's brother, took over their missionary work. Rick was responsible for the first SDA church in the area, the Bluesky church, organized on July 17, 1921.

In the Beauvallon district it was many years before the English-speaking members of the Vermilion Lake church won any of their predominantly Catholic Ukrainian neighbors. The first such convert was a lad who fled to a family named Philbrick to escape from a cruel father. This lad, later known as M. H. Philbrick, became an SDA minister. The second Ukrainian convert, George Soloniuk, also became an SDA minister. Soloniuk and his wife became interested in the study of the Bible through a report emanating from one Ripka, a Baptist, to the effect that worship of images was unbiblical. Their friend, Elia Tkachuk, was equally roused and sought for a Ukrainian Bible. On learning that a Mrs. Tym had one in her possession, he went to borrow it. Mrs. Tym consented to lend it, but while she was upstairs searching for it, her baby sat down in a pan of boiling water she had left on the floor. The baby's cries ended her search and Tkachuk's visit, but a Mrs. Smith, an SDA, saved the child's life. After the child's recovery, Tkachuk went back for the Bible, and this time got it. He began at once to read it, but found he could not understand it. He confided his dilemma to Mr. Smith, husband of the woman who saved the child's life. Smith requested help from the conference office, and finally Joe Walshy, a Polish worker, was sent. Walshy studied with the Soloniuks and in the Tkachuk home. The Soloniuks were the first to be baptized (Aug. 12, 1918).

At first the meetings at the Tkachuk home were well attended, but when Walshy began using charts, his audience became frightened and ceased to attend. Then the conference sent T. T. Babienco, who baptized 34 and organized the Pobida (Victory) church on Aug. 3, 1919.

To be baptized by the SDAs was a bold step to take. At one baptism of 23, conducted by Peter Yakavenko, it was necessary to post three husky men at the gate to keep out potential troublemakers. Even so, when one lad went into the water, his uncle had to be forcibly restrained from interfering. This baptism was followed by the organization of the second Ukrainian church, the Myrnam church.

Many Alberta congregations, such as those at Clive and Cassils, were composed almost exclusively of immigrants. The Cassils church, formed in 1919, owed its existence to a pseudo-SDA who had induced SDAs from the U.S. to enter the country by promising to build a 10-grade school. The congregations at Peoria, Belloy, and Cluny were composed of German settlers.

The Alberta Conference has always been a "little Europe." Formerly there were Scandinavian churches in Edmonton, Donalds, and Camrose; Russian churches in Coronation and in Loyalist; a Romanian company in Hamlin. There have been numerous German and Ukrainian congregations.

Seventh-day Adventist schools early became a feature of the church in Alberta. The little log building constructed in 1902 at Harmattan was erected to serve as both a church school and a place of worship. Its first teacher was Addie Tifel, and the second, LaRena Carpenter, later Mrs. F. L. Hommel. By 1921 provincial laws in Alberta barred church schools.

Membership in the Alberta Conference has grown steadily. From 1,000 members in 1916 it has increased to 7,600 in 1993. The number of churches has varied little since 1916. A few churches have ceased to exist; others have changed their names and locale, or have combined or divided.

Further Developments

Further Developments. After World War II many new church buildings were erected in Alberta, such as those in Edmonton, Lacombe, and Calgary. Representative church schools have been built and staffed with provincially certified teachers. A youth camp was established near Banff, fittingly named Camp Rundle, after the towering mountain that overlooks it. Provincial zoning regulations prevented a necessary expansion of the camp in 1971. This situation led to the purchase of almost 180 acres (73 hectares) of land along the Little Red Deer River west of Bowden. The former Camp Rundle properties were sold, and the present site has been developed for year-round use. Officially opened July 8, 1973, the new facilities are used for the conference camping programs, the annual camp meeting, and workers' meetings, as well as many other meetings and conventions. The camp name, as seen on highway direction signs, is "Seventh-day Adventist Camp."

Canada's Northland has been largely untouched in terms of Seventh-day Adventist witnessing. In 1969 the Alberta Conference took a significant step in this direction by establishing a mission work in Yellowknife, Northwest Territories, under the leadership of Henry Bartsch. Beginning primarily with Community Services programs and Signs of the Times distribution, Pastor Bartsch was able to gain the people's confidence in the Seventh-day Adventist Church. Lay members moving to Yellowknife and assistance from student missionaries have enabled the mission work to reach many communities surrounding Yellowknife. In 1973, with valuable help from Maranatha Flights International, a mission complex was built. The facility provides a worship center, an auditorium, the manse, and guest rooms. The opportunities for extending mission work in the Northwest Territories were greatly enhanced by acquiring a Cessna 180H airplane in 1974. Christened Arctic Arrow (in honor of C. S. Cooper's missionary foray up the Mackenzie River with a boat named Arctic Arrow), the plane came as a gift from the Quiet Hour and its supporters. Seventh-day Adventists in Yellowknife are members of the Alberta Conference church.

In recent years an increasing number of physicians, dentists, and optometrists, as well as other medical and paramedical personnel, have located in the conference. Annual health evangelism conferences are held to maintain a close team relationship among medical professionals and the ministry.

During the decade of the 1980s a significant work was established among the native Indian population in central Alberta. A church was established on the reservation at Hobbema with a full-time pastor. A strong educational work was established for native children. Between 1984 and 1993 one or two schools were operated each year on the reservation. In 1991 a new school with approximately 100 students opened off the reservation. It is the only school for native children operated by the church in Alberta.

ALGERIA. A North African country independent since 1962; formerly a French colony and province from 1830. The country is bounded on the west by Morocco and Mauritania, on the north by the Mediterranean Sea, on the east by Tunisia and Libya, and on the south by Niger and Mali. It has an area of 920,000 square miles (2,382,800 square kilometers) and a population (1994) of about 28 million, mainly Arabs, and 90 percent Muslim. Agriculture is the principal occupation, with wine, cereals, olive oil, and alfalfa the chief products. Large deposits of oil have been found in Algeria in recent years.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. The first SDA in Algeria was Joseph Gomis, who had been born into a Spanish Catholic family but had become a Protestant at the age of 16. During a trip to Switzerland he became acquainted with SDAs through reading the magazine Les Signes des Temps, and was baptized. About 1886 he established himself as a baker in the town of Relizane, in the province of Oran, Algeria. While working at his trade he shared his faith with several members of his family and others, some of whom accepted the new doctrines. About 1889 J. D. Comte and Albert Vuilleumier visited these new converts, and Vuilleumier baptized them. Many of the early converts emigrated to South America, while those who remained continued to be faithful in Sabbath observance though they were not visited for many years.

In 1905 S. Jespersson and his wife were sent to Algiers to do medical missionary work. In September 1907 Paul Steiner arrived to assist them in evangelistic work, but for health reasons he had to leave before completing his first year. Before the end of 1908 Ulysse Augsburg, a minister, and Joseph Abella, a colporteur, arrived. In April 1909 four women were baptized. Thus was laid the foundation for a church in the capital.

At the time of the Latin Union Conference session in 1909, Albert Guyot was invited to go to Algeria. He went first to Algiers, then in October 1910 to Oran. In Oran he renewed contact with the early adherents of Relizane, met the founder of the group, Joseph Gomis, then 77 years old, and found four large families keeping the Sabbath.

As a result of the work of Paul Badaut, J. C. Guenin, R.T.E. Colthurst, W. E. Hancock, and others, the work spread gradually to the different sections of Algeria. In 1912 the field was assigned directly to the General Conference. Then after World War I it again became a part of the Latin Union Conference. In 1921 the Algerian Mission was organized, with Albert Meyer in charge, and with a membership of 61.

When the North African Union Mission was organized in 1928, the headquarters were placed in Algiers. By 1933 there were 207 members in the Algerian Mission. Colporteur work contributed substantially to evangelism in Algeria. The medical work was represented by the Vie et Santé Institute of Algiers (established 1933) and dispensaries at Mostaganem and Bel-Hacel in the region of Relizane-Oran. In 1950 a church and headquarters building was dedicated in the center of Algiers.

In 1958 the Algerian-Tunisian Mission had 12 churches or companies, with a membership of 540. At that time 15 evangelistic and other workers and two colporteurs were at work in this vast territory. When Algeria became independent in 1962, more than a million Europeans left, and with them nine tenths of the SDA members.

A school for boys aged 12 to 17 in Algiers was closed by the government in 1968. The clinic, Vie et Santé, was taken over by the government. Our other properties were classified as “available for possession,” although our office was endeavoring to function. In 1993 there were six members in Algiers and six in the rest of the country.

Evangelistic efforts are confined to Arabic radiobroadcasts, and the Bible correspondence course originating in France.

Algerian Publishing House

ALGERIAN PUBLISHING HOUSE. A former publishing house without printing facilities, operated from 1932 to 1952 by the North African Union Mission at Algiers, Algeria. In the Statistical Report it is listed from 1933 to 1939 as a depository only, though from 1935 on, both book and periodical sales were reported. In 1940 it was designated as a publishing house, but there were no new reports on the house's activity until 1948, when its sales of books and one periodical title were given at $25,000. In 1950 it reached its highest volume of sales, nearly $40,000, but since then the sales declined, and after 1952 the house was no longer listed.

History

History. Allegheny East Conference Organized. The Columbia Union Conference committee voted July 9, 1966, to approve a reorganization of the Allegheny Conference. The present organization began in January 1945 and grew to such proportions that a commission was established to study the plan for organization of two conferences within the Allegheny Conference territory. The membership at this time was 11,144.

May 1, 1966, the Allegheny Conference constituency recommended that the new conferences begin their operation Jan. 1, 1967. Also voted at this time: the time and place for the two constituencies to meet and elect their officers.

The western section of the conference held its election Nov. 13, 1966, in Columbus, Ohio; and the eastern section held its election Nov. 20, 1966, in Baltimore, Maryland, at which time W. A. Thompson was elected as president; Edward Dorsey, secretary-treasurer; D. L. Davis, lay activities and MV director; C. L. Brooks, Sabbath school and education director; and T. S. Barber, publishing secretary of the Allegheny East Conference. The manager of the Book and Bible House was to be supplied by the Allegheny East Conference executive committee. R. W. Newman, the pastor of the Oberlin-Toledo, Ohio, district, was called to the managerial post of the Allegheny East Conference Book and Bible House Jan. 8, 1967.

Further Developments

Further Developments. In 1970 W. A. Thompson, the president, accepted a call to the Columbia Union Conference as secretary. The Allegheny East Conference executive committee on June 28, 1970, elected Edward Dorsey as the president and C. W. Laurence as secretary-treasurer.

In July 1971 Laurence's automobile overturned and he was fatally injured. The executive committee met on Aug. 1, 1971, and elected M. C. Van Putten, who was serving as secretary-treasurer of the Lake Region Conference, to become the secretary-treasurer of the Allegheny East Conference; the executive committee met Aug. 26, 1971, and decided to separate the two offices, calling L. R. Palmer, Jr., to be the conference's first executive secretary. Allegheny East Conference has experienced near phenomenal growth, going from 44 churches and 7,745 members in 1967 to 84 churches and 23,406 members in 1993. The conference has nine active companies. The Allegheny East Conference jointly operates Pine Forge Academy in partnership with the Allegheny West Conference. It is fully accredited. Recent improvements include a church, gymnasium, industrial building, and swimming pool. The enrollment in the elementary school system was 1,330 in 1993.

Because of the unprecedented growth of the original Allegheny Conference, the constituents felt that they could be served better by becoming two conferences. After a feasibility study was conducted by the Columbia Union Conference, plans were laid for the reorganization.

In two separate constituency meetings held in Columbus, Ohio, on Nov. 13, 1966, and in Baltimore, Maryland, on Nov. 20, 1966, it was voted to organize two new conferences in Allegheny territory. The Allegheny West Conference was officially established by vote of the constituents of the western section of the old Allegheny Conference in the constituency meeting held on Nov. 13, 1966, in Columbus, Ohio. Walter M. Starks, stewardship secretary of the Allegheny Conference, was elected as the first president, and Aaron N. Brogden as secretary/treasurer. Other personnel elected included Henry Freeman, publishing secretary; N. K. Jenkins, associate publishing secretary; D. B. Simons, lay activities and Sabbath school director; A. T. Allen, Alvin Nathan

ALLEN, ALVIN NATHAN (1880—1945). Missionary in Latin America, minister, teacher, and administrator. He was born in a Seventh-day Adventist family and was educated at Union (1898—1899) and Battle Creek (1900—1901) colleges. In 1901 he married Luella Goodrich, who with her parents was a missionary in the Bay Islands and Honduras. He too went there as a missionary. Together they taught, preached, and engaged in colporteur work until 1907, when they returned on furlough and he attended Washington Missionary College. In 1908 he was ordained and soon thereafter was sent to Peru to superintend the field. Between 1914 and 1917 he headed the Cuban Mission, then was president of the South Carolina Conference in 1917 and also assumed responsibility for the war service relations in the Southern Union and preached in Tennessee and Kentucky. Later he went to Mexico, where he worked in Mexico City and among the Indians of Tehuantepec. Upon his return to the United States he organized and for a while directed the Spanish-American Training School (a training school for the Spanish-speaking people at Phoenix, Arizona). In 1926 he went to South America and taught Bible at the Brazilian Seminary (Colegio Adventista). Volunteering to begin work among the Indians on the Araguaya River, he superintended the Goyaz and Araguaya Indian missions from 1927 until about 1933. At that time he resigned the leadership, but continued in the ministry until 1938. Returning to the United States, he pastored churches in Virginia and Florida until a few weeks before his death.

Allred, Ivan Lamar

ALLRED, IVAN LAMAR (1918—1985). Minister, publishing director, trust services director. He was born in Greenville, Michigan. He entered denominational service in 1951 as assistant publishing director in the Michigan Conference. Three and a half years later he became the conference's publishing director and was ordained to the gospel ministry on Aug. 26, 1955. In 1960 he accepted a call to direct the Texas Conference Publishing Department, where he served for nearly eight years.

In 1968 he entered the church's trust services work, first as secretary of the Oklahoma Conference Corporation from 1968 to 1972, then as associate trust services director in Michigan for five years and in Ohio for a short time. Finally he was trust services director in the Texas Conference from 1977 until his retirement in 1983.

Allum, Francis Arthur

ALLUM, FRANCIS ARTHUR (1883—1948). Minister, evangelist, and administrator in China and Australia. As a result of hearing a mission talk on China in his native England at the age of 14, he dedicated his life to Christian service and planned to go to China as a missionary. Later he with his family moved to Australia, where a missionary-minded woman acquainted them with the Seventh-day Adventist beliefs. With his mother and sister he was baptized in 1900. Afterward he attended Avondale School (1901—1905), and, after completing the course of training, engaged in tent evangelism in New South Wales. In 1905 the Mission Board invited him to join the pioneer SDA workers in China, but it could not provide him with fare to reach his post. He earned passage for himself and his young bride (the former Eva Osborne) by colporteur work in New Zealand. In China his first station was in the province of Honan. In 1908 or 1909 he was ordained at Shanghai by I. H. Evans, and afterward superintended the North Central China Mission (1910—1912), assisted in the supervision of the China Union (1912), directed the West China Mission (1914—1915), and presided over the North China Union Conference (1918—1919) and the Central China Union Mission (1919—1922). Ill health caused his return to the homeland after 16 years of service in China. In Australia he became secretary (1923) and later vice president (1924—1926) of the Australasian Union Conference, and later served as president of the Victoria-Tasmania Conference. He retired because of poor health and went first to Port Macquarie and then to Warrawee, New South Wales, but continued to carry pastoral and evangelistic work. In retirement he designed and distributed Bible text cards.

AMADON, GEORGE WASHINGTON (1832—1913). Publishing house worker. He was educated at Oberlin College, joined the Review and Herald office when it was in Rochester, New York, and moved with it to Battle Creek in 1855. For 50 years he served the publishing house in various capacities, such as typesetter, foreman in charge of the foreign language publications, and part-time, then full-time, editor of the Youth's Instructor (1858—1864). After the Review and Herald plant was destroyed by fire in 1902, he was for several years visiting pastor of the Battle Creek church, and was ordained when 72 years of age.

Educated at Battle Creek College and the American Medical Missionary College, she taught Greek, Latin, mathematics, and music in Claremont Union College, South Africa, from 1893 to 1900, and biology in the Chicago Veterinary College from 1907 to 1911. During 25 years of caring for her invalid mother, she worked as a bacteriologist in a public health laboratory, did technical illustrating, and carried on research in biblical chronology. Beginning in 1939 she was employed as a researcher by the General Conference.

In 1860 she married George W. Amadon. She was the first president of the first Dorcas Society, and held many sewing bees in her living room at Battle Creek.

Amazing Facts

AMAZING FACTS. Amazing Facts began as a daily radio program on WBMD in Baltimore in the spring of 1966. The radio show was developed by the Chesapeake Conference as a way to sow seeds for public evangelism. This new approach to soul winning quickly became popular under the direction of pastor and evangelist Joe Crews.

Each radiobroadcast opened with an amazing scientific or historical fact, and a brief biblical message followed. Hundreds and then thousands of listeners began sending for the free Bible lessons offered at the end of each broadcast. Christians and non-Christians alike praised the colorful and attention-grabbing Amazing Facts That Affect You lessons written by Bill May.

Realizing the enormous soul-winning potential of the fledgling program, the Chesapeake Conference began paving the way for Amazing Facts to become a nationwide ministry. First, it was legally incorporated as a nonprofit organization in the fall of 1966. Shortly thereafter, Amazing Facts became officially recognized as an authorized ministry of the Seventh-day Adventist Church. Today it continues to operate as a ministry of the Chesapeake Conference, and thus as part of the Columbia Union. All Amazing Facts employees are licensed or issued credentials by the Chesapeake Conference, and the ministry is audited yearly by the General Conference. However, because of the generous donations of supporters, Amazing Facts is totally self-funding. This unique relationship makes Amazing Facts a one-of-a-kind Adventist media ministry.

Originally located at the Chesapeake Conference office, Amazing Facts moved its headquarters to Frederick, Maryland, in 1980. This move enabled the ministry to expand in both form and function. Its Bible correspondence course continued to grow, serving students from around the world. Then, to meet a growing need within the church for affordable public evangelism, Amazing Facts began training young men to join the ministry's team as full-time evangelists. In 1987 the ministry added television programming to its communication chain. A 27-night evangelistic series held by Joe Crews was filmed live and aired on selected stations around the country. Audience response was enthusiastic, as it had been with the radio program more than 20 years earlier. The clear, Bible-based messages and straightforward delivery gained immediate acceptance by countless people nationwide.

Sensing the urgency of the gospel imperative, Amazing Facts in 1993 added two more elements to its outreach agenda. The first was a program for equipping laypersons and pastors with the skills necessary to hold successful evangelistic campaigns. These hands-on training seminars have enabled hundreds of dedicated and energetic individuals to conduct public crusades worldwide.

The second element was a church preparation coordinator to teach churches how to prework and follow-up for each Amazing Facts evangelistic meeting. A model timeline includes one year of preparation for each reaping series, followed by a six-month program to nurture new converts and those still making decisions. Pastors, laypersons, and church leaders alike have applauded these two new programs as long overdue.

Amazing Facts has grown from a local broadcast to a soul-winning center with worldwide scope. Today its radio programs are broadcast from 81 stations around the world, and its telecast airs 45 times each week. From its beginning with one evangelist it has grown to a team of 15 ministers dedicated to spreading this last-day message. Furthermore, the original 12 Amazing Facts That Affect You Bible lessons have been expanded to 27, and their appeal remains unprecedented. More than 10,000 students are enrolled in its Bible correspondence school.

Amazing Facts also publishes a monthly magazine, The Inside Report, which is free upon request. A free catalog of evangelistic resource materials is also available. Both may be obtained through Amazing Facts' corporate headquarters.

American Health and Temperance Association

AMERICAN HEALTH AND TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION. An organization dedicated to the advocacy of temperance. On Feb. 13, 1826, the American Health and Temperance Association, then called the American Temperance Society, was incorporated in Boston, Massachusetts. The Christian Examiner at that time declared: "The greatest enterprise and the most hopeful omen of the age, perhaps, is the temperance reform." By 1827 more than 7,000 temperance societies had been established and were active, composed of one and a quarter million members and claiming more than 10,000 reclaimed drunkards.

This organization was reconstituted and established by the General Conference in 1932.

Joseph Bates, one of the Seventh-day Adventist pioneers, had long been a temperance reformer. Toward the end of his years as a seaman, he discarded the use of all alcoholic drinks and tobacco. On the day of his baptism into the Christian church in 1827, he expressed his determination to organize a temperance society, and invited the minister who had baptized him to assist in this, but the minister refused to become involved in the project.

Bates therefore approached a minister of the Congregational church, and was successful in securing his support. In addition to the Congregational minister, two of his deacons, several former sea captains, and a few others whom Bates had persuaded to assist him met and organized the Fairhaven Temperance Society at Fairhaven, Massachusetts. The charter members of the society took a pledge against gin, rum, brandy, and whiskey. Later the society amended the pledge by including all intoxicating beverages, thus putting the ban on fermented as well as distilled liquors, except for medicinal purposes.

The New Bedford Society, the Bristol County Society, and then the Massachusetts State Society were organized in due course. Thus, Joseph Bates was among the earliest pioneers in organizing a temperance society and in promoting and fostering the total-abstinence movement in the United States.

Bates later devoted his full time to the Adventist movement of the 1840s, and following the disappointment in 1844 became one of the principal founders of the Seventh-day Adventist Church.

Early Seventh-day Adventist Advocacy of Temperance

Early Seventh-day Adventist Advocacy of Temperance. The original SDA leaders were abstainers, but not until 1862 was a more thoroughgoing reform inaugurated. Chiefly through the writings of James and Ellen G. White, emphasis was given to the fact that the moral nature is largely affected by physical nature, and that success in appealing to people spiritually is more effective if they can first be turned from those habits that undermine their physical powers and benumb their moral sensibilities.

The first united move was made among Seventh-day Adventists in behalf of a broad temperance program in 1863, but Ellen White had already warned of the dangers of not only liquor and tobacco but also tea and coffee.

The years of the Civil War in the United States and the subsequent period of reconstruction witnessed a serious setback to the cause of temperance reform that had flourished in the earlier part of the century. During the 1870s several temperance organizations appeared, including the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. Mrs. White actively cooperated with the national temperance movements, frequently speaking on their behalf and addressing on numerous occasions large audiences on the subject of temperance. On one occasion, during the summer of 1876, she spoke to some 20,000 people on a campground at Groveland, Massachusetts. The next day she repeated her address to the Haverhill Reform Club.

American Health and Temperance Association

American Health and Temperance Association. A great forward movement to enlist the rank and file of Seventh-day Adventists began in December 1878. A meeting was held in the publishing house chapel in Battle Creek, Michigan, on Dec. 30 "to consider the propriety of organizing a national health and temperance society." At a second meeting, held on New Year's Day, 1879, further steps were taken, and on Jan. 5 the organization of the American Health and Temperance Association was completed. J. H. Kellogg, M.D., of the Battle Creek Sanitarium, was elected president. Some 133 persons signed the teetotalers' pledge, discarding tea and other stimulants and narcotics, as well as alcohol, and 22 signed the anti-rum and tobacco pledge.

Another action was taken on Nov. 24, 1879, by vote of the General Conference, emphasizing that it is "the duty of all members of this denomination to become members of the American Health and Temperance Association, and to use their influence in inducing others to unite in this reformatory effort."

At this time the membership program was inaugurated as the basis of temperance organization. Any person of good moral character could become a member of the association by paying an initiation fee of 25 cents, and thereafter a minimum of 10 cents a year, and signing a teetotal pledge.

Also the basis was laid for general support of the temperance cause by ministers and church leaders. "Resolved, That the conference committee of each conference be requested to encourage proper persons to fit themselves to engage in the health and temperance work; and we especially urge all ministers to prepare themselves to present the subject of health and temperance in an efficient and practical manner, and make it a part of their work in their various fields of labor."

During the next few years the subject of temperance was presented actively in the camp meetings, and all SDAs were invited to become members of the organization and to take an active part in temperance endeavor.

International Health and Temperance Association

International Health and Temperance Association. By 1881 the American Health and Temperance Association had 9,819 members, according to the minutes of a meeting held that year. In that year a children's pledge was prepared for circulation among the younger people. In 1889 at the eleventh annual session, the society was renamed the International Health and Temperance Association.

The association continued its activities until 1893, when the SDA Medical Missionary and Benevolent Association was organized. The specific purpose of the original organization became subordinated in the general health program promoted by the church.

Specific counsel had been given by Ellen G. White on the necessity of establishing temperance societies and clubs, printing temperance literature, and appointing workers who would go to the cities and bear the message of temperance.

Temperance activity of Seventh-day Adventists followed the national trends during the period leading up to the enactment of the Eighteenth Amendment, with some church leaders, such as C. S. Longacre, taking part in the public education that resulted in the passage in 1917 of the prohibition amendment and its ratification by the states in 1919. SDAs oppose church participation in politics; but they have always considered legislation against alcohol and other similar poisons to be not a political but a moral issue.

When the Volstead Act of 1919 made national prohibition effective, Seventh-day Adventists relaxed their public efforts, as did the other organizations that had pushed for prohibition. In the meantime the anti-prohibition forces became active to nullify prohibition, until in 1933 the Twenty-first Amendment, to repeal the Eighteenth, was passed by Congress and became effective on Dec. 5, 1933, after the required number of states had ratified it.

American Temperance Society Reorganized

American Temperance Society Reorganized. Already in 1932, discerning the increasing tragedy of intemperance in the nation as repeal approached, SDAs had organized the American Temperance Society of Seventh-day Adventists. During the following 15 years a modest temperance program was carried on. The chief organ for the society was the Temperance Bulletin, an informational sheet of four pages. Special annual temperance editions of the Signs of the Times, circulated in millions of copies, made a major impact on the public. Anti-narcotic issues of Our Little Friend were published for the children.

After the 1946 Autumn Council, the General Conference appointed representative committees to review the church's temperance objectives and to formulate a program of world action along temperance lines, with a view to setting up an organization through which an aggressive effort could be promoted both within and outside the church.

American Temperance Society Again Reorganized

American Temperance Society Again Reorganized. Two constitutions were planned, one for the organization that was to serve the world to be known as the International Temperance Association, and the other a new constitution for the American Temperance Society. The latter would serve as the model for the organizing of a temperance society in every country. The constitution of the American Temperance Society was adopted by the General Conference Committee on Jan. 27, 1947, with J. L. McElhany, the General Conference president, being elected as president of the society and W. A. Scharffenberg as executive secretary. The constitution of the International Temperance Association was adopted at the Autumn Council of 1947.

Methods, Projects, and Publications. About this time a compilation was made from Ellen G. White's writings on the subject. Published under the title Temperance, this book serves as the blueprint for the church's temperance program.

The first major project of the American Temperance Society was the launching of the magazine Listen in 1948. This was the first of an increasing number of temperance publications that have served during subsequent years as the major stimulus for the society's growing program.

The American Temperance Society was set up as a membership organization, following the instruction and personal example of Mrs. White herself in the early temperance work of the church. Various memberships offered were junior and student memberships for the children and young people, as well as regular, family, contributing, sustaining, supporting, and life memberships for adults. Each member was to receive benefits for the respective membership, these benefits consisting mainly of the publications such as Listen, Alert, Smoke Signals, Activities, and The Winner. The annual pledge-signing campaign and membership drive provided opportunity for all church members to enroll as temperance members; this took place on Temperance Commitment Sabbath, designated at the time in the church calendar as the last Sabbath in February.

Financial support for the society came from four major sources: membership dues; sale of publications, films, and other materials; contributions from interested donors; and the annual Temperance Offering, received on World Temperance Day, the fourth Sabbath in October.

By 1964 four national conventions of the American Temperance Society had been held, two in Washington, D.C., the others in Denver, Colorado, and Kansas City, Missouri. These served as training schools for church temperance secretaries and other laypersons interested in temperance activity, and provided opportunity to present nationally known authorities in person and to publicize widely the church's temperance program.

Chapters of the American Temperance Society were organized in SDA schools. Active projects, including oratorical, essay, jingle, and poster contests, were encouraged for the young people. Many student participants presented their orations before civic and business clubs, and before other church and youth organizations. Chapters sponsored annual Temperance Weeks for the students, and engaged in community literature distribution to aid in local option elections.

Currently such activity is directed by Collegiate Adventists for Better Living and (on the elementary and academy level) Adventist Youth for Better Living.

Program

Program. The program of the American Temperance Society can be summarized under three major headings, as follows:

1. Education: the producing and making effective use of attractive magazines, pamphlets, posters, films, public lectures, and all other means to focus the attention of the church and the public on problems of intemperance, but emphasizing the principles of better living from a positive approach, in order to present appealingly, especially to youth, the advantages of abstinence as the genuine alternative.

2. Legislation: cooperating with civic and government agencies in making the community and nation a safer place in which to live, and pressing for the passage of laws to restrict, control, or ban the production, sale, distribution, and consumption of liquor, tobacco, and illegal narcotics, also urging church members and all others to make use of their vote at every opportunity on temperance issues.

3. Reformation: helping those who are victims of intemperance, pointing them back to normal living, through the use of natural means and dependence on divine aid. Spiritual emphasis is a real part of such projects.

To reflect more accurately the fusion of the Health and Temperance departments into one department in 1980, the American Temperance Society's name was change to the American Health and Temperance Society. In the early 1990s the name was changed again to the American Health and Temperance Association.

American Medical Missionary College

AMERICAN MEDICAL MISSIONARY COLLEGE. A coeducational medical school operated from 1895 to 1910 in Chicago, Illinois, and Battle Creek, Michigan, incorporated separately but sponsored by the Battle Creek Sanitarium. It offered a four-year course leading to the M.D. degree. Students were to be “those who desire to devote their lives to altruistic work,” with preference given to “those who are preparing themselves for medical missionary activity in home or foreign fields” (The Battle Creek Schools [1905—1906 bulletin], p. 43).

The school’s president was John Harvey Kellogg, M.D., who continued to serve as the pivotal administrative and professional figure in the Battle Creek Sanitarium. From 1899 to 1910, 194 Doctor of Medicine degrees were conferred. The faculty included the staff of Battle Creek Sanitarium and several eminent Chicago physicians who gave clinical instruction to students while assigned to Cook County Hospital, St. Luke’s Hospital, and the college’s dispensary in Chicago. The lack of strong financial support and the failure of the college to provide a hospital in Chicago under the control of its own staff, the plan of the denomination to develop Loma Linda as a center of medical education along with lesser problems, brought about its dissolution in 1910. Prior to the closing of the American Medical Missionary College the stockholders of the Battle Creek Sanitarium had chosen to decline official denominational ownership and control. The college dropped out of the denominational Yearbook in 1907.

Ana Stahl Adventist Clinic

ANA STAHL ADVENTIST CLINIC (Clínica Adventista Ana Stahl). A general 50-bed hospital (originally operated as an obstetrical hospital under the name Ana Stahl Clinic), owned and operated by the Inca Union Mission, situated in Iquitos, Peru.

From the time the East Peru Mission was founded in 1927, F. A. Stahl had a vision of a medical institution serving the sick of the Upper Amazon area. In 1930 a wooden building to be used as a clinic was erected on the mission property in the city of Iquitos. However, except for one room, which was used as the medical room, the building stood more than 30 years before being put to the use for which it was intended, although during much of that time it was used as the mission office. In that room Stahl and his wife, Ana, carried on an extensive and well-known medical work.

In 1953 plans were formulated for a maternity clinic under the nursing direction of Mrs. S. C. Pritchard. In 1957 Mrs. Bernice Larrabee was called to take charge of the clinic, and through her efforts the building was reconditioned and equipped, and a class of nurse's aides was trained.

On May 18, 1960, Dr. Rodolfo Alfaro from Argentina came to Iquitos, opened a medical office, and as first medical director presided on May 18, 1961, at the official opening of the clinic. Under his leadership the Stahl Clinic initiated an active public health program in the little jungle villages surrounding Iquitos.

In 1963 a new brick building to house the doctors' offices, administration and other offices, X-ray, and laboratory was completed, increasing the space for patient beds in the old building. At the same time the clinic was made a general hospital. During 1974 the Ministry of Health approved plans for the construction of a modern, well-equipped clinic, at a cost of US$750,000, which was financed by the German Evangelical Agency for Development and the Inca Union.

Medical Directors: Rodolfo Alfaro, 1961—1962; Erwin O. Beskow, 1962—1964; E. C. Lanz, 1965; E. E. Rippey, 1966; G. A. Gilkes, 1967—1970; J. H. Anacapa Adventist Hospital

ANACAPA ADVENTIST HOSPITAL. A 48-bed general acute hospital that was incorporated in September 1974 and became affiliated with Adventist Health Services, Inc., a forerunner of Adventist Health System/West, on Jan. 1, 1975. Originally Bellinda Hospital, it was founded by Dr. A. H. Crites. This modern medical facility is a single-story cement block building. Originally 30 beds, additional construction in 1964 increased the occupancy. In 1974 a two-story medical building was completed on the same site to support the hospital's operations. Later known as Port Hueneme Adventist Hospital, the facility now is leased as a behavioral treatment center for adults as well as adolescents. The hospital is located on the coast of California near a deep draft harbor, in the city of Port Hueneme.

Andaman and Nicobar Island Region

ANDAMAN AND NICOBAR ISLAND REGION. See Andaman and Nicobar Islands; Southern Asia Division

Andaman and Nicobar Islands

ANDAMAN AND NICOBAR ISLANDS. A group of islands in the Bay of Bengal toward the Myanmar coast, forming one of the Union territories of India, with a total area of about 3,200 square miles (8,300 square kilometers) and a population (1991) of 188,741. For almost a century the archipelago served as a penal colony for the government of India, and descendants of the prisoners constitute a large segment of the population, which is augmented by some recent immigrants resettled from Bangladesh. The indigenous inhabitants have retired into the interior and avoid all contact with civilization. Hindi is the main language, while southern India languages are in use in the interior.

An interest in Seventh-day Adventist teachings was created in these islands through the Voice of Prophecy Bible correspondence courses. In 1951 evangelistic work was administered from Sri Lanka, but in 1953 it was transferred to the Northeast India Union. Between 1952 and 1960 S. Daniel and his wife worked on the islands as literature evangelists. In 1959 N. G. Mookerjee conducted Voice of Prophecy and temperance meetings. In 1974 there were a few scattered members on the islands. C. C. Joseph carried on evangelistic work from 1975 to 1986. From 1985 to 1988 Dudley Poneah served as an attached field director. Simon Amrithraj served as literature evangelist from 1986 to 1988. In 1987 G. Devadass began serving as an evangelist and continues to the present.

Kindergarten-level schools were started in 1986. The Andaman and Nicobar Islands are an attached field of the Southern Asia Division. The 1989 year-end committee meetings voted to designate this territory as the Andaman and Nicobar Island Region and appointed J. H. Sibil as director. In 1992 there were 89 Seventh-day Adventist members and two companies in this region.

There are approximately 12,000 outpatients and 350 surgeries per year.

Medical Directors: Lutero Marques de Oliveira, 1976—1982; Michel Lachenal, 1982—1988; Ratsioharana Mahatana, 1988— .

In 1903 the family moved to Canton and opened a training school. Emma became well acquainted with Chinese culture as she worked with the women and children and served as mission bookkeeper. Anderson School

ANDERSON SCHOOL. A multiracial and coeducational boarding school offering full primary and four years of secondary work, situated 10 miles (16 kilometers) from Gweru, Zimbabwe, and operated by the Zambesi Union. By 1993 the enrollment had reached 111 students in the secondary school and 93 in the primary school. There was a staff of 11 teachers in the secondary school and four in the primary.

The school was opened by J. R. Burns in 1950 on a farm called Christmas Gift, near the conference headquarters in Gweru. It was then called Rhobecon Preparatory School, Rhobecon being a contraction of Rhodesia-Bechuanaland Conference, the name of the conference at that time. In 1952 the school was moved to its present 20-acre (eight-hectare) site at Thorngrove Farm on the Umvuma Road, which during World War II had been an airfield for the Royal Rhodesia Air Force.

Forty acres (16 hectares) have been added to the property, giving it a total of 60 acres (24 hectares). This has made it possible to run a dairy farm. Camp meeting facilities that were used by the former Zambesi Conference are to be used by the English-speaking churches in the Zambesi Union.

In 1960 the school was renamed Anderson Memorial School in commemoration of W. H. Anderson, a pioneer missionary. In 1963 the first class beyond the first eight years of schoolwork was added, and in 1972 the fourth year of high school was offered. In 1993, through the help of ADRA, a secretarial skills training center was established.

The plant includes a church building, boys' and girls' dormitories, administrative offices, two school buildings, a dining room and kitchen unit, auditorium, library, laboratory, woodwork shop, and dwellings for the staff. A swimming pool is also provided.

Principals: J. R. Burns, 1950—1952; Mrs. G.A.C. Ellingworth, 1952—1955; P. B. Fairchild, 1955—1959; T. A. ter Horst, 1960—1964; R. Fuss, 1965; R. A. Tarr, 1966—1968; D. H. Thomas, 1969—1970; R. Strasdowsky, 1971—1972; A. Tredoux, 1973—1976; K. B. Cronje, 1976—1981; J. E. Marter, 1982—1985; R. G. Pearson, 1986—1988; P. J. Birkenstock, 1989—1993; F. R. Oberholster, 1993— .

Anderson, William Harrison

ANDERSON, WILLIAM HARRISON (1870—1950). Pioneer missionary to Africa, 1895—1944. He was born in Mexico, Indiana. Harry Anderson, as he was affectionately known to his friends, graduated in 1895 from Battle Creek College, where he was converted. At the school he took a prominent part in the formation of the first student foreign mission band, and from early youth felt a strong pull toward the mission field.

In 1895, several months before his graduation (in absentia), he joined G. B. Tripp and Dr. A. S. Carmichael to form the party of missionaries who operated the first permanent Seventh-day Adventist mission for the people of Africa. (For two earlier short-lived attempts, see Ghana; James, George.) Before leaving the homeland, Anderson was married to Nora Haysmer. Arriving in South Africa, the party proceeded by train to Mafeking, and then spent six weeks traveling by ox wagon (the railroad had not yet been built) to the site of the Solusi Mission, near Bulawayo, Southern Rhodesia.

The Andersons, with the other workers at Solusi, had trying experiences. During the Matabele rebellion the following year, they spent several months in Bulawayo. In 1898 they watched several of their group die of malaria and others leave the country. A second larger party was likewise stricken, and in 1901 the Andersons were the only workers left at Solusi.

In 1919 the Andersons began pioneer work among the Bechuanas, through whose country he had passed nearly 25 years before en route to Solusi. In 1922 he opened work in Angola, and during the next eight years he established several mission stations.

His last 15 years in Africa were spent as a member of the African Division (and later of the Southern African Division) staff, locating new mission stations, visiting camp meetings, holding institutes, and giving advice to new missionary recruits.

In 1944 Anderson took part in the Golden Jubilee celebrations at Solusi Mission, driving an ox wagon onto the very ground on which he had first begun mission work nearly 50 years before. The following year he returned to the United States, having served for 50 years in Africa. Anderson's book, On the Trail of Livingstone (1919), did much to stimulate interest in African missions.

Andes Adventist Academy

ANDES ADVENTIST ACADEMY (Instituto Adventista de Los Andes). In 1936 in La Paz, government seat of the republic of Bolivia, the Chijini Adventist School was opened with 40 students. In 1939 it moved from Los Andes Street and became known as the Fernando Stahl School.

In 1966, by resolution of the Education Ministry, it was made an academy, and in 1976 the name was changed a second time to Los Andes Adventist Academy. In 1986 it became simply Andes Adventist Academy.

Even though it was located in a highly populated area, it had acquired a good reputation. But land was purchased in a more secure area that provided a better climate for the students. In 1991 a five-story building was constructed. In 1993, 405 students were enrolled and 22 teachers served the school.

Principals: Felipe Alcón, 1966—1967; Miguel Ramos, 1968—1970; Elías Ticona, 1971—1972; Samuel Coronal, 1973—1975; Wilfredo Condemayta, 1976—1982; Adalberto Ticona, 1983; Alcides Limachi, 1984—1985; Adalberto Ticona, 1985—1992; Arturo Chambilla, 1992—1993; Elías Ticona, 1993— .

The people are of Catalan stock and language, and are Roman Catholics. Andorra is noted for its powerful privately owned radiobroadcasting station. André, Hattie ANDRÉ, HATTIE (1865—1952). Missionary, teacher, dean of women. She entered Battle Creek College (1884), but left soon to become a Bible instructor in Ohio. Returning to the college five years later, she was graduated in 1892 and spent the following summer studying hydrotherapy and cooking. In company with seven other Seventh-day Adventist missionaries she sailed from San Francisco to Pitcairn Island (1893) on the second voyage of the ship Pitcairn. She remained on the island while the other missionaries went to various parts of the South Pacific. There she organized and conducted a school, remaining until June 1896, when she returned to America.

For one year Miss André worked as a Bible instructor in Kentucky, and then was appointed to the faculty of Oakwood College. In 1899 Ellen G. White invited her to join the staff of the Australasian Missionary College (now Avondale College), at Cooranbong, Australia. From 1900 to 1908 she gave devoted service to that institution and strongly influenced the growth of SDA education in Australia.

Miss André then spent 11 years as dean of women and taught certain courses at Pacific Union College. In 1920 she resigned to care for her aged mother, but at the same time she taught Bible in the School of Nursing at Hinsdale Sanitarium and was a member of the faculty of Hinsdale Academy. She retired from institutional work in 1929 but remained active in church work. Altogether she gave more than 60 years of dedicated service to the church.

Andrews, John Nevins

ANDREWS, JOHN NEVINS (1829—1883). First Seventh-day Adventist missionary sent to countries outside North America. He was born in Poland, Maine, and died at Basel, Switzerland, at the age of 54. In 1856 he married Angeline S. Stevens; their children were Charles (b. 1857), Mary (b. 1861), and two who died in infancy. Few details are available on his childhood and youth. At 13 he “found the Saviour.” He enjoyed “severe study” much more than physical activity; in later years he could read the Bible in seven languages and claimed the ability to reproduce the New Testament from memory. At the age of 17 he began to observe the seventh-day Sabbath. He began his work as a minister at 21, in 1850, and was ordained in 1853.

During those three years he conducted evangelistic meetings in 20 different localities throughout Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, New York, Ohio, Michigan, and eastern Canada, and published 35 articles, totaling some 170,000 words. As a result of this intense program of writing and public ministry, in five years he was “utterly prostrated”; his voice failed, and his eyesight was injured. To recover his health, he went to Waukon, Iowa, in 1855 and worked on his parents’ farm. Returning to ministerial work in 1859, Andrews conducted public meetings for several years in Michigan, Massachusetts, Minnesota, and New York.

In 1864 he became a member of the New York Conference committee and the next year a member of the General Conference Executive Committee. In 1867 he became the third president of the General Conference, a position he held for two years. He was an editor of the Review and Herald from May 1869 to March 1870. On Sept. 15, 1874, in company with his children, Charles and Mary (his wife had died Mar. 18, 1872), he sailed from Boston for Liverpool, England, en route to Switzerland. His first work in Switzerland was to visit and organize the converts already there and to do personal work with interested persons. Then he wrote tracts and laid plans for the publication of a paper. In April 1876 the General Conference voted $10,000 for a printing house in Europe. In July 1876 Andrews issued the first number of Les Signes des Temps, a monthly covering a wide range of subject material, such as world events, prophecy, Bible doctrines, and health and temperance, and containing articles from American newspapers and magazines. The absorption of his time in the publication of this paper caused the General Conference leaders to express apprehension that he was neglecting personal work and public ministry, to which Andrews replied that he never planned to shut himself up in a printing office and that in the future he would aim for a better balance in his program, but that at heart he was a writer, and since his health was not very good, he was doing his best under the circumstances. He died in Basel nine years after he first went to Europe.

As a theologian Andrews made significant contributions to the development of various doctrines of the Seventh-day Adventist denomination. For example, for some time after Sabbatarian Adventists had begun to observe the biblical Sabbath, the seventh day, there was difference of opinion among them as to when they should begin the Sabbath. Joseph Bates in 1851 held that the Sabbath should begin at 6:00 Friday evening. Others held that the Sabbath should be observed from sunset to sunset, as was the custom of the Seventh Day Baptists. In 1855 James White requested Andrews to give the subject a thorough investigation. Andrews published his findings in an article in which he showed on biblical evidence that the Sabbath begins at sunset Friday evening. His conclusions became the accepted position of the church.

Andrews' extensive writings on the subject of the seventh-day Sabbath in history were published in October 1861 in a book of 340 pages entitled History of the Sabbath and the First Day of the Week. Later editions of this work were issued in 1873 and 1887, and in 1912 the book, revised and enlarged (864 pages) by L. R. Conradi, was republished under the names of Andrews and Conradi. Andrews was the first among the church leaders to publish an article that applied the two-horned beast of Revelation 13 to the United States of America. He also led in a study of what the Scriptures taught concerning the support of the ministry, as a result of which the plan of Systematic Benevolence was adopted. In 1878 Andrews served on the committee that recommended the tithing system.

Andrews also was active helping in the development of church organization. Early pioneer Adventists were opposed to organization, but they recognized that without it the church could not legally hold property. Andrews proposed the formation of an association that he claimed would "not be a church incorporated by law." "Not a legal church organization, but a legal business association" was his recommendation. Andrews was chair of a committee of three to suggest a plan of organization for the denominational publishing house (1860), also chair of a committee to draft a constitution and bylaws for the central organization of the church (1863). During the Civil War, when the Conscription Act went into effect, Andrews represented the church in Washington, D.C., to explain why SDAs believe that participation in combat is contrary to Christian principles, with the result that SDA draftees could apply for noncombatant service (see Noncombatancy).

Andrews Memorial Hospital

ANDREWS MEMORIAL HOSPITAL. A 45-bed general acute hospital located in Kingston, Jamaica, owned and operated by the West Indies Union, with Medical, Surgical, Obstetrical, and Physiotherapy departments and a dental clinic, a medical laboratory, and an X-ray laboratory. The hospital's staff consists of two physicians, seven graduate nurses, two other registered nurses, four practical nurses, nine enrolled nurses, and 60 other employees.

In 1944 Sulgrave Manor, a property with a large dwelling house, on Hope Road in an attractive suburb of the city of Kingston, was purchased as the site for a hospital. The Loma Linda medical college contributed $12,500 to this new hospital. Toward the end of 1944 a physician, C. R. Anderson, arrived with a nurse, Ruth M. Munroe, her parents, C. R. Munroe and his wife, and R. E. Gibson and his wife, to build and organize what was to be the first Seventh-day Adventist hospital in the Inter-American Division. In 1945 a clinic building with five wards, housing 22 beds, was built on James Street in the heart of the city.

In January 1945, while Sulgrave Manor was being remodeled, Ruth Munroe began a prenursing class at West Indian Training College (now West Indies College). In May 1945 the Andrews Memorial School of Nursing was officially opened with seven students.

In December 1946 the cornerstone for a two-story concrete building of 21 rooms was laid at the Hope Road property. In 1953 the clinic was moved from James Street to Hope Road, and the hospital-clinic has operated as one unit since. In the first 18 years of operation the institution was patronized by 165,000 patients. Six nurses were graduated in 1948 and 22 in the next three years. However, in 1952 the school was closed because the hospital did not have the required minimum number of beds according to the new regulations for nursing schools. For some time annually a class of eight girls was trained as practical nurses to assist graduate nurses at the hospital, but this has been discontinued.

In 1971 Dr. Cuthbert Arthur, who was then the medical director of the hospital, reopened the School of Nursing. It is currently affiliated with the West Indies College in Mandeville. In June 1974 six nursing students graduated with their Bachelor of Science degree. They were the first to receive a degree from the School of Nursing.

Andrews University

ANDREWS UNIVERSITY. An institution operated jointly by the General Conference and the Lake Union Conference, the first university to be organized by the Seventh-day Adventist Church. It is situated on a 1,600-acre (650-hectare) campus near Berrien Springs, Michigan, on the St. Joseph River, 15 miles (24 kilometers) east of Lake Michigan.

The university comprises seven schools: the College of Arts and Sciences, the College of Technology, the School of Business, the School of Education, the School of Graduate Studies, the SDA Theological Seminary, and the University School.

The Theological Seminary and the School of Graduate Studies, which were formerly operated in Washington, D.C., under the name of Potomac University, were moved to Berrien Springs in 1959—1960 by action of the 1958 General Conference Autumn Council. At first it was planned that the three schools would be affiliated under one president but would otherwise remain distinct institutions. When this plan was found to be impracticable under the corporation procedures of the state of Michigan, it became necessary to incorporate as a single institution. This action was voted Apr. 7, 1960, and the name Andrews University (honoring John Nevins Andrews, the first missionary to extend SDA work outside North America) was chosen. Andrews University originally had a single board of trustees but two executive committees, one of which conducted the between-session affairs of the undergraduate school and the other those of the two graduate branches. On advice of the North Central Association of Colleges and Schools, the regional accrediting body, it was voted, on June 20, 1962, to replace the two executive committees with a single executive committee responsible for all three branches.

The net capital worth of the university in 1993 was more than $38 million.

The university operates several industries, including a supermarket, a farm and dairy, and a greenhouse, where students may learn useful skills while earning money to defray educational expenses. There are residence halls for unmarried men and women and furnished apartments for married students and unmarried graduate students.

All university programs are accredited by the Board of Regents of the General Conference of Seventh-day Adventists. The university (as Emmanuel Missionary College) has been on the accredited list of the North Central Association of Colleges and Schools (NCA) since 1922, at which time it was accredited at the junior college level. Accreditation at the bachelor's degree level was granted by the NCA in 1939, for master's level programs in 1968, and at the doctoral level in 1979. The university has made concerted efforts to have its professional programs accredited by appropriate bodies. This has resulted in the following accreditations: teacher training and school services programs by the National Council for the Accreditation of Teacher Education, Theological Seminary programs by the Association of Theological Schools in the United States and Canada, the Chemistry Department by the American Chemical Society, the coordinated program in dietetics by the American Dietetics Society, the program in clinical laboratory sciences by the Committee on Allied Health Education and Accreditation in cooperation with the National Accrediting Agency for Clinical Laboratory Sciences, the speech-language pathology and auditory programs by the American Speech-Language-Hearing Association, the physical therapy program by the Commission of Accreditation in Physical Therapy Education of the American Physical Therapy Association, the graduate and undergraduate programs in nursing by the National League of Nursing and the Michigan Board of Nursing, the architecture programs by the National Architectural Accrediting Board, the social work program by the Council on Social Work Education, the graduate and undergraduate programs in music by the National Association of the Schools of Music, and the School of Education's counseling programs by the Counsel for Accreditation of Counseling and Related Educational Programs.

Andrews University holds membership in the American Association of Colleges for Teacher Education; the American Association of Collegiate Registrars and Admissions Officers; the American Schools of Oriental Research; the American Theological Library Association; the American Assembly of Collegiate Schools of Business; the Association of Collegiate Schools of Architecture; the Council of Graduate Schools in the United States; the Michigan Academy of Science, Arts, and Letters; the National Association of Foreign Students Affairs; the National Collegiate Honors Council; and the Upper Midwest Honors Council. The university has a local chapter of the interdisciplinary National Honor Society, Phi Beta Kappa, as well as chapters of 15 honor societies in specific subject areas.

I. Component Schools

I. Component Schools. 1. College of Arts and Sciences. The original undergraduate school, which must be considered as the successor to Battle Creek College (founded 1874), is the oldest college in the denomination. As of 1993 it offers Bachelor of Arts (B.A.) degrees in 22 areas, Bachelor of Science (B.S.) degrees in 32 areas, and minors in 38 areas, with courses adaptable to a wide variety of educational goals. The college also offers professional bachelor degrees in art education, dietetics, fine arts, medical technology, music, radiologic technology, and social work. Associate of Science (A.S.) degrees are available in child development and medical laboratory technology. The college also offers preprofessional programs in 14 areas. On the graduate level the college offers Master of Arts (M.A.) degrees in English, history, home economics, interdisciplinary studies, and music; the Master of Music degree; Master of Science (M.S.) degrees in biology, human nutrition, interdisciplinary studies, and nursing; and the professional M.S. degrees in medical technology and physical therapy.

2. College of Technology. The College of Technology was established in 1974 to consolidate the offerings in the technical and job-oriented areas. The college offers (1993) the five-year professional Bachelor of Architecture degree, the B.S. degree in engineering in five areas, the B.S. in industrial technology in six areas, the Bachelor of Technology in five areas, and the B.S. in interiors. The two-year Associate of Engineering Technology degree is available in three areas and the Associate of Technology in 11 areas. Nondegree certificates in aircraft airframe, flight, and powerplant are also offered.

3. School of Business. The School of Business, which evolved from the College of Arts and Sciences' Department of Business Administration, was established in 1980. In 1993 the school offered the following degrees: professional Master of Business Administration with emphasis in management, accounting, or computer information science; M.S. in administration or computer science (two areas); Bachelor of Business Administration; B.S. in computer information systems or computer sciences; B.A. in economics; and A.S. in three areas. A minor in business administration and a second major in business are offered for students in the Colleges of Arts and Sciences and Technology.

4. School of Education. The School of Education traces its origins to the Normal Department, which enrolled a large share of students in Battle Creek College. Graduate programs in education were an original part of the offerings of Potomac University. These were continued and expanded when it merged to form Andrews University. Undergraduate and graduate programs were combined into the School of Education in 1983. In 1993 the school offered the following degrees: B.S. in elementary education (seven areas); B.A. with elementary certification; and either the B.S. or B.A. with secondary certification (26 areas). The school's graduate programs lead to the M.A., the M.A. degree in teaching, the Educational Specialist, and the Ed.D. and Ph.D. degrees.

5. School of Graduate Studies. The School of Graduate Studies originally was part of Potomac University and became operative at Berrien Springs when Andrews University was formed. Until 1987 it granted all the university's degrees except those offered in the SDA Theological Seminary. Since 1987 the various graduate degrees were offered by the school or college that housed the department of instruction. The School of Graduate Studies then became a coordinating and quality control entity that gave particular attention to admission and graduation requirements. It is governed by a graduate council composed of representatives from the schools and colleges that have graduate programs and members of the university administration.

6. SDA Theological Seminary. The Theological Seminary's primary purpose is to prepare candidates for effective leadership in the church's gospel ministry in the world. This ministry is grounded in the biblical, historical, and theological witness of the church, and is made proficient and effective by careful development of the ministering arts (preaching, teaching, pastoral care, and leadership).

The Theological Seminary offers the Master of Divinity degree, the M.A. degree in pastoral ministry, M.A. degree in religion (nine areas), the Master of Theology degree (six areas), the Doctor of Ministry degree (two areas), the Doctor of Philosophy degree in religion (five areas), and the Doctor of Theology degree (two areas). A major part of the course work for the M.A. degree in pastoral ministry is offered in intensives, both on and off campus. The M.A. degree in religion is offered both on campus and at selected affiliation and extension centers.

The Theological Seminary has offered a number of short-term extension schools in the various world divisions for those who cannot take advantage of Theological Seminary training elsewhere.

7. The University School. The University School, a coeducational day school operated by the university, is the successor to the original secondary departments of Battle Creek College and Emmanuel Missionary College, and later the separate elementary and secondary schools operated by the university. The University School consists of the Ruth Murdoch Elementary School (preschool through grade 8) and Andrews Academy (grades 9 through 12). The University School is governed by the University board of trustees and administered by the director, who is responsible to the university president and who is assisted by the principals of each of the school's divisions, and by assistants in admissions and records, instructional media, and student personnel services. Andrews Academy grants college preparatory and general curriculum diplomas and is accredited by the General Conference Board of Regents and the University of Michigan Bureau of School Services.

II. History of the College of Arts and Sciences

II. History of the College of Arts and Sciences. 1. Origin as Battle Creek College. This college, founded in 1874, evolved from a “select” private school established in 1868 by G. H. Bell and conducted successively in the building that first housed the Review and Herald printshop, in the church building, and in a new Review and Herald building. The school was adopted as a General Conference project in May 1872. By 1873 enrollment was more than 100, and Sidney Brownsberger, a graduate of the University of Michigan, was the new principal, Bell staying on as a teacher.

In March 1873 the General Conference, then in session, encouraged by James and Ellen White, voted to form an Educational Society (legally incorporated in March 1874) and to raise money for a college building. Vigorous efforts by G. I. Butler, S. N. Haskell, and others raised $54,000 in cash or pledges by the end of the year.

The society, acting against the advice of the Whites, who favored a 40-acre (16-hectare) former fairgrounds outside Battle Creek, purchased a 12-acre (five-hectare) estate in the city near the Western Health Reform Institute. In 1874 a three-story building was erected, which was dedicated Jan. 4, 1875. Battle Creek College opened, meanwhile, on Aug. 24, 1874, with 100 students.

Despite Ellen White’s early counsels favoring a large measure of manual and religious education, the curriculum in the early years to a considerable degree followed the conventional college pattern of the day. In 1877—1878, for example, there were three students taking the classical course (Latin, Greek, mathematics, “natural science,” rhetoric, elocution, geology); 16 the three-year “English course” (mathematics, science, a year of English, and two of a foreign language—Latin, Greek, French, or German); 235 the “normal” (teacher training) course; 111 the “special course” for those preparing for missionary work (arithmetic, grammar, history, two terms of biblical lectures, and one year of biblical Greek); 48 the school of hygiene (conducted that year by physicians from the sanitarium, but apparently discontinued the next year). Notable, from the later SDA point of view, is the presence of a classical course. Even more notable is the absence of regular Bible courses in the curriculum. The “Biblical Department” was a series of daily lectures by Uriah Smith during two of the three terms of the school year; this was required of none but those in the “special course”; others could elect it. In 1877—1878 only 75 took the Bible lectures. That year the college-level enrollment was 413; the total, including elementary grades, 478. Because there were no church schools in which they could work, most of the graduates of the Teacher Training Department, the largest, entered nondenominational service. The ministerial training was weak. When the “special course” was raised to a three-year “biblical course” with one, then two, years of biblical languages, the enrollment dropped; it was 42 in 1879—1880.

The lack of student residence halls occasioned various administrative problems; most students boarded in private homes, some banded together into clubs for group feeding, and many boarded themselves.

James White, president of the Educational Society, was nominal president of the college until 1880, when on his recommendation the college presidency went to Brownsberger, the principal. By 1880 the enrollment had climbed to 490. Leading teachers during those years included G. H. Bell, Uriah Smith, and Dr. John Harvey Kellogg.

In 1881, the year of James White's death, Brownsberger was succeeded by Alexander McLearn, a recent convert who knew little of SDA educational ideals. The 1881—1882 term, marred by unrest and dissension in faculty ranks, ended with the dismissal of McLearn and the temporary closing of the college through the 1882—1883 term.

After reopening in 1883 under Wolcott H. Littlejohn, the college attempted to follow more closely the counsels of Ellen White. Curricula were revised to emphasize short courses for denominational workers. A new three-story boarding hall, occupied first in 1883, partially solved the student residence problem; a second dormitory, including improved dining quarters, was built in 1886. Under William W. Prescott, who succeeded Littlejohn in 1885, the school-home system flourished, the president and his wife setting a pattern of etiquette by dining regularly with the students. Attempts to establish manual training and college industries, for which space was provided in a building constructed in 1885, foundered and were abandoned by 1889. For several years, beginning in 1888, ministerial institutes (see General Conference Bible Schools) during the winter months brought 150 to 300 ministers and other church workers to the college.

The early 1890s were years of deepening spiritual emphasis at the college. By 1894—1895 all students were required to take at least one year of Bible, and all classes were given a more spiritual tone. The classical course, already broadened to include history, English literature, and other subjects, gradually introduced biblical Greek and ecclesiastical Latin and diminished the classical literature. Throughout the decade revivalism marked college activities. A study made in 1897 showed that 38 percent of all ordained ministers in the denomination had received some training at Battle Creek College. The highest enrollment to be recorded at Battle Creek was reached in 1893—1894 (768, including 337 in the preparatory departments).

In 1894 the presidency passed to George W. Caviness, whose educational ideas were similar to Prescott's. In 1897 a movement for drastic curricular changes replaced Caviness with Edward A. Sutherland. Led by Alonzo T. Jones, Dr. John Harvey Kellogg, and Percy T. Magan, the reformers supporting Sutherland were resolved to abolish classical studies (by 1898 this was accomplished, and only New Testament Greek, New Testament [Vulgate] Latin, and medical Latin were taught), to expunge all traces of apparently worldly educational thought, to base all studies closely on the Bible, to establish college industries, and to prepare denominational workers, especially church school teachers, more speedily. An 80-acre (32-hectare) farm was purchased, various manual enterprises were begun, the playground was plowed and set to potatoes, and in several classes standard textbooks were largely supplanted by the Bible and denominational religious volumes. The movement was crowned when in 1898—1899 the college, operating under a new charter, discontinued the granting of academic degrees. It likewise abolished enrollment statistics, but estimates indicate that by 1900—1901 enrollment had declined noticeably.

During this period the training of teachers to staff the rapidly expanding denominational church school system became a major concern at the college. By 1899 there were 150 church schools in the United States, with two thirds of their teachers having studied at Battle Creek.

The cramped and urban campus was not well suited to the educational concepts of Sutherland, who desired a spacious rural setting like that of the recently founded Avondale College in Australia. Following the counsel of Ellen White, who had wanted a rural site from the first, the 1901 General Conference session approved the decision of the Educational Society to move the college. The property was sold to the Battle Creek Sanitarium. A “Battle Creek College” continued to operate, beginning in 1903, controlled by Dr. Kellogg’s board, but it had no connection with the original institution except the use of the same buildings.

2. Emmanuel Missionary College. After a search throughout southwestern Michigan a site was chosen near Berrien Springs, an area Sutherland had favored since 1899. Two tracts, the Richardson and Garland farms, totaling 272 acres (110 hectares), were purchased for about $18,000. The site extended along the banks of the St. Joseph River, near a passenger boat landing. The relocated institution was named Emmanuel Missionary College.

During the summer of 1901 a denomination-wide summer school for about 150 to 200 active and prospective church school teachers was held under trying conditions in tents beside the river near the village. During the regular 1901—1902 term, while the new campus was being developed, the school occupied the former county courthouse, the sheriff’s home and jail, an office building, and a summer hotel overlooking the river. Enrollment reached 100. The plan was that the college would not be allowed to exceed 250; beyond that figure a new college would be started.

During 1902 and 1903, with student labor, a group of four modest frame buildings was erected. Sutherland deliberately kept buildings dispersed and plain, to discourage the growth of pride and institutional spirit. One building was to be kept warm enough for student study; others were to be left with a minimum of heat or light, to simulate conditions in the mission fields.

Fund-raising for the new school was a major problem. Though the change was not heralded, financial responsibility for the college was passing from the General Conference into the hands of the newly established Lake Union Conference. P. T. Magan and President Sutherland tirelessly solicited donations from the laity of the area. Ellen White, the General Conference, and the Review and Herald had dedicated all proceeds from her book Christ’s Object Lessons (1900) to the support of denominational schools, and the college became a major beneficiary. Classes were suspended on four extended occasions as teams of teachers and students spread out, selling the book in communities throughout the union. Thus Emmanuel Missionary College became known as “the college in the country built by a book.”

To encourage self-government and a salutary group spirit, faculty and students assembled weekly for frank discussion of college problems of all kinds. Spirituality and evangelical fervor pervaded the campus. A considerable proportion of the academic instruction was conducted in the evenings, since many students worked all day. A novel and controversial feature of Sutherland’s program was limiting the student to one major academic subject each of the three terms.

The Sutherland regime ended in the spring of 1904, in the wake of the broad-reaching controversies between General Conference leaders and Dr. Kellogg. Sutherland went on in 1906 to pioneer SDA higher education in the South, at Madison College, Tennessee (see Madison Institutions). His successor, Nelson W. Kauble, eliminated the “one-study plan,” but continued the emphasis upon practical education, with special attention to developing the farm.

In 1910, under the presidency of Otto J. Graf, the college secured a new charter permitting the granting of academic degrees. The new charter also recognized the college as a Lake Union Conference institution, which in fact it had been since 1908. Through sound financial policies, a $60,000 debt of 1908 was cleared by 1916. Enrollment moved from 138 (including preparatory students) in 1908—1909 to 228 in 1913—1914 and 349 in 1917—1918. By 1924 the enrollment exceeded 500.

During these years of growth zeal for building an outstanding institution and for spreading the gospel through missions continued high. A 30-day student campaign in 1919 raised $6,000 to erect a music building. Student solicitation also contributed greatly to raising funds for the chapel building and a pipe organ, which were dedicated in 1928. During the virulent influenza epidemic of 1918 the college was closed for more than a month, and four students died. During the influenza epidemic of 1919—1920, 160 students went out to nurse victims in the surrounding area, and the Berrien Springs Chamber of Commerce responded in 1923 by sponsoring a fund-raising campaign on behalf of the college. Practical education continued to flourish alongside the strengthening academic program. The farm was expanded and an agricultural curriculum was added; the College Wood Products was established. A pioneering radio station, WEMC, was in operation from 1923 to 1931; it was heard as far away as southern California, and its broadcasts included evangelistic programs. Efforts to ensure standards of collegiate excellence in both teaching staff and student performance were intensified in the late 1920s. For the first time in SDA education, funds were specifically set aside to finance graduate education of faculty members.

Its pioneering years behind it, the college, from 1930, progressively improved its physical plant and strengthened its academic offerings. Despite a period of declining enrollments and considerable financial strain, and with the help of a reserve of nearly $30,000 built up during G. F. Wolfkill’s administration, the school survived the Depression. During those same years it was struggling to attain accreditation for its full college program. The North Central Association of Colleges and Schools had accredited the first two college years in 1922, but further accreditation necessitated drastic improvements. For example, as recently as 1935 every building on the campus was of wood, and each was rated as substandard. Policies for supporting graduate education of college teachers and encouraging their attendance at professional meetings had to be greatly liberalized.

Under a long-range overall plan for campus improvement, a succession of brick or stone buildings was begun. The first was occupied in 1937, as students and faculty in only four hours moved 20,000 volumes into the newly erected James White Library (now superseded by the newer university library building of the same name, dedicated in 1962).

College accreditation was attained in 1939. Meanwhile, in 1934, on discontinuation of its college-level work, Broadview College had transferred its college records to Berrien Springs. While World War II restricted the active building program, the board continued through the war years to add to the building fund and to stockpile bricks so that construction could be readily resumed. Surprisingly, the college enrollment during the war dropped by only 20 (503 full-time college students in 1941—1942, 483 in the low-enrollment year of 1943—1944), although nearly one fifth of the male enrollment was inducted into the armed forces during the year 1942—1943. By 1944—1945 a few discharged veterans were returning to classes, presaging the flood of enrollees soon to appear.

The enrollment of 29 veterans in the fall of 1945, when applicants were turned away for lack of housing facilities, swelled to 341 one year later. The 1944—1945 total enrollment (502) was doubled by 1947—1948 (1,093), and a peak of 1,119 was reached in 1949—1950. Single men and those with families were housed in various residential annexes, including quonset-type dwellings for 72 men, 16 four-room duplex houses and 17 trailer houses secured by the college, and 65 privately owned trailer houses. Throughout the emergency an only slightly augmented faculty assumed unusually heavy teaching loads. During these years and since, the new construction program has proceeded steadily, as building after building of modern permanent construction has been erected.

With the arrival of the first contingent of Theological Seminary and Graduate School students in 1959—1960, and through most of the 1960—1961 term while Seminary Hall was being completed, the already-crowded college buildings provided classroom and office space for the entire new university. From 1959 to 1962 the college was administered largely by the vice president for undergraduate affairs, Fabian A. Meier. From 1962 there was a greater centralization of administration under the university president.

III. History of the Seventh-day Adventist Theological Seminary

III. History of the Seventh-day Adventist Theological Seminary. In the Autumn Council of 1932 the General Conference Committee voted to establish a school of theology, but the action proved on further study to be premature. The Autumn Council of 1933, expressing principal concern for the training of Bible teachers for colleges, academies, and schools of nursing, voted a substitute proposal, that “successive summer schools of 12 weeks’ duration be operated at designated colleges under the auspices of the General Conference, the first session to be opened June 6, 1934, at Pacific Union College.” In addition to the special lecturers provided by the General Conference, a faculty equivalent to four full-time instructors, two to be from elsewhere than the host college, were to be employed.

The first of these summer schools—named the Advanced Bible School—was held as planned at Pacific Union College, with a staff of 13, an enrollment of 71, and Milton E. Kern as dean. Twenty courses were offered.

The Autumn Council of 1934 recommended that course offerings be expanded to include the fields of history and education, to benefit history teachers and school principals. Editors and ministers were also invited to enroll, and plans now included a master’s degree. The 1935 session was again held at Pacific Union College, with its faculty increased by two. For the 10-week session, at the same place, during the General Conference session in the summer of 1936, the staff had added three more, and 93 students registered.

In 1936 the General Conference voted to organize a permanent seminary separate from any other institution. There was to be a 1937 summer school and a three-month winter session in 1937—1938. Seminary faculty members, when not occupied in the school, could be sent to overseas divisions to assist in ministerial institutes. Erection of a suitable building was approved.

With Kern as president (1937—1943), an initial faculty of 11, and an enrollment of 38, the sessions were opened in temporary quarters in Takoma Park, Washington, D.C. Majors were offered in Bible and religious history (either church history or Near Eastern antiquity); minors included Greek and Hebrew. The new building, planned for 100 to 125 students, was begun in August 1938 and dedicated on Jan. 21, 1941. By 1942 the winter quarter enrollment had reached 65. In April 1942 came authorization to confer the degree of Master of Arts in religion. A new calendar announced winter, spring, and summer sessions.

From 1943 to 1947 a division of missions and Christian leadership offered intensive instruction in the Arabic, French, German, and Russian languages. A fourth quarter of instruction for the Theological Seminary was instituted in 1944—1945. In 1945 a program was announced for the Bachelor of Divinity (B.D.) degree; the first Master of Theology degree was conferred in 1959. Four apartment buildings, accommodating 24 families, were erected in Takoma Park in 1947. The Theological Seminary's library collection grew rapidly, doubling between 1944 (15,000 books) and 1947 (32,000 books), by which time it was said to rank among the upper one fourth of seminary libraries in the United States in total acquisitions. When the institution was moved to Berrien Springs in 1960, the collection had grown to more than 50,000 books.

An action by the Autumn Council of 1953 called for a fifth year at the Theological Seminary for all ministerial students immediately after completion of their college work. The Autumn Council of 1954 revised this action and prescribed a one-year field internship before the Theological Seminary year. In 1956 this latter action was rescinded and the 1953 Autumn Council action reaffirmed. An Autumn Council action in 1962 called for a three-year ministerial internship plan whereby the then-present two-year internship plan was extended to include an additional year of internship of study at the Theological Seminary. This plan was revised in 1964 so that, upon completion of college work, the intern would study two years at the Theological Seminary and receive the B.D. degree and spend a third year of internship in the field.

In 1971 the Bachelor of Divinity degree was changed to Master of Divinity (M.Div.).

IV. History of the School of Graduate Studies and Potomac University

IV. History of the School of Graduate Studies and Potomac University. In 1956 the Autumn Council authorized the establishment of a university-type institution to include with the Theological Seminary a School of Graduate Studies, with Washington Missionary College (now Columbia Union College) to be affiliated as the undergraduate school. Potomac University was organized in 1957, consisting of the School of Graduate Studies, with an enrollment of 31, and the Theological Seminary; but the plan to affiliate with Washington Missionary College encountered problems in finding an adequate campus site. Finally the Autumn Council of 1958 voted to move the graduate institutions to Berrien Springs, Michigan, and to affiliate them with Emmanuel Missionary College. During the 1959—1960 term, instruction by both graduate divisions was given at both Washington, D.C., and Berrien Springs, but the 1960—1961 term was conducted entirely at Berrien Springs. In 1960 the entire institution, including Emmanuel Missionary College as the undergraduate school, became Andrews University.

The Emmanuel Missionary College faculty formed the nucleus of the School of Graduate Studies faculty, which was augmented by a number of new appointees. Initially members of the Theological Seminary faculty assisted in the School of Graduate Studies. In 1961 the Theological Seminary stopped granting the Master of Arts degree. It was relocated in the School of Graduate Studies until 1987, when it was returned to the Theological Seminary.

V. History of the University School

V. History of the University School. In 1901 Battle Creek College was moved to Berrien Springs and was given the name Emmanuel Missionary College. When Emmanuel Missionary College opened, the curriculum consisted largely of secondary school courses. The first class, graduated in 1908, consisted of all secondary students. In 1922 the academy was organized as a department with a faculty of its own. The academy was accredited by the state of Michigan in 1916 and by the North Central Association of Colleges and Schools in 1922 under the name Emmanuel Missionary College Academy.

The name Andrews University Laboratory School was voted by the board of trustees in 1963, and in 1964 the university board of trustees voted to accept the Laboratory School as its responsibility. In 1974 the board of trustees voted to adopt the name The University School.

VI. Growth of the University From 1959 to 1974

VI. Growth of the University From 1959 to 1974. 1. Physical Plant. In 1959 a development program was begun to improve and enlarge the campus, as a result of the move of the university to Berrien Springs.

To provide additional housing for married students the university erected six apartment buildings for graduate students, with a total of 118 apartments (1959) and another unit with 10 apartments and 30 additional sleeping rooms (1963). In 1966 and 1967 another apartment complex was added, and again in 1970 and 1973, making a total of 268 apartments for married students. A new men's residence hall, Meier Hall, for single men students was completed in 1964, and an addition to Lamson Hall, residence hall for single women, was completed in 1968.

Seminary Hall was dedicated in 1961. The year 1961 also saw the completion of the campus center, which houses the food service and student center, as well as the FM radio station, which was completed in 1970. The James White Library building, housing the combined libraries of the university, was dedicated in 1962.

When the new administration building was completed in 1966, the old administration building (Nethery Hall) was transformed into additional classroom space. The new dairy complex was completed in 1967 and helped the university to become the largest producer of milk in southwestern Michigan. The year 1968 saw the completion of the swimming pool and gymnasium addition. In 1969 the elementary grades were moved from the main campus to a new building near the campus, and the former building was transformed into a home for the School of Education.

Auxiliary departments were not forgotten in the development plan. The book bindery (1959), laundry (1959), press building addition (1962), custodial services (1965), sewage treatment plant (1968), College Wood Products warehouse (1969), airport (1971), and the airport terminal building (1974) added to the growth of the campus. Construction on a new plant service building and the enlargement of the heating plant were started in 1973 and were completed in 1975.

The science complex, composed of three buildings that house the Departments of Chemistry, Biology, Physics, Mathematics, Engineering, Engraving Technology, and Medical Technology, was dedicated in 1974. The net capital worth of the university in 1993 was about $39 million, and the campus had expanded to more than 1,600 acres (650 hectares).

2. Enrollments. The university's opening enrollment during its centennial year (1974—1975) totaled 2,314, of which 546 were involved in graduate programs. By the 1991—1992 school year, enrollment had increased to 3,057, with 988 enrolled at the graduate level. Over the 18 years from 1974 to 1992, only the opening enrollment in 1981—1982 (3,083) surpassed that of a decade later. Graduate enrollments peaked at 1,141 in 1986—1987, while the high point of undergraduate enrollments (2,087) came in 1979—1980.

3. Affiliations. In 1975 the university began making its degrees available on the campuses of affiliated Seventh-day Adventist colleges outside the United States. This involved careful inspection and continued monitoring of facilities, faculty, and instruction at each institution. The first year (1975), undergraduate programs in approved subject areas were begun at the Adventist Seminary of West Africa in Nigeria and at Helderberg College in the republic of South Africa. Courses in these programs are taught almost entirely by faculty of the host college, although occasionally an exchange teacher might be supplied from the Michigan campus. Eventually master's degrees in religion and pastoral ministry were added in Nigeria and in religion in South Africa. Graduate courses were taught almost entirely by instructors from the home campus or by visiting instructors from another SDA college.

Following this pattern, course work toward master's degrees in religion and education were initiated in 1979 at West Indies College in Jamaica and in Religion at Montemorelos University in Mexico, with classes being taught primarily during the summer months. The next year course work toward a graduate degree in religion was begun at Antillian College in Puerto Rico and at Avondale College in Australia. In 1980 Andrews also extended its granting of undergraduate degrees to students at the new University College of Eastern Africa in Kenya. This program was continued until the Kenyan government was satisfied that the University College of Eastern Africa had developed enough academically to offer its own degrees.

In 1983 Andrews added Newbold College in England to the colleges at which certain undergraduate degrees could be earned. Later master's programs in religion and pastoral ministry were added. The year 1983 also saw the start of master's programs in education and religion at Spicer Memorial College in India. Solusi College in Zimbabwe was added as an affiliated college for undergraduate degree programs in 1984. A similar program was established at Caribbean Union College, Trinidad, in 1985. The graduate program in pastoral ministry was subsequently instituted at Solusi College.

Prior to 1988, all affiliations were with SDA institutions outside the United States. In 1988, however, an agreement was reached with Kettering Medical Center in Ohio to offer the Andrews' B.S. in nursing at that institution. The most recent Andrews' affiliation, established in 1992, provides for the university's M.A. in religion to be offered at Zaokski Theological Seminary in Russia.

VII. Andrews University in Its Second Century

VII. Andrews University in Its Second Century. In 1974 Andrews University celebrated the one hundredth anniversary of its founding as Battle Creek College with a variety of special convocations and conferences. These conferences (on the arts, missions, evangelism, and family life) were in many ways indicative of the emphases that would develop over the next two decades. The international aspect of the university's student body received visual acknowledgment in 1974 with the dedication at alumni homecoming of that year of the international flag walk between the Pioneer Memorial SDA Church and the James White Memorial Library. During the 1991—1992 academic year, students were enrolled from all 50 states and from 88 other countries. The first student from Russia had arrived in 1978 and from mainland China in 1980. The University operates an English Language Institute, in which students whose native language is not English may, through intensive classwork, rapidly acquire the language proficiency necessary to handle classes satisfactorily.

The undergraduate Honors Program, begun in 1966, demonstrates the university's strong commitment to intellectual excellence. It stresses the close cooperation of academically talented students with faculty in a variety of special courses, seminars, and research projects. An interdisciplinary emphasis avoids narrow specialization. Subject departments have been encouraged to form chapters of National Honor societies in their disciplines. In 1987 an Academic Support and Advising Service was begun to aid students in developing their potential more quickly. That year the emphasis on academic excellence was demonstrated when two undergraduates were accepted to work during the summer in the famed Argonne National Laboratory. In 1985 a Gifted Student Program was developed to allow local high school seniors to take one university class per quarter. Three years later, a Summer Scholars Program was initiated to stimulate the academic interests of talented academy juniors and seniors. These programs paid off; by 1991 the undergraduate student body included 57 National Merit scholars. The University School also was demonstrating academic excellence. In 1985 Andrews Academy was one of only 65 private schools in the country to be designated as an "exemplary school" by the United States Department of Education.

Recognizing that many students' special talents lie more in vocational lines than in the traditional academic areas, the university established a Center for Occupational Education in 1971. This center offered courses ranging from carpentry to automobile radiator repair in programs stretching from 10 weeks to 30 months. In 1974 these programs were combined with engineering, aviation, computer science, photography, graphic arts, and other vocationally oriented departments to form the College of Technology. From its inception this college has stressed cooperative work-study programs with appropriate industries. The university's traditionally strong Agriculture Department eventually was relocated in the College of Technology. The College of Technology proceeded to develop strong programs in engineering technology and media technology, and in 1983 launched the five-year Bachelor of Architecture program.

The university's 1974 Conference on Missions highlighted a variety of activities that developed to support the spread of Seventh-day Adventism around the world. That year the College of Arts and Sciences' Modern Languages Department began offering courses in French and Spanish for workers assigned to countries in which these languages were dominant. The Institute of World Mission, established in 1966 in the Theological Seminary, began holding sessions, eventually three or four times per year, to aid missionaries under appointment in preparing for more effective service by broadening their understanding of cultural differences and challenges. A strong student missionary program and an active chapter of Maranatha Flights International, which regularly promotes student involvement during vacations in church building projects in Mexico, El Salvador, and the Dominican Republic, have kept students in all the university's subdivisions aware of the challenges of world missions. In 1976 the General Conference designated Andrews University as the center for preparing pilots for mission aircraft, and the Aviation Training and Service Center was established. During the Christmas recess in 1991 and again in 1992, the Institute of World Mission sponsored conferences aimed at preparing young people from all parts of the nation. These "Go" conferences attracted more than 400 individuals, inspiring them with a vision of what they could do to aid in fulfilling the Great Commission.

In June 1974 Andrews hosted one of the three Bible conferences sponsored by the North American Division. Theological Seminary faculty were major speakers at all three conferences. That same year, the Theological Seminary developed a joint Master of Divinity-Master of Science in Public Health program with Loma Linda University. When the North American Division opened its Evangelism Institute in Chicago, the Theological Seminary faculty included a quarter of work at this institute or a similar facility as part of every M.Div. program. In 1980 the university established the Institute of Church Ministry within the Theological Seminary. This later was followed by the addition of the Center for Continuing Education for Ministry and a Youth Resource Center, all designed to harness the talents of Theological Seminary faculty and students in preparing more effective ways to aid the church in reaching the various publics that make up the modern secular world. In 1984 an Institute of Hispanic Ministry was established to better meet the needs of this rapidly expanding segment of the church.

Better preparation for effective ministry lay behind the Theological Seminary's launching of a Doctor of Ministry program in 1973 and the Doctor of Theology program in 1974. This also served as a major reason for the continuing support of periodic archaeological "digs," begun at ancient biblical Heshbon in 1968 and continued after 1984 at Tell el-^CUmeiri in Jordan. In 1980 the university established an Institute of Archaeology to coordinate the development of the Horn Archaeological Museum and the continuation of university-sponsored archaeological expeditions. A better understanding of Christianity's roots became possible for interested Theological Seminary students with the start of an on-location study quarter at the Adventist Center in Jerusalem in 1987.

Two other activities demonstrate that the 1974 Conference on Evangelism was not just an academic exercise: the heavy involvement of the Theological Seminary faculty in the preparation of the Statement of Fundamental Beliefs adopted at the 1980 General Conference session and the establishment of the Adventist Information Ministry.

The year following the university's centennial year Conference on Family Life, the university sponsored the first of what were to become annual summer family life workshops. These became very popular as they brought together leading authorities on the modern family and its problems with scores of denominational workers dedicated to meeting the challenges of eroding family life. By 1992 Drs. John and Millie Youngberg, who directed these workshops, had conducted more than 100 Marriage Enrichment seminars, involving more than 2,000 couples, in a continuing effort to strengthen Christian homes.

Andrews University has become heavily involved in meeting another late-twentieth-century problem: drug dependency. In 1971 as an ancillary to the Department of Chemistry, the university established a Drug Identification Laboratory. This laboratory has been widely utilized by local law enforcement officials, who rely on it to identify samples of suspected illicit drugs. In 1984 the university established the Institute of Alcoholism and Drug Dependency to research further what had become a critical national problem. In 1989 the university received a federal government grant of $118,000 to fund the development of a comprehensive drug prevention program.

In 1987 the university began a Community Service Assistance Program with the aid of another federal grant. Under this program interested students are given modest financial assistance as they provide a variety of social services in connection with established agencies in nearby Benton Harbor, Michigan, one of the state's most critically depressed areas economically. By 1992 students had put in more than 100,000 hours in projects as varied as literacy programs and counseling of welfare applicants. In 1988 the state of Michigan recognized the university's commitment to aiding energetic persons who had been unable to complete their education by granting $28,000 for a pilot program for single parents wishing to complete a degree program. These funds are used in part to provide child care for the students enrolled under this "Genesis Program."

The university has attempted to reach out to its local community in a variety of ways. In 1987 an Intercultural Seminar was developed and offered for employees of the Whirlpool Corporation about to take overseas assignments. In 1986 university staff who were bicycle enthusiasts began promoting an annual springtime metric century bicycle event that attracts hundreds of exercise "buffs" from a tristate area. That same summer it began hosting an annual International Music Festival that drew students, from the elementary grades up, from all over the nation. In 1989 the university Physical Education Department hosted the national championships for the United States Sports Acrobatics Federation. University facilities were made available during the summer of 1990 and thereafter for state baseball and basketball camps and for a number of state high school bands' preseason practice weeks.

Constantly expanding programs demanded increased and improved facilities. In 1975 Apple Valley Market, a modern supermarket that was soon to be a major employer of student labor and a magnet for healthful shoppers in the area, was opened. The year 1978 saw the completion of a new Andrews Academy and an expansion to the university library that more than doubled its storage capacity while providing new quarters for the Ellen G. White Research Center and temporary quarters for the developing Horn Archaeological Museum. The expanded library also housed a Teaching Materials Resource Center and a growing Adventist Heritage Center. By 1993 the university library housed more than 1.2 million bibliographic items, nearly 3,000 periodical subscriptions, thousands of musical recordings and scores, and 75,000 maps and other nonbook items. Following years of planning, the library's holdings became more accessible through the installation of an on-line catalog in 1993. In 1979 two new instructional buildings were added at the Andrews Airport to accommodate the expanding aviation program. A new men's residence hall was completed in 1982, substantially adding to student housing on campus. In 1983 the former Geoscience Institute building was reopened as the Horn Archaeological Museum. Other university buildings were converted to new uses: in 1985 a former president's residence became the Honors House, and the laundry building (discontinued as an industry in 1982) became a converted laboratory for the new physical therapy program. The expanding architecture program demanded its own new building (1984), while another former president's home was converted in 1987 to an alumni house. That same year the restored Sutherland House (home of Emmanuel Missionary College's first president after the move to Berrien Springs) became the headquarters of the Institute of World Mission.

As the result of a generous grant of $1.5 million from SDA philanthropist Chan Shun, $100,000 from the Whirlpool Corporation, and a number of other gifts, Chan Shun Hall was opened in 1989 as headquarters for the School of Business. This was the first new university building to be opened with an operating endowment for its continued maintenance. Similar generous funding from the Harrigan family allowed the opening in 1991 of Harrigan Hall as the principal center of the College of Technology. The expanding campus facilities required the erection of a new 135-foot (41-meter), 250,000-gallon (946,000-liter) water tank in 1988 and a new power plant in 1992.

Expanded facilities and programs demanded increased financial support. In the early 1980s extensive efforts were made to solicit gifts from alumni, foundations, industry, and the general public. By the 1984—1985 academic year, gifts to the university exceeded $1.1 million. In 1986 an extensive campaign was begun to raise a $10 million endowment for the university, part to be used to establish student scholarships, part for general operations. That year a gift of $925,000 established the Frank and Dolly DeHaan Work Excellence Scholarships. For the next several years the university annually received gifts exceeding $2 million. The high point of such contributions came to the university in the 1989—1990 academic year when the total surpassed $3 million.

Student life during the last quarter of the twentieth century differed markedly from the early days in Berrien Springs. The increased availability of student loans and grants coupled with more rigorous academic demands lessened students' desire to "earn while they learned." By 1987 the university trustees decided to sell off longstanding industries that had become increasingly unprofitable. The University Laundry had been closed in 1982; now it was the turn of the University Printers, the University Bindery, and the College Wood Products.

All students were being expected to be computer-literate. Major computer laboratories were established in Bell Hall, Nethery Hall, and Chan Shun Hall, with minor facilities available in most other instructional buildings. By 1992 many occupants of the residence halls had their own personal computers and telephones, complete with answering machines.

The Andrews University Press, established with minimum funding in 1969, began a considerable expansion of publishing in 1979 with the appointment of a permanent director. By 1992 it had published more than 80 titles, principally in the fields of theology, archaeology, and education. A Museum of Natural History, begun in 1960 with a small collection of teaching specimens, by 1993 included more than 30,000 marine shells, 1,600 birds, 1,400 mammals, and hundreds of butterflies and insects. This museum's herbarium section houses more than 5,000 botanical specimens. The most complete skeleton of a woolly mammoth to be found in Michigan is a popular attraction. More and more faculty attract outside funding for research projects, although few have been as successful as biology professor John Stout, funded for more than 10 years by the National Science Foundation. By 1987 attendance at commencement exercises was so great that separate services were begun for graduates and undergraduates.

The university's alumni have been taking an increasing role in the university's affairs. Not only do they make major contributions to the annual giving campaigns, but they are taking a larger role in the university's governance. In 1987 an alumni "shadow program" was instituted in which a number of alumni in various professions allow undergraduate seniors to observe their participation in the work world.

Andrews University Seminary Studies (AUSS)

ANDREWS UNIVERSITY SEMINARY STUDIES (AUSS) (1963—). The scholarly journal of the Seventh-day Adventist Theological Seminary at Andrews University. After two yearly issues AUSS was published twice a year until 1981, when the journal began to come out three times a year. In 1995 semiannual publication resumed, with a circulation of 600.

A refereed journal, AUSS provides a scholarly venue, within the context of biblical faith, for the presentation of research in the area of religious and biblical studies. AUSS publishes research articles and brief notes on the following topics: biblical archaeology and history of antiquity; Hebrew Bible; New Testament; church history of all periods; historical, biblical, and systematic theology; ethics; history of religion and mission; and selected research articles on ministry and Christian education.

Reports of the Andrews University archaeological digs appear regularly in AUSS. Abstracts of AU dissertations in religion are also published. Articles usually appear in English, but occasionally an article may be in another major Western language. Most of the articles are written by SDA scholars, many of them Theological Seminary professors. However, subject to the refereeing process, AUSS may accept articles by authors of other persuasions. Since 1967 AUSS has included reviews of significant new scholarly books in the same areas as its research articles. Articles are indexed in several scholarly bibliographical works, among which are Religion Index One and Elenchus of Biblica.

Siegfried H. Horn began the journal almost single-handedly, editing it from 1963 to 1974. Kenneth A. Strand followed him as editor until 1988. At that time, editorial responsibilities were divided between two coeditors: Strand with George R. Knight until 1991; Strand with Nancy J. Vyhmeister, 1991—1994. In 1994 Vyhmeister assumed the editorship, and Jerry Moon became associate editor and book review editor.

Editorial office: Seminary Hall, Andrews University, Berrien Springs, Michigan.

Andross, Anna Matilda (Erickson)

ANDROSS, ANNA MATILDA (ERICKSON) (1880—1957). Assistant secretary of the Missionary Volunteer Department of the General Conference, author, and editor. She was born in Denmark and in her early childhood heard the Seventh-day Adventist message preached by J. G. Matteson, pioneer of the SDA Scandinavian work, who held meetings in her home. Shortly after this, she emigrated to America. She received an education in nursing at Nebraska Sanitarium, and in liberal arts at Union College (B.A., 1907). Later she took graduate studies at the University of Nebraska and Columbia University.

Having taught for several years, she was chosen in 1907 as the first secretary (under chairmanship of M. E. Kern) of the Young People's Missionary Volunteer Department of the General Conference. Then in 1922 she went with her husband, E. E. Andross, whom she had married in 1920, to the Inter-American Division. There she served as the Missionary Volunteer and Sabbath school secretary of the division. She helped to found and, until her return in 1936 to the United States, edited the Inter-American Division Messenger and the Mensajero. She wrote several pamphlets and books, among them, Alone With God, The Life That Wins, Life's Greatest Things, Sunshine and Shadow in Southern Europe, and a substantial history of the Seventh-day Adventist Church, Story of the Advent Message, for the use of the MV Department. She also wrote a handbook, Missionary Volunteers and Their Work.

Andross, Elmer Ellsworth

ANDROSS, ELMER ELLSWORTH (1868—1950). Evangelist and administrator. After engaging in evangelistic work from 1888 to 1894, he served as Bible teacher at Healdsburg College for two years. Back in evangelistic and pastoral work, he spent three years in San Francisco, then was called (1899) to evangelism in England. After three years he was appointed president of the North England Conference, and later (1905 to 1908) served as president of the British Union Conference. Returning to America, he served terms as president of the Southern California Conference and the Pacific Union Conference, and was vice president of the General Conference for North America (1918—1922). In 1917 his wife, née Sophie P. Miller, died, and in 1920 he married Matilda Erickson. A new and important phase of his lifework began in 1922 when he organized the Inter-American Division. Fourteen years of service as president of that field was followed by a term as a field secretary of the General Conference, and a brief period as president of the Caribbean Union.

Anerley Place

ANERLEY PLACE. A home for the aged operated by the Orange-Natal Conference at Anerley, approximately 75 miles (120 kilometers) south of Durban, South Africa, on a 2.5-acre (one-hectare) property donated early in 1962 by an elderly Seventh-day Adventist member. The site overlooks the Indian Ocean, is adjacent to the Missionary Volunteer youth camp, and is within a five-minute walk of a shop, a post office, and a beach. The home was officially opened with 14 residents on Apr. 15, 1963. Besides the original residence, which provides some accommodations, facilities for a large kitchen, and a community dining room, there were 45 self-contained single and double apartments, with veranda and garden space for each occupant, and a community library-lounge. Anerley church, just across the road, provides the residents with a place of worship. A conference-appointed pastor cares for their spiritual needs.

Ang, Tau Kiet

ANG, TAU KIET (c. 1864—1936). Minister, one of the early Seventh-day Adventists in China. In his early life, he joined the Baptists and became an ordained elder in charge of an independent Baptist congregation in the town of Chiaoan, in eastern Kwangtung. Through his contact with N. P. Keh, a pioneer national SDA minister in China, he accepted the SDA beliefs and devoted his life and means to their propagation in his native province. Ang began to observe the seventh-day Sabbath, together with many members of his congregation, on the Chinese New Year's Day, which fell on a Saturday that year. His church building became the first property owned by the Swatow Mission. An enthusiastic leader, he immediately began to spread through his province the good news of Christ's soon coming. He opened new stations, distributed publications, and even employed others at his own expense to preach the gospel before the SDA mission provided financial aid for his work. He continued in evangelistic work for about a quarter of a century, opening schools and establishing churches in seven of the 12 districts in the Swatow Mission. In 1915 he became the second Chinese national to be ordained to the SDA ministry. In 1928 his health failed and his right side was paralyzed. He died in 1936 and was buried in his native village of Peh-tah.

Angervo, Oscar

ANGERVO, OSCAR (1885—1958). Minister, teacher, editor, and administrator in Sweden and Finland. As a young man of 17 he attended the Nyhyttan school in Sweden, where he finished the ministerial course. He began working as a colporteur, then in 1905 entered evangelistic work and the same year was called to Finland. Being adept at learning languages, he soon learned to speak Finnish. After two years he returned to Sweden, where he preached in different places for a number of years. For a while he was departmental secretary in the South Swedish Conference; then he taught Bible at Nyhyttan (1919—1921). In 1922 he was ordained and in 1925 went to Vasa, Finland, as a minister. Then he was called to be president and Bible teacher at the Finland SDA Mission School (now Finland Junior College). In 1932 he became editor of the Swedish Tidens Tecken and editor in chief of the Stockholm Publishing House. He served there till his retirement in 1952.

History

History. The first Seventh-day Adventist to enter Angola was W. H. Anderson, who, coming from South-West Africa in 1922, explored the country to study the possibilities of establishing mission work. Later he, with T. M. French, field secretary for the African Division, and J. D. Baker, who had been released by the South African Union Conference for work in Angola, was sent in 1923 to choose the site for the first mission station. After traveling for a month, they selected the district of Lepi, on the central plateau of Angola. In 1924, after overcoming several legal difficulties, Anderson, Baker, and O. O. Bredenkamp settled in the country.

Lepi became the temporary headquarters of the South Atlantic United Missions, which included South-West Africa and Angola. In 1925 South-West Africa was transferred to the South African Union Conference, and Angola later became part of the Equatorial Union Mission. Angola was divided on the basis of ethnic and linguistic groups into four mission fields: Ovimbundu, Kimbundu, Huila, and Chokwe. In 1928 Angola itself was detached and organized as the Angola Union Mission. (Briefly between 1955 and 1957, when Portuguese East Africa was temporarily added to it, this union was named the Portuguese African Union Mission.) Anderson was president of these three successive organizations from 1924 to 1933. He endured great hardships, spending most of his time traveling, choosing the sites for the Angola mission stations.

Shortly after their arrival, Baker and Bredekamp opened a mission station at Bongo, in the heart of the Umbumbu tribe, 10 miles (16 kilometers) from Lepi. They lived in a mud-and-pole hut while constructing houses for their families. With the arrival of D. P. Harder in 1925, they erected a school building (see Bongo Adventist Seminary). Dr. A. N. Tonge from California arrived in 1926 and practiced medicine under the most primitive conditions, until the first unit of a hospital was built in 1928 (see Bongo Mission Hospital). In 1927, during the dry season, evangelistic meetings were conducted in four villages, as a result of which 48 persons joined the hearers' classes. By the end of that year five village Sabbath schools were functioning regularly in addition to the one on the mission, with a total average Sabbath school attendance of 500. Bongo became the most important center of SDA influence in Angola.

In August 1925 Bredekamp opened the Luz Mission, in the northeastern part of Angola. He built two missionaries' homes, and a school building (1927) with a capacity of 200 students. A dispensary built in 1929 was placed in charge of Nurse M. Fourie. A church building was built in 1937, and in 1950 the old school building was replaced.

In 1927 a building for the union headquarters was erected in Nova Lisboa in the west central section. Other construction followed, and by 1961 there were homes for three missionary families, a primary school, which began functioning in 1961, a spacious church dedicated in the same year, and a secondary school, which opened in the autumn of 1963.

In 1928 a mission station was opened by Baker at Namba. (A permanent structure for the school was built in 1956, and the church was dedicated in 1961.) In 1932 Bredekamp established the Lucusse Mission among the difficult Luena tribe in eastern Angola. In addition to the residence for the director, he erected a temporary school building (replaced in 1952 by a permanent structure) and a dispensary. From Lucusse the work spread to the Rhodesian border, reaching the Bunda and Luchaze tribes.

At Cuale, to the north, E. A. Buckley in 1934 opened work among the Kimbundu, a hitherto-unreached tribe. The work here grew rapidly. A school was opened in 1953, a hospital in 1962, and a new church building in 1963.

At the General Conference session held in San Francisco in 1950, the Angola Union Mission was transferred to the Southern European Division. The union was then redivided into six mission fields, of which Ovimbundu had by far the largest membership.

In 1952 José de Sá was sent to open a station at Quicuco, in the south, on property acquired in 1931. This meant the beginning of work for a new tribe, the Quilengues. Two residences, a church, and various other buildings were erected, and in 1957 a dispensary (operated by two experienced nurses) was built. The Quilengues Mission was organized in 1958 with 136 members.

Until recently the work among the Africans in the Angola Union Mission was carried out primarily by teachers graduated from the Bongo Adventist Seminary, while conversions among the European population were to a large extent the result of the influence of the Bongo Mission Hospital. The first European Seventh-day Adventist church was formed in Benguela in 1947. The European Mission within the Angola Union was organized in 1959 with 193 members.

The first Adventist radio programs in Angola went on the air in 1953. In 1963 the Voice of Prophecy programs were being broadcast weekly from Benguela, Nova Lisboa, Sá da Bandeira, Moçamedes, Malanje, and Luso. A Bible correspondence course was offered for the first time in 1958. In 1964 the Luanda station began to broadcast the Angola Voice of Prophecy.

A building was constructed at Bongo in 1958 to house the plant printing for the Angola Publishing House, which has produced SDA publications in Portuguese and various African languages.

Since 1975, when political independence was achieved, the country has been suffering from a terrible civil war. All missionaries have been forced to leave the country. In spite of these difficulties, the church has been growing rapidly.

Angola Academy

ANGOLA ACADEMY (Colegio Adventista do Huambo). A secondary boarding school that was owned and operated by the Angola Mission and situated in Nova Lisboa, Angola.

The problems of Sabbath classes and a worldly environment presented such serious problems to the Seventh-day Adventist youth of Angola that, in 1964, the union committee, under the leadership of Ernesto Ferreira, opened a secondary school in Nova Lisboa. Legal authority for its existence was obtained and its official name, Colegio Adventista do Huambo, was taken from the district where it is situated.

The school began with a few students, two teachers offering two grades of secondary work, but the quality of instruction gained a good reputation for the institution and it progressed rapidly. In 1974 a full five-year secondary course was given, preceded by a complete five-year preparatory and elementary section. The school closed in the mid-1970s, when civil war broke out in Angola.

Principals: Ernesto Ferreira, 1964—1969; J. N. Ramos, 1970—1976.

Angola Publishing House

ANGOLA PUBLISHING HOUSE (Casa Publicadora Angolana). A publishing firm, with printing plant, operated by the Angola Union Mission at Nova Lisboa, Angola. The problem of providing publications in the vernacular, especially for Sabbath schools, was first solved by the use of a duplicator. When this means became inadequate, a Multigraph press was obtained in 1937, and a printshop was set up as a department of the Bongo Training School at Lepi, Angola. From this small printshop, during its 20 years of service, came many thousands of pages of Sabbath school material and other printed matter, including schoolbooks and songbooks.

As early as 1947 plans were laid for the purchase of a larger press, but it was apparent that soon more than a printshop would be required. At a meeting of the union committee held at headquarters in Nova Lisboa, Feb. 8—15, 1951, the organization was set up for the establishing of a publishing house, with E. L. Jewell as manager. Because of certain legal technicalities it was at first linked to the publishing house in Portugal and was named Publicadora Atlantico Limitada—Filial de Angola (“Atlantic Publishers Limited—Angola Branch”). After a building in Nova Lisboa was selected and a Babcock cylinder press and a paper trimmer were ordered, the city council decided to widen the street, making it necessary to alter and reduce the building to a size that made it inadequate as a printing plant.

Although an active business was carried on with the sale of denominational books, both directly and with the aid of colporteurs, the lack of a building and of funds delayed the establishment of the new printing plant until 1957. On Aug. 5 of that year plans were laid to erect a building for the proposed plant at the Bongo Mission, thus providing an opportunity for students from the mission school to learn the printing trade. The building was completed in 1958. In the meantime, a small Victoria press, a power plant, and other equipment were purchased, and before the end of 1957 the plant was in operation, with J. da Silva Botelho as superintendent. In 1965 the division and the General Conference assisted in the purchase of an Ala press, and in 1972 of an automatic folding machine and hydraulic vulcanizing molding machine. The printing plant was enlarged in 1973.

In 1959 a legal organization, independent of the publishing house in Portugal, was set up under the name Casa Publicadora Angolana (S.A.R.L.), that is, Angola Publishing House, with headquarters in Nova Lisboa and the printing plant still at Bongo Mission. The management remained the same, and Ernesto Ferreira was chosen as editor.

The first main project, completed in 1961, was the preparation and printing of hymnbooks in the Umbundu and Chokwe languages, paralleled in each case with the Portuguese. This was followed in 1962 by Ellen G. White’s Steps to Christ in the same languages, and in January 1963 by the first issue of the local union mission monthly periodical. In the late 1970s the publishing house was moved to Huambo.

Managers: E. L. Jewell, Juvenal Gomes, Joaquin Sabino, Bella Vista Felix, Jorge Agostinho, Joao Valerio, Autunes Filipe.

Ankazambo Adventist School

ANKAZAMBO ADVENTIST SCHOOL (École Adventiste d'Ankazambo). A coeducational boarding school on the secondary level that was operated by the Indian Ocean Union Mission near Befandriana-Nord, Madagascar.

The site of the school was chosen in 1951 by Henri Pichot, David Riemens, and Edgard Villeneuve, when they were on a prospecting and canvassing trip. In 1952 René Villeneuve arrived to supervise construction of buildings. A primary school was opened under the direction of Robert Rasamimanana. In 1953 more buildings were erected, and Henri Long and his family arrived and opened a small boarding school for boys. Also a girls' boarding school was opened. A church was organized and evangelistic work carried on in the villages by students and teachers. In 1958 five young men graduated.

The school was closed in 1990.

Principals: Henri Long, 1953—1957; Michel Grisier, 1958—1961; Jacques de Laere, 1961—1963; René Villeneuve, 1963—1966; Claude Villeneuve, 1966—1971; Paul Pichot, 1972; Jacques Gallis, 1972—1977; Nilton Amorim, 1977—1978; Louise Razafindrakalo, 1978—1984; Lyla Herimanitra, 1984—1985; Samuel Ravonjiarivelo, 1985—1986; Ernestine Rabesalama, 1986—1990.

Annual Council

ANNUAL COUNCIL. An annual meeting of the Executive Committee of the General Conference, held in October of each year at such time and place as shall be determined by the Executive Committee. The General Conference Executive Committee exercises full administrative power on behalf of the General Conference during the intervals between General Conference sessions.

The Annual Council reviews annually, in the form of reports, resolutions, and general planning, the work pursued under the general supervision of the headquarters organization. The budgets submitted on behalf of fields, institutions, and general organizations are given careful consideration, and yearly budgetary appropriations are voted. Business pertaining to the general policy of the worldwide work is transacted. Policy items intended for insertion in the General Conference Working Policy must have Annual Council approval.

The Annual Council gives approval for all general departmental councils, advisory committees, and other general meetings involving attendance from several unions and/or institutions. The boundaries between divisions can be adjusted at Annual Council provided no divisional territorial line is changed when the division or divisions involved are not represented at the council by one of their executive officers or when such division or divisions have not given consent. Emergency conditions such as war would be an exception, in which case the General Conference Executive Committee makes such provisions as are necessary for the conduct of the work.

The members of division executive committees act to a degree as the General Conference Committee in their respective division territories. In case of appeal from a division committee action, the matter may be referred for counsel to the General Conference Committee. In case of any needed adjustment of differences of opinion arising between the division committee and the General Conference Committee, the matter is referred to the next Annual Council of the General Conference Executive Committee.

The Annual Council appoints a number of standing committees to prepare the regular business of the council and to process items or recommendations that are to come before the council. Ad hoc committees can also be appointed to deal with specific problems or certain aspects of the General Conference operation. The work of these committees comes to the Annual Council likewise through regular channels.

Before 1968 Annual and Midterm Council meetings were all held in the United States of America. In 1968 the Midterm Council was held outside the United States for the first time, in Toronto, Canada. Subsequently it has been held in the following cities outside the United States: 1972, Mexico City, Mexico; 1982, Manilla, Philippines; 1986, Rio de Janeiro, Brazil; 1988, Nairobi, Kenya; 1991, Perth, Australia; 1993, Bangalore, India.

Annual Statistical Report

ANNUAL STATISTICAL REPORT (1906— ; annual; GC; limited circulation). An annual statistical summary of the Seventh-day Adventist Church activities issued as a separate publication since 1906 (reporting for the year 1905), at first apparently as a reprint from the Review and Herald.

Statistical reports for the denomination date from the fifth annual session of the General Conference, held in 1867, when a brief table of nine lines and one column in width was published in the Review and Herald. This was done in accordance with a resolution passed at the preceding session that statistics from conferences were to be furnished by the delegates to the General Conference from each local conference. At that time there were 28 ministers, 160 churches, and 4,320 members in the Michigan, New York and Pennsylvania, Wisconsin and Illinois, Iowa, Ohio, Vermont, and Minnesota conferences and in the New England Mission, all in North America. The reports were published in the Yearbook for the years 1882 to 1893, and in the General Conference Bulletin for the years 1892 to 1902, and even after the separate publication began, the statistics, at least in summary, continued to be published in the Review and Herald for some years, into the 1920s.

This report devotes 22 pages to the main table, which gives 35 items of information about church membership, contributions, church workers, and etc., for each conference, mission, union, and division. The remaining pages provide historical statistics, departmental statistics, and summary tables.

Anthony, Theodore

ANTHONY, THEODORE (c. 1838—1895+?). First Seventh-day Adventist missionary in Turkey. He was a Greek of Turkish speech and nationality, born in Asia Minor. After his conversion in California (1888) he sold his business and returned to Turkey (1889) at his own expense to spread his faith. When his money was spent he made his living at his shoemaker's trade. He met violent opposition and was imprisoned repeatedly, most often at the instigation of other Christians. But he made a number of converts, including Z. G. Baharian, who became a minister. Anthony's first name is mentioned as Theodore by his associate, Baharian (Review and Herald 69:390, June 21, 1892), and in the 1894 Yearbook; references to him as R. S. Anthony appear to indicate confusion with R. S. Anthony of South Africa, a colporteur who became a physician.

Antichrist

ANTICHRIST. A word appearing only in Christian contexts, and in the NT only in 1 John 2:18, 22; 4:3; 2 John 7; hence probably coined by the author of these Epistles. In these passages the term has a historical application to false teachers, especially Gnostics (cf. 1 John 4:2, 3), in the churches of Asia Minor in the last part of the first century, who appear to have taught the Docetic doctrine that Christ was only an appearance and not truly human. However, the theme of an antichrist is much broader, and the term has been used to refer to powers that set themselves in opposition to the plan of salvation (cf. Ellen G. White, in SDACom 7:950). The figure of a great antagonist of God appears elsewhere, for example in 2 Thess. 2:1—4 and in the prophecies of Revelation. Repeatedly Christ is portrayed as victor over this power at His second coming (2 Thess. 2:8; Rev. 17:14; 19:19, 20).

The concept of a supernatural and primeval antagonist of Yahweh is found in the OT in figures such as leviathan, Rahab, and the multiheaded dragon (as in Isa. 27:1). This antagonist is both primeval and eschatological, and is symbolic of Satan (see SDADic 278, 649, 901). Similar figures are carried on into Jewish apocalyptic; thus in the Dead Sea scrolls two personalities appear oriented against God—the Evil Priest and the Man of the Lie (oldest evidence probably in 4Q Test). Possibly these parallel, negatively, the two messianic figures also found in that literature, the messiahs of Aaron and Israel, and thus may have been a kind of “anti-messiah” or “antichrist.”

In Christian history the epithet “antichrist” has been applied to a variety of historical personages and institutions, for example, to Nero, to various popes and emperors, and to vague figures expected to arise in the East. Not infrequently he has been anticipated as a Jew from the tribe of Dan. The identification with the papacy goes back at least to Archbishop Eberhard II of Salzburg (1200—1246), during the controversy between Frederick II and Gregory IX. A similar point of view was popular among the spiritual Franciscans, influenced by the prophetic interpretations of Joachim of Floris (who expected the antichrist to be a false, heretical pope). John Wycliffe and Jan Hus adopted this interpretation, which appears also among the Waldenses. With the Reformation the idea that the papacy was the antichrist became a general Protestant tenet. Luther wrote it into the Articles of Schmalkald (1537). It remained a characteristic article of Protestant prophetic interpretation from the sixteenth to the nineteenth centuries.

Seventh-day Adventists similarly have applied the word “antichrist” to the papacy (for example, J. N. Andrews, in Signs of the Times 7:463, Oct. 13, 1881). They call “spiritualism” the “manifestation of antichrist” (PP 686). They regard Satan, the author of rebellion in heaven, as the antichrist par excellence (9T 229, 230), and identify him as the “mystery of iniquity” (TM 365; cf. 2 Thess. 2:7), who will claim to be God and deceive people by his miracles (5T 698; 6T 14; 8T 27, 28; 9T 16; TM 62, 364, 365; GC 624; SDACom 7:975).

Antillian Adventist University

ANTILLIAN ADVENTIST UNIVERSITY (Universidad Adventista de las Antillas). A coeducational boarding school operated by the Antillian Union Conference in the environs of Mayagüez, Puerto Rico. The 1992 college enrollment was 854. Total school staff numbered 150. Instruction is given in Spanish. Secondary accreditation has been granted by the Puerto Rican Department of Education. The nursing and elementary education programs are accredited by the Puerto Rican Council on Higher Education, and with the Commission of Higher Education of the Middle States Association. In 1964 the General Conference gave its approval for the offering of full college work in liberal arts. At that time, degrees were being offered in the fields of religion and general, primary, and secondary education; it offered junior college courses in Bible instructors' training, and in commercial and secretarial fields. The school is noted for the cosmopolitan composition of its student body.

Antillian Adventist University in Puerto Rico is a successor of the Antillian College that operated at Santa Clara, Cuba, from 1955 to 1961, when because of political conditions in Cuba the college department was transferred to Puerto Rico (see Cuba Adventist Seminary).

Seventh-day Adventist educational work in Puerto Rico began in 1920 with the establishment of a school in Aibonito (see Puerto Rico). In 1946 a 12-grade academy was established in Santurce, Puerto Rico (see [Metropolitan Adventist Academy \[Puerto Rico\]](#)). This school, called Puerto Rico Academy, was moved in 1957 to a 284-acre (115-hectare) site near Mayagüez, a port and industrial city in the extreme western part of Puerto Rico.

In May 1961 the school was authorized to offer the college courses formerly offered at Antillian College in Santa Clara, Cuba, and in September 1961 began to function under the name of Puerto Rico Adventist College. In March 1962 its name was changed to Antillian College, and the institution was recognized as the advanced school in the Spanish-Caribbean area of the Inter-American Division. In August 1989 the Higher Education Council in Puerto Rico authorized the name Antillean Adventist University.

Antinomianism

ANTINOMIANISM. From anti, “against,” and nomos, “law,” and meaning an attitude of hostility toward law, specifically, of Christians toward the Law, including the Decalogue. Traces of antinomianism were evident among Gnostic Manicheans of the third century, and throughout the Middle Ages. It originated as a distinct theological phenomenon with Johannes Agricola (1492—1566), in Germany, whose views were condemned by the Formula of Concord in 1577. During the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries it appeared in England, where its advocates were known as “the Ranters.” It is found today in certain forms of dispensationalism.

The antithesis of antinomianism is nomism, which manifests itself as legalism, that is, the idea that salvation can be obtained by strict compliance with legal requirements instead of by faith in Jesus Christ. Seventh-day Adventists believe that legalism and antinomianism are equally contrary to the spirit of the gospel. They see the Ten Commandment law on the one hand, and grace on the other hand, not as mutually exclusive, but as complementary (Rom. 1:17; 3:31; 5:1; 7:12). To SDAs, salvation is by grace alone, but obedience to all of God’s revealed will, including the Decalogue, is the fruit of faith (see DA 126). The function of the Decalogue is to convict of sin, but law has no power to pardon. Pardon comes exclusively by justification through faith in Christ (Review and Herald 3:24 , June 10, 1852). See Law; Law and Grace; Righteousness by Faith.

Antofagasta Adventist Academy

ANTOFAGASTA ADVENTIST ACADEMY (Colegio Adventista de Antofagasta). A secondary school located in the North Chile Mission territory. It began functioning as a secondary school in 1990 with 45 students enrolled. From 1990 to 1993, 225 students have attended classes at the academy. There are 15 teachers serving in a school building that has three floors and a cellar. The small library is limited to 645 volumes.

Aore Adventist High School

AORE ADVENTIST HIGH SCHOOL. A coeducational boarding school situated at Aore, Vanuatu. The 1993 enrollment was 252.

The school opened on Oct. 27, 1927, as the Aore training School, a training institution for national teachers and missionaries, with 25 students. After the land was cleared, indigenous-style houses were built for the students. In 1928 J. C. Radley arrived as engineer, builder, and sawmiller, and instructed the students in these lines of work.

About 1950 the institution became known as the Parker Missionary School, in honor of C. H. Parker, the pioneer Seventh-day Adventist missionary to the New Hebrides.

During the visit in 1955 of Sir Christopher Cox (the adviser on education in the colonies to the British government), warm commendation was given to the mission for the high standard of the school.

Until the end of 1972 the school offered a full primary curriculum and only one year of high school study. At the beginning of 1974 the primary school was removed from the campus. Simultaneously the name was changed to Aore Adventist High School. Five years of high school study are now offered and the sixth senior year is soon to be added.

Apocrypha

APOCRYPHA. A term used by Protestants of a group of writings found in the Septuagint and the Vulgate (with minor differences), which do not appear in the Hebrew canon of Scripture. Catholics designate at least 12 of these books as “deuterocanonical” and use “Apocrypha” to refer to the Judeo-Christian religious writings between 200 B.C. and A.D. 200 that Protestants generally refer to as the “pseudepigrapha.”

Originally the Apocrypha appeared in the King James Version, but in the nineteenth century the Bible societies insisted on removing these books from the Bibles they printed, and it became customary to omit them from most printings of this version.

Seventh-day Adventists, though recognizing some historical and literary value in the Apocrypha, agree with Protestants generally in denying that it is either inspired or an authoritative source of doctrine.

Apostasy

APOSTASY. See Church Discipline.

Apostate Movements

APOSTATE MOVEMENTS. Since the beginning of the Seventh-day Adventist Church various offshoots from it have appeared. Dr. J. H. Kellogg and prominent ministers such as A. T. Jones, D. M. Canright, and A. F. Ballenger, who left the SDA Church, did not lead organized movements of their own, although they did disagree with, and even oppose, some of the denomination's teachings and policies. For information concerning these persons, see their biographical sketches. The following offshoot organizations, listed here in the order of the dates of their rise, are discussed in other articles: the Messenger Party and "Age to Come" Defection (1853—1855); the Hope of Israel and Marion Party (1858—1863); the SDA Reform Movement—German (1915); the Reformed SDAs—Rowenite (1916); the Shepherd's Rod movement, or Davidian SDAs (1929); the United Sabbath Day Adventists (1930).

Apples of Gold Library

APPLES OF GOLD LIBRARY (1893—1915; monthly until October 1899, then quarterly; after 1903 irregular; PPPA; partial files at AU, LLU, LSU, PUC, R&H, UC, CoUC). A series of small pamphlets (4 to 32 pages) dealing with health, temperance, religious liberty, and doctrine designed as helps to personal evangelism. The small size—3½" x 6" (8.9 cm. x 15.2 cm.)—made it possible to enclose the pamphlets with personal correspondence. There were 97 titles in this series. It was listed in the Yearbooks up to 1908 as a periodical and afterward only as a collection of tracts. It was discontinued in 1915. Some of its titles, such as "How Esther Read Her Bible," were included in other series. Among those serving on the editorial committee were M. C. Wilcox, W. N. Glenn, C. M. Snow, O. A. Tait, M. H. Brown, H. H. Hall, J. F. Beatty, and A.J.S. Bourdeau.

Araki, Ai

ARAKI, AI (1890—1982). Born in Japan, she was blinded in her teens. She was a believer in Tenrikyo, a branch of Shintoism, when she met Shu Kuniya, one of the first SDA ministers in Japan. Four years later at the age of 30 she became a paid Bible instructor. In the midst of World War II, with the church in disrepute, Ai, along with 41 Seventh-day Adventist lay and church leaders, was arrested. Most were imprisoned, but Ai had her Braille Bible confiscated and was ordered not to speak about Christianity. She and others did their best to contact the scattered members, praying for them and repeating memorized scriptures to them. The church in her city of Kagoshima was locked, but Ai continued to meet with the flock when she could. At the end of the war hers was the only congregation in Japan to remain virtually intact.

Archaeology, Biblical

ARCHAEOLOGY, BIBLICAL. The scientific study of material remains of human life and activity relating to the Bible or Bible times.

History and Purpose. The purpose of biblical archaeology is the recovery of the history, culture, and religion of the ancient peoples of all Bible lands from Persia in the east to Italy in the west, with special interest in Palestine and the neighboring regions of Egypt, Syria, and Mesopotamia, which played a major role in Bible history. The archaeological exploration of Egypt began in 1798, when 120 artists and scientists accompanied Napoleon on his Egyptian campaign to study and report on Egypt's ancient remains. Exploration in Assyria began in 1842 with the excavation of Nineveh by the French consul E. Botta; and that of Palestine, with topographical explorations conducted by the American scholar Edward Robinson, in 1838.

Hand in hand with the fieldwork of excavation went the recovery of dead languages, such as the deciphering of Egyptian hieroglyphic script by J. François Champollion in 1822, and of Babylonian cuneiform writing by Henry Rawlinson and others around the middle of the nineteenth century. Since that time several other ancient scripts and languages have been recovered. Thus a wealth of ancient literature has become available for study, including historical records and annals, religious and mythological texts, prayers and hymns, laws, and documents of a judicial, economic, and scientific character.

Excavations carried on at hundreds of sites in virtually every area of the ancient Bible lands have uncovered cities, temples, palaces, tombs, and graves, and brought to light objects of daily use such as weapons and tools, musical instruments, and works of art, as well as tens of thousands of written texts. Many biblical cities—for example, Babylon, Jerusalem, Nineveh, Shushan, Shechem, and Bethel—have been diligently explored. All of this—the labors of the field archaeologist and those of the scholar who deciphers and publishes ancient texts—has provided a veritable wealth of information about Bible times and thus about the Bible itself. It has clarified numerous formerly obscure passages of Scripture, supplemented information provided by the Bible, and confirmed many historical statements. Biblical archaeology thus has a threefold purpose and value for students of the Bible: 1. It provides contemporary illustrations of customs and practices mentioned in the Bible and clarifies obscure statements. 2. It furnishes much supplementary material, especially to the historical portions. 3. It corroborates the accuracy of the Bible record.

Seventh-day Adventist Interest in Biblical Archaeology. For more than a century Seventh-day Adventists have taken note of archaeological discoveries that tended to confirm the credibility of the Scriptures. Beginning with volume 10 (1857), the Review and Herald occasionally carried articles and notes of archaeological news, taken mostly from newspapers and therefore not always altogether reliable. Sometimes articles written by prominent scholars were reprinted. Of these, the earliest appeared in the issue for Apr. 29, 1884 (pp. 275—277). It was written by the American Assyriologist William Hayes Ward for the Sunday School Times, from which it was reprinted. Later, when archaeological material became more plentiful, series of articles, sometimes illustrated with pictures, appeared in SDA journals. One of these was M. E. Kern's series of seven articles entitled "The Bible and the Ancient Monuments," which ran in the Review and Herald during August and September 1905 and covered archaeological discoveries in Egypt, Babylonia, Assyria, and Palestine.

Writers of SDA books also made use of new historical knowledge obtained through archaeological discoveries. For instance, in his earliest editions of Thoughts on the Book of Daniel, Uriah Smith referred to King Belshazzar of Dan. 5 as a grandson of Nebuchadnezzar. In reply to a reader's query, he explained in the Review and Herald for Mar. 11, 1873, that he had followed Prideaux in equating Belshazzar with Nabonidus, known from ancient sources as the last king of Babylon. In 1888, however, he published an article in the Review and Herald for Dec. 4 of that year in which he referred to texts found at Tell el-Muqaiyar (Ur) indicating that Belshazzar was Nabonidus' firstborn son. He therefore accepted a coregency for Nabonidus and Belshazzar during the last years of Babylon's history. Later editions of Smith's work on Daniel set forth this new information.

Books on ancient history and the fulfillment of prophecy such as those by A. T. Jones, which enjoyed great popularity among SDAs around the turn of the century, also utilized new historical knowledge in a limited way, but were based mainly on classical Greek and Roman sources.

The first book of a purely archaeological nature written by an SDA was W. W. Prescott's The Spade and the Bible (Revell, 1933), a book of 216 pages. For many years an educator and later an editor of the Review and Herald, the author made use of a large amount of archaeological material that shed light on various phases of Old Testament history. Since the author was neither a professional archaeologist nor a linguist, and had to rely on secondhand sources for information, it is no surprise to find the material in his book not everywhere reliable, and, of course, rather out-of-date. The same can be said with regard to other, usually small, books on archaeology issued by SDA publishing houses, such as Roy F. Cottrell's The Spade and the Book (1947). Not directly on the subject of archaeology, but utilizing archaeological documents, was a book on the chronology of Judah and Israel, The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings (1951; revised 1965), written by Edwin R. Thiele, of Emmanuel Missionary College, and published by the University of Chicago. Unlike the preceding above-mentioned books, which were written on the popular level, this was a scholarly treatment (based on his doctoral dissertation) harmonizing the biblical figures for the reigns with the generally accepted Assyrian and Babylonian chronology, and it achieved recognition among Old Testament scholars and contributed to increased respect for the accuracy of the Hebrew historians.

Archaeology and the SDA Theological Seminary. The SDA Theological Seminary, founded in 1934 as "The Advanced Bible School," lists Lynn H. Wood for the first time in its 1937 catalog as "Professor [of] Eastern Antiquities and Archaeology." During the following seven years various archaeological courses were continuously offered, but in 1944 a regular Department of Archaeology and History of Antiquity was organized with Wood as chair. This enabled students to obtain their master's degree in this field of studies. In 1951 Siegfried H. Horn became chair of this department, and in 1952 Wood retired from active teaching. When the seminary was reorganized in 1955, Horn became chair of the Department of OT Studies, but remained professor of archaeology and history of antiquity and continued to devote most of his time to the teaching of courses in this area. The first master's degree with a major in archaeology and history of antiquity was conferred in 1947; by 1967 a total of 43 such degrees had been conferred. Beginning in 1966, the Master of Arts in Religion with a concentration in archaeology was taken over by the School of Graduate Studies of Andrews University.

In 1975 Gerhard Hasel was asked to direct the Ph.D./Th.D. program at the seminary. One of the cognate areas of this new doctoral program, Biblical Archaeology and History of Antiquity, has been selected by a large number of doctoral students since this program began. Also, a number of doctoral dissertations have dealt specifically with archaeological topics. These include "The Hellenistic and Roman Strata of Hesban," by Larry A. Mitchell (1980), "Archaeology in Adventist Literature Between 1937—1980," by Lloyd A. Willis (1982), and "The Byzantine Strata of Hesban," by J. Bjornar Storfjell (1983). Most of these dissertations have been published by Andrews University Press and the Institute of Archaeology.

Not only has archaeology expanded in the seminary's academic program, but Andrews University has provided important research facilities for archaeology. In 1970 an archaeological museum was opened on the campus of Andrews University. In 1978 it was named the Horn Archaeology Museum in honor of its founder and first curator. The museum was housed in the James White Library until 1982, when it moved into its own three-story building (the former headquarters building for the Lake Union Conference and the Geoscience Research Institute) in close proximity to the SDA Theological Seminary. The museum contains some 7,000 artifacts of art and utility from the ancient Near East. Many objects such as coins, pottery, cuneiform tablets, sculptures, tools, weapons, figurines, jewelry, seals, and glass vessels have come to this collection through purchase or as gifts. Nearly 2,000 artifacts were obtained during the archaeological expeditions to Heshbon. These objects serve as visual aids for a better understanding of certain biblical passages of a historical, religious, or cultural nature. This museum houses also the Hartford Seminary Foundation Cuneiform Tablet Collection, consisting of about 3,000 ancient clay tablets ranging from the Sumerian period to Neo-Babylonian times. They are being studied with the aim of eventually publishing their contents. Curators of the Horn Archaeology Museum have included Lawrence T. Geraty, J. Bjornar Storfjell, and David Merling.

In 1980 the board of trustees established the Andrews University Institute of Archaeology, under the administration of the theological Seminary, to coordinate and direct the archaeological programs and activities of the university. The institute is housed in the same building as the Horn Archaeology Museum and contains offices, workrooms, storage rooms, a darkroom, and the Horn Archaeological Library. Its first director was Lawrence T. Geraty, who served in this capacity from 1980 until 1986. William H. Shea served as director from 1986 to 1987, and was followed by J. Bjornar Storfjell, who assumed this role from 1987 to 1988. Randall W. Younker has served as director of the institute since 1988. In 1991 P. David Merling and Øystein S. LaBianca were appointed as associate directors of the institute. Ralph Hendrix was appointed that same year to serve as managing editor of archaeological publications.

Seventh-day Adventist Archaeologists. For further information on Lynn H. Wood (1887—1976) and Siegfried H. Horn (1908—1993), see Wood, Lynn H., and Horn, Siegfried H. degree, and his Ph.D. in Hebrew Bible and Syro-Palestinian Archaeology from Harvard University under G. Ernest Wright in 1972. His dissertation was on “Third and Fourth Century B.C. Ostraca From Khirbet el Kom.” From 1972 to 1985 Geraty served as professor of archaeology and history of antiquity at the SDA Theological Seminary. From 1976 to 1985 Geraty also functioned as the curator of the Horn Archaeology Museum. In 1981 he founded the Institute of Archaeology at Andrews University and served as its first director from 1981 until 1985. He was on the Heshbon dig staff from its beginning and spent a year in Jerusalem (1970—1971), during which time he participated in several archaeological expeditions sponsored by the Albright Institute of Archaeological Research, where he served as Thayer fellow. Geraty directed the 1974 and 1976 excavation seasons at Hesban, Jordan (taking over this position from Horn); functioned as senior adviser for archeological investigations at Ein-Gedi, Israel (1979), Tell Jalul, Jordan (1992), and initiated the Madaba Plains Project, Jordan, as senior project director in 1984. Geraty has continued in this role during the subsequent excavation seasons in 1987, 1989, 1992, and 1994. In 1985 Geraty accepted an invitation to become president of Atlantic Union College with the rank of professor of archaeology. He continued in this position until 1993, when he accepted the offer to become president of La Sierra University with the rank of professor of archaeology. In spite of his duties as a president of an academic institution, Geraty continued to be active in scholarly circles, serving on numerous committees for the American Schools of Oriental Research and as vice president and acting president of the American Center of Oriental Research in Amman, Jordan. He has served as coeditor for both the Hesban and Madaba Plains final publication series and has published numerous articles in church and scholarly journals.

Lawrence T. Geraty (1940—) received his B.A. in Theology from Pacific Union College, his M.A. in Old Testament from Andrews University, where he also received a B.D.

Larry G. Herr (1946—) received his Ph.D. in Near Eastern Studies from Harvard University in 1971. His dissertation dealt with scripts of ancient northwest Semitic seals. Herr taught at the Seventh-day Adventist Theological Seminary, Far East, from 1978 to 1984. Since 1984 he has been a professor at Canadian Union College. Herr has done extensive archaeological fieldwork. He was an area supervisor at Hesban during the 1974 and 1976 seasons, director of the Amman Airport Project in 1976, chief archaeologist of the Hesban North Church Project in 1978, and chief archaeologist and director of excavations at Tell el-^CUmeiri during the 1984, 1987, 1989, and 1992 seasons. Herr also is a codirector of the Madaba Plains Project and wrote the excavation manual for that project. Herr has been active in professional archaeological circles, especially the American Schools of Oriental Research (ASOR), where he has served as an editor for some of their publication series. Herr also has been an American Schools of Oriental Research (ASOR) fellow (1974—1975) and a resident scholar at the Albright Institute of Archaeological Research in Jerusalem (1993—1994). Herr has numerous publications in church and scholarly journals and has served as senior coeditor of the final publication series for the Madaba Plains Project.

Øystein S. LaBianca (1949—) received his Ph.D. from Brandeis University in 1987 in anthropology. He has been a professor of anthropology at Andrews University since 1980. He also served as chair of the Behavioral Science Department from 1981 to 1992. With Geraty, LaBianca helped establish the Institute of Archaeology at Andrews and initiated the Madaba Plains Project in Jordan. In 1991 he was appointed associate director of the Institute of Archaeology at Andrews University. LaBianca’s archaeological fieldwork includes serving as staff anthropologist (initially with Robert Little of Andrews University) for the Hesban excavations (1971, 1973, 1974, and 1976 seasons), chief anthropologist of the Wadi Tumilat Project in Egypt in 1979—1985, and director of regional survey for the Madaba Plains Project during the 1984, 1987, 1989, and 1992 seasons. He also has overseen the ecolab and initiated careful analysis of bone remains that provided the foundation for his food systems theory. LaBianca has been active in professional archaeological and anthropological societies, in which he has organized and chaired several sessions. He has been an Albright fellow at the American Center for Oriental Research (ACOR) in Amman, Jordan. He also has been active in archaeological publications. In addition to publishing numerous scholarly articles, he is coeditor for both the Hesban and Madaba Plains final publication series. His dissertation “Sedentarization and Nomadization” (vol. 1 of the Hesban series) provided an anthropological framework for interpreting the history of Heshbon.

Randall W. Younker (1953—) graduated from Pacific Union College with a B.A. in religion in 1975 and an M.A. in biology from that same school in 1977. After additional graduate studies in archaeology and anthropology at California State University, Sacramento, and Andrews University, Younker joined the Old Testament Department of the SDA Theological Seminary in 1986 as an assistant professor of Old Testament and Biblical Archaeology. That same year, he was appointed director of the Institute of Archaeology at Andrews University. Since then Younker has continued his doctoral work in Near Eastern archaeology at the University of Arizona under William G. Dever. His archaeological fieldwork includes five seasons on the staff of Tell Dor in Israel (1980—1984), staff ecologist and surveyor for Tell el-cUmeiri in 1984 and 1987, cordirector of the Madaba Plains Project (MPP), in charge of excavations at Tell Jawa and El-Dreijat in 1989, associate director of excavations at Tell Gezer, Israel, with William G. Dever in 1990, and director of excavations at the MMP’s newest site in Jordan, Tell Jalul in 1992. In addition to fieldwork, Younker served on the board of the Albright Institute of Archaeological Research in Jerusalem as a corporate trustee for the 1992—1994 term. Younker has coedited two books and published more than 30 scholarly articles and reviews dealing with archaeology.

Douglas R. Clark (1947—) received his doctorate in 1984 from Vanderbilt University. He has served as Old Testament professor at Southwestern Adventist College (1975—1987) and Walla Walla College (1987—). Since 1990 he has been dean of the School of Theology at Walla Walla and professor of Old Testament and Archaeology. Clark has been active in archaeological fieldwork. He served on the staff of the Hesban excavation as a square supervisor during the 1973 and 1976 seasons and was a field supervisor at Tell el-cUmeiri during the 1984, 1987, 1989, and 1992 seasons. He has overseen the excavation of the most extensive ancient fortification system in Jordan. Clark also has been the consortium director for the Madaba Plains Project in Jordan. He has published a number of archaeological articles in both church and scholarly journals and is a contributor to the Madaba Plains Project final publication series.

David P. Merling (1948—) received his B.A. and M.Div. from Andrews University, where he also has pursued doctoral studies with an emphasis in archaeology. From 1984 to 1986 Merling was the assistant curator of the Horn Archaeological Museum. Since 1986 he has been the curator for the museum and assistant professor of Archaeology and History of Antiquity at the SDA Theological Seminary. In 1991 he was appointed an associate director of the Institute of Archaeology at that institution. Merlings’ archaeological fieldwork includes serving as a square supervisor at Hesban in 1974 and at Tell el-^cUmeiri during the 1984 and 1987 seasons, field supervisor at Tell Gezer in 1990, and associate director at Tell Jalul in 1992. Merling has been responsible for completing the renovation of the Horn Archaeology Museum. He has also been responsible for setting up the Horn Archaeological Library at the Institute of Archaeology, a research library with more than 5,000 scholarly volumes. Merling has published several articles on archaeology in church and scholarly journals. Most recently he has served as coeditor and contributor of the 25-year anniversary volume of the Hesban excavations published by the Institute of Archaeology at Andrews University.

Boguslaw Dabrowski (1964—) is a doctoral student in archaeology at the University of Krakow in Poland. He teaches at Polish Spiritual Seminary, Podkowa Lesna, Poland. His fieldwork includes excavation with the Madaba Plains Project during the 1987, 1989, and 1992 seasons. After the 1992 season Dabrowski was appointed field director of the tomb excavation for Tell el-cUmeiri. He founded the Levant Foundation Poland in order to further Polish archaeological research in the Middle East. He also has published several scholarly articles in both Polish and English.

S. Douglas Waterhouse (1931—) completed his Ph.D. in 1965 at the University of Michigan. His dissertation is entitled “Syria in the Amarna Age: A Borderland Between Conflicting Empires.” He has taught at Andrews University since 1963. His archaeological fieldwork includes participation in all five seasons at Hesban and the 1992 season at Tell el-cUmeiri. Waterhouse was responsible for starting the Hesban survey, which was then taken up by others, and the excavation of the Roman period tombs near Hesban. He has published several articles on archaeology in various journals, including Ministry and Andrews University Seminary Studies. He also is publishing an article on the Hesban tombs for the final publication series.

J. Bjornar Storfjell (1944—) received his Ph.D. from Andrews University in 1983. His dissertation dealt with the Byzantine strata at Hesban. Since 1980 Storfjell has been a professor of archaeology and history of antiquity in the Old Testament Department of the SDA Theological Seminary. He also has held both the position of curator of the Horn Archaeology Museum and director of the Institute of Archaeology at Andrews University. His archaeological fieldwork includes staff positions with the Hesban excavation during the 1976 season, the Tell el-Hesi Project in 1981, administrative director of the Tell el-^cUmeiri excavation in 1987, and ceramicist for the Wadi es-Siah Project during the 1988—1989 seasons. In addition to various articles he has written for church and scholarly journals, Storfjell’s dissertation on the Byzantine period at Hesban has been published as part of the Hesban final publications series by Andrews University Press and the Institute of Archaeology.

Since 1972 Loma Linda University also has become involved in archaeological fieldwork by participating in the excavations of Caesarea, Israel, as one of the sponsoring institutions of a consortium. Kenneth L. Vine (1923—), chair of the Department of Religion of the College of Arts and Sciences (now retired), and James H. Stirling (1921—), associate chair of the Department of Sociology and Anthropology of the same college, took part in the excavations. Vine was granted a Ph.D. in Near Eastern studies from the University of Michigan in 1965 with a dissertation entitled “The Establishment of Baal at Ugarit.” He had participated also in the excavations of biblical Ai in 1966, and was president of Middle East College from 1965 to 1971. Vine continued to participate in the Caesarea expedition again in 1974, while Stirling transferred to the Heshbon expedition, which Loma Linda University also supported during the 1974 season.

Vine's publications include "Byzantine Written Lamps From Caesarea Maritima," in the Robert Bull Festschrift (1986); "Ceramic Lamps From the Hippodrome of Caesarea Maritima, 1974," in the Horn Festschrift (1986), and "Terracotta Lamps of Caesarea Maritima, 1971—1976," preliminary report in The Joint Expedition to Caesarea Maritima (1982).

Another important SDA archaeological scholar is William H. Shea (1932—), who received his Ph.D. in ancient Near Eastern studies from the University of Michigan in 1976. He joined the Old Testament faculty of the SDA Theological Seminary at Andrews in 1972. In addition to various Old Testament classes, Shea taught courses in ancient Near Eastern history, archaeology, and languages. During the 1985—1986 academic year, Shea also directed the Institute of Archaeology. Since 1986 Shea has been an associate director of the Biblical Research Institute at the General Conference of Seventh-day Adventists. His responsibilities there have included, among other things, continued research on important biblical, historical, and archaeological issues and the direction of biblical studies and archaeological tours of the Holy Land out of the church's Jerusalem study center. In addition to field seasons at Gezer (1966—1967) and Hesban (1971), Shea has written extensively on archaeological topics in almost every major scholarly journal dealing with ancient Near Eastern studies. Some of his important publications include "Sennacherib's Second Palestinian Campaign," in Journal of Biblical Literature; "The Eblaite Letter to Hamazi," in Oriens Antiquus (1984); "Date of the Exodus," in the International Standard Bible Encyclopedia (1982); "Menahem and Tiglath-Pileser III," in the Journal of Near Eastern Studies (1978); and "The Date and Significance of the Samaria Ostraca," in the Israel Exploration Journal (1977).

Paul F. Bork (1924—) received his Ph.D. from the California Graduate School of Theology in 1971. He began his college teaching career at Pacific Union College in 1967, where he was a professor of Old Testament and Archaeology. He chaired the Religion Department at PUC from 1986 to 1989. Bork also participated in several archaeological prects in the Middle East, including the 1971 and 1972 seasons at Tell Gezer, the 1976 season at Mount Zion area in the old city of Jerusalem, and the 1978 and 1979 seasons at the City of David. Bork also began and directed the PUC Religion Department extension program at Jerusalem, which continued for five years until taken over by the General Conference. Bork followed Horn's tradition of making archaeological discoveries accessible to the average SDA layperson and minister by numerous publications in the Adventist Review and Ministry magazines. He also published several books on archaeology including The World of Moses (1978) and Out of the City, Across the Sands (1982).

Udo Worschech (1947—) studied theology and biblical archaeology at Andrews University (M.A., 1971). He has taught at the Marienhoehe SDA Theological Seminary, Darmstadt, Germany, since 1972 and the J. W. Goethe-Universitat since 1984. He directed several seasons of excavations at Tell Balu'a, an Iron Age Moabite site in Jordan. His publications include Die Beziehungen Moabs zu Israel und Agypten in der Eisenzeit, a scholarly work on the emergence of the Moabite polity in Jordan, and Das Land Jenseits des Jordan: Biblische Archaologie in Jordanien, a popular work on biblical archaeology in Jordan.

Archaeological Fieldwork. Beginning with the summer of 1968, Andrews University sponsored an archaeological expedition to biblical Heshbon in Jordan. The first three seasons of excavations (1968, 1971, 1973), which were supported also by the American Center for Oriental Research in Amman and by Calvin Theological Seminary in Grand Rapids, Michigan, were directed by Siegfried Horn.

The excavations brought to light remains of the ancient city of Heshbon from the twelfth century to the fourteenth century A.D. Among them were parts of the ancient city's fortifications; a huge water reservoir, probably one of the pools mentioned in Song of Solomon 7:4; the remains of a Roman cult center consisting of a via sacra, a monumental stairway leading to a temple on the summit of the mound, and the foundations of that temple; ruins of the Christian church of the early Christian centuries when Heshbon was the seat of a bishop; and remains of later structures, including the only complete Mamluk bath ever found in Jordan.

Several early Roman and Byzantine tombs, some containing rich contents, were also discovered and excavated, among them two family tombs of the first century A.D., each closed with a rolling stone. The excavations have brought to light no remains earlier than the twelfth century B.C., which leads to the conclusion that the Heshbon of King Sihon of the Amorites, conquered by the Israelites under Moses, must have been located at another site, from which it was transferred after its conquest by the Israelites to the site that for the past 3,000 years has carried the name of Heshbon (Esbus in Greek and Latin, and Hesbân in Arabic).

Beginning with the fourth season of excavations (1974), the directorship of the Heshbon expedition was taken over by Lawrence T. Geraty, who was then assistant professor of Old Testament studies at the seminary. Preliminary reports on the results of the Heshbon expedition have regularly been published in popular form in the Adventist Review, and since 1969 in a more scientific form in the Andrews University Seminary Studies. About half of the dozen or so final report volumes of the Hesban Project have been published by Andrews University Press and the Institute of Archaeology.

The successor to the Heshbon excavation, and the first project to be coordinated by the new Institute of Archaeology at Andrews University, was the Madaba Plains Project, begun in 1984 with additional seasons in 1987, 1989, 1992, and 1994. Leadership of this project includes Lawrence Geraty, senior project director; Larry Herr, director of the Tell el-Umeiri excavations; Øystein LaBianca, director of hinterland surveys; Randall Younker, director of the Tell Jalul excavation; and Doug Clark, consortium director. The archaeological findings of the Madaba Plains Project include impressive settlement remains from Tell el-Umeiri, including an Iron Age II (Assyrian and Babylonian periods) citadel and fortification systems, a Late Bronze Age occupation, and an Early Bronze Age (patriarchal period) residential area. The survey discovered numerous Iron Age farmsteads with features similar to those described in Isaiah 5:1—7. Important Ammonite inscriptions have been found, including one that has the impression of a servant of Baalis, an Ammonite king mentioned in Jeremiah 40:14 (discovered by Lloyd Willis, of Southwestern Adventist College). Another Ammonite inscription testifies to the presence of an Ammonite province during the Persian period. New excavations at Jalul have found evidence of the city gateways of the ninth and eighth centuries B.C., as well as evidence of destruction from the premonarchal period (Iron Age I). There also is evidence of Late Bronze Age occupation from the period of Israel's wandering and conquest.

In addition to the Madaba Plains Project, the Institute of Archaeology sponsored a single season dig at Tell Gezer, Israel, in 1990. Randall Younker and David Merling, along with a number of graduate students from Andrews University, joined William G. Dever and a number of his graduate students from the University of Arizona for this excavation. This dig brought additional evidence for the existence of Solomonic building activity described in 1 Kings 9:17. Specifically, it seems certain that, based on new stratigraphic and ceramic evidence, the famous "six-chambered gateway" and adjoining palace were indeed built by Solomon during the tenth century B.C. This building activity at Gezer was preceded by a dramatic destruction layer that can be associated with the sack of Gezer by an Egyptian pharaoh mentioned in 1 Kings 9:16.

Contribution of SDA Archaeological Scholarship. Careful fieldwork and prompt and unbiased publication of the results have created respect for Andrews University archaeologists on the part of the scholarly community at large. For example, Phil King, former president of the American Schools of Oriental Research, writes in his American Archaeology in the Mideast: A History of the American Schools of Oriental Research (1983): "The archaeology of Jordan owes an extraordinary debt of gratitude to the Hesban expedition, especially for its pioneering efforts in many areas of archaeological research." "Through its field school, Hesban has touched almost every dig in Jordan by serving as the training ground for scores of graduate students, several of whom now direct their own projects." Similarly, William G. Dever, former editor of the Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research (BASOR) and a leading Syro-Palestinian archaeologist, writes: "This combined project has long since become one of the most sophisticated and truly interdisciplinary of all American archaeological excavations in the Middle East. While others talk ad nauseam about 'research design,' 'holistic approaches,' 'total retrieval,' 'ecology,' and the 'new archaeology'... these people do it. The publication of the Hesban excavations has propelled Seventh-day Adventist archaeology—against all the odds—into the very forefront of Near Eastern archaeology" (BASOR 190—191, 1991).

While these accomplishments can give the SDA Church a certain amount of pride, we must never lose sight of the fact that our ultimate goal in pursuing this specialized area of biblical research is to help make God's Word, which gives the world the good news of salvation, more understandable to those of us who are separated by time and distance from the world to which God originally communicated.

Archives

ARCHIVES. The General Conference Archives serves as “the headquarters depository for documents, records, correspondence, publications, photographs, recordings, films, etc., that have historical and cultural value to the Seventh-day Adventist Church, . . . particularly materials produced or collected by the General Conference as an institution” (General Conference Committee minutes, Nov. 8, 1973). Established July 1, 1973, this office functions under the guidance of the Archives and Statistics Committee, chaired by the General Conference secretary. For about 70 years prior to 1973, the statistical secretary of the General Conference preserved special documents and reports, minutes, and printed items, including many of the church’s publications. As early as the 1940s or 1950s, members of the General Conference Secretariat spoke of having an archives, but it was not until late 1972 and early 1973, when urgings of SDA historians and the proposal to develop overseas Ellen G. White-SDA research centers converged, that action was taken to establish a General Conference Archives. The archivist also functions as records manager of the General Conference, and is a consultant for the archival functions of the world divisions and of General Conference institutions.

Records housed at the GC Archives span the years from the 1830s to the present. Most are the files of the General Conference as the central administrative body of the Seventh-day Adventist Church. The vast percentage of the more than 9,000 feet (2,750 meters) of records are available to responsible researchers and church leaders for research use.

At the 1975 General Conference session it was voted to combine Archives with the Statistical Office, henceforth to be known as Archives and Statistics.

F. Donald Yost was archivist from 1973 to 1975. In 1975 he became the director of Archives and Statistics.

Ardmore Adventist Hospital

ARDMORE ADVENTIST HOSPITAL. A general hospital of 104-bed capacity owned and operated by the Oklahoma Conference at Ardmore, Oklahoma, from May 1959 to April 1992. In 1947 Drs. J. B. McConnell, A. W. Truman, Floyd Bates, and Ethel Walker secured the old Von Keller Hospital and incorporated the Ardmore Sanitarium and Hospital as a nonprofit, self-supporting institution.

Although privately owned, the hospital maintained close connections with the church organization. In 1949 the Southwestern Union Conference president and the Oklahoma Conference president were invited to participate in the board meetings, and this participation continued until an arrangement was made in 1957 for the ownership of the hospital to be assumed by the Oklahoma Conference, under the leadership of W. A. Dessain, president.

A new $400,000 hospital building was opened on May 10, 1959. In 1960 a women's auxiliary was organized, whose volunteers from the community donated many hours, performing extra services for the patients. Two workers especially, Mrs. Eldora Taylor of the office staff and Roy M. Johnson of the board, worked untiringly and at personal sacrifice to build up the institution. Early managers and administrators, in the period of private ownership, were William G. Nelson, Robert Trimble, Sam Bailey, W. H. Wineland, and Myron Lysinger.

From 1980 to 1987 Ardmore Adventist Hospital was operated by Adventist Health System/Sunbelt. After that it was managed by the Oklahoma Conference. It was closed in April 1992.

Administrators: Earl Nelson, 1956—1958; Kent Griffin, 1958—1959; Robert E. Trimble, 1959—1962; Charles Martin, 1962—1965; W. V. Wiist, 1965—1971; John Koubs, 1971—1974; James C. Culpepper, 1974—1976; W. C. McConnell, 1976—1977; Sam C. Loewen, 1978—1990; William Straight, 1990—1992.

Argentina

ARGENTINA. A federal republic situated in the southern part of South America. It is bounded on the west by the Andes Mountains, which separate it from Chile; rivers provide a large section of its boundaries with Uruguay, Brazil, Paraguay, and Bolivia on the north and east. It has an area of 1,065,189 square miles (2,758,840 square kilometers), and an estimated population (1994) of 34 million. The inhabitants of Argentina are largely of Latin and Germanic origin, with full-blooded Indians representing less than 1 percent of the population. Illiteracy is low.

More than 90 percent of the people profess Catholicism. The Roman Catholic Church is supported by the state, but all other churches are granted freedom of worship.

Argentina has mountain ranges to the west, extensive plains to the east, and vast plateaus to the south. The climate is moderate, but with the greater part of the rainfall in the east. Two thirds of the country is arid. Because of the scarcity of commodities that arose during the two world wars, light and medium-heavy industries were added to the cattle raising and agriculture that had always been the backbone of the economy.

Historical Background

Historical Background. Argentina probably was discovered by Juan Diaz de Solís, who about 1515 claimed for Spain the Río de la Plata, the estuary at the confluence of the Paraná and Uruguay rivers, on whose bank Buenos Aires is situated. In 1536 Pedro de Mendoza, leader of a large expedition, founded a settlement where the city now stands, which, repeatedly attacked by the Indians, was later abandoned. Eventually the territory of Argentina was settled, not from the Atlantic side but from Peru, by settlers who came from the conquered Inca Empire. Argentina, along with much of the territory of the present republics of Uruguay, Paraguay, and Bolivia, was made subject to the viceroyalty of Peru, and the settlers were forced to trade with Europe by way of Lima. The criollos, the area's inhabitants of Spanish extraction, felt that Spain, through this viceroyalty, intended to exploit their land solely for her benefit. This policy produced smuggling and considerable unrest. Finally, in 1776 the new viceroyalty of Río de la Plata was created for this eastern territory, with the privilege of free commerce with Spain granted to it. The salutary effect of this policy was immediately felt in the increased prosperity of the country.

As part of this viceroyalty, Argentina was under Spanish domination until the beginning of the nineteenth century. On May 25, 1810, a junta consisting of nine men was set up, which professed to rule in the name of the king of Spain, but which actually ruled independently. This pretense was dropped on July 9, 1816, when independence was declared. A series of civil wars disturbed the country for the next 37 years.

In 1853 a national constitution was ratified, which, with certain reforms, is still in force. In spite of political instability since 1930, the religious liberty that was guaranteed by article 14 of the national constitution has not been restricted.

Beginnings of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Beginnings of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Forerunners. Long before Seventh-day Adventists entered Argentina, a book on the second coming of Christ was circulated in the country—La Venida del Mesías en Gloria y Magestad (“The Coming of the Messiah in Glory and Majesty”), written by a Chilean Jesuit, Manuel Lacunza (1731—1801). It was Manuel Belgrano, an Argentinian, who had financed a London edition of Lacunza's book in 1816 for distribution in Argentina. Among those who read this work and were influenced by it was a prominent Argentinian patriot, Francisco Ramos Mexía (1773—1828), who also kept the seventh-day Sabbath, having learned of it through reading the Bible. Ramos Mexía encountered considerable opposition from the Roman clergy when some of his friends joined with him in his beliefs and many Indians living on his estates began to observe the Sabbath. Other prominent men who knew and appreciated Lacunza's book were Dean Gregorio Funes and Domingo Faustino Sarmiento.

Pre-SDA Sabbathkeepers. By 1886 there were two groups of Sabbathkeepers in Argentina, one at the colony of Esperanza and the other at a colony near Reconquista, both in Santa Fe Province. There are at least three slightly different versions of how the group at Esperanza began to observe the Sabbath, and two of how the group near Reconquista became interested in the SDA message. These accounts come from the 1890s after SDAs had entered South America.

Writing from Buenos Aires on Feb. 3, 1892, C. A. Nowlen and E. W. Snyder, who with A. B. Stauffer were the first SDA canvassers in South America, reported: "Before closing we would speak of an experience of Brother Stauffer, who left us three weeks ago for the German colonies of Santa Fe Province. Having notified our brethren at Esperanza of his coming, he was met at the depot on his arrival there and taken to this brother's home. Through the kindness of a German neighbor who acted as an interpreter, he learned something of their history.

"It seems that about three years since, four men there—all heads of families—were at church one Sunday, and taking up the study of the Sabbath question, they soon came to the conclusion that the seventh day is the Sabbath, and at once with their families began its observance. This occurred before they had received a line of literature from the Seventh-day Adventists" (The Home Missionary 4:91, 92, April 1892).

In 1896 Jean Vuilleumier, visiting the Sabbathkeepers at the colony of Esperanza, reported that the "first Sabbathkeeping families" in Argentina had been members of the Baptist Church (Review and Herald 73:527, Aug. 18, 1896). Speaking of the group a few months before, he said: "This is where, 10 or 11 years ago, three heads of families, a Belgian, a Swiss, and a native of Swiss parentage, embraced the Sabbath after reading, in a Baptist paper, an account of Seventh-day Adventist baptisms in Switzerland" (ibid. 73:236, Apr. 14, 1896).

Writing many years later in the Revista Adventista, E. W. Thomann recounted a somewhat different version of these Sabbathkeepers as told to him by Mrs. Anna Dupertuis. He wrote: "In 1885 a group of Swiss-French Baptist colonists living in the vicinity of Felicia in the province of Santa Fe . . . discovered spontaneously, through the study of the Bible, that God commands the keeping, not of Sunday, the first day of the week, but of the Sabbath or seventh day. This subject so impressed them that they could not hide it, and upon being visited by their pastor, Mr. Pablo Besson, they told him of their discovery. However, he did not attach much importance to the subject, and tried in vain to dissuade them from keeping the Sabbath" (translated from Revista Adventista 34:6, June 18, 1934).

Thomann went on to say that Besson informed the group that the SDAs in Switzerland published a periodical in French entitled Les Signes des Temps ("The Signs of the Times"). Their curiosity was aroused by the discovery that they were not the only people who kept the Sabbath, and they begged Besson to send for a copy of Les Signes for them. He finally agreed, with much reluctance, to send for the periodical. Through the influence of this periodical the families of Jules (Julio) Dupertuis, Alberto Arn, and Floris Mathieu soon began observing the Sabbath (Review and Herald 66:710, Nov. 12, 1889). These and the Arnold Pidoux and Dobanton families of Grütly, Santa Fe, were baptized by Vuilleumier in 1896.

Some of the differences in Snyder's, Vuilleumier's, and Thomann's reports may be accounted for through errors in transmission, or possibly through confusing the basic story of how the colonists of Esperanza came to keep the Sabbath with a somewhat similar story of the colonists living near Reconquista.

Concerning the latter group, there are two versions. Relating in 1896 the story of how the Peverini family became Sabbathkeepers, Vuilleumier said: "The husband, Brother Peverini, was a Catholic, but embraced the Sabbath several years ago, after his wife [a Waldensian] had sent for Les Signes, of which she saw mention in the religious organ of the Waldenses, while the journal was opposing the work of Brother Bourdeau and Sister [Ellen G.] White in the Piedmont Valleys. Sister Peverini handed Les Signes to a [Waldensian], Daniel Rostan, 18 miles (29 kilometers) farther north, who also began to keep the Sabbath" (Review and Herald 73:541, Aug. 25, 1896).

A slightly different version of this story is related by N. Z. Town. Writing in 1899, he said that "about 13 years ago" Peverini saw, in a paper that came from Italy, an adverse criticism of Bourdeau, who was then preaching that the end of the world was near, suggesting that if his doctrine be true it hardly seemed necessary for the brethren in Basel to print Les Signes des Temps on such durable paper.

Being an ungodly man, Brother Peverini felt somewhat frightened to hear that the end might be near, and was anxious to see what the paper had to say about the matter, so Mrs. Peverini ordered the French Signs through her brother in Italy, and from their study of the truths presented therein, they began the observance of the true Sabbath (The Missionary Magazine 11:118, March 1899).

The members of both these groups of Sabbathkeepers were baptized into the SDA Church in 1896 by Jean Vuilleumier and Francis (Frank) H. Westphal (Home Missionary, 8:285, 286, December 1896). It appears impossible to determine which of the two groups began to observe the Sabbath first.

First Seventh-day Adventists. Early in 1890 four SDA families, comprising a total of 10 persons, came to Diamante, Entre Ríos Province, from Tampa, Kansas, U.S.A., and formed a colony nearby at Crespo. These were German farmers who had been colonists in Russia and had become SDAs while in the United States. The head of one of these families, Jorge Riffel, had been in Argentina several years before he lived in the United States. When he decided to return to Entre Ríos to share his faith with his neighbors, the families of Osvaldo Frick, Augusto Yanke, and Adam Zimmermann, who had emigrated directly from Russia to the United States, decided to accompany him. On their arrival they were met at Diamante by Reinhardt Hetze, a colonist of the same origin who had become an SDA after hearing something about SDAs in Russia. The next day they held the first Sabbath school service in South America, in a village near Diamante.

During this same year the General Conference assigned funds for beginning the work in South America and named a commission, subordinate to the Board of Foreign Missions, to study methods for beginning work in South America, Mexico, the East Indies, and Africa. It was this commission that sent the three colporteurs, Nowlen, Snyder, and Stauffer, who arrived in Buenos Aires in December 1891. They were joined a little later by a convert, Lionel Brooking. Over them was R. B. Craig, sent from the United States in March 1893 to take charge of the canvassing work. One of the members of the commission, L. C. Chadwick, made a trip to Argentina in July 1892. It was his reports and letters from the five colporteurs and from the SDA families in Entre Ríos and Santa Fe that resulted in the sending of Westphal, the first ordained SDA minister in South America. His task was to organize the East Coast Mission (Argentina, Uruguay, Paraguay, and Brazil). Arriving at La Plata, Buenos Aires, on Aug. 18, 1894, and leaving his family in Buenos Aires, he left for Entre Ríos Aug. 26, 1894, where on Sept. 9, 1894, he organized the first SDA church in what is now the South American Division (one of the earliest on that continent), in Crespo with 36 members. The following month he organized two other churches, one in San Cristóbal, Santa Fe, with 13 members, in the home of the Mangold family, and the other in Buenos Aires with 12 members. In 1895 and 1896 other ministers, Jean Vuilleumier, John McCarthy (superintendent of a seamen's mission, who had become an SDA in 1893), and Nelson Z. Town; a Bible instructor, Lucy Post; and a male nurse, Ole Oppegard, arrived.

In July 1896 the first SDA camp meeting in Argentina was held in Crespo, Entre Ríos, with 150 persons attending, and Westphal and McCarthy serving as speakers. By the end of 1900 the number of workers in the country had increased to 13—5 pastors, 1 licentiate, and 7 missionary licentiates, who took care of 11 churches (with 367 members), 4 companies (with 19 members), and 31 Sabbath schools (with 524 members). The headquarters of the East Coast Mission were in Buenos Aires.

Early Organization. The organized work in South America began with the arrival in 1894 of Westphal and his organizing of the East Coast Mission. In 1895, after a trip to Brazil, Westphal saw the desirability of setting apart Brazil as a separate mission. Upon his return on furlough to the United States in 1901, he recommended to the General Conference that such reorganization be made. His recommendation was accepted, but because of ill health he was unable to return to South America for several years. His place was filled by his brother, Joseph W. Westphal, who became president of the newly created South American Union Mission, with headquarters in Buenos Aires. The mission was divided into three fields: the Chilean Mission Field (changed to West Coast Mission in May 1902), the Brazil Mission Field (changed to Brazilian Conference in October 1901), and the Argentine Mission Field (which was called the River Plate Conference after November 1901).

At the first session of the newly established union, held in Palmar, Entre Ríos, from Nov. 10 to 20, 1901, the Argentine Mission Field became the River Plate Conference, with Nelson Z. Town as first president and Rodolfo Diriwaechter as secretary-treasurer. A period of rapid expansion followed.

In March 1906 the South American Union Mission was reorganized as the South American Union Conference in a meeting held in Paraná, Entre Ríos, Argentina. J. W. Westphal, who already had been president of the union mission since 1901, became the first president of the union conference, which office he held until 1916. After the formation of the South American Union Conference a new territorial distribution was made. In meetings held in Alberdi, Santa Fe, Argentina, from Oct. 25 to Nov. 4, 1906, the River Plate Conference was divided into the Uruguay Mission, the Alto Paraná Mission (Paraguay and the province of Misiones, Argentina), and the Argentine Conference. A further adjustment of territory was made in February 1912, when the Argentine Conference transferred the provinces of Chaco, Formosa, and half of Corrientes to the Alto Paraná Mission.

On Feb. 6, 1916, the South American Union Conference became the South American Division, with O. Montgomery as its first president, and with headquarters in Buenos Aires. Immediately after this, in a meeting held in La Plata, Argentina, the Austral Union was created, which comprised the Uruguay Mission, the Alto Paraná Mission, the Chile Mission, and the Argentine Conference.

Subsequent Reorganizations. The territory comprising the Austral Union, of which Argentina forms a part, has been reorganized several times since 1916. In that year the Argentine Conference comprised all of the republic of Argentina with the exception of the provinces of Formosa, Chaco, and the upper half of Corrientes, and the territory of Misiones, which belonged to the Alto Paraná Mission. In 1920 the Mendoza Mission was formed, consisting of the province of Mendoza.

The first major reorganization took place in 1921. According to a report by C. E. Krieghoff (former secretary and treasurer of the Argentine Conference), which appeared in the Mar. 28, 1921, issue of the Revista Adventista (21:8, 9): "It was voted during the conference that the provinces of San Juan and San Luis be transferred to form part of the Mendoza Mission; the territories of Río Negro and Neuquén will form the South Argentine Mission; the new Buenos Aires Conference will include the territory from Tigre to La Plata and Ensenada, including the city of Buenos Aires and its suburbs; the Central Argentine Mission will embrace the territories of La Pampa and that portion of Buenos Aires Province not included in the Buenos Aires Conference; the extant Argentine Conference will continue under the name of the North Argentine Conference and will embrace the provinces of Entre Ríos, Santa Fe, Córdoba, La Rioja, Santiago del Estero, Tucumán, Catamarca, Salta, Jujuy, and the territory of Los Andes."

According to the Yearbook (1922, pp. 123, 124), a further adjustment was made in 1921: Apparently the South Argentine Conference was dissolved and the provinces of Río Negro and Neuquén, which it comprised, were transferred to the Central Argentine Conference. About 1926 the Central Argentine Conference was disbanded, the whole of its territory becoming part of the Buenos Aires Conference (Yearbook, 927, p. 183). About 1926 the Magellan Mission, consisting of the territories of Chubut, Santa Cruz, Tierra del Fuego, Magellan (belonging to Chile), and the Falkland Islands, was established (ibid., p. 186).

In 1931 the North Argentine Conference was divided, the provinces of Entre Ríos, Santa Fe, and Córdoba going to make up a new Central Argentine Conference, and the provinces of Tucumán, Salta, Santiago del Estero, Catamarca, Jujuy, La Rioja, and the territory of Los Andes becoming the new Northwestern Argentine Mission. This mission was disbanded in 1934, and the provinces of Catamarca and La Rioja were transferred to the Mendoza Mission, which had been renamed Cuyo Mission about 1932; Santiago del Estero, Tucumán, Salta, Jujuy, and the territory of Los Andes became part of the Alto Paraná Mission, which was later renamed North Mission, or North Argentine Mission. In December 1947, Paraguay was detached from the North Mission to form the new Paraguay Mission.

Another important change occurred in 1943, when the Magellan Mission was absorbed into the Buenos Aires Conference.

In 1961 and 1971 major reorganizations occurred. In April 1961 the provinces of Chubut, Río Negro, Santa Cruz, Tierra del Fuego, and the Malvinas (Falkland) Islands were detached from the Buenos Aires Conference and became the Patagonia Mission. In December 1971 a general change took place in the administrative division of Argentina:

a new South Argentine Conference was formed, comprising the provinces that formerly formed the Buenos Aires Conference and the Patagonia Mission, i.e., the Federal Capital, Buenos Aires, La Pampa, Neuquén, Río Negro, Chubut, Santa Cruz, Tierra del Fuego, and Malvinas (Falkland) Islands. Joining the provinces under the Central Argentina Conference and almost all of the Cuyo Mission, the new Central Argentina Conference was organized: Entre Ríos, Santa Fe, Córdoba, San Luis, Mendoza, San Juan, and La Rioja. In 1985 the South Argentine Mission was organized to include half the Buenos Aires Province and all the territories to the south of it, and the Falkland Islands. That which was not included is now part of the Buenos Aires Conference. In 1988 the North Argentine Conference was reorganized. It includes Corrientes, Misiones, Chaco, Formosa, and North Santa Fe provinces. Also the Northwest Argentine Mission was formed, which includes Catamarca, Jujuy, Salta, Santiago del Estero, and Tucumán provinces.

Departmental Work

Departmental Work. 1. Publications. The first colporteurs came in 1891. The first colporteur director was R. B. Craig, 1893—1895 (The Home Missionary 7:270, December 1895; 7:100, June 1895). In 1894 a Tract Society was organized (called Sociedad Argentina de Tratados, 1896, and Sociedad Adventista de Tratados del Plata, 1908). Four years later three divisions of the society were formed to care for Uruguay, Argentina, and Alto Paraná. The first colporteur director appointed by the Argentine Conference was E. Max Trummer, in 1909. In 1912 there were 26 colporteurs. In 1994 there were 33 literature evangelists.

2. Sabbath School. The first Sabbath schools were organized in 1894 in Crespo, Entre Ríos, and in Buenos Aires; the lessons appeared in El Faro, later in Las Señales de los Tiempos and La Revista Adventista; and, after 1904, in separate form, under various names, until the present name, Lecciones de la Escuela Sabática, was adopted. Ottena Fulton was the first director of the Sabbath School Department in the South American Union (1907—1910). Beginning with 1914, the plan of the General Conference for the distribution of the offerings has been accepted. In 1992 there were 56,582 Sabbath school members.

3. Home Missionary. The first resolution designed to stimulate lay missionary activity was made in the biennial session held in Lehmann, Santa Fe, in 1904. In 1907 it was decided to organize home missionary societies in each church. In 1914 a Home Missionary Department was organized, with Mrs. Luisa P. Everest as director. The Ingathering plan was approved in 1924, although it had been occasionally practiced several years previously. Different activities were encouraged and organized later, until the establishing in 1960 of the Obra Filantrópica y Asistencia Social Adventista (“SDA Welfare and Philanthropic Work”), abbreviated OFASA. Since 1992 it has been known as ADRA-OFASA.

4. Radio. Radio evangelism began in Argentina Sept. 2, 1933, on L.U.7, Radio General San Martín, of Bahía Blanca, in the form of lectures delivered by Andrés Ascione, assisted by several coworkers. In June 1943 it was resumed under the name of La Voz de la Profecía (later changing to La Voz de la Esperanza), through records broadcast by L.T.8, Radio Rosario. At the same time, the radio correspondence school was begun with Lylon H. Lindbeck as director; Edgar Brooks prepared the first correspondence course (1943) and Juan Ferri and others the later courses, such as Tesoros de Vida (“Treasures of Life”), Curso Juvenil (“Youth Course”), and Felicidad en el Hogar (“Happiness in the Home”). In June 1964 a new radio program was begun under the leadership of Enrique Chaij, Una Luz en el Camino (“A Light in the Way”). Starting with just one radio station, it is now transmitted by 140 stations from Monday to Friday and 650 television channels, once a week in Argentina, without any charge. The original program, La Voz de la Esperanza, is heard weekly on 15 radio stations. There are 2,300 active students in the correspondence school.

5. Educational. The Colegio Adventista del Plata (River Plate College) began to operate in Las Tunas, Santa Fe, at the beginning of 1899, and was transferred the next year to Puiggari, Entre Ríos, its present campus. Its present name is Universidad Adventista del Plata (River Plate Adventist University). Instituto Adventista Florida (Buenos Aires Adventist Academy) began operating in 1914 as a primary school and in 1938 as a secondary school. Instituto Adventista Juan Bautista Alberdi (Northeast Argentine Academy) began as a primary school in 1923 and as a secondary school in 1946. Instituto Adventista de Balcarce (Balcarce Adventist Academy) began as a secondary school in 1986. Instituto Adventista Los Polvorines (Los Polvorinas Adventist Academy) was established in 1983. Instituto Adventista de Resistencia (Resistencia Adventist Academy) was established in 1989.

6. Medical. Argentina has four SDA medical institutions: Sanatorio Adventista del Plata (River Plate Sanitarium and Hospital), founded in 1908 at Puiggari, Entre Ríos (since 1983 a Healthful Living Center has been located on the premises); Clínica Médica Adventista de Belgrano (Belgrano Adventist Medical Clinic), founded in 1959 in Buenos Aires; Sanatorio Adventista Loma Linda (Loma Linda Sanitarium and Hospital), founded in 1966 at Presidencia Roque Sáenz Peña, Chaco (with its own building since June 1972); and Sanatorio Adventista del Noreste Argentino (Northeast Argentine Sanitarium), inaugurated in April 1972 at Leandro N. Alem, Misiones.

History

History. The work of Seventh-day Adventists in Arizona can be traced back to the 1880s. According to a letter from A. J. Potts, the origin of the Phoenix church goes back to 1887. Its formal organization in 1890 was noted in the conference president's report to the 1891 session of the California Conference, which in 1889 had taken Arizona as a mission territory. The same report says that "Arizona was entered more than one year ago" by "Brother [D. C.] Hunter and Brother Merrill and wife," who worked in three places. In 1895 Arizona became a General Conference mission field. In 1897 George O. States and W. L. Iles went in as evangelists, and later, W. L. Black, C. D. M. Williams, and J. E. Evans. In the next several years the Review and Herald carried reports of early evangelism in the state. Tent meetings were held at Prescott and in neighboring Peoples Valley and Skull Valley, in Phoenix and nearby Mesa (a Mormon district), and in Flagstaff. By June 1899 a new (still-unfinished) church was occupied at Phoenix, and a church school was opened in October with 15 pupils, taught by Martha Neilson. Williams and Black worked several months at Tucson among English- and Spanish-speaking people. A church was organized in Tucson Dec. 31, 1899, with a membership of 23. About the same time, a church was organized at Solomonville, a Spanish language group. Elder R. M. Kilgore, superintendent of District no. 5 of the General Conference, came especially for the organization of both groups. In January 1900 the Flagstaff church was organized with a membership of 12.

About that time States traveled on his bicycle through the Verde Valley, distributing tracts and visiting places in which meetings had been held before. His trip to Peoples Valley illustrates some of the difficulties of evangelism in Arizona. His visit two and a half years before had carried him, with tent and equipment, 35 miles (55 kilometers) south of Flagstaff on a grueling three-day journey, during which his wagon broke down and there were long treks between water supplies. But he had been successful in gathering and instructing a handful of converts. Now upon his return he found only one family of converts left. The others had either given up or moved away. A drought had caused a considerable migration. Aside from the sparseness and the transient nature of the population and the vast distances of mountain and desert to be traversed, living expenses were exorbitant. Freight rates were high, and the local foodstuffs had to be raised in relatively small irrigated areas. Large numbers of the settlers were gold seekers, and many, according to the local saying, had left their religion behind at the Missouri River. This was a common frontier condition among westward migrants who had outrun the church.

At the beginning of 1901 there were churches at Phoenix, Flagstaff, Tucson (13 Spanish-speaking; nine English-speaking, including four workers; one Chinese), and a Spanish-speaking church at Solomonville. Meetings were being held at Bisbee, on the southern border. In April, Arizona was made a mission of the newly formed Pacific Union Conference, which appointed the mission executive committee. E. W. Webster was the first superintendent of the Arizona Mission. At this time, Arizona, with an area of about 113,000 square miles (290,000 square kilometers), had a population of only 122,931, and 128 SDA members. By Dec. 31, 1901, the mission had one ordained minister, three licensed ministers, two Bible instructors, a colporteur, and a church school teacher.

The Arizona Sanitarium was operated (1903—1906) at Phoenix, first by the Arizona Medical Missionary and Benevolent Association (according to 1904 Yearbook), then by the Arizona Conference (1905 Yearbook). The 1906 Yearbook contains information that it changed hands. Afterward it operated as a private institution. It was housed in a rented two-story 40-room building.

In 1902 the mission became the Arizona Conference, with E. W. Webster as the first president. Then in 1932, because of economic depression, on the recommendation of the union conference the Arizona Conference was united with the Southeastern California Conference and remained part of the Southeastern California-Arizona Conference until 1936, when the Arizona Conference, with a membership of 1,107, was reorganized, with W. E. Atkin as president. Offices were at 1230 N. First Street, Phoenix; then from 1949 until mid-1974 offices were at 2601 East Thomas Road. In July 1974 an executive office-book center complex was occupied at 322 North 44th Street. Later an organization wishing to build an office complex and hotel on that site purchased the property for enough money to pay off the mortgage, build a new facility, and have $100,000 left over for evangelism, besides establishing a $500,000 education trust fund. The new office and Adventist Book Center is located in Scottsdale, adjacent to Thunderbird Adventist Academy, and has been occupied since 1983.

One aspect in the development of Seventh-day Adventism in southern Arizona was the Spanish language work. As a result of work in Tucson in the late 1890s, Marcial B. Serna, a Mexican-American minister, serving a Spanish language Methodist church, and most of his congregation accepted SDA doctrine and joined the church. Some were baptized in 1899 and others in years that followed. The church organized in Tucson in 1899 was largely a Spanish language group, and virtually the first Spanish church in the U.S.A. The Methodist church building in Tucson was deeded to the SDA Church by Serna's former congregation. Serna converted a group of Methodists at Solomonville to the Sabbath, and a church was organized there in 1899. Early in 1900 colporteur work began in Phoenix for the Spanish-speaking settlers by brothers Frank and Walter Bond, prior to their departure as missionaries to Spain. By 1917 Juan Garcia was giving Bible studies among the Spanish-speaking people in Phoenix.

In 1920, when the Arizona (later Thunderbird) Academy was established at Phoenix, a Spanish Language Department was set up as the Spanish-American Training School. It served its purpose well as the first training school for Spanish workers, but closed in 1933. The Phoenix Spanish church was organized in 1922. In 1923 Frank Bond returned from Spain to continue the work among the Spanish-speaking people. In 1993 there were 10 Spanish churches and two Spanish companies in Arizona, with a combined membership of 1,470.

Until a few years ago Indians and Mexican-Americans comprised a large percentage of the population in Arizona. In 1933 the first Indian from the Maricopa Reservation, 15 miles (25 kilometers) southwest of Phoenix, was baptized, during a series of meetings held by John Ford in Phoenix. The next year the Orno Follett family began work among the Maricopas through public meetings. Later a school and church were established and work expanded to several other Southern tribes.

In 1941 Marvin Walter and his wife began working among the Navajos in northern Arizona. The Seventh-day Adventist Indian Mission School at Holbrook, begun in 1946, conducted evangelism among the various tribes in Arizona. Many Indians have been baptized, some of whom have gone to an SDA academy or college for training to work among their own people. A former student now serves his people on the Navajo Reservation as an SDA minister. The school earned an enviable reputation in local government circles. Enrollment at the Holbrook SDA Indian School in 1993 exceeded 100. Three Native American churches and companies were in operation on the reservation.

In October 1951 eight acres (3.2 hectares) on Iron Springs Road near Prescott were secured as a campground site. Additional campground area has since been obtained, increasing the camp to 170 acres (70 hectares). Permanent buildings, including a large open-air pavilion, have been erected, providing year-round camping facilities.

On Sept. 6, 1961, the privately operated Tempe Clinic-Hospital at 1500 S. Mill Avenue, Tempe, Arizona, was turned over to the Arizona Conference. It was then renamed the Tempe Community Hospital. In 1974 the Pacific Union Conference assumed operation of the acute-care hospital in newly expanded and remodeled facilities. The Adventist Health System/West, upon its establishment, took over management of the hospital. But the hospital was sold in 1981.

Earlier Conferences

Earlier Conferences. The following three organizations have preceded the present Arkansas-Louisiana Conference: (1) Arkansas Conference, 1888 to 1932; (2) Louisiana Conference, 1901 to 1920; (3) Louisiana-Mississippi Conference, 1920 to 1932.

Arkansas Conference

Arkansas Conference. The early history of Arkansas is marked by struggles with poverty and Sunday law persecutions. The history of Seventh-day Adventism in the state goes back to at least 1877, when J. H. Cook held a week's meetings at Smith Chapel, two miles (three kilometers) south of Elm Springs, Arkansas. He also held meetings at Wildcat schoolhouse, where he preached to a congregation of "age to come" believers and their minister, with the result that five members accepted the Sabbath. Sometime later J. G. Wood came to Arkansas and at Hindsville visited a couple named McAlexander, who had been keeping the Sabbath about three years. He also held meetings, as a result of which there were 10 who signed the covenant and three who were baptized. J. H. Cook reported the same year (1882): "The people of Arkansas are hospitable and kind, always willing to share with you the comforts of their homes; but at present they are in very straitened circumstances" (Review and Herald 59:330, May 23, 1882). J. N. Bunch, of Oakland, California, held meetings at Casa and Ola in 1883. In 1884 J. W. Scoles and his wife and D. A. Wellman worked at Little Rock and Springdale, where the first organizations were effected.

A climax in state Sunday law prosecution came in 1886 and 1887 after the Arkansas legislature in 1885 had repealed the exemption clause for those who observed another day. A statement of policy on Sunday laws was drawn up at the first Arkansas camp meeting, held at Springdale, Arkansas, in the summer of 1886, and in the same year the General Conference in session voted to offer financial help for members sick because of long prison terms. They also voted to appeal a test case, that of J. W. Scoles, to the United States Supreme Court, and to employ suitable counsel and public relations help. At the same time they invited S. H. Lane to return from England to work in Arkansas because of the spirit of persecution in the state.

Relief came soon, for in January 1887 Senator Robert H. Crockett, grandson of famed David Crockett, introduced into the Arkansas General Assembly a bill exempting Sabbath-keepers from the state Sunday law. After an impassioned plea by the senator, the bill passed with only two dissenting votes. One sentence from that plea reads as follows: "On next Monday, at Malvern, six as honest, good, and virtuous citizens as live in Arkansas are to be tried as criminals for daring to worship God in accordance with the dictates of their own consciences." (For this speech and for accounts of prosecutions of SDAs, see American State Papers . . . on Freedom in Religion [1949], pp. 458—465, 477—484.) Despite this victory, 10 years later C. A. Gordon and his wife, from Little Rock, were listed among many others from several states who were imprisoned.

Arkansas Conference Organized. The Arkansas Conference was organized May 21, 1888, with 10 churches and 226 members. J. P. Henderson, the only ordained minister on the staff, was president; licentiates included E. B. Young, secretary; William Martin, treasurer; and W. J. Kerr. A camp meeting was held at Rogers, Aug. 20—27, 1889. Ellen G. White attended a meeting at Springdale in March 1890.

R. M. Kilgore reported in 1898: "The finances of the conference are so meager that it was thought best to ask all ministers and licentiates, except the president of the conference, to engage in the canvassing work, thus becoming self-supporting missionaries" (Review and Herald 75:575, Sept. 6, 1898). Despite these difficulties, converts were won. Sidney Scott, a Black minister, in 1901 reported the acceptance of the Sabbath by an entire Black non-SDA church (Monarch). For Black SDA churches in Arkansas, see Southwest Region Conference.

A small institution called the Little Rock Sanitarium was established in 1900 and operated by W. C. Green, M.D. It was last listed in the Yearbook of 1906.

The Arkansas Conference Association was chartered Mar. 23, 1902. Conference headquarters were successively at Springdale, Fayetteville, and Little Rock. Not until 1922, when it moved into quarters next to the church, at 1215 Marshall Street, Little Rock, did it own its offices. Membership grew from the 226 members in 1888 to 1,189 in 1932, when the Arkansas Conference and Louisiana section of the Louisiana-Mississippi Conference were united.

Louisiana Conference

Louisiana Conference. The first Sabbathkeeper in Louisiana appears to have been Mary A. Nugent in New Orleans in 1866. In 1883 George W. Winn returned to his home near Marthaville from Texas, having been a Sabbathkeeper about one year. The next year he won Dr. T. B. Sellers. A church was organized there in January 1887 by T. H. Gibbs, then of New Orleans. In the meantime a church, the first in the state, had been organized in New Orleans.

The interest that resulted in this church was aroused by R. M. Kilgore and H. W. Cottrell, who, during the exposition held in New Orleans in 1884—1885, set up an exhibit of SDA publications. This interest was followed up by SDA members canvassing and giving Bible readings. The few converts that resulted were baptized and organized into a church by G. K. Owen, of Michigan. By December 1885 about 45 had begun to observe the Sabbath. With the help of S. N. Haskell and J. H. Waggoner a city mission was established, in which “parlor services” were held. Later the mission was moved to other addresses. In 1939, while J. Lee Neil was the pastor, the first Louisiana church moved to a new building at 3500 St. Charles Avenue, in New Orleans. This building served the congregation until 1974, when the present New Orleans First church was built at 4201 W. Esplanade Ave. in Metairie.

Additional churches were established at Evergreen, Galvez, Hope Villa, Shreveport, and Welsh before 1891. The Hope Villa (later Hobart and now Gonzales) church had a threefold increase in members within a year, and erected the first SDA church building in Louisiana. M. D. Broussard donated the site and much of the building materials.

Annual camp meetings and literature and tent evangelism were the principal factors contributing to growth in church membership. The first camp meeting was held in a grove outside the city limits of Alexandria in July 1898; the second in H. E. Heald’s grove at Welsh, Louisiana, in July 1899; and the third at Marthaville in 1900. In 1899 the first church school was organized at Marthaville, with Mrs. C. F. Dart in charge.

Louisiana Conference Organized. Louisiana was a mission field in General Conference District no. 2 until, at the fourth camp meeting, at Crowley in 1901, the Louisiana Conference was organized and became part of the new Southern Union Conference. At the end of the year it reported six churches, 178 members, one company, and two ordained ministers (General Conference Bulletin, first quarter 1902, p. 596). Officers were as follows: S. B. Horton, president; W. T. Hartsock, Medical and Missionary departments; Frank Peabody, treasurer; C. F. Dart, state (canvassing) agent; Ruby Roach, superintendent of schools and Sabbath School Department. Conference committee: S. B. Horton, C. A. Watkins, E. S. Abbott, Solomon Broussard, J. R. Hudson. Conference headquarters were in New Orleans. Office space at first was rented, but in 1908 property at 810 Jackson Street was purchased and used until 1920. Contributing substantially to the growth in membership in the conference was the work of Mrs. Frances Goodwin, a Bible instructor, which dated back to 1886 and continued many years. The conference also carried on an active colporteur work, developing strong leaders.

For evangelism among Blacks in Louisiana, see Southwest Region Conference. Evangelism for the French-speaking people of Louisiana was undertaken at various times. Notable was the work of Louis F. Passebois about 1915 in and around New Orleans.

Louisiana-Mississippi Conference

Louisiana-Mississippi Conference. A new conference was organized in Jackson, Mississippi, in 1920 by combining the SDA churches and members of Louisiana and Mississippi. Each state had functioned as a single conference since organization in 1901. To this union of conferences Louisiana brought 13 churches, 4 ordained and 2 licensed ministers, and 673 members; 7 church schools, with 8 teachers and 116 pupils; 7 conference-owned buildings valued at $28,000, and a 1920 tithes of $30.06 per capita, totaling $20,231.26. The new Louisiana-Mississippi Conference, in an area with a population of 3,587,182, was organized with 30 churches, 1,144 members, 8 ordained ministers, 5 licentiates, and 12 teachers. W. R. Elliott was elected president, and N. L. Taylor secretary-treasurer. The conference headquarters were at 703 S. Gallatin Street, Jackson, Mississippi. (For the history of Seventh-day Adventist beginnings in Mississippi, see Gulf States Conference.)

Arkansas-Louisiana Conference Organized

Arkansas-Louisiana Conference Organized. In 1932, when the economic depression necessitated adjustments in administration, major territorial changes were effected in several union conferences. Louisiana, after its 12-year union with Mississippi, was transferred to the Southwestern Union Conference and joined to Arkansas. The Louisiana Conference was reluctant to break its ties with Mississippi and the Southern Union, but once the transfer was effected, a good spirit of solidarity developed.

The Arkansas-Louisiana Conference, in an area with a population of 3,956,075, was organized Feb. 23, 1932, with 33 churches, 2,078 members, 9 ordained ministers, 3 licentiates, and 18 teachers. The president was R. P. Montgomery; the secretary-treasurer, Ella M. Winn. The conference headquarters were established at 1215 Marshall Street, Little Rock, Arkansas. There were 3,266 members in 1946, the year when the Southwestern Mission (later the Southwest Region Conference) was organized, subtracting 12 Black churches and 850 members.

Ozark Academy, although located geographically off center in the northwest corner of Arkansas (Gentry, Arkansas), serves both states, and the Oklahoma Conference also.

In 1960, during the administration of I. M. Evans, president, and P. I. Nosworthy, secretary-treasurer, the conference office was moved from Little Rock, Arkansas, to Shreveport, Louisiana, a more central location. The membership grew to 3,945, as of Jan. 1, 1965, in 49 churches and 9 companies.

On Sept. 15, 1965, Camp Yorktown Bay was officially transferred from the U.S. Navy League of Hot Springs to the Arkansas-Louisiana Conference. This camp consists of 113 acres (45 hectares) on Lake Ouachita. When the camp was received it could accommodate 80 campers; now it accommodates more than 200.

Armageddon

ARMAGEDDON. (From the Greek transliteration of an unknown Hebrew phrase usually thought to be Har-megiddo, “Mount Megiddo.”) The word “Armageddon” occurs in the Bible only in Rev. 16:16, as the Hebrew name for a “place” to which three “unclean spirits” (v. 13) gather “the kings of the earth” to “the battle of that great day of God Almighty” (v. 14)—John’s designation for what is popularly called the battle of Armageddon.

The gathering to Armageddon is the principal feature of the sixth plague (vs. 12—16). The sixth angel pours out his “bowl” upon “the great river Euphrates,” whose “water was dried up, to prepare the way for the kings from the east.” Then three “demonic spirits” resembling frogs go forth from the mouths of the “dragon,” the “beast,” and the “false prophet” to “the kings of the whole world, to assemble them for battle on the great day of God the Almighty” (vs. 13—16, RSV). The sixth plague closes with the nations of the earth gathered for battle, and the context implies that battle is joined as the seventh angel pours out the vial of the seventh plague.

In popular usage “Armageddon” means any major military conflict involving many nations, though usually without reference to the biblical meaning of the term. Armageddon was not given specific emphasis by earlier Protestant interpreters, but in the first four decades of the nineteenth century, the increased emphasis on the imminence of the end of several prophetic periods in the prophecies of Daniel and the Revelation led to increased interest in the subject of Armageddon. A large group of expositors taught that events foretold in Rev. 16:12—16 paralleled those of Dan. 11:44, 45, since in both instances the establishment of Christ’s eternal kingdom follows almost immediately. Furthermore, it was pointed out that the “king of the north” of Dan. 11:40—45, whom many identified as the Ottoman Empire, occupied the area drained by the Euphrates River, which is mentioned in Rev. 16:12. Their belief that the Turks were referred to by “the great river Euphrates” under the sixth trumpet (Rev. 9:14) strengthened the conviction that the Euphrates mentioned under the sixth plague must refer to the same power. The fact that throughout the nineteenth century the territory of the Ottoman Empire was progressively being diminished (“dried up”), coupled with belief in the imminence of the event foretold, tended to confirm this interpretation. Politically and in the public press the Turkish Empire was referred to as “the sick man of the East,” and its demise was supposed to be imminent. Contemporary events were construed as part of the drying-up process to which Rev. 16:12 referred. The “Eastern question” occupied the continuing attention of political leaders throughout the century, and of the interpreters of Bible prophecy as well.

History of Seventh-day Adventist Interpretation

History of Seventh-day Adventist Interpretation. Millerite interpreters had held varying views on Armageddon. For example, William Miller taught that the sixth plague was a diminishing or taking away, of “the Turkish power” and was then (1836) in the process of fulfillment, “so that the way now appears to be prepared for the kings to come up to the battle of the great day” (Evidence . . . of the Second Coming of Christ [1836], p. 185). Josiah Litch, who placed the plagues “in the future, and after the second advent” (Prophetic Expositions, [1842], vol. 1, p. 175), believed that ‘the great river Euphrates’ will be as literally dried up to make way for kings of the Eastern world to come up to Jerusalem and Palestine to that battle, as the same river was dried up before Cyrus, when he entered and took the city of Babylon; or as the Red Sea and the river Jordan were dried up to make a highway for Israel through their bed. The effects of the sixth vial will be, first, to dry up the waters of the river, to make a highway; and secondly, to send forth the spirit of devils to deceive, by miracles, the kings of the whole earth, and their armies, and gather them” (ibid., p. 183).

SDA publications contained little on the subject of Armageddon until the 1850s. In an article in 1852 in the Review and Herald, G. W. Holt contended that the plagues were “real and literal,” as were the plagues of Egypt. After quoting Rev. 16:12, Holt declared, “This doubtless will be literal, and better understood about the time of its fulfillment” (2:105, Mar. 23, 1852). Whether by this statement he wished merely to affirm that the sixth plague would, like the others, be literal, or whether by “literal” he meant that the prophetic symbols in this verse were to be literally understood (for example, that the river Euphrates would be literally dried up, as Litch had held), is not clear. Interpreting verses 13 and 14, he comments: “This work of deception will probably increase until the great majority are led captive, and so deceived by it as to engage in the great battle against the Lamb and his humble followers. By this means they are led to resist the truth, and make war upon those that keep the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus. Thus Pharaoh and his host were deceived by the magicians and led on until they were overwhelmed in the water of the Red Sea” (ibid., p. 106).

A similar view was expressed by R. F. Cottrell in the Review and Herald in 1853: “But the last work of the spirits will be to gather the nations to the battle of the great day of God Almighty (Rev. 16:14). They are now preparing the way, and gaining an influence over kings and subjects, and when the sixth vial of the wrath of God shall be poured out, they will gather them to the battle. . . . Notwithstanding men are crying peace and safety, while sudden destruction is hanging over their heads; and the spirits of devils are arrayed against God and his truth; yet that truth will triumph” (4:157, Nov. 22, 1853).

An early SDA hymnal included a hymn entitled “Armageddon.” With phraseology based on Rev. 14:14—20 and 19:11—21, it emphasized the role of Christ and the angels in the battle of Armageddon, in defeating the wicked powers of earth and delivering God’s beleaguered people immediately prior to the resurrection and the appearance of Christ in the clouds of heaven (Hymns for Second Advent Believers Who Observe the Sabbath of the Lord [1852], pp. 23, 24).

Early in the Civil War certain individuals, obviously not the responsible leaders of the church, declared that the battle of the great day of God was beginning. James White, as editor of the Review and Herald, pointed out in the issue for Jan. 21, 1862 (19:61) that “preparations for that battle do not commence until the time of the pouring out of the sixth vial,” and that battle is joined only as the Son of God, accompanied by the angel armies of heaven, descends to earth. “The great battle is not between nation and nation,” he wrote, “but between earth and heaven,” between Satan and Christ.

The first formal exegesis of Rev. 16:12—16 in SDA literature appeared during the course of a series of articles entitled “Thoughts on the Revelation,” by Uriah Smith, which ran in the Review intermittently from June 3, 1862, to Feb. 3, 1863. In the issue for Dec. 2, 1862 (21:5), Smith identified the symbolic drying up of the river Euphrates as “the consumption of the Turkish empire,” which power, he said, would cease to exist altogether under the sixth plague. He considered the dissolution of the Ottoman Empire a necessary prelude to the battle of Armageddon, inasmuch as that battle, he said, would be fought at Jerusalem, and Jerusalem was then in the hands of the Turks. The dissolution of the Turkish Empire, he said, would prepare the way for “the kings of the East”—by which he understood nations to the east of Palestine—to fight in the battle at Jerusalem. He identified the three “unclean spirits” that gather the nations to Armageddon as “Paganism, Catholicism, and Protestantism.” These, the great religious organizations of the world, would gather the nations to “an unequal warfare . . . against the Lord of hosts.” The gathering of the nations he assigned to the sixth plague, and the battle itself, which he identifies with the judgment of Babylon in vs. 17—19, to the seventh. This exposition was retained when the series of articles appeared in book form in 1867 and became the standard SDA pattern of interpretation for the next three quarters of a century. About this time Smith also began to identify the king of the north (Dan. 11:40—45) with Turkey. Earlier he had identified this king with the Papacy (Review and Herald 19:192, May 13, 1862).

The international situation that culminated in the Russo-Turkish War (1877—1878) led to expectation of the imminent end of the Ottoman Empire, with Armageddon following immediately. In the Review and Herald for Mar. 28, 1871 (37:116, 117), Uriah Smith wrote: “All eyes are now turned with interest toward Turkey; and the unanimous opinion of statesmen is that the Turk is destined soon to be driven from Europe. . . . Time will soon determine this matter; and it may be but a few months.” (See also Thoughts on Daniel [1881], pp. 361—372.)

But James White was never reconciled to this view. While admitting that there was “general agreement upon this subject, and that all eyes are turned toward the war now in progress between Turkey and Russia as the fulfillment of that portion of prophecy which will give great confirmation of faith in the soon loud cry and close of our message,” he concluded: “What will be the result of this positiveness in unfulfilled prophecies should things not come out as very confidently expected is an anxious question” (Review and Herald, 50:172, Nov. 29, 1877; italics supplied).

The armament race that led to World War I revived interest in Armageddon. In a Review and Herald article entitled “The Gathering for Armageddon,” W. A. Spicer wrote of the evil spirits of Rev. 16:13, 14 stirring up the nations for war, and gathering all the world to Armageddon. He said: “Men who know the pulse of international affairs see just before us a world-conflict, which they describe as the Armageddon of the nations. . . . The sure word of prophecy says that it is the gathering to the battle of the last great day. . . . With express speed the world is rushing on to the great Armageddon. Before our very eyes the prophecy is fulfilling. Men of the world bear witness to it. The rest will surely come, and the time is near at hand” (ibid. 80:6, 7, Oct. 22, 1903).

In the Feb. 6, 1913, Review and Herald (90:127) W. H. Branson commented: “It is astonishing to note how the idea of Armageddon is taking hold of thinking people of every country, and how the world is awaiting with fear and trembling the great crisis that Armageddon stands for, and that is so sure and so soon to come.”

In the issue for Dec. 25 of the same year (90:1240) F. M. Wilcox asked, “What will be the end of all this great preparation for war?” and answered: “The end of it all will be that foretold by the prophet, the end looked for by far-seeing statesmen—the battle of Armageddon, the last great conflict of earth just preceding the coming of the Lord.”

Six years before the outbreak of World War I, S. N. Haskell wrote: “Even the Turks themselves are looking forward to the time when they will have to remove their capital from Constantinople to Jerusalem. . . . All know that when the Turk steps out of Constantinople, there will be a general breaking up of Europe. They may not name the impending conflict the battle of Armageddon, but God has so named it” (The Story of Daniel the Prophet [1908 ed.], pp. 282, 283).

A few weeks after the beginning of World War I, F. M. Wilcox commented: “The Scriptures indicate that eventually the site of government will be removed to the glorious holy mountain between the seas, referring evidently to Jerusalem. . . . The river Euphrates, representing the Ottoman government, is rapidly being dried up that the way of the kings of the East may be prepared to take part in the great battle of Armageddon” (Review and Herald 91:9, Oct. 15, 1914).

In the issue for Sept. 17 (91:7) C. M. Snow suggested that if Turkey should enter the war, “then this [World War I] is the first stage of the Armageddon battle. But that is yet to be determined. The outcome of this war we cannot forecast. Its relation to Armageddon depends upon the aligning and shifting of the nations themselves. Will those shiftings and alignments so dry up that power designated as the Euphrates that the way will be prepared for the forces of heathenism and Mohammedanism to come up to the common battleground of the world? Time will tell. But if this war does not do it, another must follow soon that will.”

When Turkey did declare war, six weeks later, G. B. Starr wrote: “‘The Ottoman Empire in Europe will soon be merely a memory’ (London Times, Oct. 30, 1914). . . . For nearly forty years the writer has watched with deepest interest the movements in the Near East with reference to the fulfilment of the predictions relating to the Eastern question, and rejoices in the clear evidences that the last step, the last act of the drama, is at hand” (Review and Herald 91:3, Nov. 26, 1914).

The outbreak of hostilities in 1914 inspired cautious admonitions not to consider that war the biblical Armageddon. A. O. Tait counseled: “The furious way in which this European war has broken out, and the rapidity with which it is spreading from one nation to another, is causing many people to ask the question, ‘Is this the beginning of Armageddon?’

“To this question we can clearly say, No, the war of Armageddon has not commenced; for it will be observed, in the prophecy already quoted, that that war of Armageddon takes place under the pouring out of the sixth of the seven last plagues, and these plagues have not begun to fall, as everyone knows” (Signs of the Times 40:7, Aug. 18, 1914).

Said C. M. Snow: “The war now being fought in Europe is not Armageddon, but it is entirely possible that it may lead into that battle” (Review and Herald 91:7, Sept. 17, 1914). W. W. Prescott wrote: “This great war is not Armageddon. It is not surprising that that word appears in the papers, but it is not Armageddon. This war is not the end” (ibid. 91:6, Oct. 1, 1914).

The armament race culminating in World War I was paralleled by other developments that introduced the nations of the Far East into the Armageddon picture. The awakening of Japan under the enlightened rule of the great emperor Meiji (1852—1912), the Sino-Japanese War (1894—1895), the Boxer Rebellion in China (1900), a brilliant Japanese victory in the Russo-Japanese War (1904—1905), and the Chinese Revolution (1911) gave birth to the idea that Armageddon would be essentially a battle between the nations of the Orient (the “kings of the East”) and the Occident. The king of Sweden is said to have declared as early as 1896 that “the Occident will be conquered by the Orient” (see R. C. Porter, “The World’s Armageddon Battle in Prophecy,” Review and Herald 90:748, 749, Aug. 7, 1913). The Boxer Rebellion led to the coining of the popular phrase “Yellow Peril” (London Daily News, July 21, 1900, quoted in The Oxford English Dictionary, art. “Yellow”). A series of four articles by R. C. Porter in the Review and Herald during July and August 1913 was based on the idea of Armageddon as essentially an East-West struggle. In his Aug. 7 article (90:749) Porter wrote of the great world color problem as a challenge to the White man’s supremacy, and of “the battle of Armageddon as the probable result of present conditions in the East.” He quoted Archibald R. Colquhoun, F.R.G.S., as saying in the Daily Mail Year Book (1908), “There is no question that the victory of Japan over Russia [in 1905] raised the question of relations between white and yellow in an entirely new form, and moreover that a spirit of renaissance is at work throughout Asia, which is destined to challenge the vaunted supremacy of the white man” (emphasis his). Following World War I, Lothrop Stoddard popularized such phrases as “Yellow Peril” and “the rising tide of color” in a series of books, including one entitled The Rising Tide of Color (1920). C. B. Haynes used both of these expressions in his book On the Eve of Armageddon (1946), p. 54.

Decreasing emphasis on the role of Turkey in Armageddon, between World War I and World War II, was paralleled by greatly increased emphasis on the role of Japan and other Asian nations. But with the decisive defeat of Japan in World War II, this emphasis also disappeared. Under the title “Japan and the Kings of the East” (Ministry 19:10, June 1946) Andrew N. Nelson emphatically denied that Japan had anything to do with “the kings of the East.” As world developments made the application of Dan. 11:45 and Rev. 16:12 to Turkey increasingly improbable after World War I, and likewise that of Rev. 16:12 to Japan after the close of World War II, there developed in SDA exegesis a trend toward eliminating both Turkey and Japan from consideration in connection with these prophecies and toward returning to the more general view of the pioneers. Hence there are many today who hold that the battle of Armageddon is the conflict between the forces of good and the forces of evil that will culminate in the destruction of the wicked at the second coming of Christ. Others, however, hold that the battle will be of a military character, waged between nations of the earth, and that this military battle will be terminated at the second coming of Christ.

The word “Armageddon” seldom appears in Ellen G. White’s writings. See, for example, 6T 406 and several passages printed in SDACom, 7:967, 982, 983.

Armenia

ARMENIA. An ancient country, parts of which now are in Turkey and Iran. It occupies an area of 11,306 square miles (29,783 square kilometers). The 1994 population is 3.5 million. It is bordered by Georgia, Azerbaijan, Iran, and Turkey. Present-day Armenia was set up as a Soviet republic on Apr. 2, 1921. Armenia became a constituent republic of the USSR on Dec. 5, 1936. An earthquake struck Armenia on Dec. 7, 1988, killing some 25,000 people and destroying several cities and towns. Armenia became an independent republic when the USSR disbanded on Dec. 26, 1991.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. As far back as the 1830s, many Molokans settled in the area of Mount Ararat in Armenia to await the millennium. In 1886 several Seventh-day Adventists from the Stavropol region were exiled to the same place because of their religious beliefs. When some families in the village of Bazarchar became interested in Sabbathkeeping, they sent V. Zhukov and I. Kasmynin to the Stavropol Seventh-day Adventist Church, where both were baptized. As a result of these developments, several companies and local churches had been organized in Armenia by 1908.

In 1925 two families (the Sperlings from Persia and the Galodzhevs from Tiflis) moved to Yerevan. That same year Elder Galodzhev baptized nine Armenians.

In 1993 there were nine churches and four companies in Armenia serving 365 members. Elder A. Kachikyan directs the work. Armenia is part of the Trans-Caucasian Field, in an attached field of the Euro-Asia Division.

Armenian Adventist School

ARMENIAN ADVENTIST SCHOOL. A 10-grade coeducational school that was located in Bourj-Hammoud, Lebanon, and operated by the East Mediterranean Field of Seventh-day Adventists. It was founded by Neshan Hovhannessian in Khalil Badawy, Beirut, Lebanon, in 1939 as a church school to meet the educational needs of Armenian SDA children. Because of hostile political conditions the school was moved to a new building in Bourj-Hammoud in 1963. The curriculum was presented in three languages, Arabic, Armenian, and English, and was designed to prepare the students for the Brevet examination of the Lebanese government. The school was closed in 1984.

Principals: Yepraxe Gomig, 1939—1941; Hosanna Ayoub, 1941—1946; Sella Nazirian, 1946—1950; Haigouhi Delice, 1950—1952; Hagop Keushguerian, 1952—1953; Sella Nazirian, 1953—1962; Nourhan Ouzounian and Mary Bitar, 1962—1963; Sella Nazirian, 1963—1967; Jirayr Kourouyan, 1967—1968; Aram Aghassian, 1968—1971; H. Cowles, 1971—1972; Minas Megurdichian, 1972—1975; Sella Nazirian, 1975—1984.

Arminianism

ARMINIANISM. A theological position in regard to salvation founded by Jacobus Arminius (Hermansz) (1560—1609), professor at the University of Leiden, Netherlands. Focusing his attack principally on the Calvinist position that God has predestined some to salvation and others to damnation, Arminius declared that salvation is theoretically possible for all. As the Arminian doctrine developed, his followers (known in Holland as Remonstrants), denied that any guilt pertains to a child before the age of accountability and that because individuals are not completely depraved they can cooperate with God. Conversely, they also can fall from grace. Probably the most significant theological tenet of Arminianism is that election is based on the foreknowledge of God concerning individuals' choice, rather than upon the sovereign decree of God, as taught by Calvin. At this point, it has been objected, too great stress on the Arminian position runs the risk of making salvation primarily a question of human decision and thus underemphasizing the sovereignty of God, as manifested in the election of Jesus Christ. Although condemned by the Calvinists at the Synod of Dort in 1619, Arminianism lived on. In some areas it developed far beyond Arminius' original doctrine. The basic evangelical form of Arminianism later became the soteriological position of Wesley and the Methodist Church. While Seventh-day Adventists do not formally identify themselves as Arminians, the general Arminian point of view has come to characterize their doctrine.

Armitage, Frank Benjamin

ARMITAGE, FRANK BENJAMIN (1864—1952). Pioneer missionary to Africa. Born into a Seventh-day Adventist family in Wisconsin, he attended Battle Creek College. In 1884 he married Annie Olsen, sister of O. A. Olsen. For several years he taught at Union College and other places in the Midwest.

The Armitages went to southern Africa as members of the second party of American missionary workers to Solusi Mission. They arrived there in 1897, at the height of an epidemic of malaria. Within a year Mrs. Armitage died. Shortly thereafter Armitage married the widow of G. B. Tripp. Tripp had been the first superintendent of the Solusi Mission.

In 1901 new recruits arrived at Solusi. Then the Armitages went nearly 200 miles (320 kilometers) northeast to establish the Somabula Mission. Through five long hard years they slowly won the confidence of the tribal people. Mrs. Armitage opened a school for girls. Briefly they were aided by Mrs. W. S. Hyatt, Armitage's sister, who remained and helped at Somabula when her husband, superintendent of the union, passing through, visited other missions in the north and in Nyasaland.

After their daughter Irene had suffered her fifth attack of blackwater fever the Armitages left Somabula. By this time they had greatly endeared themselves to the people. Not without reason was Armitage known as Matand' Abantu ("the man who loves people").

For nearly 20 years longer the Armitages worked in the Union of South Africa, building up the work at Maranatha, Bethel, Kolo (in Basutoland, now Lesotho), and Spion Kop missions. Then because of the failing health of Mrs. Armitage, the family returned to the United States in 1925. For a number of years after his return, Armitage pastored in California.

Armona Union Academy

ARMONA UNION ACADEMY. A coeducational senior high school sharing the campus with an elementary school in the San Joaquin Valley town of Armona, California. It is accredited by the SDA Board of Regents and is a charter member of the Western Association of Secondary Schools and Colleges through 1999. The day school is owned by the Central California Conference and operated jointly by the conference and five constituent churches.

The school began in 1903 in Nis Hansen's home, with Nellie Brown as teacher. When the enrollment increased from 4 to 13, it was transferred to Hansen's buggy house, and later to a small cottage on his ranch. By October 1906 it became known as the Central California Intermediate and Church School under the direction of B. L. Howe.

Nis Hansen donated a five-acre (two-hectare) tract of land on which a church and the old Armona Library were built. Approximately 70 students enrolled that first year. Community homes boarded nonresident students during the week. When the enrollment reached 90 in 1909, a new schoolroom was added. Myrtle B. Hudson, a physician from Battle Creek Sanitarium, joined the staff as a science teacher and conducted temperance and health clinics in the community.

During the summer of 1911 J. L. Jones arrived from Union College, and instruction was offered through grade 12. In the spring of 1912 Armona Academy graduated five students. In the summer of 1913 the Pacific Union Conference requested that academies restrict their curriculums in order to strengthen the Pacific Union College program. Armona Academy was reduced to a 10-grade school and placed under local control. In 1925 the constituent churches of Island, Laguna, Lemoore, Hanford, and Armona consolidated their small schools, bought two buses, and united as the Armona Union Intermediate School.

This school operated in the old academy building and became accredited with the General Conference Department of Education in 1928. The school expanded to include ninth-, tenth-, and eleventh-grade subjects. The 1935 enrollment of 94 filled the school to capacity.

On Feb. 24, 1936, a fire destroyed the old wooden building. Only the piano and a few books and maps were salvaged. Within two weeks plans were approved to rebuild a larger unit accommodating 100 students. The community and constituents rallied with pledges exceeding $5,000, plus materials and time. The classes met in tents and in the Armona church for the rest of the year. By the fall of 1936 four classrooms and the office were readied for the beginning of the school year. By the following year, a 300-seat auditorium and a mechanical drawing and woodworking facility were completed.

Armona Union Academy again began offering 12 grades in 1939—1940, enrolling 135. In 1949 three new classrooms and a cafeteria were added for the elementary school, and two teachers' duplexes and a metal shop building for vocational subjects. The vocational complex was named for W. A. Johnstone. In 1955 the school was accredited by the General Conference Department of Education. In 1956, under the direction of Paul Plummer, school buses were provided, the grounds were landscaped, and the school building was painted. In 1957 Lambert Flory and others purchased and donated to the school 10 acres (four hectares) across the street.

During Dallas Carr's administration, a four-room office complex, complete with intercom system and air conditioning, was moved in behind the administration building. The old elementary building was remodeled and transformed into academy classrooms and a science laboratory. Then two classrooms in the administration building were combined into a spacious library, complete with carrels, a listening center, and a conference room.

During the summer of 1978 the foundation was laid for a new gymnasium, multipurpose room, and kitchen. The old gymnasium was remodeled into a chapel that was named to honor L. A. Hansen, whose family has consistently supported the school for 90 years.

The Armona church is located on the academy campus along with the King's Crusaders Pathfinder Building, which serves the five area churches.

Principals of the 12-Grade Academy: J. L. Jones, 1911—1913; R. N. Gardner, 1938—1941; R. Shephard, 1941—1944; W. F. Storz, 1944—1946; Theophil Fischer, 1946—1947; B. C. Clark, 1947—1948; Helen Morris, 1948—1949; B. E. Schaffner, 1949—1953; M. A. Smith, 1953—1956; P. E. Plummer, 1956—1964; W. E. Minder, 1964—1966; Norman Morris, 1966—1968; E. F. Armstrong, Albert Kingsley

ARMSTRONG, ALBERT KINGSLEY (1884—1965). Pastor and composer. Born Feb. 19 in Ulceby, England, he was probably the first child born to Seventh-day Adventist parents in Britain, his parents having been baptized the previous year. He was baptized in 1901 and graduated from Stanborough College in 1908. After his marriage that same year, he and his wife went to Ireland and began lifelong service to the church. In 1913 he was transferred to the North England Conference, where he served in many churches during the next 16 years. The last 35 years of his life were spent working among the churches of the South England Conference, his last charge being the headquarters church at Stanborough Park, where he served for 17 years. He was gifted with musical talent, and two of his hymns appear in The New Advent Hymnal.

A prominent minister of another denomination volunteered the information that he found more fellowship of the spirit with Pastor Armstrong than with his fellow ministers.

Armstrong, Harry E.

ARMSTRONG, HARRY E. (1873—1920). Minister, administrator, missionary. He began work with the British publishing house in 1890, entered the ministry in 1895, and was ordained in 1898. In 1901 he conducted evangelistic work in Glasgow.

After one year as superintendent of the Scottish mission he went to India, and in 1904 was sent on a preaching mission to Ceylon. While there, certain Sabbathkeeping Tamils from Tinnevely met him. As a result, evangelistic work was begun in their village in 1908.

After three years' service in India and Ceylon, Armstrong returned to England because of ill health. He was president of the Welsh Conference for six years, and of the North England Conference for six more. On retiring from administrative responsibilities, he conducted evangelistic work on the Isle of Wight until near the time of his death.

Armstrong, Walter Worsley

ARMSTRONG, WALTER WORSLEY (1895—1970). Missionary, administrator. He was born in north London into a second-generation Seventh-day Adventist family. Baptized in 1910, he suffered persecution for his faith during World War I, but his stalwart witness, along with that of others, paved the way for a better understanding of the SDA noncombatant in Britain. He was married in 1920, and with his wife, Madge, went to Kenya, where they labored for 19 years.

In 1946 Pastor Armstrong was elected to the presidency of the South England Conference, a position he held until called to the presidency of the British Union in 1950. Because of ill health, he retired in 1958.

Arnesen, Erik

ARNESEN, ERIK (1868—1960). Editor, educator, administrator. Born in Oyer, Gudbrandsdalen, Norway, in 1888 he left his homeland for America, and found work and a home at Gelckrist, Minnesota, with a Seventh-day Adventist Norwegian farmer named Hilde. Accepting the SDA faith, he was baptized at the Minnesota camp meeting in 1891 by J. M. Erickson. That same year he enrolled as a student of the Scandinavian Department of Union College, where he spent two years. The next two years he served as secretary to J. G. Matteson, who was editor of Evangelists Sendebud and teacher in the Danish-Norwegian Department of Union College. In the school year of 1895—1896 he taught at Union College. At the end of the school year he was called to Battle Creek to serve as a secretary in the General Conference office.

In 1897 Arnesen was called to Denmark to serve as secretary to Dr. J. C. Ottosen, who had been chosen as medical superintendent of the Skodsborg Sanitarium, which opened its doors in 1898. In addition to his secretarial duties he took the nursing course, giving the first treatment to the first male patient. He remained at Skodsborg 11 years.

In 1908, when J. C. Raft was elected president of the Scandinavian Union Conference, Arnesen was elected secretary, a position he held for 24 years, until 1932, when the one union was divided into two. Also in 1908 he was appointed head of the union training school (established at that time in Skodsborg) and the next year, Bible teacher. He also served as editor of Evangelists Sendebud and translated books and tracts.

In March 1917 Arnesen was released from the school to become the manager of the publishing house (Norsk Bokforlag) in Christiania (now Oslo), Norway, and to devote his time to editorial and other literary work. Three years later he was called back to Denmark to head the training school, which was then in Naerum (see Danish Junior College). In 1925 he was again asked to return to the publishing house in Christiania to assume his old post as editor of Evangelists Sendebud, which in 1928 had its name changed to Tidens Tale.

In February 1929 Arnesen suffered a near-fatal attack of pneumonia, which made it necessary for him to relinquish his editorial work. For the school year 1930—1931 he taught Bible in the Onsrud mission school. This was his last official post before he retired.

For Arnesen retirement did not mean inactivity. Until the time of his death he continued his writing. During his long and active life he wrote numerous articles for SDA papers. He also edited a large songbook, of which 200 songs were composed by him. In addition, he translated nine of Ellen G. White's books. The last one, The Desire of Ages, was finished in his eighty-seventh year.

Arnold, David

ARNOLD, DAVID (1805—1889). Colleague of James White in publishing the Advent Review (1850), and first president of the New York Conference. He was a Millerite who accepted the Sabbatarian position soon after 1844. The first conference of Sabbathkeeping Adventists in New York State was held in his barn (or, as some say, carriage house) at Volney on Aug. 18, 1848. He wrote rather extensively for the early Adventist papers. His expositions of the Bible were essentially standard, although he held a few views that differed slightly from the rest at first—such as that the “daily” represented literal Jewish sacrifices. (See L. E. Froom, Prophetic Faith of Our Fathers, vol. 4, pp. 1022, 1086, 1087.)

Arnold, William

ARNOLD, WILLIAM (1854—1922). Pioneer colporteur. He was born in New York State, and as early as 1882 decided to make colporter work his career. He went as a self-supporting worker to Australia in 1885, and three years later was invited to work in London. He made five trips in 10 years to the West Indies, canvassing on many of the islands and in British Guiana. He worked in Ontario, Canada, and canvassed with success in Alabama and Tennessee. Ill health forced his retirement in 1919.

Art in the Seventh-day Adventist Church

ART IN THE SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH. Art in all its disciplines has played an increasingly significant role within the Seventh-day Adventist Church. William Miller and other pioneers who preceded the organization of the church used charts and graphs to clarify the complicated truths of Daniel and Revelation. But these were amateurish and limited. Eventually woodcuts, simple renderings, and then more finished illustrations were used in SDA work and publications as cost permitted.

The great themes of the Bible have challenged artists throughout the centuries, but simple line renderings have been used to communicate volumes of truth that carry eternal consequences.

Today the use of contemporary design, full-color illustrations, and photography are viewed as necessities rather than luxuries as SDAs communicate spiritual truths to a visually literate world.

Art in Evangelism. In the early days of the Seventh-day Adventist Church, illustrative material was extremely limited. Chiefly charts and illustrated diagrams were available, but with these the early evangelists sought to make their preaching effective.

James White, who had probably used the Millerite “1843 chart,” picturing the metallic image of Dan. 2, the four beasts of Dan. 7, the ram and he-goat of Dan. 8, the beasts of Revelation, and the three angels of the fourteenth chapter, initiated the printing of SDA prophetic charts. Others using such charts were Joseph Bates, J. N. Loughborough, George I. Butler, and M. E. Cornell. The quality of the art on these early charts tended to be poor.

As evangelism and evangelistic audiences became more sophisticated, the quality of art used for charts was improved. Ingenious visual methods were used both to advertise evangelistic meetings and to illustrate the messages presented. For example, around 1900 William Ward Simpson used life-sized painted papier-mâché sculptured models of the symbolic beasts of prophecy with his evangelistic work, and on a truck displayed them through the streets to advertise his meetings. Ellen White commended his ingenuity. Other evangelists used attractive handbills with many strongly appealing cartoons and posters. Later many evangelists made use of hand-colored glass lantern slides to illustrate gospel songs and biblical topics. Beginning in the 1930s, Kodachrome slides, color movies, overhead projectors, black light, and video presentations have been used.

One- and two-color handbills, posters, and promotional materials proved to be effective forms of advertising through the 1950s and 1960s. But as four-color advertising and trendy design became more widely used, SDA evangelists have needed to use full color in presenting their campaigns. New illustration and contemporary news and stock photos help keep evangelistic campaign promotions current.

Art in Education. In 1887 a course in drawing and painting was offered at Healdsburg College, California, and by 1900 in other SDA colleges. Today most SDA colleges maintain art departments and offer majors and/or minors in art. The courses emphasize basic design, drawing, painting, ceramics, computer graphics, graphic design, sculpture, and photography to enable students to develop a creative use of these mediums. Courses are offered also in art education, art appreciation, and the history of art. Art galleries in some of the colleges have facilitated exposing the students and community to artists' works.

The need for more professionally trained artist-teachers has arisen in both elementary and secondary schools because of the positive aesthetic and therapeutic value of such programs.

A pre-art therapy program presently is being offered at Andrews University. There is an ongoing need by the denomination's publishing houses for skilled graphic designers, photographers, and illustrators. Supplying such professionals who can comprehend fully the church's publishing mission necessitates the training of as many as possible within the SDA educational system.

Illustration in Publishing. The first illustration used in Seventh-day Adventist literature appeared in the Review and Herald of Mar. 23, 1852, a reproduction of a tree with the two tables of the law hanging from its branches. It was hand-engraved on wood by Uriah Smith. A similar engraving appeared in the first number of the Youth's Instructor, illustrating Sabbath school lessons in August 1852. Later periodicals made somewhat regular use of engraved reproductions of pictures that had appeared elsewhere, as well as some originals.

As demands have increased and scanning, separating, and printing techniques have improved, more full-color work is being used. The use of process color is recognized today as vital to the success of SDA publications, although many still are limited by budgets to one or two colors.

Recognizing the usefulness of pictures to convey a vital truth, James White, in 1876, had a picture prepared entitled The Way of Life, From Paradise Lost to Paradise Restored, which he offered for sale with an explanatory leaflet for $1. It showed Jesus on the cross in the center; at the left was the angel expelling Adam and Eve from Eden. To the right of the cross were pictured the Last Supper and baptism, and in the top right corner the Holy City. It was about 14" x 20" (36 cm. x 50 cm.) in size. Six years later an improved version of the picture appeared. This was copyrighted in 1889 by Ellen G. White with a new title, Christ, the Way of Life.

There was a period about 1900, as illustrations were used more plentifully in SDA books and periodicals, when pictures were used that poorly and sometimes falsely represented the facts of the textual matter. Regarding this, Ellen G. White counseled: "I am troubled in regard to the use of pictures in our publications. . . . Some of the cuts used are very inferior, and poorly illustrate the subjects represented. I hope our publications will not come to resemble a comic almanac. I would not altogether condemn the use of pictures, but let fewer be used, and only such as are good illustrations of the subject. . . . If you choose to have a few pictures and good ones, I do not object. Let illustrations be choice rather than numerous" (CW 172).

Yet she also pointed out that "God Himself employed pictures and symbols to represent to His prophets lessons which He would have them give to the people, and which could thus be better understood than if given in any other way. He appealed to the understanding through the sense of sight" (2SM 319).

The first Seventh-day Adventist subscription book on doctrinal subjects, Thoughts on Daniel and the Revelation, by Uriah Smith, issued 1882, was illustrated with reproductions from steel engravings of biblical and historical subjects and some wood engravings of prophetic symbols overprinted in flat colors. The foundations of the New Jerusalem were illustrated in colors. A few of the “abundantly illustrated” books of that period were Bible Readings (1888) and Ellen G. White’s Steps to Christ (1892), Thoughts From the Mount of Blessing (1896), Christ’s Object Lessons (1900), and The Desire of Ages (1898). The last named, republished in 1900 in two large volumes, 7¾" x 11" (20 cm. x 28 cm.), by the Pacific Press, was undoubtedly the best example, up to that time, of SDA bookmaking and illustration. The Coming King, by J. E. White (1898), contained a number of illustrations by the art staff of the Review and Herald, whose Art Department was staffed by Peter J. Rennings, William Robinson, Harry Goodrich, Fred Roberts, Pedro Lemos, Sanford M. Harlan (an apprentice), and a file clerk. However, many of the best pictures were done by freelance illustrators F. Louis Mora and W. B. Davis. Some work was also done by Charles Mente, of Congers, New York.

When the Review and Herald moved to Washington, D.C., in 1906, Sanford Harlan became the nucleus of the Art Department, which was built up by T. K. Martin, who came in 1920 and served through 1968.

In the 1940s a major step forward was taken in the production of a new edition of Uriah Smith’s Daniel and the Revelation. The illustrating of this book, under the direction of T. K. Martin, introduced a number of original paintings by noted illustrators, giving the prophecies a stronger pictorial presentation. It was about that time that an illustrator of national reputation, Harry Anderson, who had recently joined the SDA Church, began contributing to the Review and Herald publications, and two other SDA illustrators, Clyde Provonsha and John Steel, were commissioned to produce several illustrations for the Southern Publishing Association and the Pacific Press, respectively.

As offset printing came into general use, greater flexibility in the reproduction and use of pictures became possible. Books formerly limited to black and white and a few color tip-ins could now be profusely illustrated in full color. The first successful attempt to produce an all-color set of subscription books was the publication of The Bible Story, by Arthur S. Maxwell, in 10 volumes. Twenty-one illustrators were employed to supply pictures for The Bible Story, including such outstanding artists as Harry Anderson, Harry Baerg, Jes Schlaikjer, N.A., Vernon Nye, and Russell Harlan (son of Sanford Harlan and great-grandson of John N. Andrews). The quality of art in The Bible Story has contributed to the phenomenal sale of the set not only in North America but also abroad.

About the beginning of the 1970s, art in SDA publications assumed a new appearance in keeping with the fast-changing trends and tastes in society. With the new and uninhibited use of the principles of design, an influx of new typefaces, and fresh use of color and textures, the designer’s skills were given full freedom of expression.

With constantly changing desktop and litho technology, today’s graphic designers enjoy seemingly limitless options. Photos and artwork are created and viewed instantly on desktop computers. Design skills, coupled with new technology, are bringing fresh visual direction to old themes.

Photography in Publishing. Photography plays a large part in the overall account of SDA art, not only for documentary purposes but for promotion of literature and in editorial presentations and book illustrations, both black and white and color. Both U.S. publishing houses have a full-time photographer.

The bridge between photography and computers is narrowing. Photos are being scanned directly into desktop systems for sizing, position, and design. Nevertheless, the eye of the skilled photographer will always have its place in publishing, as photography adds authenticity to printed materials.

Art in Church Departmental Activities. Graphic design, illustration, and photography are making strong contributions to the departmental activities of the church through the use of books, magazines, brochures, videos, and many other promotional and outreach materials. These provide a significant link between the various departments, unions, conferences, and laypersons to which they are sent in the SDA world.

Sculpture. Of the space, or visual, arts, SDAs have made least use of sculpture. William Ward Simpson's papier-mâché models of the prophetic beasts were imitated by other evangelists, who elaborated on his idea, one using a plaster of Paris model of the image of Dan. 2. For years, very little if any sculpture appeared on SDA architecture except as borders and in connection with adapted Gothic design motifs. In 1963 British sculptor Alan Collins, A.R.C.A., A.R.B.S. did a 14-foot (4.3-meter) representation of the three angels of Rev. 14 in high relief, in fiberglass, for the Trans-European Division headquarters building in St. Albans, England. While on the faculty of Andrews University (1971—1978), Collins designed the 22-foot (6.7-meter) abstract sculpture Regeneration, adjacent to the College of Technology building. Subsequently, he has made larger-than-life figure groups in stone and bronze—The Good Samaritan (1981) for Loma Linda University, and Christ Our Healer (1992) for Paradise Valley Hospital. Other works for churches or church institutions are at Bay Knoll church, Rochester, New York; North Hills church, Claremont, California; Atlantic Union College; and Union College. In the planning stage are figure groups for Andrews University (depicting J. N. Andrews and his two children embarking as the first missionaries for the SDA Church) and for the General Conference headquarters (The Watchers, eight figures of different ethnic origin, typifying the races of the world in anticipation of the Second Advent).

Another artist, Wayne Hazen, has carved a large wood relief for Founders' Hall at Atlantic Union College and has built a large abstract construction in concrete for the campus of Andrews University. More recently he carved a wood relief sculpture 17 feet (5 meters) long by 7 feet (2 meters) high of the healing hands of Christ for Hinsdale Hospital.

Asamang Seventh-day Adventist Hospital

ASAMANG SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST HOSPITAL. A medical institution in Ghana, operated by the Central Ghana Conference. It was started as a clinic in 1984 by the people of Asamang in the Ashanti region in the Afigya Sekeyer district and is situated on 35 acres (14 hectares) of land donated by the chief and people of Asamang. The Central Ghana Conference provided money for the completion of the building, and it was officially inaugurated in November 1984. The first medical director was Owusu-Achew, assisted by Offeh Gyima, administrator; and Mary Owusuaa, medical assistant.

Equipment, hospital supplies, and a Nissan Urvan bus were donated to the hospital by the SIMANYUI in 1985.

The main hospital building is made up of a single block containing three in-patient wards, a labor ward, operating theater, injection and dressing room, consulting, accounting, and administration sections. Phase one of a building project, which was started in 1991, has been realized with the completion of the maternity block. The construction of a new operating theater will start in 1994.

Asiatic Division

ASIATIC DIVISION. A former unit of church organization that was in existence from 1909 to 1918. It was composed originally of China, India, Japan, Korea, Malay Peninsula, Philippine Islands, and Straits Settlements (the territory of the later China, Far Eastern, and Southern Asia divisions). In 1910 India, Burma, and Ceylon were formed into the India Union Mission, which in a reorganization in 1915 was reunited with the Asiatic Division. In the same year, the Australasian Union Conference also became a part of the division. At the General Conference session of 1918 these units were separated again. The India Union Mission and the Australasian Union Conference (with its island mission territory) were both placed under the supervision of J. E. Fulton (former president of the Asiatic Division), whereas the Far Eastern section, including the East Asian Union, the North China Union, the South China Union, and the Philippine Union, was placed under the supervision of I. H. Evans, with headquarters in the old division headquarters at Shanghai. At the council of the Far Eastern section, held in March 1919, this Far Eastern section adopted the name "Far Eastern Division of the General Conference of Seventh-day Adventists"; from this the China Division was later separated. In 1920 the India Union Mission became the Southern Asia Division of the General Conference, at first called the Eastern Asia Division. In 1922 the Australasian Union Conference became the Australasian Division.

Asokore Seventh-day Adventist Teacher Training College

ASOKORE SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST TEACHER TRAINING COLLEGE.

An institution established in 1962 and operated at Asokore-Kofondua, Ghana, West Africa. The original name, according to the Yearbook, was Koforidua Day-Teacher Training College. It became a boarding institution in 1964 and is a postsecondary teacher training institution.

The total student enrollment in 1993 was 640, which represents a 15 percent increase over previous years.

A serious effort is made on the part of staff to maintain high academic standards, which has resulted typically in 99 percent success in the external examinations. The spiritual aspect of the school is emphasized. In addition to the regular Week of Prayer, a special one is organized to coincide with the beginning of the external exams. In 1993 more than 30 students were baptized into the Adventist faith.

Presently under construction is an assembly hall-church building. It is being financed solely by the college church community, made up of students and staff. Future projects for the school include the construction of an ultramodern administration and library complex and additional staff housing.

In 1994 the college was to become a “polytechnic”—one of the regional colleges of arts, science, and technology.

Association of Adventist Parents (AAP)

ASSOCIATION OF ADVENTIST PARENTS (AAP). An organization developed as a specific means of helping meet the increasing drug problem in the Seventh-day Adventist Church, especially for those who may already be involved in chemical or other dependencies.

Initiative for AAP as an organization came from the grass roots level, beginning with an informal group of 13 parents meeting in Washington, D.C., to discuss forming a parent support movement within the church. Exploratory meetings determined the feasibility of such an organization and climaxed in a mass rally of parents, educators, and church leaders who called for immediate action.

Formal organization was completed on Apr. 27, 1985, in Atlanta, Georgia, at which time bylaws were adopted and a board of directors was chosen, along with a panel of educational and professional advisors. The basic aim of AAP is described in its statement of philosophy: “The use and abuse of both legal and illegal drugs in the Seventh-day Adventist Church have reached challenging proportions. Such use has extended into many segments of our church, bringing with it individual loss, spiritual degeneration, and disregard for law and regulation. With the ever younger age of drug and alcohol users, even extending to elementary school children, we as parents feel that we must join together to accomplish the changes necessary to ensure a drug-free environment to today’s and the children yet to come. . . . We are committed to work in a productive, nonjudgmental manner to create positive change in the church, home, school, and community.”

The AAP works in close cooperation with other parent groups and community efforts to encourage recovery from and to prevent addictive problems. It helps provide resources for parents and youth to prevent, reduce, or eliminate drug use. Another aim of the AAP is to provide referral for those needing information as to places or persons who can help families in crisis.

A major project of AAP is the Celebration of Recovery, which is a weekend spiritual retreat for Adventists with dependency problems. These celebrations explore spiritual resources for recovery and provide opportunity for participants to share experiences, strength, and hope, and to offer praise to God for the gift of continuing sobriety.

The AAP is a membership organization open to anyone desirous of furthering the purposes of the organization, benefiting from its services, or contributing (financial or otherwise) to its program. Where feasible, AAP encourages the formation of local parent support groups to help families and youth facing addiction and dependency problems.

Association of Adventist Physicists

ASSOCIATION OF ADVENTIST PHYSICISTS. An organization developed in 1976 with the purpose of facilitating communication among its members and fostering a sense of community, promoting the science of physics and its responsible application to human endeavors, providing a forum for the continued development of an integrated view of science and theology, providing a common voice of its members to other individuals and organizations, and coordinating efforts and initiating programs of interest to the group.

The association publishes the Newsletter of the Association of Adventist Physicists four times a year. It is sent free to all physicists who request it and to all SDA academy and college campuses.

Association of SDA Historians

ASSOCIATION OF SDA HISTORIANS. An organization founded in San Francisco on Dec. 28, 1973, designed, according to its constitution, to “provide intellectual and social fellowship among its members, encourage scholarly pursuits in all the historical disciplines, identify Seventh-day Adventist teachers of history both within and without the church’s educational system as well as researchers and graduate students working in historical fields, [and] acquaint others with our contributions as historians.”

The association meets annually in conjunction with the convention of the Organization of American Historians. Its newsletter and directory have provided members with networking information about fellow historians.

Association of SDA Institutions of Higher Education and Secondary Schools

ASSOCIATION OF SDA INSTITUTIONS OF HIGHER EDUCATION AND SECONDARY SCHOOLS. An association of denominationally owned and controlled institutions of higher education and secondary schools throughout the world that (1) have been approved and registered by, or accredited with, state, regional, or national associations or by the Board of Regents of the Department of Education of the General Conference, and (2) are operated in harmony with the aims and policies approved by the General Conference and by the educational boards and executive committees of the union conferences and divisions in which the schools are situated.

It was brought into existence in 1929 as the Association of Seventh-day Adventist Colleges and Secondary Schools to deal with common problems in the North American Division confronting denominationally owned and operated schools in their relationship with university, state, and regional accrediting organizations. Membership consisted of the Board of Regents of the General Conference Department of Education (the executive committee of the association), qualifying SDA educational institutions, certain honorary members, secretary and associate secretaries of the General Conference Department of Education, and union conference secretaries of education. The secretary of the Department of Education is the president (formerly chair) of the association. In 1943 the name of the association was changed to Association of SDA Institutions of Higher Education and Secondary Schools. By 1954 the organization was enlarged beyond North America to include institutions of higher education, training schools, and secondary schools of the overseas divisions, and duties were expanded. The organization aimed “to assist member institutions in identifying, reaching, and maintaining adequate standards in administration, management, teaching, scholarship, Christian worship and service and citizenship, character training, and health education, and to assist the church in understanding and giving support to its system of schools,” and to assist the educational institutions of the church in interpreting and meeting the needs of the denomination and its young people. In 1962 the constitution and bylaws were revised, enlarging the Board of Regents, making provision for representation on it from college departments of education and additional representation from academy principals and union conference secretaries of education. The association became inactive in 1970 when the Association of Seventh-day Adventist Educators was organized.

Association of SDA Nurses

ASSOCIATION OF SDA NURSES. A church-sponsored organization for promoting the ideals and principles of Seventh-day Adventist nursing, to encourage SDA young people to enter the nursing profession, to keep members informed as to the need for SDA nurses in denominational work and other places, to encourage practicing nurses to give spiritual assistance to patients while caring for their physical needs according to the instructions and teachings of the denomination, and to advance the standards of SDA nurses and nursing, the care of the sick, and the honor and character of the nursing profession. The organization is commonly referred to as ASDAN.

On May 7, 1967, 45 registered nurses of the North American Division met at the New York Center, to organize an association of SDA nurses. The following officers were elected for a two-year term: president, Maureen Maxwell; president-elect, Alice E. Smith; secretary-treasurer, Marjorie Cornor; board members at large, Naomi Gowan and Ellen Gibson; executive director, Mazie A. Herin.

ASDAN holds an annual meeting usually preceding or following the meetings of the American Nurses' Association or the National League for Nursing.

ASDAN awards honors to outstanding SDA nurses through the Nurse of the Year and the Hall of Fame programs. At the 1974 annual meeting the president recognized 18 chapters of ASDAN located in various sections of the North American Division. The secretary reported a total of 1,879 members in the association. ASDAN publishes the Forum four times a year as its official organ.

Other divisions have formed or are planning to organize associations for SDA nurses. The British Adventist Nurses Association (BANA) was organized Apr. 1, 1972. Tabitha Abel was elected the first president; Ruth Balderstone, secretary; Ann Marie Kelly, treasurer. This association publishes the BANA Newsletter several times a year.

The Pan American SDA Nurses Association was organized in November 1972, and the nurses of the Mexican Union organized in 1973. For a number of years SDA nurses in Germany have had an association called Friedensauer Schwesternschaft. The nurses in Brazil and Argentina are working on separate organizations for SDA nurses in these countries.

ASDAN ceased to exist as a membership organization in 1993 and became ASDAN-NAD, an official committee of the North American Division. The mission remains the same.

Association of SDA Optometrists

ASSOCIATION OF SDA OPTOMETRISTS. An organization established by a group of practicing optometrists of the Seventh-day Adventist Church in June 1958 at the White Memorial Hospital in Los Angeles, California. Its purpose is sixfold: to aid in spiritual development of its members; to promote greater missionary activities through their offices and their churches; to encourage active participation in foreign mission service; to encourage students in SDA academies and colleges to study optometry; to stimulate members in current scientific developments; to encourage members to attend the annual meetings for spiritual and social development.

The members of this organization are confined to individuals that subscribe to the code of ethics of the American Optometric Association and who are members in good standing in the SDA Church. Student membership may be granted to individuals of accredited schools and colleges of optometry who also are members in good standing in the SDA Church. They may be entitled to all rights and privileges of regular members except the right to vote or hold office. Meetings of the association shall be held annually during the months of June, July, or August, usually just prior to the annual meeting of the American Optometric Association or at such other time and place as shall be determined by the president and the board of directors. In August 1973 the first SDA optometrist, Dr. Robert Baker, was given mission appointment by the General Conference to the island of Guam in the Far Eastern Division. Since then, this clinic has been expanded with the addition of two more optometrists and an ophthalmologist. Eye clinics also have been established in Manzini, Swaziland; Lilongwe, Malawi; and on the islands of Palau and Saipan.

The organization is a member of the Health Advisory Commission for the General Conference of Seventh-day Adventists. In 1993 Clarence D. Omans was serving as assistant director for vision affairs in the Health and Temperance Department of the General Conference.

Astronomy

ASTRONOMY. From the beginning Seventh-day Adventists have had an interest in certain elements of astronomy as they relate to certain aspects of their teaching: 1. Chronology. Seventh-day Adventists inherited their chronology of the 2300 prophetic days from the Millerites, who had cited for it the canon, or king list, of the ancient astronomer Ptolemy as well as the ancient lunisolar calendar. 2. The Sabbath. Advocacy of the Sabbath often evokes the demand for an explanation of certain problems, such as the phenomenon of the day beginning at the date line and traveling with sunset round the rotating globe; of the sunset reckoning of the Sabbath in the polar regions, which is connected with the inclination of the earth's axis; of the continuity of the week (see Sabbath, VI; Week).

Astronomical cycles cannot identify the first Sabbath (or the year of Creation or the day of the Crucifixion); but there are certain dates in OT history that have been fixed by astronomical computation (for example, in Nebuchadnezzar's reign; see SDADic, "Chronology," V, 3; SDACom 2:152; SB, no. 452). On the other hand, the very absence of any astronomical basis for a seven-day cycle is cited by SDAs as strengthening the case for the Mosaic account of the origin of the week (see SB, Nos. 1762, 1766; also Encyclopaedia Britannica (11th ed.), vol. 4, p. 988). 3. Cosmic-theological concept. Beginning with Ellen G. White's early references to other planets (2SG 83; EW 39, 40), which influenced the pioneer leader Joseph Bates, SDAs developed a sort of cosmic-theological concept of the earth as a planet—indeed, a revolted planet—among other worlds in an orderly universe sustained by the Creator. They see world history as a cosmic demonstration of both the results of sin on a rebel world and the redemptive power of God's love; and they envision the re-creation of this globe as Paradise restored (see Home of the Redeemed).

In addition, evangelists have often employed popularized descriptions of the heavenly bodies as examples of the obedience of the cosmos to God's natural law, and as evidence of His creative and sustaining power.

Asunción Adventist Academy

ASUNCIÓN ADVENTIST ACADEMY (Colegio Adventista de Asunción). A coeducational secondary school that specializes in Japanese language education as well as Spanish. Part of the Paraguay Mission, it is located in Asunción, capital of Paraguay, in the heart of South America.

It was built in 1971, with a small dormitory for Japanese students and a school building to be used for teaching in the Japanese language. In 1993, 145 students attended the Japanese school.

In 1975 an elementary school in Spanish was opened, and in 1980 the initial high school classes were taught. In 1982 the full high school program of six years training was added. The academy has been accredited by the Board of Regents since 1986.

In 1993, 185 off-campus students were in attendance, served by 17 teachers. The library contains 3,350 volumes.

Asunción Adventist Sanitarium

ASUNCIÓN ADVENTIST SANITARIUM (Sanatorio Adventista de Asunción) (formerly Paraguay Adventist Sanitarium and Hospital). A general acute hospital owned and operated by the Austral Union Conference, situated in the capital city of Asunción on the principal road leading to the interior (Pettirossi 372). The brick building (its interior portion three stories high), with 25 adult beds, two pediatric beds, five bassinets, and an Isolette incubator, provides care for private as well as charity patients and has facilities for surgical, obstetrical, medical, and pediatric cases. The staff consists of two physicians, an administrator, 14 nurses, a physiotherapist, and 10 auxiliary personnel.

The forerunner of the sanitarium was the Fisioterapia Mayo (Asunción Treatment Rooms), which was opened under the auspices of the Paraguay Mission in August 1945 and was staffed by Miguel Esparcia and his wife and Arnol Treiyer, graduate nurses from the River Plate Sanitarium in Argentina. In April 1954 Ira E. Bailie, M.D., a graduate from Loma Linda, arrived to direct the medical work in Asunción. Plans were drawn up, and construction was begun on a hospital building on land previously purchased. The building was completed in February 1957, at which time the Fisioterapia Mayo was transferred to its new headquarters, but it was not until 1959 that equipment arrived making inpatient care possible. On May 18, 1959, the first patient was admitted, the next day the first surgery was performed, and a few days later the first baby was born. Though the hospital was functioning, it was not inaugurated until a few months later, July 26, 1959.

It was not long until the sanitarium bed capacity was inadequate, and in November 1960 land adjoining the original plot was purchased and plans were laid to increase the bed capacity and to modernize the outpatient facilities. The first stage of this expansion project was begun in August 1962, and was completed in 1964. An expansion project being planned will bring the capacity to 50 beds. The second stage of the expansion now in progress will add 1,076 square yards (900 square meters), which will permit relocation of surgery, intensive care, and other facilities. The space now used for these services will provide room for 10 new beds. The planned expansion will require the services of four additional doctors (a general physician, a surgeon, a gynecologist, a pediatrician), four nurses, two nurse's aides, a biochemist, a chaplain, and an administrative employee. This hospital serves all economic classes; more than two thirds of the patients come from low-income groups.

Athens International Academy

ATHENS INTERNATIONAL ACADEMY. An English language secondary school that operated from 1972 to 1982 under the direction of Home Study Institute. From an enrollment of 12 in 1972 the number of students rose to a peak of 35. During its existence more than 80 young people enrolled in the school, and a significant number of these made their decision for baptism. A total of 10 student missionaries gave invaluable assistance in math and science classes.

After a decade of operation, the school was closed; it was a unique experience for the students, teachers, and the Greek Mission.

Principals: Nick Germanis, 1972—1982.

Atlanta Adventist Academy

ATLANTA ADVENTIST ACADEMY. A college preparatory high school serving the Seventh-day Adventist youth of the Greater Atlanta area. The academy has been in operation as a senior academy since 1979 and has an average enrollment in the nineties. A high percentage of the students are enrolled in a college preparatory course. Ten constituent churches support this high school. In the past two years, approximately $500,000 has been spent in expansion and refurbishing. Buildings on campus include an administration building, chapel, elementary school, music building, and gymnasium.

Principals: Keith Gibbons, 1979; David Fardulis, 1980; William Worth, 1981—1982; Victor Kostenko, 1983—1987; William Ruby, 1987—1991; Dean Maddock, 1991— .

Atlantic Conference

ATLANTIC CONFERENCE. A former unit of church organization existing in North America from 1889 to 1902. It originally embraced New York City, Long Island, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, and the District of Columbia. In 1899 it was reduced to Greater New York, Long Island, and New Jersey, when the southern portion was formed into the Chesapeake Conference. In 1902 the Atlantic Conference was divided into the Greater New York (including Long Island) and New Jersey conferences.

Atlantic Union College (AUC)

ATLANTIC UNION COLLEGE (AUC). A coeducational four-year undergraduate liberal arts college operated by the Atlantic Union Conference. With more than a century of recognized academics behind it, the small New England college has an international student body. It first opened in 1882 as an academy. Its strategic location in South Lancaster, Massachusetts, 40 miles (65 kilometers) west of Boston, 15 miles (25 kilometers) north of Worcester, and 190 miles (305 kilometers) northeast of New York City, allows for cultural outings to museums and concert halls, as well as to nearby historic landmarks.

Incorporated under the laws of Massachusetts, it is authorized to grant the degrees of Bachelor of Arts, Bachelor of Science, Bachelor of Arts in Music, Master of Education, and Associate in Science. AUC is a member of the New England Association of Colleges and Secondary Schools, is on the approved list of the Board of Regents of the University of the State of New York, and is a member of the Association of American Colleges.

The faculty of Atlantic Union College has adopted a master plan that emphasizes traditional and nontraditional academic programs. Besides the on-campus program, the college offers other programs for those interested. Continuing education coordinates degree programs for people who live within commuting distance of the college, particularly in afternoon and evening courses. The adult degree program, begun in 1972, is open to adults 25 or older and is arranged as the student proposes a semester's plan for earning 16 credits. The electronic distance learning program offers college courses via computers for unserved segments of the population, such as residents of correctional facilities and mental institutions. Enrollments in these programs in 1993 were: on-campus program, 653; continuing education, 143; adult degree program, 109; and electronic distance learning, 543.

On Atlantic Union College's tree-lined, 330-acre (133-hectare) campus tradition and technology not only coexist but thrive. The college's book collection, consisting in 1993 of more than 110,000 volumes, has been housed since 1970 in the G. Eric Jones Library. The present college administration building, Haskell Hall, first occupied in the autumn of 1951, is named for the founder of the college, S. N. Haskell.

In 1975 the college restored its first administration building, the oldest academic building at an SDA college still standing on its original site. Now called Founders Hall, the 107-year-old building contains a chapel, classrooms, and offices for the Department of Theology and Religion. On display are Bundy's portraits of Mr. and Mrs. William Miller, a pulpit used by Miller, and other Adventist memorabilia.

The Bartlett Art Gallery is a local museum landmark purchased by the college in 1973, named for Mabel R. Bartlett, professor emeritus of art, and renovated as the headquarters of the college's Art Department. The Thayer Conservatory of Music is housed in an elegant nineteenth-century mansion once owned by New England's prestigious Thayer family.

In 1993, under the coordination of Lawrence Geraty, then college president, ground was broken for the Chan Shun Dining Commons, named in honor of its major donor, an SDA philanthropist.

The college's two main dormitories are Rachel Preston Hall and Lenheim Hall. In addition, the college maintains apartments for married students.

History. Early in 1882 S. N. Haskell called the quarterly meeting of the New England Tract and Missionary Society to meet in Lancaster to consider the "propriety of establishing a Seventh-day Adventist school at some point in New England," also to find out how many would patronize the school if established, and whether the members were ready to support such a venture.

At the meeting, held Feb. 4 and 5, 1882, most of those who spoke on the subject were strongly in favor of the project. Resolutions were passed indicating approval, Dores A. Robinson and F. W. Mace were named to meet with the conference committee (S. N. Haskell, C. W. Comings, J. C. Tucker) to act as a school committee.

The school committee chose South Lancaster as the place for the new institution and announced that the school would open about the first of April. G. H. Bell, of Battle Creek College, was chosen as the first principal.

The first term opened on Apr. 19, 1882, with 19 pupils. The teachers included S. N. Haskell, G. H. Bell, Dores A. Robinson, Edith Sprague, and Maria Huntley. For a time the small new school went unnamed; frequent articles about the new educational project appearing in the Review and Herald referred to it simply as "that New England school," a name that indicated neither its educational level nor its specific locality in New England.

The enrollment continued to increase so that the school had to be moved from its original one room to the basement of the South Lancaster church, which it occupied from September 1882 until June 1884.

At the close of the fall term, on Nov. 29, 1882, the New England Conference, in a meeting in South Lancaster, voted to form a permanent school organization according to the laws of the state and to raise $15,000 to purchase and erect buildings and purchase land in South Lancaster or elsewhere. On Dec. 12, 1883, a board of managers was elected and the school was incorporated under the laws of Massachusetts as South Lancaster Academy. Land was purchased and permanent academy buildings were erected, which were dedicated on Oct. 29, 1884.

Although advanced courses were offered for some years in several departments, it was not until 1918, during the administration of M. E. Olsen, that the school became a full-fledged junior college, and the name was changed to Lancaster Junior College.

In 1922, under the presidency of Benjamin F. Machlan, the college was granted the right to confer the Bachelor of Theology degree to those finishing a new four-year course. At the same time, the name was changed to Atlantic Union College.

In 1926 permission was granted to give a Bachelor of Religious Education degree. In 1927 the Atlantic Union College Alumni Association was organized. In 1933 permission was granted by Massachusetts to confer the Bachelor of Arts degree. Regional accreditation was achieved in 1945. Permission was granted to confer the Bachelor of Science degree in 1954.

The college paper, The Lancastrian, had earlier predecessors. The True Educator, beginning in April 1884, was published by South Lancaster Academy. At first an eight-page monthly, it was enlarged during the administration of C. C. Ramsay to 16 pages, and the subscription list reached about 800. In 1890 the academy students began to publish a new monthly paper called The Kaleidoscope, but there were only five issues. In December 1907 the students began another paper called The Student Idea, which in October 1926 became The Lancastrian.

The Atlantic Union Conference, originally called the Eastern Union Conference, was formed Apr. 16, 1901, at the General Conference session. At that time it was made up of nine conferences (Maine, Vermont, New England, New York, Pennsylvania, Atlantic, Chesapeake, Virginia, and Quebec) and two mission fields (the Maritime Provinces and Newfoundland).

Later, at the first biennial session of this union, held Nov. 27 to Dec. 5, 1901, the name was changed to Atlantic Union Conference. At this meeting the territories of Quebec, the Maritime Provinces, and Newfoundland were separated from the Atlantic Union and made part of the Canadian Union Conference.

In 1907 the southern part of the union (the New Jersey, East and West Pennsylvania, Chesapeake, Virginia, and West Virginia conferences) was given over to the then-forming Columbia Union Conference. About 1915 the Bermuda Mission was added to the Atlantic Union Conference.

Atoifi Adventist Hospital

ATOIFI ADVENTIST HOSPITAL. A 100-bed general hospital with facilities for midwifery, surgery, and treatment of tropical diseases. It is situated in East Kwaio on the east coast of Malaita Island in the Solomon Islands, and is owned and operated by the Western Pacific Union of Seventh-day Adventists. The first buildings were funded by the fourth quarter 1965 Thirteenth Sabbath Offering overflow. The first carpenter, Michael, a Solomon Islander, arrived at Atoifi on July 12, 1963, 11 days after his 11-year-old daughter, Linda, died of dysentery.

Brian and Valmae Dunn from Australia were the first nurses appointed to serve at Atoifi Hospital. Eleven days after their arrival, Dec. 19, 1965, while caring for an outpatient, Brian met his death when he was speared by a hostile native. Lens Larwood was appointed in 1966 to take Brian's place. He died in a tractor accident on Aug. 15, 1979.

The hospital was officially opened on Aug. 25, 1966, and has X-ray and laboratory facilities, with power being supplied by a hydro generator.

For many years the M.V. Dani, a 28-foot (8.5-meter) medical launch, was used for medical patrols and infant and maternal welfare clinics. It has been replaced by motorized canoes.

No roads link Atoifi to the outside world. The main contact is through the mission-owned airline. Occasionally the island is served by small passenger or cargo boats. Most patients arrive by canoe or by walking down from the hills.

Two permanent clinics are operated from Atoifi at Honoa and Sango, and village health workers are trained in elementary medical and health care and work in some villages.

Ian Cameron began the nurse training program in 1973, but accreditation of the program was opposed; the first official general nurse program began in 1981. Graduates from this program serve in the 14 Seventh-day Adventist clinics in the Solomon Islands as well as those in Kiribati and Vanuatu. The graduates also are in demand for service in the government's health service.

In 1992 the hospital had 1,602 admissions, treated 23,000 outpatients, and performed 600 surgical procedures. Also, 2,002 patients were treated on patrols and 2,004 were examined in infant welfare clinics.

Medical Superintendents: Dr. L. H. McMahon, 1966—1969; Dr. H. Posala, 1969—1982; Dr. D. Pikacha, 1982—1984; Dr. J. Chee, 1986—1989; Dr. C. Kuma, 1989— .

Directors of Nursing: B. Dunn, 1965; L. Larwood, 1966—1979; R. Leet, 1980—1981; B. Robinson, 1982—1986; B. Vavozo, 1986— .

Directors of School of Nursing: I. Cameron, 1973—1978; L. Doble, 1979—1981; G. Evans, 1982—1984; G. Wilson, 1985; J. Jays, 1986—1989; J. Tutuo, 1989—1991; L. Hope, 1992— .

Atonement

ATONEMENT. Hebrew kippurîm, from kaphar, “to make atonement,” generally believed to have the basic meaning of “to cover.” The Greek katallagē, “reconciliation,” is translated “atonement” once (Rom. 5:11) in the KJV. Theologically atonement is the process by which a sinner is reconciled to God or brought into a state of at-one-ment with Him. Christ’s vicarious sacrifice upon the cross is the central, decisive, effective act in this process, and without it all else would be insufficient to atone for sin. The atonement there provided was perfect and complete. It was “once for all” in the sense that it would never have to be repeated. Having made the atonement on the cross, Christ ascended to heaven as our great high priest, there to be our intercessor and to minister on our behalf the benefits of the atonement made available at the cross (Heb. 7:27; 9:12, 26; 10:10). Since His ascension Christ ever lives to make intercession for us, and this intercession is part of the work of reconciliation, or atonement, in its larger sense (Heb. 7:25; 8:1, 2; 9:11, 12; 10:12—14, 21, 22). Accordingly He invites us to draw near to the throne of grace with confidence, “that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need” (Heb. 4:16).

Some early Adventists, basing their definition of the term on its OT meaning with reference to the ancient sanctuary service, and believing that the ancient priests served “unto the example and shadow of heavenly things” (Heb. 8:5), stressed this high-priestly aspect of Christ’s atoning ministry to the point of seeming to deny that His sacrifice on the cross could properly be called a work of atonement. William Miller, for instance, wrote that Christ’s shedding of His blood on Calvary for a sinful world was “the propitiatory sacrifice to God,” but that the atonement “is made by his life and intercession in heaven (Heb. 7:25),” “so that through his intercession we can be saved by his life (Rom. 5:10; 1 John 5:11)” (letter of Nov. 22, 1844, in Western Midnight Cry 4:26, Dec. 21, 1844).

The misunderstanding arising from the denial by Miller and by some early SDA writers that atonement was made on the cross is a matter of semantics. None of those who denied this denied either the fact or the efficacy of Christ’s sacrifice made on the cross, nor did they believe that He offered another sacrifice in heaven. They were simply using the word “atonement” in its original, biblical sense rather than in the popular theological sense. They pointed out that in the ancient sanctuary service atonement was made for the sinner, not by the slaying of the sacrificial offering, but by the priestly ministry performed within the sanctuary after the sacrifice had been slain: “And he [the penitent] shall lay his hand upon the head of the sin offering, and slay the sin offering in the place of the burnt offering.

“And the priest shall take of the blood thereof. . . . And the priest shall burn it [the fat] upon the altar for a sweet savour unto the Lord; and the priest shall make an atonement for him, and it shall be forgiven him” (Lev. 4:29—31; cf. v. 27).

They contended that the atoning ministry of Christ in the heavenly sanctuary since His ascension—and not His sacrifice on Calvary—was the biblical counterpart of the atoning ministry of the priest in the earthly sanctuary after the sacrifice had been slain (Heb. 9:11—15, 23—26; 10:11—14; cf. Lev. 4:27—31, etc.). Thus when Miller and other early Adventists spoke of the atonement as being made not on the cross, but by Christ after His ascension to heaven, they were technically correct insofar as the use of the word “atonement” in ritual law was concerned. However, contemporary theological usage of the word “atonement” does not include its biblical application to the priestly ministration of the blood of a sacrifice that had already been slain. This is the reason the Seventh-day Adventist position on the atonement has sometimes been misunderstood and misrepresented. In any discussion of the atonement, it is important that this distinction between biblical and modern theological use of the word be recognized.

The relationship between Christ’s sacrifice on the cross and His priestly ministry in heaven since His ascension is explained thus by Ellen G. White: “The intercession of Christ in man’s behalf in the sanctuary above is as essential to the plan of salvation as was His death upon the cross. By His death He began that work which after His resurrection He ascended to complete in heaven” (GC 489).

“The great sacrifice had been offered, and had been accepted, and the Holy Spirit which descended on the day of Pentecost carried the minds of the disciples from the earthly sanctuary to the heavenly, where Jesus had entered by His own blood, to shed upon His disciples the benefits of His atonement” (EW 260; first published in 1858 in ISG 170).

But that this position in no sense depreciates the atonement provided at the cross is evident from her further comments: “The sacrifice of Christ as an atonement for sin is the great truth around which all other truths cluster” (Ellen G. White, in SDACom 5:1137).

“The cross must occupy the central place because it is the means of man’s atonement and because of the influence it exerts on every part of the divine government” (6T 236).

“Christ’s words on the mountainside [in Galilee after the Resurrection] were the announcement that His sacrifice in behalf of man was full and complete. The conditions of the atonement had been fulfilled; the work for which He came to this world had been accomplished” (MS 138, 1897).

When SDAs speak of Christ’s work of atonement in the heavenly sanctuary, they refer to the application to each individual believer, according to his/her need, of the benefits of salvation provided for all at Calvary.

In the ancient sanctuary the solemn services of the annual Day of Atonement brought the yearly ritual cycle to a close (Lev. 16). The work of atonement, or reconciliation, performed on that day brought to completion all that the sanctuary and the priests could do for repentant sinners, and cleansed the sanctuary and the people. On the basis of the clear analogy drawn by the inspired writer of Hebrews between the earthly sanctuary and that in heaven, SDAs recognize in the final phase of the heavenly ministry of Christ a counterpart of the earthly Day of Atonement service. SDAs refer to this concluding phase of Christ’s ministry of reconciliation as the “great antitypical day of atonement,” and the “investigative judgment” (see also Sanctuary).

The need for a reconciliation, or atonement, between God and humanity derives from the fact that when Adam sinned “sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned” (Rom. 5:12; cf. 3:23). Disobedience separated human beings from their Maker, and the outraged divine law demanded the death of the transgressors. God’s justice required that all imperfection must be eradicated. But since humans were the offspring of a loving Creator, almighty love planned a way of escape for those who had fallen into the trap of sin set for them by Satan.

Being a reflection of the character of God, the moral law is immutable. There is nothing sinners can do to recommend themselves to God or to bring about reconciliation. Accordingly God made provision for reconciling sinners to Himself should the need arise. The plan was devised before the creation of Adam (1 Peter 1:20), and explained to him before his expulsion from Eden (Gen. 3:15). This plan called for the Son of God to lay aside His divine power, to be clothed with a human body, to meet temptation as humans must meet it, yet without sin, and to die a vicarious death in the sinner's place. He would be treated as the worst of sinners, and experiencing separation from the love and presence of the Father, He would suffer for all sinners. He paid the price of sin and offered humanity His righteousness.

John 3:16 summarizes the plan of the atonement: "For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." The love of God is free, but it must be believed and accepted voluntarily. It is available to all, but not all accept it. There can be no atonement for those who "neglect so great salvation" and refuse to "live by faith" (Heb. 2:3; Rom. 1:17). A complete atonement must not only afford pardon for past sins but also provide human beings with power to overcome temptation. For this reason Christ lived among humans as their example and also offers them the Holy Spirit to enable them to live sinless lives.

Auburn Adventist Academy

AUBURN ADVENTIST ACADEMY. A coeducational boarding school on the senior high school level, situated 4.5 miles (7.2 kilometers) southwest of Auburn, Washington, between the Olympic Mountains and the Cascade Range, on a plateau overlooking the Green River Valley. The school serves the constituency of the Washington Conference and is accredited by the SDA Board of Regents, the Washington State Board of Education, and Northwest Association of Schools and Colleges.

The academy replaced two conference schools, one at Mount Vernon and the other near Battle Ground. Under the leadership of George F. Enoch, funds were raised at the 1919 camp meeting to complete a single-unit administration building with classrooms, chapel, kitchen, dining room, and girls' and boys' dormitories; also to erect an apartment dwelling for faculty and workers. The school (called Western Washington Missionary Academy until 1930) opened in 1919 under the principalship of Lyle C. Shepard. In 1930 the name was changed to Auburn Academy and in 1971 to Auburn Adventist Academy.

On May 6, 1921, fire destroyed the administration building; in 1922 a new administration building and a separate 40-student girls' dormitory, Regina Hall, were erected (Regina Hall was enlarged in 1926 and 1937). The boys moved into East Hall, the former apartment dwelling.

A dormitory accommodating 80 boys (and boasting hot and cold water) was constructed in 1931—1932 of lumber produced by a student-operated sawmill, using trees from the academy property. The dormitory was named in honor of Olaf Gibson, a retired halibut fisherman, who donated liberally to the project. East Hall became a gymnasium in 1933—1934, and in 1943, a girls' dormitory and Manual Arts Department.

Several buildings were erected during the administration of A. J. Olson: a new building of 21,000-square-foot (1,950-square-meter) capacity, to replace the woodshop, which burned in 1942; a 9,000-square-foot (850-square-meter) gymnasium in 1943; a two-story service building containing a pasteurizing plant, laundry, cannery, Home Economics Department, and extra classrooms in 1945, to which were added in 1947 a new power plant, metal shop, and Maintenance Department (the power plant was moved to a separate location in 1949; the service building burned down in 1988); and South Hall, a three-story girls' dormitory and cafeteria, completed by stages, 1946—1949. After extensive remodeling, South Hall was renamed Ruby E. Nelson Hall in 1965.

Regina Hall, changed to a boys' dormitory in 1949, was renamed Manous Hall, in memory of N. L. Manous, teacher of music and Spanish from 1945 to 1947, who died while teaching at the Chile Training School. This building was razed in 1965.

The woodshop burned in 1951 and was rebuilt in 1952. In 1953 the woodworking and mechanical drawing classes moved from East Hall to the service building, and the Music Department moved to East Hall.

In 1958 a concrete shower room was added to Gibson Hall, and the Washington Conference built a 28,000-square-foot (2,600-square-meter) camp meeting auditorium that supplemented the school gymnasium. In 1959 a maintenance garage was constructed, and architectural studies for a long-range building program were instituted.

By the 1962—1963 school year a masonry-and-steel boys' dormitory was ready for use. It accommodated 180 students and included two deans' apartments, a recreation room, and a chapel. In 1965 it was renamed C. L. Witzel Hall.

In 1965 construction was completed on a one-level masonry-and-steel administration building (C. A. Scriven Hall, with classrooms, learning resources center, and chapel accommodations for 500 students) and a chapel for the girls' dormitory (with a seating capacity of 178). With a new cafeteria, Rudolph Hall, in 1963 and the remodeling of the girls' dormitory the same year, the academy's three-year expansion program (1963—1965) cost more than $1 million.

In 1966 operation of the academy furniture factory, established by C. L. Witzel in 1926, was transferred to the General Conference industrial organization Harris Pine Mills. This organization employed approximately 200 students annually.

During the 1968—1969 school year approximately $40,000 was spent in remodeling Gibson Hall, an overflow girls' dormitory. During the following year the Land Improvement District installed water and sewer lines throughout the campus at a cost of $43,000. A storm sewer system was installed in 1991 in order to eliminate standing surface water during the rainy season.

A 2,100-square-foot (195-square-meter) swimming pool, with lockers, shower rooms, and physical education personnel offices, adjacent to the school gymnasium, Rainier Auditorium, was opened in 1969.

In 1974 the Music Department transferred from the former administration building to a single-level brick structure designed for that purpose, immediately west of C. A. Scriven Hall. During the same year, the students and staff raised more than $150,000 in cash, materials, and labor to construct a 16,000-square-foot (1,500-square-meter) industrial arts building. This complex, completed in the spring and summer of 1974, was named Spady Hall in 1986. During 1974 construction of a three-bedroom home for the girls' dean, adjoining Nelson Hall, was completed.

A 17,300-square-foot (1,600-square-meter) church building seating 850 was ready for services in 1981 and was dedicated in 1986. In 1985 the Loving to Learn Day-Care Center for ages 1—10 was opened. In 1993 an addition to accommodate children from 6 months to 12 years of age was being planned.

In July 1993, prior to the Maranatha International convention being held on campus, more than 100 Maranatha volunteers made major renovations in the administration building, music building, faculty housing, and other areas.

Since the founding of the school more than 5,500 students have graduated. Graduation classes have grown from five members in 1920 to more than 100 per year.

Yearly enrollments that fluctuated between 300 and 400 since the mid-1940s rose sharply in 1968 to 547 and peaked in 1974 with 595. Since then enrollment averages between 350 and 400 students.

Auckland Adventist Hospital

AUCKLAND ADVENTIST HOSPITAL. A 62-bed surgical and medical hospital owned and operated by the Trans-Tasman Union Conference, situated at St. Heliers, a suburb of Auckland, New Zealand. The hospital is built on an elevated site overlooking the nearby harbor and gulf. Although the hospital project was conceived as early as 1963, it was not until 1972 that work began on its construction. On July 30, 1972, Ralph F. Waddell, M.D., unveiled a plaque commemorating the beginning of building. The hospital was officially opened by the mayor of Auckland on Jan. 20, 1974.

Medical Directors: R. J. Swannell, 1974—1977; A. D. Laughlin, 1978—1991; D. Rankin, 1992— .

Auckland Adventist High School

AUCKLAND ADVENTIST HIGH SCHOOL. A coeducational day school on the senior high school level, operated by the North New Zealand Conference. It is situated in Mangere, Auckland, New Zealand, approximately six miles (10 kilometers) from the center of the city. In 1993 the enrollment of the high school was 160, with a staff of 12 teachers. The students are drawn from all the Auckland suburban Seventh-day Adventist churches.

The school developed from a primary school established in 1945 at the rear of the Balmoral church. In 1949, shortly after the Remuera church school began to offer high school studies, the two schools amalgamated, and the Balmoral Adventist High School came into being. Then in 1956, when the Royal Oak Primary School combined with it, the Balmoral High School became the Auckland Adventist Central School, with 43 primary and 23 secondary pupils. In 1958 an adjoining property was purchased, on which extra classrooms and staff facilities were erected. Membership growth led the Balmoral church to rebuild on a completely new site, where it became known as the Brentwood Avenue church. The school took over the old church building (1961), converting it into a library, a commercial room, and a classroom.

In 1970 the secondary school was separated from the primary department and moved to a new location at Mangere. The new site provides ample space for playing fields and tennis and basketball courts, as well as a new classroom and administration building with library, science laboratory, home economics room, commercial room, and woodwork shop.

Between 1981 and 1985 additional buildings added were: a design technology and chapel complex; a new administration wing; and extensions to the library.

The Auckland Adventist High School, registered as a high school with the New Zealand Ministry of Education, offers both an academic course and a commercial course, and prepares for the University Entrance Examination.

Auditing Service

AUDITING SERVICE. An organization that makes a systematic audit of financial records of all organizations in the Seventh-day Adventist body from the local church to the General Conference.

From the time the General Conference was organized in 1863, provision was made by the General Conference Executive Committee for the appointment of an auditing committee annually to audit the books of account. As the General Conference grew and its constituent organizations and institutions multiplied, the annual appointment of a committee was superseded by the election of an auditor of the General Conference and associates as required by the increasing volume of work.

Each overseas division committee followed the pattern by electing a division auditor and by appointing auditors for the union missions. In North America each union conference elected an auditor and such associates as were necessary. Auditors on the union level were responsible for financial audits of local conferences/missions in their respective territories and of union institutions—publishing, educational, and health care.

The responsibility for audits of local churches, church schools, and other entities under the direction of the local conference has throughout the period rested with the local conference executive committee, which elects or appoints the local conference auditor.

The General Conference auditor and staff audited the records of the General Conference and its legal corporations, as well as those of all divisions and General Conference institutions. In all cases, annual reports were submitted by the auditor to the organization's executive committee and, as scheduled meetings of constituencies took place, to the assembled constituency. In the case of the General Conference, this meant an annual report to the full General Conference Committee and a report by the General Conference auditor to the General Conference session on a four-year and later a five-year basis.

As membership in all divisions grew, and as the financial activity of the various organizations became more significant and more diversified, it was seen that, from considerations of objectivity and independence, it was wise to distance the auditing function on all levels from the controlling committees at those levels. Thus in 1976 the General Conference Committee in the Annual Council authorized the establishment of a unitary Auditing Service as a part of the General Conference structure. The Auditing Service was organized with a director and associate directors, and the North American Division territory was set up in three areas, each with several district offices corresponding, in most cases, to the territories of the union conferences. The same pattern was expected to be followed in other divisions, and this reorganization has been going forward since 1977.

Under the new plan the responsibility for all audits, down to the local conference level, rests directly with professionally qualified individuals elected or appointed by the General Conference and under the day-to-day guidance of the director of the General Conference Auditing Service. This step has led to the application of uniform standards of reporting and disclosure for all organizations, and to the development of higher standards of training and proficiency in all members of the worldwide auditing staff. It has made it possible to raise the standards of auditing around the world to more nearly meet those of the business community in developed countries.

At the time of the establishment of the Auditing Service in 1976, a policy was also enunciated that placed the responsibility for auditing the General Conference itself, and its related legal organizations, on a firm of independent Seventh-day Adventist certified public accountants selected by the General Conference Executive Committee.

Under the unitary plan, all audits of all denominational organizations, from the local conference level through to the General Conference itself, are performed by professional auditors independent of their employing organizations. Audits of local churches and entities operated by local churches remain under the aegis of the local conference constituency, which names the local conference auditor with counsel from the director of the General Conference Auditing Service.

Auditors: J. J. Ireland, 1914—1932; Claude Conard, 1932—1942; W. E. Phillips, 1942—1955; H. W. Barrows, 1956—1958; E. L. Becker, 1958—1964; R. J. Radcliffe, 1964—1968; R. M. Reinhard (acting), 1968—1970; R. M. Davidson, 1970—1976; David D. Dennis, 1976— .

Aufranc, Louis

AUFRANC, LOUIS (1842—1906). One of the pioneers of Seventh-day Adventist work in Europe. He was a teacher at a school in Le Locle, Switzerland, when he became acquainted with SDAs through a series of evangelistic meetings that D. T. Bourdeau held in that community in 1876. Convinced that the SDA interpretation of Christianity was correct, he resigned his position as an elder of a local Protestant church, accepted baptism, and moved to Basel. There he assisted in the founding of Les Signes des Temps and in publishing SDA materials generally. He translated many articles and also wrote his own. Being a good linguist, he translated into French The Life of Christ and The Great Controversy, both by Ellen G. White. He was employed full-time by the church for only a short time and later studied and practiced dentistry in Basel and its vicinity.

Auger, Emery P.

AUGER, EMERY P. (1864—1922). Pioneer Seventh-day Adventist colporteur in France. Born in Ayer, Massachusetts, he went to France about 1888. There he made an attempt to sell SDA publications, but apparently was not there long enough to develop the work, which had a new beginning some eight or nine years later. After his return to the United States he was a self-supporting missionary in the South.

Augsburger, Ulysse

AUGSBURGER, ULYSSE (1878—1963). Minister, pioneer missionary in North Africa, and conference administrator. A Swiss national, he was baptized into the Seventh-day Adventist Church in 1891, and was one of the first French-speaking young men to be trained for the ministry at the Geneva and Paris training institutes (1901—1903). In 1907 he was ordained to the ministry. In 1908 he went to Algeria, where, with the help of José Abella, he established a church. He was president of the Lemman Conference (1917—1923; 1932—1938), the North France Conference (1923—1929), and the South France Conference (1929—1932). He continued being listed until 1950 in the Yearbook as an active minister in the Lemman Conference. He was a successful evangelist and a good pastor, rather conservative in his outlook, but a staunch supporter of the church program in all its facets. He was married twice, first to Ruth Jeanlouis, who died in 1934, and then to Clementine Fankhauser.

Austin, Linda Hyacinth

AUSTIN, LINDA HYACINTH (1903—1980). Educator, administrator. Born in Trinidad, she was taken to Panama at the age of 9. She was among the first students enrolled at the Adventist school in the Canal Zone. In 1926 she graduated and was baptized. A year later she was among the first teachers to arrive at Caribbean Union College, where she served for 40 years. She was the first West Indian to serve in a leadership role at that school, acting as teacher, matron, and head of the Secretarial Department, as well as treasurer. Although a strict disciplinarian, she exemplified Christian grace. Her exemplary role caused the school to name the women's residence in her honor. After retiring in 1967, she served for 12 years as manager of the Voice of Prophecy Bible School of the South Caribbean Conference.

Australia

AUSTRALIA. A self-governing country comprising geographically the continent of Australia (the smallest continent in the world) and the island of Tasmania to the south—a total land area of 2,966,151 square miles (7,682,300 square kilometers), slightly smaller than that of the United States of America, all lying south of the equator, between the Indian Ocean and the South Pacific Ocean. It is divided into six states (New South Wales, Victoria, Queensland, South Australia, Western Australia, and Tasmania) and two territories (Northern and Australian Capital). Its population (1994) is 18 million.

The country has hundreds of species of eucalyptus and acacia trees. About 1,000 flowering plants are indigenous to the country. The fauna peculiar to Australia includes the emu, wallaby, koala, kangaroo and duck-billed platypus (a creature that has a facial projection resembling the bill of a duck, lays eggs, is covered with hair, and suckles its young). The country has a variety of bright-plumaged birds; there are no fierce beasts of prey.

The continent has an equable climate and is well watered by lakes and rivers along its great coastal belts, with the exception of the Great Australian Bight. The longest rivers are the Murray and its tributary, the Darling. The Murray rises in the Snowy Mountains, near Mount Kosciusko (7,316 feet [2,230 meters] in elevation and Australia's highest), and forms the border between Victoria and New South Wales for a distance of 1,200 miles (1,930 kilometers).

Primary products include wool, coal, beef, sheep, steel, dairy products, and wheat. Australia's mineral wealth includes gold, bauxite, uranium, silver, and lead, and the recently discovered large oil deposits. The estimated population of Australia in 1992 was approximately 17.6 million, predominantly of European descent and basically of British extraction. The indigenous people are the Aborigines. After a period of decline, their numbers are increasing. Their heritage and nomadic lifestyle have contributed to major cultural clashes between them and the Caucasian population. However, significant moves toward reconciliation and integration are now taking place.

Universal manhood suffrage was conceded to the Australian colonies in the 1850s, and secret voting (the "Australian ballot") was first adopted by Victoria in 1856. Woman suffrage was enacted in 1902. A number of benevolent social service schemes are administered by the government, such as pensions for the aged, child endowments, maternity allowances, and sickness and unemployment benefits. Australia regulates its basic wage and maximum hours of work.

Historical Background

Historical Background. Dutch explorers visited the northern coast of Australia in the early seventeenth century and named it New Holland. Captain James Cook explored the east coast and took formal possession of that portion on behalf of the English Crown on Aug.

23, 1770, calling it New South Wales. The first settlement was a British colony founded in 1788. In the nineteenth century the continent became known as Australia and was claimed in its entirety by Great Britain.

Through the activities of courageous explorers and the rapid expansion of the parent colony of New South Wales after the discovery of gold in 1851, four new colonies were formed: Victoria, Tasmania, South Australia, and Queensland. These became self-governing by 1860. Western Australia, founded in 1829, did not have self-government until 1890. In 1901 the six colonies federated themselves as states into the Commonwealth of Australia, governed by a federal parliament consisting of a Senate and a House of Representatives, with a governor-general acting for the sovereign. Each of the six states has its own constitution, governor, and parliament (bicameral except in Queensland, which in 1922 ceased to operate the upper house). The federal capital is Canberra, in the Australian Capital Territory, which lies within the state of New South Wales.

The federal government administers the Northern Territory (which came under its control in 1911) and several overseas territories such as Norfolk Island and Christmas Island. Australia claims a large portion of the Antarctic regions to the south, an estimated 2,472,000 square miles (6,402,000 square kilometers).

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. Seventh-day Adventist teachings were first preached in Australia by Alexander Dickson, of Melbourne, Australia, who accepted them while serving as a missionary in Africa, where he came in contact with Hannah More, another missionary, and heard from her what she had learned of SDAs on visiting New England about 1861. When Dickson returned to his homeland, he published tracts and traveled about preaching the new doctrine to people. Although his work aroused considerable favorable interest, he did not succeed in developing any visible results, and became discouraged (S. N. Haskell, in Historical Sketches, p. 94). The next move to introduce SDA doctrines into Australia was made from the United States.

As early as 1874 Ellen G. White urged the SDA Church to spread the message widely, and made particular mention of the continent of Australia (LS 209). At a General Conference session in Battle Creek in 1884 an action was taken to send S. N. Haskell to Australia. On May 10, 1885, a party consisting of Haskell, J. O. Corliss, M. C. Israel, William Arnold, and Henry Scott, with their families, sailed from San Francisco, and upon arrival in Australia settled in the city of Melbourne, Victoria. That country thus became the first in the Southern Hemisphere to be entered by SDA missionaries. While Haskell, Corliss, and Israel engaged in evangelistic work, Arnold devoted himself to selling books, disposing of 2,168 during his brief stay in Australia. Scott was occupied in organizing the equipment to print literature.

The first Sabbath school in Australia was held on July 4, 1885, and the first public discourse by an SDA was delivered a week later by Corliss in the Temperance Hall in Richmond, a suburb of Melbourne. Four weeks later the first SDA convert in Australia, J. H. Stockton, with his two children, joined the Sabbath school. The first tent meetings were conducted by Corliss in North Fitzroy, a northern suburb of Melbourne, with meetings held every night from Oct. 25, 1885, to January 1886. On Jan. 10, 1886, the first SDA church in the Southern Hemisphere was organized. Then meetings were held in South Melbourne. By the time these meetings ended, further accessions brought the number to 55; by May this church recorded a membership of 90, and within five years a membership of more than 200.

In January 1886 Corliss and Haskell began editing and publishing a 16-page monthly, The Bible Echo and Signs of the Times. Beginning in January 1889, it was published weekly.

Israel visited Ballarat, Victoria, in May and held cottage meetings every night for three weeks, awakening a keen interest. Corliss followed him, conducting public meetings from June 20 to Aug. 8, when a Sabbath school of 50 was organized. Within a few weeks a church of 20 members was established in Ballarat.

South Australia was entered when, in September 1886, Corliss opened a series of meetings in Norwood, Adelaide. Within 12 weeks, on Nov. 27, an initial company of 34 members was organized, which developed into a strong church.

Early in 1887 additional workers from the United States, W. D. Curtis, Byron Belden, W.L.H. Baker, and their families, arrived in Melbourne. During 1887, meetings were held in Geelong, Daylesford, Trentham, Wychitella, and Kyneton, where groups of converts were gathered.

Curtis' first appointment was to the town of Castlemaine, Victoria, where a church was established. Later he built up churches in the suburbs of Melbourne and Adelaide, using a large pavilion for his meetings. It was necessary at times to hold double sessions to accommodate his audiences. He returned to the United States in 1892, after a ministry of five and a half years.

Tasmania was entered after an interest had been created there through the distribution of publications. A tent mission was conducted by Israel and Baker in Sandy Bay, Hobart, beginning late in February 1888. They moved to the Federal Hall when cold weather set in. In a short time 60 had enrolled in the Sabbath school, and a church of 24 members was organized in June of that year. In July 1889 there were 50 members and about 100 Sabbathkeepers reported. Early in 1889 David Steed entered Bismarck (Collinsvale), a rural community about 12 miles from Hobart, and established a church of 33 members. Churches were established also in Latrobe and Launceston.

Australian Conference Organized. At a general meeting held in the Rae Street Temperance Hall, North Fitzroy, Melbourne, the Australian Conference was organized about the first of September 1888. G. C. Tenney was elected president and Stephen McCullagh secretary. At the same meeting the Australian Tract and Missionary Society was organized, with M. C. Israel as president and Josie L. Baker as secretary. Delegates were present from the Adelaide, Ballarat, Hobart, and Melbourne churches, and a representative from the company at Wychitella. At that time 335 Sabbathkeepers were reported in Australia and Tasmania, 266 of whom were church members.

In 1888 a three-story building was erected in Melbourne, and the Echo Publishing Company opened that same year. Here was published monthly The Bible Echo and Signs of the Times, which became a bimonthly and ultimately a weekly periodical. See Signs Publishing Company.

In 1889 E. M. Morrison arrived in Australia with his family, to be the leader of the bookselling work in that country. In the following year, 1890, there were 28 colporteurs; these made monthly sales of more than £1,000. In 1895 a new leader, E. R. Palmer, arrived in Sydney from the United States to manage this important work. From 1914 to 1954 $5.5 million worth of books were sold. Deliveries from 1955 to 1964 amounted to $5.25 million (almost as much in one decade as in the four previous decades), while from 1965 to 1974 book sales reached $6.5 million.

In the latter part of 1889 David Steed was transferred from Tasmania to Victoria and joined Stephen McCullagh in evangelistic tent meetings in Sandhurst (Bendigo). There a church of 22 members was organized with the assistance of Robert Hare, of New Zealand.

The work in New South Wales began in Sydney in 1890 through Steed's ministry. Before the close of the year a church was organized. The meetings continued in a large pavilion in the suburbs of Burwood and Newton. For a brief period in 1891, A. G. Daniells, who had recently been transferred from New Zealand to Australia, was associated with the mission. In 1892 Robert Hare joined Steed in a tent series in Parramatta, one of the outlying suburbs of Sydney, which resulted in a church of 50 members. A church building was erected in five and a half weeks at a cost of £420, and dedicated on Dec. 10, 1892.

Meetings were opened a few miles from Parramatta in the village of Kellyville in 1893. A suitable church building was erected, and within six months a membership of 30 was reported. The movement spread rapidly as interests sprang up in the suburbs and outlying areas of Sydney.

In May 1894 two orchardists, members of the Kellyville church, were charged in court under a statute of Charles II (about 1675) for doing manual work on Sunday, for which the penalty was to forfeit five shillings or, in default, to be set publicly in the stocks for two hours. They were convicted and fined. Three months later another SDA who was similarly sentenced to pay a fine of two shillings and sixpence, with costs, or to spend two hours in the stocks, said, "I will prefer the stocks to paying." The attorney general ultimately recommended remission of the sentence—because there were no stocks. Much public interest and press comment favorable to SDAs was created by these cases.

Ellen G. White in Australia. In 1891 the General Conference arranged for Ellen G. White, her son W. C. White, G. B. Starr and his wife, and other helpers to visit Australia. Her gifts, her spiritual insight, and her counsels brought great blessing and lasting benefit to this field in its formative years. Mrs. White lived in Australia almost 10 years. She made her home on land adjoining the property of the school that is now Avondale College, whose founding she encouraged.

Mrs. White's group arrived in time to attend the fourth session of the Australian Conference, which opened in the Federal Hall, North Fitzroy, on Dec. 23, 1891, with 40 delegates in attendance, in addition to a large number of church members from New South Wales, Victoria, Tasmania, and South Australia. Two new churches, one at Geelong and the other at Latrobe, were received into the conference, and A. G. Daniells was elected president.

A Bible training school was opened at a temporary location on St. Kilda Road, Melbourne, on Aug. 24, 1892, with L. J. Rousseau as principal and G. B. Starr the Bible teacher. The school, which opened the first year with 25 students, was the forerunner of Avondale College.

In 1892 A. G. Daniells organized the first Young People's Society in Adelaide, one of the earliest in the denomination (see Adventist Youth Societies; MV Societies).

The first camp meeting in Australia, with more than 100 tents, was held at Middle Brighton, Victoria, from Jan. 5 to 22, 1894.

O. A. Olsen, president of the General Conference, Ellen G. White, and her son W. C. White were in attendance. It was at this camp meeting, with 40 delegates from nine churches, that the Australasian Union Conference was organized, the first union conference in the denomination, which became a pattern for those later organized. W. C. White was elected president; A. G. Daniells, vice president; and L. J. Rousseau, secretary. Headquarters were in Melbourne (in 1898 they were transferred to Sydney).

This conference decided that G. B. Starr and A. S. Hickox should conduct public evangelism in Rockhampton, Queensland, where there were 10 adherents. Hickox, recently from the United States, was holding meetings in the Seven Hills district, an outlying area of Sydney. He was ordained at the camp meeting on Jan. 20, 1894. The evangelistic meetings in Rockhampton yielded the first church in Queensland, with 48 members.

The following year, G. B. Starr conducted meetings in Toowoomba, where another church of 32 members was organized. In 1898 two more churches, one in South Brisbane and the other in North Brisbane, resulted from the work of S. N. Haskell.

During the inception of the work in Australia, camp meetings drew large and responsive audiences. This invariably led to a keen interest in the proceedings and in the ultimate establishment of a church in the area. For example, a camp meeting held in Ashfield, a suburb of Sydney, in 1894, resulted in a church of 66 members.

During 1894 and 1895, as the work expanded in Sydney, it grew also in the suburbs of Melbourne. Churches were established in Middle Brighton, Williamstown, and Hawthorn. These, with North Fitzroy and Prahran, brought to five the number of Melbourne suburbs in which SDA services were being conducted.

Western Australia Entered. The first series of meetings in Western Australia was opened in the city of Perth on Feb. 9, 1896, by J. O. Corliss. Within a few months a church was established. When Corliss became ill, Robert Hare succeeded him. The membership continued to increase.

About 17 miles (27 kilometers) from Perth, in the Darling Range area of Western Australia, a boarding academy was opened in 1907 to assist students to obtain a secondary education, preparatory to entering Avondale College (see Carmel Adventist College).

Church Schools. Around the turn of the century there was an awakening consciousness of the need not only for denominational higher education but also for church day schools for primary education. On June 10, 1900, it was reported that there was a church school at North Fitzroy, Melbourne, with two teachers and more than 60 pupils in attendance.

Other schools soon followed in the various conferences. Schools and junior colleges have also been established in the fields of the Pacific Island union missions, and today most of the administrative responsibility is being placed upon the island nationals in these areas.

Health Institutions. In her counsels Ellen G. White urged upon the constituency the need for a medical institution for the treatment of the sick. In 1896 treatment rooms were opened in a seven-room house in Ashfield. The work was later transferred to Summer Hill. These were replaced by the Sydney Sanitarium (now Sydney Adventist Hospital) at Wahroonga, a suburb of Sydney, established in 1903. At Adelaide a 10-bed institution called the Adelaide Sanitarium was operated from 1908 to 1919. Warburton Sanitarium (now Warburton Hospital) was established in 1910 in a bush setting in a valley 45 miles (70 kilometers) from Melbourne.

The Sanitarium Health Food Company, now with headquarters at Wahroonga, New South Wales, was opened in Melbourne, registered in 1898, and has established a chain of factories, wholesale distributing depots, and cafés and retail stores in the main cities of Australia and New Zealand. The company's earnings are used to bring assistance to the educational, benevolent, and missionary enterprises sponsored by the church.

Later Organization. The Australasian Union Conference, organized at the conclusion of the Australian Conference session held during the first camp meeting in 1894, comprised the Australian Conference and the New Zealand Conference. In 1895 the Australian Conference was divided into two conferences: the New South Wales Conference, with W. C. White as president, comprised the colony of New South Wales; and the Central Australian Conference, with A. G. Daniells as president, comprised Victoria, South Australia, and Tasmania. In 1899 Queensland, which with West Australia had been administered as a mission by the union, was organized as a conference, with 211 members and with G. C. Tenney as president. South Australia was organized as a separate conference in 1899, with a membership of 190, and with J. H. Woods as president. Tasmania became a separate conference in 1901, with a membership of 150 and with E. Hilliard as the first president. In 1902 the West Australian Conference was organized, with a membership of 152 and with J. Pallant as president.

In 1920 the New South Wales Conference was divided into the North New South Wales Conference and the South New South Wales Conference. In 1949 the South New South Wales Conference was divided into the Greater Sydney Conference and the South New South Wales Conference. The latter had its headquarters originally in Wagga Wagga, but in 1965 moved them to Canberra, the federal capital.

The Queensland Conference was divided in 1929. Its northern area was designated the North Queensland Mission under the direction of, and subsidized by, the Australasian Union Conference, with headquarters in Townsville. At that time it had four churches and a membership of 161.

In the same area, some 35 miles (55 kilometers) northwest of Cairns, a mission station had been established for the Aborigines in 1913, called Mona Mona Mission, with P. B. Rudge and J. L. Branford as its first administrators. In 1949 the North Queensland Mission, which had been separated from the Queensland Conference in 1929, was transferred, together with the Mona Mona Mission, from the control of the Australasian Union Conference to the control of the newly formed Trans-Tasman Union Conference. In 1955 the North Queensland Mission was constituted the North Queensland Conference, and the Mona Mona Mission was taken over by this conference. With this additional membership of 112, the conference had a total of 711 members. In 1984 the territory of the North Queensland Conference and that part of the South Australia Conference within the boundaries of the Northern Territory were joined to form the Northern Australian Conference.

In 1953 the Trans-Commonwealth Union Conference (now Trans-Australian Union Conference), formed in 1949, sponsored an Aboriginal Mission at Karalundi, some 500 miles (800 kilometers) north of Perth, Western Australia, under the direction of the West Australian Conference. Another mission was opened in 1956 at Wiluna, 100 miles (160 kilometers) east of Karalundi.

In 1949 the Australasian Union Conference (also administered as the Australasian Division since 1922) was reorganized as the Australasian Inter-Union Conference, composed of two union conferences and two union missions. At that time the conferences of Australia were formed into the Trans-Commonwealth Union Conference (now Trans-Australian Union Conference) and, with New Zealand, into the Trans-Tasman Union Conference.

Progress in Australia. The total number of conferences in Australia increased from six in 1905 to nine in 1955.

In recent decades large numbers of SDAs of Eastern European origin have migrated to Australia.

Sydney Adventist Hospital: The Wahronga site of Sydney Adventist Hospital (formerly Sydney Sanitarium) was chosen by Ellen White and built in 1903. Sydney Adventist Hospital was the first private hospital in New South Wales to be accredited by the Australian Council on Healthcare Standards and has maintained its accreditation continuously. In 1995 Sydney Adventist Hospital, with a bed capacity of 320, was the largest private hospital in New South Wales.

In 1972 a new School of Nursing was built. In 1973 the Institution was rebuilt and renamed Sydney Adventist Hospital. At a cost of $8.5 million, the main wooden building was replaced by a 10-story brick-and-concrete structure.

In 1980 a tertiary nursing program commenced with Avondale College. The hospital further consolidated its place as a teaching hospital in 1994 with an affiliation with the Faculty of Medicine with the University of Sydney.

In 1990 a 50-bed maternity unit was opened (replacing an existing ward), and special care nursery was added. In 1992 the Physiotherapy Department was extended, and the lithotripsy service commenced.

In 1995 a $37 million extension opened featuring 12 operating theaters (increased from eight), new day surgery and endoscopy facilities, medical imaging and renal dialysis, new School of Nursing, new Hospital Library and Lecture Theatre (see Sydney Adventist Hospital).

SDA Media Centre: In 1966 new offices and studio were opened. Film production for TV began with Focus on Living films. In 1971 color movie films with synchronized sound were produced for denominational departments, and in 1973 LP records were produced.

In 1973 a new TV series was produced entitled Crisis. In 1974 the studio control room was reequipped with a new mixer control and four program duplicators; "Teac" tape recorder, cassette deck, and two cassette duplicators; 16-millimeter film editing machine for film department.

“Here’s Life,” a 34-lesson doctrinal Bible correspondence course, was introduced in 1974. By 1974 radio outreach increased to more than 100 programs per week using These Times in both the five- and 15-minute format. TV outreach increased to 12 regular 30-minute TV programs per week using It Is Written and Faith for Today. In 1974 a series of TV one-minute commercials were produced. In 1985 the Video Production Department was set up. More than 30 productions are completed annually. The department is often requested to produce reports for other world divisions.

Since 1991, TV commercials in 60-second and 30-second versions have been produced and screened by television networks. These have been the major source of responses and enrollments for the correspondence school. Some 16,000 responses are received annually.

TV community service spots (30-second) are screened free of charge. In 1984 a presenter and media evangelist was appointed to reap contacts gained from correspondence school and electronic media contacts. In 1994 an associate was appointed.

At present there are plans to extend the current building.

Education: See Avondale College.

Archives: An archive room was established at Avondale College in 1974. In 1964 Sunnyside, Ellen White’s home, was purchased by the denomination, and the South Pacific Museum set up on land adjacent to it.

Builders of the Church in Australia: The earliest leaders came from overseas as pioneers, but soon Australian converts stood side by side with the men and women from the United States. Among the former might be named S. N. Haskell, who led the pioneering party to Australia and New Zealand; J. O. Corliss and M. C. Israel, who did so much to break new ground in these countries; W. D. Curtis, who accomplished much in a short time; G. C. Tenny; A. G. Daniells, who was later to emerge as a great denominational leader in the General Conference; Ellen G. White, whose counsel and help in founding our education system, the sanitarium, and the health food interests made this division the great mission base that it is; E. W. Farnsworth; Drs. Daniel and Lauretta Kress in the medical sphere; G. A. Irwin, W. W. Prescott, and later Lynn Wood in the service of education.

Among Australian and New Zealand denominational employees who have made an outstanding contribution to the work in this division might be named the Hare family, the Stewarts, the Piper brothers, J. H. Woods, J. M. Johanson, and the Kent family. A. W. Anderson and Reuben E. Hare, who hammered out the principles of religious liberty before legislators, military authorities, and trade union executives, leading them to recognize the principles of freedom and helping preserve the priceless heritage of liberty now enjoyed by the church; C. H. Watson, who became head of the church in Australia and then proceeded to fill the wider office of General Conference president. In the Pacific mission fields the names of G. H. Gates, J. M. Cole, E. S. Butz, J. E. Fulton, and G. F. Jones are remembered along with those of Andrew Stewart, A. H. Piper, H. Steed, R. H. Tutty, S. W. Carr, and many others.

Austria

AUSTRIA. A republic situated in the heart of Europe, bounded by Germany, the Czech Republic, Slovakia, Hungary, Slovenia, Italy, Switzerland, and Liechtenstein. Its area is 32,374 square miles (83,847 square kilometers), and the population (1994) is nearly 8 million. Ninety-nine percent of the people are ethnic Germans, with various minority groups, such as Slovenians, Hungarians, and Croatians. Eighty-eight percent of the population are Roman Catholic, 5 percent are Lutheran or Reformed, and the rest belong to religious minorities or are unaffiliated. Austria's economy is chiefly industrial.

Pre-World War I Austria was the center of an empire, from 1867 called the Austro-Hungarian Empire, which included what are now the Czech Republic, Slovakia, Hungary, Slovenia and Croatia, and parts of Romania, Russia, Poland, and Italy. The Austrian imperial house of Hapsburg ruled from the Middle Ages to 1918, and from 1438 to 1806 supplied the monarchs of the so-called Holy Roman Empire. After World War I the monarchy was abolished, and various parts of the heterogeneous empire were incorporated into the states named above. The German-speaking core of Austria became a republic with a democratic constitution. Hitler annexed it to Germany in 1938, but it was restored to independence after World War II. Its present constitution dates from 1955.

Because of the changes in boundaries, the use of the word "Austria" can be confusing. Before 1918, the name was used loosely to refer to the whole Austro-Hungarian Empire. At the same time, it also was used to designate "Austria proper," or the western segment of the Dual Monarchy, which at that time included several non-Austrian areas that do not now belong to Austria (German Austria).

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. The territory of Austria constitutes the Austrian Union of Churches, part of the Euro-Africa Division. Statistics (1993) for Austria: churches, 44; members, 3,266; ordained ministers, 23; licensed ministers, 8. Headquarters for the Austrian Union of Churches are at Nussdorferstrasse 5, 1090 Vienna.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. In 1895 L. R. Conradi conducted the first SDA baptismal service in Austria-Hungary at Klausenburg (Koložsvár). Christine Pauline Rottmayer joined the SDA Church on that occasion. She was the daughter of Johann Rottmayer, Jr., who worked as a Baptist pastor in Vienna. Her grandparents were converted to Seventh-day Adventism by Conradi as early as 1890. Living in Klausenburg (Koložsvár), they were the first SDA members in the Hapsburg empire. Upon her return to Vienna, Christine Pauline Rottmayer remained the only SDA church member within the borders of present-day Austria until 1903. The year 1902 marks the beginning of SDA missionary work in Vienna by H. Kokolsky, a well-known sculptor at the turn of the century who had been baptized by G. Perk in Germany. Also in 1902 a German-American pastor, L. Mathe, was sent to Pressburg (Pozsony). Interest in the SDA message had developed in Ratzersdorf (Rac), a village near Pressburg, through a relative's visit from the U.S. In 1903 Mathe succeeded in organizing a small SDA congregation in Ratzersdorf, which is close to the present-day Austrian border. Because his life was threatened on several occasions, Mathe transferred his missionary activity to nearby Vienna, where, on July 1, 1903, he was able to perform the first SDA baptism within the borders of present-day Austria. At that time the distrustful if not hostile mentality of the rural, strongly Catholic population could be easily avoided in the cities in which underground work was possible. In 1902 "Austria proper" was designated as the Austrian Mission. Under the leadership of L. Mathe (1903—1906) and W. Prillwitz (1907—1908) missionary work advanced primarily in Bohemia, Moravia, and Austrian Silesia. Until 1912 these lands, together with German-speaking Austria (German Austria), constituted a single mission field. The breakthrough in missionary work is credited to the efforts of J. Wolfgarten (1909—1918), who had come to Austria from Germany. He was the first to start regular and systematic missionary work in German Austria, searching for a way to make public evangelism possible. Because members of unrecognized religions, such as Seventh-day Adventism, were not allowed to engage in public worship or evangelism, new forms of mission outreach had to be found. Two legal societies (Vereine) were founded: the Society of Christian Men and Women (for Vienna) and the Austrian More-Light Reading Society (for the entire country). Under the guise of these lecture societies, SDAs in Austria could hold public meetings. The SDA Church in Vienna, the first in present-day Austria, was founded in 1908.

Before World War I, 11 local churches were organized in German Austria, with approximately 250 members. In 1909 the first native Austrian SDA minister, Franz Gruber, was ordained in Vienna. The church made a serious effort to train indigenous missionary workers, as foreign pastors were in constant danger of being deported for "disturbing the peace." Colporteur work was extremely difficult in the face of laws forbidding the circulation of religious literature by loan, sale, or gift.

In 1913 A. G. Daniels, SDA General Conference president, visited Austria a second time. He reported: "Austria is said to be the most intensely Catholic country in all Europe, and possibly in all the world. We have not been permitted to take a religious name, or to hold a regular public religious service. The law forbids religious teaching, baptizing, and the forming of churches. It aims to make it impossible for any religious body, save the Catholic Church, to exist in Austria" (Review and Herald 90:1145, 1146, Nov. 27, 1913; see also D. Heinz, Church, State, and Religious Dissent: A History of Seventh-day Adventists in Austria, 1890—1975 [1993]). A petition sent to Emperor Francis Joseph I by the SDA leaders in Austria in 1914 asking him to stop "systematic religious discrimination," to which SDAs in Austria were continually exposed, remained unnoticed. The repressive situation forced the SDA Church in Austria to work underground until the collapse of the monarchy in 1918.

The rise of democracy after 1918 proved a turning point in the mission history of the SDA Church in Austria, inaugurating the era of large-scale public evangelism.

Austrian Conference

Austrian Conference. As a result of the peace treaty of St.-Germain after World War I, the Austrian republic was established. With religious freedom guaranteed under the democratic constitution, the way was open for the new mission era. In 1920 the Austrian Mission was reorganized as a conference, with a membership of 526, and with offices in Vienna. Also after the war the Hamburg Publishing House opened a Vienna branch, and the colporteur work was promoted. Many new members joined the church. During the 1930s new obstacles appeared, as a result of revolutionary political movements. Then in 1939, with the outbreak of World War II, public mission work was forbidden without exception. The war brought untold destruction. At the end of the war the people rallied, the SDA message was again preached freely, and many were baptized.

Austrian Union of Churches

Austrian Union of Churches. After World War II the Austrian Conference, which until then had belonged to one or another of the German union conferences or to the Central European Division, was transferred to the Southern European Division but not attached to any union conference. In 1947 it became the Austrian Union Conference and was divided into two conferences: the Danube Conference with headquarters in Vienna, with a membership of 1,138; and the Alpine Conference with headquarters in Salzburg and a membership of 984.

In order to facilitate administrative work, the two conferences were replaced in 1967 by an Austrian "Union of Churches," the first Seventh-day Adventist organization of this kind in Europe. It represented a centralized form of church government with union status, composed of the local churches within a given area. The church organization of 1967 ultimately led to the financial independence of the SDA movement in Austria. The reasons for financial independence include savings realized by a simplified denominational structure and an increase of church offerings as a result of the growing economic prosperity of the country. In later years the Austrian members have ranked second worldwide in terms of the total amount of offerings given to the church.

In 1950 an evangelistic center was purchased that furnishes office space and a hall seating 500, where the largest SDA church in Vienna meets. A publishing house (without a printing plant) was opened in 1948, the colporteur work was revived, and a Bible correspondence course was launched. The Bogenhofen Seminary was established in 1949. In addition to the headquarters building, 14 chapels were built in different cities, and new halls have been rented and equipped.

The General Conference session of 1975 in Vienna, the first ever held outside North America, represented a highlight for the SDAs in Austria. It also marked a new beginning for the SDAs in the Communist countries of Eastern Europe, allowing them to turn gradually to the West. By 1993, because of the secularizing trends of society, SDA Church growth had slowed, but the membership had crossed the 3,000 mark.

Austrian Publishing House

AUSTRIAN PUBLISHING HOUSE (Wegweiser-Verlag). An incorporated publishing firm (without printing plant) in Vienna, owned and operated by the Austrian Union of Churches.

The predecessor of the Austrian Publishing House was a branch of the Hamburg Publishing House established in Vienna in 1921 for the Austrian Conference, which at that time was under the South German Union Conference. The branch operated with two employees and 20 colporteurs. When it was closed in 1941 by the police, the Hamburg Publishing House assumed responsibility for Austria's colporteurs, who, however, because of the war, had to stop their work. To prevent confiscation, the books in stock were sent to Hamburg and to the Zurich Publishing House.

In 1948, when the Austrian Union Conference became a part of the Southern European Division, an independent publishing house (without printing plant) was established in Vienna, since it was difficult to import books from outside. At first the work had to be carried out in the name of the first manager, Rudolf Ueberbacher. In 1951 the firm became the Wegweiser-Verlag Society. In 1948, with two employees and 10 colporteurs, it had sales amounting to $5,579. Since 1948 the delivery of books to customers has been made directly from the house. Doing so has increased sales considerably. The house published Zeichen der Zeit, a 16-page bimonthly, for more than 20 years. Because more and more books were printed for the German-speaking area in Europe, the manager of the Austrian Publishing House was also appointed a member of the planning committee of the Hamburg Publishing House. The sales in 1992 amounted to $1,670,500. At that time there were five employees and 70 literature evangelists. From 1948 to 1992, 673 people have been baptized as a result of this ministry.

Managers: Rudolf Ueberbacher, 1948—1959; Engelbert Hatzinger, 1959—1975; Otto Chrastek, 1975— .

Avista Hospital

AVISTA HOSPITAL. A general, acute, 50-bed hospital operated at Louisville, Colorado, by the Mid-America Union Conference. It is accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Healthcare Organizations, Chicago, Illinois, and has a staff of 250 physicians and 400 employees, approximately 180 of whom are nursing personnel. About half of the individuals employed by Avista were employees at Boulder Memorial Hospital until its closing in March 1989 (see Boulder Memorial Hospital). Avista Hospital services include obstetrics and gynecology, pediatrics, medical/surgical services, radiology, cardiopulmonary, rehabilitation, and 24-hour emergency care.

The hospital's Family Life program offers a wide selection of pregnancy, childbirth, and parenting classes tailored to today's active family. In addition, the hospital serves its community with Ask-a-Nurse, a 24-hour, free health information and physician referral service. Avista Hospital is a member of Rocky Mountain Adventist Healthcare (RMAH), the regional corporate organization that also includes Porter Memorial Hospital in Denver, Littleton Hospital in Littleton, and Platte Valley Medical Center in Brighton. The hospital supports Avista Medical Associates, a physician network formed to further encourage relationships with medical insurance companies.

History

History. Avista Hospital was established in 1990 with funds from the sale of Boulder Memorial Hospital's facility. Ground was broken on Feb. 21, 1989, and nearly 500 visitors looked on as the hospital opened publicly on May 6, 1990. The first patient was admitted on May 7, 1990, and the first baby was born on May 9.

Avista Hospital stood strong through its turbulent first two years of operation, despite a delay in the expected population increase in the area. The hospital's financial performance dramatically improved in 1992 and 1993 because of a large increase in residential building and the hospital's success in medical insurance contracting.

John Sackett, formerly vice president of general services at Boulder Memorial Hospital, has served as the hospital's president since before its opening; Harold T. Dupper, formerly vice president of finance for Heritage Centers of America, is vice president of finance; and Carol Schmidt, R.N., M.H.A., formerly vice president of nursing at Boulder Memorial Hospital, is vice president and chief clinical officer. John Brownlow joined the staff in August 1990 as vice president of operations for Avista Medical Associates. Marvin Dunaway, N.M., has served as the president of Avista Medical Associates since the organization's inception.

Avondale Adventist High School

AVONDALE ADVENTIST HIGH SCHOOL. A coeducational day school (years 7-12) located near Avondale College, Cooranbong, New South Wales, Australia. In 1993 the school had an enrollment of 368 and employed a staff of 25 full-time and three part-time teachers.

The school began as a primary school in 1897 with 15 students in a room borrowed from Avondale College. By 1899 the school had 42 students and was run in conjunction with the Teacher Training Department of the college. Between 1922 and 1933 the first three years of high school were added.

In 1934 the Avondale Village church began the operation of a full high school, first in the old church in which Ellen White had preached, then in a weatherboard building on the grounds of the church. A brick five-room building was constructed for the primary school in 1937.

The high school gained improved facilities when it moved to a new building on the college campus in 1942 and came under the administration of the college. In the postwar years the college offered a precollege academic course that was operated in conjunction with the high school. When in 1971 the NSW Higher School Certificate became the prerequisite for tertiary-level studies, the high school assumed full responsibility for the years 7-12 program.

During the 1970s the school came under the control of the North New South Wales Conference. A 42-acre (17-hectare) block at the end of Avondale Road was acquired from the Australasian Conference Association. A new primary school complex, caretaker's cottage, and high school complex was built on the site in 1980.

The high school comprises 14 classrooms, two science laboratories, an industrial arts block, library, and administration block. Extensive playing fields and sports courts were developed. In 1992 an auditorium with associated music classroom and music teaching studios was constructed.

Although conference-owned, the school continues its working relationship with Avondale College. Trainee teachers visit the school to observe lessons and practice-teach, as they did in its beginnings.

Avondale College

AVONDALE COLLEGE. A multidisciplinary residential institution of higher education situated near Cooranbong about 90 miles (145 kilometers) north of Sydney, New South Wales, Australia, with a secondary campus for its School of Nursing on the grounds of the Sydney Adventist Hospital. Avondale is owned by the South Pacific Division of the Seventh-day Adventist Church, and operated by a board of governors constituted in accordance with terms agreed to by the church and the government. In 1993 there was an enrollment of 786, a teaching staff of 77, and a support staff of 61.

Avondale offers six baccalaureate degree programs accredited in Australia, as well as a master's degree in religion offered through an affiliation agreement with Andrews University. An associate diploma is available in aviation, and certificate courses are offered in secretarial studies and pilot training.

History

History: The predecessor of Avondale College was the first Seventh-day Adventist Bible training school in Australia, operated in rented buildings on St. Kilda Road, Melbourne, Victoria, from Aug. 24, 1892, to September 1894. The school opened with 25 students, increasing to 56 by the following June. L. J. Rousseau served as first principal.

Upon the recommendation of Ellen G. White a more suitable school site was sought in the country, and in 1894 an estate of 1,450 acres (585 hectares) was inspected at Cooranbong. Although it was regarded unfavorably by many of the leaders of the church and by agricultural experts, Mrs. White, after visiting the estate, urged its purchase, being certain that the Lord had led in its discovery. In 1895 the decision was made to establish the school there.

Between 1896 and 1899 the Avondale School for Christian Workers, as the college was originally called, was literally hewn out of the forest. Students and teachers lived in tents and in the Healy Hotel, Cooranbong, which was rented for this purpose. By day, trees were felled and land cleared and drained, and in the evening, classes were conducted in the hotel. The corner brick of the first building, Bethel Hall, was laid by Ellen White on Oct. 5, 1896, and the school opened Apr. 28, 1897, when two buildings were ready for use, at least in part—Bethel Hall and the dining hall, both two-story wood structures. The school opened with only 10 students (two were boarders), who were directed in their studies by four teachers. By the close of the term the enrollment had increased to 60. The first principal was C. B. Hughes. Associated with him were his wife, S. N. Haskell and his wife, and H. C. Lacey and his wife. In 1898 the enrollment was 104; by 1900 it was 158. A third of the students were enrolled in the preparatory grades (equivalent to United States grades 1—8).

The boys' dormitory, a three-story wood building providing accommodation for 60, was completed in 1898. A church was erected at the entrance to the estate, about a mile (1.6 kilometers) from the school buildings. The central building of the school, known as the chapel (used for 60 years as an administration building for classes, and for assembly), was opened in April 1899. By 1908 several smaller buildings, including a press, had been erected.

Ellen White was closely associated with the school during its early days. She raised much of the money required to launch the project and was the guiding spirit behind its establishment. She made her home near the school from 1895 to 1900, living in a cottage named Sunnyside, and was a frequent visitor to the school. Many of her counsels concerning Christian education were written at Cooranbong.

In June 1911 the name of the school was changed to Australasian Missionary College. The new name was suggested in part by the responsibility accepted by the Australasian Union Conference of training missionaries, not only for the South Pacific area but also for Malaya and Indonesia.

Also in 1911 the growth of church school work in Australia and New Zealand led to the reorganization of teacher training at the college. From the early years practical instruction in several lines of manual training had been offered. Class instruction was available in agriculture, carpentry, blacksmithing, printing, sewing, and cooking. However, from 1923 onward strong efforts were made to expand and organize such subjects by introducing a Department of Technical Education and by outlining new courses in carpentry and sewing. In 1924 home economics and cooking were added, and the home economics building was erected. Prior to this expansion into technical education, college courses were restricted to the training of ministers, missionaries, teachers, and office workers.

Music was taught at the college almost from its beginning. The department was strengthened in 1925 when a brick building was erected to house it. The Avondale Symphonic Choir was formed in 1948, and from 1951 a more extensive music course has been offered. Art was introduced in 1903; in 1949 the standard was raised and the department strengthened. Science had been taught in an elementary form from the first, but with the completion of the science building in 1928, that field was given increased emphasis. In common with most subjects, however, none of the work was above senior secondary level.

Until 1951 only two years of tertiary-level work were offered. The advanced courses were based on five years of secondary education, followed by two years of professional study. In 1951 the ministerial course became a three-year program and led to the granting of a Licentiate of Theology (L.Th.). Arrangements were also made at that time for students to take external studies with the University of London for the Bachelor of Science degree. This arrangement continued until 1976, by which time Avondale had achieved accreditation for its Bachelor of Education degree with a science specialty.

The college course was raised to a four-year level when affiliation was effected with Pacific Union College in 1954. The affiliation, which continued until 1990, was valuable to Avondale by enabling it to offer degree courses while local accreditation was being developed, and for providing opportunities for staff exchange. In 1964 the name of the school was changed to Avondale College. In 1974 the college received its first national accreditation, which was for a degree and diplomas in education. Recognition in Australia of other courses has continued, with accreditation being given for Bachelor of Business (1983), Bachelor of Arts (Theology) (1990), Bachelor of Nursing (1991), Bachelor of Arts (1993), and Bachelor of Science (1993).

Additions to the school plant have included: brick primary school building (1937), secondary school building (1942), brick 70-bed women's dormitory (1953), auditorium (1955), new administration building with classrooms and library (1961), hostel for missionaries' children of high school age (1961), brick dormitory for 300 men (1964), food service building (1967), additional lecture theater (1973), library building (1973), married students' units (1974), women's chapel (1980), chemistry building (1981), College church (1986), student fitness center (1984), and an additional women's dormitory (1989).

Avondale Health Retreat

AVONDALE HEALTH RETREAT. A medical institution operated for a time at Cooranbong, New South Wales, one of the earliest opened by Seventh-day Adventists in the Australasian field. It was built under the direction of Ellen G. White, and opened for patients on Dec. 28, 1899. It was managed first by H. A. Hellier and his wife, of Victoria (with Dr. Silas Rand, of Newcastle, as the physician on call), and after about a year by a couple named Robie, from the United States. After the arrival from the U.S. of the Drs. D. H. and Laretta Kress in November 1900, a training school for nurses was opened.

After the opening of the Sydney Sanitarium at Wahroonga in 1903, the health retreat lost much of its former significance, and later became an overflow dormitory for young men from the nearby school (now Avondale College). In the early 1930s the building was demolished, and in 1960 the site was used for the erection of the Kressville Home for the Aged.

Ayer Manis School

AYER MANIS SCHOOL. A coeducational boarding school on the secondary level for training national Seventh-day Adventist workers, operated by the Seventh-day Adventist Church of Sarawak on a 114-acre (46-hectare) campus on the main road, 34 miles (54 kilometers) southeast of Kuching, the capital of Sarawak, Malaysia.

Founded in late 1933, when Albert Munson was the president of the Sarawak Mission, the school opened in January 1934 to receive its first Dyak students. Tuition and board was free. A. L. Pauner, a missionary from Indonesia, was the first principal. Because of the danger of malaria, the school was moved from its original 11-acre (4.5-hectare) campus to higher ground on the other side of the road. The enrollment gradually increased, and an academic level of six grades was reached. During the Japanese occupation in World War II the school was closed, but its facilities served as a haven for the mission personnel, who supported themselves by farming the land.

The school was reopened in 1946, with J. T. Pohan as principal. The medium of instruction was Malay, but English classes were taught. Four years later English became the medium of instruction, with classes in the Malay language. The present dormitories, built since the war, were financed by a Thirteenth Sabbath Offering overflow.

Primary 1 to 6 was taught until 1961. Since that time, three years of secondary education have been provided in English. In 1965 the Sarawak government authorized a five-year program leading up to the Cambridge School Certificate. The school has been accredited by the board of regents of the Far Eastern Division, and following a self-evaluation program in 1974, accreditation was granted for a four-year period. The enrollment was 250 in 1974; the faculty for these grades totaled nine. The students are Chinese, Iban, Land Dyak, and Malay; approximately 33 percent come from non-SDA homes.

Because of free education provided by the government, Ayer Manis enrollment was affected to the extent that the school was closed in 1983. In 1984 it was reopened with 45 students and a staff of two. In 1993, 98 students were enrolled, and there were 10 teachers.

In 1992 a commercial branch school was begun in Serian, a town two miles (three kilometers) from the campus, and 75 were enrolled in typing and computer courses.

Azerbaijan

AZERBAIJAN. An Asian country bordered by Russia, Georgia, Iran, Armenia, and the Caspian Sea. It occupies an area of 33,428 square miles (86,600 square kilometers) and has a population (1994) of 7.7 million. Azerbaijan was conquered by Russia in 1813 and 1828. It joined the USSR on Dec. 30, 1991, and became an independent state when the Soviet Union disbanded in December 1991.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. Jacob Klein was the first preacher entering the city of Baku and Caucasian areas in 1894. Several German families had already kept the Sabbath there. He baptized seven people from these families and shared the Lord's Supper with them. After several days Elder Klein was arrested and exiled. Soon after that, those he baptized also had to leave that place.

In 1906 in the village of Novo-Vasiljevka, near the Caspian Sea, a Russian church of 34 former Molokans was organized. In the same year Elder Albert Ozel visited Koryazhno (now Fizuli) and baptized a group of believers. Vasily Zhukov was the first church elder there. Elder G. A. Lepsak visited this group in 1908.

In spite of 70 years of repression and atheistic propaganda, in 1993 there were four local churches and two companies in Azerbaijan, with a total membership of 259. A unique church in Gyandzha consists of 29 Azerbaijanians (formerly Moslems) and 23 Jews. The worship services are held in the Azerbaijan language.

Azerbaijan is part of the Trans-Caucasian Field, an attached field of the Euro-Asia Division.

Azores

AZORES. A group of nine islands in the eastern Atlantic Ocean, administered as three districts of Portugal. The total area is 868 square miles (2,250 square kilometers), with a population (1993) of 236,000. Agriculture is the principal occupation.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. The territory of the Azores Islands, formerly a mission of the Portuguese Union, is now part of the territory assigned to the newly organized Portuguese Union of Churches of the Euro-Africa Division. Statistics (1992) for Azores: churches, 5; members, 174; ordained ministers, 2.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. As early as 1892 G. R. Drew, of England, reported the sending of publications by ship to the island of São Miguel in the Azores (Review and Herald 69:230, Apr. 12, 1892). No results were known. Direct SDA work in the Azores began in 1931 when a colporteur sold SDA publications there. E. P. Mansell and his wife, who were transferred there from Madeira in 1934, rented a hall and held meetings in Ponta Delgada on the island of São Miguel. On Dec. 12, 1935, the first six converts were baptized. Other missionary families followed. A church was built on the island of Pico in 1949, a donation from Lidia Madsen, a native of the Azores then resident in California. In the 1930s a Catholic woman on the island of Flores had SDA books that she had not read. She lent some to one of her relatives, who accepted their teachings but was not baptized until 1947.

The Azores Mission appeared first in the Statistical Report for 1936 with one church of 10 members, and five Sabbath schools totaling 32 members. The converts, having been won largely through SDA publications, were active in distributing tracts.

Aztec Union Mission

AZTEC UNION MISSION. A former unit of church organization (1923—1926); its territory included British Honduras (now Belize), El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, and Mexico.

B

Baasch, David Henry

BAASCH, DAVID HENRY (1921—1987). Missionary, administrator. He was born in Puerto Rico, the son of missionaries. After graduation from Pacific Union College in 1943, he married Iva N. Munson. They had two sons and two daughters. Baasch began his ministry as an intern in the Arizona Conference in 1943 and soon became a departmental director in the Puerto Rico Mission. He was ordained to the ministry in Santurce, Puerto Rico, in 1948. He held the position of departmental secretary in the Colombia-Venezuela Union from 1948 to 1951, after which he was called to be principal of Colombia-Venezuela Union College. He also served as Inter-American youth director for the Inter-American Division, president of the Mexican Union, secretary of the division, and associate secretary of the General Conference before accepting the position of undersecretary of the General Conference, a position he held until his death.

Babcock, David Caldwell

BABCOCK, DAVID CALDWELL (1854—1932). Conference administrator and missionary. He was educated at Battle Creek College and was president of the West Virginia Conference (1892—1895) and the Virginia Conference (1897—1899). He directed the British Guiana Mission (1900—1905) and the British West African Mission (1905—1914); he opened up Seventh-day Adventist work in Nigeria (1914—1917). In 1917, while en route to England seeking treatment for sleeping sickness, he was rescued when the ship was torpedoed. In 1919 he was sent to the Virgin Islands for ministerial work, and again to British Guiana as president of the conference (1925). Two years later ill health forced his return to America.

Baber, Granville Henderson

BABER, GRANVILLE HENDERSON (1852—1936). Pioneer Seventh-day Adventist missionary in Chile, teacher, and conference administrator. He was educated at Battle Creek College and was a member of the first class in Dr. J. H. Kellogg's Health and Temperance Missionary School. In 1895 he was sent to Chile as the first SDA minister to engage in regular evangelistic work. While there he started the missionary paper Las Señales de los Tiempos in 1900. In 1902 he returned to the United States and joined the faculty of the Southern Training School (now Southern College) in Tennessee, where he served for 11 years.

Babienco, Theophil A.

BABIENCO, THEOPHIL A. (1850—1943). One of the pioneer Seventh-day Adventists in Russia; lay evangelist. He was a native of the village of Tarashcha in the Ukraine south of Kiev. As a young man he assisted in the services of the Orthodox Church by reading the psalms. His interest in the Bible thus being aroused, he obtained permission to take a copy home. Gathering his neighbors together, he read to them. His study led him to the conclusion that many doctrines believed and taught by his church were not scriptural.

In 1877 Babienco and a group whom he had interested in the Bible left the Orthodox Church and organized themselves into “a community of brethren, believers of the Bible.” The community grew and spread to other towns and villages of the Ukraine. Some time later in exile in Stavropol in northern Caucasus he was led, according to his son’s account, to keep the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath and to expect Christ’s return to this earth in a short time. Correspondence with some of his former associates at Tarashcha led them to join him in his beliefs.

About 1886 or 1887 Babienco, then still in exile at Stavropol, accepted the SDA message, becoming acquainted with the church, probably through a visit by Conrad Laubhan (one of the early SDA workers among the German Protestant settlers in Russia) to Babienco’s employer, a Baptist. Through his missionary efforts Babienco gathered a group of Russian converts at Stavropol, which later, in 1890, was organized into a church. Other groups were developed in the vicinity. In 1890, at the first general meeting of the Seventh-day Adventists in Russia, which was held at Eigenheim in the Caucasus, Babienco was ordained as church elder for the Russian group, the first Russian SDA ordained to a church office. Soon after the ordination, Babienco secretly (he was still in exile) visited his former home village and organized a church among his former brethren, with whom he had continued to correspond through the years.

His active work in behalf of the gospel brought persecution. Less than a year after the church was organized at Stavropol, Babienco and seven members of the church were exiled beyond the Caucasus Mountains, to a place named Herusy, near Mount Ararat, at the end of the stagecoach route. But exile did not daunt him. He spoke of his faith to other exiles and to the coachmen, mostly Russian Baptists and Molokans, and soon more than 200 persons were observing the Bible Sabbath in the surrounding villages.

Babienco was threatened with another exile even farther from Russian centers, but the amnesty proclaimed on the accession of the new czar, Nicholas II, prevented this. Nevertheless, his five-year term was increased by another eight years. Separation from his family and continual harassment by the political administration turned his mind to emigration. With the help of English Protestants he went to Romania in 1896, where his family joined him.

In 1903 the family emigrated to Canada, and he settled on a farm in Saskatchewan. His son, Theophil T., became a minister, and preached for many years among the Russian people in Canada, the United States, China, and the Baltic States.

Babylon, Symbolic

BABYLON, SYMBOLIC. A cryptic designation in Revelation (Rev. 14:8; 16:19; 17:5; 18:2, 10, 21) for apostate religious organizations in opposition to Christ and His people on earth, especially during the closing phase of the age-long conflict between good and evil. Babylon is variously identified as “that great city, which reigneth over the kings of the earth,” as “the great whore” and a “mother of harlots” (Rev. 16; 17:1, 5, 18). Adultery is a common OT metaphor for apostate religion (for example, Eze. 16:15 ff.; 23:2, 3 ff.; Hosea 4:15). The revelator declares that Babylon has “fallen” (Rev. 14:8; 18:2), has seduced “the kings of the earth” to commit fornication with her (Rev. 17:2), has enticed “the inhabitants of the earth” to become “drunk with the wine of her fornication” (Rev. 17:2; 19:2), and has deceived the nations with her “sorceries” (Rev. 18:23). He represents her as “drunken with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus” (Rev. 17:5, 6; 18:24; 19:2). He sees her “sins” as consisting of pride and arrogance (Rev. 17:4; 18:7, 16), defiance of God, and the persecution of His people on earth (cf. Rev. 16:19; 17:6; 18:24), and an illicit alliance with the political powers of earth (Rev. 17:2, 3; 18:9). He notes that “her sins” eventually reach “unto heaven,” and the time comes for God to judge her (Rev. 16:19; 18:5, 6; 19:2). God therefore summons His people to leave Babylon, in order to avoid complicity in her “sins” and the “plagues” He is about to visit upon her (Rev. 18:4). Disillusioned, the kings of the earth turn on Babylon and destroy her (Rev. 17:14, 16, 17; cf. Rev. 18:19, 21; 19:3). In this way God avenges His people on Babylon (Rev. 18:20; 19:2).

Babylon is “a name of mystery” (Rev. 17:5, RSV), that is, a figurative or cryptic title; hence the often-used designation, “mystical Babylon.” This symbolic name connotes the historical fact that in OT times literal Babylon was the archfoe of God’s covenant people. Mystical Babylon is to be understood in terms of the role played by its historical counterpart in OT times (see SDACom 7:866, 869). The Babylonian name Bâb-ilu (Babel or Babylon) meant “gate of god.” In ancient times the city gate was the place where official visitors conducted public business. The name Bâb-ilu reflected the belief that Babylon was the place selected by the gods to meet with human beings, and the claim of Babylonian kings that the gods had commissioned them to rule the world. In Hebrew Bâb-ilu was disparagingly associated with the term balal, “to confuse”—a reminder that God had confused the speech of the Babel builders (Gen. 11:9).

From the time of its founding by Nimrod (Gen. 10:9, 10; 11:1—9), Babylon was characterized by disbelief in the true God and defiance of His will. Its tower was a monument to apostasy, and a citadel of rebellion against Him. Isaiah identifies Lucifer as king of Babylon (Isa. 14:4, 12—14), and implies that Satan made Babylon the center and agent of his master plan to secure control of the human race, even as God purposed to work through Jerusalem to accomplish His plan for this world. Throughout OT times the two cities typified the forces of evil and good at work in the world. In Revelation mystical Babylon stands in contrast with the New Jerusalem, Christ’s “bride,” who is dressed in “fine linen, clean and white: . . . the righteousness of the saints,” in contrast with Babylon’s gaudy, voluptuous attire (Rev. 19:8; cf. Rev. 17:4; 18:7, 16).

Nebuchadnezzar II made Babylon one of the wonders of the ancient world, intending his kingdom to be universal and eternal (Dan. 3:1, 4—30). Over the centuries following its destruction by Xerxes, the city gradually lost its glitter and importance, and by the time John wrote Revelation it was virtually a desolate ruin, and thus a graphic illustration of the impending fate of mystical Babylon.

As early as the first century A.D., Christians were referring to Rome by the cryptic title Babylon (see 1 Peter 5:13). The Jews were suffering under Rome as they had previously suffered under Babylon, and Christians were also experiencing sporadic persecution. To avoid reprisal, both Jews and Christians began to use “Babylon” as a secret name for imperial Rome (see the Sibylline Oracles 5:155—161; 2 Baruch 11:1; the Jewish Midrash Rabbah on Canticles 1:6 [“They called the place Rome Babylon”] [Soncino ed.], p. 60).

The Church Fathers of the early centuries, as for example Tertullian (Against Marcion 3. 13) and Irenaeus (Against Heresies 5. 26. 1), applied “Babylon” in the Apocalypse to the city of Rome or to the empire. Joachim of Floris (d. 1202) was among the first to include the Roman Church under “Babylon” (L. E. Froom, Prophetic Faith, vol. 1, p. 708). Others of the late Middle Ages who did so were Pierre Jean d’Olivi, a French Spiritual (d. 1298) (ibid., pp. 764, 765); Michael of Cesena (ibid., vol. 2, p. 20); the Lollards (ibid., pp. 78, 79); John Huss (ibid., p. 116); and Savonarola (ibid., p. 152). This identification came to be widespread among Protestants.

William Miller identified mystical Babylon with “Rome under papal rule” (Joshua V. Himes, [William Miller’s] Views of the Prophecies and Prophetic Chronology [1842], p. 200). Sylvester Bliss, a Millerite editor, held that Babylon is “everything in this world opposed to or varying from the spirit of Christ,” or “Satan’s Kingdom,” and that upon the division of the Roman Empire “the Papal horn succeeded to the supremacy, as the head of Satan’s power, and became the Babylon of the world” (The Advent Shield and Review [1844], pp. 112, 113, 115, 116). When the Protestant churches rejected the message of Christ’s soon coming, Adventists began to include them under “Babylon,” along with papal Rome, and interpreted the fall of Babylon to be these churches’ rejection of that message. For example, Joseph Bates assigned the fall of Babylon to 1843—1844 and attributed it to the churches’ utter rejection of the doctrine of the coming Lord.

“When this subject first began to be introduced in 1843, the most of the professed nominal churches had closed their doors against the Second Advent doctrine, and began to treat the message with scorn and contempt. . . .

“Mystery Babylon . . . represents the organized churches of all descriptions, divided into three parts, Rev. 16, 19, viz, Roman, Greek, and Protestant. . . .

“Our business then is with the Protestant Church, for it will be admitted by all that the Roman and Greek churches are corrupt and anti-Christian” (Joseph Bates, in Advent Review 1:66, 67, November 1850).

In 1851 James White wrote: “The woman, which is the great city, called Babylon, symbolizes the fallen apostate churches” (Review and Herald 2:3, Aug. 5, 1851). J. N. Andrews similarly defined Babylon as being “all the corrupt religious bodies which ever have existed, or which exist at the present time, united to the world, and sustained by the civil power,” including “the corrupt Jewish church,” “the corrupt Papal and Greek churches,” and “the great body of the Protestant churches” that “imitate the Romish church” (ibid. 5:5, Feb. 21, 1854).

Uriah Smith, classic SDA commentator on Daniel and the Revelation, understood “that by this symbol [Babylon] is meant the great mass of confused and corrupt Christianity,” and added that “her fall was a moral fall, caused by rejecting the vivifying truths of the first message, or great Advent proclamation. By the wine of the wrath of her fornication we understand her false doctrines and pernicious errors. These she has caused all nations to drink” (Thoughts on the Revelation [1865 (i.e., 1867) ed.], p. 233).

He identified the component parts of modern Babylon as “paganism, Catholicism, and Protestantism,” and the whore of chapter 17 as the Roman Church. “Other independent religious organizations,” are her daughters, and all “belong to the same great family.” The Roman segment of Babylon, he wrote, comes to an end in chapter 17, and the Protestant daughters in chapter 18. He quoted contemporary Protestant commentators to the effect that the popular Protestant churches had become Babylon (ibid. [1867 ed.], pp. 233—275, passim).

Seventh-day Adventist interpretation today is essentially that of Uriah Smith and other early SDA commentators. Modern Babylon is understood to stand for all Christian churches that have departed from the “everlasting gospel” as set forth in the Scriptures, including both the great Roman apostasy of the early Christian centuries and the more recent departure of mainstream Protestantism from God’s Word, beginning in particular with its rejection of the 1844 message. The fall is understood to be progressive; it is not yet complete, but it will be so when the major Protestant churches collaborate with the Church of Rome in an attempt to coerce the conscience (Rev. 13). The second angel’s message of Rev. 14:8 is a warning that Babylon has fallen, and Rev. 18:1—4 is a call to God’s people to come out of Babylon, in order to avoid complicity in her crimes and a share in her “plagues.”

Bachelor, John Warren

BACHELLER, JOHN WARREN (1839—1917). Printer. He worked on the Review and Herald when it was published in Saratoga Springs, New York, went with it to Rochester, New York, and to Battle Creek, Michigan, where the first Adventist publishing association was formed. He was a charter member of the Battle Creek Seventh-day Adventist Church.

Bäcker, Friedrich Alex

BÄCKER, FRIEDRICH ALEX (1893—1958). Minister, missionary in Turkey, and departmental secretary in Germany and the Netherlands. The son of a church leader in Frankfort on the Main, he was baptized in 1910 after attending elementary and secondary schools. Five years later he began his service in the church as conference secretary and Sabbath school and tract society secretary of the West German Union Conference (c. 1916—1921). In 1921 he was ordained to the ministry. During the next several years he was secretary for the Sabbath School and Home Missionary departments of the same union. In 1928 he went to Turkey to superintend the mission work and worked there until 1936, when he returned to Germany and served as a pastor in the Hestia-Westphalian Conference. Shortly before World War II he assumed leadership of the Home Missionary, Sabbath School, and Young People's departments of the newly organized Netherlands Union Conference. After the war he was a minister in the Northern Hanover and Southern Hanover conferences until his death in 1958. He married Antonie Henriette Frohmann in 1920.

Bacolod Sanitarium and Hospital

BACOLOD SANITARIUM AND HOSPITAL. A 100-bed general hospital operated by the Central Philippine Union Mission. It began as a small rented clinic operated by Dr. Gideon Mercurio in downtown Bacolod City in 1961. On Feb. 18, 1958, six acres (2.5 hectares) of land were bought, and construction on a new building began Apr. 29, 1962. The first patient was admitted on Sept. 8, 1966, and on Dec. 8 the hospital was officially opened, with Dr. W. G. Dick as the first medical director. Dr. W. C. Richli, a self-supporting medical missionary, was most helpful during the early years of the hospital's history.

In 1969 Philippine Union College affiliated with the hospital for the medical technology internship training program. In 1970 Dr. R. W. Spalding relieved Dr. Dick. In August 1971 Dr. F. T. Geslani served as the first national medical director. In 1990 Rufo G. Gasapo was appointed president.

In 1972 the government approved and accredited the hospital as a teaching institution for medical interns, and the clinical division began as a facility of the Mountain View College School of Nursing. Badaut, Jean Pierre BADAUT, JEAN PIERRE (1850—1933). Pioneer colporteur and evangelist in France. Of Protestant background, he read J. N. Andrews' French periodical, Les Signes des Temps, about 1880, and thus became acquainted with Seventh-day Adventists. Over a period of several years he investigated SDA teachings, accepting them one by one. When his employer refused his request to have Sabbaths free, he left his job at a flour mill, and was baptized into the Seventh-day Adventist Church in 1884. One year later he went out to sell publications that came from the newly established SDA publishing house in Basel, Switzerland. Later he became an evangelist, and was ordained to the ministry in 1908. Two of his sons, Paul and Samuel, distinguished themselves as strong leaders of the SDA Church in France.

Badaut, Paul

BADAUT, PAUL (1880—1948). French evangelist, missionary, and conference administrator. A member of a pioneer French Seventh-day Adventist family (his father, J. P. Badaut, being one of the earliest SDA colporteurs and evangelists in France), he took an active part in the work of the church from an early age. He was baptized in 1897, and in 1900 went to the Institut Sanitaire at Basel, Switzerland (see Lake Geneva Sanitarium), where he attended a course for nurses for two years. Meanwhile, in 1901, he attended a short Bible course in Geneva. Afterward he preached at Charleroi, Belgium, then at Mazamet, in southern France, and in several places in Switzerland and again in southern France. In 1903 he married Martha Rose Fontane. He was ordained to the ministry in 1906. In 1909 he went to French North Africa and became one of the pioneers of the SDA work there. In 1914, when a call for a minister came from Mauritius, in the Indian Ocean, Badaut went there, baptized the first SDA converts on the island, organized a church, and for a few years served as director of the Mauritius Mission. In 1920, after his wife's failing health made necessary a return to France, Badaut entered evangelistic work in his homeland. Between 1932 and 1938 he headed the South France Conference. He spent the last years of his working life at Bordeaux. He retired in 1945, but continued to take part in the work until he died from the effects of a cold he caught while on a visit in Switzerland after attending a conference session at Collonges.

Badaut, Samuel

BADAUT, SAMUEL (1891—1927). Minister and departmental leader in France. His birth came as a consolation to his parents, a pioneer French Seventh-day Adventist family who previously had lost three children by diphtheria. His father, J. P. Badaut, was one of the early colporteurs and evangelists in France. Samuel was baptized at the age of 14, and after having received secondary education in France, went to Stanborough Park Missionary College in England in 1908. While there he earned his expenses as a colporteur. He also mastered the English language well enough to become a proficient translator. On his return to France in 1910 he worked as a colporteur and in the office of the Latin Union, and assisted in evangelism. When World War I broke out he was drafted for military service and remained in the service until 1917. Successful in obtaining the permission of his superiors to observe the Sabbath, he preached regularly in the Seventh-day Adventist church at Grenoble, in southeastern France. He spent much of the war years as an interpreter with the English Expeditionary Army. In 1917 he returned to the service of the church as an evangelist, an enthusiastic leader, and an administrator. In the same year, he married Madeleine Delahaye. Between 1920 and 1925 he was secretary of the home missionary and young people's work in the Latin Union. In 1924 he was ordained, and from 1925 until his death, the result of a motorcycle accident in 1927, he was a minister in north France.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. SDA work in the Bahamas was begun by colporteurs. According to the Review and Herald (71:293, 294, May 8, 1894) C. H. Richards, a colporteur, and his wife arrived in Nassau, Bahamas, late in 1893. In April of the following year they wrote of a young police officer who had “been a local preacher among the Methodists” and who was interested in SDA teachings but could “not yet” see “his way clear to leave his position on account of his family.” Richards and his wife returned to the United States a few months later (Home Missionary 6:192, August 1894), and early in 1895 Charles F. Parmele, a former canvassing agent, came to the Bahamas to sell books. He reported in the Review and Herald (72:827, Dec. 24, 1895) that when he arrived, “no real fruit then appeared,” but that the first Sabbath after he landed, one brother for whom Richards and his wife had labored “began to keep the Sabbath.” This brother had a wife and four children, and Parmele went on to report that “thus far our Sabbath school consists of these.”

The story of the beginnings of SDA work in the Bahamas has also been related as follows: A colporteur by the name of Richards began selling books in the Bahamas in 1893. The first to accept the SDA beliefs were William Charles Antonio and his wife. Antonio, at the time the superintendent of a Baptist church, searched his Bible in an endeavor to refute the teachings found in the books sold to him by Richards, and later by Parmele, but the more he searched, the more he became convinced that the SDA doctrines were correct. A Sabbath school, begun in Antonio's home immediately after he and his wife were baptized, continued for approximately 10 years. All the members of the Antonio family became Seventh-day Adventists.

In 1909 the first full-time SDA missionary to the Bahamas, W. A. Sweany, was sent to Nassau. The new mission was placed under the Southeastern Union Conference, an arrangement that proved temporary (it can be found only in the 1910 Yearbook). Sweany conducted evangelistic meetings, established a Sabbath school in the Odd Fellows Lodge Hall on Meeting Street, and soon after the first baptisms in 1911 organized a church. After Sweany left the islands, his work was continued by J. H. Smith, who came in 1913. The first Seventh-day Adventist church in the Bahamas, known as the Shirley Street church, was built in Nassau under his direction in 1914. Not confining his efforts to Nassau alone, Smith journeyed to Andros and Eleuthera, the second and third islands entered by SDAs in the Bahamas. He also held evangelistic meetings on Cat Island and on San Salvador. From this small beginning the SDA teachings have spread through the Bahamas.

In the early 1930s R. J. Sype established a second church in the Bahamas, on the island of San Salvador. By this time colporteurs were selling SDA books throughout the archipelago, and lay evangelism through self-supporting work and branch Sabbath schools was playing an important part in the growth of the work in the Bahamas. In 1940 the Bahamas Mission embraced 17 churches, with 545 members, and operated two elementary schools, with a total enrollment of 96 students. During the next 10 years the membership increased to 718, and though the number of churches increased only by two, the number of church buildings increased by six, giving the mission 22 places of worship in 1950. In 1955 the school at Nassau became a senior academy (see Bahamas Academy). By the early 1960s all the islands of the Bahamas could hear the weekly broadcast of the Voice of Prophecy programs over station ZNS in Nassau, the only radio station in the Bahamas at that time. A branch of the Voice of Prophecy Bible correspondence school had been opened by the mission office, and a welfare center established in the mission office building, from which thousands of persons were being helped every year.

The decade of the 1960s can be characterized as the decade when the changing of the guard occurred in the leadership of the then-burgeoning mission. In 1964 Silas N. McKinney became the first Bahamian minister to assume the presidency of the mission. Under his leadership the mission became a conference and experienced phenomenal membership growth.

In 1993 the educational institutions in the conference included three academies and two church schools with a total enrollment of more than 1,200 students. The conference also was sponsoring the Breath of Life Telecast and a local radio program called Family Forum.

Baharian, Zadour G.

BAHARIAN, ZADOUR G. (d. 1915). Armenian evangelist and missionary. While attending college at Aintab, Turkey, he received tracts from his father, in whose home Theodore Anthony, the first Seventh-day Adventist in Turkey, was staying. At home for the summer of 1890, he read Uriah Smith's Daniel and the Revelation and J. N. Andrews' History of the Sabbath, and accepted the SDA faith. He then went to Basel for two years' training in SDA teachings and while there began to translate Bible readings and tracts; then in 1892 he returned to Turkey to proclaim his faith.

He was associated at first with Theodore Anthony, and together they gained six converts, one of whom became his wife. Many times he was imprisoned and threatened with death, both by mobs and by officials, all of which he met with unflinching courage. In addition, he encountered strong opposition from other Protestants in the country. He was ordained in 1894, and shortly after found himself in the thick of the Armenian-Turkish conflict of 1896. He worked for Armenian Christians and Muslims alike, and for some years was superintendent of the Armenian Mission. He sent frequent reports to the Review and Herald between 1893 and 1905.

In 1915, while traveling to Constantinople, he was killed and robbed by his Kurdish driver.

Shortly thereafter, in 1916, he was called to Hungary, and worked in that country until 1921, despite the troubled conditions. He was ordained to the ministry in 1919, and the same year married Violette Bourquin. After the war he preached in Bavaria and Württemberg and then returned to Switzerland, where he was president of the German-Swiss Conference from 1926 to 1930. Bahrain is a territory in the Gulf Section in the Middle East Union of Seventh-day Adventists.

In 1971 it was learned that four Seventh-day Adventists from Seychelles, including Eghbert Fred and his wife, had moved to Bahrain. Mrs. Fred was employed as nurse for the daughter of the ruler, Sheik Isaibn Sulman Al Khalifah. Through her witness the sheik became interested in SDAs and welcomed anti-smoking clinics, the first of which was conducted by K. S. Oster and H. N. Sheffield. Clinics have been held periodically since then.

The first converts on Bahrain were Don Yettie and his wife and three children. They had been in contact with SDAs before moving to Bahrain. They were baptized in 1972. Through the efforts of Eghbert Fred, Nima Shring, a young Buddhist, was baptized in 1973. Mona Nicette was baptized later that year and joined the company that was organized in Bahrain.

After being inactive for many years, the company was reorganized in 1993 with 17 members. Benjamin Flaiz from India is the company leader.

Ball, Dexter A.

BALL, DEXTER A. (1851—1906). Pioneer worker in the West Indies; minister. He was the seventh child of a poor farm family in southwestern New York. While working as a farmhand he was converted and joined the Baptist Church in 1873, and preached on occasion. Embracing Seventh-day Adventist beliefs in 1874, he actively propagated them by word of mouth and through the sale of publications. He became a full-time preacher in New York and Pennsylvania and formed a number of churches. In 1890 he and William Arnold, a colporteur, were sent to do pioneer self-supporting work in the West Indies. Ball spent two years in the islands and established churches on Barbados and Antigua before a developing cancer of the stomach made his return to the United States necessary. Recovering somewhat, he preached and sold books and periodicals for the remainder of his life. He was a staunch supporter of church educational and medical programs and personally sold hundreds of copies of Ellen G. White's Christ's Object Lessons in support of the schools. He was married twice: first to Martha Clark, a teacher from Pennsylvania; and then, after her death in 1901, to Hattie M. Buckland. His daughter by the first marriage became the wife of Roy F. Cottrell.

Ballenger, Albion Fox

BALLENGER, ALBION FOX (1861—1921). A one-time Seventh-day Adventist minister, who later apostatized. He was born on a farm near Winslow, Illinois, the son of J. F. Ballenger, an SDA minister. After completing his public school education he taught for four years. Then the conference granted him a ministerial license and sent him out to preach. He became a fluent preacher and an able writer. After entering the ministry, he attended Battle Creek College for parts of two years.

In 1890 he was chosen secretary of the National Religious Liberty Association, with headquarters in Chicago. Three years later he was invited to serve as assistant editor of the American Sentinel, published in New York City. Eager to get back into public work, he resigned his editorial post after about a year. He attended camp meetings and other important gatherings in nearly all the conferences in North America. Outstanding among his sermons was the one entitled “Receive Ye the Holy Ghost.” About this time he wrote the book Power for Witnessing.

About the turn of the century he was called to Great Britain, where he worked in several of the large cities of England. For a time he served in the Welsh Mission and later the Ireland Mission.

It was while leading the work in these missions that he began to entertain erroneous views regarding the work of Christ in the heavenly sanctuary. He submitted a manuscript on his views to a committee selected to examine them, who pointed out the errors and counseled him not to print the manuscript. He rejected their counsel and proceeded to propagate his views by voice and by pen. This naturally led to a separation from the organized work. His name appeared for the last time in the 1905 Yearbook as superintendent of the Ireland Mission. He returned to the United States, where he became active in proclaiming his erroneous views.

Beginning in 1914 he sought to bring his views before the church by means of a publication called The Gathering Call, which he took over from one Eylar of Bache, Oklahoma, and transferred to Riverside, California. He won sympathizers here and there, but did not develop an organized offshoot movement.

He was successful in influencing his aged father, J. F. Ballenger, a retired SDA minister, to embrace his erroneous views and to lend his influence in disseminating them. His brother, E. S. Ballenger, an ordained minister, also joined him, and as a result lost his credentials in 1913 or 1914. When Albion died, August 1921, E. S. Ballenger became the editor of The Gathering Call, with Mrs. A. F. Ballenger as associate editor.

Ballenger, John Fox

BALLENGER, JOHN FOX (1834—1921). Minister. He was born on a farm where the city of Columbus, Ohio, now stands, the son of Asa Ballenger, a Methodist circuit rider and farmer. When John was 2 years old the family moved to a farm near Winslow, Illinois. His religious experience began in early childhood, and later he became a class leader in the Methodist Church. Shortly before the Civil War he accepted the Seventh-day Adventist faith as the result of tent meetings conducted by W. S. Ingraham in Onesco, Illinois. Recognizing the abilities of the young farmer, Ingraham urged him to enter the ministry. Ballenger gladly accepted the call, planted his rented farm to small grain, said goodbye to his family, and joined Ingraham in a series of tent meetings in St. Cloud, Minnesota. He was ordained Oct. 14, 1893, in the Battle Creek Tabernacle. For more than 50 years he preached in Minnesota, Illinois, Wisconsin, Michigan, Canada, and California, retiring in 1910 or 1911.

In his old age he was influenced by his son Albion to embrace and propagate certain erroneous views regarding the work of Christ in the heavenly sanctuary. When he refused to accept the counsel of the leaders to renounce the false teachings, he was asked to surrender his credentials. His monthly sustentation allowances were, however, continued until the time of his death.

Baltic Union School

BALTIC UNION SCHOOL. A school established in 1923 for the training of church workers. It was operated by the Baltic Union at Suschenhof estate near Riga, Latvia. It is listed in the Yearbook from 1924 to 1937. The estate was situated in a picturesque area near Lake Stintsee and included a main building, referred to as a castle, and several auxiliary dwellings and farm buildings. The main building contained classrooms, a 120-seat chapel, a dining room for 100 persons, and a young women's dormitory. Other buildings housed faculty members and married students. A dormitory for male students, housing two or three in a room, was erected in 1924. Instruction began under the direction of L. F. Oswald, who came from the United States. Other early faculty members were A. Eglit and M. Oswald, wife of the principal.

The school had a multilingual student body and offered courses in German, Latvian, Estonian, and Russian. About two thirds of the enrollment came from Latvia, about a third from Estonia, and a few from Lithuania. The school was also known by the German names Missions-Schule Suschenhof and Advent-Missionsseminar. In 1935 the Estonian Conference established its own school, Estonian Mission School (Adventusuühingute Usuteaduse Kool). From 1938 the only school listed as near Riga was the Latvian Conference School (Adventes Misijas Seminars).

Bandung Academy

BANDUNG ACADEMY (Sekolah Lanjutan Advent). A day school situated in Bandung, Java, Indonesia. Church members in the Bandung area of Indonesia began a church school on July 30, 1948. This became a junior academy on Aug. 4, 1963, with M. L. Tobing as principal. When the children graduated from the junior academy in 1966, the church members and the West Java Mission staff opened the present senior academy as a day school on Aug. 4, 1966, with an enrollment of 22 students. R. K. Siahaan was the principal. Since that time enrollment increased until it reached 450 students. The academy has been self-supporting since it opened. The present location is adjacent to the Seventh-day Adventist church, 63 Jalan Karyawan, Bandung, Java, Indonesia.

Principals: E. T. Mangunsong, 1968; R. K. Siahaan, 1969—1971; M. R. Manurung, 1972—1976; W. Hutapea, 1977—1978; H. Sitompul, 1979—1981; W. Hutapea, 1982—1986; B. Bangun, 1987—1991; B. Hutasoit, 1991—1994; K. A. Siregar, 1994— .

Bandung Adventist Hospital

BANDUNG ADVENTIST HOSPITAL (Rumah Sakit Advent). A 200-bed general hospital operated by the West Indonesia Union Mission in Bandung, Java, Indonesia.

Seventh-day Adventists began conducting medical work in Indonesia soon after establishing their mission work there. The Java Health Retreat at Sumber Wekas, in eastern Java, was opened in 1908. It was put in the charge of Anna Nordstrom (later Mrs. G. A. Wood), a nurse from the Wahroonga Sanitarium, who arrived in Surabaja on Oct. 20, 1907, and Ethelbert Thorpe and his wife, both nurses, who arrived in Surabaja from Australia late in 1908. Wood and his wife operated a clinic at Pangungsen Colony in central Java from 1909 to 1912. Tena Judge did medical missionary work in Padang, Sumatra, from 1909 to 1914; she was joined in 1910 by Victoria Whitton, also a graduate of the Wahroonga Sanitarium in Australia.

In 1920 when D. S. Kime was appointed to take charge of the work in Batakland, Sumatra, he immediately opened a clinic in connection with an English school at Sipogu, Sipirok, Tapanuli, which continued to operate until the Japanese occupation; Mrs. G. A. Wood opened a mobile clinic in Tandjung Medan, Sumatra, in April 1930.

Maria Muster, a midwife from Germany, opened medical work in Palembang, Sumatra, in May 1932, but the clinic closed in 1936 when she married. A clinic was opened adjacent to the Batavia (now Jakarta) church on Apr. 19, 1938. Mrs. S. H. Horn, a graduate nurse from Holland, operated the clinic with the help of J. E. Sinambela, a national nurse, and under the medical supervision of Dr. Tan Tjoe Han, a member of the church. This clinic later became a maternity clinic, first employing Mrs. P. Loth as midwife and later Anna Kalangi in the same capacity. This maternity clinic continued to function until 1947, when, during the revolution, it was taken over by the Red Cross and never returned to the denomination.

Dr. N. Twijnstra opened a dental clinic, which is still in operation, in Medan, Sumatra, in 1950.

In October 1920 J. E. Gardner, M.D., had sailed from the United States under appointment to begin medical work in Indonesia, but because he was not given permission to do so by the Dutch government, he later began medical work in Penang, Malaya.

In 1949 Donald N. Holm, M.D., from the United States, came to Indonesia with the understanding that if he would work in the government health department for three years, he would be allowed to open up denominational medical work thereafter. However, as he studied the contract he discovered that the law under which foreign doctors were allowed to practice in mission hospitals made no mention of the necessity of serving the government first. The church, therefore, requested permission for Dr. Holm to open an SDA mission hospital immediately. Providentially, since the Dutch were preparing to transfer the government to the people of Indonesia, they consented.

As a result, on Apr. 24, 1950, a clinic was opened in south Bandung, Java, at Kiaratjondong, and in October 1950 the Rumah Sakit Advent (Bandung Adventist Hospital) was officially opened at Taman Sari 40. This 20-bed hospital occupied a dwelling converted into crowded but efficient quarters for providing the multiple type of services required.

In October 1952 the first class of seven nursing students was admitted. In 1953 a second house adjacent to the hospital was purchased, renovated, and enlarged to increase the bed capacity to 70, as well as to provide more suitable quarters for the School of Nursing, kitchen, and dining room. Later remodeling increased the bed capacity to 110, including the bassinets. In 1953 Dr. Jess C. Holm arrived with his family to join the hospital staff.

Wilma Leazer, from the United States, a nurse with special training and experience in nursing education, devoted herself to strengthening the scholastic program of the School of Nursing. She arranged collegiate cooperation with Indonesia Union Seminary, and in 1957 sponsored a postgraduate program of nursing education with the cooperation of the Indonesia Union Seminary faculty and others qualified to teach these advanced subjects. A large building was purchased to house the School of Nursing.

Plans for building a representative medical institution were largely in the hands of Dr. D. N. Holm. Shortly before he left on furlough in 1960, the groundbreaking ceremony was held (Mar. 1) on the 2.5-acre (one-hectare) plot he had purchased in a choice location of the city of Bandung. The erection of the new three-story hospital building began a short time later under the supervision of A. L. Sherman, a builder from the United States, who had arrived from Bangkok. When Sherman returned to the United States, the hospital's business manager, Tan Peng Hong, who had solicited millions upon millions of rupiahs for its construction, supervised the building of the new plant. The new Bandung Adventist Hospital, containing 200 beds and costing nearly $4 million, was officially opened on Jan. 24, 1963, with Dr. Jess C. Holm as the medical director.

Medical Directors: Donald Holm, 1950—1960; Neil Thrasher, 1960—1961; Jess C. Holm, 1962—1966; Neil Thrasher, 1966—1968; Henry A. Novak, 1968—1970; E.B.K. Supit, 1970—1971; A. M. Mamora, 1971—1976; Paiyan L. Tambunan, 1976—1982; Simon Tomarere, 1982— .

Bangalore Seventh-day Adventist Higher Secondary School

BANGALORE SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST HIGHER SECONDARY SCHOOL.

A coeducational day school offering instruction up to the twelfth standard, or School Leaving Certificate. It is operated at Bangalore, Karnataka state, by the Karnataka Section of the South India Union of the Southern Asia Division. Enrollment in 1993 was 2,000.

The school was opened in 1941 as an elementary church school, with 30 students and Edna Dyer as teacher. In 1954 additional classrooms were constructed, along with an auditorium and boys' and girls' dormitories. In January 1955 the Bangalore Middle School was opened as a coeducational English language boarding school with the equivalent of 10 grades. In 1961 the boarding section was closed and the school operated as a day school only. In 1967 the school was accredited with the Council for the Indian School Certificate examination, which is affiliated with the University of Cambridge Examination Syndicate, London. At present (1993) there are two sections in the high school classes, one for the Secondary School Leaving Certificate and government examination, and the other for the Indian Certificate of Secondary Education examination, conducted by the Council for the Indian School Certificate board, New Delhi.

In 1971 additional classrooms and a science laboratory were added, thus giving more accommodation for better classroom facilities.

In 1989 computer classes were started with 10 computers in the classroom.

Bangkok Adventist Hospital

BANGKOK ADVENTIST HOSPITAL (formerly Bangkok Sanitarium and Hospital). A general hospital with a capacity of 180 beds and 24 bassinets, situated at 430 Pitsanuloke Road, Bangkok, Thailand, owned and operated by the Christian Medical Foundation of Seventh-day Adventists, Thailand.

Bangkok Mission Clinic. The present institution is an outgrowth of the Bangkok Mission Clinic, opened in rented quarters at 4986 Plabplachai Road, on May 2, 1937, with funds contributed by a philanthropist sea captain, Thomas Hall, of Mexico. Dr. Ralph F. Waddell and his wife, Ellen; Nai Pleng Vitiamyalaksana; and Kon Vui-leong directed the development of the original 12-bed hospital with an Outpatient Department into a 50-bed clinic.

As the medical work in Bangkok grew, expanded facilities were needed. In late 1940 a large house about a mile (1.6 kilometers) from the original clinic was leased and remodeled to provide an additional 30 beds, and became known as the Annex. This increased the hospital's capacity to 80 beds and made possible the opening of a School of Nursing in May of 1941 under the direction of Ruth Munroe.

World War II and After. When war came to Southeast Asia, Dr. G. G. Innocent (the medical director) and Dr. D. P. LaTourette, with their families, and Ruth Munroe were interned. The Annex was closed, but the clinic continued to operate under the direction of Nai Pleng, a medical assistant, and a Romanian physician, S. Bene, was employed to attend the patients. During the war years the clinic's income supplied funds for the mission budget.

Bangkok Sanitarium and Hospital. With the cessation of hostilities, the overseas staff returned to Thailand. On Dec. 25, 1946, the former Annex and surrounding buildings, occupying a six-acre (2.4-hectare) tract of land at the corner of Pitsanuloke and Lan Luang roads, were purchased for the development of the Bangkok Sanitarium and Hospital. The former Annex, remodeled again, became the initial building of the Bangkok Sanitarium and Hospital. Another building was converted into quarters for the School of Nursing, which was reopened July 1, 1947. Thirty-three students of the first postwar class were capped Oct. 30, 1947. Some of these still work at the hospital and its related institutions.

Medical activities of the Bangkok Sanitarium and Hospital were extended into the provinces of Thailand in 1949, when the institution sponsored the opening of mission clinics at Ubol, Phuket, and Haad Yai, under Drs. J. E. Sandness, F. N. Crider, and R. C. Gregory, respectively. The clinics at Ubol and Haad Yai have since been closed.

On Aug. 3, 1949, the cornerstone of the new Bangkok Sanitarium and Hospital building was laid. A joint church community financial campaign provided funds for a modern four-story hospital building, which was officially opened by L. Pibulsonggram, Thailand's premier, on Mar. 19, 1951. During the ensuing years, the clinic was departmentalized and the number of staff members increased accordingly.

In July 1955 the wife of the premier officially opened the new building for the School of Midwifery. Gertrude Green, an American midwife, directed the development of the obstetrical clinic, which serves the poor and also provides clinical experience for midwifery students. Green retired in 1980 and returned to the United States in 1992 after a total of 51 years of service, 43 of them at the Bangkok Adventist Hospital.

Near the end of 1957 a dental clinic was developed by M. C. Lamberton, D.D.S., who later moved to Chingmai and opened a dental clinic there. The original clinic was sold, and a new one has been built on a different site.

In mid-1958 a much-needed addition to the sanitarium building increased the total bed capacity to 180. At that time the work that had been conducted in the city clinic was transferred to the sanitarium.

On Dec. 2, 1958, Queen Sirikit of Thailand opened a modern three-story concrete building for the School of Nursing, with dormitory space for 120 student nurses, administrative offices, library, and classrooms. A new administrative building for the nursing training program was opened in 1989, and the administrative section of the original building (along with the library and classrooms) was transferred to this new building. Training schools in nursing, medical and X-ray technology, anesthesia, and midwifery were conducted at that time, but now midwifery has been absorbed by the college program, and training in X-ray and laboratory skills are being run by the government and other universities. Nurse anesthetists are no longer being trained.

March 1969 marked the opening of a midwifery clinic at Chiengkong. An attractive four-story dormitory to house graduate nurses was completed in 1972 in Bangkok.

The name Bangkok Adventist Hospital was officially adopted in January 1973. In 1983 a new wing was opened, built into the original hospital building, in order to increase much-needed outpatient, operating room, and patient room facilities. This wing was named after Ralph Waddell. In 1987 the Pleng Vitimalaksana building was opened on the fiftieth anniversary of the hospital to provide beds for obstetric and pediatric patients, a new food and bakery service, and much-needed car parking space.

In 1990 a lifestyle center called the Mission Health Promotion Center, capable of housing 60 people, was opened in the hamlet of Muak Lek in the province of Saraburi. This facility is designed to present preventive medicine in harmony with the traditional SDA "sanitarium" concept.

All the Seventh-day Adventist medical institutions in Thailand are operated under the auspices of the Christian Medical Foundation.

Clinical Activity: In 1992 the Bangkok Adventist Hospital admitted 8,000 patients, treated 118,000 outpatients, and provided $161,000 worth of charity care. In that year there were more than 500 employees working at the hospital, in Muak Lak, at the college, and in the hospital store.

Other Features: Besides admitting and treating patients, the hospital also runs a mobile clinic that is equipped with an X-ray unit.

Bangladesh

BANGLADESH. A republic comprising what was formerly known as East Pakistan. It gained independence from Pakistan in December 1971. Bangladesh covers an area of 55,813 square miles (144,556 square kilometers) bounded by India on its northern, eastern, and western borders, the Bay of Bengal to the south, and Myanmar in the southeastern corner. The population (1994) is about 125 million, the majority of whom are Bengalis in ethnic origin, with smaller groups of tribal people, such as Garo, Santali, Mog, and Chakma, found mostly in the border areas. The country is probably the most densely populated area of the world, with about 2,150 persons per square mile (830 per square kilometer). The climate is warm and humid, with high rainfall during the monsoon season, but drier weather during the winter months. Much of the land, which includes the vast delta areas of the Padma, Meghna, and Jamuna rivers, is subject to seasonal flooding. Consequently, when this is excessive, crops can be seriously damaged. The country is periodically battered by severe cyclones coming from the Bay of Bengal. These sometimes whip up tidal waves, as was the case in 1970 and 1991, killing tens of thousands of people. The official language of the area is Bengali, but other languages, including English, are used. More than 85 percent of the people are Muslim, about 12 percent Hindu, and the rest are Christians, Buddhists, and animists.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Seventh-day Adventists began work in the territory of Bangladesh in the last decade of the nineteenth century, when colporteurs from Calcutta entered the area. In 1906 Lal Gopal Mookerjee, an early convert in India and a descendant of William Carey's first convert, opened the first SDA mission station in East Bengal (now Bangladesh) at Gopalganj. With his own funds he paid for the mission buildings, his own dwelling, a church, a dispensary, and a residence for other national workers. A few years later he left because of his wife's failing health, and in 1909 A. G. Watson, an Anglo-Indian, was placed in charge of the station, while Mookerjee went to develop the city work in Calcutta and to edit a newly established Bengali language evangelistic magazine, Juga Lakshan.

In 1909 the first general meeting of adherents was held, and at that time the first SDA communion was celebrated in East Bengal. Late in that year J. C. Little, who had been assigned to the East Bengal field, went to the city of Barisal. A few months later, in February 1910, a second annual meeting was held, at which about 40 members were present and 20 persons were baptized. The first SDA church in Bangladesh was organized at Barisal with 26 members. Unfortunately, Little died in August 1910, while itinerating during a cholera epidemic. Nevertheless, the work continued to grow. In 1910 the General Conference appropriated funds for a 25-foot (7.6-meter) mission launch to ply the rivers and canals of East Bengal (M. E. Olson, Origin and Progress, p. 524; in Our Story of Missions, p. 315, W. A. Spicer mentions a houseboat, The Canal Friend, as being there about the same time). Much work was also done by colporteurs, among whom R. C. Dey, A. Mundel, and B. A. Nath were pioneers.

In 1921 a boarding school for boys was opened at Gopalganj. Mrs. L. G. Mookerjee, whose husband was superintendent of the field, was principal of the school. In 1926 A. G. Youngberg became field superintendent and principal of the school. In 1929 a physician, C. F. Schilling, came as dispensary doctor and his wife as principal of the school. In the same year, a girls' school (called the Bengali Girls' School), which had been established in 1916, was transferred from Hooghly, West Bengal, to Gopalganj and was combined with the boys' school in 1932. In 1939 the school was transferred to Jalirpar, about 19 miles (30 kilometers) north of Gopalganj (see Kellogg-Mookerjee Memorial Seminary).

Organization and Growth

Organization and Growth. Until 1910 SDA work in British India, Ceylon, and Burma was administered by the India Mission, organized in 1895, with headquarters at Calcutta. In that year, at the fourth biennial meeting of the mission held at Lucknow, India, October-November 1910, SDA work in India was organized along the language lines into four missions, among them the Bengali Mission, with headquarters at Calcutta, including the part that later became Bangladesh. L. G. Mookerjee, A. G. Watson, W. A. Barlow, and W. W. Miller were assigned to work in East Bengal. W. R. French, who had recently arrived from the United States, was given supervision of the work in that area. He was succeeded by L. G. Burgess in 1915, and by L. G. Mookerjee in 1919. In this year the Northeast Union was formed, with East Bengal Mission as a part. From Aug. 15, 1947, it was known as East Pakistan Local Mission, still under the Northeast Union. Then, from 1956, it continued as the East Pakistan Section under the Pakistan Union, with R. S. Fernando as president. After independence, in December 1971, the area was renamed the Bangladesh Section.

Still later, because of upgrading, the name was changed to the Bangladesh Union Mission. In 1993 a new seminary was under construction in the West Bangladesh Mission to meet the needs of a fast-growing field.

Bangladesh Adventist Publishing House

BANGLADESH ADVENTIST PUBLISHING HOUSE. A printing establishment begun in 1952 under the name Seventh-day Adventist Mission Press, at what is now Kellogg-Mookerjee Memorial Seminary. At that time only a letter press was in use. An electric press was purchased in 1963. In 1966 the press was transferred to church headquarters at Dhaka. In the 1970s the name was changed to Bangladesh Adventist Press and Publishing House. Its main mission was to print books for literature evangelists.

In 1988 the Bangladesh Union Mission purchased a flatbed press from Japan, but because of financial difficulties, the press had to be sold. In 1991 the union mission purchased a computer and laser printer that enables the publishing house to prepare materials for printing on an offset press.

In 1993 there were 40 literature evangelists distributing the literature produced by the publishing house in Bangladesh.

Bangladesh Adventist Seminary and College

BANGLADESH ADVENTIST SEMINARY AND COLLEGE (formerly Bangladesh Adventist Academy). A coeducational boarding college and seminary located about 30 miles (50 kilometers) north of Dhaka near the town of Kaliakoir, on the Dhaka-Tangail Highway. It is situated on 60 acres (25 hectares) of rural land. The college offers majors in education, religion, business, and office management, with minors in health as well as in the areas mentioned. In 1993 the institution had approximately 585 students, including about 120 in college.

The kindergarten through standard 10 program is taught in the Bengali language with a strong emphasis on English. The college program is taught in English.

In 1964 several plots of land were purchased near Kaliakoir with the plan of starting an educational program. The spot was remote and almost uninhabitable at the time. Thick jungle covered most of the high ground. The road to Dhaka was not much more than a dirt track. By 1969 the education needs for the young people were critical, and so a junior high school was established under the direction of D. P. Rema. He worked with the students and faculty to build “Kutchal” houses and cleared a portion of jungle. In 1970, 30 students enrolled in the pioneer school.

Students traveled from the north and south to attend the new school. Most were from poor families in villages where they could not obtain the education they needed. By 1973 the program was upgraded to the high school level under the leadership of Sunith K. Dass. A two-year seminary program beyond high school also was introduced at this time. Several of the early brick buildings were constructed during these years. As the land was cleared slowly, the campus took shape.

A special agricultural program, following the Mittleider method, was begun under the direction of W. L. Fuller in 1975. The goal was not only to feed the students but to train them in effective agricultural methods so that when they returned to their homes they could help improve the health and prosperity of their villages.

In 1976 B. H. Stickle succeeded Sunith K. Dass as principal. Under his leadership the physical plant improved considerably. In 1981 R. G. Burton returned as principal and continued to improve the program in preparation for future college status.

By 1983 Bangladesh Adventist Seminary was ready to consider offering higher seminary and college level classes. A visiting evaluation team from the Board of Higher Education encouraged the institution to press forward with a college program, and set about to meet the many challenges this step would require.

Sukrit K. Dass was called to be the first president of Bangladesh Adventist Seminary and College, and in June 1983 the junior college program was begun. Programs were offered in business, religion, education, and office management. The college program thrived and grew under S. K. Dass’s leadership.

In 1988 I. P. Bairagee came and began preparations for upgrading the institution to a four-year program. In 1989 E. P. Rema became acting president. The college board prepared for another visit of the evaluation team with the hope of approval for a four-year program. The four-year senior college program was inaugurated in August 1990 with the arrival of Dr. S. R. Guptill, the new college president. Four-year programs were started in business, religion, and education.

This led to a time of rapid growth for the campus physical plant. A new church was built, followed by a new women's hostel. A new deep well was dug and several married student houses were made. A three-story shower and latrine facility was constructed for the men's hostel, and a water tank was built on top of the administration building. A metal workshop was started through the efforts of ADRA, and a new gate was built at the entrance. A dining hall/gymnasium was constructed in 1993, and paved walks and benches were added to the campus landscape. Also at this time a playing field was constructed for students' use.

Principals: D. P. Rema, 1969—1973; Sunith K. Dass, 1973—1975; B. H. Stickle, 1976—1977; R. G. Burton, 1977; C. E. Ondrizek, 1977—1981; R. G. Burton, 1981—1982; Sukrit K. Dass, 1983—1987; I. P. Bairagee, 1988—1989; E. P. Rema, 1989—1990; Stephen R. Guptill, 1990— .

Baptism

BAPTISM. (Gr. baptisma, from baptizō “to dip,” “to immerse.”) The Christian ceremony of initiation, traditionally either by immersion, pouring, or sprinkling. Seventh-day Adventists “believe in baptism by immersion,” and that baptism “typifies the death, burial, and resurrection of Christ, and openly expresses faith in His saving grace and the renunciation of sin and the world, and is recognized as a condition of entrance into church membership” (Church Manual [1990], pp. 42, 182). Accordingly, baptism is administered only to those who have reached an age of accountability. It “is usually conducted by an ordained minister, but in his absence the local church elder may officiate,” only, however, with the approval of the conference president (Manual for Ministers [1992], p. 84). Persons entering the SDA Church who have been baptized by immersion in other religious communions are accepted without rebaptism, unless they desire to be rebaptized; however, “it is recognized that rebaptism is desirable” (Church Manual, p. 51).

When members have apostatized, the Church Manual recommends rebaptism: “When members have fallen away in apostasy and have lived in such a manner that the faith and principles of the church have been publicly violated, they should, in case of reconversion and application for church membership, enter the church as in the beginning, by baptism” (p. 51).

Seventh-day Adventists believe that candidates for baptism should be thoroughly instructed in the Christian faith, in order that they may take the step intelligently and with resolute purpose. To this end, special classes are conducted in which instruction on the principal articles of faith and on the Christian way of life is given. In non-Christian lands candidates may remain in baptismal classes for as long as one or two years, until they have demonstrated both a theoretical and a practical understanding of the Christian faith. Immediately prior to baptism, candidates are asked to affirm, publicly before the church, their assent to the teachings of the church, and their intent to order their lives in harmony with their beliefs.

Origin and Development of the Seventh-day Adventist View. The question of baptism naturally arose early among SDAs, coming as they did largely from membership in other churches. In 1857 J. H. Waggoner declared that a person should be rebaptized after coming to have a correct understanding of the law of God, since that individual cannot have truly been baptized until having died to sin; in baptism that person “puts on Christ, . . . and takes His name,” but we “cannot live unto God and walk in newness of life, while we continue to transgress the law,” regardless of whether the sin was committed in ignorance (Review and Herald 9:173, Apr. 2, 1857; 9:181, Apr. 9, 1857). The question of baptism was further discussed by James White in 1867, who listed several conditions that call for rebaptism: not having truly died to sin; having been baptized by an unholy minister or one who opposed “Bible purity” or spiritual gifts, or the work of SDAs; having been baptized before accepting “the truth”; having apostatized and turned to iniquity (ibid., 30:114 ^f, Aug. 6, 1867).

Although there is evidence that the question of the character of the minister was an issue in the early years, this has not generally typified SDA doctrine. The question of whether rebaptism of converts is necessary, however, continued to be an issue until the General Conference session of 1886, when the policy essentially as it stands today (see above) was formally adopted (EW 99; Ellen G. White, Sketches From the Life of Paul, p. 133; Ev 375; Yearbook [1887], p. 45).

Meanwhile, the theological dimensions of baptism were developed in a series of articles by Waggoner in 1878, followed by four more articles from J. N. Andrews in 1880 (Review and Herald, Feb. 14—June 6, 1878; Jan. 15, 22, Feb. 5, 26, 1880). Emphasis was placed on the relation of baptism to the law: baptism is the outward act signifying that the sinner has died with Christ, i.e., has been united with Him in His atoning death; he or she dies to the transgression of the law and thus is forgiven of past sins; he or she rises to a new life of obedience to God's will, a life of consecration. In a later series appears a new emphasis on the importance of faith and the work of the Spirit, particularly in connection with baptism as a symbol of resurrection: O. Davis writes in 1893 that in baptism "God . . . raises us up as He raised Jesus up a new creature, if we have faith in the operations of God." "We are reckoned new creatures, born of the Spirit" (ibid. 70:595, Sept. 19, 1893; 70:614, Oct. 3, 1893). Ellen G. White portrays baptism as an oath of allegiance on the part of the one baptized (Ev 307 [1903]) and represents that individual as having received "a pledge from the . . . Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit" (SDACom 6:1074 [1900]). "If we are true to our [baptismal] vow, there is opened to us a door of communication with heaven—a door that no human hand or satanic agency can close" (ibid., 1075 [Review and Herald 83:20, May 17, 1906]). In more recent years C. B. Haynes wrote: "When the believer . . . rises from the baptismal waters, he testifies that his only hope of a life that will give him victory over his old sinful nature is in a risen Lord and the new spiritual and resurrection life which his Lord alone can give" (These Times 67:19, September 1958).

Historical Backgrounds of Baptism

Historical Backgrounds of Baptism. The OT background of baptism is to be found in the ceremonial washings with water specified for the ancient Hebrew rituals. It included both sprinkling and bathing the entire body (Lev. 14:8, 9; 16:4; cf. Zech. 13:1). Compare also "Purge me with hyssop" (Ps. 51:7); in the ancient services of purification hyssop was dipped in water and used for sprinkling the people (Lev. 14:6, 7; Num. 19:17—19).

In late Judaism at least three developments are relevant to a background for baptism:

1. According to the Talmud (Tractate Mikwaoth), virtually all the washings prescribed in the sanctuary rituals were to be accomplished by complete immersion in a pit filled with water (a Mikweh). This makes understandable the variant reading of Mark 1:4, where even beds are spoken of as being baptized, a ceremony provided for in the Talmud.

2. There is evidence from the Talmud (Yebamoth 46a-b) that from the end of the first century of the Christian Era at least, baptism along with circumcision and sacrifice was required for the admission of a proselyte to Judaism. While some have questioned that this was practiced as early as the time of John and Jesus, it is now generally conceded by scholars that it must have been. (See Frank A. Moran, "Jewish Elements in Christian Baptism,” pp. 10—13, where the problem is discussed and the evidence presented for the antiquity of a proselyte baptism.)

3. Josephus mentions daily ritual washings of the Essenes (War 2. 19. 5, 10), and there are repeated references in the Dead Sea scrolls to some kind of ritual washing (1QS, III, 4—6, 8—10; IV, 18—21). In addition, a number of cisterns have been found at the Qumran monastery, at least one of which is well suited for baptism (W. H. Brownlee, “John the Baptist in the Light of Ancient Scrolls,” The Scrolls and the New Testament, ed. Krister Stendahl [1957], pp. 38, 39).

A development may be observed in Jewish, Johannine, and Christian baptism: Jewish baptism was largely a cleansing from ritual defilement and, at least at Qumran, was also connected with rectitude of life and granting of “a holy spirit” by God (1QS, III, 6—10; IV, 18—20).

John the Baptist seems to place an even greater emphasis upon repentance and also looks forward to a connection between baptism and “spirit.” With John the emphasis seems to be much more directly upon cleansing spiritually and upon ethical rectitude, while at Qumran there is a stronger ritual orientation upon the cleansing of the “flesh.”

Particularly significant is the fact also that while the Qumran ritual was highly exclusive, limited only to members of the community—the “elect”—John’s baptism was open to all who repented.

As contrasted with that of John, Christian baptism is “in the name of Jesus” and associated with the reception of the Holy Spirit (see Acts 19:1—6). Also in contrast with Qumran, the Holy Spirit in the New Testament is divine and not simply “a holy spirit” granted by God to an individual. Furthermore, Christian baptism is connected with the death, burial, and resurrection of Christ (Rom. 6:1—11).

Infant Baptism

Infant Baptism. Seventh-day Adventists reject infant baptism, asserting that there is no Scripture warrant for such a practice. They believe that active faith on the part of the participant is a prerequisite for baptism, and since infants cannot exercise such kind of faith their baptism would be entirely without meaning.

Historically clear evidence of infant baptism first appears in the Christian church during the second half of the second century. Whether it arose first in the East or in the West is not clear. However, our earliest testimony to it is in the West, and the two major factors that seem to have contributed to its appearance are first attested there: an identification of baptism as “spiritual circumcision” (Justin Martyr Dialogue With Trypho 43, in ANF, vol. 1, p. 216); and the belief that baptism cleansed from original sin.

Infant baptism is probably referred to by Irenaeus (Against Heresies 2. 22. 4, in ANF, vol. 1, p. 391), and is testified to from the beginning of the third century by Tertullian (On Baptism 18, in ANF, vol. 3, p. 678). The fact that in the East infant baptism apparently was practiced before the doctrine of original sin was introduced suggests that the latter may have been introduced in explanation, at least partially, of the practice of infant baptism. Thus, Origen (d. c. 254) supported infant baptism as an apostolic tradition and used it as an evidence for the doctrine of original sin, which he strongly taught (Commentaria in Epistolam ad Romanos 5. 9, in PG, vol. 14, p. 1047; In Lucam Homilia 14, in PG, vol. 13, p. 1835; In Leviticum Homilia 8, in PG, vol. 12, p. 496). However, the doctrine of original sin was never as deeply rooted in the East as in the West.

Mode of Baptism

Mode of Baptism. From the beginning Seventh-day Adventists have practiced baptism by immersion. While it is unsafe to make the meaning of baptizō a final argument for the mode of baptism, it does seem clear that as used in ancient literature, at least to A.D. 100, baptizō never departs from the basic meaning of “to dip,” “to overwhelm.” At the same time it cannot be proved beyond all doubt that baptizō never refers to a rite performed by sprinkling or pouring, in view of the wide variety of figurative uses in which the word is employed. The strongest argument for baptism by immersion is a theological one—Paul’s symbolism of baptism as representing death, burial, and resurrection, which would have had no significance if the apostolic church had practiced a mode of baptism other than immersion.

Significance of Baptism

Significance of Baptism. From the beginning Seventh-day Adventists, in common with their Protestant heritage, have rejected any view of baptism as an opus operatum, that is, as an act that, in and of itself, imparts grace and effects salvation. Historically, the beginnings of such a view of baptism—the idea that ritual washing had some kind of supernatural power—are very early and may well be a part of the early Christian heritage from Judaism. This already seems to be suggested in Hermas, book 3, similitude 9, 16. Tertullian is the first writer to refer to baptism as a sacramentum. However, this in itself cannot be taken as proof that he thought of baptism as a sacrament in the sense of an opus operatum, for he expresses disapproval of the belief of some who expected from baptism a magical cleansing of sin without true repentance. This in itself testifies to the extent to which baptism, in some minds, had come to be considered an opus operatum by the early third century (Tertullian On Repentance 6). However, in another treatise he comes very close to the idea that the water of baptism has a special power after the invocation of God has been made over it (On Baptism 4). Later in the fourth century the Donatist controversy was settled in favor of baptism as an opus operatum as against an opus operantis. Augustine’s victory over Pelagius on the side of the doctrine of original sin did much to enhance a sacramentalist view of baptism.

Barbados

BARBADOS. An independent state occupying the most easterly of the Caribbean islands, with an area of 166 square miles (430 square kilometers) and a population (1994) of 256,000. In general appearance the island is reminiscent of the English countryside, and the people follow many English customs. The elected House of Assembly, an organ of popular government on the island, dates from 1639. The Church of England is the established church, to which about 70 percent of the people adhere. About 80 percent of the population is of African descent, 16 percent of mixed descent, and about 4 percent of European descent.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. SDA work in Barbados had its beginning when Anna Alleyne became acquainted with SDA teachings through reading magazines sent to her by her sister from British Guiana some time in the 1880s. She shared her magazines with her neighbors with the result that several others began to keep the seventh-day Sabbath. In 1889 an SDA went from British Guiana to Barbados, scattering SDA publications and arousing widespread interest in SDA teachings.

As a result, Sabbathkeepers began meeting in Bridgetown, the island's capital. On Sept. 21, 1891, a group of 17, including Anna Alleyne, C. D. Adamson, Hannah Holder, and Miriam Blenman, was organized by D. A. Ball into the Bridgetown SDA Church. Four years later the church membership had grown to 40. Later James Morrow (1897) and A. J. Haysmer (1900) preached there. At that time the Barbados church served as a base for SDA work in the other East Caribbean islands.

In June 1900 land was purchased in Bridgetown at a cost of WI$250, on which the first SDA church building was erected. A mission school at Bridgetown was reported in the 1904 Yearbook. During the following three decades churches were organized at Gardens, Cave Hill, Checker Hall, and Mile-and-a-Quarter. In the early 1920s a sanitarium was reported on Barbados. A church school was opened in Bridgetown in July 1922. In 1932 the Government Hill church was organized, which at present has 597 members. In 1953 a secondary school was opened.

The territory of Barbados was organized in 1903 as a part of the East Caribbean Conference. Subsequently the administration of the work on the island was transferred through several conferences until in 1930 it was placed with the Leeward Islands Conference.

In 1934, because of administrative advantages, Barbados was chosen as a working base for the conference, which previously had had its headquarters in Antigua. Financial problems arising out of World War II forced the conference to accept mission status in 1945, but with improved conditions conference status was restored in July 1960 under the name of the East Caribbean Conference.

The Cave Sanitarium, which was located on Culloden Road, was transferred to a 2.3-acre (.9-hectare) property on Britton's Hill comprising a commodious two-floor building providing 14 rooms for patients, and two cottages. On this property the new spacious conference headquarters was erected. The old office building was converted into a senior citizens' home. In 1974 an assembly hall was built in back of the Ephesus church to house general gatherings.

BARBADOS SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST SECONDARY SCHOOL. A coeducational day school on the senior high school level, situated at Dalkeith Road, Bridgetown, Barbados, West Indies. The school prepares students for the General Certificate of Education Examination of the Oxford and Cambridge Examination Board and also for college entrance.

The school was established in 1953 by the Leeward Islands Mission (now the East Caribbean Conference) in rented quarters at “Flodden,” Culloden Road, not far from its present site. In January 1961 it was moved to its present property.

The school was founded primarily to provide secondary Christian education for SDA young people in Barbados and the Leeward Islands, but pupils of other faiths are also accepted. In 1993 the school had a staff of 17.

Barlow, William Alexander

BARLOW, WILLIAM ALEXANDER (1862—1942). One of the pioneers of Seventh-day Adventist work in India. He was born in Garston, near Liverpool, England, and spent four years in a parish school there. After working as an office boy, he served as captain's boy on several cruises to North America. When he was about 21 years old he was converted, joined the Salvation Army, and worked with the rank of captain as a self-supporting missionary in the villages of Kent and in the slums of Liverpool. Later he went to India, where he joined an independent Baptist mission working among the Santals in the northeastern part of India. Several years later he became convinced of SDA teachings through reading and was baptized in 1900 at Simultala by G. K. Owen. He then established a self-supporting Seventh-day Adventist mission among the Santals at Simultala, about 30 miles (50 kilometers) west of Karmatar, in the state of Bihar. He retired from active service about 1914, although he remained in India and, almost to the time of his death, continued to make missionary visits and to distribute publications.

Barnes, Edwin

BARNES, EDWIN (fl. 1884—1900). Music teacher and composer of hymns. He headed the Music Department and taught vocal and instrumental music at Battle Creek College (1884—1900), and was coeditor of Hymns and Tunes (1886). Seven of his hymn tunes, written in classic style, appear in the Church Hymnal, among them Winterbourne, Southampton, and Morton.

Barnes, Roger W.

BARNES, ROGER W. (1897—1982). Urologist. Born in Littleton, Colorado, he attended the College of Medical Evangelists (now Loma Linda University), graduating in 1922. After his residency, he accepted an appointment to the faculty of the school and served there until his death. One of his most noted accomplishments was involvement in the development of trans-urethral resections of the prostate, a procedure in which he was unsurpassed. At the School of Medicine he served as chairman of the Department of Urology for several years. He and his wife, Oca, accepted assignments to various parts of the world, including the Middle East, Far East, Australia, South America, and Southern Asia, where they helped establish and organize teaching programs in urology.

Barquisimeto Adventist Clinic

BARQUISIMETO ADVENTIST CLINIC (Clínica Adventista de Barquisimeto). A health-care institution owned and operated by West Venezuela Mission of Seventh-day Adventists for some time, then taken over by the Venezuela-Antilles Union Mission.

It was begun in 1978 in a dwelling bought by the West Venezuela Mission to be used as the mission office, and was remodeled for hospital use and surgery with a capacity of 10 beds. The mission office moved to another building, leaving more space for the clinic. The clinic was administered by mission presidents Ernesto Santos and Nathaniael Garcia from 1978 to 1981. Since 1982 official administrators were appointed.

New services were gradually added and by 1993 a strong outpatient service had been developed, including laboratory, X-ray, ultrasonic, dentistry, ophthalmology, 24-hour emergency, general surgery, internal medicine, gynecology, laparoscopic surgery, reconstructive surgery, pediatric, urology, and other services. In 1993 the clinic was planning a new building that would increase the number of beds to 45, responding to the needs of the thousands of patients that come to the institution each year.

Barron, Richard Clinton

BARRON, RICHARD CLINTON (1925—1972). Evangelist. He was born and reared in California. When very young he dedicated his life to the Lord and was baptized at the age of 9. As a child he would line up chairs on the front porch and “preach” to the “congregation” on Sabbath afternoons.

After his graduation from La Sierra College in 1945, he married Jeanne Bickett and began his work as pastor of the Hawthorne, California, church. After attending an evangelistic workshop in Texas, he joined with his brother in full-time evangelism. In 1960 the Barron-Turner evangelistic team was formed. The following year he suffered back pain, which ultimately led to surgery and divine healing. This was followed by a decade of successful evangelistic work.

He died in the crash of a small plane he was piloting near Walla Walla College in Washington.

BARTLETT, WILLIAM T. (1870—1947). Minister, missionary, church administrator, editor, and teacher. He was born in London, England, and trained for the law. He was baptized into the Seventh-day Adventist Church in 1888, and soon thereafter joined the staff of the Chaloners Mission in north London. After having canvassed for two years, he entered employment with the SDA publishing house in England in 1892. He began his work with the International Tract Society in 1896, and from 1897 to 1901 managed a health food business. Between 1897 and 1920 he served first as an assistant editor and later as editor of the British Present Truth. Concurrently he taught Bible at, and for two years served as principal of, the Stanborough Missionary College (predecessor of Newbold College). He was ordained to the ministry in 1907 in Nottingham, England, by L. R. Conradi and E. E. Andross. In 1916, in the course of World War I, the SDA Church in Great Britain appointed him to look after the interests of SDA young people in the armed services. In 1920 he was called to Africa, where he superintended British East African missions until his return to England in 1930. From 1930 to 1932 Bartlett served as president of the North England Conference; between 1932 and 1941 he was field secretary of the Northern European Division, and for some time after 1933 was its Sabbath school division secretary. His last place of service was Newbold College, where he taught Bible for six years.

Bass Memorial Academy

BASS MEMORIAL ACADEMY. A coeducational boarding school on the senior high school level, operated by the Gulf States Conference and located near Lumberton, Mississippi. The school includes grades 9—12 and is fully accredited by the state and the denomination. On the campus are the following buildings: administration, music, domestic science, natural science, industrial arts, chapel, library, pecan building, laundry, maintenance, elementary school, six separate classrooms, two dormitories (for 160 students), cafeteria, 11 faculty homes, and a gymnasium-auditorium seating 2,000.

Bass Memorial Academy was envisioned in 1957 when Mr. Bass, of the Bass pecan-oil-timber family, decided to donate 356 acres (144 hectares) of his 25,000-acre (10,000-hectare) property to the SDA Church for this purpose. Although not a Seventh-day Adventist, he had read about the church and was acquainted with various members, including Ralph Hender-shot, a layman in the Talowah, Mississippi, church, whom he had met in the Ingathering campaign several years earlier. He admired the clean-living principles of SDAs, which paralleled his own nondrinking and nonsmoking code, and was especially interested in the SDA program of industrial training.

At Bass's invitation LeRoy J. Leiske, conference president; Oscar L. Heinrich, educational secretary; and L. E. Aldrich, conference treasurer (later replaced by J. Henson Whitehead), selected a choice site of 356 acres (144 hectares)—including a pecan grove of 20 acres (eight hectares), about 80 acres (32 hectares) of cleared land, and 250 acres (101 hectares) of pines—a tract evaluated at $100,000. On Aug. 25, 1957, the conference voted to accept the gift. About a year later, in July 1958, the first board meeting was held.

The churches in the conference undertook separate fund-raising projects for specific buildings or rooms. Members donated calves for the dairy farm. Pathfinder clubs raised funds for the school entrance sign, which was dedicated on Sept. 14, 1958, in the presence of J. P. Coleman, governor of Mississippi.

A "Million Penny Campaign" for the administration building culminated on Apr. 5, 1959, when members of the national guard shoveled the 1,242,221 coins into buckets before loading them onto a truck for a widely publicized four-ton (3.6-metric ton) bulk deposit in a New Orleans bank.

O. O. Smith was the original architect and supervising engineer. Later O. L. Heinrich became full-time contractor and superintendent of development. His son, Jerry, thereafter did most of the architectural drawing and Mrs. O. L. Heinrich the interior decorating. S. A. Brown did much of the building. The academy opened on schedule Sept. 10, 1961.

On Aug. 18, 1969, the academy was badly damaged by Hurricane Camille. Even though the total cost of repairing the damage reached almost $100,000, the opening of school was delayed only one week.

May 29, 1971, marked the dedication of the academy with the burning of a $70,000 note, leaving the academy plant with no indebtedness.

A committee of 100, organized in 1969, by 1974 had raised more than $50,000 for school equipment and improvements.

The continued interest of the Bass family in the school and its operation was evidenced by an unrestricted gift of 80 acres (32 hectares) of prime land in 1974. This was officially appraised at $76,000.

Construction of a new $200,000 church was completed in 1975 with a seating capacity of more than 400.

Butler Industries, which arranges silk flowers, was established in 1981 and employs 15 or more students. The Adventist Health Center, a primary-care nursing home, was constructed in 1981 and also employs 15 or more students.

Major remodeling was done in 1988—1989 to the cafeteria, dorms, administration building, and gymnasium. New tennis facilities and a swimming pool were added.

Enrollment in 1992 was 108.

BATA, RUDOLPH ANDREW (1922—1974). Pastor, evangelist, departmental secretary. A native of Ohio, he received his early education in a small church school. He attended Broadview Academy and later Columbia Union College.

While still in college he met and married Margaret Ellis. After graduation he interned in the Ohio Conference and then served in a pastoral capacity in several Midwest and Southern states. Later he became lay activities secretary of the Texas Conference. He also served as secretary-treasurer of the Kentucky-Tennessee Conference and then moved to the Potomac Conference, where he was lay activities secretary. In 1973 he moved back to Tennessee, where he became secretary of the conference and also served as ministerial secretary.

During his 29-year ministry he baptized personally more than 1,000 persons.

Batakland English School

BATAKLAND ENGLISH SCHOOL. A school operated for a time at Sipogu, Sipirok, in northwest Sumatra, under the direction of the North Sumatra Mission. It was established in 1921, along with a clinic, by Dallas S. Kime and his wife, both nurses, and Albinus Mamora, interpreter and teacher of English. After the school opened, with an enrollment of 175, several other national teachers were added. In 1925, because of the help given the local people by the clinic and school, government officials proposed that the community be known as Huta Kime (Village of Kime). The school was changed later into a Dutch language school. In 1937 it was closed and replaced by a colony for the blind. During World War II the buildings were destroyed.

Bates, Joseph

BATES, JOSEPH (1792—1872). Mariner, reformer, Advent preacher, one of the founders of the Seventh-day Adventist Church. He was born July 8, 1792, at Rochester, Massachusetts, near New Bedford. At the age of 15 he set out from his home to follow the sea. He experienced shipwreck, capture, and forced service in the British Navy, and was for two and a half years a prisoner of war in England, being released in 1815. After being restored to his home and family, he continued his career as a merchant seaman, becoming a captain in 1820.

In 1818 he married Prudence Nye, a childhood friend. “Prudy” proved to be an exceptionally patient and loyal wife, and a godly influence upon her husband and family. To them were born five children: one son who died in infancy, another son who died at sea at the age of 35, and three daughters who survived to maturity.

In 1821 Bates gave up the drinking of ardent spirits. The following year he resolved to drink no wine, and soon after gave up smoking and chewing tobacco, as well as the use of profane language. Before 1838 he had abandoned the use of tea and coffee, and in 1843 he discontinued the use of flesh foods. Previously he had stopped using butter, grease, cheese, pies, rich cakes, and spices. Thus, before Seventh-day Adventists were organized into a religious group, Joseph Bates was an enthusiastic supporter of the health principles that this body eventually came to embrace.

After Bates’s conversion to Christianity in the middle 1820s, he commanded a temperance ship on which he allowed no intoxicants, no swearing, and no washing and mending of clothes on Sunday. He conducted morning and evening worship, but in spite of these rigid rules the rough crew adapted themselves very well to this strict regimen. Earlier, in 1824, a New Testament that his wife had placed in his trunk stimulated the beginning of a spiritual awakening. Sobered by the death of a crew member, he surrendered his life to Christ and began daily Bible study and prayer. Upon reaching home, he was baptized and attended religious meetings, and in 1827 he joined the Fairhaven Christian church, to which his wife belonged. It was in this year that he went on his temperance voyage, which lasted almost a year, with which he ended his career as a seaman.

Bates now settled in Fairhaven, fairly well fixed financially with what was known as “a competency” of about $11,000. For the next dozen years, until the Millerite movement attracted his full attention and participation, Joseph Bates dealt with local affairs, such as his father’s properties, civic matters, and a variety of reforms of which the air was full at this particular period in American history. These included temperance, antislavery, tract distribution, vocational education, and the level of morality among seamen in general.

In 1839 Bates accepted William Miller’s views on the Second Advent and from that time forward devoted his whole attention to the Millerite movement, eventually giving all his means to this cause. The following year he served on the committee that issued a call for the first general conference at Boston on the Second Advent. He became an exceptionally active and successful Millerite minister and in May 1842 served as chair of one of the most important of the Millerite conferences. In 1844 he sold his home and most of his other real estate, settled all his debts, and prepared to go wherever necessary to herald the second coming of Christ. Accompanied by H. S. Gurney, an evangelistic singer and formerly a blacksmith, he went into Maryland and preached on Kent Island in the Chesapeake Bay, where he had once been shipwrecked. There he was opposed, particularly for his antislavery views, but he stood up courageously to those who threatened to do him bodily harm.

Bates experienced the disappointment of 1844 without losing his faith. After reading T. M. Preble's article on the seventh-day Sabbath, published in The Hope of Israel in February 1845, and checking the Bible evidence with his customary thoroughness, he made his decision to observe the seventh-day Sabbath. Five years later Prudence joined him in this. Characteristic of the man was his reply when, on the bridge between Fairhaven and New Bedford, upon being hailed by James Madison Monroe Hall, his neighbor and fellow Adventist, with the question "What's the news, Captain Bates?" he replied, "The news is that the seventh day is the Sabbath."

The years between 1846 and 1850 were difficult ones for the early Advent believers. It was a time of bewilderment and recapitulation, of looking back and looking forward, of trying to figure how events and prophecies could fit together to give a clear picture of what had happened and where events were leading. Bates was eminently fitted to lead out in this work. He was a careful student of the Scriptures, having spent much time on his later long sea voyages with his Bible.

In 1846 Bates published a tract dealing with the Sabbath. In this 48-page tract entitled "The Seventh-day Sabbath, a Perpetual Sign," he presented the case of the Sabbath almost exclusively on the basis of the Ten Commandments as the moral guide and rule for all humanity, including Christians. He touched only briefly on the prophesied change of the Sabbath by the papal little horn of Dan. 7.

In the second edition of the tract, published the following year, Bates emphasized the place of the third angel's message in the Sabbatarian movement. On the basis of the long-accepted Protestant identification of the beast with the Papacy, he held that the change of the weekly day of worship from Saturday to Sunday was the badge of papal power. To explain this he issued his tract entitled "A Seal of the Living God," which set forth the Sabbath as the seal.

In 1847 Bates published the longest of his pamphlets, entitled "Second Advent Waymarks and High Heaps, or a Connected View of the Fulfillment of Prophecy by God's Peculiar People From the Year 1840 to 1847." In this he gave an overview of the Advent message for this period, proposing to give its readers a view of their journey to the Promised Land and a survey of things they had passed and things still to come.

These pamphlets, six in all in this period, gave evidence of Bates's sincere desire to know the truth, and of his willingness to search for it diligently. His interpretations of prophecy, tentatively given, indicate a willingness to change with the coming of new light, but on cardinal points of Bible teaching he was adamant and not disposed to compromise.

Bates played a prominent part in the "Sabbath Conferences" that began in 1848 and were intended to clarify the Sabbath teaching and bring it into harmony with other basic concepts of doctrine.

In 1849 Bates's pioneering spirit led him west to Michigan, where in time he gathered a company of converts in Jackson. In 1852 he went on to Battle Creek and pioneered the work in this city, which was to be for many decades the center and headquarters of the Seventh-day Adventist denomination. His first convert here, Presbyterian David Hewett, by his prompt and enthusiastic acceptance of the Advent truths, led Bates and other Adventist leaders in 1852 to abandon the “shut door” position, which had been accepted after the disappointment of 1844.

During the 1850s Bates spent an increasing amount of his time in Michigan and the adjoining states and in Canada. In 1858 he moved permanently from Fairhaven and settled for the rest of his days in Monterey, in western Michigan.

A striking feature of Bates’s activities for the last two decades of his life was his constant itinerating, first in New England and later in Michigan and neighboring states. A good share of his life he spent on the move, first by sea and later by land, seemingly a compulsive traveler. These itineraries, after 1845 in particular, reveal that after he had given his modest fortune to the Adventist movement he was almost totally dependent upon the financial largesse of interested friends and of those to whom he ministered.

As the church moved toward formal organization, which came in May 1863, Bates was called upon regularly to assume the leadership of conferences of church leaders. He presided at the conference in Battle Creek when the name Seventh-day Adventist was adopted to designate the body of Sabbathkeepers who were looking for the coming of Christ.

After the Ellen White vision of June 1863, dealing with health reform, Bates felt a compulsion to advocate more openly and aggressively the health principles that he had long practiced. In 1865, when practically all the church leaders were incapacitated because of serious illness, and when for nearly a year it was not possible to gather a quorum to transact church business, Bates carried on in good health, encouraging the others and setting an example in healthful living.

At the first camp meeting, held at Wright, Michigan, in 1868, Bates, then 76 years of age, was one of the speakers. His lifetime companion, “Prudy,” passed to her rest in 1870, but Bates continued his ministry, though at a more restricted pace. In 1871, the year before his death, he held at least 100 meetings, besides those at his local church in Monterey and the conferences that he faithfully attended. He died at the Western Health Reform Institute in Battle Creek on Mar. 19, 1872. He was buried by the side of his wife in Poplar Hill Cemetery in Monterey, where about 100 of his SDA brethren also await the call of the Life-giver.

Bates’s contribution—as one of the triumvirate, with James and Ellen White, that founded the Seventh-day Adventist Church—was extensive and varied. He won many to the Lord by his personal efforts and contributed significantly to the shaping of the body of Adventist beliefs and teachings.

Bates Memorial High School

BATES MEMORIAL HIGH SCHOOL. A coeducational day school on the senior high school level, operated at Sangre Grande, Trinidad, West Indies. It is under the direction of a board of management that meets annually and an executive board that meets monthly. During the 1992—1993 academic year the school had a staff of 13 and an enrollment of 268. Instruction is offered in five-year secondary courses in preparation for the Caribbean Examination Council and is approved by the Trinidad and Tobago government.

The forerunner of the school was the Sangre Grande Intermediate School, established in January 1948 with an enrollment of 14, and taught by J. R. Hill and M. McKenzie. Because its growth was slow, it was not until October 1952 that the secondary section was separated from the elementary grades and named Bates Memorial High School. At first the school operated under the control of the local church, with the assistance of the conference. However, in March 1962, when its enrollment had reached 100, it came under direct conference control.

The school was moved to a new location on Adventist Street, Sangre Grande, Trinidad, in April 1974. In 1992 it was accredited for three years by the Inter-American Division Commission on Accreditation and the General Conference Board of Regents.

Batouri Adventist Hospital

BATOURI ADVENTIST HOSPITAL. An institution owned and operated by the East Cameroon Mission. It was established as a dispensary Mar. 10, 1962, under the direction of Akamba Roger, a male nurse.

In 1966 it was operated under the supervision of Mrs. Maurice Zehnacker, and from 1970 to 1974, by Mrs. Adolphe Kinder, who was helped by nurse aides Bekolo David and Samba Gaston. Unfortunately, it was closed in 1987.

The dispensary was reopened by Paul Gheorghe in 1990, and by January 1991 it was converted into a hospital. The stone-laying ceremony for the construction of the surgery block was held May 15, 1991. On June 28, 1992, the teachers' houses were converted into temporary medical quarters. The hospital has two modern units with a capacity of 70 beds.

The administrator, Paul Gheorghe, is assisted by his wife, Renée Sansfamille, a qualified nurse, as well as two local helpers.

There have been approximately 1,500 patients registered at the hospital. Among them are Muslims (Bororo, Kakou), Catholics, and Presbyterians. Funds that have helped develop construction came from private donations contributed by non-Adventist medical institutions in the United States, and the CIBA-Geigy Association of Switzerland.

Plans include adding a maternity unit. This is the only hospital unit in the region where cataract surgery is performed.

Battle Creek Academy

BATTLE CREEK ACADEMY. A coeducational day school on the senior high school level, with associated grade school, operated at Battle Creek, Michigan, by a board consisting of the Lake Union educational secretary, the Michigan Conference president, secretary, treasurer, and educational superintendent, together with the school principal, the pastors and other representatives from each of the five area churches (Battle Creek [Berean, Tabernacle, Urbandale], Delton, and Marshall), with a total constituency (1992) of 1,404. Students also are enrolled from other Seventh-day Adventist churches. The school is accredited with the University of Michigan and with the SDA Board of Regents.

The enrollment of the high school for 1992—1993 was 64, with another 147 enrolled in the kindergarten and grades 1 through 8. The school employed eight academy teachers, seven elementary teachers, and five nonteaching staff members.

Battle Creek Academy offers strong college preparatory courses. Instruction is given in English, mathematics, physics, science, history, business education, Spanish, technology education, physical education, music, and other fields.

SDA schools began to operate in Battle Creek as early as 1856, a year after the Review and Herald was moved to Battle Creek. In that year a church school was opened in a private home, the teacher receiving 25 cents a week for each pupil. This school ran for several years, with a succession of teachers. Then after an interval of several years without a school, another was opened by G. H. Bell, first in a little cottage, then in a room in the Review and Herald building. Later the school came under General Conference auspices.

When Battle Creek College was founded in 1872, a day school was operated that became a church school when the college moved to Berrien Springs, Michigan, in 1902. In 1904 the Battle Creek Industrial Academy, as the school was then named, opened in a new building on Sept. 6. This was a school supported by the church, and operated by the church board, M. B. Miller being the pastor. B. E. Nicola was the principal and in charge of secondary grades; elementary teachers were Pearl Hallock, seventh and eighth grades; Frances L. Case, fifth and sixth; Mrs. Ella King Sanders, third and fourth; Mrs. L. Flora Williams, first and second. Part of the time the school had 10 grades. Before many years had passed, the word “industrial” was dropped, and it took its present name of Battle Creek Academy.

When the academy building on North Kendall Street, endeared to many students during 40 years, was damaged by fire in 1945, classes met at the municipal airport for a time. Then a new, modern school building was erected on a 44-acre (18-hectare) plot at 180 Welch Avenue (now renamed 480 Parkway Drive), and dedicated on Sept. 6, 1948, by E. L. Pingenot, former pastor of the Battle Creek Tabernacle, who, with V. E. Garber, a former principal, had begun the planning for the new school building. Several local business and professional men led in the promotion and financing of the project, including H. M. Babcock, William Heffley, D. B. Wildman, Sr., and Dr. William Kenzie, the latter leaving a sizable sum of money that was given to the school. M. D. Hannah was the first principal of the new Battle Creek Academy.

In 1953 an auditorium-gymnasium was completed; by 1959 three new classrooms were added for the sixth, seventh, and eighth grades; and in the fall of 1961 a new chapel. During 1968 two additional rooms were constructed, and in 1970 two more, which serve as a kindergarten room and an elementary media center. A year later a three-bay garage with an automatic hoist was added to the shop area, and in 1974 a three-room primary unit complex was completed, making two additional classrooms available for secondary use. In 1985 a new addition was completed to serve as the band room.

Battle Creek Sanitarium

BATTLE CREEK SANITARIUM. A pioneer Seventh-day Adventist medical institution at Battle Creek, Michigan, in which SDA concepts of health and healing were given their first public demonstration. It was owned, controlled, and operated by the Seventh-day Adventist Church from 1866 to 1908 (when control of the institution was taken over by its medical director, J. H. Kellogg); from 1957 to 1974 it was operated as an SDA self-supporting institution; and from 1974 to 1993 it was fully owned and operated by the church. In 1959 its name was changed to Battle Creek Health Center, and in 1966 its name was again changed to the Battle Creek Sanitarium Hospital. The name was changed once again on Dec. 10, 1981, to Battle Creek Adventist Hospital.

History of the Sanitarium

History of the Sanitarium. The Sanitarium Founded in 1866. The need for a health institution based on health principles newly advocated by the developing SDA Church was presented by Ellen White at the fourth session of the General Conference, which convened in Battle Creek, Michigan, in May 1866. It was decided to establish such an institution at Battle Creek, where the headquarters of the church were situated at that time. The site was considered to be midway between the East and the West, and easily accessible by means of the Michigan Central Railroad, which operated between Detroit and Chicago and ran through Battle Creek. The leaders of the church, among them James White and J. N. Loughborough, decided that the proposed institution should be organized as a stock company. In mid-June an appeal to the people to subscribe to the stock was made in the Review and Herald. By that time the members of the church at Battle Creek and at Olcott, New York, had already subscribed more than $2,500, with J. P. Kellogg and James White heading the list with a subscription of $500 each. With these and other funds that came in, a residence with seven or eight acres (about three hectares) of land, situated in Battle Creek, was purchased from Benjamin Graves, a judge of the Michigan Superior Court. During that same summer a two-story addition was built and treatment rooms were equipped, allowing the institution to open for patients on Sept. 5, 1866, under the supervision of Dr. Horatio S. Lay. In less than two years, the stockholders voted to forgo any future profits in their investment and to turn any realized proceeds back to the hospital's directors to use for charity.

A note in the Review and Herald of Sept. 11 called attention to the rapidity with which the enterprise was conceived and carried out: "We have only to look back to our conference in May last, less than four short months ago, for the time when this matter first began to take practical shape among our people. Now we behold an elegant site secured, buildings ready for operation, a competent corps of assistants on the ground, . . . a sum bordering on $11,000 already subscribed for stock in the enterprise, and the institute opened and operations actually commenced. In no enterprise ever undertaken by this people has the hand of the Lord been more evidently manifested than in this thing” (Review and Herald 18:116, Sept. 11, 1866).

The opening of the institution, named the Western Health Reform Institute, marked a new era in SDA history. The building was situated on high ground in Battle Creek, a flourishing manufacturing town of about 5,000 people. Screened from the street in front by a grove of trees, the Institute looked out in the rear on a landscape of hill, valley, and stream. It was in a location suitable for inculcating the principle of right living as a means of recovering and preserving the health through the “correct application of water, the right use of air, and a proper diet.” The equipment was meager but adequate for the immediate needs.

Said M. E. Olsen, a later church historian: “It not only gave tangible outward expression to the health principles as a definite phase of denominational belief but it supplied an effective instrumentality for the propagation of those principles. It represented, on the side of the Adventists, a new and enlarged vision of the world’s need, and of the duty resting upon the Christian church to supply that need. The healing ministry of Christ was seen to be a manifestation of divine love which should be continued in the world through the instrumentality of the church. The practice of health principles and the use of simple hydropathic means of treating disease were regarded as a means of cooperating with the divine power, which alone can truly heal. Disease was seen to be the result of transgression of natural law; and the duty and privilege of Christians to obey all these laws, and teach others to obey them, appeared to be a part of the everlasting gospel” (Origin and Progress of Seventh-day Adventists, pp. 269, 270).

When the pioneers of the SDA medical work decided to establish a corporation, they discovered that Michigan law had no provision for benevolent institutions of their kind. Consequently, the institute property was held in trust until the legislature could authorize the corporation (in an amendment to an act authorizing mining and manufacturing enterprises). The Western Health Reform Institute was legally incorporated on Apr. 9, 1867. The unfortunate result of its incorporation under a law for business companies was the limiting of its charter to 30 years, a provision that later caused many difficulties over the administration and control of the institution and that eventually led to the separation of the sanitarium from the church.

During the first 10 years, the institution had a struggle financially. James White, the leader in the enterprise, was away from his office much of the time, and also suffered from overwork. Without his business counsel, the institute came close to financial ruin. Furthermore, its medical staff, which at first did not represent the best medical schools, failed to inspire the public with confidence. Despite noble attempts on the part of the entire staff to carry on as best they could, attempts that on the whole were reasonably successful, the patronage wavered. However, fortunes changed after John Harvey Kellogg, M.D., a graduate of Bellevue Hospital Medical College, New York City, joined the staff in 1875, and the next year was appointed medical superintendent of the institute. About the same time, James White returned to leadership of the enterprise. By 1877 increased patronage made the erection of another building necessary. In the same year, the institution was renamed the Medical and Surgical Sanitarium; however, it later was commonly called the Battle Creek Sanitarium. When someone remarked that the word “sanitarium” was not in the dictionary, Dr. Kellogg replied that it soon would be. Although the Battle Creek institution was not the first one in the world to use the word “sanitarium,” it made the term well known, and for many years afterward SDA medical establishments were distinguished by this name. The Battle Creek institution soon became known affectionately as the “San” and gradually achieved an international reputation growing from its one-patient status at its opening to 1,200 patients and guests at the height of its fame in 1929. It has played an integral and lively part in two great histories—the beginning of both a worldwide medical ministry of the Seventh-day Adventist Church and of the cereal industry, which still is an important part of Battle Creek’s economy.

Expansion of Buildings and Facilities. Late in the spring of 1877 construction began on a four-story brick veneer building 136 feet (41 meters) in length. It was dedicated in April 1878 and constituted the central portion of what later became known as the main building. Its cost was $115,000.

The equipment of the new building included new apparatus, the policy of management being to keep up with the scientific and sanitary developments in America and abroad. The improvements increased the efficiency of the institution. With a continued growth in patronage, new additions were made: In 1884 a five-story addition containing a gymnasium, dining facilities for 400, serving room and kitchen, and a storeroom was built to the south at a cost of $50,000. In 1887 a separate five-story hospital structure, 60’ x 100’ (18 m. x 30 m.) was built for surgical and charitable work. This was dedicated in 1888. Two years later another five-story extension on the north was added to the main building at a cost of $50,000, and the original section was raised one story. In 1894 a five-story brick dormitory, 90’ x 120’ (27 m. x 37 m.) was erected to accommodate 150 or more women nurses. In 1895 further additions were made, the hydrotherapy space was enlarged, and a chapel seating about 400 was built.

In 1895, in line with the program of health education that the sanitarium had sponsored since its inception, the American Medical Missionary College was established. While not formally a part of the sanitarium itself, this school used the sanitarium facilities for clinical instruction, and had Dr. Kellogg as its president and moving spirit.

By the end of the century the sanitarium employed more than 900 workers, not only to provide health care, but also to operate the farms that supplied produce, milk, and eggs for the patients. The acreage was about 1,000 acres (405 hectares), including several farms—one of 150 acres (60 hectares), northwest of the sanitarium; one of 125 acres (50 hectares), northeast, devoted entirely to vegetables and fruits; and another of 120 acres (49 hectares) on the south side of Lake Goguac, where a large amount of produce was raised.

In 1893 the Seventh-day Adventist Medical Missionary and Benevolent Association was brought into being as the legal embodiment of the medical arm of the denomination, and Dr. Kellogg placed at its head. As the number of institutions under its control grew, and spread outside the United States (by the turn of the century there were institutions in such countries as Switzerland, Germany, Mexico, South Africa, Palestine, and Egypt), the name of the association was changed (1896) to the International Medical Missionary and Benevolent Association. The absence of “Seventh-day Adventist” in the name made it easier for Dr. Kellogg later to divorce the medical and humanitarian work of the association from the church that gave it birth.

Reorganization of the Corporation. When the charter of the Western Health Reform Institute expired in 1897, the assets of the corporation were sold for an amount equal to the corporation’s indebtedness at a public auction to a new body, the Michigan Sanitarium and Benevolent Association, organized by the International Medical Missionary and Benevolent Association to hold the property of the sanitarium and its associated enterprises.

The constituency of the new association was considerably larger than the number of stockholders of the old corporation. The number of members was made equivalent to the number of shares in the old corporation-650 instead of about 150. The new members were nominated by the former stockholders and the board of directors, although still from among members of the SDA Church, and mostly from its ministry.

Several changes were also made in the articles of the association. Whereas in the past only members of the church could be stockholders, the membership of the new association was not expressly so limited; the control over the activities of the association was given to the members meeting annually, each of whom now had only one vote and could exercise it only in person; and the statement of objectives contained the provision that the institution was to perform acts “of an undenominational, unsectarian, humanitarian, and philanthropic nature.” There were some questions raised over the insertion of these words, which might be interpreted as divorcing the institution from denominational control, but Dr. Kellogg explained that they were meant to refer only to the application of the benevolence of the institution without regard to creed. This explanation was accepted in good faith. Later this provision was to play the key role in Kellogg’s claim that the Battle Creek Sanitarium was not under denominational control.

Repeated Warnings From Ellen G. White. As the work at the sanitarium developed, numerous and repeated warnings came from Ellen G. White that this institution, created and nurtured under the guidance of God, should ever be managed in the spirit of service and in humility, and should always be kept distinguishable from secular institutions. This instruction, however, was not always welcomed by the management. At the same time, the church at Battle Creek also was being warned of its indifferent spiritual condition and of the danger that the initial success of the Battle Creek enterprises would lead to courting the favor of the public through compromises in the standards and principles on which the institutions were originally founded. At times the warnings were heeded, and at other times, they were disregarded. Mrs. White especially counseled against concentrating much investment in one place and drawing the best workers there, as well as concentrating in a few hands the power and control over the various medical institutions serving the church. This latter instruction ran directly counter to the plans of Dr. Kellogg, whose dream it was to create a network of SDA health and welfare institutions under his leadership.

By this time it was evident that in his speeches and articles Dr. Kellogg was setting himself and the medical work in opposition to the General Conference and was seeking independence in matters of administration and policy. At the time of the reorganization of the Seventh-day Adventist work effected in the 1901 General Conference session (see Organization, IV, 2, 3), the conflict came into the open, but it was temporarily assuaged. Then in the early morning of Feb. 18, 1902, the main sanitarium building and the hospital burned down. The question immediately arose as to whether to rebuild them, at what cost, and in what size. In a meeting held in March, which was attended by the president of the General Conference, union conference presidents, and other leaders of the denomination then in Battle Creek, the sanitarium board recommended the erection of only one building, which was not to exceed five stories in height and 450 feet (137 meters) in length.

But when the building was actually put under construction, it became apparent that Dr. Kellogg had proceeded independently and had ordered an elaborately equipped building five stories in height and 550 feet (168 meters) in length, with extensions aggregating another 500 feet (152 meters) on the sides, ornamented with marble and mosaic work supervised by the master craftsman who had supervised the mosaic work in the Library of Congress in Washington, D.C. Although the break between the denomination and the sanitarium was not yet openly declared, the action of the medical director made it impossible for the church to support the project, since it was being carried out in disregard of denominational counsel.

Final Break With the Denomination. The final break with the denomination came several years later through legal technicalities in the organization of the Michigan Sanitarium and Benevolent Association. The charter taken out in 1897, at the expiration of the original charter of the Western Health Reform Institute, contained a provision (thought useful at the time to safeguard denominational control over the property in case some members of the association should leave the church) that any member who was out of harmony with the principles of the association could be dropped at an annual meeting by a two-thirds vote of the members present. Now this provision was used to drop from membership those loyal SDA members and leaders who opposed the plans and projects of Dr. Kellogg. This maneuver became possible because, after the denominational headquarters were removed from Battle Creek to Washington, D.C., many members of the association, the majority of whom were faithful working ministers of the church, found it inconvenient to attend the meetings of the association that earlier had usually been held in conjunction with the General Conference sessions. Since no quorum was provided for in the charter or the bylaws, in 1908 most of the active SDA leaders were dropped from the sanitarium association by a small group of members, most of whom were connected with the management of the sanitarium, and the institution was effectively taken away from denominational ownership and control.

Later History. After the alienation of the sanitarium from the denomination, the sanitarium board became its practical owner. Elected by the small minority of the remaining association members who attended the annual meeting, it represented a limited base of support. The medical school faltered and was closed in 1910. The welfare institutions under the control of the sanitarium in Chicago and elsewhere closed one after another. A grandiose building program in 1927, which included a 15-story tower with an elaborately decorated lobby and dining room added to the main part of the sanitarium at a cost of $4 million, put the institution into debt that the prolonged depression of the 1930s made impossible to repay. For a number of years the institution operated with heavy annual deficits. Finally, in 1933, after it defaulted on the payment of interest and principal on its outstanding obligations, it went into receivership.

Following this, representatives of the sanitarium (which still had many members of the SDA Church holding responsible positions on its administrative and operating staff) approached the General Conference Committee and invited the denomination to collaborate in planning for future operation of the sanitarium. After due consideration, the officers of the General Conference declined to assume the heavy financial burden that the mammoth institution would have required.

In 1938 the sanitarium association was reorganized under Section 77B of the National Bankruptcy Act, and with the approval of the court the Battle Creek Sanitarium and Benevolent Association was formed to take over the assets and obligations of the enterprise. In 1942 the main building of the sanitarium was sold to the United States government, and the indebtedness of the association was paid in full. There remained in the hands of the association the annex building across the street, about $1 million in cash and other assets, and certain real estate in the vicinity of Battle Creek.

The disbursement of these assets sparked a controversy that ended in court action. Dr. Kellogg, then more than 90 years old, proposed that the assets be turned over to a new organization to be created from a merger of the Battle Creek Sanitarium and Benevolent Association with the Race Betterment Foundation (of which Dr. Kellogg was the head), and be left in the hands of a named and self-perpetuating board of trustees for the purpose of conducting “a charitable hospital or other charitable asylum within the state of Michigan or elsewhere.” Certain other members of the association, desiring to perpetuate the then-existing Battle Creek Sanitarium, appealed to the General Conference Committee to rally the surviving members of the association, the great majority of whom were SDAs, to an annual meeting. This was arranged, and a large representation of members gathered at a meeting presided over by Dr. Kellogg. He strenuously objected to the proceedings, and when the members decided to perpetuate the association and duly elected a new board of trustees, including Dr. Kellogg and several of his associates, he refused to recognize the action of the constituency and obtained an injunction from the court against the General Conference Corporation, against W. H. Branson, who acted as the representative of the General Conference and as coordinator of the meeting, and against the newly elected members of the board. The dispute was settled by a division of assets, of which about $650,000 reverted to the denomination. The sanitarium association remained in existence, and it carried on its medical activities independently of the SDA organization, in the building called the Annex, across the street from the original sanitarium building.

Return to Seventh-day Adventists—The Battle Creek Health Center. In May of 1957 the sanitarium went into receivership that terminated when its board resigned and was superseded by a board of SDA physicians representing the Hospital Service Foundation, of Glendale, California. At the time the receivership was established, the civic leaders of Battle Creek began a campaign to return the institution to the control of the SDAs.

At that time the property of the sanitarium was valued at about $1 million and consisted of a 236-bed sanitarium, a 59-bed hospital located a short block away on Emmett Street, doctors’ offices, and an auditorium. Considerable renovation and reequipping was done, and in 1959 the institution was renamed the Battle Creek Health Center, operating as an acute-care hospital and sanitarium. It operated under its 1938 charter as a nonprofit institution and as a member of the Association of SDA Self-supporting Institutions (now Adventist-Laymen’s Services and Industries). Organizationally, it had an SDA constituency and was operated by an independent board, of which the chair was the president of the Michigan Conference. Of its 13 members, 12 were SDAs.

Although a “sanitarium” type practice was continued, it soon became evident that the days of this type of treatment were passing, and the hospital board focused its attention on other areas. In 1958 a 28-bed mental health unit had been established, and in 1965 an inpatient and outpatient alcoholism rehabilitation program. Services were expanded in 1972 to include a similar program in drug rehabilitation. Sanitarium functions were closed on Mar. 1, 1972, as was the health center. The sanitarium thus became solely an acute-care hospital with medical, surgical, and mental facilities.

In January 1971 patients were moved into the first and second floors of a modern $2 million four-story brick Jeffrey Building, named after a former sanitarium janitor, James R. Jeffrey, who went on to get his medical degree and who, upon Dr. Kellogg's death in 1943, became the sanitarium's medical director. The new building featured a 39-bed mental health unit on the first floor and a 37-bed medical-surgical unit with a four-bed intensive coronary care unit on the second. Another patient unit on the second floor of the old building was continued until August 1973, when the third floor of the Jeffrey Building was finished and patients moved into its 34-bed unit.

On Oct. 1, 1974—for the first time in its 108 years of service—the Battle Creek Sanitarium Hospital's constituency voted to come under the ownership of the SDA Church. Thus, this institution, which was the forerunner of the medical work of Seventh-day Adventists, became the church's 394th medical facility.

The study to change the status of the hospital from a member of the ASI to a denominationally owned facility was begun in 1973 by a special commission under the direction of Francis W. Wernick, president of the Lake Union Conference. At the constituency meeting he was named chair of the board, and Robert D. Moon, president of the Michigan Conference, the vice chair.

In January of 1975 the hospital began a $3.5 million expansion program incorporating a new administrative and reception center, a new area for the Pharmacy, Physical Therapy and Laboratory departments, and the completion of the fourth floor of the Jeffrey Building to increase the hospital's bed capacity to 155.

A highlight in the history of the hospital came during the celebration of its 100 years of service. When Battle Creek Sanitarium was founded Sept. 5, 1866, President Johnson was in the White House—Andrew Johnson. One hundred years later to the day, another President Johnson signed the guest registry—this time Lyndon B. Johnson. He was accompanied by his wife, Lady Bird, who, in her remarks to a crowd estimated at 15,000, indicated that at the age of 11 she had visited the sanitarium with an aunt, Mrs. Effie Patillo. She added that she remembered Dr. Kellogg practicing what he preached as he rode his bicycle to and from the san. "It was here that I first heard about the importance of vitamins, sunshine, and exercise," she recalled. Louis Gordon, administrator, presented Mrs. Johnson with her original sanitarium admission card as a memento of her visit on its centennial day.

In 1979, when the Michigan Bed Reduction Plan mandated more efficient use of existing health-care facilities, the Battle Creek Sanitarium Hospital, supported by more than 25 years of mental health treatment, began phasing down medical/surgical intensive care programs, emphasizing, in its place, chemical dependency and psychiatric care. In 1983 surgery was closed. When the last medical unit was closed in December 1987, the change from a general hospital to a specialty mental hospital was complete. With inpatient and outpatient psychiatric services and substance abuse programs, Battle Creek Adventist Hospital continued to deliver one of the most comprehensive ranges of psychiatric services available in southwest Michigan. The hospital was sold in September 1993.

Administrators of Battle Creek Sanitarium since it was taken over by Adventist laity include: Dunbar Smith, 1957—1958; William G. Simmons, 1958—1961; S. J. Ruskjer (consultant administrator), 1961—1962; Clifford Eckman, 1961; Louis E. Gordon, 1961—1967; Clarence Simmons (acting administrator), 1967; Richard E. Lane, 1967—1972; H.

Battleford Academy

BATTLEFORD ACADEMY. A coeducational secondary boarding school formerly operated at Battleford, Saskatchewan, from 1916 to 1931 by the Saskatchewan Conference. The school was housed in one of the most historic buildings in the province—a building that had housed the government of the Northwest Territories from 1876 to 1883. Originally leased from the government at one cent an acre (.405 hectare), the property, containing about 600 acres (243 hectares), was finally purchased by the conference. The enrollment, beginning with 114 in 10 grades, in 1918 reached a peak of 166 in 12 grades. Then, after a decade of fluctuation between 121 and 150, it dropped to 90, and in 1930—1931, as the economy became more severely depressed, to 65. With such a small enrollment it seemed inadvisable to continue operating the school, especially since Canadian Junior College in neighboring Alberta, which also was suffering a decline in enrollment, could absorb the Saskatchewan students. In 1931 the school was closed. Its demise was considered a severe blow to the work in the Saskatchewan Conference. The property was sold to the Oblate Fathers.

Born in St. John, North Dakota, he was educated at Gem State Academy and Walla Walla College, where he received a bachelor's degree in 1923. He married Gladys I. Corley, an elementary school teacher, to whom he was married for 70 years.

He began his denominational employment as Bible teacher and dean of boys at Auburn Academy. He was ordained in New York City in 1926 on his way to Europe. He and his wife spent 28 years in service on that continent. After French culture and language study at the Sorbonne, he served as a departmental director in the old Latin Union from 1927—1928, president of both the Belgian Conference (1929—1932) and the Franco-Belgian Union (1932—1936). During this time Beach served also as editor of the French Life and Health, and together with his wife broadcast in the English overseas radio programs of the Swiss Broadcasting Corporation.

His period as division president marked a remarkable postwar rebuilding and expansion of the worship and educational facilities of the church in Europe. Beach concluded his overseas service in 1954 when he was elected secretary of the General Conference, in which position he served until 1970. During this period he was instrumental in launching the first Global Mission program, entitled "From Everywhere to Everywhere."

He retired in 1975 as a general vice president, after 52 years of active service. He was a member of the General Conference Executive Committee for 44 years.

Beach was known as an inspiring preacher, an administrator with a cosmopolitan bent of mind, and a prolific writer. His best-seller, Nous et Nos Enfants, originally written in French, was translated into a dozen languages. His best-known books in English are Dimensions in Salvation and Light From God's Lamp. Together with his son Bert he authored his last book, Pattern for Progress (1985), dealing with church organization. He died in Loma Linda, California.

Bekwai Seventh-day Adventist Secondary School

BEKWAI SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST SECONDARY SCHOOL. A coeducational boarding school with a curriculum leading to the advanced level general certificate in education. The school is situated on a tract of land near the town of Bekwai, in the Ashanti region of Ghana, about 25 miles (40 kilometers) south of Kumasi.

History. The school began as a six to nine months' basic evangelistic training course for capable national workers, offered at the mission established in 1931, a half mile (.8 kilometer) north of the town of Bekwai, by Jesse Clifford, from England. In 1939 Charles A. Bartlett arrived from the United Kingdom to become the first principal of a new teacher-evangelist one-year training program, which continued through 1944.

Bekwai Training School appears for the first time in the Statistical Report in 1940, which reports three finishing the course and three entering the work. The 1940 Yearbook lists the school as established in 1939, "formerly the Agona Training School." However, the latter, situated at the Agona Mission Station, about 22 miles (35 kilometers) northeast of Kumasi, continued as an elementary school, as it had operated since about 1915. It appeared in these annual records from 1930 (with H. K. Munson as the first principal) through 1939. In one year (1934) the Statistical Report listed 28 pupils in grades 9—11; then the school disappeared from the record in 1940 and Bekwai Training School came into the list.

In 1944 Bekwai Training School received official permission from the Ministry of Education to offer the two-year Certificate B teacher's course. Fifteen students enrolled in the first class on Jan. 26, 1945. With the enrollment in 1947 of three girls as teacher trainees, the school became coeducational.

A further two-year training course leading to Certificate A was authorized in 1948. In that year James C. Vetter arrived from the United States to assist in this higher training program, which began with four students. Demonstration primary and middle schools, where trainees could observe and practice, were operated on the compound. An advanced evangelistic training course was also offered for promising workers. The four-year training college was completely phased out in August 1974 to make room for the expansion of the secondary school.

Under the direction of H. J. Welch, who had arrived from the United States in 1949 to become the principal, the first class enrolled for a new five-year secondary school program. In 1953 a concrete secondary school building housing five classrooms, an assembly hall, and administrative offices was built. N. C. Maberly became the first headmaster of the newly opened secondary school. Other headmasters were H. I. Dunton, W. L. Parker, and E. B. Christie. With an increase in the enrollment, more buildings were erected, such as a science laboratory in 1956. A third stream was added to the school in September 1973.

The school offers arts, science, and business for the Ordinary Level GCE/School Certificate Examination. In 1974 the teacher training program was phased out and the sixth form course was added, which offers arts and sciences at the advanced level, making the school the largest SDA school in the country. Agricultural and vocational courses are also offered.

The enrollment in 1993 was 1,212. The school celebrated its fortieth anniversary in October 1993.

Headmasters: N. C. Maberly, 1955—1956; H. I. Dunton, 1957—1961; W. L. Parker, 1961—1962; E. B. Christie, 1963—1964; J. D. Dorland, 1965—1967; C. Y. Kyereme, 1967—1976; I. T. Agboka, 1976—1981; I. K. Belchambers, Marion Hulda

BELCHAMBERS, MARION HULDA (c. 1886—1949). Conference office worker and teacher in India, one of the early Seventh-day Adventists in India. As a child she attended the first Sabbath school in Calcutta, which had been opened by the pioneer group of SDA missionaries to India. She attended the first SDA school in India, which opened in 1899. In 1903 she was baptized and began her work with the mission, first as a church school teacher at Karmatar and Calcutta, and then as assistant to Mrs. M. M. Quantock, who was then treasurer of the India Mission. Later she served as secretary-treasurer successively of the Northwest India Union, Northeast India Union, and Western India Union. Her last years of service were spent in the office of the publishing house at Poona and in the division office.

Belden, Franklin E.

BELDEN, FRANKLIN E. (1858—1945). Publishing house worker and songwriter, nephew of Ellen G. White. With Edwin Barnes he was musical editor of Hymns and Tunes (1886); later he was a superintendent at the Review and Herald Publishing House. He wrote hundreds of Sabbath school songs and hymns, in most cases both words and music. Although it has been remarked that the volume of his output exceeded its quality, the present Seventh-day Adventist Hymnal retains 16 of his tunes and a dozen of his lyrics. At the turn of the century he entered into certain business transactions relating to songbook publishing, which, although faithfully carried out by the publishers, led him to feel that he had been unfairly treated. This supposed grievance laid the foundation for a course of action that led to his separation from the church about 1907.

Belém Adventist Hospital

BELÉM ADVENTIST HOSPITAL. (Hospital Adventista de Belém). A 100-bed general hospital owned by the North Brazil Union Mission and operated by an administrator and a medical director appointed by an administrative committee formed by members of the union and three missions. It is housed in a two-story brick and concrete structure situated in Belém, capital of Pará, Brazil, on the Belém-Brasília Highway. Built with funds from the Thirteenth Sabbath Offering overflow for the fourth quarter of 1949, it was opened on Apr. 10, 1953. With a capacity of 27 beds, it offered a laboratory, pharmacy, and X-ray facilities.

In 1962 the number of beds was increased to 40, even though the building was not enlarged, and the same year a first-aid service and a blood bank were added. In 1964 there were four doctors, eight graduate nurses, and 16 nurse's aides employed at the hospital. The Belém Hospital enjoys a good reputation among local doctors and the public.

In 1970 a new wing was inaugurated, increasing the hospital's capacity to 120 beds. New equipment was acquired, and the institution became one of the best equipped hospitals in north and northeast Brazil.

In 1993 the hospital medical staff included 22 missionary physicians and 23 missionary nurses. It has an ICU, children's ICU, and five modern surgery rooms.

Medical Directors: Elmer Bottsford, 1953—1955; Gunther Ehlers, 1955—1956; Oséas Florencio, 1956; Russell T. Smith, 1956—1957; Jetro Carvalho, 1958—1961; Zildomar Deucher, 1962—1972; Daniel J. dos Reis, 1972—1973; Rene Gross, 1974—1976; Alaor Jose Toledo, 1977—1984; Merari Reinert, 1985— .

Belgian Flemish Publishing House

BELGIAN FLEMISH PUBLISHING HOUSE. A publishing house (without a printing plant) formerly operated in Brussels by the Belgian-Luxembourg Conference.

At the turn of the century, pioneers published and used the evangelistic journal Tekenen des Tijds and the health magazine Leven en Gezondheid to arouse interest in the third angel's message. Publications were later supplied by the Netherlands Publishing House, but because of Belgium's predominantly Catholic population, with its different needs, an independent Belgian-Flemish Publishing House was established in 1966.

Educational books—Praktische Gids voor de Vorming van de Persoonlijkheid—were published, in addition to the monthly health journal, Leven en Gezondheid. Dutch translations of various Ellen White books, including The Great Controversy, were published in close collaboration with the Netherlands Publishing House.

The publishing house closed in 1989.

Managers: Roger Merckx, 1969—1974; Jean Geeroms, 1974—1986; Henri Van Der Veken, 1986—1989.

Belgium

BELGIUM. A constitutional monarchy in Western Europe with an area of 11,779 square miles (30,500 square kilometers) and an estimated population (1994) of 10 million, divided between the Germanic Flemings and the French-speaking Walloons. Both French and Flemish are used as official languages. The religion of the people is mainly Roman Catholic, but there are a few Protestants and Jews. The constitution guarantees civil and religious liberty.

At the time of the Reformation the territory that is now Belgium and the Netherlands (the Low Countries) was controlled by Spain. Spain's attempts to eradicate Protestantism among the Dutch of the northern part of this territory led to their revolt and the establishment of the Netherlands. The southern part of this area remained Catholic and was later controlled by Austria. In 1815 the Low Countries were again united under the Dutch sovereignty, but in 1830 Belgium declared its independence from the Netherlands.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. In 1897 the first French-speaking SDA missionary, C. Augsburg, entered Belgium from Switzerland and established himself in Angleur, near Liège. C. Grin joined him in 1898. As a result of their work, several families accepted the SDA message, and in July 1899 J. Erzberger organized a church of 10 members in Jemeppe, a suburb of Liège. In 1901 Augsburg returned to Switzerland, and in 1902 Grin died. In 1903 J. Curdy took charge of the work in Belgium, and in 1907 Gustave Roth replaced him. During this time Brussels, Charleroi, and Namur were entered. Until 1904, when R. G. Klingbeil began to work with success in the Flemish language in Antwerp, all work had been done in the French-speaking part of the country.

At first the work in the French section of Belgium was under the direction of the Central European Conference; later it was under the Latin Union. The work in Flemish was under the West German Union Conference. In 1910 the two sections were united as a part of the West German Union. As the work progressed, the colporteur work was organized, evangelistic meetings were held, baptisms took place, and churches were organized. The Sabbath School, Home Missionary, and Young People's departments were so well organized that despite many privations brought on by the German occupation of 1914—1918 the activities of these various departments continued.

In 1919 the territory of Belgium was organized as the Belgian Conference under the Latin Union, with Jacob Wibbens as president, and with a membership of 257. The work prospered in the years between the two world wars. The Antwerp church built the first Seventh-day Adventist chapel in Belgium. In 1926 the conference purchased a large building in Brussels with halls for two churches (French and Flemish), and with offices for the conference and for the Book and Bible House. Ingathering was introduced with excellent results. Missionaries were sent to different countries. By Dec. 30, 1940, there were 15 churches, with 624 members, in the conference.

World War II was a period of great trial because of the bombings. At Liège the church and the pastor's home were completely destroyed. The work was hindered, and the departments had to be reorganized.

Since the war, the SDA message has been preached in unentered cities, and a number of new churches have been added to the conference. Work is carried on through Flemish and French Bible correspondence courses, with encouraging results. Since the 1960s, stop-smoking programs have been held in most of the large cities. Most evangelistic campaigns begin with Bible and archaeology multivision slide shows. By this means much prejudice is broken down. The territory of Luxembourg was attached to Belgium in 1968, thus forming the Belgian-Luxembourg Conference (see Luxembourg.)

Belgrano Adventist Medical Clinic

BELGRANO ADVENTIST MEDICAL CLINIC (Clínica Médica Adventista Belgrano). A 14-bed general acute hospital owned by the Austral Union Conference, situated in the residential district of Belgrano, in Buenos Aires, Argentina. It began operation in 1959, and represents Seventh-day Adventist medical work in an area of approximately 10 million people. It is administered by a medical director and a business manager responsible to an administrative board that includes representatives of the union conference, the Belgrano Clinic, and the local conference.

The hospital has specialists in ophthalmology, orthopedics, otorhinolaryngology, and dentistry, a room for major surgery, and offices for general practitioners. It also offers services in obstetrics, urology, pediatrics, gynecology, cardiology, and hematology.

When the clinic was opened in 1959, services were limited to outpatients (doctors' consulting offices, laboratory, X-ray, and hydrotherapy), but soon it was expanded to accommodate surgery and some beds for inpatients. In 1979 a total of 28,525 square feet (2,650 square meters) were added. In 1980 and 1981 a tower of 11,840 square feet (1,100 square meters) was added that requires the services of several more physicians and nurses.

The first medical director was C. E. Drachenberg, who worked alone for a while accompanied solely by two nurses, until Dr. Klinton Weiss and more nurses joined the clinic. The first head nurse was Mercedes Peverini.

Medical Directors: C. E. Drachenberg, 1959—1963; Oldemar Beskow, 1963—1978; Pedro Tabuenca, 1978—1983; Oldemar Beskow, 1983—1993; René A. Leichner, 1993— .

Belize

BELIZE (formerly known as British Honduras). A parliamentary democracy situated on the east coast of Central America, bordered by Mexico on the north and Guatemala on the west and south. Its area is 8,867 square miles (22,965 square kilometers). The population (1994) is 209,000. There is a complex racial mixture of European, Maya, Creole, Carib, Syrian, and Chinese elements. English is the official language. However, Spanish is widely used, and Carib and Maya are used on a lesser scale. On Aug. 3, 1970, Belmopan became the new capital of the country. It is situated in the very center of the nation. The site is about 50 miles (80 kilometers) from Belize City, 55 miles (88 kilometers) from Stann Creek, and 30 miles (50 kilometers) from Benque Viejo del Carmen, in the Cayo district, which borders on Guatemala. One major contrast to the former capital is that it nestles 200 feet (61 meters) above sea level.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. SDA teachings were introduced into British Honduras by means of SDA publications. About 1885 Mrs. E. Gauterau, from the republic of Honduras, who had joined the SDA Church while in California, distributed publications in her home area and apparently went into British Honduras also. According to reports, T. H. Gibbs, a minister from New Orleans, visited Belize in 1887 and placed a reading rack on one of the principal streets, securing the services of one of the interested readers to keep it supplied with tracts. In December 1891 L. C. Chadwick, then president of the International Tract Society, visited Belize and found a small group of converts there. About this time F. J. Hutchins was sent to settle in the Bay Islands of the republic of Honduras; he came to Belize from time to time and in 1894 reported holding evangelistic meetings there. In 1893 J. C. Brooks canvassed there. In 1895 James A. Morrow settled in Belize and held regular weekly meetings at his house, reporting that he hoped to organize a church in the city soon.

Organization and Growth

Organization and Growth. From the beginning of the mission work in the area, British Honduras and the republic of Honduras, including the Bay Islands, were administered as a single mission field, and the statistics were reported together. At the turn of the century the headquarters for SDA work in the area (referred to as the Central American Mission) and a book depository were situated in Belize. The regular church congregation at Belize was reported to be about 50 persons in 1902.

In 1905 the combined membership for both countries, most of it in the Bay Islands, in Honduras, was reported at 160, organized in five churches and five companies. In 1906 the field was included in the West Indian Union Conference. In 1908 the Central American Mission was extended to include Guatemala and El Salvador, and the whole was organized as the Central American Conference, with 333 Sabbathkeepers. In 1913 the Central American Conference was reduced to the size of the original mission, and the next year it, along with some other areas, was transferred to the General Conference as a detached mission, the whole group being named the Northern Spanish American Missions. In 1918 the Honduras Mission (including both British Honduras and Honduras) was organized with a membership of 267. After several administrative transfers within the Inter-American Division, the mission was divided in 1930, and British Honduras and the Bay Islands were formed into a separate mission field. At that time British Honduras had only one church, with a membership of 56. By the time the mission was reorganized in its present territory in 1937, the membership had increased to 385, with the addition of seven churches. At the end of 1944 there were 12 churches and 422 members in this mission, which earlier that year had been attached to the British West Indies Union Mission. In 1952 the British Honduras Mission, which at the beginning of that year had 15 churches and 486 members, was returned to the Central American Union.

Laypersons have played a prominent part in the growth of the SDA Church in British Honduras. In 1930 I. D. Sabido, a member of the Belize church, sold books and gave Bible studies at San Pedro, a small fishing village on Ambergris Cay. The fishermen carried the new doctrine to Pembroke Hall on the northern mainland, where they sold fish. In 1931 two lay members, Mrs. Amy Campbell and Mrs. C. A. Gill, held meetings at Pembroke Hall. As a result of this work almost the entire village was won. Some families from there later moved to another village called Calcutta, which today is composed mainly of SDAs and has a large church school. In 1934 Mrs. Gill organized a Sabbath school at Corozal, near the Mexican border. The work in the Stann Creek area in the south was opened by another laymember, C. E. Overstreet.

In the Cayo district, in the western part of the country, the seed of Seventh-day Adventism was first sown by Violet James and a couple by the name of Raisin. In 1968 Aquilino Jesse was sent to look after the interest and help advance the work. He immediately organized a branch Sabbath school. This was followed a few months later by an evangelistic effort, after which six persons were baptized. Today there are a large number of believers. In April of 1972 Petronilo Romero, an active laymember, was asked to leave his hometown in Progreso to reside in Punta Gorda for the purpose of beginning SDA work in an organized way. When he arrived, he began preaching. Today many persons are members of the church as a result of his efforts in this southern district of the country.

Belize Adventist College

BELIZE ADVENTIST COLLEGE. A coeducational school on the secondary level located about 10 miles (16 kilometers) northeast of Belize City in Central America. It is connected to the city by a paved highway. Belize International Airport is located about 10—12 miles (16—20 kilometers) from Belize City on the Belize-Corozal road, about two hours' ride by car from the college campus. The school was established in 1969.

About five miles (eight kilometers) to the north of BAC is the beautiful coastal town of Corozal, this being the main shopping center of the district. The college campus covers an area of about 80 acres (32 hectares) of flat, rocky but fertile land, of which about one third is under sugarcane cultivation. However, efforts are now being made to cultivate the remaining land with vegetables and fruit trees.

A primary school had been in operation in the Calcutta Village area for approximately 20 years before this institution came into being. The need for a Christian education center was felt as early as 1960, but it was not until the early part of 1968 that things began to take some shape when a meeting was held between a representative of the Department of Education of Belize and the local leaders of the Calcutta Seventh-day Adventist Church. A positive agreement was reached, and in the second half of the year the clearing of the site was begun.

Under the leadership of Elder Winston D. Cunningham, president of the mission at that time, the members of the district churches began the construction of classrooms early in 1969. In September of the same year, the Adventist Vocational College (now Belize Adventist College), proudly opened its doors to 53 students, becoming also the fifty-third secondary school in the Inter-American Division of Seventh-day Adventists. Since then Belize Adventist College has welcomed an ever-increasing number of students each year.

Bell, Goodloe Harper

BELL, GOODLOE HARPER (1832—1899). Educator and author. He was born, the eldest of 12 children, at Watertown, New York, and studied at Oberlin College.

At 19 he taught his first country school, but overwork placed him in the Battle Creek Sanitarium, where he accepted the Seventh-day Adventist faith, having been earlier a Baptist, and, for a time, a Disciple. After his health improved he began a private school for SDA children in the community. In 1872 he opened a school, under the auspices of the General Conference, which later became Battle Creek College. The following year Sidney Brownsberger was made principal. Subsequently Bell became head of the English Department. In 1881 Bell, who was considered a severe disciplinarian and who strongly advocated the principles of education set forth by Ellen G. White, clashed sharply with the principal, Alexander McLearn, on the operation of the college. As a result, the school was closed for a year, and Bell resigned and became principal of the newly established South Lancaster Academy in Massachusetts. After two years there he returned to Battle Creek and established a monthly called The Fireside Teacher, gave private instruction, particularly in English, and devoted considerable time to the preparation of textbooks in that subject. His wide interests led him to original field research in botany and natural history, and he was interested in painting, architecture, and music.

Bell made a noteworthy contribution to the development and molding of Sabbath schools, modeling them after the day school, with recitations, records, and thorough scholarship. He prepared a series of eight books for class use. When the General Sabbath School Association was formed in 1878, he was made the first recording secretary, and later the president. Among his published works are Natural Method in English, Rhetoric and Higher English, and a series of three grammar textbooks.

Bella Vista Adventist Academy

BELLA VISTA ADVENTIST ACADEMY. A coeducational day school with grades K-12. It is operated by Bella Vista Hospital as an Antillian Union school. It is accredited by the Puerto Rico Department of Education. The school opened in 1955 in Dr. Dunscombe's home with 10 students. William Barney was the first teacher for the one-room school.

The school continued expanding and now is located in three buildings that have 15 classrooms, three offices, and the library. The campus is on the Bella Vista Hospital grounds. Student enrollment in 1993 totaled 286. There are 21 faculty members composed of principal, librarian, guidance counselor, secretary, Spanish elementary teacher, music teacher, seven elementary teachers, and eight secondary teachers.

Bella Vista Hospital

BELLA VISTA HOSPITAL. A 157-bed general hospital situated at an elevation of 1,000 feet (305 meters) on a mountain ridge about two miles (three kilometers) from the city of Mayagüez on the western coast of the island of Puerto Rico. It is owned and operated by the Antillian Union. The hospital is fully accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Health Care Organizations and the Department of Health of the commonwealth of Puerto Rico.

The property consists of a modern four-story hospital building of reinforced concrete, a nurses' home, staff apartments, family residences, a new church building, and an academy. In 1960 an auditorium, seating about 300, was added.

In 1972 construction began on a new wing that doubled the capacity of the hospital. In addition to more beds, new surgery suites, a new pharmacy, a new central supply area, a new intensive care unit, a new kitchen and cafeteria, and other new services were added. Remodeling of the original building is taking place. In 1992 there were 550 employees, including 14 physicians, two dentists, and 220 graduate nurses, in the hospital and its clinics.

The institution is operated on an open-staff basis, with an administrator. About 200 qualified physicians and specialists use its facilities, which include medical, surgical, obstetrical,

X-ray with CT scan, nuclear medicine, bone densitometry, cardio respiratory therapy, clinical laboratory, health education, one-day surgery, endoscopy, and physical therapy units. There also is an invasive digital subtraction catheterization/angiography laboratory.

The minimum daily census of patients in 1992 was 77, with a maximum of 156. In that year 8,779 patients were admitted, and 44,779 patient days of care were given. More than 2,366 major operations and 4,147 minor operations were performed, and 686 babies were delivered. An additional 36,006 patients were treated at the polyclinic that is operated by the hospital in the city. In May 1993 the hospital opened a pediatric satellite outpatient clinic in San Sebastian. It also operates a satellite dental clinic in Ponce, on the southern part of the island. Many patients come from the nearby islands to be treated at the hospital.

The site for the hospital was chosen in 1947. A group of Seventh-day Adventist physicians (including Colby William Dunscombe and Charles B. Moore) were already practicing in Mayagüez, operating a regular polyclinic and a charity clinic. L. L. Dunn, the first administrator, supervised the construction of the hospital building and the purchase of equipment, which were partially financed by Hill-Burton funds. The hospital accepted its first patient on Jan. 1, 1954. During the first 10 years of its operation 27,600 patients were admitted.

On Aug. 15, 1965, a three-year accredited School of Nursing was opened in affiliation with Antillian College (about four miles [six kilometers] away). In 1972 the associate degree program was begun at Antillian College. In 1973 the hospital three-year diploma program was terminated. The hospital and the local church share in the support of a nine-grade school for English-speaking students. Along with Antillian Adventist University, the hospital has developed a four-year nursing program, a two-year respiratory therapy technician program, and a two-year medical technician degree. It also has its own internship program for physicians.

Medical Directors: C. W. Dunscombe (acting), 1954; C. B. Moore, 1955; C. M. Donaldson, 1956; C. W. Dunscombe, 1957; C. M. Donaldson, 1958; H. F. Evans, 1959; R. L. Horner, 1960—1961; B. H. Westphal, 1962; C. M. Donaldson, 1963—1971; Benjamin LeDuc, 1972— .

Bellah, Charles Greeley

BELLAH, CHARLES GREELEY (1873—1964). Literature evangelist leader, administrator, author. At the beginning of the century he and his wife spent four years in colporteur work, and by 1906 he was directing the book work in the Missouri Conference. From 1907 to 1914 he directed the colporteurs in the Central Union, which in those days led in book sales. Following this, Bellah did evangelistic work in Missouri and for several years was pastor of the Central church in St. Louis. From 1922 to 1924 he served as president of the Kansas Conference, and for the following seven years carried heavy pastoral responsibilities.

Because of serious illness he retired in 1931, settling in Fredricktown, Missouri, chosen because there were no Seventh-day Adventists in town. The Bellahs aided in the establishment of a debt-free church there in 1950. He authored nine books.

Belleau, George S.

BELLEAU, GEORGE S. (1895—1964). Departmental secretary, administrator. A native of Quebec, he first came in contact with the teachings of the Seventh-day Adventist Church in 1913. He immediately enrolled at Canadian Union College to prepare for the ministry. In 1918 he began his service to the church in the Idaho Conference, following which he worked among the French-speaking people of eastern Canada and served for a time as mission superintendent in Brazil.

After graduation from the ministerial and educational course at Walla Walla College in 1927, he served in various capacities in the Oregon Conference and as MV and educational secretary in the North Pacific Union. He later served as president of the Idaho and Northern New England conferences.

Belz, Francisco

BELZ, FRANCISCO (1866—1948). Pioneer teacher and evangelist in Brazil. He was born in Germany and emigrated with his family to Brazil, where his father was among the first in that country to join the Seventh-day Adventist Church. In 1899 he was baptized, and two years later, in 1901, entered denominational work as a teacher of a primary school. He received his education at the SDA Brusque missionary training school at Gaspar Alto (near Brusque), Santa Catarina, in Brazil. His name appears in the SDA Yearbook between 1909, when he was listed as a licentiate in the Santa Catarina and Paraná Conference, and 1928, when he was listed as an ordained minister in the Rio-Espirito Santo Mission. In between these dates he is listed also in the Rio Grande do Sul and Espirito Santo missions.

Belz, Wilhelm (Guilherme)

BELZ, WILHELM (GUILHERME) (fl. 1895). Reported to be the first Seventh-day Adventist in Brazil. As a child in Pomerania, he learned that according to the Bible the seventh day is the Sabbath. However, when he questioned his minister and his mother about the matter, he was led to dismiss the subject from his mind by the reply that Christ had changed the day of rest. Many years later, after the family had moved to Brazil, he found in the home of his elder brother, Carl, a copy of Uriah Smith's Gedanken über das Buch Daniel ("Thoughts on the Book of Daniel"), in which he read that the papacy had changed the Sabbath. He began an investigation, read and reread his Bible, and finally came to the conclusion that there was no divine authority for the change and that the seventh-day Sabbath was still the day appointed by God for worship. After a while he determined to observe it even though he was not aware of other Christians' doing so. His influence led several others in the neighborhood to begin keeping the seventh-day Sabbath some years before SDA missionaries reached Brusque, near Gaspar Alto, Santa Catarina, where he lived. He joined the SDA Church about 1895 and was "elected librarian of the [Brusque] tract society" (Review and Herald 72:636, Oct. 1, 1895).

Bender, Urbanus

BENDER, URBANUS (1877—1959). Minister, educator, and administrator in South Africa, West Indies, and the United States. He became a Seventh-day Adventist while still in his teens through reading. Upon graduation from Union College he assisted in city missions in Nebraska as cook, nurse, and general helper. Later he worked in Arkansas, first as a minister, and then as conference president (1901—1906). He was the first president of the West Indian Union (1907—1913), president of the Montana Conference (1913—1916), successively principal of Spion Kop College, administrator of Solusi Mission, and president of Cape Conference (1916—1927), teacher at Oakwood College (1927—1928), teacher at Mount Pisgah and Fletcher academies, minister in the North Carolina Conference (1928—1939), and minister in the Michigan Conference (1939—1946).

Bengel, Johann Albrecht

BENGEL, JOHANN ALBRECHT (1687—1752). German Lutheran theologian, textual scholar, and commentator. He predicted that “the appearance of the coming of Jesus Christ,” the destruction of the beast, and the imprisonment of Satan would take place about 1836, and would be followed by two millenniums, the first a golden age on earth, the second the reign of the saints in heaven (Bengel, Gnomon of the New Testament, ed. Andrew R. Fausset, vol. 4, p. 226; vol. 5, pp. 365, 367, 368, 373). He described this “appearance” of Christ’s coming as separate from the “one coming of Christ in glory, at the last day” (ibid., vol. 5, p. 363). Yet for many in Europe who did not necessarily follow his elaborately contrived chronology or his double millennium and double Second Advent, his writings served as a call to prepare for “the appearance of His coming,” which he called “the first dawn of the brightness of His actual coming” (ibid., vol. 4, p. 232). His predictions for 1836 led many in Germany and Russia, for example, to look for “the advent near.” In fact, during the time of the Millerite movement in America, Bengel’s doctrine in summary was published in an English translation, in which a table listed the beast’s “overthrow at the appearing of the Lord” for 1836 (John C. F. Burk, A Memoir of the Life and Writings of John Albert Bengel, trans. R. F. Walker, p. 294). Bengel is mentioned in a Millerite paper as “looking for the advent about this time” (The Signs of the Times 6:36, Sept. 20, 1843), and referred to similarly by J. N. Andrews (Review and Herald 55:10, Jan. 1, 1880).

Benghazi Adventist Hospital

BENGHAZI ADVENTIST HOSPITAL. A 32-bed general hospital formerly operated by the Middle East Division in Benghazi, Cyrenaica, Libya, immediately east of the main commercial section of the city. It was administered by a medical director. The institution operated Medical, Surgical, and Obstetrical departments, and provided laboratory, X-ray, and pharmaceutical services. In 1964 a school of nursing was opened for training registered nurses and nurse's aids.

The institution was opened in 1956 by Dr. Roy S. Cornell, who had arrived Feb. 2, 1955, and had supervised the remodeling of a war-damaged hotel building secured for the hospital, purchased equipment, and arranged for a staff, while assisting the Libyan government as chief surgeon at the government hospital in Benghazi. The hospital was formally opened May 21, 1956. A year later Dr. Cornell contracted acute paralytic poliomyelitis, which left him completely paralyzed and unable to continue directing the project that he had pioneered.

The hospital was operated by the Nile Union Mission, until, at the end of 1958, it came under the direct control of the Middle East Division. Fakhry Naguib was the first business manager; the first nurses were Mrs. Rafic Issa and Dallal Kotaira (later Mrs. Munir Masloub), who, with Rafic Issa, business office assistant, and Munir Masloub, laboratory and X-ray technician, were active in establishing the work of the hospital. Miriam Bruce was the first director of nurses (from September 1956).

By 1963 minor construction provided for expanded laboratory and kitchen facilities and increased the patient capacity from 27 to 32. However, already by late 1961, because of the need for expanded medical services, it had been decided to relocate the hospital. A member of the royal family made available for purchase 10 acres (40,000 square meters) of choice property. Community support was enlisted, and oil companies operating in the area contributed $750,000. Construction on the project began in 1964, and on Jan. 17, 1968, the 60-bed hospital, valued at US$1.4 million, was dedicated and opened to the public, with a staff of 105. On Nov. 23, 1969, the new Revolutionary Command Council, whose policy required that all medical services be owned and administered by the government, nationalized the hospital. The expatriate staff, consisting of 48 families and single workers from the United States, the Philippines, Indonesia, India, and several Arab countries of the Middle East, were relocated outside the country.

Medical Directors: Roy S. Cornell, 1956—1957; J. P. Munsey (acting), 1957—1960; William Wagner, 1960—1963; D. Clifford Ludington, 1963—1968; G. N. Benson, 1968—1969.

Benin

BENIN (formerly Dahomey). A republic in West Africa, formerly colonized by France. It received its independence on Aug. 1, 1960. It has an area of 43,483 square miles (112,621 square kilometers) and a population (1994) of 5.3 million. It is bounded on the north by Niger, on the east by Nigeria, on the west by Togo and Burkina Faso, and on the south by the Gulf of Guinea. Agriculture is the principal occupation, the chief exports being palm kernels, palm oil, groundnuts, cotton, and coffee. Most of the people are animists, with some Muslims and Christians.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. The territory of Benin constitutes the Benin Mission, which is part of the Sahel Union Mission and thus part of the Africa-Indian Ocean Division. The country, then known as Dahomey (its name was changed to Benin in 1975), was first entered by an SDA in 1957 when Georges Vaysse, a European colporteur, canvassed there for about two years. As a result of his efforts, two men accepted the SDA message.

In 1963 the West African Union asked H. Kempf, president of the Ivory Coast Mission, to make a tour of Dahomey and Togo to explore the possibilities of establishing permanent work there. In 1964, while working in Togo, he visited Dahomey and won converts. The Togo-Dahomey Mission was established the same year. Work progressed gradually. In 1986 Benin became an organized mission. At the end of 1992 there were 1 church, 10 companies, and 551 members.

Berean Library

BEREAN LIBRARY. A set of books selected for the training of lay evangelistic workers through individual or group reading in accordance with a plan called the Missionary Reading Circle and conducted through the pages of the Review and Herald, the Missionary Magazine, and the Youth's Instructor, under the title "Berean Library Studies." The idea first appeared in the Review and Herald (76:776, Nov. 28, 1899). The Berean Library is first listed in the General Conference Bulletin for the third quarter of 1899 (p. 65). It was published by the Review and Herald Publishing Association, although the early titles carried the imprint Berean Library, Battle Creek, Michigan. At first the plan was to issue the selected titles, usually reprints in paperbound form, quarterly, and the library was advertised as a periodical (annual subscription 75 cents), but apparently the plan was abandoned, and only 12 numbers had been listed by 1915. The series was carried as a separate set in the Review and Herald catalog until 1921 and was afterward discontinued.

The library as listed in 1905 included:

(1) Steps to Christ, by Ellen G. White; (2) Thoughts on Daniel, and (3) Thoughts on Revelation, both by Uriah Smith; (4) Christian Principles, by S.M.I. Henry; (5) Looking Unto Jesus, by Uriah Smith; (6) History of the Sabbath, by J. N. Andrews; (7) Great Nations of Today (pamphlet), by A. T. Jones; (8) Battle of the Century (pamphlet), by P. T. Magan; and (9) Miraculous Powers (pamphlet), by M. E. Cornell. The 1915 catalog listed numbers (10) Our Paradise Home, by S. H. Lane; (11) Religious Liberty in America, by C. M. Snow; and (12) The Coming King, by J. Edson White. The catalog listed the following substitutions for the original selections: (4) His Glorious Appearing [James White?]; (5) Sabbath in the Scriptures, and (6) Sabbath in History, two parts of a two-book reprint of the History of the Sabbath, by J. N. Andrews; (7) Conflict Between Capital and Labor, by E. T. Russell; (8) Here and Hereafter, by Uriah Smith; and (9) Bible Footlights, by William H. Granger. The 1916 and later catalogs listed Religious Liberty in America as number 4 of the set, which by then had only seven or eight titles. Several volumes included in the series are in print at the present time.

In its early period the editorial committee included L. A. Hoopes, S. N. Haskell, A. T. Jones, W. C. Sisley, and S. H. Lane.

Berger, Alberto

BERGER, ALBERTO (fl. 1895). One of two brothers (the other was J. Frederico) who were among the earliest Seventh-day Adventist colporteurs in Brazil. Apparently they were originally from Germany and emigrated first to the United States and then to Brazil, where they arrived in August 1895 and worked among the German settlers in Rio Grande do Sul for a short time, after which they returned to Germany.

Bergheim Mühlenrahmede

BERGHEIM MÜHLENRAHMEDE (Mühlenrahmede Retreat Center). A property consisting of about five acres (two hectares) of land, with a building completed in 1961 by the Grundstückverwaltung der Siebenten-Tags-Adventisten in Westdeutschland (the Seventh-day Adventist Building Corporation in Western Germany) providing accommodations for 215 guests, a large dining room and meeting hall seating 150 (which can be enlarged, if necessary, by opening the sliding doors to the vestibule), and also a library and a music room. It is situated on the hillside above the Rahmede Valley in the Sauerland forests near the town of Altena in North Rhine-Westphalia, western Germany, about 40 miles (64 kilometers) east of Düsseldorf. The center is owned and operated by the North German Union.

The institution provides opportunities for rest and recreation for church members and their friends. Its facilities are used also for ministerial meetings, colporteur institutes, church officers' and laypersons' meetings, Bible schools for youth and adults, children's and veterans' camps, and courses in diet.

The institution originated in 1953 when the Hessia-Westphalian Conference established in Evingsen, near Altena, Westphalia, a small recreation camp for SDA young people, which consisted of three small wooden houses. Later these buildings were moved to Mühlenrahmede, where, about 1960, the construction of the present structure was begun. After several alterations in 1993, 104 persons can be accommodated. The meeting hall seats 120. In the 1980s a sports field, a playground for children, and a small animal precinct were added. In 1993 the property covered 8.4 acres (3.4 hectares).

Managers: Ernst August Schulz, 1961—1964; Helmut Gaffron, 1964—1973; Wolfgang Thieme, 1973—1980; Wolfgang Oldenhoff, 1980—1984; Reinhard Fuchs, 1984— .

Bergman, George Clyde

BERGMAN, GEORGE CLYDE (1898—1957). A Loma Linda graduate (1924), first Seventh-day Adventist missionary doctor sent to Ethiopia (1927). He married Gertrude Katherine Nelson in 1921. Largely because of Emperor Haile Selassie's confidence in him, he established the Taffari Makonnen Hospital in Dessie. To reach Dessie he, his wife, and baby had to travel 300 miles (500 kilometers) by horseback and mule caravan, and then he had to build the mission hospital himself. In 1932 he founded the Empress Zauditu Memorial Hospital in Addis Ababa, with his sister, Esther Bergman, as director of nursing education. She died there in 1935.

Bergman was called to serve in the United States Army in 1942, and received distinguished service medals for his services in inter-American affairs. In 1946 he entered private practice.

Berlin Hospital

BERLIN HOSPITAL (Krankenhaus Waldfriede). A 230-bed acute-care hospital operated by the Euro-Africa Division in Berlin. It has six departments—internal medicine, surgery, gynecology, obstetrics, anesthesiology, and radiology—each headed by a department chief.

Founded on Apr. 15, 1920, the institution was called Waldfriede Sanitarium and Clinic. When in 1930 the sanitarium was enlarged, the name was changed to Waldfriede Hospital because of the requirements of the government health insurance program. From then on, it has been a registered hospital with three departments, each with two wards. Recognition as a sanitarium had already been granted by the regency of Potsdam, where the hospital was situated at the time. After the area was incorporated into Greater Berlin, the hospital came under municipal authorities (at that time, the public health office) of the metropolitan area of Berlin.

The institution was opened with 39 beds; later the number increased to 60; and through an extension in 1922—1923, to 110. Further enlargement in 1927—1928 brought the number of beds to 134 and later, in 1959, to 186, and in 1991 120 beds were registered by the senate of Berlin.

Many patients prefer the Waldfriede Hospital to other institutions because of the excellent care they receive and because of the friendly spirit evident there. The hospital runs internship and residency programs in each of the departments, and works with a closed staff program.

Up to 300 physicians from all over the city refer their patients to Waldfriede Hospital.

Since 1923 the hospital has had a nursing school with 65 students. The diploma is recognized by the German authorities.

In July 1993 a health center opened its doors. It is the first center attached to an acute-care hospital within the European Seventh-day Adventist health-care system and is under the leadership of a specialist in public health.

Berlin-Steglitz Old People's Home

BERLIN-STEGLITZ OLD PEOPLE'S HOME A 55-bed old people's home operated in Berlin, Germany, by the Berlin-Brandenburg Conference of the North German Union.

The need for a home for aged Seventh-day Adventists of the Berlin area became apparent after World War II. In 1956 a suitable house at 39 Grunewald Street, Berlin-Steglitz, was purchased and remodeled. The first patients moved in on June 1, 1957, and the home was opened officially on June 6, 1957, with 36 patient beds. Capacity in 1993 was 755 patient beds. At present (1993) the manager is Gerd Mollack, and the head nurse is Manda Brala.

History

History. Seventh-day Adventist work began in Bermuda early in the 1890s when two SDAs, Marshall Enoch and his wife, emigrated from Nova Scotia. About the same time two brothers, Frank and Marquis Pogue, came from Minnesota as colporteurs. The first Bermudan converts were the R. T. Munroe family, who began observing the Sabbath after studying SDA publications bought from one of the Pogue brothers. In 1895, when Marshall Enoch heard of the Munroes, he visited them and arranged to hold weekly services in their home. From this Munroe family came a minister, several missionaries, Bible instructors, and nurses.

From 1901 until Bermuda was made a part of the Atlantic Union Conference in 1915, the work in the islands was directed by the General Conference as one of the "miscellaneous missions." The mission was fully organized in 1959, and was incorporated by an act of the Bermuda Parliament in 1960. In 1986 the Bermuda Mission became the Bermuda Conference.

The first Seventh-day Adventist minister sent to Bermuda was J. W. Bartlett, who organized a company in Hamilton on Mar. 16, 1901. During the pastorate of J. A. Morrow, the first permanent pastor (1903—1909), the first little church was built in Hamilton. This has been replaced since by a larger church on King Street. The new building, dedicated in 1949, and serving also as an evangelistic center, has been an important factor in the growth of the work in the islands.

The second church, begun in Southampton in 1926, was a small chapel erected on land donated by Profirio Gomez, and later enlarged. A new church building was erected and was dedicated on Dec. 19, 1964.

Another church was organized in St. George's in 1935. The members met in rented quarters until 1954. They bought the historic Cooper estate on York Street and remodeled the building into a church auditorium and Sabbath school rooms, and dedicated it free of debt in 1957. In 1984 a larger edifice was erected on Secretary Road in St. George's. A portion of the York Street church is being used as a Community Services center.

In 1965 the Warwick church was dedicated; in 1978 the Midland Heights church was dedicated. The new Somerset church was completed in 1983 and dedicated debt-free in the same year. In 1987 and 1990 new churches were opened in Devonshire and Pembroke, respectively.

Special emphasis was placed on evangelism following the 1950 General Conference session, when W. H. Branson, the newly elected General Conference president, challenged the world field to double the church membership during the coming quadrennium. The Bermuda Mission doubled its membership in less than two years: the 1950 total was 288; the 1952 total was 607.

Evangelism in Bermuda has been fostered in many ways through a number of radio and television programs. Tent, church, and school evangelism continue to constitute the thrust of witness to the island.

Since 1989 administrative posts have been filled by Bermudans.

Bermuda Institute

BERMUDA INSTITUTE. A coeducational elementary and secondary school located in Southampton, Bermuda. In 1898 a school was opened by the Enoch family, with Winnie M. Peebles as teacher. This was before a church was organized in Bermuda. In 1942 J. F. Knipschild, Sr., superintendent of the mission, was granted permission by the government to establish a school in Southampton Parish. Classes were conducted in rooms at the back of the old Southampton church until 1953, when an old homestead known as Sandringham was secured and remodeled into two classrooms. Another classroom was added in 1956.

On Nov. 16, 1961, Governor Major General Sir Julian Gascoigne officially opened a modern two-room primary department. June 9, 1965, saw the groundbreaking for a new library, science laboratory, assembly hall, kitchen, and classrooms to accommodate the increased enrollment.

With the introduction of the tenth grade in September of 1966, the enrollment rose to 200 and the faculty increased to nine. In 1967 a full secondary school year began with some 210 students and 11 teachers.

A third modern and fully equipped building valued at $125,000 was dedicated free of debt in March 1972. The phenomenal growth and excellent quality of its teaching soon resulted in full denominational accreditation for Bermuda Institute.

In 1981 ground was broken for the construction of an administration building and classrooms for the elementary school. It was completed in 1983.

In 1984 a building to facilitate vocational arts for the high school was added. To meet further expanding enrollment, the administration converted the assembly hall in the elementary school to three classrooms. In April 1993 a new elementary and administration building was opened free from debt.

Bernstein, Otto O.

BERNSTEIN, OTTO O. (1874—1965). Evangelist, teacher, administrator. After hearing Ellen White and other speakers at the 1888 General Conference session, he was inspired to become an evangelist. He enrolled in Union College during 1891, its opening year, and became known as an orator. He became a minister in the Minnesota Conference and was called to evangelism in England. Back in the United States he conducted a total of 77 major evangelistic campaigns during terms of service in Pennsylvania, Colorado, Kansas, and Nebraska. He was the first principal of Maplewood Academy, where he also taught Bible. He served as president of the New Jersey Conference and the Southern California Conference.

During 1934 Bernstein was in charge of a booth at the World's Fair in Chicago, where the worldwide work of the church was presented to the public and more than 500,000 pieces of literature were distributed.

Bethel College

BETHEL COLLEGE. A coeducational boarding school on the academy level, operated by the Southern Africa Union Conference, located in southern South Africa. It provides secondary training for a student body representing the African population in the territory of the union.

In 1993 enrollment was 551 (56 secondary, 495 junior college). The faculty numbered 27. About 52 percent of the students were from Seventh-day Adventist families and the rest from Christian backgrounds.

The college is affiliated with the local University of the Transkei and registered with the government. Students sit for external government examinations after the tenth and twelfth years, reaching a university entrance standard.

History

History. Maranatha Mission. The forerunner of Bethel College was the school at Maranatha Mission, situated in the Eastern Cape Colony 25 miles (40 kilometers) from Grahamstown, on 500 acres (200 hectares) of land donated by a layperson, Charles Sparrow. It was the first Seventh-day Adventist mission among the African people.

The school was opened by G. A. Ellingworth, its first principal, in 1909 with an enrollment of 60 students. The first among many trained during those early years were Amos Magalela, Agrippa Mzozoyana, Stanford Ntwana, Banford Scott, Shadrach Pikoli, Douglas Ntsikeni, Dode Kobe, and Griffiths Mayaba, all of whom later occupied responsible positions in the work. In 1910 the first four converts were baptized.

In 1916, when W. Claude Tarr was director of Maranatha Mission, the committee decided, because the African population was moving eastward, to move Maranatha Mission to the Transkei, an area of teeming African population.

Bethel Mission. In 1917 approximately 300 acres (120 hectares) of partly cultivated farmland, five miles (eight kilometers) from Butterworth, were purchased for £1,100. The first building was a small pole-and-mud church with a thatch roof. Soon other buildings were added, and the school was moved from Maranatha Mission. The new mission took the name Bethel.

One year after the opening of the work in the Transkei 30 converts were baptized, one of them being 100 years old. It was necessary for I. B. Burton and W. C. Tarr to work without the assistance of African teachers, inasmuch as none had yet completed their training. The first graduation from the Theological Department took place in 1920. The school served as the Bethel Training School for all African workers within the Union of South Africa.

Spion Kop Missionary Institution. From 1928 to 1937 the training school was operated in Natal and became known as the Spion Kop Missionary Institution, occupying the buildings vacated when the European training school, Spion Kop College, was moved to Helderberg.

Bethel College. At the end of 1937 the institution was transferred again to Bethel Mission, and was established on its present site. Its name was changed to Bethel Training College and changed again at the end of 1961 to Bethel College.

Beginning in 1955 the plant and facilities were expanded in order to provide for doubling the enrollment. Additions included a new church and a basement recreation hall (1955), a new cafeteria and a domestic science unit (1958), a remodeling of the administration building with a two-story frontage (1960), and extensive additions to the boys' dormitory (1962).

In 1974 additions to the girls' dormitory were made and a new science block was built.

The industrial program includes operating a dairy with a registered Friesland herd; also kitchen cabinet making. Bethel farm is productive, supplying milk to neighboring villages as well as to the Bethel community. By 1993 poultry farming was proving to be the backbone of the farming program.

Also by 1993 many of the old buildings had been modernized and converted to new uses. A magnificent new administration building had been erected at the center of the college.

Principals—Spion Kop Missionary Institution: J. G. Siepman, 1928—1929; F. E. Thompson, 1930—1933; R. E. Ansley (acting), 1933—1934; E. D. Hanson, 1935—1937.

Bethel College: E. W. Tarr, 1938—1940; P. H. Mantell, 1941; E. W. Tarr, 1942—1944; A. V. Edwards, 1945—1947; S. W. Beardsell, 1948—1957; W. A. Hurlow, 1957—1963; R. G. Pearson, 1963—1970; R. A. Marx, 1971—1973; M. R. Siepman, 1973—1978; I. du Preez, 1979—1980; J. J. Mdakane, 1981—1990; T. H. Langeni, 1990—1992; S.B.M. Baduza (acting), 1992—1993; S. Lebese, 1993— .

Bethel Sanitarium

BETHEL SANITARIUM (1917—1925). A health institution, earlier called the Alberta Sanitarium, operated by the Alberta Conference and the Western Canadian Union Conference between 1917 and 1925 at Calgary, Alberta, Canada. It occupied a two-story main building with 31 rooms and a number of outbuildings on a 23-acre (nine-hectare) property at Bowness Park, eight miles (13 kilometers) west of Calgary. Between 1920 and 1924 it treated between 200 and 400 patients a year, was supervised by a physician, and had a staff of nurses numbering from 5 to 20. Until 1922 the sanitarium operated a Physiotherapeutic Department in the city of Calgary. For some time it also offered nursing training in affiliation with one of the Seventh-day Adventist schools of nursing in the United States.

The sanitarium was an outgrowth of treatment rooms opened in Edmonton in 1903 by Frank L. Hommel, a graduate of Battle Creek Sanitarium. His work prospered so well that in 1908 a 28-room house, one of the largest in town, was rented to house his establishment, which had become known as the Alberta Sanitarium. According to the 1909 Yearbook (pp. 176, 190) an institution under the name of Alberta Sanitarium was opened in 1908 at Lacombe, on the campus of the present Canadian Union College (see Western Canadian Tidings 13:3, 4, Mar. 14, 1923; Mar. 28, 1923). The Yearbook lists its assets at $4,000, capacity at 20 patients, and the number of patients treated in the preceding year is given as 250. In the 1910 Yearbook there is a notation that the sanitarium is not under conference control, though the Yearbook still lists the conference president as a member of the governing board. In 1911 Hommel went to Calgary and opened treatment rooms there. In June 1917 the Alberta Conference took over the management of the establishment. About that time two physicians, Hans and Dale Bonde, recent Loma Linda medical graduates, came to Calgary and apparently set up a small hospital, which soon required more space. The conference then provided property first in town and later at Bowness Park, to which the treatment rooms and the doctors' offices were transferred. On Aug. 1, 1923, the institution, which had been called Alberta Sanitarium, changed its name to Bethel Sanitarium to avoid confusion with government-operated Alberta Sanitarium situated nearby. In 1919 the operation of the sanitarium was assumed by the Western Canadian Union Conference, but later it was returned to the Alberta Conference.

Bethesda Adventist Home and Hospital

BETHESDA ADVENTIST HOME AND HOSPITAL. A home for senior citizens situated at 27 Esplanade Road, Mount Eden, Auckland, New Zealand. The property is conveniently located about two miles (three kilometers) from the center of Auckland, on the base of Mount Eden, an extinct volcanic cone. The institution is owned and operated by the North New Zealand Conference.

The original two-story building was for many years the conference office and was converted to form the administrative section of the home, providing an office, kitchen, dining room, chapel, and staff quarters. To this was added a new wing that provided a bed capacity of 28. Alterations to the two-story building, together with the construction of the new wing, were financed by the church in North New Zealand and generously subsidized by the New Zealand government. The home was officially opened on July 4, 1965.

Additional extensions were opened in 1971, increasing the accommodations of the home to 38.

Betikama Adventist High School

BETIKAMA ADVENTIST HIGH SCHOOL. A coeducational boarding school on the seventh-standard (approximately junior high school) level, owned and operated by the Western Pacific Union Mission, situated on the banks of the Lunga River, about eight miles (13 kilometers) from Honiara, capital of the island of Guadalcanal, Solomon Islands. The school was founded in 1948 by A. L. Thrift, an Australian missionary, using the facilities of an abandoned World War II American base camp, which included, among other things, dormitories, a light plant, and water systems.

The school originally accepted only boys, but it was made coeducational in 1950, the first such school in the eastern Solomon Islands. Students come from all the islands of this group. Instruction is conducted in English, and high standards are maintained in all subjects of the curriculum. Besides high academic standards, strong evangelistic outreach and Pathfinder programs have been carried on through the years.

In 1962 more than 100 boys and nearly 100 girls were in academic classes ranging from preparatory to standard 7. In 1963 a European woman teacher was appointed to help train the girls, making a teaching staff of two Europeans and nine nationals.

Form 1, the first year of high school, was added in 1965. The high school program developed over the years until in 1973 the first group of form 5 students sat for the Cambridge Overseas School Certificate. The 1993 enrollment was 364, with an academic staff of eight.

The operational costs of the school, apart from the salaries of overseas missionaries, are largely met from two major industries—Betikama School Farm and Betikama Carvings, the latter providing a worldwide outlet for Solomon Island woodcarving and other local handcrafts. A girls' sewing industry is currently being expanded.

Prior to 1963 the school building complex consisted of American wartime Quonset huts, except for two classroom blocks and the chapel, with a seating capacity of 300. From 1963 onward a vigorous building program has been carried on to replace the wartime buildings. A Thirteenth Sabbath Offering overflow started this program. By 1974 the only wartime buildings remaining in the greatly expanded high school complex were the woodwork classroom and the boys' kitchen-dining room.

Beulah College

BEULAH COLLEGE. A coeducational boarding school offering 12 grades of secondary education, situated on 327 acres (132 hectares) of flat leasehold land at Vaini, nine miles (14.5 kilometers) east of the administrative capital of Nuku‘alofa, on the island of Tonga.

A school in the area was opened in 1895 by Mrs. E. Hilliard, who arrived in Tonga with her husband, a Seventh-day Adventist minister, a few months before. Classes were at first conducted in their home. When the enrollment increased, instruction was transferred to a 14' x 24' (4.3 m. x 7.3 m.) schoolhouse. The next year Mrs. E. S. Butz, who came with her husband and child from Pitcairn, assisted in the school, which numbered up to 28 pupils. However, the school did not continue.

On Nov. 28, 1904, a school was established on the Nuku‘alofa Mission site with 12 pupils, and Ella Boyd, from Australia, as teacher. Nellie Sisley, Myra Ford, and Mrs. E. Thorpe followed her as teachers. The school was patronized by the European trading community, as well as by the Tongan royal family and local chiefs.

In 1921 a boarding school was opened at Houma, with E. E. Thorpe in charge. In 1924 C. S. Palmer arrived as the school's first principal. The enrollment increased steadily to about 50 pupils, four of whom were girls. Joni Latu, recently returned from Avondale College, assisted.

Toward the close of 1923 the first lease, 80 acres (32 hectares), of the present property was secured by R. W. Smith. The Houma school was moved to the new campus in 1925. When C. S. Palmer returned to Australia in 1926 because of ill health, Mrs. R. W. Smith assumed leadership of the school and continued until H. L. Tolhurst arrived in 1927, acting as both field superintendent and principal.

Beulah was officially recognized by the government's Education Department as a college in 1937.

For some years the school struggled against difficulties, such as lack of facilities, which restricted enrollment. Gradually conditions improved, and capable national staff were added. Henele Moala, Steven Fine, and Ilaisa Teaupa were assisting J. Cernik in 1948. The Tongan government, the director of education, the secretary to the premier, and other officials spoke highly of the educational contribution made by Beulah College during the 1940s.

During the principalship of A. E. Watts (1938—1940), a new European-style school building was erected that was opened by Queen Salote in 1939. During the Japanese invasion of the Pacific, Paul Fua led the college. Another 100 acres (40 hectares) of fertile land was secured during J. Cernik's administration, while in 1955 a third lease of 147 acres (60 hectares) of coconuts was obtained. To cope with increased enrollment and advanced levels of education, a second expatriate was added to the staff, commencing in 1958 with R. N. Sutcliffe. In 1972, 11 grades were offered, and 12 in 1985. An excellent brass band has operated since 1966, and in recent years two dormitories, additional classrooms, a kitchen and dining room, and a library have been added. Enrollment in 1993 was 310.

Bhutan

BHUTAN. An autonomous kingdom lying on the southeastern slopes of the Himalayas. It is bordered on the west by Sikkim, on the north by Tibet, and on the south and east by India. It has an area of 19,305 square miles (5,000 square kilometers) and an estimated population (1994) of 1.7 million. In the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries Bhutan resisted British efforts to open trade; in 1866 it accepted a settlement by which the British undertook to protect it from outside interference. After 1949 its foreign affairs were administered by India. Bhutan is ruled by a hereditary maharajah. The people of Bhutan are mostly of Tibetan stock, with a significant minority of Nepalese in western Bhutan. There are also Lepchas from Sikkim, and Paharis. The Bhutanese speak a Tibetan dialect. They are predominantly Lamaistic Buddhists. The preaching of Christianity has been forbidden by a royal decree.

The hill people are graziers and herders. the inhabitants of the valleys industrious farmers. Primitive and virtually roadless Bhutan was first opened up to the outside world in 1959, and now has three roads. In 1962 the country had two doctors and 20 pharmacists and was issuing its own passports and postal stamps.

Seventh-day Adventist influence is restricted to the sale of health and religious books by student literature evangelists. There are several hundred students of the Voice of Prophecy Bible Correspondence School. Five Bhutanese were baptized on Oct. 24, 1993, as a result of evangelistic meetings conducted by P. D. Kujur and his team at Raimatan Forest Camp, near the Bhutan border.

Bhutan is assigned to the Himalayan region, which is a part of the Southern Asia Division. In 1993 this region, which includes Nepal, had three Seventh-day Adventist churches.

Bible

BIBLE. The collection of sacred writings accepted by conservative Christians as being of divine origin and therefore possessing divine authority. The OT consists of 39 books written before the first advent of Christ, while the NT, written since Christ's time, consists of 27 books. (Seventh-day Adventists, in common with Protestants in general, hold that the Apocrypha is not a part of the canon of Scripture.)

Bible in the Seventh-day Adventist Church. SDAs believe that “the Holy Scriptures, Old and New Testaments, . . . given by divine inspiration” and that they “are the infallible revelation of His will” (Church Manual [1990], p. 23). All theological beliefs must be measured by them; any teaching that is contrary to them is to be rejected.

Early SDAs affirmed that the Bible alone was the source of their beliefs. Every matter was to be decided by the Bible, which is the test of all doctrine. They believed it to be the duty of all members to search the Scriptures for themselves and to know the reason for their faith. In 1847 James White declared, “The Bible is a perfect, and complete revelation. It is our only rule of faith and practice” (A Word to the “Little Flock,” p. 13).

In 1849 he reaffirmed his position: “The Bible is our chart—our guide. It is our only rule of faith and practice, to which we would closely adhere” (Present Truth, 1:46, December 1849). In this position he was supported by his wife, who said, “The Bible and the Bible alone is to be our rule of faith” (Ellen G. White, in Sabbath School Worker 2:4, October 1886).

When, in 1889, Seventh-day Adventists for the first time included in their Yearbook a list of fundamental principles, they prefaced the list with the statement “Seventh-day Adventists have no creed but the Bible.” Their declaration on the Bible reads as follows: “That the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments were given by inspiration of God, contain a full revelation of His will to man, and are the only infallible rule of faith and practice” (pp. 147, 148).

Bible Study Encouraged. In a great variety of ways Seventh-day Adventists encourage the reading and study of the Bible, both among members and nonmembers. The Bible is the focal center of the young minister's seminary training. Bible courses are required in every university and college curriculum of denominationally operated schools, both graduate and undergraduate, and in each year of the elementary and secondary levels. In the weekly Sabbath school, which is attended not only by children but by adults of all ages, the lesson is devoted exclusively to a study of the Bible, and all members are encouraged to attend Sabbath school regularly and to study the lesson each day. Senior and youth Morning Watch calendars present selected passages for daily meditation, and a devotional book published each year provides a three-minute comment on each passage. Church members, especially young people, are encouraged to read the Bible through each year.

Because of the emphasis Seventh-day Adventists have placed on individual Bible study, they have stood high in contests involving knowledge of the Bible. For example, at the Second International Bible Contest (1961) sponsored by the Israel Bible Society, and held at Jerusalem, Israel, Mrs. Yolanda da Silva, a teacher and homemaker of Brazil, came so close to first place that the judges reconsidered and awarded her a gold medal similar to the first prize. In 1964 at the Third International Bible Contest, Graham Mitchell, an accountant at the Sanitarium Food Company, Australia, took first prize. Several other Seventh-day Adventists from other countries also ranked high in the same contest.

SDA publishing houses around the world produce millions of dollars' worth of literature each year, most of which is related in one way or another to the Bible. In addition to evangelistic periodicals and tracts, there are many Bible-related books, including The Seventh-day Adventist Bible Commentary, a seven-volume, 8,000-page commentary on the entire Bible; the Seventh-day Adventist Bible Dictionary, a matching 1,200-page work, and The Bible Story, a 10-volume work profusely illustrated in color to which has been added a companion volume for adults, Your Bible and You; Bible readings, in book or pamphlet form in various languages (outline or question-and-answer Bible study guides with comment on Scripture topics); and materials for Sabbath schools and Vacation Bible Schools.

Bible Evangelism. Public evangelism consists essentially of the exposition of the Bible. In some instances good-quality Bibles are given away by the hundreds and thousands to those attending a specified number of meetings, at which the audience marks the texts used by the evangelist. Full-time evangelistic assistants called Bible instructors conduct Bible studies with individuals and groups. Training courses and institutes are conducted regularly to instruct laypersons how to teach the Bible to others through Bible studies.

From time to time Bible conferences, at which the youth participate in discussing selected Bible topics, are held for the young people of the church. Radio and television programs highlight the Bible, and a number of local, regional, or national Bible correspondence schools enroll registrants by the hundreds of thousands.

Seventh-day Adventists also cooperate with the Bible societies by official, direct contributions, by participation in translation projects, and by assisting in the circulation of the Bible.

Bible Conference

BIBLE CONFERENCE. A term Seventh-day Adventists have applied to a series of regular meetings, convened by the General Conference since 1919, for the purpose of in-depth study of biblical and theological issues.

Bible conferences had their beginning in the formative years of the church, when the leaders met to pray and to study the Bible so as to arrive at doctrinal unanimity on the basis of the Bible's being the only rule of faith and practice (see Sabbath Conferences).

A significant Bible conference was held in Washington, D.C., from July 1 to 21, 1919. This was a closed conference and was attended only by denominational editors, Bible and history teachers from Seventh-day Adventist colleges, and members of the General Conference Committee. The objective of the conference was "to unite in a definite, practical, spiritual study of the Word of God" in order "to gain more light and greater unity" (Review and Herald 96:3, 4, Aug. 21, 1919). The following topics were discussed at this Bible conference: (1) The Person and Mediatorial Work of Christ, (2) The Nature and Work of the Holy Spirit, (3) The Two Covenants, (4) The Principles of Prophetic Interpretation, (5) The Eastern Question (Turkey and Armageddon in Bible Prophecy), (6) The Beast Power in Revelation, (7) The 1260 Days, (8) The United States in Prophecy, (9) The Seven Trumpets, (10) Matthew 24, and (11) The Identification of the 10 Kingdoms. There is a stenographic transcript of this conference in the denominational archives in Washington, D.C.

The announced result of this conference was that "the Bible and history teachers, the editors, and the members of the General Conference Committee, who came together from all parts of North America, rejoiced to find themselves in agreement on all the great fundamental truths of the Bible" (ibid., p. 4).

A second SDA Bible conference was held in Washington, D.C., Sept. 1—13, 1952. Much larger than the previous Bible conference, it was attended by members of the General Conference Committee; in North America, two Bible teachers from each senior college, one Bible teacher from each junior college, from one to several evangelists from each union conference, editors of leading periodicals, book editors of leading publishing houses, representatives from the SDA Theological Seminary; and the presidents and a minimum of three others from the overseas divisions.

A transcript of this conference is preserved in the denominational archives in Washington, D.C., and photostatic copies of this transcript are available at the Andrews and Loma Linda universities' heritage rooms.

The purpose of this conference was threefold: (1) to study together the doctrines that made Seventh-day Adventists a distinct people and that justified their continued existence, (2) to set forth Seventh-day Adventist doctrines in a way that most fully explained the meaning of the times and most effectively challenged the attention and response of the public, and (3) to keep "in step" in areas of prophetic interpretation "heretofore but dimly discerned," but "now . . . seen more clearly" (Our Firm Foundation [1953], vol. 1, p. 17). The following topics were presented at the conference: (1) Recent Discoveries Confirm the Bible, (2) Christ the Center of All True Preaching, (3) The Spirit of Prophecy and the Remnant Church, (4) The Gospel in Type and Antitype, (5) The Atonement and the Cross, (6) The Covenants and the Law, (7) Life Only Through Christ, (8) The Increasing Timeliness of the Threefold Message, (9) Antichrist in History and Prophecy, (10) The Mediatorial Ministry of Jesus Christ, (11) The Advent Message Built Upon the Foundation of Many Generations, (12) The Imminence of Christ's Second Coming, (13) The Great Controversy, (14) Health and the Gospel Message, (15) The Companions of the Lamb, (16) The Gospel Commission and the Remnant Church, (17) World Evangelism Our Basic Task, (18) The Place of Prophecy in Our Preaching, (19) The Lord Our Righteousness, and (20) The Holy Spirit and the Latter Rain.

Reporting on the results of the conference, D. A. Delafield wrote: "The General Conference Committee did not anticipate that the Bible conference should simply reaffirm our faith in the great truths of the third angel's message. They also encouraged, and looked forward to, a great spiritual revival at the meetings that would reach out through the 450 delegates to our churches in all the world. The greater, more compelling result of sanctification of life through the truth was realized to a highly gratifying extent by the meetings" (Review and Herald 129:1, Oct. 2, 1952).

In May and June 1974 three identical eight-day Bible conferences drew 2,000 delegates of the North American Division to the campuses of Southern Missionary College, Andrews University, and Pacific Union College. The conference program was built around the work being done by the Biblical Research Committee in the area of biblical hermeneutics (principles of interpretation). Small group discussions of the topics presented, and panel discussions of group questions, attempted maximum interaction.

A Symposium on Biblical Hermeneutics (Gordon M. Hyde, ed., 1974), written primarily by members of the Biblical Research Committee, was distributed to delegates in advance of the conferences as a means of orientation to the Bible conference papers. The latter covered: (1) Biblical Archaeology as an Aid to Biblical Exegesis, (2) Biblical Authority: A Study of Religious Trends From the Apostolic Church to the Present Time, (3) Toward a Seventh-day Adventist Theology of Revelation-Inspiration, (4) The Relationship Between the Bible and the Writings of Ellen G. White, (5) General Principles of Biblical Interpretation, (6) Principles of Interpretation of the Prophetic and Apocalyptic Literature of the Bible, (7) "The Song of the Vineyard," a Case Study in Biblical Interpretation, (8) Preaching the Bible, (9) The Use of Tools in the Study of the Bible, (10) The Role of the Holy Spirit in Biblical Interpretation, (11) Issues in Current Theology, (12) The Interrelation of the Bible and Science With Particular Consideration of Issues Related to Creation, (13) The Everlasting Gospel and Righteousness by Faith, (14) The Unique Contribution of Adventist Eschatology, (15) The Role of the SDA Church in the Great Controversy in the End-time.

Morning Bible study series were presented on the Epistles of Ephesians, Galatians, and Colossians, respectively. Reports were presented on a proposed biography of Ellen G. White and on the Andrews University Heshbon dig.

The delegations were primarily drawn from the preaching and Bible teaching ministries of the church, with representation of all departments, institutions, administrative branches, and laypersons. World divisions sent observers to the conferences.

The primary objectives were to review the Seventh-day Adventist concept of the revelation-inspiration basis for the authority of inspired writings; to present a sound SDA system of interpretation principles for the study of inspired messages; and to attempt application of such principles in key eschatological subject areas.

Reporting on the Bible conferences, Kenneth H. Wood wrote, “The . . . editors of the Review . . . consider these conferences one of the most constructive influences within the church during this generation” (Review and Herald 151:33, Aug. 15, 1974, p. 3).

After 1974 Bible conferences were conducted in Europe (1977), Australia (1978), and South America (1979). The biblical and theological subjects discussed were the same ones presented in North America in 1974. However, allowance was made for the discussion of subjects of particular relevance and interest to each region.

The Euro-Africa Division was the location of another Bible conference in 1982. The main focus of discussion was prophecy and eschatology. The papers presented were published in French (Prophétie et Eschatologie I-II [France: Séminaire Adventiste du Saleve, 1982]) and German (Prophetie und Eschatologie I-II [Marienhöhe, 1982]). The same subjects were discussed in two other Bible conferences held in the Southern Asia Division (1983) and in the Far Eastern Division (1984).

It has been the practice of the Euro-Africa Division to organize and direct Bible conferences every five years in its territories. One of those was held in 1988 on the book of Revelation (Études sur l'Apocalypse [Conférences Bibliques Division Eurafrique, 1988]), and another one in 1993 on ecclesiology.

Bible Correspondence Schools

BIBLE CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOLS. Organizations conducting evangelistic correspondence courses in Bible subjects, operated by various union or local conferences or missions and by broadcasting organizations; often promoted in connection with radio or television programs. The courses, which carry no school credit and are offered free of any obligation, are intended to lead the student to Christ through a study of the Bible. They are designed for various age levels and prepared in several degrees of difficulty. The majority are biblical courses, but there are also health courses and a special course for alcoholics. They are issued in many languages and in braille.

The largest of the schools in North America are those conducted in connection with radio and television programs. There are many Voice of Prophecy Bible Correspondence schools outside the North American Division and others connected with the various national broadcasts in other lands, or conducted without any broadcast at all, publicized by word of mouth or by newspaper or other advertising.

Many of these schools are conducted under the name Voice of Prophecy or the equivalent national name for the local broadcast or organization, some offering courses in many languages.

The first of these Bible correspondence schools originated in connection with a local radiobroadcast. In 1939 Dallas Youngs, pastor of the Williamsport, Pennsylvania, church, needed a method of following up interests resulting from his broadcasts over station WRAK. Conceiving the idea of offering a free Bible correspondence course, he announced a 23-lesson course, for which he used an already available series of Bible lessons written by J. L. Shuler and published in loose-leaf form for use in evangelistic Bible classes conducted in churches. When this series proved successful as a correspondence course, another evangelist, A. E. Lickey, wrote a new set of correspondence lessons that became the Twentieth Century Bible Course; and the Voice of Prophecy broadcast began to issue its own correspondence courses, as did the telecast Faith for Today later (see the articles on these two programs).

As Bible correspondence schools came to be operated by various conferences, the General Conference recommended in the Autumn Council of 1947 that the Home Missionary Department foster the organization and direction of the conference-operated Bible correspondence schools in the North American Division. In 1961 the securing of enrollments in regularly established Bible schools, the distribution of radio-TV logs, etc., was assigned to the Home Missionary Department on all levels in North America.

At the time of the 1954 General Conference session a total of 44 conference Bible schools were in operation in North America, resulting in many baptisms. In the preceding four years 6,682 students had been baptized.

By 1968 the responsibility for Bible correspondence schools in North America operated under the lay activities departments in local conferences and unions had been transferred to the Voice of Prophecy and Faith for Today. Some small schools have been operated in connection with local broadcasts such as those of Amazing Facts (Chesapeake Conference). The Church Ministries Department has the responsibility for securing enrollments in courses.

Beginning in 1970, the Voice of Prophecy and Faith for Today began revising their major courses. Specialized courses are offered such as health, nutrition, and youth. Revised and new courses maintain enrollments and results at a high level.

In Latin America, eastern Asia, Australia, and the South Pacific, Bible correspondence courses form an essential part of door-to-door evangelism. Laypersons act as letter carriers, taking the lessons to students and returning the test sheets for grading and offering spiritual help during their visits. Large graduations of students often have been a feature of follow-up of courses.

BIBLE EXPOSITOR (listed in the Yearbook from 1935 to 1954; monthly; the Christian Record Benevolent Association, Lincoln, Nebraska). An evangelistic magazine for the visually impaired printed in revised braille and New York point. It began as a 12-page publication but later reached 42 pages. It was discontinued in the 1950s, and its place was taken by various Bible correspondence courses for the visually impaired.

Bible Instructor

BIBLE INSTRUCTOR. In the Seventh-day Adventist program of evangelism, a person who dedicates himself or herself to the teaching of the Scriptures, generally to individuals or to small groups. Such persons may be assigned to local churches or to institutions, or may be asked to work with evangelists. Generally personal Bible instruction is given in the homes of interested people. Most of the Bible instructors in the church have been women. Through the centuries of the Christian Era gifted women have played their part in spreading the good news of salvation in Christ.

Before the church provided a system of training in its Christian schools and colleges, ministers' and colporteurs' wives (for example, Angeline Cornell) volunteered their services for personal Bible instruction.

In 1883, the same year that S. N. Haskell promoted a new method of evangelism by the Bible reading plan (see Bible Studies), the Battle Creek Tabernacle Institute gave great impetus to the training of workers in this method of Bible instruction. At first referred to variously as Bible readers or Bible reading workers, these became known as Bible workers, now called Bible instructors. About the same time large-city missions began to prepare women through in-service training for house-to-house Bible teaching. (Mrs. A. T. Robinson, née Loretta Farnsworth, is reputed to have been the first woman Bible instructor.) At the turn of the century a large number of women skilled in the knowledge and use of the Scriptures were associated with large-city public evangelism. Thus a place for the profession was made in the church organization.

In time some dedicated young women took the undergraduate ministerial course, thus qualifying themselves to be of even greater service to evangelists in gaining decisions and in establishing new believers in doctrinal truth. Some of these skilled instructors assumed the responsibility of training gifted young people in the churches, thus recruiting new Bible instructors. Later, courses for Bible instructors were offered in SDA colleges and in the SDA Theological Seminary.

Bible, Interpretation of

BIBLE, INTERPRETATION OF. From the first, Seventh-day Adventists have stressed the importance of following sound principles of exegesis when interpreting Scripture. They recognize that interpretation is necessary because of the diverse literary forms found in the Bible; because the languages in which it was originally written, the modes of thought and expression, the customs, and the historical setting are unfamiliar to the modern reader; and because human language is at best an imperfect medium for the communication of divine thought.

As to literary forms, the language of Scripture may be in the form of poetry or prose; it may be literal or figurative; it may be historical, prophetic, or apocalyptic. As to language, it is often difficult if not impossible to translate an idea expressed in one language into another without loss or modification of the thought. The customs and modes of thought and expression of people of a foreign culture that ceased to exist many centuries ago are easily susceptible to being misunderstood today. The messages of Scripture were often given with respect to a particular historical situation, which must be known and understood before their original import and their application today can be accurately determined. The fact that human language is at best an imperfect vehicle for conveying divine thought calls for caution, and the guidance of the Holy Spirit.

The early SDA leaders, such as James White and Joseph Bates, who had no formal seminary training, brought a natural strength of intellect, deep earnestness, and diligent effort to their study of the Bible. Despite their lack of formal theological training, they discovered and followed sound principles of exegesis. Their expositions of Scripture have, accordingly, at nearly every significant point stood the test of the years. They stressed that the Scriptures were to be taken literally unless the context made it obvious that a figure of speech was being used by the sacred writer. In this they followed William Miller, who “concluded from his study of the Bible that it should be understood literally unless there is clear proof that figurative language is being employed by the inspired writer. That is, the words of Scripture ought to be understood in their ordinary historical and grammatical sense, even as with secular writing, except in those instances where the writer used figurative language. In thus viewing the Scriptures literally, Miller was simply following the path of conservative theologians from the very beginnings of Protestantism” (F. D. Nichol, The Midnight Cry [1944], p. 32).

Of the literal method of interpretation Ellen G. White wrote (1888): “The truths most plainly revealed in the Bible have been involved in doubt and darkness by learned men, who, with a pretense of great wisdom, teach that the Scriptures have a mystical, a secret, spiritual meaning not apparent in the language employed. These men are false teachers. . . . The language of the Bible should be explained according to its obvious meaning, unless a symbol or figure is employed” (GC 598, 599).

In general, early SDAs followed the method of Scripture interpretation characteristic of conservative Protestantism, which viewed all Scripture as divinely inspired. To find truth, early SDAs believed it was necessary to compare all relevant Scripture passages. They pointed to Isa. 28:10, “line upon line; here a little, and there a little,” as authority for using the proof-text method. They were convinced that when correctly understood, the Bible is consistent throughout.

Emphasis was also given to the matter of understanding biblical passages in their context. Mrs. White urged (Review and Herald 60:1, Oct. 9, 1883): “Make the Bible its own expositor, bringing together all that is said concerning a given subject at different times and under varied circumstances.” The introduction to the book Bible Readings for the Home Circle (1888) called for a careful study of the context in order to determine the meaning of a statement of Holy Writ.

The antithesis of the literal method is the allegorical method, a system of interpretation that arose early in the Christian Era, minimizing the literal sense of Scripture. This method of interpretation seems to have originated with the Greeks, who in the sixth century before Christ invented it to reinterpret the ancient gods and their cruel and immoral actions, as depicted by the poet Homer, in order to save Homer for the more enlightened ethical philosophy of a more sophisticated age.

The Jewish philosopher Philo, of Alexandria (c. 20 B.C.-after A.D. 40), borrowed the allegorical method from the Greeks and applied it to the OT. He did not deny the literal meaning altogether, but considered it only shadow. He took the figurative or allegorical meaning to be the real substance or meaning of the text. By this process of reinterpreting the OT he harmonized Scripture with his eclectic Greek philosophy. The Christian scholar Origen (c. A.D. 185—c. 254), also of Alexandria, introduced the allegorical method to Christian hermeneutics, which method dominated interpretation for more than a millennium. Origen found three meanings in Scripture corresponding to the human body, soul, and spirit—literal and moral meanings for the simple-minded, and the more profound allegorical mysteries for the discerning few.

Meanwhile, beginning at least as far back as Theophilus of Antioch at the end of the second century after Christ, a more conservative hermeneutic developed in opposition to Alexandria, emphasizing a literal, historical, and grammatical exegesis. Only with caution in Antioch were OT prophecies and types applied to Christ; allegory was despised. Great names in the “school” of Antioch included Diodorus of Tarsus (d. A.D. 394), John Chrysostom (c. 345—407), and above all Theodore, bishop of Mopsuestia (392—428). The Antiochene hermeneutic did not deny the validity of spiritual meanings but attempted to derive them from the literal meanings. Antiochene principles were not totally lost during the Middle Ages, and came to new life in Luther’s emphasis on the grammatical sense of Scripture and in the literalistic comments of Calvin. Conservative Protestant theology, including that of Seventh-day Adventists, has tended to follow this approach.

Bible-Reading Gazette

BIBLE-READING GAZETTE (1 vol., 1884; monthly; R&H; vol. in R&H). A monthly periodical containing Bible studies, published from January to December 1884, in accordance with the resolution of the General Conference session of 1883. The subscription price was set at $1 for those who submitted one or more studies for publication, and at $5 for others. The 12 numbers contained 162 lessons in all, written by many ministers and lay evangelistic workers on a wide range of scriptural topics covering the cardinal points of the doctrines held by Seventh-day Adventists. Although more than 12,000 copies were distributed in 1884, there was a large inventory still left at the end of the year. As an experiment the series was bound in book form and sold by colporteurs in Ohio. The book, containing Bible lessons in a form not available elsewhere, met with a large degree of success, and was reprinted. Later the Review and Herald prepared a similar series of studies, again by various authors, under the name Bible Readings for the Home Circle, which replaced the Gazette volume and which is still in print.

Bible Reading Plans

BIBLE READING PLANS. Several plans for systematic Bible reading that were promoted by the former Young People's Missionary Volunteer Department.

Bible Year. A plan of reading the Bible through in one year. The idea was suggested at the 1920 MV Secretaries' Council held in Indianapolis. For those who completed this reading within the year the General Conference MV Department issued Bible Year certificates, the first of which were awarded in 1922. Various Bible reading checklists in leaflet form subsequently appeared.

Correlated Reading Plans. Plans for daily reading of the Bible along with character-building books. The 1946 Advisory Committee introduced the Character Classics, daily readings in the five books of the Conflict of the Ages Series (Ellen G. White's Patriarchs and Prophets, Prophets and Kings, The Desire of Ages, The Acts of the Apostles, and The Great Controversy) correlated with selected chapters of the Bible. Outlines were provided for four different years of reading. In 1957 a similar plan was introduced for the reading of Ellen White's Messages to Young People along with certain correlated Bible references.

MV Bible Marking Plan. Sets of Bible references printed on gummed paper that could be cut apart and pasted beside Bible verses, thus guiding the reader from text to text in 20 different Bible studies. During its first three years of use (1959—1962) 86,500 sets of the MV Bible Marking Plan were distributed through the local MV departments.

Bible Schools and Institutes

BIBLE SCHOOLS AND INSTITUTES. Seventh-day Adventists use the term Bible School mostly in combination, as in Branch Bible School, Community Bible School, or Bible Correspondence School. However, in earlier years, when there were few Seventh-day Adventist colleges and academies, many short-term schools or institutes were held in various places, called Bible schools, biblical institutes, Bible reading institutes, or Bible training schools. These schools offered instruction in doctrines and evangelistic methods for ministers, Bible instructors, colporteurs, and laypeople wishing to enter such work. See Workers' Institutes.

Bible Students' Library

BIBLE STUDENTS' LIBRARY (1889—1915; monthly 1889—1899, quarterly 1899—1908, then irregular to 1915; PPPA). A series of pamphlets, designed for the public, containing brief and pointed essays on Bible doctrines, the fulfillment of prophecy, and other aspects of Seventh-day Adventist teachings. The 1915 catalog of publications listed 209 titles. Later the tracts were renumbered. In 1922 the series, which then contained 42 titles, was discontinued. M. C. Wilcox was chair of the editorial committee for a number of years.

Bible Studies (or Bible readings)

BIBLE STUDIES (or Bible readings). Topical presentations, usually in question (sometimes in outline) form with the answers read from the Bible—a method of Bible evangelism practiced extensively in the Seventh-day Adventist Church. From the 1880s the method was used systematically by ministers and Bible instructors, and also by lay members, in house-to-house visitation.

A Bible study may be completely informal, given in response to an inquiry on a specific subject; or it may be, and more often is, one of a progressive series of studies planned for the purpose of systematic instruction in Bible doctrines and Christian living or of preparation for baptism. Since Bible studies are usually given to an individual or a small group, they can be constructed with reference to the problems and questions of the individual and varied in order and difficulty according to the circumstances and the skill of the instructor. On the other hand, there are various series of published Bible studies, either in printed form or recorded on sound tape, complete with the Bible answers, which may be used along with filmstrips and portable projectors, and, more recently, on videotapes. These aids, which enable even inexperienced laypersons to present standardized courses of Bible study, include filmstrips and tapes keyed to the Twentieth Century Bible Correspondence Lessons, Friendship Bible Study Cards, Better Life Picture Roll, a Bible chain-marking plan, and the “My Bible Says” series of printed studies.

In 1883 the plan of conducting Bible studies was introduced to SDAs as a major method of evangelism, by S. N. Haskell, the “father of the Tract and Missionary Societies,” who at that time was the president of the California Conference. As he later told the story, he gave his first “Bible reading” during a southern California camp meeting held near Lemoore in May 1883. When a downpour of rain prevented his holding one of the regular meetings, he gathered a group around him in the center of the tent and began to announce texts of Scripture to be read by various persons in response to questions related to the subject under discussion. This method of communicating Bible teachings and Christian faith was received with enthusiasm and was endorsed by church members and leaders.

Two months later, also in southern California, two ministers, E. A. Briggs and M. C. Israel, joined with several colporteurs each morning for a Bible class, training themselves to use this new method. Haskell quotes one of these men as follows: “We have been having a drill on different subjects, and each person has a short form of Bible reading questions in his Bible, so when the Sabbath question or any other subject comes up, each one makes it a point to have the person or family visited get a Bible, and have the subject cleared up right from the Scriptures. In this way a controversy never arises; but the people are in almost every case convinced that the Bible teaches that doctrine. . . . I do not see why very many of our brethren and sisters may not be educated in this way to make efficient workers. By practice they could soon get so they would not have to look at the questions. They could get companies of neighbors together, and have prayer with them, and Bible-readings” (Review and Herald 60:486, July 31, 1883).

Haskell recommended that every family study the Bible in this way, and thus teach their children and others. When Haskell attended the Michigan Conference in September, and reported the success of Bible readings in California, Nebraska, and elsewhere, the conference voted approval of the plan for use by colporteurs, and a 10-day Bible Reading Institute was announced for Battle Creek, to begin Oct. 30, preceding the General Conference session. Haskell reported: "The subject of Bible readings has been one of interest on the Pacific Coast, and has been considered of that importance that there is a special department in that College [Healdsburg College] devoted to it. Those who have adopted this method in their colporteur work speak of it in the highest terms, as it avoids all discussion, and simply calls the attention of the people to the Word of God" (ibid. 60:649, Oct. 16, 1883).

To this institute Haskell invited ministers and licentiates, licensed colporteurs, and church officers, at least one from each church. He conducted such Bible studies at the institute and during the General Conference session.

The conference voted to recommend the Bible study method and proposed the publication, by a "Bible reading Bureau," of a monthly sheet containing one or more lessons for each week, to be sent out to those who would pay $1 a year and furnish one or more original readings each month; others were to pay $5 for the publication. This Bible-Reading Gazette was issued monthly through the year 1884. Afterward it was bound and sold as a book, and later was replaced by the much larger book still published, after many editions, as Bible Readings for the Home.

This same 1883 General Conference session recommended the establishment of "Missions" in the principal cities (see City Missions) as centers of evangelism. In the 1880s a number of these were opened, containing combination reading room, lecture hall, Tract and Missionary Society depot, and colporteur headquarters. In these missions the new method of giving Bible studies was used with excellent results, and the missions became training centers for workers, especially young women, in this method. Referred to as "Bible workers," they became what are now known as Bible instructors, full-time assistants to evangelists or pastors, carrying on personal evangelism mainly through Bible studies with individuals. Bible instructor training came to be offered in SDA colleges, and the giving of Bible studies by lay members has been encouraged, and training courses for laypersons have been offered in the churches.

Bible Training School

BIBLE TRAINING SCHOOL. A 16-page monthly devoted to the interests of house-to-house evangelism, edited by S. N. Haskell, first at New York, and afterward at South Lancaster, Massachusetts. It is listed in the General Conference Bulletin, second-third quarter 1902, as a denominational publication. The Yearbook lists it as a privately sponsored periodical from 1907 to 1913, after which the Yearbook no longer listed private periodicals.

Biblical Research Institute

BIBLICAL RESEARCH INSTITUTE. A service department of the General Conference established by action of the GC Committee on Sept. 25, 1975 (GCC 75—274). The purpose and goals of the institute are to (1) identify areas in which biblical research is needed in the Seventh-day Adventist Church; (2) conduct research in the Bible and related areas; (3) communicate the results of this research to the appropriate audiences; (4) assist the GC administration on matters of biblical interpretation, doctrines, and church trends; (5) serve the world field as a resource in the areas of biblical interpretation and doctrine; (6) evaluate manuscripts referred to it by the North American unions and the overseas divisions; (7) provide educational services in biblical studies and theology for pastors, Bible teachers, administrators, and other interested workers; (8) maintain contact with SDA seminaries; (9) foster and maintain contact and good relationships with the community of SDA scholars in biblical studies, theology, and related areas; and (10) provide a forum for the presentation and discussion of papers on biblical studies (BRIAD Committee, Feb 13, 1980).

The historical roots of the institute go back to two committees that functioned for many years independent of each other: the Biblical Study and Research Committee and the Defense Literature Committee. The Biblical Study and Research Committee was appointed by the Autumn Council on Sept. 24, 1952. The purpose of this committee was to encourage, organize, and coordinate biblical research and exegesis; to give guidance to persons who made what they considered to be significant discoveries of truth; and to examine manuscripts submitted to it for evaluation (Ministry, February 1953).

The Biblical Study and Research Committee was established when the Biblical Research Fellowship was being dissolved, and was to a certain extent to take its place. The fellowship was a self-appointed society of SDA Bible teachers organized in 1940 with the purpose of deepening the understanding of known truth and exploring other areas in which additional knowledge was needed. The new committee was to foster that interest in biblical research.

The Defense Committee, established in 1943, had basically an apologetic function answering publications against the church. In 1969 this committee and the Biblical Study Research Committee merged under the name Biblical Research Committee (Officers' Meeting 69—135). The objectives of this committee were stated as follows:

- “a. To explore new areas of truth.
- “b. To study question of biblical interpretation.
- “c. To review problems of biblical chronology.
- “d. To study and analyze problems of biblical translations.
- “e. To provide an agency for the examination of theological interpretations, ideas, and theories presented by laymen and/or church scholars.
- “f. To prepare materials as needed by the church in defense of truth and to recommend individuals for specific field assignments” (Officers' Meeting, Mar. 31, 1969 [69—135]).

This committee was only a study committee and did not have “final authority to speak for the church on theological or doctrinal matters” (ibid.).

The change from Biblical Research Committee to Biblical Research Institute facilitated employing persons trained in theology to work full-time with the director of the institute as associate directors. The institute is under the leadership of a GC field secretary and three other associate directors. All of them are trained in biblical or theological studies. In addition to an administrative committee, the institute works with two subcommittees. One of them deals with biblical and theological matters (BRICOM) and the other with the interaction of science and religion (BRISCO).

Since its inception, the institute has organized many Bible conferences around the world and in North America. The institute's work on biblical hermeneutics became the foundation of the North American Bible Conference in 1974. Under the leadership of the director of the institute, seven volumes were published, called the Daniel and Revelation Series (1982—1992). They address issues raised against the Adventist doctrine of the sanctuary and its prophetic interpretation during the late seventies and early eighties.

Chair/Secretaries/Directors: W. E. Read, 1952—1959; H. W. Lowe, 1959—1969; G. M. Hyde, 1969—1979; W. R. Leshner, 1979—1984; G. W. Reid, 1984— .

BIESDA (Border Institute of English, Seventh-day Adventist) Language Programs

BIESDA (BORDER INSTITUTE OF ENGLISH, SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST) LANGUAGE PROGRAMS. An evangelistic outreach school that teaches conversational English and Spanish to youth and adults along the Texas-Mexico border in Brownsville, Texas. It is part of the Texas Conference of Seventh-day Adventists.

In 1977 while conducting an evangelistic campaign in Korea, Cyril Miller, then president of the Texas Conference, became acquainted with the concept of English language school evangelism with student missionaries Dan Serns and Jeff Brown.

Two years later, in June 1979, the Texas Conference rented a building one block from Mexico in Brownsville, Texas, and began renovations. Within two weeks after the grand opening August 30, 1980, youth and adults had registered for the first two-month term. The original staff consisted of director Dan Serns, Bible worker Lillian Gonzalez, and student missionaries Jeff Brown, Danny Payan, and Bill Serns.

In 1980 BIESDA summer camp operated on the campus of Valley Grande Academy with 112 campers. In August a second school was opened in Hidalgo, followed by a third in Laredo in 1981. BIESDA was selected as one of the Sabbath school Investment projects in 1980, and money received was used to purchase the Brownsville school and office building.

Three students were baptized in BIESDA's first baptism in May of 1982. During the next three years BIESDA was productive evangelistically but suffered financially as the Mexican peso plunged in value more than 1,000 percent. BIESDA experimented with schools operated in Adventist churches in Houston, San Antonio, El Paso, Pharr, and Del Rio, Texas, as well as Reynosa and Mexico City, Mexico.

As the Mexican peso continued to decline in value in the late 1980s, all operations were closed except the Flagship School in Brownsville. In spite of difficulties during its first decade (1979—1988) BIESDA gave 110 student missionaries an opportunity to share their faith with 18,000 students, seeing 120 of them baptized into area churches.

Directors: Dan Serns, 1979—1984; Jeff Brown, 1984—1989; Rudy Juarez, 1989—1991; Jan Yakush, 1991—1992; Harvey Kornegay, 1992—1993; Randy Hart, 1993— .

Big Week

BIG WEEK. An annual one-week campaign devoted to the sale of Seventh-day Adventist publications by colporteurs. Originally church leaders and laypersons were encouraged to participate, and to turn over at least half, and if possible all, of the proceeds of their sales to missions; colporteurs were asked to contribute the sales of their biggest day. This plan was first tried in North Dakota in 1913 and was gradually adopted by other conferences in North America. In 1920 the Spring Council made it a part of the denomination's worldwide program. During the 1920s and early 1930s this week usually came during the month of April or May. It became associated with the Missions Extension Fund for important special projects in the worldwide work of the church. Big Week was discontinued about 1935 as a fund-raising project and became a week during which colporteurs were encouraged to put forth extra time and effort in the sale of SDA publications. In the churches a Missions Extension Offering, no longer necessarily derived from the sale of publications, is taken annually—now in the month of September (see Church Calendar). About 1944 Big Week was shifted from a week in April or May to a Week in the first half of September.

In 1944 he was called to serve as comptroller of Loma Linda University, in charge of financial affairs. Four years later he was elected president of the Oregon Conference, which position he held until 1959. From that time until his retirement, he was religious liberty secretary of the North Pacific Union.

BISHOP, FREDRICK W. (1864—1929). One of the pioneer colporteurs who opened Seventh-day Adventist work in Chile. He was born in England, and as a small child was brought to the United States by his mother. He became acquainted with SDA beliefs when someone invited him to attend the SDA church in San Francisco sometime in the 1880s. Soon after joining the church, he began selling books and then attended Healdsburg College. While there, F. L. Mead asked him if he would be willing to go to Chile, and without any knowledge of Spanish, he sailed there in 1894 in company with Thomas Davis. In 1897 he married a Chilean and remained in Chile, retiring from active canvassing in 1921.

Blake, Lottie C. Isbell

BLAKE, LOTTIE C. ISBELL (1876—1976). Physician. She began a career in teaching in Columbus, Ohio, in 1896, where she became a Seventh-day Adventist. Later, while studying nursing at Battle Creek, she was encouraged to become a doctor. She trained at the American Medical Missionary College, graduating in 1902. She began practicing in Nashville, Tennessee, as director of Rock City Sanitarium. A year later she organized a nurses' training program in Huntsville. In 1904 she was the only Black female physician practicing in Birmingham. The Blakes, parents of five children, engaged in team medical work in Central America and the Caribbean. After her husband's death, she moved back to Columbus, Ohio, and worked in general practice until 1957. She was honored by the AMA for 50 years of medical service.

Bland, William Thomas

BLAND, WILLIAM THOMAS (1862—1953). Educator and administrator. A Seventh-day Adventist since his youth, he was teaching in a public school when he was called to teach English language and literature at Battle Creek College about 1889. In 1893 he became the first principal of Mount Vernon Academy, Ohio, and in 1896 took charge of the Graysville, Tennessee, academy. From 1898 to 1901 he was president of Union College. In 1903 he was appointed acting treasurer of the General Conference and was placed in charge of the business transactions connected with the transfer of the Seventh-day Adventist headquarters to Washington, D.C. He assisted in the establishment of Washington Missionary College, Washington Sanitarium, and the Review and Herald Publishing Association. After that, he was principal of Fox River Academy for about a year until his retirement. His wife, Flora H. Bland, was acting secretary of the Sabbath School Department of the General Conference in 1903, and for many years was an active and inspiring leader in the educational and religious activities promoted by the SDA Church.

Blantyre Adventist Hospital

BLANTYRE ADVENTIST HOSPITAL. A 45-bed hospital started in 1956 as an outpatient extension of the Malamulo Hospital, 40 miles (65 kilometers) south of Blantyre, Malawi. It began in Limbe, five miles (eight kilometers) from Blantyre and moved to the present location in 1958. From being a single-doctor outpatient facility it has now grown to seven full-time staff physicians and four courtesy staff.

In 1964 a dental practice was started by Dr. Ben Nelson. This was carried on in temporary quarters on the second floor of the clinic building. In 1968 an extension to the existing facility was added and a compact two-operatory dental unit was located on the main floor. In 1974 a second dentist arrived, and the clinic was extensively remodeled to provide four dental operatories.

In 1974 Drs. Elton and Rheeta Stecker purchased a house that they converted into a 10-bed hospital, with one bed in the labor ward and operating room. This brought a lot of professional satisfaction, as the doctors could not admit their patients anywhere else. In 1983, 14 more beds were added, and another doctor was called to make it a two-physician practice. There was a felt need for a health education building, and funding was sought. The Scandinavian ADRA provided the funds.

Today adjacent to the hospital is a beautiful building where “Breathe Free, weight control, stress control, vegetarian cooking, and prenatal classes” are held.

The hospital provides X-ray services, ultrasound diagnostics in both medicine and obstetrics/gynecology, endoscopy services, and general medical care.

A large donation was received from the Blantyre business community for the expansion of the in-patient facility. In 1993 this project was in progress. It would provide the hospital with an additional 14 beds.

Blue Mountain Academy

BLUE MOUNTAIN ACADEMY. A coeducational secondary school for boarding students situated on 750 acres (300 hectares) of rolling farm and woodland at the base of the Blue Mountain Range of the Appalachians, three miles (five kilometers) west of Hamburg, Pennsylvania. It is owned and operated by the Pennsylvania Conference. The student enrollment in 1993 was 210; total school staff, 36 (teachers and administration, 25; industry management, vocational and clerical staff, 11). The school is approved by the Department of Public Instruction for the state of Pennsylvania, and is accredited by the Middle State Association of Colleges and Secondary Schools.

Industries include the farm, dairy, cafeteria, and literature evangelism. In 1990 an on-campus industry was added and housed in an expanded industrial arts building for the express purpose of providing student employment. The students fold, price-tag, and package garments and plasticware. This industry employs half the student body.

The forerunner of Blue Mountain Academy was Philadelphia Academy, established as a senior academy in 1939 and operated until the spring of 1945 in the German church building. In the autumn of 1946 the school was moved to a newly purchased property in Overbrook. The last class graduated from Philadelphia Academy in the spring of 1955. Blue Mountain Academy opened its doors to students that fall.

The history of Blue Mountain Academy goes back to July 4, 1948, when the East Pennsylvania Conference, at its fifteenth biennial session, voted to establish and maintain a boarding academy. It created an educational expansion committee, which appointed three committees (locating, financing, and publicity) to execute the establishment of the academy. In August 1948 the actions of the educational committee were presented to the churches of the East Pennsylvania Conference for approval. When the plans were approved, the constituency pledged 96 percent of the needed amount to build.

On January 28, 1954, groundbreaking ceremonies took place, and construction began on the cafeteria building. In the autumn of 1955 the school opened with the following buildings: the south wing of the girls' dormitory, the north and south wings of the boys' dormitory, the cafeteria building, a sewage disposal plant, and a Quonset building. The north wing of the boys' dormitory was used as a temporary administration building, classrooms, library, chapel, and music studios. Opening enrollment was 143.

Additional construction since 1955 includes a new farm shop (1959); administration building containing classrooms, auditorium, library, Music Department, administrative offices (1961); three new faculty homes (1961); remodeling of the north wing of the boys' dormitory to be used as residence hall, second floor for the boys and the first floor for girls (1961); additional faculty home (1963); a 10-acre (four-hectare) athletic field (1964); a north wing of the girls' dormitory (1966); a gymnasium/auditorium (1967); an airfield and new dairy complex (1970).

The 2,800-foot (850-meter) sod runway, located south of the gymnasium and the athletic fields, is lighted and has tie-down facilities. Flight training is given in the academy-owned Cessna 150. After 23 years the flight program has logged 8,000 accident- and incident-free hours and has produced 67 private pilots.

The dairy farm cultivates 400 acres (160 hectares); it milks 130 head, with a yearly production average per cow of 18,500 pounds. The Industrial Arts Department was established in 1965.

Beginning in 1974, a vocational and career diploma was established. Vocational and career certificates are offered in several areas and are designed to provide the basic experience, knowledge, and skills necessary for a student to be able to obtain at least an entry-level position upon graduation. Each student completes up to 37.5 semester hours of additional classwork and as many as 350 hours of work experience to earn a certificate. Certificates offered are: Private Pilot, Office Skills, Auto Mechanics, and Auto Body.

In 1991 the school established a service program to enhance its mission statement objective of providing a Christ-centered Seventh-day Adventist education that leads youths into lives of service for God. The student body participates in 15 different community outreach projects throughout the year by dividing the student body into 15 family groups.

Boettcher, Julius Theodor

BOETTCHER, JULIUS THEODOR (1865—1931). Minister, administrator. He was born in Lindenwerder, Germany, and at the age of 14 was confirmed a member of the Lutheran Church. He came to the United States in 1881. Influenced by his sister and W. B. Hill, he accepted the Seventh-day Adventist faith in 1885. He spent the school year 1885—1886 in Battle Creek College and began preaching in the Ohio Conference. In 1889 he accepted a call to work in Germany. In 1890 he was ordained in Oberweil, Switzerland.

In 1894 Boettcher returned to America. For a short time he carried on evangelistic work in Minnesota and Ohio, then became head of the German Department in Union College, where he remained for seven years. In 1901 he was invited to return to Europe as president of the German-Swiss Conference, transferring in 1905 to the South German Conference, and in 1907 he was appointed leader of the work in Russia. Beginning in 1911, he served as vice president of the European Division.

Boettcher remained in Russia until forced to leave by the exigencies of World War I in 1916. Soon after his return to the United States, he was invited to teach Bible in the Clinton Theological Seminary at Clinton, Missouri. At the 1918 General Conference session in San Francisco he was appointed head of the German work in North America. He held this position until 1930, when failing health forced him to retire.

Bogenhofen Seminary

BOGENHOFEN SEMINARY (Seminar Schloss Bogenhofen). A coeducational boarding school on the secondary level, but offering programs on the junior/senior college level in theology and in German as a foreign language. The school, which is operated by the Austrian and the Swiss unions, in the Euro-Africa Division, is located in the small upper Austrian village of Bogenhofen, close to Braunau am Inn at the German border, 40 miles (65 kilometers) from Salzburg, 80 miles (130 kilometers) from Munich, and 180 miles (290 kilometers) from Vienna. It serves not only the Austrian Union but also, since 1953, the Swiss Union, by accepting students from the German Swiss Conference. The average enrollment is 100, with a staff of 12.

The school accommodates students from countries all over the world, and since 1968 has been connected with the ACA (Adventist Colleges Abroad) Program.

The following programs are offered: theology and religion (four years); Bible for high school graduates and lay workers (one year); high school (four years), leading to the Matura or Abitur, necessary for entrance into any European university; German for foreigners (one or two years). Since 1961 the German Language Department has been authorized by the Goethe Institute in Munich to teach German to foreign students and to award diplomas on three levels.

The 18-acre (7.3-hectare) school property, purchased in 1949 by the Austrian Union Conference with help from the then Southern European Division, includes a fifteenth-century castle under state protection as a historical monument. Classes opened on Nov. 30, 1949, with 22 students and a four-year curriculum consisting of the following programs: theology, general education, commercial courses, prenursing, and home economics.

The school has also owned a farm, vegetable gardens, and a factory (Optimo), manufacturing bedsteads and mattresses, enabling students to learn useful skills while earning money to defray educational expenses. F. Pieringer, the first principal of the institution, established a program combining the religious aspect of learning with the manual. The rural setting of the school helped to implement this goal. The growing enrollment necessitated the erection of various school buildings in the late 1950s and 1960s. Two modern dormitories were built recently. The Theological Seminary, established by F. Pieringer and H. Heinz, now offers classes at the senior college level on a provisional basis until full accreditation is granted. More than 80 percent of the Seventh-day Adventist pastors in Austria and more than 50 percent of those in German-speaking Switzerland have received their ministerial training at Bogenhofen Seminary. A number of pastors who attended the school have served as missionaries in French-speaking central Africa.

During the summer vacations the school is open for junior camps, conferences, and offers an intensive six-week German language course at different levels for foreigners. The summer language program is also affiliated with ACA.

Principals: Ferdinand Pieringer, 1949—1954; Paul Steiner, 1954—1957; Herbert Stöger, 1957—1961; R. J. Buyck, 1961—1963; Hans Heinz, 1963—1970; Horst Herrnstein, 1970—1974; Otto Riegler, 1974—1983; Klaus Zachhuber, 1983—1990; Franz Nusime, 1990— .

Boliu Hospital

BOLIU HOSPITAL. A 24-bed medical institution located on Mussau Island, Papua New Guinea. It was established in 1955. The 1977 Yearbook listed two workers, Samuel and Esther Kangai. At that time it operated only as a small clinic and, in 1978, was taken over by the government.

Bolivia

BOLIVIA. A landlocked republic situated in the heart of the South American continent, bounded on the east and north by Brazil, on the west by Peru and Chile, and on the south by Argentina and Paraguay. It has an area of 424,160 square miles (1,100,000 square kilometers) and a population (1994) of 7.7 million.

About 55 percent of the people are Indians (largely Aymarás and Quechuas), 30 percent are mixed European and Indian (called cholos), and 15 percent are European, mainly of Spanish descent. This division is largely cultural; an Indian leaving a tribe and learning Spanish is classed as a cholo, and many classed as European have traces of Indian ancestry.

In general, the cholos are tradespeople, skilled workers, and minor civil servants; and the Indians are mainly laborers. Spanish is the official language of the country, but Aymará and Quechua are spoken by large numbers of Indians in the mountainous region around Lake Titicaca. Besides these two principal Indian languages, there are 28 tribal dialects that have been discovered by the Wycliffe Bible Translators. La Paz, where the executive and legislative branches of government reside, is the de facto capital, though the legal capital, where the judiciary branch resides, is Sucre. The state recognizes and supports the Roman Catholic religion, but since 1906 the constitution has provided for religious toleration. Ninety-five percent of the population professes Roman Catholicism, and of the remaining five percent more than 87,000 (1992) are Seventh-day Adventists, the rest being principally Presbyterians, Methodists, and Baptists.

There are three distinct and widely divergent geographical regions: (1) the Altiplano plateau between two ranges of the Andes Mountains, averaging 12,000 feet (3,650 meters) in elevation, comprising about two fifths of the land area of the republic, but containing three fourths of the population; (2) the yungas region, consisting of small valleys and steep mountain slopes on the eastern side of the Andes; and (3) the lowland plains, occupying the eastern portion of the country. Although Bolivia is entirely within the tropics, differences in elevation result in climates that may be described as arctic in the Altiplano, temperate in the yungas, and tropical in the lowlands. Bolivia is chiefly a mining country and is one of the world's largest exporters of tin. However, less than two percent of the population engage in tin mining. Most of the people (about two thirds) are agricultural workers.

Historical Background

Historical Background. The earliest history of what is now Bolivia is a matter of dispute, but it seems certain that in pre-Inca times a highly developed civilization flourished around the region of Lake Titicaca, as is evidenced by the ruins of Tiahuanaco. The Incas extended their empire into Bolivia long before the arrival of the Spaniards. Upper or Alto Peru, as it was called until 1559, fell to Gonzalo and Hernando Pizarro in 1538. The discovery of enormous silver deposits at Potosí brought a great influx of Spaniards, so that Potosí became the largest city in the Western Hemisphere and held this distinction until Mexico City surpassed it in the eighteenth century. The rule of the Spaniards was so oppressive that revolts erupted from time to time, the most notable one occurring in 1780. All of them except the last one were ruthlessly suppressed by the Spaniards. In 1776 Bolivia (called the audiencia of Charcas from 1559 to 1776) was transferred to the vice-royalty of La Plata, with headquarters in Buenos Aires. An uprising in 1809, led by Josè Domingo Murillo, was crushed, but the country did win independence Aug. 6, 1825, under the leadership of Gen. Antonio de Sucre, with the assistance of Gen. Simón Bolívar and Gen. Josè de San Martín. The new republic was named Bolivia in honor of Bolívar, and Sucre became its first president. The ensuing history of the country was disturbed by corrupt and autocratic administrations and disastrous military adventures. A war with Chile from 1879 to 1883 ended in the loss of Bolivia's region along the coast. A revolt of Brazilian rubber workers in 1899 led to the ceding of the territory of Acre to Brazil in 1903. But the costliest campaign of all was the Chaco War with Paraguay from 1932 to 1935, in which Bolivia lost most of the Chaco. Recent years have seen progress toward a stable democratic government and economic self-sufficiency.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. The territory of Bolivia constitutes the East Bolivia Mission and West Bolivia Mission, a part of the Inca Union Mission, which in turn is part of the South American Division. Statistics (1992): East Bolivia Mission: churches, 37; members, 19,161; elementary schools, 9; ordained ministers, 14; licensed ministers, 5; credentialed missionaries, 10. Headquarters are at Santa Cruz de la Sierra. West Bolivia Mission: churches, 149; members, 67,883; elementary schools, 80; ordained ministers, 27; licensed ministers, 18; credentialed missionaries, 9. Headquarters are at La Paz.

SDA Work

SDA Work. Beginnings. Bolivia was the last of the countries of the South American Division in which SDAs established their work (Revista Adventista 7:5, June 1907). However, as early as the middle of 1897, SDA literature was being sold in that country by Juan S. Pereira, a former Presbyterian colporteur. The Missionary Magazine for January 1899 reported: "The last message has been taken to Bolivia by a colporteur named Pereira. He took of our [SDA] books, Patriarchs and Prophets and Steps to Christ. He was a former colporteur for the Presbyterians who have a Bible Society established in Valparaiso, but he was discharged from their service for propagating Seventh-day Adventist doctrine, as was made public in the annual calendar of the society. Brother Pereira went to Bolivia at his own expense. He was arrested at the instigation of a priest for selling bad books. At his request the books were examined and pronounced not bad, whereupon he was released with the official advice to leave the country. However, he remained and continued his work for 18 months. Word has just arrived that he has returned to the north of Chile. I hope to give fuller particulars later. This brother has not yet fully identified himself with us, not having received baptism yet, as he said he was not ready.”

Sometime later, after Pereira had left Bolivia, it came to light that while in that country, he had been imprisoned and condemned to death through the influence of the Roman clergy, but had miraculously escaped death through the help of a judge, Dr. J. Suárez Mirando, who later became interested in SDA teachings (Revista Adventista 7:5, 6, June 1907; 35:8, November 1935).

The next attempt at conducting colporteur work was made in the fall of 1902, when Edward W. Thomann and José Luis Escobar went to Bolivia to canvass in La Paz, Cochabamba, and Oruro. Although persecution broke out, the itinerary was a success, the canvassers selling about 1,000 copies of Señales de los Tiempos (“Signs of the Times”) in La Paz alone. However, the work was not followed up, probably because of lack of religious freedom (ibid. 2:8, November 1902; 35:8, Dec. 9, 1935). In 1906 toleration of all religions was guaranteed by the Bolivian constitution, and in March of that year plans were laid for establishing work in Bolivia (ibid. 6:3, April 1906). Pereira, who had nearly lost his life a few years before, was among the first to volunteer “to lift the banner of God there” (ibid. 6:3, August 1906; 6:4, October 1906) through the sale of books.

First Missionaries. Early in June 1907, Thomann and his wife were sent to Bolivia to direct the work. They arrived in Oruro, Bolivia, where they met several persons who had become interested in the SDA doctrines through the reading of books they had purchased from Pereira (ibid. 7:4, August 1907). From Oruro the Thomanns went to Cochabamba, where they settled and worked not only for the Spanish people but also for the Quechua and Aymará Indians (ibid. 9:13, September 1909; 11:10, August 1909). At the end of July 1909 they left for Chile (ibid. 9:13, September 1909). Ferdinand A. Stahl, the new mission superintendent, arrived in La Paz with his wife and daughter about a week before the Thomanns left (F. A. Stahl, In the Land of the Incas, p. 62). Although he was unable to speak the language, Stahl began medical work among the higher class Bolivians before the end of the year (Revista Adventista 9:13, December 1909). Later he and Mrs. Stahl opened medical work among the Indians of Bolivia (ibid. 11:10, August 1911).

About a year after the Stahls arrived in La Paz, Otto H. Schulz came from the United States to do canvassing work (ibid. 11:9, January 1911). A few months later Ignacio Kalbermatter and his wife arrived from Paraguay to canvass as well as to assist the Stahls in medical work (ibid. 11:10, April 1911; 11:10, August 1911; 14:13, 14, February 1914).

Early in 1911 Stahl held an open-air meeting with Juan Huanacca, an SDA Indian from Peru, who served as his interpreter (ibid. 11:10, 11, May 1911; 11:10, June 1911; 11:10, 11, August 1911). As a result, a widow, Rosa N. Doering, was baptized on Aug. 7, 1912, as the first Bolivian to become a Seventh-day Adventist (ibid. 11:11, 12, August 1911; 11:12, September 1911; 11:10, October 1911; 12:14, November 1912; 13:12, February 1913). A Baptist youth (ibid. 11:12, September 1911; 13:12, February 1913), José Cristobal Gómez, attended the same meetings and later joined the SDA Church by profession of faith. In 1913 Gómez canvassed with Schulz in the villages of Viacha and Corocoro and in the cities of Oruro and Cochabamba, selling the book Salud y Hogar (“Health and Home”) and the magazine Salud y Vida (“Health and Life”) (ibid. 13:12, September 1913; 13:14, November 1913; 14:14, January 1914).

In July 1911 Stahl was temporarily assigned to Plateria, Peru, to develop medical work among the Aymará Indians, while Kalbermatter remained in La Paz, apparently as acting superintendent (ibid. 11:16, July 1911; 11:10, August 1911; 11:12, September 1911; 11:16, October 1911; 15:9, June 1915). Later that same year Stahl's temporary assignment became permanent (ibid. 11:16, October 1911), but it was two years before a new director could be sent to take his place in La Paz. In 1914 W. R. Pohle replaced Stahl as the new director of the Bolivia Mission (ibid. 14:10, July 1914).

The first Sabbath school in the Aymará dialect was organized in 1913, on Potosí Street in the city of La Paz. However, because of the harmful effects of the high elevation of the Altiplano on the health of many of the missionaries, several of the workers were forced to leave Bolivia (ibid. 16:16, April-May 1916), resulting in a much smaller increase in membership than had been hoped, an increase from seven to only 15 between 1914 and 1919.

Indian Work. In 1920 Reid Shepard, who had been working at Puno, Peru, with F. A. Stahl, was sent to work among the Indians of Bolivia (ibid. 19:7, November 1919; 20:13, June 3, 1920). A few weeks after his arrival, he introduced himself to the minister of public instruction. In the course of the conversation the minister said, "I have in Pucarani [near Lake Titicaca] a normal school I have established to train teachers for the Indians. I will gladly turn over this school to your mission" (ibid. 20:13, June 3, 1920). Thinking that perhaps the minister did not fully understand the objectives of SDA work, Shepard replied, "You must remember, Mr. Minister, that as Protestants we cannot teach the Catholic religion in our educational work. Instead of it we teach the religion of our church" (ibid.). To this the minister replied, "I don't mind that; on the contrary, it [the SDA religion] is much better" (ibid.). The result of this interview was that at Rosario within six months the first SDA mission school in Bolivia was established (ibid. 21:11, Jan. 21, 1921; 29:8, January 1929). But severe opposition, which characterized the next 12 years of work in Bolivia, arose immediately. The first national missionaries in Bolivia came from the school at Rosario. Among these were Feliciano Chuquimia, Manuel Mamani, Domingo Chuquimia, Ignacio Mamani, and Ramón Chuquimia, who went out to preach the gospel in various provinces of the Department of La Paz.

Persecution and Hardships. In 1924 in response to a request by Chipana, Juan Pati, Francisco Mamani, and Melchor Mamani, Indians from the village of Collana, that a missionary be sent to them, Isaac C. Schneider went to open the mission station of Collana, assisted by an interpreter, Marcos Zenteno. This was the second Seventh-day Adventist mission station to be established in Bolivia. As the work progressed, persecution again arose. The wells of the mission were filled with dirt, and the buildings were either destroyed or damaged. In response to a request for help, a unit of cavalry was sent by the government to supervise the rebuilding of the damaged buildings by those who had harmed them. The worker's house and the storeroom reconstructed at that time are still in use. Chief Pedro Tambo, urged on by religious leaders, brought suit against the SDAs, claiming that the work was prejudicial to the community. His sudden death ended his opposition.

In 1926 an incident took place that left an indelible mark on the memory of Bolivian SDAs. One night a mob led by religious fanatics beat into unconsciousness Manuel Quilca, the teacher of the school in Arca in Inquisivi province, and burned down his home. His wife likewise was beaten until she was unconscious. C. H. Baker, an SDA missionary who visited the Quilca family about a week after the incident, reported that “alone in the house, which was already ablaze, was the daughter of the teacher. She also had been wounded, but before the fire reached her, she was rescued. Beaten and bruised by clubs, the little body welcomed death as a sweet release, and the end came the following morning” (South American Bulletin 2:6, October 1926).

In the following years, as Quilca reflected upon this experience he found compensation in the fact that some of those who burned his house and murdered his daughter had accepted Christ.

About three years after the founding of Collana Mission Station, David E. Dalinger and his wife established a station near the village of Quime in the valley of Inquisivi, the third mission station to be established in Bolivia. Although they were beset by hardships and the loss of one of their children through disease, they were able to gain many friends and converts among the Indians. Other missionaries have also lost children while engaged in mission service. In little more than a year the Schneiders lost their two little daughters.

At the beginning of 1929 the Colegio Adventista de Bolivia (the Bolivia Training School) was organized on the grounds of the Collana Mission Station, with Leon Replogle as its first director and with Mariano E. Huayllara as a teacher. After two years the school was moved to Carcajes and then to Vinto in the Department of Cochabamba. From its beginning, this institution has provided the Bolivian field with workers and teachers.

The same year that the Bolivia Training School was established, the first Seventh-day Adventist camp meeting was held at Collana Mission Station and was attended by some 600 SDAs, who lived as far away as four days' walking distance from the campgrounds. This number represented nearly half the SDA membership of 1,400 in Bolivia that year. Nearly all related experiences of persecution through which they had passed (Revista Adventista 29:6, Mar. 25, 1929).

Medical Work. Seventh-day Adventist medical work was placed on a firm footing with the arrival of Dr. H. E. Butka in 1929, who was put in charge of Chulumani Mission Station, the fourth SDA mission station to be established in Bolivia. His subsequent medical and missionary work became well known throughout the nation and did much to lessen the persecution that had impeded SDA work in Bolivia (ibid. 29:8, October 1929; 31:9, Aug. 10, 1931). The local authorities were so impressed by his work that they built a hospital for him in 1931, which has been called Hospital Adventista Chulumani.

In 1937 the Ministry of Public Health of Bolivia assumed ownership of the hospital and leased it to the Bolivia Mission, which operated it until 1970, when it was returned to the government.

The beginning of the Chaco War (1932—1935) marked the end of active persecution of SDAs in Bolivia, and as a result SDAs began to make significant gains. In 1919 there was but one church and 15 members in Bolivia. By 1931 these figures had increased to seven churches and 1,905 members. But in 1936, only five years later, these figures had increased to 20 churches and a total of 2,801 members.

In 1936 Hospital Chulumani was closed because the Bolivia Mission thought it advisable to discontinue operating the hospital under existing arrangements with the government. The mission offered instead to lease it for 25 years. On hearing of these plans, a Roman Catholic priest secured a German medical doctor and offered to pay the Bolivian government 12 times as much for the lease as the SDAs had offered. Nevertheless, SDAs got the lease.

Contracting acute appendicitis three years later, the priest was operated on by an SDA doctor at Chulumani Hospital. Recovering, he was so impressed by the Christian treatment he had received from the doctor and the nurses that he stopped his opposition and later publicly offered a dinner to the doctor and his family as a gesture of grateful appreciation. This change of attitude is typical of the change that has come over many former enemies of SDA work in Bolivia (ibid. 38:10, June 13, 1938; 38:9, July 11, 1938; 41:12, June 9, 1941; 45:15, Oct. 29, 1945).

In 1946 Dr. Harry T. Pitman, then medical director of the Chulumani Hospital, took charge of the newly built Guayaramerin Hospital (Hospital Adventista Guayaramerin) at Guayaramerin (Puerto Sucre) on the Mamore (Madera) River. In order to take care of these two hospitals so far apart, he purchased two war surplus airplanes. On his first flight he and his Polish pilot were killed instantly when their plane crashed on the side of Tunari Mountain, near Cochabamba. Dr. Pitman was buried at Cochabamba, and later a cenotaph was built at Bolivia Training School at Vinto in his honor and as a reminder of his sacrifice. The Guayaramerin Hospital was then leased by the Bolivia government to Dr. Elmer Bottsford, a missionary doctor who operated it until 1951. It was leased later to the Bolivia Mission from 1961 to 1967.

Recent Developments. After several attempts to establish a medical missionary institution in the Bolivian territory, the La Paz Adventist Clinic opened its doors in 1989, occupying a three-story building purchased for this purpose in the district of Miraflores. In Santa Cruz de la Sierra, in east Bolivia, a small ambulatory clinic was opened in 1990.

Other events that demonstrate recent progress:

1. The increase in baptisms, reaching a total of 87,044 members in 1992.
2. At the end of 1992, there was one SDA for every 89 in the population.
3. An increase in academic preparation of Bolivian workers through higher education.
4. The development of a solid SDA educational system, including maintaining many elementary schools, and since 1991 the founding of an SDA University.
5. An outstanding increase in social assistance through ADRA, distributing each year hundreds of tons of food and clothing to the destitute.
6. The development of a mission launch program in the wide northeast area of Bolivia.
7. The emphasis on developing urban work, which should help reach those in higher socioeconomic levels, thus providing greater resources to this field where the work has developed largely in rural areas.

Bolivia Adventist Educational Complex

BOLIVIA ADVENTIST EDUCATIONAL COMPLEX (Complejo Educativo Adventista de Bolivia). A coeducational boarding school on the secondary level situated on 80 acres (32 hectares) of land at an elevation of 9,000 feet (2,750 meters) above sea level, at Vinto, Province of Quillacollo, Department of Cochabamba, Bolivia. It is owned and operated by the Bolivia Mission and serves the Seventh-day Adventist constituency in Bolivia. In 1993 there were 399 students and 36 teachers.

The school was created on Oct. 24—26, 1928, in the Bolivia Mission. It began its activities on Apr. 2, 1929, in Collana in La Paz, and was named Bolivia Adventist Industrial Institute. On July 9, 1931, it received official accreditation for the operation of an elementary school. In 1932 it was moved to Carcajes in Cochabamba, where it operated for 16 years, relocating in 1949 to Vinto, where it still is. Its name was changed to Colegio Adventista de Bolivia (Bolivia Training School).

On Mar. 16, 1952, by a resolution of the Ministry of Education, the Teacher Training School authorized the operation of a normal rural private school, by which six years of secondary instruction are offered, as well as six years of primary instruction. A later agreement in 1957 allowed the school board to create an Industrial Department, in conjunction with the work plan, which embraces training (largely practical) in carpentry, plumbing, mechanics, tractor farming, cattle raising, culinary art, sewing, and decorating. A four-year teachers' course was offered, following the primary course, for those preparing to teach in the rural SDA schools. Later, the school was authorized to offer, instead of the rural normal course, a three-year college-level course in elementary education. In 1987 an accounting and secretary school was added.

In 1991 the institution became Bolivia Adventist University (BAU) by Supreme Court Resolution. BAU began its activities on Aug. 27, 1991. In 1992 the church changed the name to Bolivia Adventist Educational Complex (BAEC).

BOND, C. LESTER (1888—1971). Youth leader, administrator. Bond was a native of California and received his education at Pacific Union College. Upon graduation he began his ministry in the Arizona Conference, and later served in several California conferences and Cuba. He joined the General Conference Missionary Volunteer Department in 1927 and served as an associate secretary until 1946. Under his leadership the JMV classes and the MV Honors were expanded and refined. He wrote the JMV Handbook, which was for many years the official guidebook for the JMV classwork. He became known as “Mr. JMV” because of his untiring work for juniors and his interest in the junior camp program. His book, Ideals for Juniors, an extremely popular volume, expands and explains the JMV Pledge and Law.

After 18 years of service to youth, Bond accepted a call to the Upper Columbia Conference, where he served first as Book and Bible House manager and then as president for eight years until his retirement in 1957.

Bond, Frank Starr

BOND, FRANK STARR (1876—1924). Pioneer Seventh-day Adventist worker in Spain. He was a member of a family that contributed several workers to the church, among them C. Lester Bond, youth leader and author. His father, James Monroe Bond, a descendant of Oregon pioneers, was a farmer in Stanislaus County in California when his uncle, Seth, a convert of J. N. Loughborough, came to tell his brother of his new beliefs. Joining the SDAs, James Bond left farming and became a physician. His son Frank determined early in life to become a minister. After graduation from Healdsburg College, California, where he studied theology (1893—1899), he preached in Arizona and worked among Spanish-speaking settlers. In 1902 he and his brother Walter volunteered to pioneer SDA work in Spain, arriving there in 1903. In 1905 he returned to the U.S. to marry Mrs. Martha Farnsworth, then continued serving in the Iberian field as an evangelist and as a leader until 1923, when poor health caused his retirement. He was ordained to the ministry in 1907 in Gland, Switzerland.

Bond, Walter Guy

BOND, WALTER GUY (1879—1914). Pioneer Seventh-day Adventist worker in Spain. He was born in California, where his parents became SDAs when he was a child. Near the turn of the century he was preaching in California and, as some reports indicate, among the Spanish-speaking settlers in Arizona. In 1902 he and his brother Frank volunteered to go to Spain to pioneer SDA work there. Before leaving the U.S., he married Leola Gerow. They arrived in Barcelona, Spain, in June 1903, and later that year he with his brother Frank opened a boys' school in the town of Sabadell nearby. From then until his death in 1914, with the exception of one year (1904—1905), he directed SDA work in Spain, establishing churches in several places and preaching in many places. He died from peritonitis while on a missionary journey.

Bonfoey, Clarissa M.

BONFOEY, CLARISSA M. (1821—1856). Housekeeper for Ellen G. White. On the death of her parents in 1849, she proposed that she share with the Whites the furniture she had inherited, live with them, and assist in the housework. For eight years she gave devoted service, traveling with them on occasion, and sometimes caring for the children while the Whites were away. Ellen G. White writes of her in most appreciative terms (LS 123; 2SG 113).

Bongo Adventist Seminary

BONGO ADVENTIST SEMINARY (formerly Bongo Mission Training School). A former coeducational boarding school on the junior high school level, operated by the Angola Union Mission in the Euro-Africa Division. It shared the same campus with the Bongo Mission and the Bongo Mission Hospital.

The forerunner of the Bongo Mission Training School was an elementary school opened soon after the founding of the Bongo Mission in April 1924. During the first year, 15 to 20 students from 5 to 50 years of age attended classes for an hour each day on a porch that served as a shelter for the carpenters. In 1925 after the arrival of D. P. Harder, the Bongo school was conducted in a more organized way. A temporary building was constructed in which Artur de Oliveira taught classes four hours a day.

In January 1927 the school moved into a brick building, and a class in teaching methods, conducted by Mrs. A. N. Tonge, was begun. This same year a student named Daniel Cahangala took the government examination and became the first African Seventh-day Adventist worker in Angola.

Because of increasing enrollments, a new school building was erected in 1941. New girls' (1954) and boys' (1962) dormitories replaced the old adobe buildings. From the beginning, agriculture held an important place in the curriculum. From this source students could earn almost enough to meet their expenses.

In addition to five years of elementary schooling, the teachers' course included two years of secondary training plus three years of Bible instruction and related subjects. The average attendance was 300.

Because of the political situation, the school was moved to Huambo. In January 1992, during the terrible events of the war, the buildings were totally destroyed. There are plans to rebuild Bongo Adventist Seminary as soon as peace is established.

Principals: D. P. Harder, 1925—1927; Mrs. A. N. Tonge, 1927—1931; O. I. Fields, 1931—1942; I. D. Higgins, 1942—1944; W. M. Webster, 1944—1948; E. V. Hermanson, 1948—1950; E. L. Jewell, 1950—1951; A.J.S. Casaca, 1951—1952; J. M. Miranda, 1952—1954; J. A. Morgado, 1954—1955; M. S. Castro, 1955—1956; Dr. Roy B. Parsons, 1956—1959; Frank Dietrich, 1959—1964; A. C. Lopes, 1964—1965; J. E. Rodrigues, 1965; A. Mauricio, 1965—1969; J.P.F. Sincer, 1969—1971; Dr. David Parsons, 1971—1972; D. L. Cordas, 1972—1975; Teodoro Elias, 1984—1992.

Bongo Mission Hospital

BONGO MISSION HOSPITAL. Operated until 1975 as a 101-bed general hospital, located at Bongo Mission, Lépi, Angola, and organized as an institution of the Angola Union.

In October 1926 Dr. A. N. Tonge arrived to begin the medical work among the Ovimbundu people, where the Lépi mission station had been opened only two years before by J. D. Baker and his wife. Mrs. Baker, a nurse, had begun a small dispensary for the local people. Dr. Tonge treated his first patients on the veranda of the director's house. Later, when his own house was ready, the doctor used his bathroom, which had an outside entrance, as the dispensary. In 1928 the first building was finished, housing the office and a dispensary. Two small separate buildings were added later. These served as wards and were followed by a new dispensary. All these facilities were permanent.

Dr. Tonge remained at Bongo until February 1930, when he was called to serve as medical secretary of the Southern African Division.

Bongo Dispensary and Hospital remained under the care of nurses, first Ina Moore and then, for a short time, Ruth Johnson, until the arrival of Dr. Roy B. Parsons on Dec. 1, 1931. He had spent 18 months in Portugal learning the language and getting his Portuguese degree to practice medicine.

In 1938 construction was begun to enlarge the patient accommodations, a program that continued until 1955. The original buildings were incorporated into new structure, with additional construction, to bring the bed capacity up to 101. A new dispensary was built in 1945. The new unit included separate buildings for a kitchen, laboratory-pharmacy, laundry, electric-light plant, surgical unit, and dairy. Except for the surgical unit of the hospital, funds for construction were all furnished by income from the European patients and small donations by friends.

The financial maintenance of the hospital and dispensary continued to depend on income from patients. This included all salaries and expenses, except the director's salary, since 1950. In 1973 the dispensary had an average of 10,249 new African patients a year, and the European consultations averaged 4,524 new patients annually. The hospital admissions for 1973 totaled 3,369.

In 1968, after more than 35 years of medical work in Angola (many of those who came from all parts of the country to seek his professional skill became SDAs), Dr. Roy Parsons retired, and his son, Dr. David Parsons, who also held a Portuguese degree, became medical director. Another son, Robert Parsons, was a laboratory technician. Mrs. David Parsons was the director of nurses. In 1972 Dr. Gideon Marques, followed by Dr. Helio Rocumback in 1973, joined the staff. Both doctors were from Brazil. In 1974 the new X-ray Department began to function, with James Holder as technician.

Because of political circumstances, the hospital was closed in 1975. Until 1980 medical care was provided by qualified nurses because of the lack of doctors. In 1980 Dr. Ferran Sabate, from Spain, his wife, and nurse Victoria Duarte reopened and ran the hospital until 1983, when they were kidnapped by the UNITA. The hospital was closed, and local nurses continued offering treatment to the population.

In 1985 Dr. Otello Vergeres from Switzerland and Dr. Roberto Va from Germany resumed medical service at Bongo. Both were forced to leave the country in 1987. Since then the hospital has been operated only as a dispensary.

Medical Directors: A. N. Tonge, 1926—1930; R. B. Parsons, 1931—1968; David Parsons, 1968—1975; Ferran Sabate, 1980—1983; Pedro Balanca de Freitas 1983—1986; Otello Vergeres, 1986—1987.

Borle, Louis Edward

BORLE, LOUIS EDWARD (1860—1943). Publishing house manager successively in Mexico, Switzerland, Spain, and France. Borle's parents were among the first in Switzerland to become Seventh-day Adventists (about 1870), and so he had an SDA home background. In 1876 he was baptized, and two years later, at the age of 18, he began working at the SDA publishing and printing office in Basel, where he learned the printing trade. In 1888 he came to America and worked at the Pacific Press Publishing Association for 20 years. In 1908 he went to Mexico to work in the SDA publishing house there. About 1910 he returned to Switzerland and took charge of the Latin Union Publishing House. In 1915 he went to Barcelona, Spain, as the first manager of the Barcelona Publishing House, and remained there until 1921. From 1923 to 1925 he again managed the Latin Union Publishing House, which by that time had been transferred to France.

Bose, Kheroda

BOSE, KHERODA (d. 1948). Nurse, personal worker. Probably the first Seventh-day Adventist convert in India. She was a teacher in a Baptist school, and came to assist Georgia Burrus, who was teaching the first Seventh-day Adventist school for girls in Calcutta, India, which was opened soon after the arrival of D. A. Robinson in 1895. The transfer was made by recommendation of Baptist missionaries on the basis of the school's increasing enrollment. After a short time with the school, she accepted SDA beliefs and joined the young church in Calcutta despite the reproach and separation from her former Christian friends. After spending some time in schoolwork, she took training in nursing at the Calcutta sanitarium and served as a nurse in the sanitarium with Dr. O. G. Place and Drs. R. and O. Ingersoll. When the sanitarium was closed, she helped in the treatment rooms that succeeded it, and in later years, as long as her strength permitted, she went from house to house speaking of her faith to Indian women. Gentry G. Lowry wrote a book about her entitled Korada, a Child Widow of India (1931).

Bosnia and Herzegovina

BOSNIA AND HERZEGOVINA. A republic in southeastern Europe whose neighbors are Croatia and Yugoslavia. Bosnia and Herzegovina covers an area of 19,736 square miles (51,100 square kilometers) and has a population (1994) of 4.7 million, made up primarily of Muslims, Serbs, and Croats. The principal language is Serbo-Croatian; religions include Islam, Serbian Orthodoxy, and Roman Catholicism.

For more than 500 years Bosnia and Herzegovina was under Turkish, Austrian, and Hungarian influence. In 1918 it became part of the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, which became Yugoslavia in 1929. Bosnia and Herzegovina became independent from Yugoslavia in 1992.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. Bosnia and Herzegovina is part of the Southwest Conference, which in 1993 had 19 churches and 604 members. The Southwest Conference is part of the South-East European Union, which in turn is part of the Trans-European Division.

Boston Regional Medical Center

BOSTON REGIONAL MEDICAL CENTER (formerly New England Memorial Hospital). A 195-bed general hospital in Stoneham, Massachusetts, nine miles (14 kilometers) north of Boston. Ellen White referred to the hospital as the “Melrose Sanitarium” because of its proximity and former access at the railroad station in Melrose, an adjoining city.

The hospital is located on a 45-acre (18-hectare) plot overlooking Spot Pond, in the midst of a beautiful, natural, woodland park of 5,000 acres (2,025 hectares) known as the Middlesex Fells (watershed) reservation.

It is operated by the Atlantic Union Conference of Seventh-day Adventists. A general board of trustees appoints an administrator and an executive board and approves appointments to the medical and administrative staffs.

Approval for operation is granted by the Public Health Department of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and accreditation by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals; membership is held in the Seventh-day Adventist Hospital Association, American-Protestant Hospital Association, American Hospital Association, Massachusetts Hospital Association, and the North Shore Health Planning Council. The institution is a participating hospital in the Massachusetts Hospital Service.

History

History. A charter was granted Apr. 28, 1899, to Hampton W. Cottrell, William A. Wilcox, Edgar Kelsey, Horace B. Tucker, Frank W. Mace, Joseph H. Haughey, Charles R. Brown, and Wilbur L. Payne, a group organized for the purpose of founding a hospital, under the name New England Sanitarium and Benevolent Association. The hospital was located near the present campus of Atlantic Union College, in South Lancaster, Massachusetts, as the eastern branch of the Battle Creek Sanitarium. (In 1907 the constitution was amended to relate the hospital directly to the New England Conference—now the Atlantic Union Conference.)

The year 1901 records more than 600 patients from 26 states, Canada, and the West Indies. It was sometimes necessary to find additional accommodations for the patients in the village. Expansion was needed but was impossible on the original site.

In August 1902 C. C. Nicola, M.D., superintendent, wrote to Ellen White regarding local conditions that confirmed warnings she had given (7T 88, 89) against locating sanitariums near wealthy homes.

The search for a new site, in response to a vision of Ellen White (Review and Herald, Sept. 29, 1904), resulted in the acquisition of the Langwood Hotel property in Stoneham—then a hotel building—plus several detached buildings, with its own electric lighting and steam heating system. It was purchased from a Dr. Coggsell, formerly port physician of Boston, who had planned to convert it into a hospital or sanitarium. This property, assessed at $98,000, was bought for $40,000.

The final transfer of patients was made from South Lancaster on Oct. 9, 1902, when a railroad car with 25 passengers, 12 of whom were patients, was routed to Melrose. The buildings on the South Lancaster property were torn down and portions were moved to the Stoneham property.

After a visit, Ellen White wrote that the transfer of the sanitarium to “a place much nearer Boston, and yet far enough removed from the busy city so that the patients may have the most favorable conditions for recovery of health,” was in God’s providence (Special Testimonies, Series B, no. 13, p. 3).

In 1906 a new main building was completed. (The original structure was repaired after a fire and used as a residence for student nurses.) A gymnasium and physical-therapy treatment rooms were added in 1908.

An additional stucco hospital wing was constructed in 1924, and was used as a surgical unit. Another wing, the Ruble Memorial, a more modern, four-story brick building, was completed in 1952, and named in honor of Dr. Wells A. Ruble, medical director from 1929 to 1943.

In March 1967 the name of the hospital was changed to New England Memorial Hospital to better reflect the full line of services offered in surgery, medicine, and maternity, and in memory of the early pioneers of the Advent movement. In August 1967 construction was begun on a major modernization and expansion program. All of the buildings, except the brick Ruble Memorial Wing, were demolished after the October 1969 opening of the first phase of a 300-bed hospital. A 16-suite medical arts building, adjacent to and north of the main hospital, was opened in early 1971; and phase two of the rebuilding program was completed in early 1973, thereby offering a completely modern facility for a witness to the community, with up-to-date technology and facilities for health care, and an expanded outreach in health-education evangelism. Another medical office building was added in 1988.

In the five-year period between preconstruction (1969) and after-construction (1974), the inpatient load increased from 5,000 to 9,000 patients per year; and the emergency room load increased from nearly 6,000 to more than 20,000 patients. In the 1990s, inpatient admissions stand at approximately 8,000 per year. Outpatient admissions and visits surpass 171,000.

The hospital is affiliated with schools, colleges, and universities in the following programs: Schools of Nursing—Atlantic Union College and Northern Essex Community College; School of Radiologic Technology—Northeastern University; School of Medical Technology—Atlantic Union College and Framingham State College; Health Education, Physical and Occupational Therapy—Loma Linda University; Physical Therapy—Northeastern University and the North Shore Community College; OR Technician Program—Northeastern Metropolitan Regional Vocational School. (The School of Nursing was operated at the hospital from 1899 to 1966, when it was transferred to Atlantic Union College, 45 miles [70 kilometers] distant.)

The hospital church was organized on Oct. 14, 1903, with 35 members. A Sabbath school was formed on Oct. 22, 1902. A second church was organized in the town of Stoneham, two miles (three kilometers) from the hospital, on Dec. 9, 1942. Both churches attest to the growth of Seventh-day Adventist membership—primarily in affiliation with the hospital—which bears a constant personal witness of Jesus in this area.

Building on the pioneer missionary endeavors of the early workers, two full-time hospital chaplains, one full-time health education worker, and nearly 1,200 full- and part-time employees continually pursue with the help of the lay and medical staff a course of health education, one-to-one and group-witnessing evangelism, and Bible studies leading to baptism.

The present staff is endeavoring to meet the objectives set for the institution in Special Testimonies, Series B, no. 13, page 12: "Boston has been pointed out to me repeatedly as a place that must be faithfully worked. The light must shine in the outskirts and in the inmost parts. The Melrose Sanitarium is one of the greatest agencies that can be employed to reach Boston with the truth."

In 1995 New England Memorial Hospital became Boston Regional Medical Center.

Botswana

BOTSWANA. An African republic situated in southern Africa, bounded on the west by Namibia (formerly South-West Africa), on the north by Zambia, on the east by Zimbabwe, and on the south by South Africa. It has an area of 231,804 square miles (600,400 square kilometers) and a population (1994) of 1.4 million.

The Botswana people, mainly of Bantu origin, migrated, for the most part, from what is now the Republic of South Africa and the territories of Lesotho and Swaziland. Large areas in the northwest are uninhabited because of sleeping sickness. Arid conditions prevail during much of the year, particularly in the west, in the Kalahari Desert. The principal occupation of the people is raising cattle, sheep, and goats, but during the years 1960—1980 the mining of nickel, copper, and diamonds developed greatly. During the 1980s and after, diamonds have become the backbone of the country's mining resources.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. The territory of Botswana constitutes two fields: the South Botswana Field, with headquarters in Gaborone, the capital city; and North Botswana Field, with headquarters in Francistown. These fields are attached to the Eastern Africa Division. Statistics (1992) for the North Botswana Field: churches, 16; members, 6,271; ordained ministers, 7; credentialed missionaries, 2. South Botswana Field: churches, 11; members, 5,909; ordained ministers, 8; licensed ministers, 7; credentialed literature evangelists, 3.

Development of SDA Work

Development of SDA Work. Permission to open a hospital in Kanye village was granted on the understanding that no preaching be done. W. H. Anderson in 1921 received this in an interview with the queen mother, Gagoangwe, regent for the then-16-year-old chief, Bathoen II. The work of Dr. A. H. Kretschmar in the new hospital broke down prejudice, and subsequently he received permission to preach. In 1922 J. R. Campbell was allowed to enter Kanye and hold meetings. In 1927 H. Walker was permitted to conduct regular mission work there and also at Mauyana, a village some 30 miles (50 kilometers) away, where David Livingstone once worked. After 1928 SDA work in Botswana was administered by the Zambesi Union, except for a short period when it was under the South African Union Conference.

In 1951 Botswana was organized into a field within the Zambesi Union, with headquarters at Kanye. W. M. Webster was president. From 1954 to 1959 work in Botswana was administered by the Zambesi Union, then the territory was reorganized as a field in 1959, with W. M. Cooks as president. At that time the headquarters were established at Francistown, with permanent housing and an office building. In 1962 the first SDA school in Botswana opened in the small village of Ramokgoname, 40 miles (65 kilometers) from Palapye, and soon had a substantial enrollment. In 1984 the Botswana Field was organized into two fields, the North and South, which are attached directly to the Eastern Africa Division.

Bouaké Adventist Secondary School

BOUAKÉ ADVENTIST SECONDARY SCHOOL (Collège Adventiste de Bouaké). A coeducational day and boarding school on the secondary level, situated on the outskirts of Bouaké in the central Côte d'Ivoire, approximately 250 miles (400 kilometers) from Abidjan. It is operated by the Sahel Union Mission. The school developed from an elementary school whose buildings (three classrooms and a house), begun by J. R. Buzenet, who arrived at Bouaké in 1952, were finished in 1955 by G. M. Ellstrom. On Mar. 7 the school opened, offering the first primary class, which was taught by Ba Amadou. In October 1956 Buzenet opened two other classes. With three more added in 1957, the school offered the entire primary school course.

In 1958 G. Gutekunst and H. Kempf opened the first year of the secondary school. The second and third years of the secondary school were added in 1960 and 1961, respectively. A primary school of six classes, housed in temporary quarters, was opened for mass education.

In 1962 the secondary school added the fourth year, as well as the first year, of a commercial course. The straw huts were replaced by classrooms, and the secondary school was transferred to a new building containing four classrooms and two offices, erected on a new compound separated from the old by a road.

In 1971 a seminary was opened, offering three years of theology leading to the diploma of evangelist. An extensive building program was launched in 1973, with projects for lavatories, a new classroom building with a science laboratory, a new primary school, and a boys' dormitory. There are six staff houses and a church seating 1,000.

In 1991 Salomon Assiene became the first national principal. In 1993 the school had a capacity of 1,300 students, with an enrollment of 819.

Principals: H. Kempf, 1958—1959; P. A. Heise, 1959—1964; P. E. Giddings, 1964—1970; G. Dewinter, 1970—1972; A. M. Vine, 1972—1973; R. L. Joachim, 1973—1978; M. Michel, 1978—1980; D. Dekeuster, 1980—1982; S. Galanth, 1982—1991; S. Assiene, 1991— .

Boulder Memorial Hospital

BOULDER MEMORIAL HOSPITAL. A 93-bed acute care general hospital with specialized rehabilitation operated at Boulder, Colorado, until it was sold in 1989. It has been replaced by Avista Hospital.

History

History. In 1893 a retired minister, John Fulton, visited Boulder, Colorado, in search of health. He was so impressed with the city that he wrote to Dr. J. H. Kellogg urging him to found a medical institution there. As a result, on Dec. 4, 1893, a health boarding home was opened in a dwelling on University Hill, and placed under the direction of Lewis Kleuster and his wife, of the Battle Creek nursing staff. From this small nucleus grew the Colorado Sanitarium, which was built by the General Conference and the Medical Missionary Board of the International Medical Missionary and Benevolent Association under the direction of Dr. Kellogg. Ground was broken on June 10, 1895, on a 90-acre (36-hectare) site on Upper Mapleton Hill, for three buildings, the largest six stories high. The sanitarium was dedicated July 1, 1896. Joseph Hartman, a nurse, became the first business manager, and Dr. O. G. Place was the medical superintendent.

In November 1897 the institution, valued at $76,500, was taken over by the newly organized Colorado Medical Missionary and Benevolent Association, to which the General Conference medical organization gave $31,500 as a working capital; the Colorado association promised to pay $45,000 as the sanitarium became sufficiently prosperous. This debt proved to be a millstone about the neck of the fledgling institution.

Being regarded as a summer resort, the sanitarium was well patronized in the summer, especially by people from the South, such as Texans who came to the mountains to spend the hot-weather period, but it had a lean existence during the long period between summers. By July 1902, however, F. M. Wilcox, the chaplain, was able to report in the Review and Herald that the past winter the patronage had been about twice what it had been heretofore, that the summer patronage was excellent, and that the sanitarium now needed additional facilities to care for the summer patronage and also separate facilities to care for consumptive patients. (The sanitarium had so many of these patients that it had become known as an institution for tuberculosis patients.) However, 1902 was a peak season. By 1906 the institution was glad to take advantage of the campaign then launched for the relief of sanitarium debt around the circle of the globe through the sale of Ellen G. White's book The Ministry of Healing.

In 1905 the institution was renamed the Boulder-Colorado Sanitarium, and in 1910 it was turned over to the Central Union Conference. From 1937 to 1941 Boulder-Colorado Sanitarium was operated under joint management with Porter Sanitarium at Denver, R. J. Brown managing both.

Beginning about 1897, a health-food factory was operated for many years. In 1912 a health food store was operated in Denver, and at times outlets were distributing the products in other cities. A three-story wing was added to the south end of the old main building in 1918—1919. This section included the pharmacy, laboratory, Maternity Department, operating room, patient rooms, a large parlor, and sun deck. In 1929—1930 a three-story nurses' residence was built northwest of the main building. After the professional nursing school was discontinued in 1955, this building was converted into a senior citizens' center.

Nursing Education and Training. Within three months after the opening of Colorado Sanitarium, a training class of 22 student nurses was reported "well in progress." The two-year course included the medical aspects of the care of the sick, hydrotherapy, massage, laundering, waiting on tables, and cooking. Classes were graduated every year, except one, from 1898 to 1944. In the early 1940s a joint School of Nursing was set up by Porter Sanitarium and Boulder-Colorado Sanitarium. The 1947—1948 Union College Bulletin announced that the two sister medical institutions had entered into an arrangement with Union College of Lincoln, Nebraska, to establish the first collegiate nursing program among SDAs, whereby the liberal arts and preprofessional science courses were taken on the Lincoln campus and the clinical experience was offered at Boulder and Porter. On Jan. 15, 1955, Boulder dropped out of this arrangement.

Growth in Organization and Changing Concepts. When the institution was built, according to the old traditional sanitarium concept, a corps of SDA physicians was employed by the institution. It was anticipated that the reputation of the sanitarium would attract the sick from many places, often from a distance, to become patients of the sanitarium physicians and under their care to receive such treatments as would aid the body to work its own healing, aided by hydrotherapy and other natural treatments, rest, proper diet, exercise, and the reform of injurious habits. Horseback riding, mountain climbing, and walks amid the beauties of nature were included in the regimen. Lectures on healthful living and the learning of correct habits were intended to bring about a permanent cure.

As the years went by, the old sanitarium concept passed and it became necessary to rely upon local physicians to bring their patients to the sanitarium, usually for short periods of hospitalization. In harmony with the new type of patronage, it was not necessary to employ a medical superintendent and other physicians. The name of the institution was changed to the Boulder-Colorado Sanitarium and Hospital (1956). Under the new hospital system the staff was organized in the conventional manner from local participating physicians.

Outstanding in medical service to the institution was the career of H. A. Green, who arrived at Boulder on Dec. 4, 1910, and continued as medical superintendent and chief surgeon until 1937, a period of nearly 30 years, when the institution was widely known as Dr. Green's sanitarium. Another long term of service was that of Dr. Kate Lindsay, who came around the turn of the century and remained until 1920.

Later Developments. In the late fifties a rebuilding of the physical plant was begun. The original building was razed and was replaced with a new, modern building in 1957. A new obstetrical wing and new operating rooms were added in 1958. In 1962 the name was changed to Boulder Memorial Hospital. The year 1969 marked the completion of a new million-dollar three-story east wing, and a new entrance and offices were added to this east wing in 1972. At the same time a completely new Radiology Department was added. In 1973 the obstetrical service was closed out and in its place a strong pediatrics service was developed.

Hydrotherapy and other natural remedies, a basic part of the sanitarium's treatment since its inception, were expanded into a full physical medicine and rehabilitation program in the early 1970s. By the early 1980s the hospital was considered to have the best rehabilitation service in Colorado.

In 1986 because of the need for a full-service hospital located in an area of growth at a greater distance from its competition, the hospital acquired 72 acres (30 hectares) of land off the Boulder-Denver Turnpike in Louisville, about 10 miles (16 kilometers) southeast of its location in Boulder. In late 1987 plans were accelerated to build in Louisville. At first it was thought that Boulder Memorial could be retained, but because of mounting financial losses, it was decided to sell to Boulder Community Hospital and to build a replacement hospital at Louisville. The sale was finalized on Mar. 9, 1989, and Avista Hospital opened its doors on May 7, 1990, as a continuation of SDA health care in the Boulder area. See Avista Hospital.

Bourdeau, Augustin Cornelius

BOURDEAU, AUGUSTIN CORNELIUS (1834—1916). Pioneer French language evangelist, brother of D. T. Bourdeau. Born in Canada, he was reared in Vermont; at 12 he joined the Baptist Church and became a promising preacher, working chiefly among French-speaking people. In 1856 he accepted the Sabbath doctrine, and the following year was baptized as a Seventh-day Adventist, and was ordained.

For eight years he supported himself as a carpenter and joiner, while preaching the SDA message. He helped organize the Vermont Conference in 1862, and later served as its president for several years.

He was sent to Iowa in 1866 to help reorganize SDA churches that had been disaffected by the Snook-Brinkerhoff defection (see Marion Party). Later he worked in Illinois, Wisconsin, Missouri, and Vermont. Working in Quebec, he organized the Quebec Conference and served as its president for a time.

From 1884 to 1888 he worked in various parts of Europe, including Italy, France (where he promoted the colporteur work), Romania, and Switzerland. While overseas he contracted black typhoid fever, which left permanent aftereffects. On his return he worked in Canada, Vermont, Michigan, Pennsylvania, and the Dakotas. In his earlier ministry he had been closely associated with James and Ellen G. White.

Bourdeau, Daniel T.

BOURDEAU, DANIEL T. (1835—1905). Evangelist and missionary, brother of A. C. Bourdeau. At 11 years of age he joined the Baptist Church, and at 16, with his brother, attended a Baptist French language institution at Grand Ligne, Lower Canada. In 1861 he married Marion E. Saxby. Ordained to the SDA ministry in 1858, he, with his brother, spent many years in evangelism in New England and Canada. As far as is known, the two brothers were the first of French descent to accept the Seventh-day Adventist faith.

In 1868, with J. N. Loughborough, he responded to a call from an SDA group in California, headed by M. G. Kellogg, to open SDA work in that state. When he returned to the East in 1870, he resumed work among the French-speaking people and organized churches in Wisconsin and Illinois (1873).

In 1876 he went to Europe to spend a year of evangelistic work in Switzerland, France, and Italy, and associated with J. N. Andrews in editorial work. Again in 1882, with his brother, he took up evangelistic work in Europe, working in France, Switzerland, Corsica, Italy, and Alsace-Lorraine. Altogether he spent seven years overseas. On returning to the U.S. (1888), he continued as a minister and writer, working at first for French-speaking people, and then largely for the English.

Boushrieh Adventist Secondary School

BOUSHRIEH ADVENTIST SECONDARY SCHOOL. A coeducational day school on the thirteenth-grade (college freshman) level, operated by the East Mediterranean Field. It was first opened under the auspices of the educational department of Middle East College to serve as a laboratory for teacher-training students, with Edith Davis as principal. In 1963 it was upgraded to a high school affiliated with Middle East College. In 1969 it was separated from Middle East College and moved to its present location in Boushrieh, Jdeidet El Matn, Lebanon.

In 1987 a thirteenth-grade class (college freshman equivalent) was added. The school follows the curriculum of the Lebanese Ministry of Education augmented by the Seventh-day Adventist religion program. The enrollment in 1993 was 430.

Böx, Heinrich

BÖX, HEINRICH (1876—1942). Leader in the publishing work in central Europe. He became a Seventh-day Adventist through the influence of his wife, née Alma Blote (they were married in 1898), who apparently had become an SDA before him. After he was baptized in 1902 by H. F. Schuberth, he began to sell SDA publications in Germany. Sometime thereafter he attended Friedensau Seminary and, according to one source, was ordained to the ministry and became a leader of colporteurs in 1907. His name first appears in the Yearbook in 1910 as canvassing agent of the Middle German Conference, then in 1912 as field agent for the East German Union Conference.

Drafted into the German Army during World War I, he performed noncombatant service. His superiors allowed him to visit and instruct the colporteurs then in the field. A story has been told that when he went on such leaves he was supplied with an official pass endorsed with a request to all concerned to give aid and assistance “to Herr Böx, leader of the Seventh-day Adventist colporteur work.”

After the war he served as field missionary secretary of the East German Union Conference. In 1922 he became secretary, and later associate secretary, of the Publishing Department of the European Division. In 1925 the Yearbook first lists him among ordained ministers. From 1928 until near the time of his death he was secretary of the Publishing Department of the Central European Division.

He is remembered as playing an important part in the development of SDA book sales in Germany. When he began work, there were only 25 colporteurs in his district; at the time the colporteur work was brought to a standstill in the early 1930s, he had 500 trained booksellers under his charge. Someone has said that he did not know the word “cannot.” “With God,” he said, “I can do all things.” He lived his beliefs and allowed himself little rest and relaxation.

Boyd, Maud (Sisley)

BOYD, MAUD (SISLEY) (1851—1937). Pioneer Bible instructor, colporteur, and the first Seventh-day Adventist woman missionary sent to Europe. She was born in England, but emigrated to the United States when she was 11, where she found her older brother keeping the seventh-day Sabbath. Soon her whole family became SDAs. When at the urging of James and Ellen White they moved to Battle Creek, Maud, age 15, found employment in the composing room of the Review and Herald and attended G. H. Bell's pioneer English classes for Review and Herald employees. With a group of young people from the Review and Herald she attended the first SDA camp meeting (at Wright, Michigan, September 1868). When SDAs began to accept the tithing plan, Maud Sisley is reported to have been one of the first tithepayers in Battle Creek. She became a charter member of the first Tract Society in Battle Creek, which was organized by S. N. Haskell. She was so enthusiastic about the new opportunities that she asked for a six-month vacation in order to join Elsie Gates in self-supporting missionary work in Ohio.

In 1877 the General Conference sent Maud Sisley to assist the pioneer SDA missionary J. N. Andrews in his publishing work in Switzerland. There, in true pioneer spirit, she set in type the first SDA tract in Italian, even though she did not know the language. In 1879 J. N. Loughborough called her to assist in Southampton, England, as Bible instructor and colporteur. Shortly thereafter, on her return to America, she became the second wife of Charles L. Boyd, the president of Nebraska Conference. Later she helped him pioneer in the Northwest, where he was president of the North Pacific Conference.

In 1887 the Boyds were sent by the General Conference in the first group of missionaries to Africa. They remained in South Africa until 1891, when Boyd's failing health forced their return to U.S., where he died in 1898. Mrs. Boyd continued her Christian service in Australia, as a teacher at Avondale for nine years and then for three years as a Bible instructor in New South Wales and Victoria. Then for 17 years, until her retirement in 1927, she worked as a Bible instructor at the Loma Linda and Glendale sanitariums in California.

Brack, Augusto

BRACK, AUGUSTO (fl. 1890). One of the pioneer colporteurs in Brazil. He came from Germany in 1898, and later (1902) worked with the Berger brothers in Santa Maria and Taquara, Rio Grande do Sul. Shortly after this he returned to his homeland.

Branch Bible School

BRANCH BIBLE SCHOOL. The equivalent of a branch Sabbath school, but conducted on a day other than the Sabbath. Such schools were formerly called Community Bible Schools, but because similar meetings sponsored by the Home Missionary Department were also called Community Bible Schools, the name branch Bible schools was adopted in 1963.

Branch Sabbath School

BRANCH SABBATH SCHOOL. An evangelistic type of service for the benefit of non-Seventh-day Adventists conducted generally as a branch of an established Sabbath school. According to the specifications of the North American Sabbath School Secretaries' Council, 1963, such meetings should be approved by the Sabbath school council, or the assistant superintendent for branch Sabbath schools of a parent school, or by the conference Sabbath school secretary in the case of a school conducted by isolated members; should preferably be conducted on Saturday; and should follow the general pattern of a regular Sabbath school, with any necessary program adaptations during the early development of the school. A similar school conducted on days other than Saturday is called a branch Bible school.

The idea of sharing the Sabbath school program and lessons with others began early. In 1879 Sunday schools were organized, a few of which were changed to Sabbath schools and were instrumental in the formation of new churches. Beginning in 1885, a considerable interest was aroused in conducting Sunday schools; two were reported in California in 1885, and others in 1886 in Allegan County, Michigan; in Wellsville, New York; and in several other places. In 1891 a letter from L. Johnson in Scandinavia told of a woman colporteur who opened a branch Sabbath school with 60 children. At the 1901 General Conference session, Ida M. Walters of Ohio reported on "branch Sabbath schools" before the Sabbath school council, and both the council and, in July, the International Sabbath School Association recommended operating such schools wherever practicable.

In 1927 R. G. Jones and his wife founded numerous branch Sabbath schools in the Dominican Republic in the Inter-American Division, and used these neighborhood Sabbath schools as a means of evangelism. They divided the city of Santo Domingo into several zones and encouraged their church members to conduct the schools on Sabbath afternoons in the areas nearest them.

At the General Conference Sabbath School Department meetings in 1930, many encouraging reports were given about branch Sabbath schools in northern California, Iowa, and other places. Some of these were follow-up work after Ingathering, and many resulted in additions to the church.

In 1933 J. M. Howell reported that a Sabbath school in Chile had, in about 1927, held 11 branch Sabbath schools, with the result that the church membership had grown from about 25 to nearly 100. Another Sabbath school conducted six branch Sabbath schools. In 1933 Mrs. Anna L. Hindson, in Australia, reported a number of Sunday schools held in different places.

The Autumn Council of 1934 commended the establishing of branch Sabbath schools, Sunday schools, and home Sabbath schools in all conferences and churches. From then on branch Sabbath schools sprang up everywhere—in Australia, in the Inter-American Division, in South America, in India, in Africa, in China, and wherever the regular Sabbath schools were found. By 1946 the goal was one branch Sabbath school for every regular Sabbath school.

In 1942 a series of four senior lesson quarterlies was provided for branch Sabbath schools, and in 1948 lessons called “Adventures in the Holy Bible” were prepared for boys and girls by R. R. Breitigam and his wife. Later, filmstrips for these lessons were prepared and also a set of lessons for adults, “Bible Adventures.”

In 1953 there were 3,058 branch Sabbath schools in all the divisions; by the end of 1964 there were 27,268 schools, with 203,546 members. In addition, there were 7,976 branch Bible schools, with an attendance of 53,307 around the world.

In 1989 there were 66,879 branch Sabbath schools, with 543,650 members. Since then, no statistics have been recorded. See Branch Bible School.

Branch, Thomas H.

BRANCH, THOMAS H. (1856—1924). Missionary. He began his ministry in Pueblo, Colorado, in 1901. The next year he was sent to the newly acquired Plainfield Mission station (renamed Malamulo Mission station in 1907), in Nyasaland (now Malawi), one of the first Seventh-day Adventist Black Americans to be sent overseas as a missionary. His wife gave simple treatments and his daughter was in charge of the school. He returned to the United States in 1908 because of ill health and engaged in pastoral work.

Branson, Ernest Lloyd

BRANSON, ERNEST LLOYD (1906—1960). Missionary in the Middle East. He was educated at Spion Kop College in South Africa, Emmanuel Missionary College, Atlantic Union College (B.Th., 1927), and the SDA Theological Seminary. In 1926 he married Ardyce Detamore. He served as pastor and evangelist in southern New England (1927—1934) and in Missouri (1934—1935), and then as president of the Missouri Conference (1935—1938). In 1938 he became superintendent of the Egyptian Mission and then superintendent of the Middle East Union Mission (1942—1950). After his return to the United States he pastored at Oakland, California, then became president of the Greater New York Conference (1950—1958), and again pastor in California (1958—1960). He was the son of W. H. Branson.

Branson, William Henry

BRANSON, WILLIAM HENRY (1887—1961). Evangelist, author, conference administrator, General Conference president. He was educated at Battle Creek College (1901—1903) and Emmanuel Missionary College (1903—1904). His denominational service of almost 50 years began in 1906 when he entered the colporteur work. Evangelism in Florida in 1908—1910 was followed by pastoral work in South Carolina in 1910—1911, and ordination to the ministry (1910). In 1911 he was called to the presidency of the South Carolina Conference, and for the next 43 years he held administrative posts. He was president of the Cumberland Conference (1913—1915), and of the Southeastern Union Conference (1915—1920).

He was appointed president of the African Division in 1920 and continued to administer that fast-growing field until 1930, when he became a vice president of the General Conference.

In 1938 Branson served as head of the Central European Division, Section II, and from 1938 to 1940 as head of the China Division. In 1946, in a period of great stress in China, he was sent to direct the rehabilitation of the church, and served as president of the China Division from 1946 to 1949.

He became president of the General Conference in 1950, and filled the office until 1954, when he retired because of failing health.

Branson was a strong administrator, an aggressive builder spiritually and materially, and was considered an authority on early missions in southern Africa. In addition to making numerous contributions to the church papers, he wrote a number of books, including The Way to Christ, Missionary Adventures in Africa, The Holy Spirit, In Defense of the Faith, How Men Are Saved, and The Drama of the Ages.

Braun, Josef (also spelled Brown, Joseph)

BRAUN, JOSEF (also spelled Brown, Joseph) (1881—1958). Minister and conference administrator in Germany, Austria, and the United States. He was baptized in 1904 and four years later, in 1908, began denominational service in western Germany. His name appeared in the SDA Yearbook for the first time in 1910, when he was listed as a missionary licentiate in the Rhenish-Prussian Conference. He continued to work in that area as licentiate, minister, and administrator until about 1925 (he was ordained earlier, and in 1921 was elected president of the Rhenish Conference). Between 1925 and 1936 he directed the work of the church in Austria. Later he went to the United States, where he worked as minister in the Wisconsin and North Dakota conferences, and retired in Oregon sometime between 1945 and 1950. About 1953 he returned to Germany. The Yearbook from 1955 to 1958 lists him among honorary ministers of the Rhenish Conference. He died in Germany in 1958.

Brazil

BRAZIL. A federal republic situated on the northeast coast of South America, bounded on the southeast, east, and northeast by the Atlantic Ocean, and bordering the French Guiana, Suriname, Guyana, and Venezuela on the north; Colombia and Peru on the west; Bolivia, Paraguay, and Argentina on the southwest; and Uruguay on the south. Therefore, Brazil has a common border with all the countries of South America except Ecuador and Chile. It has a total area of 3,286,470 square miles (8,511,957 square kilometers) and a population (1994) of 159 million.

Brazilian territory extends in both hemispheres, and it is the fifth-largest country in the world, surpassed only by Russia, China, the United States of America, and Canada. Portuguese is the official language. The capital city, Brasilia, was founded on Apr. 21, 1960, for this purpose.

Brazil is a triangular-shaped country occupying half the land area of the South American continent. It lies almost entirely within the tropics and consists of a vast central plateau bordered by lowlands that range in size from the sprawling Amazon basin in the north to a narrow coastal plain in the east and southeast. The mountainous ranges of what is called the maritime system form the eastern part of this plateau, the easternmost range being known as the Serra do Mar (coastal range). In the northeast the coastal plain rises gradually to the interior, but between Bahia and Rio Grande do Sul the Serra do Mar poses a formidable barrier to communication with the hinterland. West of the maritime mountain ranges are the elevated tablelands of the Paraná and São Francisco river systems. To the northwest of these is the immense Amazon basin, which is drained by a vast system of tributaries, many of which are navigable. The Amazon carries the greatest volume of water of any river in the world, and, when it flows into the Atlantic Ocean along an estuary of 200 miles (335 kilometers), still runs more than 185 miles (300 kilometers) inward. As far as length is concerned, it is the second river in the world, with a total of 4,000 miles (6,440 kilometers), 1,950 miles (3,150 kilometers) of which are within Brazil. It is surpassed only by the Nile River, with 4,150 miles (6,680 kilometers). In the Amazon basin, and in those places along the Atlantic coast where the rainfall is heavy, there are tropical rain forests composed of broadleaf evergreen trees, there being as many as 3,000 different species in a square mile (2.59 square kilometers).

The region drained by the Paraná-Paraguay system is a broad flattish plain clad with semideciduous trees and savanna grass, largely devoted to cattle raising. Southern Brazil is an area of humid subtropical forests and coffee plantations. The varying topography and diversified climate of this region have resulted in a wide range of farm and forest products, which have contributed to Brazil's wealth.

Brazil may be divided into climatic zones that extend from north to south, varying from tropical in the north to subtropical in the south. There are not, however, extremes of temperature or rainfall. The annual average temperature in the Amazon region is around 79°F (26°C) most of the year. In the northeast, which is arid, temperatures as high as 100°F

(38°C) occur. Southern Brazil, from the tropic of Capricorn to 30° south latitude, has a humid subtropical climate characterized by warm wet seasons and cool dry seasons. Except in the southernmost states, there is no frost.

The economic history of the country has been characterized by a series of cycles of booms and depressions, the result of Brazil's economy being based upon a single product, coffee, for which the country was, at one time, the world's chief source. Later Brazil was unable to compete with other countries that were able to produce coffee, rubber, and other products more efficiently and at a lower cost. In recent years sustained efforts have been made to diversify the economy, and thus reduce dependence on a single commodity for prosperity. Brazilian industry today accounts for more than half of all industry in Latin America.

Historical Background

Historical Background. Brazil was claimed, Apr. 22, 1500, by Pedro A'lvares Cabral, who was commissioned by the king of Portugal to sail to India to open a trade route with the East Indies. Adverse winds drove his expedition onto the coast of Brazil, in the vicinity of what is now Bahia. Supposing the newly discovered land to be a large island, Cabral named it Ilha de Vera Cruz ("Island of the True Cross"), but when later discoveries revealed the continental nature of the new land, it was renamed Terra de Santa Cruz ("Land of the Holy Cross"). Still later, when pau-brasil, a red dyewood, was discovered, the newly discovered land was named Brazil. There is historical evidence that others had touched the coasts of Brazil before Cabral, among them the Spanish navigator Vicente Yáñez Pinzón, a former member of Columbus's expedition, who in January 1500 discovered the mouth of the Amazon River, naming it Mar Dulce ("Freshwater Sea").

According to the generally accepted account, Amerigo Vespucci, an Italian navigator, sailed from Lisbon, Portugal, in the employ of the Portuguese king, May 13, 1501, and discovered Guanabara Bay, Jan. 1, 1502, and probably was the one who named the river Rio de Janeiro ("River of January"). The name "America" is derived from a Latinized form of his name.

1. Portuguese Colony. Thirty years passed after the discovery of Brazil before serious efforts were made to colonize it (1530). São Vicente, in the state of São Paulo, and São Salvador, in the state of Bahia, were among the first cities established to consolidate Portuguese claims. Portuguese colonial policy consisted largely in exploiting the new land for its natural resources for the benefit of the mother country, so that during a period of nearly 300 years Brazil was practically closed to commerce with the outside world.

In 1549 Tomé de Sousa was appointed royal governor by John III, king of Portugal, and established his headquarters at Bahia. He was accompanied by several Jesuit missionaries, among them Manuel da Nóbrega, first of a long line of Catholic missionaries who devoted their lives to the conversion of the Indians. In 1554 Nóbrega established a college at Piratininga, giving it the name of São Paulo, which is the origin of the largest Brazilian city. There he was joined by José de Anчета, another Jesuit missionary who had just arrived and whose labors among the Indians won him the title "Apostle of Brazil."

In 1555 Nicolas de Villegagnon, a French adventurer and soldier of fortune, enlisted the support of Admiral Coligny, leader of French Protestants, and even of John Calvin, for the establishment of a Huguenot colony in Brazil that would be an asylum for Huguenots and other Protestants. Henry II of France approved the project, but after establishing the colony, Villegagnon went back on his promise of toleration and attempted to force the conversion of the colonists to Roman Catholicism. Rumors of this episode reached Europe and checked what might have become a great migration from France and Switzerland.

From 1580 to 1640 Brazil, with Portugal, was under the rule of Spain. This was the time when the colonists, especially those who lived around the village of São Paulo, organized the famous bandeiras, expeditions for the purpose of finding gold. Since all of South America belonged to Spain, these expeditions went beyond the frontiers of the Tordesilhas Treaty, signed by the kings of Portugal and Spain in 1494, and took possession of the land they were going through. When Portugal recovered its autonomy again, Brazil had tripled its area. During the Spanish dominion the Dutch tried to occupy part of the country.

In 1624 the Dutch seized and held briefly Bahia, and in 1630 the Dutch East India Company gained control of Pernambuco in northeastern Brazil. The company chose for governor of its new possession Count Maurice of Nassau-Siegen, an able statesman and administrator. However, the directors of the company refused to support him, and he resigned in 1644. When his successors proved unable to cope with an uprising led by João Fernandes Vieira, the Dutch were expelled from Brazil in 1654, and control reverted to the Portuguese.

In 1693 gold was discovered in Minas Gerais ("General Mines"), and in 1729 diamonds were found in the same state, giving new impetus to the growth of the country, and resulting in the removal of the colonial capital from Bahia to Rio de Janeiro (1763).

In 1789 the first rebellion against Portuguese authority was led by Joaquim José da Silva Xavier, popularly known as Tiradentes ("tooth puller"), because he occasionally extracted teeth. The revolt was quelled, and Tiradentes was executed.

2. Result of Napoleonic Wars. The Napoleonic invasion of Portugal forced the royal family to flee to Brazil in 1808. With the arrival of the queen mother, Maria I, and the prince regent, João, afterward Dom João VI, a new day dawned for Brazil. Brazilian ports were thrown open to foreign commerce, rights were given freely to establish industries, and a royal treasury, a national bank, a supreme court of Justice and Finances, a government press, and an official journal were established.

In 1820 a revolution broke out in Portugal necessitating the return of Dom João VI to his country. The administration of Brazil was left to the king's son, Pedro, assisted by a Council of Four. Meanwhile, in the political ferment of the times, a strong nationalistic sentiment began to lead the people of Brazil toward a struggle for independence. José Bonifácio de Andrada e Silva, known as the "Father of Independence," a man of great prestige in the government of Pedro, persuaded the young prince to cast his lot with the nationalists.

3. Brazil an Independent Nation. On Sept. 7, 1822, at Ipiranga, São Paulo, Pedro proclaimed independence and became Dom Pedro I. A constitution was ratified and sworn to early in 1824, and some amendments were added to it in 1835. Strong opposition to the emperor forced Dom Pedro I to abdicate in 1831 in favor of his 6-year-old son, Dom Pedro II. A triple regency held the reins of government through nine stormy years (1831—1840), at the end of which both houses of parliament passed a declaration that Dom Pedro II had attained his majority. Under his enlightened rule Brazil enjoyed 50 years of prosperity and progress.

In 1851 the slave trade was abolished, and in 1871 infants born of slave mothers were declared free. In 1885 slaves more than 60 years of age were freed, and in 1888 an emancipation proclamation abolished slavery, but failed to provide compensation for their owners. This act alienated the rich slaveholders and precipitated the revolution of 1889. Dom Pedro II was dethroned and went into exile, and a republic was declared Nov. 15 of the same year.

The republic was at first ruled by military regimes, but in 1894 constitutional stability was achieved, and the next four presidents, Prudente de Moraes Barros (1894—1898), Manuel Ferraz de Campos Salles (1898—1902), Francisco de Paula Rodrigues Alves (1902—1906), and Affonso Augusto Moreira Penna (1906—1909), gave the country stable administrations.

In 1917 Brazil joined the allies in World War I, shared in the peace settlement, and joined the League of Nations, but withdrew in 1926. Washington Luis Pereira de Souza became president in 1926 and ruled to Oct. 26, 1930, when he was forced to resign by rebels under the leadership of Getúlio Dornelles Vargas, who refused to accept the election results earlier in the year, which showed Julio Prestes to have been elected. Declaring that the election had been won by fraud, Vargas seized control of the country through an armed uprising. Elections were called for in 1933 to establish a constitutional assembly. However, it was not until July 1934 that a new constitution was adopted to supersede that of 1891, and Vargas was chosen constitutional president by the assembly.

Vargas dominated Brazilian politics from 1930 to 1954, with the exception of the period from 1945 to 1951, when Gen. Eurico Gaspar Dutra was president. In 1942 Brazil declared war on Germany and Italy, and in 1944 sent an expeditionary force to Italy. After Vargas's death in 1954, Brazil entered a period of spiraling inflation and political unrest, but after the overthrow of João Goulart (1961—1964), the country has had a stable government.

In 1964 then President João Goulart was removed from office by military coup. During the military regime that followed, there were several presidents. In 1985 a civilian, José Sarney, became president. In 1990 Fernando Collor de Mello was elected president, but resigned in 1992 and was replaced in office by Itamar Franco.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. 1. Beginnings. There were Sabbathkeepers in Brazil before the arrival of SDA missionaries. Writing in the Missionary Magazine (11:302, July 1899), Friedrich Stuhlman refers to “Brother Kinder, who came here in 1878 as a minister of the Stangnofski [Stangnowsky] [Sabbathkeeping] church” (see Germany). Besides Kinder there were others “who observed the Sabbath of the Lord, as the result of [his] labors.” Many years later these Sabbatarians were reached by the SDA message, and Kinder, especially, “although much advanced in years, and deprived of the use of his eyes,” became an ardent advocate (ibid.).

The SDA message first entered Brazil through publications that arrived at the port of Itajaí, Santa Catarina, in 1879. The reason for their arrival centers in the story of a young German named Burchard, who, having violated a local law, fled Brazil as a stowaway on a German ship. Discovered en route to Europe, he was obliged to work out his passage. While on board he conversed with two SDA missionaries, who questioned him regarding religious interest and activities among the people of his community. They learned that the Lutherans were active in evangelistic work among German immigrants, especially in the state of Santa Catarina. Obtaining from Burchard the address of his stepfather, Carlos Dreefke, who lived in Brusque, Santa Catarina, they decided to send him SDA publications.

Almost two years passed before Dreefke received a package of the literature. It was handed to him while he was in a general tavern-grocery shop belonging to David Hort. According to the account of Hort's son Adolf, 9 years old at the time and present, Dreefke was reluctant to open the strange package, which he had not ordered. However, at Hort's insistence he opened it and found 10 copies of the SDA periodical Stimme der Wahrheit ("Voice of Truth"), printed in Battle Creek, Michigan. Dreefke kept one paper and gave the rest to Hort and others. As a result, the ten families that received the papers became interested in SDA teachings and asked for more information.

As requests increased for more literature, Dreefke began to fear that the cost of the papers would fall upon him, but a man named Chikrevitowski offered to assume responsibility. In time, however, Chikrevitowski's interest waned.

Later Friederich Dressel, a son of a Lutheran minister, assumed responsibility for ordering and paying for the publications. He had come to Brazil after being banished from his home because he had taken to drink. Settling at Brusque, he taught in an elementary school. In order to quench his thirst for liquor, he supplemented his salary by selling these SDA tracts and magazines. It is said that at times his hands trembled so much that many a tract was dropped quite by chance in a home, in a shop, or on the streets. Many papers were used, after having been read, to wrap groceries, and in this way still others read these SDA publications. Apparently with him was associated a certain Wilhelm Verwiebe, concerning whom nothing is known except that he signed a letter with Dressel asking for more SDA publications (Review and Herald 65:157, Mar. 6, 1888).

As orders increased, Dressel continued to make further requests to the International Tract Society in the United States. Other periodicals were sent, such as the Christlicher Hausfreund ("Christian Friend of the Home"), and books, both large and small. In this way hundreds of dollars' worth of SDA publications were scattered among the people in and around Brusque.

2. Early Converts of German Extraction. Among the first to begin observing the Sabbath as a result of these scattered publications was Guilherme Belz, a German immigrant of Gaspar Alto, Santa Catarina. While visiting his brother in nearby Brusque, he had seen the book Gedanken über das Buch Daniel ("Thoughts on the Book of Daniel"), by Uriah Smith, which his brother had obtained from Dressel. Upon reading it, Belz had become especially impressed by the chapter "The Papacy Changes the Sabbath." This title reminded him of his youth in Germany, when, upon reading the Bible, he found that it only mentioned Sabbathkeeping, though his pastor and mother had explained to him that Christ Himself had made this change. He studied this matter earnestly, and had no more doubts. About the beginning of 1890 he and his family had begun to observe the day. Soon a number of his neighbors, among them the Olm, Look, and Thrun families, did likewise.

According to extant records, the first Seventh-day Adventist to visit Brazil was L. C. Chadwick, who stopped over in Rio de Janeiro for several weeks in August 1892. In May 1893 came the first SDA colporteur, Albert B. Stauffer, followed soon after by E. W. Snyder and C. A. Nowlen, originally sent from the United States to sell SDA publications in Uruguay and Argentina, and Lionel Brooking, one of their converts from Buenos Aires (see Argentina; Uruguay). Stauffer worked first in São Paulo and then successively in Rio de Janeiro and the states of Rio Grande do Sul (1894) and Espírito Santo (1895). Stauffer sold books in German and English, because at this time there were no SDA publications in Portuguese. In Rio Grande do Sul he sold the book Patriarchs and Prophets to Germano Preuss, the owner of a hotel in the city of Taquarí, who was baptized with his wife, Claudina, in 1897. When the first missionaries arrived in Rio Grande do Sul, they stayed in his residence, which became a center for evangelism in that state and Brazil. There they founded the first missionary school and the first publishing house. His son, Leopoldo, became a worker, and served for 58 years, many of which were in Brazil Publishing House. In Espírito Santo, Stauffer sold many books in the Santa Maria German colony, which is situated at the head of a river by the same name. And as old Pastor Gustavo Schroeder Storch said: “Harsh persecution started against the ‘Verfluchten Sabbatisten’ [“cursed Sabbathkeepers”],” but the seed yielded its fruits, and the first baptism took place in December 1895. Later on these SDAs moved to Serra Pelada, to the municipality of Afonso Claudio, where one of the largest churches during the time of the pioneers was established.

At a sailors’ home in Rio de Janeiro, Snyder met Alberto Bachmeyer, a young German seaman who some months before had become a Christian while in Liverpool, England (Review and Herald 70:665, 666, Oct. 24, 1893). After persuading Bachmeyer to accept the Seventh-day Adventist faith, Snyder instructed him in the art of selling books. Although as yet not baptized, Bachmeyer soon began canvassing in various cities of the state of São Paulo, among them Indaiatuba, Rio Claro, and Piracicaba, where SDA books and papers, chiefly in German, found ready acceptance. Among those who later became SDAs as a result of reading these publications were Guilherme Stein, Jr., and his family, Guilherme and Paulina Meyer, and Guilherme Stein III and his family. Stein III, who had been a Methodist, became convinced about the SDA message after reading Der Grosse Kampf (“The Great Controversy”), by Ellen G. White. Guilherme Stein, Jr., abandoned his secular activities, and began teaching at the Curitiba International College, and the Missionary School of Gaspar Alto. In 1900 he was in Rio de Janeiro, where he published our first missionary magazine, O Arauto da Verdade (“Herald of Truth”), and in 1919, the Sociedade Internacional de Tratados no Brazil published the first SDA book written by a Brazilian, O Sabado (“The Sabbath Day”).

3. Missionaries Sent In. In 1894, because of increasing requests for denominational publications, the General Conference sent W. H. Thurston and his wife to establish a book agency in Rio de Janeiro. Receiving no salary from the denomination, he sold books, but being unable to speak Portuguese and knowing no one, he was obliged to canvass with English and German books. At this time the city had a population of nearly 1 million. It was a trying period for the young couple, who faced hunger and hardships, but the Lord provided for their needs. On one occasion a missionary of another denomination, without having been asked, lent money to the couple saying, “Here is a little money. I want you to take it and keep it until I call for it, and use it.” Later he said, “God told me to give you this money because you needed it” (General Conference Bulletin, Apr. 8, 1901, p. 123). Gradually the early obstacles were surmounted, and Thurston became a valuable colporteur agent. He served as chair and treasurer of the Brazil Mission Field from 1895 to 1900. He was ordained to the ministry in 1900 and became director of the Brazil Mission Field during the latter part of the same year.

In 1894 Bachmeyer sold books in the state of Santa Catarina and there discovered Sabbathkeepers at Brusque and Gaspar Alto. Bachmeyer informed Thurston of these interested persons, and Thurston wrote to F. H. Westphal, who had recently (1894) arrived in Argentina from the United States to visit the interested ones. Arriving in Rio de Janeiro in February 1895, Westphal acquainted himself with the progress of the work in that field.

From Rio de Janeiro he and Stauffer left for a trip to the interior of the São Paulo and Santa Catarina states. In March 1895, in the city of Piracicaba, São Paulo, Westphal conducted the first baptismal ceremony in Brazil, baptizing Guilherme Stein, Jr. It is interesting to note that the Indians called Piracicaba the fishing place, and without a doubt Brazil proved to be an extraordinary “piracicaba” of souls for the kingdom. On Sabbath, June 8, 1895, Westphal baptized eight persons, and three days later, three miles (five kilometers) from Brusque, he baptized another 15 people in Gaspar Alto. Guilherme Belz and his wife participated in this baptism, and three generations of workers have come from their family (their son, Francisco Belz; their grandson, Rodolfo Belz, who was president of both South and East Brazil unions; and their great-grandsons Claudio and Otavio Belz). Also baptized was colporteur Bachmeyer, who had not yet had the opportunity. Even though the first regular SDA church was organized in Gaspar Alto, an organized church existed in Rio de Janeiro before this time, but it was composed of newly arrived workers only. By the end of 1895, 35 converts had been baptized into the Seventh-day Adventist Church in Brazil. All the converts were of German birth or descent, or were people who spoke German.

4. First Brazilian Converts. Guilherme Stein, Jr., was the first SDA of Brazilian birth to be baptized. Others were being converted at the same time. Writing from Rio de Janeiro on Oct. 15, 1894, Thurston had reported holding Bible readings with “a Portuguese colporteur [a representative of the American Bible Society], whom brother Stauffer interested” (Review and Herald 71:725, Nov. 20, 1894). A few months later he wrote: “The Portuguese colporteur [in Rio de Janeiro] has accepted [the SDA message]. . . . Another Portuguese colporteur in São Paulo is interested” (ibid. 72:236, Apr. 8, 1895). Finally in the issue of Oct. 1, 1895 (72:636), F. H. Westphal reported: “I have just received a letter from Brother Stauffer and one from Brother Thurston, stating that the Portuguese that took his stand for the truth under Brother Thurston’s labor is now at work in connection with Brother Stauffer.”

The names of these men are not known.

5. First Churches Organized. In order to care for the increasing number of interested persons, Huldreich F. von Graf, a native of Germany, who had been a minister at Good Thunder, Minnesota, was called to Brazil to superintend the Brazil Mission Field (General Conference Bulletin, July 1895, p. 547). Soon after his arrival on Oct. 4, 1895, “the first Seventh-day Adventist church in Rio [de Janeiro, and probably the first in Brazil, but consisting entirely of workers from the U.S.] was organized Oct. 27, with H. F. Graf as elder, W. H. Thurston, deacon, and Florence Thurston, clerk” (Review and Herald 72:779, Dec. 3, 1895).

At Gaspar Alto (near Brusque), Santa Catarina, in February 1896 Graf supervised the organization of the first Seventh-day Adventist church among the settlers in Brazil. However, it was not until Mar. 23, 1898, that a church building was erected—a structure that served until 1949, when it was replaced by a brick building, the original wood flooring being retained. Graf organized many churches and made many trips into the interior. One of his longest itineraries was made in 1898 and became known as “One Hundred Days on Muleback.”

Various groups, such as those at Não-me-Toque and Taquarí in Rio Grande do Sul, Joinville in Santa Catarina, Curitiba in Paraná, Rio Claro in São Paulo, Teófilo Ottoni in Minas Gerais, and Espírito Santo in the state of Espírito Santo, were organized into Sabbath schools that later became churches.

As the Seventh-day Adventist organization in Brazil developed, the work of ministering the field and directing the workers was assigned to Frederico Weber Spies, a former colporteur director in Germany, who came to Brazil in 1896. During one four-month period in Brazil, Spies traveled 600 miles (1,000 kilometers) by water, 500 miles (800 kilometers) by rail, and 1,700 miles (2,700 kilometers) by muleback.

Between 1895 and 1904, besides the missionaries already mentioned, others, such as John Hettrick (1895), J. F. and A. J. Berger (1895), John Lipke (1897), Waldemar Ehlers (1898), Augusto Brack (1898), C. W. Barnes (1898), Elsie Strong (1899), and A. L. Gregory, M.D. (1902), came to Brazil. From time to time, as circumstances required, meetings of workers were held. The first meeting at which all the SDA workers then employed in Brazil were present was held in Brusque, Santa Catarina, in May 1898 (Review and Herald 76:653, 654, Oct. 9, 1900).

In 1899 the first Seventh-day Adventist service in Portuguese was held. F. W. Spies reported: “We had long looked forward to the time when we might begin work [in Rio de Janeiro]. . . . Wm. [Guilherme] Stein [probably III], a native brother, and his family, moved to this place, and on Saturday evening, October 21 [1899], we held the first service in the Portuguese language, in our home” (ibid. 76:124, Feb. 20, 1900).

In the same article of the Review, Thurston spoke of the urgent need for tracts and magazines in the language of the country. “We have no tract nor paper in the Portuguese tongue, and, in fact, nothing to give the people to read, and they are afraid of the Bible. We are, however, preparing manuscript for the first issue of our Portuguese paper planned long ago. But even when we shall have the matter prepared for the press, we do not know how long we must wait before we can print the first edition, because our funds are low.”

In July 1900 the first issue of O Arauto da Verdade (“The Herald of Truth”), the first SDA periodical in Portuguese, was published (General Conference Bulletin, Apr. 8, 1901, p. 121).

Organization

Organization. 1. Brazilian Conference. Brazil operated as a mission until 1902. According to the General Conference Bulletin (second and third quarters, p. 627) the Brazilian Conference was organized at a meeting held in Gaspar Alto, Santa Catarina, May 10—20, 1902, with H. F. Graf as president, A. B. Stauffer, secretary-treasurer, and Johanne Rebling, Sabbath school secretary (cf. Review and Herald 79:17, Oct. 21, 1902). The Bulletin also gave the following persons as constituting the executive committee: H. F. Graf, F. W. Spies, Abel Gregory, John Lipke, Emílio Schenk, Geo. Wischral, and John Het[t]rick. There were three ordained ministers: H. F. Graf, F. W. Spies, and Ernesto Schwantes; one licentiate: Wm. [Guilherme]Stein; and four missionary licentiates: John Lipke, A. B. Stauffer, A. L. Gregory, and Mrs. Lulu V. Gregory. According to the Review and Herald (79:17, Oct. 21, 1902), there were also 8 canvassers, 15 churches, 9 church schools, and about 860 members.

Soon afterward, Abel L. Gregory, a dentist and physician from the United States, opened medical work (ibid. 79:16, Nov. 4, 1902; cf. 81:15, July 14, 1904).

2. Reorganization in Four Parts, 1906. The South American Union Conference was organized at Paraná, Entre Rios, Argentina, Mar. 15—25, 1906, with the following officers: J. W. Westphal, president; H. F. Graf, vice president; N. Z. Town, secretary-treasurer. Executive committee: J. W. Westphal, H. F. Graf, N. Z. Town, F. W. Spies, Dr. R. H. Habenicht, Arturo Fulton, G. [Wm.]Steele, Jorge Riffel, F. H. Westphal, Juan McCarthy (Revista Adventista 6:4, April 1906; cf. Yearbook [1907], p. 94).

Soon after, in 1906, the Brazil Conference, which formed part of the South American Union, dissolved and was divided into two conferences, Rio Grande do Sul and Santa Catarina-Paraná, and two missions, São Paulo and North Brazil.

The Rio Grande do Sul Conference was organized Apr. 15, 1906, with headquarters in the city of Taquarí, Rio Grande do Sul, under the following administration: H. F. Graf, president; Abel L. Gregory, vice president; A. Pages, secretary-treasurer; Miona Graf, Sabbath School Department secretary. Executive committee: H. F. Graf, A. L. Gregory, A. Pages, John Lipke, and Emilio Schenk. Ordained ministers: H. F. Graf and Ernesto Schwantes; licensed minister: J. Lipke; missionary licentiates: A. Brack and A. Schwantes (Revista Trimensal 1:3, April 1906).

According to the 1906 Statistical Report, at the end of the year this conference had 6 churches, 444 members, 1 ordained minister, 1 church school, 1 teacher, 1 colporteur. There were also an industrial school for training future workers and a printing press.

The Santa Catarina and Paraná Conference was organized between May 12 and 15, 1906, with headquarters in Gaspar Alto (near Brusque), Santa Catarina, with the following officers: Waldemar Ehlers, president; Mary Ehlers, secretary-treasurer and Sabbath School Department secretary. Executive committee: Waldemar Ehlers, Augusto Olm, A. Hort, Jorge Wischral, Rudolph Zimmermann. Minister-evangelist: Waldemar Ehlers; licensed ministers: José Lindermann and Francisco Belz; Bible instructor: Theobald Renk. According to the 1906 Statistical Report, there were by the end of the year in this field 12 churches, 427 members, 8 church schools, 8 teachers, 2 colporteurs, and 1 ordained minister.

The São Paulo Mission was established in 1906 in the city of Rio Claro, São Paulo, with 23 members and 1 church. Officers were Emilio Hoelzle, president; Guilherme Stein, secretary-treasurer; Guilherme Meyer, Jr., licensed minister. Executive committee: Emilio Hoelzle, Guilherme Stein, Guilherme Meyer, Jr., João Mosmann, and Walter Meyer. According to the 1906 Statistical Report, there were by the end of the year in this field 1 church, 23 members, and 1 ordained minister.

The North Brazil Mission was founded in 1906, with headquarters in Rio de Janeiro, with Frederico W. Spies, president. According to the 1906 Statistical Report, by the end of the year this large area, which included 16 states with a population of 7 million, had 5 churches, 176 members, 1 church school, 1 teacher, and 1 minister.

3. National Association Formed. The Associação dos Adventistas do Sétimo Dia no Brasil (“Association of Seventh-day Adventists in Brazil”), a legal organization, was established on July 18, 1907, in the worship hall of the church of Rio Claro (São Paulo), having its own constitution and bylaws, which were published in their entirety in the official journal of São Paulo on July 24, 1907. Article III states its objectives: “The purpose of this Association is to diffuse moral and religious education in Brazil, by means of churches, organizations, publishing houses, medical and health institutions, educational institutions, publications, missionary agencies and other instruments and methods appropriate and lawful in reaching these goals, the Association having the right for this to borrow, receive deposits and donations, sign promissory notes, grant annuities, acquire, possess and maintain properties, movable and immovable, within the country, by purchase or donation, and thus to hold mortgages, mortgage and sell properties when it seems best to do so.”

4. Later Reorganizations and Changes. According to the Yearbook four major reorganizations and several lesser changes have been made in SDA work in Brazil since 1906. The first reorganization was voted at a meeting held in Pôrto Alegre, Rio Grande do Sul, Dec. 9—18, 1910 (effective Jan. 1, 1911), by which the territory of Brazil became the Brazilian Union Conference, comprising the following conferences and missions: the Rio Grande do Sul, Santa Catarina, and Paraná conferences and the São Paulo, Rio-Espírito Santo (states of Rio de Janeiro and Espírito Santo and the Federal District), East Brazil (states of Bahia, Sergipe, Alagoas, and Pernambuco), and North Brazil (states of Paraíba, Rio Grande do Norte, Piauí, Ceará Maranhão, Pará, Amazonas, Mato Grosso, Goiás, and Minas Gerais) missions. In 1916 the state of Minas Gerais was separated from the North Brazil Mission and established as the Minas Gerais Mission. The same year Pernambuco was separated from the East Brazil Mission and established as the Pernambuco Mission.

The second major change was made in 1918, when the North Brazil Union Mission, composed of the East Brazil and Pernambuco missions, was separated from the Brazil Union Conference. About a year later this new union mission was named East Brazil Union Mission, and the Brazil Union Conference became the South Brazil Union Conference. At that time several territorial adjustments were made, by which the Minas Gerais Mission was divided into the East Minas and West Minas missions, the former being joined to North Brazil Union Mission, and the latter continuing as a part of the (South) Brazil Union Conference. The same year (1919), the Rio-Espírito Santo Mission was divided into the Rio de Janeiro Mission (state of Rio de Janeiro and the Federal District), and the Espírito Santo Mission, both becoming part of the North Brazil Union Mission. It may be noted that some confusion in names existed during this reorganization period. The church paper, Revista Mensal, referred to the South Brazil Union Conference as the Brazil Union Conference, and the Yearbook for the same period referred to the East Brazil Union Mission as the North Brazil Union Mission.

The third major reorganization was made in 1927 and 1928. The Paraná Mission and the Santa Catarina Conference were united to form the Santa Catarina-Paraná Mission. The same year the Goiás Mission and in 1928 the Araguaia Indian Mission were established as part of the South Brazil Union Conference, and the Lower Amazon Mission (states of Ceará, Piauí, Maranhão, Pará, and Amazonas, and the territory of Acre) was established (1928) as part of the East Brazil Union Mission.

In 1931 the Rio de Janeiro Mission was united with the Minas Gerais Mission to form the Rio-Minas Gerais Mission. The next year (1932) the Bahia and Pernambuco missions were joined to form the Northeast Mission.

The fourth major reorganization occurred in 1936 when the Lower Amazon Mission was separated from the East Brazil Union Mission and formed into the North Brazil Union Mission, comprising the Lower Amazon Mission and the North Coast Mission; the same year the Araguaia Indian Mission was disbanded. The next year (1937) the states of Bahia and Sergipe were detached from the Northeast Mission and formed into the Bahia-Sergipe Mission.

Two minor changes were made in 1940: the Santa Catarina-Paraná Mission, which about 1934 had become the Paraná-Santa Catarina Mission, became the Paraná-Santa Catarina Conference, and the state of Amazonas and the territory of Acre in the East Brazil Union Mission were separated from the Lower Amazon Mission and established as the Central Amazon Mission.

The Rio São Francisco Mission, formed in 1945 and organized in 1951, was disbanded in 1955. The Rio-Minas Gerais Mission, which became a conference in 1951, was divided in 1955 into the Rio-Minas Conference and the Minas Mission. That same year (1955) the Rio-Espírito Santo Mission was reorganized as the Espírito Santo Conference.

In 1957 the Paraná-Santa Catarina Conference was divided into the Paraná Conference and the Santa Catarina Mission. The Central Brazil Mission was organized that same year. In 1972 the name of the Espírito Santo Conference was changed to East Conference.

In 1980 the Mato Grosso Mission was divided into the Mato Grosso Mission and the South Mato Grosso Mission. In 1983 the Minas Mission was divided into the Central Minas Mission and the South Minas Mission. In 1986 the South Brazil Union Conference was divided into the South Brazil and the Central Brazil union conferences. In 1988 the Sergipe-Alagoas Mission was formed. In the North Brazil Union in 1988, the Maranhão Mission was formed from the North Coast Mission. In 1989 the Paraná Conference was divided into the North Paraná Conference and South Paraná Conference.

In 1991 the West Amazon Mission became a conference.

Departmental Work

Departmental Work. 1. Publishing. The need for publications in the Portuguese language was recognized early by SDA workers in Brazil. In September 1898 John Lipke wrote in the Missionary Magazine (10:341, September 1898): “We need a paper in this language [Portuguese], and I believe it would be able to accomplish much good here, and then it could be sent to Portugal where we have no one to spread the [SDA] message.”

Within a year W. H. Thurston wrote in the same periodical: “We now have three small books in the Portuguese language, Steps to Christ, Gospel Primer, and Bible Lessons for the Sabbath-School, no. 1, and some tracts are in the publisher’s hands. Christ Our Saviour and a small book of Bible Readings will be translated this year, and with these and a Portuguese paper which we are planning to start we hope to teach the natives present truth” (Missionary Magazine 11:258, June 1899).

Apparently, these were the first SDA books published in Portuguese.

In July 1900 publication of O Arauto da Verdade (“The Herald of Truth”), an evangelistic paper, was begun. According to the Yearbook this magazine continued to be published until about 1912. Apparently it was succeeded by a similar paper, Sinaes dos Tempos (“Signs of the Times”), which was first published about 1917 as a quarterly and a year later as a monthly, continuing until 1923, when it was superseded by the monthly O Atalaia (“The Watchman”), which has continued to be published up to the present time. A church paper, the Revista Trimensal (“Quarterly Review”), was begun January 1906; in January 1908 it was changed to Revista Mensal (“Monthly Review”); in March 1931 the name of the periodical was again changed, this time to its present title, Revista Adventista (“Adventist Review”).

In 1902 plans were set afoot “to establish a printing plant in connection with the industrial school [at Taquarí, Rio Grande do Sul]” (Review and Herald 79:16, May 13, 1902), but it was not until 1905 that a printing press was secured and the printing plant was established there (ibid. 82:15, June 15, 1905; 82:13, July 13, 1905; 83:14, Mar. 22, 1906). In 1907 it was voted to move the printing plant from the school (Revista Trimensal 2:1, October 1907), and early in 1908 the press was transferred to São Bernardo, about 10 miles (16 kilometers) from the city of São Paulo (see Brazil Publishing House).

2. Colporteurs. The story of colporteurs who played a large part in the spread of SDA teachings in the early 1890s has already been told (see above). In August 1895 two brothers, Alberto J. and J. Frederico Berger, arrived from the United States and began colporteur work in the colony of Santa Leopoldina, Espírito Santo state, and later in the state of Santa Catarina. In two and a half months they sold $400 worth of SDA publications, a sizable amount at that time. Later they worked in Mucuri, Minas Gerais, and in southern Bahia state, being pioneers in both regions. In 1897 they began their work in Rio Grande do Sul, and in 1902 they canvassed in Santa Maria and Taquara, Rio Grande do Sul, together with Augusto Brack. Saturnino Mendes de Oliveira, one of the early colporteur directors in Brazil, was associated with the colporteur work for 41 consecutive years before retiring. During that time he is reported to have visited or worked in more than 820 cities and villages in Brazil.

3. Educational Work. As in the beginning of the history of our church, the educational work in Brazil started with a private institution, Curitiba International College, which began functioning July 1, 1896, in the city of Curitiba, Paraná. Founded and conducted by dedicated church members such as Paulo Krämer, Vicente Schmidt, and Guilherme Stein, Jr., the school had 117 students in the first year of operation. This number increased later on, surpassing the 400 mark. After some eight years of operation, the school closed about 1904.

The first missionary school was established in 1897 in Gaspar Alto, Santa Catarina, under the direction of Guilherme Stein, Jr., who was succeeded three years later by John Lipke. In 1903 this school was transferred to Taquarí, Rio Grande do Sul, and Emilio Schenk, J. Lipke, and Emanuel Kämpel served as its directors successively. This school continued to operate until 1910.

Finally in 1915 our brethren were able to reopen the missionary school, but now in Santo Amaro, São Paulo. The pioneers were John Lipke and John H. Boehm. A Brazilian convert, Pantaleão Theissen, was anxious to see the school functioning, and he sold the necessary land at a very low price. John H. Boehm donated money he received from an inheritance for the same purpose. Originally named Seminario Adventista (Adventist Seminary), it is known as Instituto Adventista de Ensino (Brazil College). In 1943, to facilitate the preparation of workers from the north and northeast, Educandario Nordestino Adventista (Northeast Brazil College) was founded approximately 1,800 miles (2,900 kilometers) north of the college in São Paulo, in the interior of the state of Pernambuco. For many years, this college taught the theology course for hundreds of students from the East and North Brazil unions. In 1988 the Theological Seminary was transferred to the Northeast Brazil College in Bahia.

When the government of Brazil took over the property that belonged to Brazil College, the money obtained from the sale was used to purchase a property of 2,000 acres (800 hectares) 110 miles (180 kilometers) from São Paulo, near Artur Nogueira, where a new college called Central Campus already had a student enrollment of 1,300.

4. Sabbath School. According to the Review and Herald (72:459, July 16, 1895), F. H. Westphal organized what was probably the first Sabbath school in Brazil, sometime in March or April 1895 at Indaiatuba, São Paulo. According to his reports, he established two Sabbath schools in the state of São Paulo and a third in Santa Catarina, between the time of his arrival, about Mar. 11, and his report, May 27. Concerning their organization he wrote: "At Indaiatuba one family began to keep the Sabbath through reading. I baptized seven of the family and organized a Sabbath school [apparently the first in Brazil]. . . . At Piracicaba we held meetings nearly three weeks. . . . [Here] we organized a Sabbath school and a missionary society, and celebrated the ordinances. It was the first quarterly meeting held by Seventh-day Adventists in Brazil. We also baptized five persons in the Piracicaba River. . . . [At Joinville, Santa Catarina] we organized a Sabbath school of fifteen members, and the second Sabbath of its existence, and my last Sabbath there, the school numbered twenty-eight" (Review and Herald 72:459, July 16, 1895).

Shortly before establishing the first Sabbath school at Indaiatuba, Westphal had visited Rio Claro, where he found two families who had accepted SDA teachings. He baptized one person in what probably was the first SDA baptism in Brazil (ibid.).

After Westphal's departure, more Sabbath schools were established. In February 1896 H. F. Graf organized a Sabbath school at Gaspar Alto, Santa Catarina, with Augusto Olm as superintendent, Martha Olm as secretary, and 23 registered members. Four years later (fourth quarter of 1900) there were seven other Sabbath schools: Brusque, Santa Catarina; Taquarí, Rio Grande do Sul; Curitiba, Paraná; Rio Claro, São Paulo; Serra Pelada, Espírito Santo; Mucuri, in the municipality of Teófilo Otoni, in Minas Gerais; and Rio de Janeiro. All the Sabbath schools then existing were supervised by the Sabbath school secretary of the Brazil Union Conference, Mary Ehlers, and included a total of 608 members. The Sabbath school offerings totaled 580 mil and 210 reis, which at the exchange rate at that time would correspond to $193.43 in gold (one gold dollar = 3 milreis).

The subsequent organization of missions and conferences, each with a departmental secretary, made for stronger promotion and supervision of the Sabbath school work. By December 1992 there were 699,480 Sabbath school members in Brazil.

5. Evangelism. During the first years of Seventh-day Adventist mission work in Brazil, converts were won principally by colporteur evangelists; later came the regular evangelists. The first ordained ministers in Brazil were foreigners, mostly of German and North American origin, among them W. H. Thurston, H. F. Graf, F. W. Spies, Ernesto Schwantes, J. Lipke, Manuel Kuempel, Max Rohde, Emilio Hoelzle, E. C. Ehlers, Waldemar Ehlers, L. Conrado,

C. E. Rentfro, Germano Streithorst, J. L. Braun, Arthur Westphal, Ricardo Suessmann, H. Meyer, and others.

In 1920 the first Brazilian minister, José Amador dos Reis, was ordained, and later others, including Ricardo Wilfart, Henrique Stoehr, and Gustavo Storch. In 1992 there was a total of 818 active ordained ministers in the different missionary fields of the country. Of the 316 active licensed ministers, the majority work as assistant evangelists. Active workers in the country total 9,997.

6. Voice of Prophecy (“Voz da Profecia”). The Voice of Prophecy radiobroadcast was launched in Brazil the latter half of 1943, under the direction of Roberto Mendes Rabello, principal speaker of the radio program. The first programs in Portuguese were prepared in Los Angeles under the guidance of W. P. Bradley, secretary of the Radio Commission. At the same time a radio correspondence school was organized at Niterói, Brazil, directed by Ilka Reis, who corrected lessons and answered letters.

Initially some stations were reluctant to broadcast a Protestant program. Because of religious pressures certain others who had signed contracts later canceled them. However, gradually opposition subsided, and the number of stations carrying the program increased, until 295 stations were broadcasting this program in 1973.

From 1943 to the beginning of 1963 the radio correspondence school received 401,362 requests for its course, 133,150 actually enrolling, and 30,234 completing it. During 1973 a total of 20,845 students enrolled. In order to care adequately for this large correspondence, two branches of the Radio Correspondence School were opened, one at Belém, Pará, in the north, the other at Pôrto Alegre, Rio Grande do Sul, in the south. Central offices occupy a building inaugurated October 1962 at Rio de Janeiro, where there are facilities for the recording of the Portuguese programs, including songs by a male quartet.

In 1959 the Brazilian Japanese Voice of Prophecy broadcast was begun with a theology graduate and former tea processor, Kiotaka Shirai, as the principal speaker, and Yoshinobu Omura, announcer and technician. The broadcast uses hymns recorded in Japanese by the King’s Heralds of the original Voice of Prophecy in California. The radio correspondence school provides three courses—Youth, Introduction to Christianity, and General (doctrinal). Hundreds of thousands of Japanese are reached each week by the stations broadcasting these programs. Three times a week the Japanese newspaper Nippaku Shimbun publishes Voice of Prophecy sermons, prepared by Shirai. The school and studio operate under the auspices of the São Paulo Conference.

In 1960 for the large German-speaking population of southern Brazil, the São Paulo Conference sponsored Stimme der Hoffnung (“Voice of Hope”), with Jorge Hoyler, a minister, as speaker.

On Nov. 18, 1962, the SDA television program Fé para Hoje (“Faith for Today”) was launched in São Paulo, and a little later in Rio de Janeiro. Alcides Campolongo, a minister, with his wife, conducted the program. In November 1991, through the combined effort of some Brazilian businesspeople, the program It Is Written is being aired nationally.

7. Public Affairs and Religious Liberty Department for Brazil (Deveres Cívicos da Igreja Adventista do Sétimo Dia no Brasil). A department created in 1951 at Rio de Janeiro to foster good relations between the SDA Church, the public, and governmental authorities in all of Brazil. This department has been instrumental in obtaining government exemption for SDA students from taking school examinations on Saturday and in gaining recognition for the church's medical cadet training. Domingos Peixoto da Silva, general secretary of this department, promoted this activity of the church from its beginning in 1951 until 1968, when Dr. A. A. Nepomuceno was appointed to fill this post until July 1970. Walter J. Streithorst and Assad Bechara have continued this work.

8. Medical Cadet Training. In 1945 a medical cadet course was incorporated into the training program of SDA colleges and academies in Brazil. On Mar. 2, 1953, the president of Brazil officially recognized the medical cadet course, called Curso de Formação de Enfermeiro Padioleiro, abbreviated C.F.E.P. The curriculum was approved by the Ministry of War, on Mar. 11, 1954. Thus every young man who has completed the course is automatically assigned, upon induction into the armed forces, to the health corps. Between 1954 and 1974 more than 1,271 young SDA men received diplomas for the medical cadet course.

In 1972 the course underwent some modifications and was again submitted and approved by the armed forces in Brazil. At that time the name was changed to "Curso de Formação de Enfermeiro Socorrista Padioleiro."

Medical Work

Medical Work. 1. Medical Institutions. The pioneer missionaries—particularly H. F. Graf, who came to Brazil in 1895—did everything possible to teach the new converts health principles and the advantages of natural treatments, including hydrotherapy.

Seven years after Graf's arrival, Abel L. Gregory, a physician and dentist, came to Brazil from the United States with his wife as a self-supporting missionary, to help develop SDA medical work in Rio Grande do Sul. Working intensively, he did much toward reducing prejudice and in advancing the local church work. He was joined in 1907 by Luisa Wurtz, a physician, and Corina Hoy, a nurse, who arrived from the United States. Both rendered valuable medical and health education service. However, attempts to establish medical work were unsuccessful at this time, and again in 1926, when John Lipke and his wife (a nurse) made another attempt. In 1939, under the leadership of E. H. Wilcox, then president of the South Brazil Union, SDA medical work became firmly established in Brazil, with the foundation of the Boa Vista Clinic (Good View Clinic) under the direction of Dr. Antonio Alves de Miranda. This clinic was substituted in 1942 by the Casa de Saúde Liberdade (São Paulo Adventist Hospital), under the direction of Dr. Galdino Nunes Vieira, a university teacher who left his job to dedicate himself to medical missionary work. At this same time, the São Paulo Conference organized the first Medical Assistance Department, with Renato Emir Oberg as director. In 1942 the Rio de Janeiro Clinic and Rest Home was founded in Rio de Janeiro, with Dr. C. C. Schneider as director. This North American missionary, interested in the right arm of the message, temporarily left his activities to study medicine in Brazil. His assistant was Dr. Artur Oberg, who later became the first SDA medical doctor in the East Brazil Union. In 1948 the Rio de Janeiro Clinic was replaced by Silvestre Adventist Hospital, on a property located under the famous monument of Christ the Redeemer, one of the beauty spots of Rio de Janeiro. In 1953 Belém Adventist Hospital was inaugurated in the capital city of the state of Pará, and in 1959, Pênfigo Adventist Hospital was established in Campo Grande, Mato Grosso, especially dedicated to curing the terrible illness generally known as savage fire, with facilities for ambulatory patients, consultations, and natural treatments, especially hydrotherapy. Until recently a similar clinic was operated in Pôrto Alegre, Rio Grande do Sul, called Clínica Bom Samaritano (Good Samaritan Clinic).

Since then the following institutions have been added: São Roque Adventist Clinic, 60 miles (100 kilometers) from São Paulo, totally dedicated to natural treatments and lifestyle-change programs; Vitoria Adventist Hospital, in Espírito Santo; Manaus Adventist Hospital; Adventist Health Center, located in a residential area of Rio Grande do Sul; São Paulo Adventist Hospital, in the Liberdal district.

2. Medical Work Among the Indians. In 1928 with the support of local church leaders, such as Rubens Anderson and Antonio Pereira, of the state of Goiás, A. N. Allen, a missionary from the United States, began welfare work among the Carajá Indians, and established the Rio Araguaia Mission. Later a school was opened. From the beginning until 1934, Ernesto Bergold, assistant to Allen, ministered to the Indians, teaching them such things as agriculture, practical trades, and the Bible, adapted to the Indian way of thinking. Beginning in 1953, the mission launch Pioneira was used to conduct medical work on the Araguaia River. In 1964 this launch was replaced by a new one.

The Pioneira was not the first such boat in Brazil; Leo B. Halliwell was the pioneer in launch medical missionary work, beginning his well-known welfare ministry in 1931 with a launch on the Amazon River, designed and built by himself—the first of a series of such craft named Luzeiro. There followed others called Luminar, on the São Francisco River, beginning in 1946; the Samaritana, on the Ribeira River (1955); the Luzeiro do Sul (1963), on the coast of Paranaguá; and in 1964 a new medical missionary launch began operation at the Furnas Dam, in the Rio-Minas Conference. As the years have passed, new boats replaced some of the old. Others have been retired as new roads and communication media made them obsolete. In 1993, 10 launches were still in service.

The combined work of these launches gives assistance to thousands of sick persons, besides distributing clothing and food. Malaria, intestinal parasites, malnutrition, skin diseases, general and tropical diseases, and extraction of teeth are the most common problems cared for through this type of medical missionary work. Some literature evangelism also is carried on by the launches.

3. Social Welfare Work. Lar da Velhice Adventista (“Adventist Old People’s Home”), open to SDAs, was established in the capital of São Paulo in 1950.

Dorcas Societies, established wherever there are Seventh-day Adventist churches, care for the needs of the poor and help with medicines, clothing, food, child care, and the finding of work for the unemployed.

Brazil College (Central Campus)

BRAZIL COLLEGE (Instituto Adventista de Ensino) (Central Campus, also known as New Adventist Brazil College). A coeducational senior college located in a rural area in the township of Engenheiro Coelho, 90 miles (144 kilometers) northwest of the city of São Paulo, Brazil.

It is one of the two campuses occupied by Brazil College.

The school is located on a farm that contains 100,000 orange trees. It was bought as a result of the partial expropriation of the institution by the city.

Administered by an interunion board (South and Central Brazil union conferences) and part of the organizational structure of the South American Division, this college was founded with the purpose of becoming the main campus of the new Brazil College, serving a nationwide constituency (1992) of 600,000 members.

The school's atmosphere is characterized by a pollution-free environment, with direct contact with nature. Both the staff and students are involved in practical work, and there is a friendly mixture of young people coming from all over Brazil and from other countries in South America and Africa.

History

History. The idea of moving the main Brazilian College from São Paulo to a rural area predated the partial expropriation of the land. It was felt that an urban campus was no longer ideal for training young people seeking a Christian education. When attempts to sell the land failed, the expropriation act by the city of São Paulo served as a catalyst for the actualization of the plan. Since then a string of divine providences have shown the moving to be a part of God's plan. From the united action take by the committee members and the support given by the church to the purchase of prime quality land and the wise use of the resources—all demonstrated that the beginnings of the new Brazil College were not mere coincidence.

Despite fears that the city government might not pay or might underevaluate the expropriated land, the property was paid for in cash at the market value (US$4.3 million). With these resources in hand, a fully equipped, fertile, totally arable, 1,900-acre (770-hectare) farm was purchased. Producing oranges, bananas, and peaches, with an appropriate soil and climate for raising cattle, the farm is self-sufficient and has greatly helped in the development of the institution.

The enthusiasm of church members, private agencies, and foundations has been an added blessing. A gift equivalent to US$1.5 million was donated by an alumnus for the construction and equipment of the library building. The Chan Shun International Foundation is funding half of the construction of the academic complex, estimated at US$2 million. The construction program, begun soon after the land was purchased, totals more than 400,000 square feet (37,200 square meters), including residence halls, kitchen and cafeteria, library, and staff houses.

The enrollment has been larger than expected. Elementary and secondary students, as well as hundreds of college students, looking for a better-quality education apply every year. Today's greatest need is room in the dormitories for college students. As the institution celebrates its tenth anniversary (1983—1993) with a total enrollment of more than 1,500, the Lord's hand can be seen working.

Departments and Industries

Departments and Industries. The central campus is characterized by the involvement of all boarding students in practical work, allowing them to learn a skill and pay for part or all of their board and tuition costs. This is done in connection with the service departments and industries (New Life Food Factory, Lagoa Bonita Dairy Industry). The quality of what these students do is well known. The cattle they care for and the milk they offer to the market are considered among the best in the country. During vacation they are encouraged to canvass, and experiences gained have been rewarding.

Brazil College (São Paulo)

BRAZIL COLLEGE (Instituto Adventista de Ensino) (São Paulo). One of the two campuses occupied by Brazil College. This is the original site, located 14 miles (22 kilometers) from the center of São Paulo, a city of some 15 million people. The school is now surrounded by the city. The institution maintains three dormitories capable of housing a total of 588 students.

A wide range of courses are offered, including majors in various health fields, language, and literature, and minors in science, mathematics, and biology. It is hoped that by 1995 the school will be authorized to offer courses in data processing, psychology, physiotherapy, nutrition, and physical fitness.

The enrollment in 1993 was 2,735 students on all levels.

Forerunners. The first Seventh-day Adventist mission training school in Brazil, known as the Brusque School, was established late in 1897 at Gaspar Alto (near Brusque), state of Santa Catarina. The founder was Guilherme (Wilhelm) Stein, a teacher, who was among the first converts in Brazil (Review and Herald 80:12, Mar. 10, 1903). The first class graduated from this school in 1901; however, it soon became evident that more land was “sadly needed at the Brusque school, to give it proper support” (Review and Herald 80:15, July 7, 1903). The school closed in 1903.

In that same year the Taquary School, established at Taquary (near Pôrto Alegre), state of Rio Grande do Sul, by John Lipke, a missionary-teacher, in 1903, seems to have taken over the mission training function of the Brusque School. It was closed in 1910 and sold for $7,000.

There was no mission training school in Brazil for the next few years. However, in 1915 Izadora Spies, wife of F. W. Spies, president of the Brazilian Union Conference, appealed at a ministers’ congress for faith to establish a new missionary school, and in the spring an ideal site was found at Santo Amaro, state of São Paulo, which was bought with the $7,000 from the sale of the Taquary School. Work on the new property began on May 6, 1915.

History

History. The new school, known as the Seminário Adventista da Conferência União Brasileira dos Adventistas do Sétimo Dia (“Adventist Seminary of the Brazilian Union Conference of SDAs”; Brazilian Seminary), began to function officially with 12 students on July 4, 1915, with John Lipke as principal, J. H. Boehm as manager, and Paulo Henning as teacher. Later five more students enrolled. At first the school faced a serious housing problem, but the Thirteenth Sabbath Offering overflow for the second quarter of 1916, which amounted to $4,318.90, did much to ease the situation by providing funds to build dormitories and homes for teachers.

According to the Prospecto Annual (school bulletin) for 1930, “seventeen students enrolled in our seminary during its first year. These spent at least half of their time tending the farm and helping with the construction of the first buildings. The rest of the time was devoted to study. The second year the number of students almost doubled, 33 young people enrolling, and in 1917 the enrollment reached 55” (p. 7). The Prospecto Annual goes on to say that “in 1919 there began an era of expansion, including the construction of more buildings and the enlargement of existing structures in order to accommodate a much larger number of students.”

In 1922 the first class, consisting of 11 students (four young women and seven young men), graduated. Their motto, “Rumo ao Mar” (“Seaward,” or “On to the Sea”), indicates their purpose of carrying the gospel to all the world.

The school has operated under various other names. In 1919 its name was shortened to Seminário Adventista (“Adventist Seminary”). The name was Colégio Adventista (“Adventist College,” referred to as Brazilian Seminary or Brazil Training School in the Yearbook) in 1923. This name was retained until 1942, when it became Colégio Adventista Brasileiro (“Brazilian Adventist College,” referred to as Brazil College in the Yearbook). In 1961 the name was changed to Instituto Adventista de Ensino (“Adventist Training Institute,” referred to as Brazil College in the Yearbook).

As of 1992, 3,282 college-level students had received diplomas and certificates in seven disciplines. More than half of these have served or are serving the church as workers and missionaries to countries worldwide. In 1993 Brazil College employed 329 faculty and staff members.

Brazil Publishing House

BRAZIL PUBLISHING HOUSE (Casa Publicadora Brasileira). A publishing firm with printing facilities, founded in 1904 in Taquarí (near Pôrto Alegre), Rio Grande do Sul, Brazil, and moved in 1907 to Estação de São Bernardo, 15 miles (25 kilometers) from São Paulo, capital of the state of São Paulo. It is the largest Seventh-day Adventist publishing institution in Latin America, and fourth-largest in sales in the denomination. It is administered by an interunion board representing all the unions in Brazil. Publishing work in Brazil began in 1900 in Rio de Janeiro under the guidance of W. H. Thurston, a missionary from the United States. Under the editorship of Guilherme (William) Stein, a former teacher, O Arauto da Verdade (“The Herald of Truth”) began to be issued in July of that year. Later John Lipke, a missionary, returned to the United States to appeal for funds for a printing press. A total of $1,500 was raised. In addition, Emmanuel Missionary College donated a handpress salvaged from the Battle Creek fire of 1903.

Jorge (George) Sabeff, then at College View, Nebraska, who had acquired printing experience with the International Tract Society, was called to set up and operate the press in Brazil. In 1905 he was joined by Augusto Preuss, a printer, and his brother, Leopoldo F. Preuss, an apprentice. They set up the press, and on May 10 printed 2,000 16-page issues of O Arauto da Verdade. Business to the amount of $667 was done in that year.

At the invitation of the General Conference, Augusto Pages of the Hamburg Publishing House arrived in Brazil in November 1905 to serve as business manager of what had come to be called the Taquarí Branch of the International Tract Society and as secretary of the Rio Grande do Sul Conference.

In January 1906 the first issue of the Revista Trimestral (“Quarterly Review”), now Revista Adventista (“Adventist Review”) appeared, official organ of SDAs in Brazil. It was also published in German for the large number of German-speaking SDAs in Brazil under the name of Rundschau der Adventisten (“Adventist Review”). Besides various leaflets, four books were printed that year: A Volta de Cristo Nesta Geração (“Return of Christ in This Generation”), Ellen G. White’s Passos a Cristo (“Steps to Christ”), also O Glorioso Aparecimento de Jesus (“Jesus’ Glorious Appearing”), and Sucessos Preditos na História Universal (“Fulfilled Prophecy in Universal History”).

In 1908, after the move to Estação de São Bernardo, the institution received the old handpress from Taquarí, and two smaller gasoline-powered presses, one of which was donated by Hamburg Publishing House in Germany.

At present the Brazil Publishing House has 165 electrically powered machines. There were 16 periodicals published during 1993, among which were Revista Adventista (“Adventist Review”), Decisão (“Decision”), Vida e Saúde (“Life and Health”), Mocidade (“Youth”), and Nosso Amiguinho (“Our Little Friend”). From 1904 to 1993, 450 different books were published, some in several editions, totaling more than 30 million copies. Among the most popular have been Vida de Jesús (“Life of Jesus”), by Ellen G. White, 2,100,000 copies; O Moéo e Seus Problemas and A Moéa e Seus Problemas (“On Becoming a Man” and “On Becoming a Woman”), both by Harold Shryock, M.D., 535,000; O Conflito dos Séculos (“The Great Controversy”), by Ellen G. White, 1,565,000, including the popular edition; Nutrição e Vigor (“Nutrition and Vigor”), by António Miranda, M.D., and Clarita Miranda, M.D., 370,000; Vereda de Cristo (“Steps to Christ”), by Ellen G. White, 1,458,969, including pocket edition; Técnica Moderna de Primeiros Socorros (“First Aid”), by Dr. Marcelo A. Hammerly, 523,000, including the popular edition; Pelos Meandros do Mal (“The Marked Bible”), by C. L. Taylor, 277,000; Matrimônio Feliz (“Happy Marriage”), by Luiz Waldvogel, 240,000; Fumar, ou Não Fumar? (“To Smoke, or Not to Smoke”), by Dr. Ajax César da Silveira, 265,000; Escravos do Século XX (“Slaves of the 20th Century”), 200,000; Homens que Fizeram o Brasil (“Men Who Made Brazil”), by Luiz Waldvogel, 195,000; O Fumo e o Câncer do Pulmão (“Smoking and Lung Cancer”), 173,000; A Família Moderna e a Solução de Seus Problemas (“The Modern Family and the Solution of Its Problems”), 170,000; Conselheiro Médico do Lar (“Home Medical Counselor”), by Hubert Swartout, M.D., 170,000; Felicidade Conjugal (“Happiness for Husbands and Wives”), by Harold Shryock, M.D., 160,000; O Destino do Homem (“The Destiny of Man”), by João Pinho, 152,000. More recently: Amor, Sexo e Erotismo (“Love, Sex, and Eroticism”), by Galdino N. Vieira, M.D., 265,000; A Ilusão das Drogas (“The Illusion of Drugs”), by Ivan Schmidt, 380,000; A Cura e a Saúde Pelos Alimentos (“Cure and Health Through Food”), by Ernest Schneider, M.D., 560,000. Generally, the more popular books have run through six or seven editions of 30,000 each.

At the present time (1993) more than 73 million Bible study leaflets and other leaflets for missionary distribution are issued annually. From 4 to 5 million periodicals are printed annually. In 1993 gross sales totaled almost US$8.1 million.

Sixty-one Ellen White books have been translated into Portuguese, for a total of 5,406,253 copies for sale to individuals and for church use.

The publishing house presently has 280 employees who supply 2,600 colporteurs, besides 800 students who canvass during school vacations.

In 1985 the Brazil Publishing House was moved to the city of Tatuí, which is 80 miles (130 kilometers) from São Paulo. In 1993 it occupied more than 193,680 square feet (18,000 square meters) of space.

Managers: Augusto Pages, 1905—1921; R. C. Gray, 1921; M. V. Tucker, 1922—1926; C. E. Schofield (acting), 1926; Frederico W. Spies, 1927—1933; J. Berger Johnson, 1933—1937; H. B. Breath of Life

BREATH OF LIFE. A television ministry featuring the preaching of the gospel by Charles D. Brooks, general field secretary of the General Conference. Excellent music by dedicated musicians augments each program. The Breath of Life telecast has wide cross-cultural appeal in the United States and other countries.

In 1973—1974 Breath of Life began operations as a media outreach of the Seventh-day Adventist Church, answering the need for programming targeting Black America. Walter E. Arties, while affiliated with station KHOF-TV in Glendale, California, developed this idea and initiated its acceptance with a pilot and numerous presentations to clergy and laity. Members attending camp meetings and convocations endorsed the concept. The music of the original Breath of Life Quartet—Clyde O. Allen, James L. Kyle, Shelton E. Kilby III, Walter E. Arties—along with Myrna Matthews-Haynes, arranger/accompanist, helped open the way for the telecast. Samuel D. Meyers was the speaker on the pilot program. Brenda Blackmon Wood, news anchor in Atlanta, Georgia, for station WSB, was program announcer and filled this position for several years.

When C. D. Brooks accepted the challenge to be director/speaker, in addition to his elected post, the program's strategy became more focused. In cities where public evangelism was planned, the telecast was aired 13—26 weeks prior to the meetings. The objective was to direct viewers to the meetings and church fellowship. The Washington, D.C., campaigns, conducted consecutively in 1978 and 1979, stand out as the best example of this plan. Church members advertised the telecast and the meetings. Baptisms totaled more than 500, and a new church was organized. Now located in Fort Washington, Maryland, the Breath of Life church bears the name selected by the new converts that commemorates its origin.

More than 12,000 persons rejoice in the blessed hope as a result of crusades from Palau (Micronesian island in the Pacific), across America to the United Kingdom and the West Indies. Churches have been established in many areas with the first being in Memphis, Tennessee, 1974, and the most recent being in Nassau, Bahamas, 1993. This unique blend of television and public evangelism continues to yield rich dividends.

Scripts for the telecast were written early on by Louis B. Reynolds, associate director of the Sabbath School Department of the General Conference and former editor of Message magazine. He particularly assisted with the Heritage Series, which focused on the spiritual connection that our forefathers had with their God and the continued legacy it provides Black Americans today. His contributions added a special quality and dignity to the telecast. Special emphasis was placed on health with a series of programs in which Brooks interviewed physicians and other health professionals. Dr. Samuel L. DeShay provided the spark and substantial financial assistance, through the General Conference Health Department, to produce these programs.

With the emergence of cable TV, the door was opened for Breath of Life to become a weekly program in the United States on the Black Entertainment and VISN networks, and in Canada on the VISION Network. Other cable systems air the telecast in local areas to their subscribers. The PTL and ACTS networks carried Breath of Life for a substantial period.

With limited resources provided by a relatively faithful few and General Conference appropriations, Breath of Life has made significant strides. In 1981 Dorothy Valcarcel introduced and implemented the direct mail system for consistent contributions. Its steady growth is a principal source of support. Fiscal responsibility is a hallmark of the telecast as well as its high standard for production and spiritual quality. C. D. Brooks continues to set the pace in public evangelism and addresses current spiritual themes on the telecast. Arties serves Breath of Life as ministry coordinator/director of production. In addition to other assignments, he is also assistant to the president of the Adventist Media Center.

To maintain the ministry's growth pattern, Reginald O. Robinson joined the staff in 1982, succeeding Kyle. He is the associate speaker, evangelist, director of field services, fund-raising and development, and several other departments. Also, the rich music of Ron Murphy enhanced outreach engagements. While viewers are asked to write in for free materials (or call via the 800 number), they are also invited to join the Bible school. Thousands have graduated from this course. These names provide a ready source of interests for follow-up and church membership.

A host of people contribute their time and energy to make the actual telecast succeed in its mission, such as program announcers Michael Conner and Maria Anderson, and health professionals Donna L. Willis, M.D., and Gwendolyn L. Foster. The best of music is provided by the Breath of Life Quartet II, namely: Roger C. Smith, Ronald A. Woodfork, Loren Mulraine, and Myron S. Ottley; "Joy" (Deidra Brooks) Tramel, Sharon Brathwaite, and Melvin Bryant; and vocalists Janice Chandler, Ullanda Innocent, and Pastor T. Marshall Kelly. Adrian T. Westney, Jr., serves as music director for the ministry. They offer their expertise on a volunteer basis. Completing the support staff are Mardel Duldulao, administrative secretary; Joyce Shepperd, secretary/departmental assistant; Gerri Banfield, Bible school counselor; and Grayce Grant, trust officer.

Breathe Free: The Plan to Stop Smoking

BREATHE FREE: THE PLAN TO STOP SMOKING. A program designed to aid the smoker in developing self-assurance and confidence in the cessation process. Breathe Free assists participants in becoming knowledgeable and active in the process of behavior change, opening up to them a vision of personal choice, individual responsibility, freedom to act, and power to direct their own lifestyle. It helps them find confidence in their ability to regain control of their lives.

Breathe Free seeks to empower the individual to reach four major objectives: physical preparation, mental conditioning, social support, and spiritual regeneration. The revised Breathe Free plan consists of nine sessions, one and a half to two hours in length, lasting over a period of four weeks. Periodic home visits and phone or written contacts are very helpful. This includes a minimum of three contacts at least three, six, and 12 months after the initial nine sessions.

The materials provided for the Breathe Free plan consist of nine annotated scripts designed for the expert or the novice in conducting a smoking cessation program. The plan also provides a director's manual giving detailed information on how to plan, promote, and implement the program.

For the participant a number of items are available to enhance the effectiveness of the program: novelty buttons; a personal plan booklet that guides each participant through each session of the program; diplomas to be given at the end of the nine sessions, at six months, and at one year; a number of posters to be coordinated with each of the nine sessions; nine videos, one for each of the nine sessions; many demonstration devices; new pamphlets designed to accompany each of the sessions, particularly in the area of smoking and the topics of exercise, caffeine, alcohol, heart disease, cancer, secondhand smoke, weight control, stress, diet, and a number of other helpful topics.

The church's first smoking cessation program was designed by Dr. J. Wayne McFarland and Chaplain Elman J. Folkenberg between 1959 and 1961. Called the Five-Day Plan to Stop Smoking, it was one of the first smoking-cessation programs available in the United States. At that time the GC Temperance Department also produced one of the first films on smoking and health—One in 20,000. During the next 20 to 25 years this plan was successful in helping many thousands of smokers stop smoking. In 1980 Dr. Mervyn Hardinge set up a commission of smoking-cessation experts to study the feasibility of revising the Five-Day Plan.

In 1984 Stoy Proctor, associate director of the Health and Temperance Department, was commissioned to continue research on revising the Five-Day Plan by conducting a thorough literature search as well as a survey of smoking cessation experts throughout North America. This work was completed in 1984 and a revised Five-Day Plan to Stop Smoking was placed on the market in 1985 and was named the Breathe-Free Plan.

In 1988 the Health and Temperance Department commissioned the Center for Health Promotion at Loma Linda University to study the effectiveness of Breathe Free. Their evaluations and research suggested that the length of the Five-Day Plan should be extended, that the after treatment should be lengthened, and that more time should be allowed for discussion. The small group work should be implemented and given a major part of the program with less attention to be given to the lecture format.

In 1993 Breathe Free was again revised to meet these findings, and the newly revised Breathe Free plan was released. Anyone with successful speaking ability or group dynamics expertise can conduct a successful program because of the comprehensive nature of the self-help material provided by Breathe Free: The Plan to Stop Smoking.

Tobacco is now the leading cause of preventable disease, a major contributor to heart disease, cancer, stroke, and chronic respiratory disease. The surgeon general of the U.S.A. has declared that smoking is an addiction comparable to cocaine addiction. Seventh-day Adventists must continue their efforts to fight this plague.

One of the most successful concepts used by Breathe Free: The Plan to Stop Smoking is found in Fundamentals of Christian Education: “If we wish to do good to souls, our success with these souls will be in proportion to their belief in our belief in, and appreciation of, them. Respect shown to the struggling human soul is the sure means through Christ Jesus of the restoration of the self-respect that man has lost” (p. 281).

In 1988 and 1989 Dr. Terry Butler, then a researcher at Loma Linda University involved in the evaluation of the Breathe Free plan, went back to his native Australia and adapted many of the Five-Day and Breathe Free concepts for a program used mainly in the South Pacific Division called “I Quit Now!” The Health and Temperance Department encourages every country to use Breathe Free: The Plan to Stop Smoking as appropriate or to adapt it to the culture and language that are needed in that particular area.

History

History. Beginnings of the Work in the Conference. As part of the territory of the North Pacific Conference (U.S.), beginning in 1886, western British Columbia was evangelized by ministers from Oregon. In 1887 a branch of the North Pacific Tract and Missionary Society was established in Victoria, the provincial capital. S. Fulton and G. W. Davis held some meetings there the following winter, baptizing three converts—two of whom had become interested through Bible studies conducted by a man named Robb. In 1889 H. W. Reed, assisted by Baxter and David Fulton, held a tent meeting in Victoria, and before the annual conference session May 27—June 4, 1890, a church was organized in Victoria—the first in British Columbia.

On June 26, 1890, a series of tent meetings was opened in Vancouver by Isaac Morrison and V. H. Lucas. These meetings proved highly fruitful, and on Nov. 30 a church of 16 members was organized by R. A. Underwood. Meetings were also held in Nanaimo at an early date and with some success, for by September 1895 there were a sufficient number of adherents in that place to protest the holding of Saturday elections.

In 1897 J. L. Wilson settled in Vancouver, held a series of meetings, revived the members, and reorganized the church of which the Wolfers and a Mrs. Kenny were charter members.

Early in 1900 W. W. Steward, of the Upper Columbia Conference, began preaching in Rossland; later a church was organized there. Mrs. R. S. Greaves, who had the distinction of being the first public school teacher in the province south of Nelson (1893—1894), and Mrs. Cour-Barron—a convert of the pioneer colporteur Geo. W. Sowler—were two of its members. Other early churches were formed in Mission City and in Cumberland on Vancouver Island. Mrs. C. H. Casey and C. O. Smith, early teachers in British Columbia church schools, came from Cumberland.

The British Columbia Conference Organized. In June 1902 the British Columbia mission field was organized under the superintendency of J. L. Wilson. The following September (1902), at the first camp meeting held in British Columbia, it was reorganized as a conference of five churches (with two church buildings, valued at $3,000), and a membership of about 75. J. L. Wilson became the first president.

The same year treatment rooms were opened in Vancouver at 163 East Hastings Street, with M. Shaffer in charge of the women's treatments and W. H. Davies of the men's. A year later treatment rooms were established in Victoria. Also in Vancouver a pure-food vegetarian restaurant was opened in 1904, at 165 Hastings Street, with A. Ferguson in charge. However, in September of that year it was decided to sell out all these places of business, "freeing . . . hands from the temporal things."

In 1903 William Manson gave land near Vancouver for a school known as Manson Industrial school, which became Manson Academy; it operated from 1904 to 1915.

The work in British Columbia in the early days, with the exception of the two coastal churches at Port Simpson and Bella Coola, was concentrated in three areas: Vancouver Island, the mouth of the Fraser River, and the Okanagan Valley. Before 1902 Vancouver members had built a small church on Keefer Street for $850 (which they sold after eight years for $17,500). In 1909 a church was organized in South Vancouver, and a year later, one in West Vancouver, where a church building with six dwelling rooms below it was purchased. Beginning in April 1910, the conference Tract Society, hitherto situated in Pitt Meadows, was housed in the West Vancouver church. The members in both South Vancouver and East Vancouver built churches of their own, and all three churches were dedicated in December 1911. For many years the Vancouver churches also maintained a Chinese mission, with Lim Ping in charge.

During this same period O. E. Davis began his work among the Indians at Port Simpson, where he established, on Dec. 11, 1903, the first Indian church in the conference. About the same time, A. M. Dart went to the Yukon and worked in White Horse, Dawson, and Bonanza. In 1907 new churches were organized in Bella Coola, where Frank Johnson was the first SDA settler, and at Abbotsford, where the charter members included the Thomas Atkinsons, Pykes, McIlvanias, Hartnells, and Adgates. The conference also owned, successively, three mission launches—the Evangel, the Rambler, and the Saturna—which operated along the coast.

The first SDAs in the Okanagan Valley were a group of immigrants from Great Falls, Montana, who settled in Silver Creek about 1901. They included two Haines families and a McLean family. Soon after, the conference sent William C. Young to hold meetings in Armstrong. Converts from these meetings included W. T. Rogers and his wife, formerly Emma Jane Hoover. Later other members of the Hoover family became SDAs. The result was the organization of the first church in the Okanagan, at Armstrong, with a membership of 13. A year later Young pitched his tent in Salmon Arm, where he numbered among his converts M. E. Toombs, his wife, and their sons George and Harold.

On June 21, 1906, William C. Young and P. P. Adams, with George Toombs as tentmaster, began a series of tent meetings in Vernon, where there were already a few SDAs. From their work emerged a new congregation—the second in the Okanagan—organized Nov. 10, 1906. Twenty-nine miles east of Vernon, at Reiswig (no longer in existence), was a small, unorganized group of German believers, mostly Reiswig families, and there in September 1906 Asa Smith opened the first denominational school in the Okanagan. His 10 pupils ranged in age from 7 to 23.

At Silver Creek E. J. Harvey conducted meetings in the schoolhouse from May to July 1908. In July P. P. Adams moved with his family from Manson Academy to Vernon, where he had worked previously. Several months later he opened a new series of meetings in Silver Creek. In all, he spent two years in this district, working among the members in Salmon Arm, Armstrong, Vernon, Silver Creek, and Reiswig. During his ministry a congregation was organized at Silver Creek, and officers were elected on Jan. 9, 1909; a place of worship at Armstrong, built six years earlier, was dedicated on Oct. 30, 1909; and a church of 21 members was organized at Round Lake by J. G. Walker in the home of William Brown (July 23, 1910), which later became the Grandview church.

The Reiswig families, formerly living east of Vernon, moved into the Grandview area after Adams left the community, in September 1910. Together the members, including the Stickle and Wm. McLeod families, erected a place of worship there, which J. G. Walker dedicated on Dec. 24, 1911—one week after he dedicated a church in Vernon. In this church German services were held in the morning and English in the afternoon. In the church auditorium a church school was begun in the fall of 1911, even before it was dedicated, with Lydia Stickle as teacher. A year later C. O. Smith became the principal, teaching in English at one end of the room while his assistant, Henry Berg, taught in German at the other. There were at that time 16 Reiswigs in Smith's class. In 1913 the English-speaking group separated to form the Lumen church (renamed Lumen Grandview in 1916).

A church in Nanaimo resulted in 1912 from the work of F. H. Conway. That year, J. L. Wilson pitched his tent, first in Kamloops and later in Penticton, where resided the Harlow and A. T. Greenslade families. On Mar. 8, 1913, a church was dedicated in Penticton, and the following day a new congregation was organized. In the autumn of 1913, J. G. Walker, the conference president, organized a new church in Vancouver. Two years later C. E. Wood settled in Nelson and E. R. Potter in Kelowna. At Nelson, on Dec. 21, 1915, ten were baptized, and two days later a church was organized. In Kelowna progress was slower, but Potter was successful in making a few converts, Thomas Barber being the first. A church was finally organized there (now Rutland) on Mar. 27, 1919.

By June 1920 there were five ordained ministers and the following churches in the conference: three in Vancouver, two in Grandview, and one each in Armstrong, Vernon, Kelowna, Penticton, Nelson, Firvale (Bella Coola), Victoria, and Nanaimo. On Sept. 3, 1921, W. A. Clemenson organized a new church of 21 members at White Rock as a result of Bible studies conducted there by S. G. White. A year later two new churches appeared—a Russian congregation at Grandview, the work of M. S. Krietzky, and a church at Rest Haven, the result of opening the new sanitarium. In 1923 S. G. White took up residence in Mission City, where there once had been a church. After a systematic distribution of publications followed by tent meetings, he won five converts. On Aug. 8, 1925, the churches in Vancouver united to form one central church with a membership of 139. In 1926 Harry Cameron established himself in Alberni, where one Adventist, Mrs. A. Monks, lived. On Feb. 13, 1927 he organized a new church of 19 members. By the end of 1929 there were 13 churches in British Columbia with a combined membership of 838.

In 1931 new churches were organized in Chilliwack, Aldergrove, and New Westminster. S. J. Shafer was associated with the beginnings of the first two and H. Cameron with the third. Three years later, the church at Silver Creek, which had been disbanded, was reorganized. New churches appeared in Langley (1935), Whalley (1936), Adams Lake (1937), Prince George (1938), and Vancouver (1939)—the last named a Ukrainian church, which owed its existence to S. J. Demchuk, W. Poleshuk, and N. Bodrug. Ainsley Blair was associated with the organization of the church at Prince George, and S. J. Demchuk with the one at Whalley.

About 1939 Fred Blair and his wife, SDAs from Saskatchewan, moved into the Creston Valley. Soon, Mrs. Blair began giving Bible studies to her neighbors. Later C. C. Weis followed up the interest. Other SDA settlers joined the group. They purchased and remodeled an old Catholic church and dedicated it on May 15, 1943, when they were organized into a church.

New churches appeared in the interior (often around logging camps operated by SDAs), in the southeast at Oliver, and at Trail; in the far north at Dawson Creek, the most northerly congregation in Canada; and at Hazelton, organized in 1956. In 1962 the only floating church in Canada was dedicated—the Watcher Isle church on Smith Inlet, part of a logging village built on cedar log rafts.

The Golden church, organized in 1970 as a company and in 1973 as a church, purchased the oldest church building in the Kootenays (built c. 1870) from the Catholic diocese. Being a heritage building, the original structure could not be altered, but an extension for school classrooms was permitted.

The British Columbia church school system had its beginning with the organizing of a school in Pitt Meadows in 1904, later becoming the Manson Academy and continuing until 1915. Others followed in Reisdig, Bella Coola, Firvale, Grandview, Penticton, Nanaimo, Silver Creek, Naden Harbor, Kelowna, Nelson, and Mission City. By 1916—1917 the only schools left in the conference were at Grandview and Firvale. From 1918 to 1929 schools were added in Rutland, White Rock, Rest Haven, Vancouver, and Victoria. In 1923—1933 depression brought the number down to four—Vancouver, Rutland, Grandview, and Rest Haven. Later in that decade several had been revived.

The school in Rutland increased its offerings to all grades from 1—12, changing its name to Okanagan Academy. In 1975 the school was relocated on a 13-acre (five-hectare) parcel of land on Hollywood Road. The building was expanded to contain 13 classrooms, library, industrial arts shop, and a large auditorium.

A notable step was taken in 1964 when the Vernon and Armstrong areas began the first consolidated school in the conference. This was called the North Okanagan Academy situated on the Grandview Flats.

The next step in consolidation was the amalgamation of the Vancouver and New Westminster schools in 1965, which became known as the Deer Lake Academy. In 1968 the Rest Haven and Victoria schools united under the name of Van-Isle Academy, located in the Victoria plant. In 1986 property at Elk Lake, midway between Victoria and Sidney, was obtained for the building of a new four-room school with an auditorium. The name was changed to Island Pacific Junior Academy. The most significant consolidation occurred in 1971 when Fraser Valley Academy took in students from Chilliwack, Mission, Abbotsford, Aldergrove, Langley, and White Rock. By 1974 this school had expanded to a senior academy.

Since 1971 the growth rate has accelerated considerably. That year there were 18 schools with 42 teachers. By 1993—1994 there were 25 schools with 102 teachers. In 1971 Cariboo Academy replaced Williams Lake School and expanded to teach all 12 grades. A school was begun in 1983 in Salmon Arm. In 1993 it united with Silver Creek School under the name Shushwap Adventist School. In 1980 a school was built by Maranatha Flights in Whitehorse, Yukon. The Vernon church built the Pleasant Valley School in 1975 for grades 1—8. Beginning with school year 1993—1994, the Riverside SDA School has been operating in a former four-room public school purchased from the Chilliwick School District.

Beginning in 1959 the conference employed a mission launch, the Northern Light, to ply the waters off the west coast of Canada. Through the ministry of Ronald Reimche, the first skipper of the boat, and his wife, many persons have been baptized and many isolated members have been strengthened. The original launch was replaced by a modern 52-foot (16-meter) launch specially designed for the task in 1967. This new launch was skippered by Clyde Gildersleeve, assisted by his wife, Nancy. The Northern Light outreach initiated a dental health education program for the isolated people of the West Coast and particularly for Native Americans. This dental program has been under the direction of Dr. W. Danielson, with headquarters in Bella Coola. A mission school established in Bella Coola was expanded in 1984 to offer a secondary school program to students with special needs. By this time the Northern Light had ceased to operate and was sold in 1975.

The British Columbia Conference also owns a permanent campground at Hope, on the Fraser River, where both the annual camp meetings and the youth camps are held. Camp Hope Lodge, containing 72 motel-like suites, dining hall, auditorium, and recreational area, serves church functions year round. At the eastern end of the campground is Camp Chawuthan, the youth camp. It has its own lodge, pavilion, cabins, and outdoor swimming pool.

Broadview Academy

BROADVIEW ACADEMY. A coeducational boarding school on the senior high school level, serving the Illinois Conference. It is now situated on rolling acreage in Kane County, Illinois, five miles (eight kilometers) west of Geneva near Lafox in the Fox River Valley. The 1992—1993 enrollment was 118, and the faculty and staff numbered 21.

The academy is a descendant of the Broadview Swedish Seminary, founded in 1909 on 78 acres (32 hectares) at Broadview, 12 miles (19 kilometers) from Chicago. Through the years this seminary trained many Seventh-day Adventist workers in Swedish, German, and other languages. It graduated its first class in 1914. In 1922 the name of the school was changed to Broadview College and Theological Seminary, and in 1925 the Clinton Theological Seminary was united with it. In 1923 the adjacent Rathe property of 114 acres (46 hectares) was purchased. In 1932 the school became Broadview Junior College and Broadview College Academy. In 1933 it was voted that Emmanuel Missionary College be the one college for the Lake Union Conference and that the Broadview school be operated only as an academy.

At that time Broadview College Academy, with Percy W. Christian as principal, received the highest rating by the Illinois Department of Education and full accreditation by the North Central Association of Colleges and Secondary Schools. In the reorganization as Broadview Academy, the Chicago Academy, the Hinsdale Sanitarium Academy, and the Fox River Academy were merged with Broadview College Academy.

As Chicago and the western suburbs continued their rapid expansion, conference and school officials, aware of the denomination's basic plans for Christian education, became increasingly aware of the problems connected with operating a school in urban surroundings and decided to move the school. The Savage-Marydale farm at Lafox, reputed to be one of the finest and most modernly equipped farms in the state of Illinois, was purchased as the new site. Ground for the new school was broken Nov. 17, 1957.

A new era in Broadview Academy history began in 1958, when two dormitories, an administration building, and a cafeteria were erected. Also constructed were 12 faculty homes; a 12-inch (30-centimeter) well 1,350 feet (410 meters) deep, with a 75,000-gallon (285,000-liter) water tower; and on a nine-acre (3.6-hectare) site on the west side of Geneva, close to shipping facilities, a 45,000-square-foot (4,200-square-meter) building for a branch of the Harris Pine Mills. This building now houses Academy Pak, where students package tractor parts for AGCO, Inc.

When school opened Sept. 8, 1958, nearby communities showed a friendly spirit of welcome toward the new institution. A much-appreciated gift to the academy was a carillon from the Herman Kleist family, installed on the roof of the administration building.

In 1963 an addition to the girls' dormitory and in 1967 an addition to the boys' dormitory were completed, making room for more than 300 students.

In 1971 the camp meeting auditorium was remodeled into a gymnasium and a $100,000 expansion to the warehouse, packaging complex was completed.

Open house for the new $644,000 chapel-music building was held Apr. 29, 1972. This modern two-story octagon-shaped building is air-conditioned and fully equipped, including a three-manual pipe organ.

A $200,000 donation from the Loletta Blaine Estate made possible, during 1974, the building, equipping, and furnishing of the cafeteria-dining room complex.

Brooking, Lionel

BROOKING, LIONEL (fl. 1892—1904). One of the earliest Seventh-day Adventist converts in Argentina, and later a colporteur in Argentina and in England. He was an evangelist for one of the Protestant churches in Buenos Aires and was connected with the YMCA when, in 1892, he met the first SDA colporteurs in Argentina, E. W. Snyder, A. B. Stauffer, and C. A. Nowlen. After he joined the SDAs, he colporteurd in Argentina, chiefly among the French Waldensian settlements, and later went to England, where he also was connected with SDA mission work.

Brooks, Edgar

BROOKS, EDGAR (1886—1957). Missionary editor, pastor, and teacher in Argentina. He was born in Plymouth, England, and was converted when about 14 years old. Three years later, in 1903, he began to work at the Caterham Sanitarium as a bellboy. Later he worked as an apprentice typesetter and proofreader at the SDA publishing house in London. From 1904 to 1906 he attended the mission training college there, then worked as a proofreader at the Stanborough Press, and afterward as assistant editor (1908—1911). In 1910—1911 he attended the missionary training college at Watford, England. The next year he accepted a position as a private tutor in Arequipa, Peru. During the four years he spent in that country he engaged in considerable missionary work, organizing a Sabbath school and preaching in Spanish. In 1915 he returned to England, but was called to the Buenos Aires Publishing House as editor. In 1917—1918 he edited La Revista Adventista and, from 1917 to 1929, El Atalaya. After 1929 he taught Bible at River Plate Junior College, worked as an editor, and preached. He retired after 35 years of service for the church.

Brorsen, Knud

BRORSEN, KNUD (1846—1893). Minister. He was born in Norre Farup, Ribe Amt, Denmark. At the age of 22 he came to the Unites States. The year after his arrival he was converted and accepted the SDA faith in California. Soon after this, he enrolled as a student in Battle Creek College. In 1878 he returned to his homeland to preach, spending the major portion of his time in Denmark, but working also in Norway and attending meetings in Sweden.

In October 1892 Brorsen was invited by the General Conference to attend a health and temperance class at the Battle Creek Sanitarium in order to prepare him to render effective service along these lines in the Scandinavian countries. On May 31, 1893, after the completion of his course, he sailed from New York, in company with S. N. Haskell of the General Conference, to attend a camp meeting in Moss, Norway. From Moss he and Haskell left on June 22 for Sweden to attend a session of the Swedish Conference, in which he took an active part. On June 28, before the session was finished, he died of a hemorrhage of the lungs.

Brouchy, Pedro Mariano

BROUCHY, PEDRO MARIANO (1891—1961). Nurse, masseur, evangelist, president of local fields. He was born in Posadas, Misiones province, Argentina, and was baptized in 1902. In 1913 he graduated from the masseur nurses' school of River Plate Sanitarium, and married Adela Toledo, who graduated the year before, at the first graduation of that school. With her efficient help, he worked the following 14 years in Corrientes, in northeast Argentina, as a self-supporting worker, conducting a physiotherapy treatment center they had established. His dedication to reading in Spanish and English helped him acquire considerable education. He was ordained to the ministry in 1923.

He served as president of the Buenos Aires Conference (1929—1933), of the Uruguay Mission (1934—1941), of the Cuyo Mission (1942—1945), and of the North Argentine Mission (1946—1949). He was an outstanding builder of representative and strategically located churches in big cities. From 1950 to 1952 he was the administrator of River Plate Sanitarium.

Brown, Frederick W.

BROWN, FREDERICK W. (1860—1899). Pioneer Seventh-day Adventist minister in India. He was a son of a Protestant minister in the state of New York and was dedicated by his parents for service in India in his childhood. At the age of 15 he was baptized in the Free Will Baptist Church. At 17 he determined to become a preacher, and was licensed to preach in 1881. After completing his theological education at Hillsdale College (Michigan), he was invited by the Free Will Baptist Mission Board to go to India, where he went in 1888 as the college's missionary. He served as Indian secretary for his missionary society from 1890 to 1892. While in India he married Kate D. Lawrence, a member of the Disciples Church and a missionary of the Christian Women's Board of Missions. She did zenana work among the women, trained national Bible women, was in charge of two orphanages, and had the oversight of 16 day schools. After they returned to America in 1892, he joined the Disciples Church and was employed by the Christian Women's Board of Missions to travel throughout the United States in the interest of the foreign mission work. In 1895 he enrolled in the Medical Department at the University of Michigan, where he met SDAs and two years later, in 1897, accepted their beliefs, resigned his pastorate of a Disciples congregation, and entered the American Medical Missionary College. He and his wife were baptized into the SDA Church in 1898 and joined the Battle Creek congregation. Soon thereafter they were sent to India. Shortly before leaving in December 1898, he was ordained to the ministry. In India he and D. A. Robinson opened the first Seventh-day Adventist mission station in the interior of the country, at Karmatar, Bihar, where he conducted a medical dispensary until his death in December 1899 during a smallpox epidemic.

Brown, Freeman G.

BROWN, FREEMAN G. (fl. 1843). Baptist minister of Worcester, Massachusetts, a Millerite preacher, and author of Views and Experience in Relation to Entire Consecration and the Second Advent (which was later reprinted by Seventh-day Adventists) and A Warning to Watchfulness (1843).

Brown, Gertrude

BROWN, GERTRUDE (1879—1974). Social worker, physician, benefactor. Born in Essex, England, she was the youngest of 11 children. She was baptized in 1893 and went to the Seventh-day Adventist sanitarium in Basel, Switzerland, for her nursing diploma. While working in the SDA hospital in Ireland, she met and married Edward Brown, a nurse. She became a social worker for London County Council in Hoxton, where she served before being invited to join the staff of the Battle Creek Sanitarium, working there as matron over 2,000 patients.

Returning to Britain, she qualified as an M.D. in Edinburgh, Scotland. The Browns settled in Scotland and founded Crieff Nursing Home. Upon the death of her husband, she turned the home over to the church with the understanding that it would continue to be developed along the same lines as Battle Creek. Throughout her life she was known as an indefatigable apostle of the remnant church's health message, and was acknowledged as Britain's senior church worker.

Brownsberger, Sidney

BROWNSBERGER, SIDNEY (1845—1930). Educator, administrator. Graduate of University of Michigan (1869), he was the first principal of Battle Creek College (1874—1881), and also of Healdsburg College (1882—1887). His training in the classics led him to view the conventional colleges as suitable patterns for denominational schools, although he did encourage industrial education. He was secretary of the General Conference for a year (1873—1874).

The later years of his life were spent in ministerial work and in self-supporting schools in the South. In 1909 he helped establish the Asheville Agricultural School and Mountain Sanitarium near Fletcher, North Carolina, and for the next 10 years, as his health permitted, he taught the children of the community in a small school.

Brunei Darussalam

BRUNEI DARUSSALAM (“Abode of Peace”). A small country located 275 miles (443 kilometers) north of the equator on the northern coast of the island of Borneo. Its land area of 2,226 square miles (5,765 square kilometers) is divided into two parts by the Malaysian state of Sarawak. Brunei is bordered on the north by the South China Sea, and on the other three sides by Sarawak. Bandar Seri Begawan, the capital and main population center, is located nine miles (15 kilometers) from the mouth of the Brunei River. About 110 miles (175 kilometers) from the capital, in the center of the oil and gas industry, are Brunei’s other major cities of Seria and Kuala Belait.

Brunei’s 1994 population of 285,000 are mainly Muslim Malays, although there are approximately 80,000 Chinese and other non-Malays in the country. Small communities of Britons, Dutch, Americans, and Australians work in commerce and in the oil and gas industry. Oil and gas production give Brunei its revenue, and the population of Brunei enjoy one of the highest per capita incomes in the world.

Brunei has an equatorial tropical climate, with a temperature of about 80°F (27°C) throughout the year. It has consistently high humidity and rainfall. In the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries Brunei was a large empire stretching from north Borneo to the north Philippines. By the end of the nineteenth century Brunei had lost much of its territory and power in the colonial expansion in Southeast Asia. In 1888, Brunei became a British protectorate. On Jan. 1, 1984, Brunei became the world’s 159th sovereign state. It is an Islamic nation, a member of the U.N., ASEAN, and the Organization of Islamic Conference.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. As the pioneer Seventh-day Adventist missionaries spread the gospel through the island of Borneo, they encountered the British-administered protectorate of Brunei. It was difficult, if not impossible, to obtain official sanction for church work in Brunei. Only the Roman Catholic and the Anglican churches have official presences in Brunei.

In 1934 the North Sarawak and the South Sarawak mission areas were formed, with Brunei becoming part of the North Sarawak work. Gus Youngberg was assigned to take charge of the work along the Tatau River and was also to have responsibility for the work in Brunei.

In 1936 the minutes of the union committee recorded an action recommending to the upcoming biennial session that Sarawak and Brunei be organized into a regular mission known as the Sarawak Mission of Seventh-day Adventists with headquarters at Kuching. This arrangement was to be effective upon the arrival of a foreign worker who could administer the work in Sarawak and Brunei. Dr. R. T. Morrow was named by the same committee to be in charge and to locate in Bintulu, where the government was eager to turn over its dispensary to the Adventist mission.

In January 1956 it was voted to unite the North Borneo Mission and the Sarawak Mission, effective the first of the year, into a single mission known as the Borneo-Brunei-Sarawak Mission. Five years later Sarawak became a separate mission again.

Because of the difficulty in working in a Muslim area where it was patently illegal to preach the gospel, no real progress was made in Brunei. The country has appeared to be like a volleyball, with its administration alternating back and forth between the Sabah and the Sarawak Mission offices. Though unrecorded, probably the earliest Seventh-day Adventist contact with Brunei was through SDA laity. An SDA member from Kuching, Sarawak, is the longest-standing SDA resident of Brunei. She has been in the country for the past 17 years.

The first recorded attempts by SDAs to enter Brunei officially with literature work date back prior to 1980. Richard Moss, a literature evangelist from Sarawak, and Peter Ching, another literature evangelist from Peninsular Malaysia, both entered Brunei. Moss worked off and on in Brunei, though he was based in Sarawak. Ching was assigned to work in Brunei in 1981 and was given special funding to rent a house to be used also as a meeting place. Ching coordinated the activities and worship services of resident SDAs in Brunei who were entirely foreign workers. Ching continued to work in Brunei until January of 1983. He started two different church groups, which met on a regular basis. The majority of the members in these groups were Malaysians, many of whom were from Sabah and Sarawak. The group also included a number of Filipinos.

After Ching left Brunei to take up leadership in the West Malaysia-Singapore Mission, Richard Moss continued to work until 1984. About this time another literature evangelist, Theresa Chin from Kota Kinabalu, worked for more than six months in the Brunei area on a part-time basis.

In 1986 Colin Choo, a literature evangelist from Sabah, entered Brunei, working out of Kota Kinabalu. He spent more than five months in the country during 1987. In addition, two literature evangelists stationed in Miri, Sarawak, entered Brunei occasionally during the year to sell literature. Choo began to regroup the SDA members he met into Sabbath fellowship groups. His leadership, especially during the weekends, proved invaluable in encouraging the often isolated SDAs who were working in the country.

In 1986 Hulman Sinaga, a university professor and active layman and church elder from the Penang English church, accepted a teaching position at the Universiti Brunei Darussalam. His influence and leadership also breathed life into the membership of the church. Through his work and the work and influence of Colin Choo, and also through the leadership of the administration of the Sabah Mission, today approximately 30 members of the SDA Church meet on a regular basis in three places, namely, Bandar Seri Begawan, Seria, and Kuala Belait. The work done by these dedicated literature evangelists and laypersons has virtually opened up the country to SDA influence and work.

In 1986 a fund of S$50,000 was set aside by the Far Eastern Division and the Southeast Asia Union Mission to enter Brunei with Christian work. These funds were to be spent in opening up SDA work in Kuala Penyu and on the island of Labuan, which is part of Malaysia. Labuan, which is only a short boat trip away from Bandar Seri Begawan, was to serve as a base for gospel work in Brunei. All of these areas—Brunei, Labuan, and Kuala Penyu—were part of the Sabah Mission.

Though the Sabah Mission stationed a worker in both Labuan and Kuala Penyu for a time to develop the work in those areas, and though he made intermittent trips to Brunei to visit members and to start church work, he was unsuccessful because the Bruneian authorities noticed his frequent trips into the country. They warned him not to travel often to the country unless he had official business and a proper visa. It had earlier been visualized that the Southeast Asia Union and the Sabah Mission would have to encourage a “tent-making” type of endeavor in Brunei.

Although the plans laid by church leaders to assign a full-time worker in or near Brunei came to nought, the efforts of dedicated literature evangelists and laymen have opened up the country for Adventists just as the entire Far Eastern Division was opened for the work of the church by pioneers such as Abram La Rue.

In 1991 the Sabah Mission requested the Southeast Asia Union Mission to reassign the territory of Brunei from the Sabah Mission to the Sarawak Mission. The reason for the request was that Sabah had been unable to penetrate Brunei effectively, using Labuan and Kuala Penyu as a base. Most travel to and from Brunei had to be done from Kota Kinabalu by air. Because there is a road link between Miri in Sarawak and Brunei, it was felt that the pastor in Miri could make monthly or periodic visits to the church groups in Brunei, thus strengthening the work.

In 1991 official action was taken by the Far Eastern Division to transfer the responsibility for the work in Brunei to the Sarawak Mission. Since then there has been increased contact between the workers in Sarawak and the SDA members in Brunei. Members continue to meet in private homes. There are regular Sabbath meetings in homes in three locations in the country of Brunei.

Buckner, Tazwell Benjamin

BUCKNER, TAZWELL BENJAMIN (1860—1924). Minister; one of the first Black Seventh-day Adventist workers in the South. Beginning as a self-supporting colporteur in 1890, he established numerous companies of SDA believers throughout the South. He was ordained in 1898. Late in life he was pastor of the Hartford Avenue church, Detroit, Michigan.

Budget

BUDGET. The method of apportioning the income derived from tithe, offerings, and other sources, for the operation of Seventh-day Adventist world work. The General Conference and subsidiary organizations operate their work on an annual budget system that provides for the intelligent planning of future activities and for making regular measurements of progress.

At its thirty-seventh session, in 1909, the General Conference recommended that “the Executive Committee of the General Conference make appropriations annually to mission fields, equitably distributing the money raised, proportionate to the needs of the fields.” These appropriations are voted at each Annual Council, based on written requests from the respective divisions.

Budnick, Michael

BUDNICK, MICHAEL (1890—1954). Minister and church leader in Germany. He grew up in a Seventh-day Adventist home and was baptized in 1904. After he had attended Friedensau Missionary Seminary he entered denominational service in 1913, working in the eastern part of Germany, around Königsberg. In 1916 he married Helene Krueger. In 1918 he was ordained to the ministry in the East Prussian Conference. About 1924 he assumed leadership of the Young People's, Sabbath School, and Home Missionary departments of that conference. About 1926 he was transferred to the North East Saxon Conference, where he headed the same departments. About 1931 he became president of that conference. From 1936 until his death in 1954, he headed the East German Union, the largest in the country (with almost 20,000 members in 1954).

His coworkers remember him as a talented leader who was devoted to his people and interested in their welfare and in their everyday lives.

Buenos Aires Adventist Academy

BUENOS AIRES ADVENTIST ACADEMY (Instituto Adventista Florida). A coeducational day school on the senior high school level situated in Florida, a suburb about a mile from the Buenos Aires city limits, in the province of Buenos Aires. The school is owned and operated by the South Argentine Mission and serves 13 of the 30 Seventh-day Adventist churches of Greater Buenos Aires. The curriculum consists of the five-year official secondary course, accredited by the Argentina Ministry of Education.

The academy originated as a primary school, established in 1913, owned and operated by the Florida church, called Bernardino Rivadavia. Secondary instruction began in 1937 under the direction of David Rhys, the second and third years being added later. A night commercial course was added in 1938, incorporated to the Academia Mercantil Fossa, of the federal capital.

The present course of studies dates from 1944, when the official system of accreditation of the country was initiated. The school continued in the same location until it moved Apr. 7, 1945, into the present building, which was provided by the Buenos Aires Conference. In 1946 the name was changed to Instituto Florida, and in 1974 it was changed again to Instituto Adventista Florida. In English it is known as Buenos Aires Adventist Academy.

The new building had four classrooms and four offices. Since 1955 and before 1971 the following had been added: four more classrooms, a library with reading room, an auditorium, a science laboratory, and other rooms. In 1971, 13,934 square feet (1,295 square meters) of construction were added.

The students publish a school paper Alma Estudiantil. The instruction given qualifies the young people to enter River Plate or any university in Argentina. In 1993 the enrollment was more than 900.

Buenos Aires Publishing House

BUENOS AIRES PUBLISHING HOUSE (Asociación Casa Editora Sudamericana). A publishing association with printing facilities, operated at Florida, Buenos Aires, Argentina, to care for the needs of the Austral, Chile, and Inca unions, and North and South Ecuador missions, which comprise the Spanish-speaking portion of the South American Division. The Austral Union encompasses Argentina, Paraguay, and Uruguay, with an area of 1,290,273 square miles (3,341,800 square kilometers) and an approximate population (1993) of 41 million. The Chile Union is comprised of the country of Chile, which has an area of 292,257 square miles (757,000 square kilometers) and an approximate population (1993) of 14 million. A branch of the house is located in Chile. The Inca Union consists of Bolivia and Peru, with an area of 920,437 square miles (2,384,000 square kilometers) and a population (1993) of about 30 million. The North and South Ecuador missions are attached fields with a combined area of 109,483 square miles (283,600 square kilometers) and a population of approximately 10 million.

Development and Organization. In October 1896 authorization was received to publish a magazine in Spanish named El Faro (“The Lighthouse”) in a commercial printing office in Buenos Aires. The first number of El Faro and a monthly leaflet entitled Carta Mensual were published in July 1897. On Mar. 17, 1904, the organization that published these periodicals was legally constituted the Casa Editora Sudamericana. The following year the first printing shop for this house was established in Camarero (today Villa Libertador San Martín, Puiggari), Entre Ríos, Argentina, at River Plate College, under the direction of J. W. Westphal. This plant was called Imprenta La Verdad Presente (“Present Truth Printing Office”).

On Mar. 22, 1906, the printing office was transferred to Florida, Buenos Aires, and placed under the direction of Juan A. Bonjour, with N. Z. Town and his wife as editors. In 1910 it absorbed the Chile publishing house. In 1913 the publishing house was renamed Casa Editora Unión Sudamericana. In January 1920 the name was registered as Asociación Casa Editora Sudamericana. On Mar. 18, 1920, a branch publishing house was organized in Lima, Peru, which functioned until Dec. 30, 1926, when the Buenos Aires Publishing House began to serve the Inca Union directly. On Jan. 17, 1933, the name was shortened to Casa Editora Sudamericana, and a constitution and statutes were adopted. Sixteen years later, on June 21, 1949, official recognition was obtained.

The publishing house, which employed eight in 1896, employed 84 in 1992. In the latter year it sold almost 214 million pages of books and magazines. The assets of the institution in 1992 included about five acres (30,000 square meters) of land, with buildings in Florida, Buenos Aires, Argentina; two web presses; five presses (two large, two medium-sized, and one small); two folding machines, and various other machines for use in binding books. The operating capital in 1992 was US$3,465,657.

Publications. In 1904 El Atalaya Americano (“The American Watchman”) replaced El Faro. La Revista Adventista (“The Adventist Review”), published first (beginning in 1901) in Chile, has been published since 1907 by the Buenos Aires Publishing House. The magazine Salud (“Health”) was first published in October of 1909. Soon afterward La Verdad Presente (“The Present Truth”), which the Buenos Aires Publishing House had published since 1905, was absorbed by Las Señales de los Tiempos (“The Signs of the Times”), formerly published in Chile, but thenceforth issued from the Buenos Aires house. The first number of the combined magazine appeared in 1910.

El Centinela (“The Sentinel”) was first published in 1915, and in 1918 appeared El Monitor de la Juventud (“The Youth’s Monitor”), which was published until 1925, and in 1935 was replaced by Juventud (“Youth”). The name of Las Señales de los Tiempos was changed to El Atalaya (“The Watchman”) in 1913 and to Vida Feliz (“Happy Life”) in 1956.

The circulation of the principal magazines in the years 1986—1992 was as follows: Vida Feliz, 1,773,425; Juventud, 1,070,579; La Revista Adventista, 725,897.

Besides the periodicals previously mentioned, the following departmental magazines are published: El Ministerio Adventista, El Informa Misionero Mundial, three series of Sabbath school quarterlies (senior, junior, and primary), and El Colportor Eficiente. On Feb. 11, 1915, the first book, La Crisis del Mundo (“The World Crisis”), was published.

Nearly 463 works of different authors and of various formats have been published on religious themes, morals, health, diet, and the home, in addition to a number of translations of works by Ellen G. White, such as El Conflicto de los Siglos, El Deseado de Todas las Gentes, Los Hechos de los Apóstoles, El Camino a Cristo, La Educación, Joyas de los Testimonios, Evangelismo, and others.

Bugema Adventist College

BUGEMA ADVENTIST COLLEGE. A coeducational boarding school on the junior college level, operated by the East African Union Mission on a 640-acre (260-hectare) tract of land 20 miles (30 kilometers) north of Kampala, the commercial capital of Uganda. The enrollment in 1993 stood at 120, with 15 percent being women. Bugema College serves the Seventh-day Adventist constituency of Kenya, Uganda, and Tanzania, and is controlled by an interunion board representing the East African, Uganda, and Tanzania unions.

The farm grows much of the food needed in the Boarding Department. Water is supplied from a deep well on the school property, and since 1955 electricity has been available from the public supply.

History

History. The school was established in 1948 under the name of Bugema Training School, incorporating the East African Union Training School, which, according to the 1947 Yearbook, was formerly the Nchwanga Training School. W. N. Andrews was the acting principal, and a staff of six assisted him. Only grades 1 through 8 were offered at that time. By 1950 the plant included an administration building of six classrooms and four offices, a dining hall, and two dormitories, each housing about 80 boys. In 1948 the junior ministerial course was begun. In 1949 a two-year post-grade 6 teachers' course was begun. Although this course was approved, it was not recognized by the Uganda Department of Education; however, it prepared the way for a recognized three-year post-grade 6 course, which was first offered in 1951. In the same year a three-year post-grade 9 teachers' training course (primary teacher training course) was offered. In 1953 the school was registered with the Uganda Education Department as a senior high school, with the first high school students sitting for their Cambridge Overseas School Examination in 1955.

In 1990 the first postsecondary college students were admitted for the Junior of Arts diploma in theology. From 1993 a Bachelor of Theology degree is being awarded.

In 1992 the secondary site was relocated. See Bugema Adventist Secondary School.

Bugema Adventist Secondary School

BUGEMA ADVENTIST SECONDARY SCHOOL. A coeducational boarding secondary school operated by the Uganda Union mission on a 170-acre (70-hectare) piece of land. The secondary school as a separate institution from the college came into existence at the beginning of 1992, when it was moved from the campus that it had shared with the college since the beginning of the college in 1971.

The enrollment in 1993 was 700 students, with the number of girls equaling that of boys. The school offers programs leading to both the Uganda Certificate of Education and the Uganda Advanced Certificate of Education in both arts and sciences. The staff is comprised of nationals, with Paul Sebiranda as the headmaster.

The property was purchased in 1979 for $150,000, which was raised by different church organizations, with a view to using the premises for operating a secondary school, union offices, medical and dental offices and a Better Living center. The original name, St. Peter's Diocese School, was changed to Bulawayo Adventist Secondary School after the property was purchased in May 1979. When the school started, it had a total of 18 classrooms, administration offices, and sports grounds that included a swimming pool. Four new classrooms have been added.

The school opened in January 1980 with 160 pupils and eight teachers.

Bulgaria

BULGARIA. A republic situated in the northeastern part of the Balkan Peninsula bounded by Romania on the north, Yugoslavia and Macedonia on the west, Greece and Turkey on the south, and the Black Sea on the east. It covers an area of 42,818 square miles (1,109,000 square kilometers), and its population (1994) is estimated at 8.8 million, of which 85 percent are Bulgarians (a mixture of Slavs, who in the sixth century A.D. had occupied the area, and Bulgars, Turkic invaders who in the seventh century came around the north shore of the Black Sea). The rest are Turks, Macedonians, Gypsies, Jews, Armenians, Romanians, and Eastern European peoples. The traditional church is the Bulgarian Orthodox, which became independent early in the tenth century. About four fifths of the people belong to this church. The long Turkish rule left its mark on the religion of the country so that there are about 1 million Muslims in Bulgaria. In addition, there are small numbers of Roman Catholics, Armeno-Greeks, and Protestants. The language of Bulgaria belongs to the southern Slavic group, and of the southwestern Slavic languages is probably the closest to the Russian. It uses the Cyrillic alphabet.

The early Bulgarian state successfully challenged the Byzantine Empire, only by the turn of the tenth century to fall under its dominance. It rose again to the rank of a major Balkan power in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, but in the fourteenth century it was overrun by the Turks. Turkey controlled the land absolutely until 1878, and only in 1908 did Bulgaria attain complete independence. It was a kingdom until 1944, when, in the wake of World War II, a people's republic closely allied to the Soviet Union was proclaimed.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. The territory of Bulgaria constitutes the Bulgarian Union of Churches, a part of the Euro-Africa Division. No official reports on the organization and statistics of the Seventh-day Adventist work in Bulgaria have been received, but it has been estimated that there are about 70 churches, with approximately 6,000 members.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. According to extant records, SDA teachings were first introduced into Bulgaria in the early 1890s, when a group of German SDAs who had emigrated from the German settlements in the Crimea, Russia, and had settled in Romania, near the Bulgarian border, apparently spread their beliefs among their Romanian and Bulgarian neighbors. Their minister, G. Wagner, was later listed among the pioneers of Seventh-day Adventist work in Bulgaria (Review and Herald 110:12, Feb. 16, 1933). In 1893, L. R. Conradi, the leader of SDA work in Eastern Europe at that time, reported in the Review and Herald (70:406, June 27, 1893) that Bulgaria had been recently added to the countries entered by SDAs and that a worker of Bulgarian descent, E. S. Popoff, was soon to go there from America. A few months later he reported that he had heard of one Bulgarian Sabbathkeeper who had learned of the SDA teachings from the SDAs in Romania. In March of 1894 Conradi visited Bulgaria and reported that on that visit he had arranged for the translation and printing of several tracts in the Bulgarian language, the first of which, “Is the End Near?” was ready by the time he wrote, and two others, “The Full Assurance of Faith,” and “The Blessed Hope,” were being prepared. He also reported that Popoff’s sister had accepted SDA doctrines, and that the Bulgarian Sabbathkeeper of whom he had written earlier was teaching his neighbors in Romania. In the spring of 1897 Popoff urged support from the members elsewhere for the work in Bulgaria (ibid. 74:267, Apr. 27, 1897).

In 1898 Conradi visited Ruse (Rustchuk) and reported that on Apr. 26 he had conducted the first Seventh-day Adventist baptism in Bulgaria, baptizing two candidates, the fruits of the work carried on by A. Seefried from January of that year. When Conradi arrived, Bible studies were conducted in Bulgarian and Turkish through interpreters on alternate evenings (ibid. 75:352, May 31, 1898). At that time there were several SDAs in the city, among them certain Armenian women who had come from Constantinople (Istanbul) in Turkey.

In 1899 Ellen G. White’s Steps to Christ was translated into Bulgarian, and published in Bulgaria, the first SDA book to be translated into that language.

In the first decade of the present century there were few reports. It appears that although there was liberty for religious work, there was little promotion. It also appears that foreign workers had left the country. However, in 1908, G. Kadaleff, a native Bulgarian, returned to his country after attending an SDA training school in Germany. He worked first in Tutracan and later in Sofia, the capital, where he baptized Anna Kostova on June 3, 1911.

Bulgarian Mission Organized. In 1911 C. Motzer, a minister, came from Germany and in either that year or the next organized the work in Bulgaria (administered at that time as a part of the Balkan Mission of the East German Union Conference) into a separate Bulgarian Mission under his leadership. Stefan Konstantinoff became secretary of the mission. By 1912 a church of eight members was organized in Sofia.

Despite the difficulties created by the Balkan wars of 1911—1913 and World War I, new converts were added to the church from year to year. Some members of 50 years’ standing are alive today. However, when Guy Dail, one of the leaders of the work in Europe, visited Bulgaria in 1920, he reported that at that time there were no ordained ministers or church elders in the country, and that the church, numbering 56 members at the end of 1919 in three churches, at Sofia, Ruse (Rustchuk), and Gabrovo, had only one evangelistic worker, a licentiate, S. Konstantinoff. During this visit he baptized 24 persons, some of whom had waited more than three years for this rite. The church had no literature at all, although they expected to receive whatever publications the Hamburg Publishing House had in stock as a gift. Dail related that one lay leader of the church had expressed his thankfulness for his business success by renting a hall for evangelistic meetings for three years at his expense. Dail also reported that Alfred Thomas, a minister who had been working in Bulgaria for a number of years before World War I, was to return (Review and Herald 97:12, 13, Oct. 21, 1920).

Later Developments. In 1924 a publishing house was established in Sofia at mission headquarters (listed in the Yearbook as the Bulgarian Publishing House, in Bulgarian, Knigoisdatelstvo “Nov Zhivot”). In 1924 there were nine churches and 205 members in the mission. Growth had been steady but slow. The publications did much to spread the SDA message. For a while there was a missionary journal, Westitel Na Istinata (“Herald of Truth”), edited for a time by S. Konstantinoff. At least 20 of Ellen G. White’s books were translated into Bulgarian.

In 1933 church membership reached 500. In that year the first workers’ meeting was held in Bulgaria, at Varna, on the Black Sea, and was attended by 14 workers. Four years later Charles Sohlmann, the mission director, reported that the church, then numbering 730 members, owned a convenient 250-seat evangelistic hall at the headquarters at Sofia, which was filled to capacity by inquirers twice a week.

He also reported that in cooperation with other welfare agencies the welfare department of the church was functioning with great success in ameliorating the conditions of the poor and of those who had suffered in the several earthquakes that had affected Bulgaria. In 1936 the church opened a summer camp for children at Sgove, about a half-hour train ride from Sofia, where many underprivileged boys and girls were taken. But still there was a great shortage of church-owned buildings. In 1938 the Bulgarian Mission had only two church edifices in all the country.

The church’s work during and after World War II has not been reported abroad, and no official statistics have been published in denominational sources. It has been made known, however, that the work of the church has been growing in Bulgaria. The membership of the congregation in Sofia was estimated in the early 1960s at about 500.

Recent Developments. In 1959 the Communist authorities abolished the union council and appointed a new council that would work under their direction. In 1965 SDA workers elected a new council, naming Belcho Totev as president. But police came to the office and ordered the council to vacate the premises.

In 1974 Communist authorities appointed a council of two persons and a president. When General Conference president Robert Pierson visited Bulgaria in 1977, he gained permission for three more pastors to be placed on the council. But in 1983 the authorities removed them, and the president assumed responsibility of including whomever he wanted to be on the council. Those were hard years for the church, but it continued to grow.

In 1989, because of political changes in that part of Europe, the authorities gradually lost control over the church. In April of 1990 Euro-Africa Division president Edwin Ludescher officiated at the first election held in accordance with denominational working policy for 42 years. Agop Tachmissjan was elected president of the Bulgarian Union. On Nov. 7, 1990, the Seventh-day Adventist church was recognized officially by the Bulgarian government. In 1992 a publishing house was established in Sofia. The Bulgarian Union has demonstrated the most dramatic membership growth in the Euro-Africa Division since the fall of Communism, having nearly doubled their membership by 1994.

Mission Affiliation. The Bulgarian Mission was at first included in the East German Union Conference, but about a year later was transferred to the Levant Union Mission and remained there until the early 1920s, when it became a detached mission of the European Division. Later, when the Central European Division was organized, it became a detached mission of that division, and in the course of World War II was transferred to the Southern European Division. Now it is part of the Euro-Africa Division.

Bunch, Taylor Grant

BUNCH, TAYLOR GRANT (1885—1969). Author, pastor, executive, teacher. Born in Oregon, he attended law school and then felt the call to make the ministry his lifework. He served as pastor of some of the largest Seventh-day Adventist churches in the United States. While pastor in South Lancaster and Takoma Park, he lectured regularly in the Religion Departments of Atlantic Union College and Columbia Union College and for five years was the head of the Department of Religion at Atlantic Union College. For seven years he had charge of the Department of Religion at Loma Linda University. He served as president of three conferences, Southern Oregon, Idaho, and Michigan. During his long and active ministry he authored more than 20 books.

Bunoa, Pauliasi

BUNOA, PAULIASI (d. 1918). First ordained Fijian Seventh-day Adventist minister. He was a small boy when the first Christian missionaries reached the Fiji Islands. His father was among the first to be converted to Christianity, and for a while it was necessary for him and his family to find refuge in the bush to escape persecution. Pauliasi was educated in a mission school, which he attended for about seven years sometime in the 1870s. After teaching for a while, he was ordained to the ministry in the Wesleyan Methodist Church and spent 10 years as a missionary on the islands of New Ireland and New Britain, where he lost his entire family from malaria. Returning to Fiji, he settled at Suva Vou. After some 20 years in the ministry, he resigned from the service of the church and in the late 1890s came to Fiji. He helped J. E. Fulton write the first Fijian SDA tract on the seventh-day Sabbath. He was baptized into the Seventh-day Adventist Church in 1900, and six years later was ordained to its ministry at Cooranbong, New South Wales, Australia. To the time of his death he preached among his people with great power.

Burden, John Allen

BURDEN, JOHN ALLEN (1862—1942). Administrator. Beginning at 9 years of age he showed a deep interest and regard for the writings of Ellen G. White, and later was closely associated with Mrs. White in the development of sanitariums. In 1874 he joined the Seventh-day Adventist Church, and entered Healdsburg College in 1882. He became manager of the St. Helena Sanitarium in 1891, then from about 1901 to 1904 engaged in sanitarium work in Australia. In 1905, at Ellen White's request, he promoted sanitarium work in southern California.

After assisting in the purchase of the Glendale Sanitarium, he played an important part in the purchase of the Loma Linda property (1905). At Mrs. White's urging, and, in spite of extreme financial difficulties, he gathered together a few students and teachers and began a medical missionary school in 1906, which was incorporated in 1909 as the College of Medical Evangelists (now the Loma Linda University School of Medicine). For a time he was manager of the institution.

From 1916 to 1924 and again from 1925 to 1934 he served as manager of Paradise Valley Sanitarium.

Burden, William D.

BURDEN, WILLIAM D. (1870—1945). Pioneer Seventh-day Adventist missionary in Japan; founder of the Japan Publishing House (Fukuinsha). Reared on the Pacific Coast, he early chose to become a missionary to the Japanese people. After attending Healdsburg College from 1892 to 1896, he entered city mission work in San Francisco and volunteered to help in the mission school for the Japanese. In 1897 he married Suzanne Margery Grainger, daughter of W. C. Grainger, the first American SDA missionary to Japan, and the next year began a term of service in Japan that lasted 20 years. To foster the publishing work, he set up a small printing shop in his own house and then in 1909 led in the establishment of the Japan Publishing House. He returned to the United States 10 years later.

Bureaud, Michel Joseph

BUREAUD, MICHEL JOSEPH (1895—1958). French minister, missionary, and administrator. He was born in a Catholic home, but became a Seventh-day Adventist at an early age and was baptized into the church in 1909. He studied at the Latin Union School for three years, and in 1914 entered denominational service as a minister and missionary. In 1922 he married Luce Retournat. In 1927 he was ordained to the ministry. From 1927 to 1935 he was president of Madagascar Mission, and from 1936 to 1938 served as the first president of the Indian Ocean Union Mission. After his return to France he served as an evangelist and, between 1949 and 1951, as president of the Southwest France Conference. Called in the early 1950s to the leadership of the St. Lawrence Mission (French) in Canada, he served there from 1952 until his death.

Burgan, Walter Lee

BURGAN, WALTER LEE (1883—1940). Journalist, first director of the General Conference Press Bureau. He began his newspaper career early in life and worked on the American and the Sun of Baltimore. Shortly after accepting the Seventh-day Adventist faith, he inaugurated the Bureau of Press Relations for the General Conference (1912), and directed it until his death. He promoted friendly relations with the secular press and trained others to present SDA beliefs in the newspapers.

Burgess, Georgia Anna (Burrus)

BURGESS, GEORGIA ANNA (BURRUS) (1866—1948). One of the first Seventh-day Adventist missionaries in India, where she spent nearly 40 years. Converted at the age of 16, Georgia Burrus joined the SDA Church over the opposition of her relatives, worked her way through Healdsburg College, and later taught at a Bible Training School held at Oakland. Stirred by the needs of India, she volunteered for service there, and arrived in Calcutta in 1895. She began working as a self-supporting missionary among the secluded women of the country, while studying Bengali. In 1896, with Mae Taylor, she opened a girls' school in Calcutta. In 1903 she was married to Luther J. Burgess, and together they spent 32 years pioneering work among the Bengali-, Hindi-, Urdu-, and Khasi-speaking peoples. So great was their devotion to India that when they were in the United States in 1904 because of the husband's failing health since the mission board had no funds to send them back, they devised a plan to sell 20,000 copies of the Bible Training School (at 10 cents each) to defray the travel expenses. They remained in India until 1935, then returned to the United States and retired near the Paradise Valley Sanitarium in National City, California.

Burgess, Luther J.

BURGESS, LUTHER J. (1874—1946). Missionary. In 1901 he was appointed secretary and treasurer of the India Mission. Two years later he married Georgia Burrus, who had preceded him to India in 1895 as the first Seventh-day Adventist worker among the women of India. The Burgesses pioneered work in the Bengali, Hindi, Urdu, and Khasi languages. Failing health forced his return to the United States in 1935, where he retired in California.

Burkina Faso

BURKINA FASO (formerly Upper Volta). A military republic in western Africa, independent since 1960, bounded on the south by Côte d'Ivoire, Ghana, Togo, and Benin; on the north and west by Mali, and on the east by Niger. Its area is 105,869 square miles (275,000 kilometers); the population (1994) is about 10 million. About 30 percent are Muslim and 10 percent are Christians (9 percent Catholic and 1 percent Pentecostal). There are many tribal languages, but French is the official language. The area of Burkina Faso was controlled by an African empire of the Mossi people from the eleventh century, before it came under the European influence. It became a French colony in the last decade of the nineteenth century.

It is located in the Sahel area, south of the Sahara, and has suffered many years of drought and famine. The help sent by Seventh-day Adventists to this suffering people has opened many doors and hearts, and made SDAs well known in the country.

The territory of Burkina Faso is assigned to Burkina Faso Mission, part of the Sahel Union Mission, which in turn is in the Africa-Indian Ocean Division.

The country was entered at the end of 1971 by H. Kempf and his family, French missionaries who came from Togo. He secured official recognition from the government for our denomination to work in the country. In 1972 a one acre (one-hectare) piece of land was purchased in the very center of the capital city of Ouagadougou, where SDAs established an open-air evangelistic center. Several evangelistic campaigns were held in 1973, 1974, 1980, 1992, and 1993.

Burkina territory now is an organized mission with three churches, three companies, and 309 church members. An agricultural center, established in 1977, is located at Bazega. ADRA is developing a number of projects in this area.

Burley, Sergius Gregory

BURLEY, SERGIUS GREGORY (1884—1941). Evangelist among the Russian and Ukrainian immigrants in North America, educator, editor, and translator. He was born in the town of Boguslav, Ukraine, Russia, in a Greek Catholic family and in his earlier years served as an altar boy, planning to become a priest. He received his earlier schooling in a town school in his native city (1893—1897). His religious inclination led him to search the Bible for himself, and eventually to join the Baptists. In 1903 he was baptized by Johann Perk, and joined the Seventh-day Adventist Church in Boguslav. Because of persecution from his relatives and friends he emigrated to Canada and there attended Portage Plains Academy (1906—1909). Afterward he went to Union College (1909—1910). He was ordained in 1910 and devoted his life to work among the Russian and Ukrainian immigrants in the United States and Canada as an evangelist and teacher. For eight years he conducted a Russian Department at Sheyenne River Academy (1910—1918). During the same time, he established several Russian churches in North Dakota and one at Yale, Virginia (1914). In 1918 he went to Chicago to work for the Russian population there, and while there established a Russian Department at Broadview Theological Seminary. From 1919 to 1921 he edited Znamenie Vremeni (the Russian edition of Signs of the Times) and prepared Russian translations of Bible lessons and other publications. Later he was sent to Riga, Latvia, to work among the Russian emigrants, and established a church there. After his return to the United States he preached in Virginia, New Jersey, and Illinois. He was married in 1912 to Beatrice Lucinda Tucker, a music teacher at Sheyenne River Academy.

Burman, Charles A.

BURMAN, CHARLES A. (1870—1940). Teacher, evangelist, and administrator. He was born near Eau Claire, Wisconsin. His parents became Seventh-day Adventists when he was a child, and through their influence he chose to dedicate his life to the ministry. He was educated in a public school (1882—1887), Minneapolis Conference School (1888—1890), and at Union College, where he attended several semesters between 1892 and 1897. In 1897 he married Leona Summey. He began his evangelistic work as a tent master in 1893 at Jefferson, South Dakota. In 1900 he was ordained to the ministry. He was a recognized administrator and served as president of South Dakota Conference (1904—1906), the first president of Alberta Conference (1906—1914), and the first principal of Alberta Industrial Academy (see Canadian Union College), and president of Upper Columbia Conference (1915—1916). Ill health forced him into temporary retirement, but after a year's rest he became instructor in Bible at Walla Walla College and later dean of men at Emmanuel Missionary College (see Andrews University). When in 1935 failing health made outdoor work desirable, he undertook the landscaping of the campus at Emmanuel Missionary College while teaching Bible at the academy.

Burns, Nelson C.

BURNS, NELSON C. (1897—1979). Missionary, Bible teacher. He was head of the Bible Department of Avondale College from 1944 until the 1960s. He was known as a man who inspired Bible study, evangelism, and mission service; one who saw the good and the potential through Christ in every student. After serving widely throughout the Australasian Division (now the South Pacific Division), he retired as honorary chaplain at the Coronella Retirement Homes in Melbourne, still the consummate Christian gentleman who endeared himself to the people.

She received her doctorate in education and English from Columbia University and served as guest professor at Andrews University. She coauthored 60 basal readers and guidebooks for the General Conference Department of Education. She also wrote an autobiography and many articles that appeared in Seventh-day Adventist periodicals. Burrell received the Citation of Honor from the General Conference Department of Education in 1972, was included in the Andrews University Hall of Fame in 1973, and in 1975 was cited at the General Conference session in Vienna, Austria, as one of the 10 most outstanding women of the SDA Church.

Burrus, Noni (Or Nanibala) Biswas

BURRUS, NONI (OR NANIBALA) BISWAS (d. 1958). One of the first Seventh-day Adventist converts in India. She was born in a high caste Hindu family in Calcutta, India, was married as a young girl, but by the time the first SDA workers arrived in India she had been widowed and was living in her father's house. There Georgia Burrus, an SDA missionary, while visiting the zenanas (women's quarters) in the neighborhood of the mission, met her and presented Christianity to her. When she accepted the new beliefs, her family threatened to kill her. She escaped during the night and came to the mission school, where she learned to read and write, and soon was baptized, taking the name Burrus after the missionary who introduced her to Christianity. After Dr. Place announced a nursing course at the Calcutta Sanitarium, she was one of the first students. About 1901 she accompanied Dr. Place's family to the United States to continue her education. After training at Battle Creek Sanitarium and in Boston, Massachusetts, she became a registered nurse and a masseuse. For more than 40 years afterward she practiced her calling in the town of Attleboro, Massachusetts.

Burton Adventist Academy

BURTON ADVENTIST ACADEMY. A coeducational day school offering grades kindergarten through eighth and high school, located in Arlington, Texas. Originally known as Fort Worth Seventh-day Adventist Church School, it began in the early 1900s in the Seventh-day Adventist church at 2020 Hemphill Street, south of downtown Fort Worth. The school later relocated to Lipscomb Avenue and adopted the name Fort Worth Junior Academy. In 1961 Mr. and Mrs. Harry F. Burton graciously donated 10 acres (four hectares) of land, and Fort Worth Junior Academy moved to its present location under the name Harry F. Burton Junior Academy.

In 1985 the school received its present name with the addition of a kindergarten and grades 11 and 12. Burton Adventist Academy is convenient to most areas of the Dallas/Fort Worth Metroplex and has a strong academic program. Three high school levels of transcripts are offered. The campus consists of the main building containing the administrative office, classrooms, library, and cafeteria. Adjacent to the main building are the gymnasium and two fully equipped softball fields. Building began in the summer of 1993 on additional classroom facilities.

In 1969 Harry F. Burton Junior Academy had six teachers, including the school board chair, with an annual budget of $59,000. In 1993 the school today includes 25 staff members with an annual budget of $1 million.

Burundi

BURUNDI. A central African republic, independent since July 1962. Formerly known as Urundi, it had for many years been a part of German East Africa, then after World War I, part of the Belgian mandate called Rwanda-Urundi. Burundi has an area of 10,740 square miles (27,800 square kilometers) and a population (1994) of 6.1 million, almost all Africans. In 1966 the kingdom was replaced by the republic of Burundi. Its capital is Bujumbura. The ruling king at the time independence was granted was Mwami Mwambutsa IV. Two official languages are used, Kirundi, the national language, and French, the diplomatic language. Burundi is mountainous, and agriculture is the chief occupation of the people. Serious famines have devastated the country at times. Burundi is bounded on the north by Rwanda, on the east and south by Tanzania, and on the west by Lake Tanganyika and Zaïre.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. The territory of Burundi constitutes the Burundi Mission, which is attached to the Africa-Indian Ocean Division. Statistics (1992): churches, 104; members, 35,471; ordained ministers, 24; licensed ministers, 33. Headquarters: Bujumbura.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. The first SDA worker to enter Burundi (Urundi until 1962) was D. E. Delhove, who came from Rwanda to open a mission in 1925. On a site some 40 miles (65 kilometers) from Usumbura, on a road running north to Cyangugu, he opened the Buganda station. Negotiations leading up to acquiring some 125 acres (50 hectares) of land were concluded in 1936. In 1927 Maxime Duploux took over the work in Buganda.

In 1936 a concession of 25 acres (10 hectares) was obtained for another mission, in the hills about eight hours' walk to the east of Buganda, at an elevation of 5,905 feet (1,800 meters). This mission, called Ndora, had a climate more suitable for European missionaries, and was still accessible to the schools and church companies built up in connection with Buganda. After the opening of Ndora in 1937 by H. J. Moolman of South Africa, Buganda was operated under an African district leader. Moolman was followed by W. R. Vail (April 1938—February 1941).

During the early years the work in Urundi was conducted as a detached mission in the East Congo Union, and later in the Central African and Congo unions. In 1947 Urundi was joined to Rwanda in an organization known as the Rwanda-Urundi Field, with A. L. Davy as president and H. J. Bennett as secretary-treasurer. Headquarters were at Gitwe, in Rwanda. This relationship continued with varying degrees of change until January 1960, when the country became the Urundi Field, with headquarters at Ndora and with F. L. Bell as president and Labani Biyayire as secretary-treasurer.

Until 1961 the school program in Urundi was limited to the first eight years of school, the last two of which were taught at Ndora Mission only. In April 1961 Ndora Mission was authorized by the Rwanda-Urundi Union to offer the ninth grade.

In January 1961 Mariko Sembagare was called from the North Congo Field to be president of the Urundi Field.

In 1963 the Burundi Field was divided into two parts along the main road running north from the capital, Bujumbura (formerly Usumbura), to Kayanza. The western section, which contained the major portion of the church membership, was known as the West Burundi Field, with the officers as formerly in Urundi Field; the east section was administered directly from the Central African Union office in Bujumbura until 1964, when it was organized as the East Burundi Field.

Because of better communications and improved living conditions, the West Burundi Field headquarters were reestablished at Buganda in 1972.

All Seventh-day Adventist primary schools were taken over by the government in 1980. In 1982 Kivoga, a secondary school, also was taken over, but was given back to the church in September of that year. In 1984 Rwanda became a union, and the two Burundi fields were combined to form the Burundi Mission.

In 1983 all denominations in Burundi were persecuted by the government of that period. The Seventh-day Adventist Church was outlawed, and pastors and believers were prohibited from gathering for worship. In 1987 a new government allowed the churches to be opened again. Since then the Seventh-day Adventist Church has become well known throughout Burundi, and its membership has increased from 17,000 in 1987 to 34,000 at the end of 1992.

BUSINESS AND PROFESSIONAL FOUNDATION (BPF). An association begun in 1966 in the Kentucky-Tennessee Conference. Realizing the difficulties encountered by small congregations in constructing suitable church buildings, a group of concerned laypersons, headed by James Ladd, M.D., and E. L. Marley, then president of the conference, organized BPF for the purpose of making low-interest loans to such congregations. Since then, the foundation has assisted with the construction of nearly 40 church buildings and has made loans of nearly $1 million.

Butler, George Ide

BUTLER, GEORGE IDE (1834—1918). Minister, administrator. His grandfather was a Baptist preacher who had been governor of Vermont (1826—1828). Although the home of Butler's parents had been a center for early Adventist activities, until the age of 22 young Butler had leanings to infidelity, but was upright and honest. In 1859 he settled on a farm near Waukon, Iowa, became a deacon in the local Adventist church, and then an elder. Upon the defection of Snook and Brinkerhoff, president and treasurer, respectively, of the Iowa Conference (see Marion Party), Butler was elected president of the conference and threw himself energetically into reviving the church in Iowa, divided by the defection. Two years later he was ordained to the ministry. He was called to the presidency of the General Conference in 1871 and showed a keen interest in the development of the institutions and activities of the church organization. During his first term of office, which extended from 1871 to 1874, he was active in raising funds to establish the first Seventh-day Adventist college in Battle Creek, Michigan, and in establishing the Pacific Press Publishing Company, in California. Beginning in 1881 he was for many years president of the SDA Publishing Association, and saw the rapid advance of colporteur work. He served a second time as General Conference president from 1880 to 1888.

On a visit to Europe in 1884 he laid the groundwork for publishing houses in Basel, Switzerland; Christiania (Oslo), Norway; and Grimsby, England. The impetus he gave to the SDA cause in Europe resulted in notable expansion.

In spite of his iron will and strong constitution, he was forced to retire in 1888 for a period. He bought a farm in Florida and planted an orange grove. Because his wife became an invalid the next year, he stayed on in retirement 12 years longer. After her death late in 1901, he was elected president of the Florida Conference, and the next year was called to the presidency of the Southern Union Conference and the Southern Publishing Association. During the last years of his life he held no administrative post, but wrote various articles for SDA periodicals and did some preaching.

Butterfield, Charles Leslie

BUTTERFIELD, CHARLES LESLIE (1879—1935). Missionary in Korea, conference administrator. He was brought up in a Seventh-day Adventist home and attended the Minneapolis preparatory school and later took the ministerial course at Battle Creek College (1898—1900). After that he canvassed, taught in the winters, and took part in evangelistic meetings in the summers, first in Minnesota and later in western Oregon. Ordained in 1907, he went the next year with his wife (née Mary M. Winnegar) to Korea and served as the first superintendent of the Korean Mission (1908—1922). Because of the failing health of his wife and the educational needs of his children, he returned to America and served as president of the Saskatchewan (1922—1926), Carolina (1926—1932), and Kentucky-Tennessee (1932—1934) conferences.

Butz, Edwin Sebastian

BUTZ, EDWIN SEBASTIAN (1864—1956). Missionary to Pitcairn and Tonga islands, pastor, teacher, and conference administrator. In 1895 he, his wife, and their daughter sailed on the Pitcairn as missionaries to Pitcairn Island. Later he pioneered Seventh-day Adventist work in the Tonga Islands. From 1906 on he worked in Australia, serving as vice president or president of the South Australian, Tasmanian, Queensland, and West Australian conferences successively. Later he was preceptor and teacher of Bible and home nursing at the Australasian Missionary College, and still later he pastored churches in northern New Zealand and southern Australia. His daughter, Alma, married Norman Wiles, who pioneered SDA work in the New Hebrides.

Byington, John

BYINGTON, JOHN (1798—1887). Pioneer minister and first president of the General Conference. His father, Justus, was a soldier in the Revolutionary War, an itinerant Methodist Episcopal preacher, and later one of the founders of the Methodist Protestant Church, becoming an early president of its Vermont Conference. At 7 years of age John first came under the conviction of sin, and at 18 (1816) was converted. Because his mother was a woman of great diffidence, he conducted family worship when his father was absent. He became active in Methodist laity work, but at 21 years of age his health failed, and for three years he suffered depression. However, encouraged by prayer, he returned to his work, dividing his time between farming and preaching.

Since he was actively antislavery in sentiment, and the leadership of the Methodist Episcopal Church opposed antislavery activities, he withdrew from that denomination and joined the new antislavery Wesleyan Methodist Connection, helping erect a church and parsonage that are still standing at Morley, New York. He went as a lay delegate to the Wesleyan organizational General Conference meeting in Cleveland, Ohio, in 1844; and later became a Wesleyan minister, pastoring the church at Lisbon, New York. He regularly entertained Indians and Blacks in his home, and is said to have maintained a station of the Underground Railroad at Buck's Bridge, New York, where he lived on a farm.

In 1844 he heard a Millerite sermon in Cleveland, Ohio, but was not deeply impressed. In 1852, on reading a copy of the Review and Herald, he began to keep the Sabbath, against bitter opposition from friends. Shortly afterward James and Ellen White visited his home at Buck's Bridge. For three years he conducted Sabbath meetings in his home, then erected and owned a church building on his own property. This may have been the first Seventh-day Adventist-built church, thought to have been completed earlier than the Battle Creek church, built the same year. In a nearby home his daughter Martha (later the wife of G. W. Amadon) taught what has been remembered as the first SDA elementary school (1853). Also, one of the earliest Sabbath schools was conducted in Byington's home.

At the request of James White, Byington moved to Michigan in 1858 and spent 15 years in self-supporting ministerial work, traveling throughout the state. He was closely associated with James White and J. N. Andrews in aggressive planning for the growing church. In 1863, at the initial organization of the General Conference at Battle Creek, Michigan, he became the first president and held that office for two one-year terms. James White, who was elected first, declined the office.

From 1852 until his death Byington served the cause he loved, contributing generously of his means to the cause. Being older in years than his fellow SDA ministers, he became affectionately known as "Father Byington."

Cady, Benjamin Jacob

CADY, BENJAMIN JACOB (1863—1927). Missionary. Educated at Battle Creek College, he preached in South Dakota (1884—1887) and in Wisconsin (1887—1892). He was ordained in 1889. In 1893 he sailed on the second trip of the Pitcairn for service in the South Pacific. For 17 years he worked mostly in the Society Islands, 16 years as superintendent of the Eastern Polynesian Union Mission, and one year as superintendent of the Central Polynesian Mission. For a time he was chaplain and manager of the Sydney Sanitarium, and then preached in Queensland (1911—1912). On returning to the United States, he worked in Montana (1913—1914), Washington (1914—1917), and Oregon (1917—1923) before retirement.

Cady, Marion Ernest

CADY, MARION ERNEST (1866—1948). Educator and author. A graduate of Battle Creek College (1893), he became head of the Science Department at Union College (1894—1898), president of Healdsburg College (1899—1903), and of Walla Walla College (1905—1911). He also was a Missionary Volunteer and educational secretary on the Pacific Coast for seven years. Later he was educational secretary of the Columbia Union Conference (1921), president of what is now Columbia Union College (1921—1922), and field secretary for the General Conference Educational Department for several years, until 1926. His published works include Fundamentals of Christian Education, Early Educational Pioneers, Better Voice for Better Speech, and The Education That Educates.

Cagayan Valley Sanitarium and Hospital

CAGAYAN VALLEY SANITARIUM AND HOSPITAL. A 100-bed general hospital operated by the North Philippine Union at Santiago, Isabela, in the mountains of the northeastern part of Luzon, Philippines. The institution opened on Mar. 16, 1959, in the former Northeast Luzon Mission office building, with equipment and supplies donated by the Loma Linda medical alumni and former American missionaries to the Philippines Dr. B. P. Ingersoll, of Tomah, Wisconsin, and Dr. A. C. Atwood, of Modesto, California.

The original hospital staff consisted of C. A. Fernando, medical director and business manager; Leonardo Rolle, intern; Mrs. A. P. Fernando, head nurse; and Miss E. A. Pasamonte, dietitian. Later another physician, Gideon G. Pilar, joined the staff. A full complement of hospital personnel was soon recruited.

The hospital serves the entire Cagayan Valley, and patients come also from various lowland tribes and mountain peoples. In 1969 a sprawling X-shaped, million-peso, 50-bed-capacity building was opened on an 11-acre (4.5-hectare) lot just outside the town. In 1971 a three-apartment building was constructed on the compound for hospital workers. In 1972 a doctor's residence was added. In 1973 renovations included a new apartment complex, a dormitory, a 50,000-gallon (189,250-liter) water tank, a children's playground, and upgrading of the hospital rooms. In 1976, 12 air-conditioned suites were added. Another 14 suites were added in 1992 and 1993.

Medical Directors/Presidents: C. A. Fernando, 1959—1971; O. C. Pilar, 1971—1972; L. R. Garcia, 1972— .

Calbayog Sanitarium and Hospital

CALBAYOG SANITARIUM AND HOSPITAL. A 17-bed medical institution operated by the Central Philippine Union Mission in Calbayog City, Samar, third-largest island in the Philippines. A two-story residence was leased for five years by L. E. Montana, then president of the East Visayan Mission, pending the acquisition of a hospital site. Dr. O. B. Varona, former assistant medical director of the Bacolod Sanitarium and Hospital, was appointed as chief of clinic. He arrived with his family on Sept. 13, 1973, bringing 23 crates of medical equipment, supplies, and medicines. Renovation and partition of the rented building started immediately. Dr. William Richli, a self-supporting missionary doctor, helped install the electrical wiring and X-ray.

On Nov. 9, 1973, with only five workers, the clinic was opened. With no adequate seating facilities, patients had to stand in a waiting line. Outpatients averaged 70 daily. Dr. and Mrs. Gaudioso Mabaquiao, as well as medical interns in training at the Miller Sanitarium and Hospital, were lent temporarily to take care of the influx of patients. Later Dr. Roy Day, ophthalmologist and otolaryngologist, joined the staff. Using the clinic as a base, he has done much in projecting a favorable image of Seventh-day Adventist medical and welfare work in Samar and Leyte through the promotion of his Sight for the Curable Blind program, which is sponsored by such civic organizations as the Rotary Club and Kiwanis International.

From its status as a clinic it grew into a hospital and was transferred to a new site in 1984. A five-acre (two-hectare) plot less than two miles from the city center, the structure faces the National Highway, where buses ply the route from the southern Philippines to the northern Philippines.

Staff houses were built to accommodate the workers. In 1988 a guest house was added, with SIMS (Students for International Missionary Service) students being the first guests.

A food factory was opened in 1989 that produces wheat bread, soy milk, and vegetarian products. A Health Food Center building was constructed in 1991 that serves as a canteen and bakeshop for the general public. This was made possible by a donation from Dr. Eliseo and Esther Bautista of Glendale, California.

Hospital facilities were updated by acquiring a 300 MA X-ray machine, a semiautomated chemical analyzer, a cardiac monitor, and a Stateside ambulance.

Medical Directors/Presidents: O. B. Varona, 1973—1982; Lorna N. Madrio (acting), 1983—1984; Manuel S. Daprosa (acting), 1984—1985; Teresa L. Aguilar, 1985—1990; Annabelle O. Ursales, 1990— .

Caldwell, Joseph Edmond

CALDWELL, JOSEPH EDMOND (1855—1923). Physician, missionary. A graduate of the University of Iowa with a Ph.D. degree, and later (1880) with an M.D. degree, he taught at Healdsburg College (1887—1891). After a brief stay in Tennessee, he served at the sanitarium at Claremont, South Africa (1892—1894). Appointed to mission service in the Cook Islands, he sailed on the third voyage of the Pitcairn in 1894, and worked for eight years on Rarotonga. Returning to the United States, he worked for eight years in the South, including terms at Graysville Sanitarium (1903—1904); Nashville Treatment Rooms (1904—1905); Knoxville, Tennessee (1905—1906); Florida Sanitarium; and Huntsville, Alabama (1906—1911).

Caldwell, Robert Archibald

CALDWELL, ROBERT ARCHIBALD (1879—1966). Pioneer missionary to the Philippines. Robert Caldwell was born in Portarlington, Victoria, Australia. He and his mother were among the earliest to accept the Sabbath truth at Portarlington in the late 1890s, while Ellen White was in Australia. After a period at Avondale College he connected with the colporteur work in Victoria and was appointed publishing secretary of the Western Australian Conference at the turn of the century.

In 1904 he accompanied Pastor G. F. Jones to Singapore, visiting Java and Borneo en route. On his journey to the Philippines in 1905 he traveled through Penang and Bangkok, but in all these places he found it difficult to sell English books. He enjoyed great success in the Philippines because he sold Spanish books. While furloughing in Australia in 1908 he married Mary Schowe, who accompanied him on his return to the Philippines. With the exception of periods spent in China and Japan, he remained in the Philippines until 1919. In 1920 he was preceptor at Avondale College. For a time he was engaged in evangelism with Pastor A. Smart. He was again connected with the colporteur work in Tasmania and Victoria during 1924—1925.

Calendar Reform

CALENDAR REFORM. A change in an existing calendar. The calendar currently in use in most nations, the Gregorian, is the result of a calendar reform in 1582 that corrected two erroneous suppositions of the Julian calendar, which had been in use since 45 B.C.—namely that the year contains exactly $365\frac{1}{4}$ days and that 235 lunar months exactly equal 19 solar years. That revision corrected an accumulated error of 10 days and stopped the calendar from slipping farther out of line with the seasons. (See SB, Nos. 360—363, or any standard encyclopedia.)

This article concerns itself only with those attempts to reform the calendar that have occurred during the history of the Seventh-day Adventist Church and that, if adopted, would have disrupted the historic cycle of the week. Calendar reform that would leave intact the weekly cycle is not the concern of the SDA Church. The church's position was defined in a letter from the General Conference Executive Committee to Secretary of State John Foster Dulles in 1955: "We are not opposed to calendar reform per se, but we are opposed to any change that would contribute to national or international disunity, economic perplexity, or religious confusion and distress."

Neither the Julian nor the Gregorian calendar interfered with the weekly cycle.

Concerning the reform of the Julian calendar by Pope Gregory XIII in 1582, we are told: "Thus, every imaginable proposition was made; only one idea was never mentioned, viz. the abandonment of the seven-day week" (Catholic Encyclopedia, vol. 9, p. 251, art. "Lilius"). "It is to be noted that in the Christian period the order of days of the week has never been interrupted. Thus, when Gregory XIII reformed the calendar, in 1582, Thursday, 4 October, was followed by Friday, 15 October. So in England, in 1752, Wednesday, 2 September, was followed by Thursday, 14 September" (ibid., vol. 3, p. 740, art. "Chronology").

Among the hundreds of proposals made to improve the Gregorian calendar, only a few have received much attention. Among these are the Edwards Perpetual Calendar, devised by Lt. Com. Willard E. Edwards of the United States Navy, and the World Calendar. Both have 12 months, divided into four equal 91-day quarters of three months each, containing 30-30-31 in the Edwards Perpetual Calendar, and 31-30-30 days in the plan of the World Calendar Association. The 12 months contain 364 days, leaving one "blank day" (two in leap years) outside the count of the months and the weeks. An earlier proposal with strong backing in the 1920s and 1930s was the Moses B. Cotsworth plan, which, because of heavy financial backing by George Eastman, millionaire Kodak manufacturer, came to be called the Eastman Calendar. This calendar had 13 months, each beginning on Sunday and containing exactly four weeks (28 days), making the 13 months contain 364 days.

Advantages claimed by promoters of these calendars are commercial, economic, statistical, and most recently, religious. Adoption of the World Calendar, which was aggressively promoted for a time, will, it is claimed: (1) fix the year in perpetuity; (2) retain and largely equalize the 12 months; (3) retain and equalize the half years; (4) retain and equalize the quarter years; (5) group the months uniformly within the quarters; (6) provide 13 complete weeks within each quarter and uniformly group these weeks; (7) reduce the inequality between months from as much as three days to one day, and establish an equal working month; (8) stabilize the dates of Easter, Christmas, and other religious holidays.

Opponents of the World Calendar, among whom are Seventh-day Adventists, claim it will: (1) upset established religious customs and habits; (2) substitute a spurious or artificial week for the historic seven-day cycle; (3) create new religious controversy; (4) exalt materialism at the expense of religious emphasis and conscience; (5) create working difficulties for millions of conscientious observers of Sabbath and Sunday who would be forced to observe their rest days on working days of the week during most of each seven-year period; (6) compound educational problems for millions of students and teachers who would not attend classes on the seventh or the first day of the historic week.

Two other calendars that have had some backing would achieve most of the objectives of the above proposals without disrupting the weekly cycle. One, called Jubilee Calendar, was proposed by Cecil L. Woods, dean (1948—1954) of Pacific Union College, Angwin, California. The Woods proposal would allow the convenient reckoning of the year at 364 days, and would insert 71 intercalary weeks into the calendar within a 400-year period, according to the following rule: A week is intercalated between the last of December and first of January at the beginning of years divisible by 5, except those ending in 25 or 75, or divisible by 400. This week would have a special name—Jubilee Week, and could be considered the first week of a Jubilee Year, but not as part of any month or of any quarter. Records for the week would be kept separately, making the rest of the year comparable to all other years of 364 days. Another Jubilee Calendar, proposed by a number of Jewish bodies, differs from Woods's proposal in its intercalation of the 71 weeks in 400 years at intervals of five or six years in irregular sequences.

The Woods plan was submitted to the World Calendar Association by Dr. Alvin W. Johnson, secretary of the International Religious Liberty Association, on Jan. 8, 1951, as a compromise plan that might secure the backing of Seventh-day Adventists and Jews and of Sundaykeeping organizations to whom the observance of a particular day is important. The principle of maintaining an unbroken weekly cycle was shrugged aside in a 15-page evaluation of the Jubilee Calendar sent to Johnson and Woods in March 1951. The report quoted Dr. Henry Smith Leiper, associate general secretary of the World Council of Churches: "Shall the World Calendar, which stabilizes our days along scientific and mathematical lines, be denied to the world because of the opposition of minority groups? Must all our days continue to wander throughout the calendar in order to prevent one wandering day for the opposition of the minority because of their own particular religion?"

"It is difficult to conceive," said the report, "that God would choose one day as of more value and importance than another."

History

History. Calendar reform in the twentieth century received its impetus, fittingly, from a statistician, Moses B. Cotsworth (1859—1943). Challenged by the uneven distribution of time in the months of the Gregorian calendar, he set out to create a calendar that would lend itself to more exact comparative statistical analysis. His new calendar, described above, received its first endorsement in 1909 from the Canadian Royal Society. Encouraged, Cotsworth organized the International Fixed Calendar League, and in 1923 or 1924 secured the financial support of George Eastman.

Meanwhile other individuals and organizations began to give the subject study. Notable among these were the International Astronomical Union, which in 1922 decided that some revision of the calendar was desirable, though it did not approve a specific plan of revision. About the same time the International Chamber of Commerce approved reform of the calendar and requested that the League of Nations appoint a special committee to study the problem.

When in 1923 such a committee was created, calendar reformers began to send in their plans. Of the some 185 (some sources give 187) plans submitted, only three were deemed worthy of consideration. One of these was the Cotsworth plan. Determining that the next step toward calendar reform must be the arousing of widespread public interest in the question, the committee in 1926 recommended that member nations of the league appoint committees to consider calendar revision, each nation through this medium to report to an international conference at which the final form of a new calendar for the world could be adopted. The committee agreed unanimously “that no reform can be effected without the consent of all, or almost all the important bodies interested, among which ‘religious bodies’ were placed first.”

In 1928 the Pan-American Union, meeting in Havana, recommended not only that member nations appoint national committees on calendar simplification but also that they hold an international conference. Thereupon, in December 1928 a resolution was introduced into the U.S. Congress authorizing the president to call such an international conference or to accept on behalf of the United States an invitation from some other nation to attend such a conference. This bill—known as House Joint Resolution 334—presented the question of revision essentially in terms of Cotsworth’s plan.

When extended public hearings on the bill were held before the House Foreign Affairs Committee, SDA leaders joined with other groups to oppose endorsement of a proposal that would upset the weekly cycle. Protests against the “blank day” feature of the plan were so effective that similar resolutions introduced into the House of Representatives on 15 Mar. and Mar. 29, 1929, omitted the preamble favoring the blank day device. Neither of these resolutions was passed. No such resolution has since received public consideration either by Congress or by any of its committees.

In July of 1928 a Calendar Committee was brought into existence, with George Eastman as chairman. Because the United States was not a member of the League of Nations, this committee had no official status. In October 1931 the calendar reform question was submitted to the Fourth General Conference of the Committee on Communications and Transit in Geneva. Present were 111 delegates from 42 nations. Eleven SDA leaders were present to oppose the plan: Charles S. Longacre, secretary of the International Religious Liberty Association; Jean Nussbaum, France; Arthur S. Maxwell, General Conference; L. L. Caviness and S. Rasmussen, southern Europe; R. A. Anderson, Australia; A. Vollmer, Germany; G. E. Nord and P. G. Nelson, Scandinavian countries; T. T. Babienco, Baltic States; and J. I. Robison, Southern African Division. (For an account of the proceedings, including an account of how Longacre produced a letter from Secretary of State Henry Stimson that flatly contradicted the claim of Charles F. Marvin to be the official representative of the United States government, see Nathaniel Krum, Charles S. Longacre, pp. 65—68.) The committee took no action, giving three reasons: the troubled state of the world, pronounced religious opposition, and lack of agreement among the calendar revisionists.

Calendar reform from 1930 to 1960 was largely the story of one American woman, Elisabeth Achelis, and the organization she founded in 1930, the World Calendar Association of the United States. A fervent backer of the “twelve-month equal-quarter plan,” which she rechristened the World Calendar, this woman, who claimed to have heard a voice telling her “You must work for this plan,” invested her ample fortune and talents in the cause of calendar reform.

During 1930 the World Calendar Association enrolled between 2,000 and 3,000 members, and began to publish a quarterly Journal of Calendar Reform. Here was the first attempt to promote continuous study of the calendar on the broadest international basis. By 1956 the association had 10,000 members. Subsidiary organizations had been set up in Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Mexico, Panama, Uruguay, Peru, Colombia, Belgium, England, Germany, France, Denmark, Hungary, Ireland, Italy, Spain, Switzerland, Turkey, and elsewhere.

Miss Achelis resigned as president of the association in April 1956, but only to devote fulltime to persuading American authorities to support the World Calendar proposal before the United Nations. In that year also the headquarters were transferred from New York City to Ottawa, Canada, and the organization was renamed the International World Calendar Association.

Notable defeats were suffered by calendar reform backers, with defeat of two bills in the United States House of Representatives during the late 1940s. H. R. 1242, introduced on Jan. 23, 1947, by Joseph R. Farrington, delegate from Hawaii, asked Congress to approve adoption of The Edwards Perpetual Calendar for use in the United States and all its territories, effective Jan. 1, 1950. H. R. 1345, introduced into the House of Representatives on Jan. 27, 1947, by Representative John Kee of the Fifth District of West Virginia, asked Congress to approve adoption of the World Calendar. Both sponsors requested that the president place their projects before the United Nations, with the recommendation that it be approved there by the General Assembly for use in the whole world at the same date, Jan. 1, 1950.

Even more crushing reverses were suffered in 1950, 1954, and 1956 before the United Nations. In 1950 the Committee of Fifteen of the United Nations declined to consider the World Calendar plan. Working with the delegates were the following SDA leaders: Jean Nussbaum for southern Europe, the Netherlands, Poland, and Haiti; Arthur S. Maxwell for the United Kingdom; G. Arthur Keough for the Middle East; C. P. Sorensen for the Far East; B. F. Perez for Mexico, Central America, and South America; H. L. Rudy for Canada; L. G. Mookerjee for Southern Asia; Frank H. Yost for the United States.

In 1954 the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations considered a proposal for calendar revision (the World Calendar) by India and Yugoslavia. The council, in a compromise resolution, referred the question to the governments represented in the United Nations, to “study the problem and furnish their views by some time early in 1955.” Views of the governments were then to be considered at the resumed nineteenth session in 1955. Of the 41 governments that replied to the questionnaire, only five favored the plan. This resolution set the stage for an emphatic repudiation of the World Calendar proposal.

Three days before the Economic and Social Council began its twenty-first session in New York on Apr. 17, 1956, the World Calendar Association wrote the president of the council requesting that the calendar item be withdrawn from the agenda. Because of the lack of interest or the disapproval in the replies received from the nations to the questionnaires sent out by the secretary of the United Nations, the association thought it advisable to postpone discussion of the question.

The council, by 15 votes to none, with three abstentions (Czechoslovakia, Canada, and the USSR), adjourned sine die without consideration of the plan for a reform of the Gregorian calendar. The proposal for adjournment was made by the representative of the Netherlands, who said there was at present not enough support throughout the world to justify adoption of a new world calendar. Of the 33 nations that replied, three approved: Monaco (if universal), Nepal, and Thailand. Two, Yugoslavia and Iran, recommended further study. Five—Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Ireland, and Paraguay—felt no study should be undertaken or proposal approved without the concurrence of the Roman Catholic Church. Twenty-five nations opposed: New Zealand, Union of South Africa, Australia, Burma, Finland, Israel, Italy, Japan, Switzerland, Great Britain, United States, Netherlands, Pakistan, Philippines, Portugal, Canada, China, France, Norway, Sweden, Belgium, Denmark, Lebanon, Mexico, and Syria.

On Mar. 21, 1956, the United States government had presented its position through the following release from the State Department: “The United States government does not favor any action by the United Nations to revise the present calendar. This government cannot in any way promote a change of this nature, which would intimately affect every inhabitant of this country, unless such a reform were favored by a substantial majority of the citizens of the United States acting through their representatives in the Congress of the United States. There is no evidence of such support in the United States for calendar reform. Large numbers of United States citizens oppose the plan for calendar reform which is now before the Economic and Social Council. Their opposition is based on religious grounds, since the introduction of a ‘blank day’ at the end of each year would disrupt the seven-day sabbatical cycle.

“Moreover, this government holds that it would be inappropriate for the United Nations, which represents many different religious and social beliefs throughout the world, to sponsor any revision of the existing calendar that would conflict with the principles of important religious faiths.

“This government, furthermore, recommends that no further study of the subject should be undertaken. Such a study would require the use of manpower and funds which could be more usefully devoted to more vital and urgent tasks.”

The International World Calendar Association became aware that any calendar reform must have strong religious support and shifted its tactics to emphasize the religious rather than the commercial and statistical benefits of the World Calendar.

It was voted to include calendar reform on the agenda of Vatican Council II (opened 1962). Dr. Jean Nussbaum, Dr. B. B. Beach, and Dr. G. Rossi were appointed by the General Conference as a committee to watch the developments at the second Vatican Council regarding calendar reform and oppose any reform that would break the weekly cycle. The objective of the calendar reformers within the Roman Catholic Church was, basically, to stabilize the date of Easter and thus to enhance the chance of reunion, initially between the Papacy and the Eastern Orthodox churches—whose observance of Easter on a different date from that observed by the Roman Church is a stumbling block on the road to unity—and eventually with the rest of Christendom. Stabilizing the Easter date would also greatly facilitate the preparation of the various ecclesiastical calendars used by religious orders and other bodies. The reform submitted to the Central Preparatory Commission for the agenda of the council by Amleto Cardinal Cicognani, acting in his capacity as president of the Preparatory Commission for the Oriental Churches, was essentially the World Calendar plan. The suggested calendar incorporated the familiar blank days, the extra day of each year being referred to as a “World Holiday,” and the extra day of leap years as “Leap Day.”

The second session of the council, by a vote of 2,058 to 9 (1 was void), rejected the blank day calendar concept, affirmed the noninterruption of the weekly cycle, and made the following recommendations in the form of amendments to the fifth chapter of the council’s schema on the liturgy, here translated from the Latin text.

A Declaration of the Second Ecumenical Council of the Vatican on Revision of the Calendar

A Declaration of the Second Ecumenical Council of the Vatican on Revision of the Calendar. The Second Ecumenical Sacred Council of the Vatican, recognizing the importance of the wishes expressed by many concerning the assignment of the feast of Easter to a fixed Sunday and concerning an unchanging calendar, having carefully considered the effects that could result from the introduction of a new calendar, declares as follows:

1. The sacred council would not object if the feast of Easter were assigned to a particular Sunday of the Gregorian calendar, provided that those whom it may concern, especially the brethren who are not in communion with the Apostolic See, give their assent.

2. The sacred council likewise declares that it does not oppose efforts designed to introduce a perpetual calendar into civil society.

But among the various systems that are being suggested to stabilize a perpetual calendar and to introduce it into civil life, the church has no objection only in the case of those systems that retain and safeguard a seven-day week with Sunday, without the introduction of any days outside the week, so that the succession of weeks may be left intact, unless there is a question of the most serious reasons. Concerning these, the Apostolic See shall judge.

Calendar reform continued to be studied at the Vatican after Vatican Council II’s action supporting the current weekly cycle. L’ Osservatore Romano (no. 95 [31.568], p. 3, Apr. 24, 1964) advocates an intercalated day. The writer, Serafino M. Sarb, asserts intercalary days have occurred in the past. La Civiltà Cattolica (Anno 115, Quaderno 2736, June 20, 1964, pp. 546—560) suggests that Christmas Day be made the “blank” day, outside the week, thereby ensuring religious observance of the extra day. In this way it was thought the disruption of the weekly cycle would not be objectionable to Christian religious authorities. Another article in L’ Osservatore Romano (no. 155 [31.628], July 8, 1964, p. 7) reviews the calendar problem and the various suggestions without advocating any particular plan although voicing no serious objection to a blank day. The main objective of the Roman Catholic Church is to obtain a fixed date for Easter.

A book, La Misura del Tempo (1969), by Prof. G. Imbrighi, a Vatican scholar, gave a history of the calendar and suggested that a “blank” day would solve the problems of the present Gregorian calendar.

Pentecontad Theory. This hypothesis claims there were seven “blank” days in the early Jewish calendar before the reign of Solomon. Propounded by Prof. Julius Lewy and his wife, Dr. Hildegard Lewy, this theory was given wide circulation by Rabbi Julian Morgenstern, former president of the Hebrew Union College in Cincinnati. Dr. Morgenstern included this conjecture in material for The Interpreter’s Dictionary of the Bible (vol. 4, Articles “Sabbath” and “Week”). The theory, based on Lev. 23:15, 16, postulates seven periods of 50 days plus two weeks of festivals in each Jewish year. Each of the seven periods comprised seven weeks of 49 days, with the fiftieth day outside the weekly cycle. The World Calendar Association has given this assumption wide publicity.

Congressional Proposals. Since 1965 proposals for calendar change have been introduced into each session of the United States Congress. A detailed explanation of a calendar devised by Father Evarist Kleszcz was printed in the Congressional Record of Jan. 26, 28, 1965. This calendar does not disturb the weekly cycle, but requires a “leap week” every five or six years. Bills supporting the Edwards Perpetual Calendar died in committee in the Eighty-ninth, Ninetieth, Ninety-first, and Ninety-third Congresses.

Bills for the Adjusted Gregorian Calendar, invented by A. F. Beine, died in committee in the Ninety-first and Ninety-second Congresses. In 1974 Congressman Gilbert Gude (R-Md.) proposed (HR 14092) that the Ninety-third Congress appropriate $100,000 for the study of calendar improvement. The bill was not scheduled for hearings because of a lack of public interest.

Weekday Renumbered. In 1971 the International Organization for Standardization (ISO) of Geneva, Switzerland, recommended (Resolution R2015) “for the purpose of week numbering, the first day of the week shall be Monday.” This plan does not change the Gregorian calendar and maintains the sequence of the traditional weekly cycle without disruption. However, it does disrupt the calendrical numbering of the days of the week by designating Monday as the first day of the week, Sunday as the seventh. In the New Testament, Sunday is consistently referred to as the “first day of the week.” Several countries have officially adopted this calendrical method of numbering the days of the week. However, this has been done for commercial standardization, not for religious reasons.

Monday Holidays. President Lyndon Johnson signed the “Monday Holiday” Act, June 28, 1968. Since Jan. 1, 1971, four holidays always fall on Monday. These are: President’s Day (third Monday in February), Memorial Day (last Monday in May), Columbus Day (second Monday in October), and Veterans Day (fourth Monday in October).

In March 1970 the World Council of Churches called a consultation in Switzerland regarding calendar reform and fixation of the Easter date. Dr. B. B. Beach served together with the secretary of the archbishop of Canterbury as a drafter of the statement, adopted by the consultation and later approved by the WCC Central Committee, affirming support for fixing the Easter date on the second Sunday after the first Saturday in April, and opposing any civil calendar reform that would break the weekly cycle by introducing blank days.

Psychology. Seventh-day Adventists feel that tampering with the calendar could prepare the minds of people for further change. While neither the “Monday Holiday” law nor the designating of Sunday as the seventh day interferes with the weekly cycle, these changes could condition minds for more substantive changes. People who have become accustomed to change may be inclined to accept even a disruptive “blank” day without critical thought. Since the middle seventies, things have been quiet on the calendar reform front. There seems to be very little public or governmental interest in this matter.

California Conference

CALIFORNIA CONFERENCE. A former unit of church organization originally comprising all of the Seventh-day Adventist churches in California. (Later other areas were included or attached at times, as noted hereafter—Nevada, Utah, and Arizona.) The State of California now embraces four conferences, but the present article covers the early development of the churches in the entire state before the division, and in the California Conference as long as it existed as such (until 1932). For the later period see the names of the present conferences: Central California; Northern California; Southeastern California; Southern California.

Perhaps the first SDA in California was Daniel Eaton, who wrote to the Review in 1855 and 1857. Merritt G. Kellogg went overland to the state in 1859 and settled in San Francisco. Here he met B. G. St. John and through reading matter and Bible studies persuaded him to accept SDA teachings. The two men interested others and held Sabbath services in the St. John home on Minna Street. In 1865 they raised $133 in gold and sent it to the General Conference with a request for a minister. It was not until 1868, however, that two ministers, J. N. Loughborough and D. T. Bourdeau, were sent. They arrived in San Francisco on July 18. Following a lead furnished by Kellogg, who in 1867 had gone East to study medicine, they found the group of Sabbathkeepers worshiping in San Francisco and preached to them.

Through a newspaper story in the New York press (quoting James White calling for $1,000 to finance a tent in San Francisco), a group of worshipers in Petaluma, near San Francisco, who called themselves Independents, learned of the arrival in San Francisco of the two men with a tent. They prayed, "If these, O Lord, are Thy servants, give them a prosperous journey, and come Thou with them." One of the group went to San Francisco, found the preachers, and brought them to Petaluma. There a tent was pitched and meetings were held from mid-August to mid-October. Despite considerable public prejudice, there were 20 converts.

In the same year, Bourdeau and Loughborough introduced Adventism into other centers in Sonoma County. By January 1869, 50 meetings had been held in Windsor, a dozen persons had accepted the Sabbath, and a Sabbath school had been organized. It was while working for an SDA at Windsor that Abram La Rue, later a pioneer missionary to Hong Kong, read some of the literature, attended meetings, and became a convert. The tent meetings created much interest in surrounding areas such as Santa Rosa, where a lot and lumber for seats were offered without cost.

On Apr. 11, 1869, Loughborough baptized 15 in the first Seventh-day Adventist baptismal service in California, conducted on the farm of a Mr. Lee, near Santa Rosa. Later the members formed a temporary state organization, but were not as yet organized into churches. They elected as president D. T. Bourdeau; secretary, J. F. Wood; treasurer, J. N. Loughborough; executive committee, D. T. Bourdeau, Merritt G. Kellogg, and John Bowman. When the committee was formed, Bourdeau stated in his report: "When we came to Petaluma we knew of but one in this county who was keeping the Sabbath. Now we know of at least seventy-five.”

As a result of the work in this area, a church 30' x 60' (9m. x 18m.) was built in Santa Rosa and dedicated by Bourdeau on Nov. 21, 1869, the first SDA church west of the Rockies. This building stood when the surrounding area was severely damaged by the 1906 earthquake. Work also was conducted in Healdsburg, but with strong opposition. From Healdsburg the tent was moved to Sebastopol, seven miles (11 kilometers) west of Santa Rosa. By 1870 there were more than 100 Sabbathkeepers in California, with four churches established, and the self-sustaining mission had a reserve of several hundred dollars.

In 1871 Loughborough began his first public meetings in downtown San Francisco. Miles Grant, a minister of the Advent Christian Church, from New England, had created some interest with 50 followers, who, not wishing to join the Methodist Church as he advised, had organized into a separate society. San Francisco was favorable to the public meetings, held in a store building at 113 Minna Street. M. E. Cornell from the East joined Loughborough for his campaign. More than 70 new members joined the church, among whom were many from Grant's group. Grant, however, was not a convert. There was a total of $1,100 pledged in tithes in one year, and offerings of $510.

In April 1872 at a regular session of the California state meeting in Santa Rosa, an invitation was sent to James and Ellen White to spend the winter of 1872—1873 in California. Their first appearance, Oct. 2, 1872, was at a small camp meeting held at Windsor, where future plans for evangelism were laid; from there they went with the tent to San Francisco. Their visit did much to bring about a union of the work in the West with that in the East.

In February 1873 a state conference was formed, with seven churches and a total membership of 238; and application was made for admission into the General Conference. The first year's tithe was $2,151.51. Loughborough, the first president, continued in this position until 1878. Offices were in Oakland.

The year 1873 saw the work advance to Red Bluff and the Napa Valley. In May the newly organized conference erected a tent in Napa and established a church of 50 members. The Napa church building was dedicated by the Whites on Apr. 4, 1874. The tent went next to St. Helena.

At the second camp meeting, held at Yountville, near St. Helena, plans were laid for establishing a health institute and a branch publishing house. It was at this meeting that Moses J. Church, a constructor of irrigation ditches, accepted the SDA faith, and, in turn, carried his newfound faith to the San Joaquin Valley. Church was the founder of the irrigation system used in the valley and the one who chose the site of the city of Fresno; he became known as the “father of Fresno.” While the work was developing in northern California, Church was using his influence as newspaper editor and businessman to spread his newfound faith in and around Fresno. A church of about 50 members was organized there, and a church building was erected on the corner of Mariposa and O streets.

D. M. Canright joined the working force, beginning meetings in December 1873 in Watsonville, some 100 miles (161 kilometers) south of San Francisco. One of the converts was William Healey, who had learned of the faith in Minnesota, and who later became an outstanding evangelist in southern California.

A few believers had settled in Oakland, including John I. Tay and his wife, who in 1890 sailed from San Francisco on the maiden voyage of the missionary ship Pitcairn. Canright and Cornell held meetings in Oakland in 1874, which were well attended. More than 1,500 persons gathered at Lake Merritt on June 14, 1874, when 23 were baptized. They next held tent meetings in San Jose, where 35 accepted the SDA faith, and in Santa Clara, where a church of 25 members was organized.

At the 1874 conference, Healey, Uhl, Carey, Brorsen, Knud Brorsen, Bartlett, Stockton, Howard, and Judson were licensed to preach; others were added later. Tent campaigns were conducted in Stockton, Gilroy, and Hollister. Healey and Stephens took their tent to Sacramento in 1876. In the same year J. L. Wood worked in the San Joaquin Valley, beginning at Kingsburg, where he followed up the interest created by Moses Church.

In 1874 Mrs. White said to her husband, "Somewhere in Oakland is the place to locate the paper," speaking of the proposed missionary paper for the church. After a series of providential developments, the first issue of the Signs of the Times came off the press in Oakland, dated June 4, 1874. In 1875 an Oakland site was chosen for the new publishing house, and the Pacific Seventh-day Adventist Publishing Association (later called the Pacific Press Publishing Association) was organized.

In 1876 in order to qualify the laity for more extended missionary work, a Bible institute was conducted in Oakland, Apr. 1—16, the conference providing board and room for the 48 who enrolled. It was led by Uriah Smith and James and Ellen White.

California converts began penetrating other areas—Nevada, Arizona, and the Hawaiian Islands. Abram La Rue went to China, the Tays to Fiji, and William Hunt to South Africa.

In the fall of 1877 two camp meetings were held, one at Yountville, in the north, where 57 were baptized, and the other at Lemoore, in Kings County, which was attended by people from points as distant as San Diego and San Pasqual; 29 were baptized.

With the opening of the Rural Health Retreat (which later became the St. Helena Sanitarium and Hospital) in 1878, the first step was taken to establish health work in the West. It was headed by Merritt G. Kellogg, who had finished an elementary medical course and returned West. In 1885 the Pacific Health Journal and Temperance Advocate (an earlier name of Vibrant Life) was launched by the medical staff of the sanitarium and printed by the Pacific Press.

At Healdsburg in 1882 a school headed by Sidney Brownsberger was opened with an enrollment of 26—from ages 5 and up—which increased in the first year to 152. At the close of the school year ministerial students were sent out as assistants for the summer tent meetings. Because of financial problems and a need to move to a more rural area, Healdsburg College closed in 1908 and was replaced by Pacific Union College. But during this time nearly 2,000 young people had passed under its influence, 400 of whom became active denominational workers. By 1900 there was a wave of interest in education as attested by an impressive number of church schools conducted by teachers from Healdsburg College and Battle Creek College. There had been early schools in Fresno, San Pasqual, and San Francisco, the first believed to be that opened in Oakland in 1889 taught by a Miss Morrison.

With the arrival in southern California in 1874 of John B. Judson, an ordained minister, SDAs for the first time had an official representative south of the Tehachapis. By this time the state conference had been divided into four Tract and Missionary Society districts, and Judson was made leader of District no. 4, which included the counties of Los Angeles, San Bernardino, and San Diego. The Judsons made their home in San Pasqual Valley, where a church later was organized. J. L. Wood held tent campaigns in Orange in 1879. S. N.

Haskell and J. H. Waggoner followed in San Diego, where they found a few Sabbathkeepers as a result of Wood's meetings. They also visited the believers in Los Angeles.

In 1879 William Healey began evangelistic meetings in Los Angeles and organized the first SDA church south of the Tehachapi Pass. This church, at first on Third Street, was moved and became known as the Carr Street church. Several years later it moved to 650 West 21st Street and was renamed the Central church.

The second church group to be organized in southern California, and the first to erect a church building, was the one in Norwalk, organized in 1884. Soon other churches were built in Los Angeles, San Diego, San Pedro, and Pasadena.

In 1887 William Healey held tent meetings in San Diego, where a church was built on 18th and G streets. Treatment rooms were opened in the late nineties by a graduate nurse from Battle Creek, and E. G. Fulton and M. A. Hollister opened a vegetarian restaurant in San Diego.

When in 1889 Merritt G. Kellogg left St. Helena Sanitarium and moved to El Monte, the first American settlement in southern California, he found two members there, and in Pomona a group of 16, who in 1886 had attended tent meetings conducted by E. A. Briggs, a blind SDA evangelist.

In 1896 a vegetarian restaurant and treatment rooms were opened under the direction of a certain Dr. Moran between Broadway and Hill on Third Street, Los Angeles. Besides the group of about 100 meeting in the Carr Street church, there was now another group meeting on the east side of Los Angeles, which was later formed into the Lincoln Park church. The California Conference, sponsoring evangelism in Nevada for some years and having had the members there under its "watch care" since 1878, was enlarged in 1883 to include Nevada. In 1889 it took the responsibility for the largely unentered territories of Utah and Arizona. In 1894 Utah was taken over as a General Conference mission, and Arizona likewise in 1895. The California Conference included Nevada until 1911. In the 1905 and 1906 Yearbooks it is called the California-Nevada Conference. In 1901 the California Conference became a member of the newly formed Pacific Union Conference, an area comprising the states of Montana, Idaho, Washington, Oregon, California, the territory of Alaska, Hawaii, British Columbia, Nevada, Utah, and Arizona (1902). At this time C. Santee was president of the California Conference, and offices were at 301 San Pablo Avenue in Oakland.

At the Oakland camp meeting in 1901, the first steps were taken for a division of the California Conference. At that time the area of the state south of the Tehachapi and Santa Ynez mountains was detached and organized into the Southern California Conference. In 1911 when further division was deemed desirable, Inyo and Mono counties, and a portion of Santa Barbara, together with the counties of Clark, Lincoln, Nye, and Esmeralda in Nevada, were added to the Southern California Conference, and the remaining territory in the California Conference was divided into three conferences: the California Conference, the Central California Conference, and the Northern California-Nevada Conference. The California Conference now covered a territory composed only of the following counties: Santa Cruz, Santa Clara, San Mateo, Alameda, Contra Costa, Solano, Marin, Sonoma, San Francisco, Napa, Lake, Mendocino, Trinity, Humboldt, and Del Norte. With a population of 1 million, it had 38 churches and a membership of 2,806, with 21 ministers.

In 1915 the California Conference was divided again, retaining 20 churches and a membership of 1,620 in the area south of the San Francisco Bay and west of the Coast

Range (with J. L. McElhany as president); the 21 churches and 1,261 members north of the Bay and west of the mountains to Oregon were organized as the Northwestern California Conference, with J. A. Stevens as president and with offices in Santa Rosa. But in 1918 these two were merged once more under the California Conference, with G. W. Wells, president; H. B. Thomas, secretary-treasurer.

In 1932 the California Conference terminated its separate existence and was divided between the Central and Northern California conferences. For later Seventh-day Adventist history in the state of California, see the separate conferences listed in the first paragraph of this article.

Calkins, Glenn Alwin

CALKINS, GLENN ALWIN (1889—1962). Evangelist and conference administrator. When he accepted the Seventh-day Adventist faith in 1919 he gave up business interests and entered Pacific Union College to prepare for the ministry. After a period in evangelistic work, he became business manager of the Loma Linda Sanitarium. He served successively as vice president of the Southern California Conference (1927), president of Southeastern California Conference (1927—1930), comptroller of the College of Medical Evangelists (1931—1934), president of the Pacific Union Conference (1933—1941), president of the Inter-American Division (1941—1947, 1951—1954), and a General Conference field secretary (1955—1958).

Cambodia

CAMBODIA. An independent republic situated between Vietnam and Thailand in Southeast Asia, with a population (1994) of 10.3 million living in a geographical area of 70,238 square miles (181,916 square kilometers). From 1863 to 1953 it was a French Protectorate.

Buddhism is the state religion, and with the people satisfied with their ancient beliefs, Christian missions have made limited progress.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. The territory of Cambodia constitutes the Cambodia Attached District, in the Southeast Asia Union, which is a part of the Far Eastern Division. Statistics (1994) for Cambodia are difficult to verify because of the tremendous growth of our church taking place there and because church officials have not been able to enter some restricted areas of the country. But reports indicate that there are at least 36 groups of believers meeting regularly, with about 185 members (1,500 attending services) and 36 lay pastors being trained to serve these small congregations; ordained ministers, 1. Headquarters for the Cambodia Attached Mission are at Phnom Penh.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. The first Seventh-day Adventist worker to enter Cambodia, then a part of the Indo-China Mission, was Fred L. Pickett, who went there in January 1930. When the government refused to give him permission to build a church, he established a church of 32 Cambodian members at Tinh Bien, a village near Chaudoc, in the neighboring Cochin China (now South Vietnam). Other early workers were Eng Pheng and Svay Sas. In January 1937 Robert Bentz and his wife arrived in Cambodia and from 1939 to 1941 operated a Bible school and maternity clinic in Phnom Penh, the capital. When World War II reached Cambodia, causing other overseas leaders to leave the country, Robert Bentz was called to Saigon, Vietnam, to head the French Indo-China Mission.

In 1957 Ralph E. Neall and his family went to Cambodia—the first postwar SDA workers to arrive there. They were soon followed by Giang Tu Minh and his wife. Later Wong Yew Seng and Manuel G. Tortal joined the staff of workers. On Nov. 1, 1958, the first Seventh-day Adventist church in Cambodia was organized, with 11 charter members of many nationalities. Government recognition of the mission on Aug. 21, 1959, made possible the construction in Phnom Penh of a church building, seating 150, opened Feb. 3, 1962.

Political changes closed down SDA work in 1965, and no overseas workers were allowed in the Khmer Republic until 1972. An English language school was started by Edwin Moore in 1972. In 1975 it had more than 500 students.

The government made an agreement with the SAWS organization for relief commodities to be distributed to refugees in the country. In late 1974 Mr. and Mrs. Matthew Ferguson arrived to serve as volunteer workers with their primary responsibility in the relief area. An overseas family was called from the United States in early 1975. Although there was only one church facility located in the language school building, two services were held every Sabbath, one in a Chinese dialect and the other in the Khmer language.

In 1972 the country was no longer connected with the Vietnam Mission, but became a detached district under the supervision of the Southeast Asia Union Mission. A national missionary couple, Pastor and Mrs. Ng Gan Theow, from Singapore, reactivated the Bible correspondence school, started by Ralph Neall, which offers courses in Chinese and Khmer.

In 1975, after the Khmer Rouge takeover, SDA work, for all practical purposes, ceased.

In late 1978 Vietnam attacked Cambodia and drove the Khmer Rouge from power. During 1979 and 1980 large numbers of Cambodian refugees fled into Thailand and were settled in United Nations-sponsored camps. From 1978 to 1991 Cambodia (known as Kampuchea) remained in a state of civil war. During these years more than 300,000 refugees continued to live in camps inside Thailand.

SAWS was one of the first relief organizations to provide care for these refugees. ADRA carried on active health work for several years, and lay SDA organizations such as Adventist Frontier Missions continued to support workers in the camps until 1993 when repatriation of refugees was completed. As a result of this work, several congregations were started among the refugees living in the camps. More than 14,000 baptisms were reported and at least 600,000 refugees were taken to live in other countries. Many of the Seventh-day Adventists among this group have become active in SDA congregations in their new countries.

Beginning in 1988, ADRA led out in a project that restored an irrigation system near the ancient Angkor Wat ruins. In 1991 ADRA established a country office in Phnom Penh.

In 1991 lay Bible worker training courses were initiated in three of the camps. By April 1992, when repatriation of refugees began, 18 Bible workers had been selected to work inside Cambodia, and in 1994 reports indicate that at least double that number are at work. Attempts to locate pre-1975 members in Cambodia have not been successful so far.

In January 1993 M. Daniel Walter arrived in Phnom Penh to take up responsibilities as administrator of the Cambodia Attached District. In May of that year the Seventh-day Adventist Church was recognized officially by the government of Cambodia.

At a Global Mission rally held at Southern College on Mar. 19, 1994, more than $500,000 was raised to establish and house 63 new congregations in Cambodia.

Cameroon

CAMEROON. An independent republic in West Africa. Cameroon lies between 2° and 13° north latitude and stretches from the tropical jungles in the south to the edge of the Sahara in the north. The country is bounded on the west by the Gulf of Guinea and Nigeria, on the east by Chad, the Central African Republic, and the Congo, and on the south by Gabon and Equatorial Guinea.

First discovered by the Portuguese in 1472, the area was a German colony from 1884 until 1919, when it was made a mandate of the League of Nations and divided between France and Great Britain to administer. On Jan. 1, 1959, that portion assigned to France was granted full autonomy, and complete independence one year later. In a plebiscite held in February 1961 the northern part of the British Cameroons chose to join the Federation of Nigeria, while the southern part voted union with the Cameroon republic and became known as West Cameroon.

The Cameroon republic has an area of 179,714 square miles (465,459 square kilometers) and a population (1994) of 13 million. Agriculture is the principal occupation, the chief products being cacao, palm kernels, coffee, timber, cotton, and rubber. The climate is hot and rainy on the coast, but less hot and humid inland. Thirty-three percent of the population is Christian, 16 percent Muslim, and the rest animist. Christian missions, Catholic and Protestant, entered first in the south.

There is a great contrast between south and north Cameroon, because of differences in climate, and economic, scholastic, and religious development. Those in the north are generally either Muslim or animist. Their staple foods are many varieties of millet and Guinea corn, peanuts, and toward the east, rice. The Muslim Fulani engage in cattle raising and trading; most of the rest are subsistence farmers, raising some sheep and goats. The chief cash crops are cotton and peanuts. In the south the climate is equatorial, and the chief food crops are yams, plantains, cassava, and palm oil.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. SDA work in Cameroon began in November 1926 when W. H. Anderson, founder of several missions in South Africa and in the Congo, chose the site of the first station at Nanga-Eboko, 100 miles (160 kilometers) northeast of Yaoundé, the capital. Early in 1928 Robert L. Jones organized the first Sabbath school and the first primary school. On Jan. 1, 1929, Cameroon was assigned to the Southern European Division, and Marius Raspal, who had pioneered the work in Madagascar, was called. He erected the first brick buildings in Nanga-Eboko and conducted the first baptism there. Daniel Ndi, Josué Medjo, and Antoine Mpfoumi were the first converts. At a second baptism the wives of Ndi and Medjo also joined the church. On Mar. 12, 1930, when 11 persons were baptized, the first Seventh-day Adventist church was organized.

With the arrival of two more missionaries, Serge Yérétzian and Aimé Sallée, the work grew. National evangelists were quickly trained and sent to the following stations: Nsem, Andom, Mbong, Eteké, Ngama, Mbargué, Mbinang, Wall, Sandja, and Menga. The pioneer national workers were Daniel Ndi, Josué Medjo, Robert Amougou, Thomas Ndongo, Joseph Eto, Samuel Bina, Joseph Assou, Joseph Mimbangi, Antoine Mpfoumi, and Pierre Assamba.

In 1930 a second station was opened in Batouri, and in 1936 a third, in Ndoumbi. The work progressed continuously in that region, and contact was established with the Pygmies several years later, in 1955.

Advance Toward the South. In 1935 Marius Fridlin and his wife arrived to work among the people on the coast. On Nov. 2, 1938, Paul Bénézech and his family opened the first mission station at Grand-Batanga. In 1940 Fridlin baptized the first 18 members, who had been prepared by the African evangelists Adalbert Ekitike, Antoine Mpfoumi, and Adolphe Oyono. In 1950 a new station was opened by A. Cosendai and his wife in Nanganjango, near Kribi.

Around 1940 an interest was awakened among the Boulou tribe, and a mission station was opened in Kongo, 23 miles (37 kilometers) from Sangmélima. In 1944 a main station was opened in Avebe by E. Curmatureau, assisted by national evangelists Josué Medjo and Daniel Ndi.

In 1946 the district of Babimbi, among the Bassas, was entered. A station was opened in Mandjab by the African pastor Antoine Mpfoumi, and a school was opened by Oscar Nzhié.

In Douala, the port of Cameroon, a Sabbath school was established in 1953, directed by a layman, Antoine Mahelet. In May 1960 Pastor A. Ekitike was transferred to Douala, where he was assisted by K. Waber and his family. The following year a church of 26 members was organized. In 1963 an evangelistic center was bought, which Eliseo Cupertino used in May 1963 for a series of evangelistic meetings, the first in Douala.

North Cameroon. In January 1931 R. Bergström arrived and established a station in Dogba, 15 miles (25 kilometers) from Maroua. Later two other stations were opened, one in Mikiri, the other in Mokio. The first African evangelist, Jean Bikoé, arrived from the south in 1934 and opened a school in Dogba. In March 1935 the first six converts were baptized. In 1949 a second station was opened in Koza, in the heart of the Mandara Mountains, peopled by several Kirdi tribes. In 1954 Koza was chosen as the site for the first SDA hospital, operated by Dr. F. W. Brennwald and his wife.

Central Nyong. From the country of the Yébékolos, watered by the river Nyong and its many tributaries, many pupils went to the primary school at Nanga-Eboko. When they returned home, they taught the SDA message to their parents. In 1940—1941 the first station was established in Niamvoudou by Marius Fridlin, then in charge of the work in Cameroon. Soon, other stations were established in many neighboring villages.

After having operated under the direction of the Nanga-Eboko Mission and then under the Yaoundé Mission, the work in this prosperous section was organized as the Central Nyong Mission in 1962. The principal mission station, Niamvoudou, with its permanent chapel, was chosen as the site of the Collège Biblique Adventiste (“Adventist Bible College,” Cameroon Bible School), which opened its doors on Nov. 1, 1963, and began to train ministers and Bible workers.

In 1953, 27 years after SDA teachings were taken to Cameroon, the work was started in Yaoundé, the capital, by Kurt Scheidegger, who undertook evangelistic and construction work. A primary school was opened, which 10 years later had 1,200 pupils. In 1954 a church was organized. A church building and several school buildings were erected on a plot at the edge of the city. This mission station became well known in the capital city.

After the establishment of stations in Obala and Bilomo, north of Yaoundé, the Yaoundé Mission was organized in 1956. It included the territory of the Yébékolos people.

West Cameroon. The area on the eastern border of Nigeria (formerly the southern part of the British Cameroons) was first entered by SDAs when in December 1929 a layman, E. Gji, was sent by the Calabar, Nigeria, church board to investigate in response to a letter from Bekura. He reported that there were 27 interested persons who wished further instruction. In July 1960 M. Gbadiah went from the Calabar area and conducted an evangelistic campaign in West Cameroon. The first overseas missionary to enter the area was Louis Nielsen, who arrived in February 1961. He found a small group of unbaptized converts in Bekura village, who had been faithfully instructed for two years by a Nigerian trader, Okpan Kalu. This trader, formerly a fetish priest at Ikong in Calabar Province, had been converted by an Adventist layman named Chuks, from Calabar, but before he could be baptized he moved to the West Cameroon to set up his own business. There he shared his new faith and organized a Sabbath school. Later S. A. Chicaye, a young minister of the East Nigerian Mission, and S. Giba, a Cameroon national living in Nigeria, came as missionaries to this new territory. Within six months the number of adherents increased and a small church was built.

Development and Organization. Primary schools and, since the arrival of Paul Bernard in 1950, secondary schools have played an important part in advancing the work in Cameroon. Medical work was carried on first in temporary and later in permanent dispensaries at Nanga-Eboko, Bertoua-Ndoumbi, Batouri, Dogba, Kribi, and Niamvoudou. The Cameroon Mission Hospital was established in Koza.

Because of world conditions, Cameroon was placed under the West African Union Mission in 1946, and directed from the General Conference headquarters at Washington, D.C. In 1949 the French West and Equatorial African Union Mission was organized, with headquarters at Nanga-Eboko, Cameroon, under the Euro-Africa Division. In 1955 the offices of the union mission were transferred from Nanga-Eboko to Yaoundé, where two buildings were constructed for offices and workers' apartments, on a hillside overlooking part of the city. In addition to the Cameroon republic, the union territory in 1974 embraced the independent states born of the old French Equatorial Africa—the Congo republic (Brazzaville), Gabon, the Central African republic, the republic of Chad—and Equatorial Guinea (Bioko and Río Muni).

Nanga-Eboko Adventist Secondary School has made considerable progress. To prepare well-qualified workers, a training program for evangelists and ministers has been organized on different levels, taking into consideration the varying educational backgrounds. In 1970 a new mission station was opened at Bafang, in West Cameroon, in the Bamiléké district, where there are more than 1 million inhabitants. The first missionaries to that district were René Augsburger and his wife. Recently work, which had been developed largely in the bush, was established in more than 35 cities of the Cameroon. Three new schools were opened: the Bergström School at Dogba, the Adventist school at Niamvoudou, and the Kribi Adventist School.

Radio work has also been organized. Presently the SDA message is being broadcast over Radio-Yaoundé, Radio-Douala, Radio-Maroua, Radio-Bertoua, and Radio-Buéa, which airs a program in English to the area formerly called the British Cameroons. Broadcasts in French are planned for the Central African Republic Mission from Bangui, the capital. In 1977 a dental clinic was opened at Yaoundé, and in 1991 a hospital was constructed at Batouri.

Camp Meeting

CAMP MEETING. A series of meetings held for a number of days, generally in a rural or semirural setting, with provision for encampment on the grounds; a type of meeting now peculiar to the Seventh-day Adventist Church and a few other denominations. Camp meetings are held in various sections of the world, usually annually, and at times when the weather is suitable for such occasions; customarily a camp meeting is conducted by a conference or an equivalent unit of church organization.

History

History. Camp meetings originated among the Presbyterians in Kentucky in the early years of the nineteenth century and later flourished especially among the Methodists. SDA camp meetings began in 1868, five years after the General Conference was incorporated in 1863. The background for the SDA gatherings was in the Millerite camp meetings of 1842—1844, in which both James White and Joseph Bates, early leaders of the SDA Church, had participated, and in similar meetings held by the Methodist Church with notable success.

The subject of holding such meetings came up at the General Conference session held at Battle Creek, Michigan, May 12—18, 1868. The minutes of that meeting reported the following: “Resolved, That this conference recommend to our people to hold a general camp meeting annually at the time of the sessions of our business associations.

“Resolved, That the Gen. Conf. Committee be authorized, at their discretion, to carry this plan into execution” (Review and Herald 31:356, May 26, 1868).

Two months later, in an editorial, James White set the matter before the readers (ibid. 32:56, 57, July 14, 1868), and made a strong appeal for general camp meetings. He referred to the unsuitability of the business sessions of the General Conference and other business sessions for a spiritual feast.

“This is not a good time for a general gathering of our brethren and sisters to enjoy a spiritual feast. Not understanding this, many have come to our annual conferences, spent a week’s time, and gone home disappointed. They had no special interest in the business sessions, thought they occupied too much time, and concluded that their brethren were becoming formal and backslidden.”

The issue of Aug. 25 carried the announcement of “Our First General Camp Meeting,” to be “held at Wright, Ottawa Co., Mich., Sept. 1—7.” This meeting (ibid. 32:172, Sept. 15, 1868; 32:197, Oct. 6, 1868), attended by as many as 2,000, was both a revival for the church members and an evangelistic series for the visitors. There were 22 tents, each housing the group from one local church, and two large tents for meetings in case of rain. These were arranged in a circle around the outdoor meeting place, which had a preachers’ stand and board benches. There was also a crude stand where books and tracts were sold. Within a month other camp meetings were held at Clyde, Illinois, and Pilot Grove, Iowa (ibid. 32:196, 216, Oct. 6, 20, 1868).

From this small beginning camp meetings have become a regular feature of SDA Church life in many countries. The next year several were held; one for New England was held in September 1869 near South Lancaster, Massachusetts. The first SDA camp meeting in the western United States convened Oct. 2, 1872, in Windsor, California. Present were J. N. Loughborough, M. E. Cornell, and James and Ellen White. The meeting lasted six days. In eastern Canada the first SDA camp meeting in Quebec was held at Magog, Aug. 21—26, 1879, with about 90 in attendance; one was held at Ayer's Flat, July 1—6, 1886. In western Canada a camp meeting was held on the banks of the Red River, near Winnipeg, Manitoba, July 2—11, 1897. At this meeting both English and German were used, A. T. Jones being the principal speaker in English. In 1904, the year before the territory of Alberta became a province, the first camp meeting for the Alberta Mission was held in Wetaskiwin.

Camp meetings have been conducted by SDAs outside of North America in various countries. When attention was given to the building up of the SDA Church in Australia, it was decided to hold the first camp meeting in the town of Brighton, Victoria (near Melbourne), in September 1893. Ellen White, who was present, wrote that this Brighton meeting awakened an interest "greater than anything we had witnessed since the movement of 1844."

Open-air encampments, often rather large, are sponsored by the SDA Church in various parts of Africa. In 1939 the Gitwe Mission, then headquarters of the Congo Union, reported a larger attendance at its camp meeting than at any other camp meeting ever held by this denomination. The number exceeded 18,000.

General Pattern for Camp Meeting Procedure

General Pattern for Camp Meeting Procedure. The usual 10-day camp meeting follows a rigorous daily schedule from six in the morning until 10 at night. Each day is filled with sermons, Bible studies, and meetings of various church departments, with some leisure time allotted for meals and rest. Separate meetings are held for young people and for several age groups of children. From early times the programs have included not only doctrinal, devotional, and evangelistic sermons but also instruction on the laws of diet and health, and on temperance. Of a Fresno, California, camp meeting in 1879 S. N. Haskell wrote: "Quite an interest was taken in the temperance question. A goodly number signed the teetotal pledge, thus severing their connection with tea, coffee, and tobacco" (ibid. 54:100, Sept. 18, 1879).

From the first, camp meetings have offered not only spiritual help and instruction to the lay members but also evangelistic meetings aimed at the visitors. In earlier times when camp meetings were held in a different locality in the conference each year, the convocations represented major evangelistic campaigns to reach various places.

Steering away from the basically evangelistic nature of the nineteenth-century camp meetings, SDAs today tend more and more to utilize these yearly sectional gatherings as spiritual meetings for the church members, though not ignoring opportunities for neighborhood evangelism. The practice of maintaining permanent camp meeting sites, rather than moving to different locations each year, has become general. In practically all the conferences of North America large permanent pavilions have replaced the former canvas tents as the places of general convocation. A pavilion in Lynwood, California, no longer used for camp meetings, accommodated 10,000 or more people in one meeting. Some campgrounds have cabins; most provide family tents and accommodations for house trailers and recreational vehicles, so that as many campers as may desire can reside on the grounds during the encampment. In recent years many of the conferences have had to hold regional camp meetings because campgrounds can no longer accommodate all who wish to attend.

Camp Meeting Permanent Sites

CAMP MEETING PERMANENT SITES. Many conferences in the North American Division maintain locations for yearly camp meetings. These often have permanent buildings in which the various age groups meet, though in some cases tents may be pitched to accommodate the series, or existing school buildings are used. Space is available for recreational vehicles, and simple cabins, tents, or dormitory rooms provide living facilities during the sessions. In 1993 the following sites were in operation:

Campbell, Alexander John

CAMPBELL, ALEXANDER JOHN (1901—1970). South Sea Island missionary. Born in Kalgoorlie, Western Australia, he was instructed in present truth from earliest childhood. Graduating from Avondale College in 1924, he spent a year in colporteur work followed by two years in evangelism in north New South Wales. In 1925 he married Emily Ford. In 1927 he went to Buin in the Solomon Islands for two years and then to Choiseul for another seven years. In 1936 he began a long term in the Eastern Highlands of New Guinea. With the exception of the war years, he worked there until his return to Australia in 1960. From that year until 1967, he was curator of Ellen G. White's old home, Sunnyside, at Cooranbong.

During his retirement, he engaged very actively in furthering the work of the International Educational Recording Organization, headed up by Herbert Ford in California. This group places in the hands of primitive peoples the world over small hand-operated gramophones with gospel recordings in their own tongue.

Campbell, Malcolm Neal

CAMPBELL, MALCOLM NEAL (1874—1958). Minister, administrator. He was born on Prince Edward Island, Canada, and married Ida Lillian Frohmader in 1897. From 1895 to 1906 he held various pastorates, among them that of the Battle Creek church. With his appointment as president of the Iowa Conference in 1908 began a succession of administrative positions that lasted until his retirement.

He became president of the Eastern Canadian Union (1912), and of the British Union Conference (1917). On his return to North America in 1922, he became assistant secretary of the General Conference until he became secretary of the Bureau of Home Missions (1924). On the uniting of the Eastern and Western Canadian unions in 1932, he became the first president of the Canadian Union. He became president of the North American Division in 1936 and retired in 1939.

Camping

CAMPING. Part of the AY recreational and training program. Organized Seventh-day Adventist youth camps began with a junior boys' camp in the summer of 1926 in Michigan. The next year a girls' camp was added in Michigan and a boys' camp was held in Wisconsin. In 1928 similar camps were first held in California.

The object of these AJY summer camps, conducted by the various conferences, was to invite junior youth to engage in vigorous activity in a healthful Christian environment for the purpose of developing Christian character and habits of usefulness. By 1930 leadership training camps and senior youth camps were being conducted, designed to provide senior young people with the benefits of outdoor life and Christian fellowship. The camping idea began to spread to other divisions of the world field. The greatest growth took place in the 1950s. In 1964 there were 741 junior youth camps conducted in the world field, with an attendance of 46,465.

As conducted in the mid-1960s, the typical daily program at a youth camp begins with reveille, flag raising, and morning watch. After personal inspection, there is breakfast and inspection of quarters. Morning and afternoon sessions are devoted to crafts and MV Honors, with as much swimming, hiking, boating, and horseback riding as time allows.

Religion is given top priority, with early-morning prayer bands, midmorning "camp councils," and campfire devotions. Often an ordained minister serves as camp pastor, speaking each morning at camp council and leading up to a decision for baptism by the end of the camp. The Friday night campfire frequently climaxes with a consecration service.

There is a strong trend toward erecting permanent camp facilities on conference-owned property. Such a camp provides a lodge, a kitchen and dining room, a headquarters building, quarters for staff members, an infirmary, a nature center, cabins for the campers, and where needed, a standard-sized swimming pool; also, wherever possible, one or more outpost camps, where hikers can spend a night or two roughing it.

In addition to junior and senior summer camps there are teenage camps and occasionally adult or family camps; also camps for underprivileged children.

Campion Academy

CAMPION ACADEMY. A coeducational boarding school on the senior high school level, operated by the Colorado Conference, and situated four miles (6 kilometers) south of Loveland, Colorado.

The need for a school in the area was sensed in the early 1900s by H.M.J. Richards, who, concerned about a Christian education for his own boys and other young people, obtained conference permission to raise funds for an academy and collected more than $7,000.

The need was also felt in 1904 by W. A. Hankins, who noted that Seventh-day Adventists near Berthoud, Colorado, had been meeting for some 20 years but had not yet sent out one foreign missionary or Bible instructor. At camp meeting that year he offered any five acres of his homestead for a conference school. A committee consisting of G. F. Watson (conference president), H.M.J. Richards (vice president), G. W. Anglebarger, F. M. Wilcox, Watson Ziegler, E. E. Farnsworth, Elbridge Green, and Horace Williams selected the present site of Campion Academy.

By 1907 a classroom building and a dormitory had been erected, and a modest beginning made. Frank A. Page, the first teacher and principal, had 29 students in grades 1 through 9. The first class, three in number, was graduated in 1911. Called Eastern Colorado Academy at first, the school was later renamed Campion Academy from a nearby stop and spur of the Colorado and Southern Railway. Because expenses of construction and maintenance were met largely by the local church, the earliest years demanded great personal sacrifice on the part of students and teachers. But by 1927, the school's twentieth anniversary, the last of the mortgage papers were burned.

In 1919 the chapel and administration building was destroyed by fire. It was replaced by a brick building, Hankins Hall, which was completed in 1921 and served as administration building and provided classroom, library, chapel, and dining room space.

A notable feature in the early years of the school was the Little Leaven League, a small but influential student organization formed in 1913 to prepare student speakers for missionary activity. John Turner, Roy Miles, Harold M. S. Richards, John Deapen, Kenneth Gant, Charles Stagner, Roger Altman, and Albert E. Hagen began their evangelistic service in this organization.

The school's first dormitory housed both boys and girls and contained the dining room. Then a girls' residence, which included food service, was erected in 1912 of concrete blocks made by students and staff. This dormitory stood nearly 40 years. The original frame dormitory served the boys until a brick home was completed in 1938. Another girls' dormitory was built in 1946. When finally completed in 1953, the dormitory could house 140 girls. In 1980 this dormitory was replaced by a single-story X-shaped building that boasted bathrooms in every suite, a chapel, kitchen, and dean's apartment.

In June of 1951 a gymnasium was erected during camp meeting week and occupied on the last Sabbath. A beautiful new church was completed in December 1966, which serves both the student body and the community. A new classroom-administration building, which combined all instructional facilities under one roof, was completed in 1967. In 1969 a new building was finished that doubled the boys' dormitory space and provided a new cafeteria. Six new homes for faculty had been added also by 1969. In 1974 one more home was built and funds were raised to complete the campus landscape plan.

Although situated in the shadow of the Rockies, Campion Academy depended for water first on a bucket brigade from the Hankins farm home, then on a water wagon, and later on cisterns. In 1937 a four-inch (10-centimeter) water main from the city of Loveland was installed, but by 1956 this was inadequate. In December 1962 connection was made with the Little Thompson Water Association, which provided the school with abundant pure water with good pressure.

Academy industries include Bake 'n' Serve; Silver State Packaging Company, contract packagers and producers of plastic bags; a literature evangelistic ministry; several cabinet shops; a greenhouse; and a graphics business. A press that operated from the earliest years was closed in 1955. The dairy was discontinued in 1974.

Student publications are the school annual, Mountain Echoes, and an annual literary journal called Images. A monthly newsletter put out by the administration is called the Campus Communique. In the past, students also published a paper called The Frontiersman, previously known as The Reflector, then The Rocky Mountain Academician.

Enrollment in 1974 was 324, of whom 256 were in dormitories. The 30-member staff exceeded in number the student enrollment of the first year. Because of demographics, enrollment dropped to about 180 by the 1992—1993 school year, with a third of these attending from the village. Hundreds of the 4,034 alumni graduated by 1993 fulfill the dream of the little group of missionary-minded students of 82 years before.

Canadian Union College

CANADIAN UNION COLLEGE. A coeducational boarding school operated as an accredited high school, as a junior college, and as a senior college in the field of theology by the Seventh-day Adventist Church in Canada at College Heights, in the province of Alberta, Canada, 100 miles (160 kilometers) north of the city of Calgary and two miles (three kilometers) north of the town of Lacombe (7,700 population). The 12 major buildings of the school plant are surrounded by more than 2,000 acres (800 hectares) of farmland belonging to the school. It was known successively as Alberta Industrial Academy (1907—1919), Canadian Junior College (1919—1946), and Canadian Union College (1946—). The 1992—1993 enrollment was 551 (353 college and 198 secondary).

Origin

Origin. At the General Conference session of 1901, held at Battle Creek, Michigan, J. W. Boynton, of Nebraska, was assigned to Alberta, then a mission field. At that time Alberta was part of the Northwest Territories (it became a province of the Dominion of Canada in 1905). Of the 50 members found by Pastor Boynton upon arrival, 35 were German believers meeting in a church at Leduc, 60 miles (100 kilometers) north of the present site of Canadian Union College. In 1906 at a camp meeting held in Red Deer, the Alberta Conference was organized, with C. A. Burman as the first conference president. By that time three church schools had been opened in the province, but the growing number of SDA families created a demand for education on higher levels. Upon the recommendation of the conference committee, Burman took charge of the new educational enterprise, and school opened in temporary quarters in the town of Leduc on Jan. 1, 1907. The initial enrollment of nine increased to 27 before the end of the three-month term.

The first faculty consisted of C. A. Burman, principal and Bible teacher; Mrs. C. A. Burman, teacher of the common branches of learning; W. O. James, instructor in methods of selling denominational books; and Mrs. L. T. Heaton, cook. This first school was established primarily to train colporteurs.

During the summer of 1907 the Alberta Conference solicited funds and borrowed money to purchase a farm on which to relocate the school. At a conference held at Lacombe, Alberta, July 1—7, 1907, C. A. Burman, J. W. Boynton, Henry Block, A. C. Anderson, Charles Rick, L. T. Heaton, and H. R. Kitto were chosen to select a site. The place chosen for the school, which was named the Alberta Industrial Academy, was a 160-acre (65-hectare) farm three miles (five kilometers) west of Leduc, on which were two two-story structures, a barn, granary, and other small buildings. The first regular school term of the Alberta Industrial Academy opened on Nov. 9, 1907, and lasted for six months. The enrollment that year was 36.

Relocation in Lacombe. By 1909 need for expansion was so evident that it was proposed to erect two additional buildings—a girls' dormitory with kitchen and dining hall, and a boys' dormitory with chapel and classrooms. Every member in the conference was asked to sell three copies each of Ellen White's books Christ's Object Lessons and The Ministry of Healing to help defray the expenses to be incurred. However, as a result of the counsel of W. A. Spicer, who visited Alberta in the spring of 1909, it was decided to seek a new location so that a school and a sanitarium might be operated jointly. A gift of $3,000 made possible the purchase of 198 acres (80 hectares) near Lacombe, sold to the conference by Andrew Gilmour. The plan was to move both the school in Leduc and a sanitarium in Edmonton to the new location at Lacombe. However, since greater emphasis was being placed upon the educational work, only the school plant was built on the new site (see Bethel Sanitarium).

J. I. Beardsley was chosen as principal of the new school. His arrival from South Dakota in the fall of 1909 permitted Burman to give his entire time to his duties as president of the Alberta Conference. Beardsley, who was connected with the school until 1914, functioned as business manager and teacher as well as principal. Associated with him were I. G. Ortner, preceptor, mathematics and German Bible teacher; Mrs. I. G. Ortner, German language and primary teacher; Mrs. Leona Burman, English teacher; Essie Barber, preceptress and matron; and Mrs. A. J. Beardsley, science and history teacher.

Because the school had neither the funds nor the time in that summer to erect the buildings needed, it was necessary during the first year to hold the school in a large barn. A number of girls lived in tents until the dormitory was ready for occupancy in December. The boys' dormitory was built in 1910. The 81 students who enrolled for the first year on the new campus endured many hardships because of the subzero weather and the primitive living conditions. Grades 7 through 10 were taught, based on the American four-unit high school system. The library consisted of 92 volumes. The first industry was a broom factory established during the 1911—1912 school year. Wages for student labor in those years averaged 10 cents an hour.

In the summer of 1912 construction began on the administration building, and other buildings were added as the school progressed. In 1913 the academy graduated the first class in its history, consisting of one student, Walter A. Clemenson.

Curriculum Changes. In 1915 E. D. Dick, of Lincoln, Nebraska, was elected principal. During his administration study was given to changing the school program from the four-unit plan copied from American schools to the spiral system followed in Canadian public schools; but it was several years before an agreement on this change was reached and the plan implemented.

Canadian Junior College. By 1918 denominational leaders realized that the curriculum should be extended to meet the needs of the growing constituency, and in February 1919 the school, still under Dick's administration, achieved junior college status. At the same time control of the institution was transferred from the Alberta Conference to the Western Canadian Union Conference, comprising the local conferences of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, and Manitoba.

On May 28, 1930, a fire of incendiary origin burned three buildings, with a loss of $100,000. Reconstruction began almost at once despite a time of drought and financial depression. School was resumed in October in partially completed buildings.

Impetus for the growth of the school came from the Saskatchewan Conference when in 1931 its academy at Battleford closed and the students came to augment the enrollment of Canadian Junior College.

H. M. Johnson (1940) built large barns and expanded the farming operations.

Senior College Status in Theology. In the summer of 1945, E. E. Bietz, of South Dakota, became president of the institution. On the foundation laid by his predecessors, and with the active support of H. L. Rudy, president of the Canadian Union Conference, Bietz directed further physical and scholastic expansion. Work was begun in 1948 on a new dormitory for the young women, and a cafeteria building was constructed in 1950. Changes were made in the scholastic program; in the summer of 1946, the school was raised to senior college status in the area of theological training, and on Mar. 31, 1947, it was renamed Canadian Union College.

H. T. Johnson, who became president in 1951, undertook to expand the industrial program in order to provide more work for students. A building was erected to house the printing press and the bindery; the farm was enlarged and modernized; and a furniture factory was built, specializing in upholstered furniture. These industries furnish students more than $230,000 worth of work each year.

In 1959 the Canadian Union Conference and the Canadian Union College board voted to launch a 10-year, million-dollar expansion program to provide additional faculty housing and school buildings. A new $300,000 cafeteria, accommodating more than 500 students, and having the dining area and kitchen facilities both on the main floor, was completed in 1964. The former cafeteria building was remodeled to serve as a library.

N. O. Matthews, who became president in 1971, undertook to upgrade the academic program. Negotiations for affiliation with the University of Alberta, begun by the former president, P. G. Miller, were carried to completion; and beginning with the 1971—1972 school year, first-year university-level studies leading to a baccalaureate degree were offered in arts, science, education, business administration, physical education, dentistry, medicine, pharmacy, and household economics. During the summer of 1972, a $200,000 Career Center was constructed to accommodate nonuniversity-bound students in career-oriented areas such as upholstery, bookbinding, fibreglassing, general contracting, industrial management, commercial cooking, business administration, secretarial science, printing technology, and auto mechanics. The Career Center also provided for the needs of high school and college students interested in an industrial arts program, as well as offering adult continuing education courses. Because of decreased enrollment in the career-oriented areas, these programs were terminated.

In March 1982 the academy was separated from the college and named Parkview Adventist Academy.

In September 1991 the college received approval to offer the B.A. degree program (three-year) under the authority of the government of Alberta upon the recommendation of the Private Colleges Accreditation Board (PCAB).

The college has a provincially approved partner campus agreement, begun in 1979, with Union College to offer various four-year degree programs in such areas as Bachelor of Arts, Bachelor of Business Administration, Bachelor of Education, and Bachelor of Science. These degrees are scheduled to become Canadian Union College degrees by 1996.

La Sierra University offers a graduate, professional program through an extended campus program at Canadian Union College. Under this arrangement, which began in 1983, students may complete the requirements for a Master of Arts degree in Elementary Education in four summers. This program, which is accredited by the Western Association of Schools and Colleges, operates with the approval of the Alberta Ministry of Advanced Education.

Since 1989 Loma Linda University has offered a graduate, professional extended campus program at Canadian Union College. Under this arrangement, students may complete the requirements for a Master of Science degree in marriage and family therapy in two academic years. This program, which also is accredited by the Western Association of Schools and Colleges, operates with the approval of the Alberta Ministry of Advanced Education.

During the fall of 1992 the Department of Career and Continuing Education was established, which offers nonacademic career programs in office management.

Physical improvements since 1974 include a gym complex with swimming pool, Lakeview Hall (college dormitory), a furniture factory, remodeled Education Department facility, remodeled Arts Department facility, additional classrooms in the old Career Center building, and the Chan shun Science Center.

Cancele Secondary School

CANCELE SECONDARY SCHOOL. A coeducational boarding school operated by the Cape Conference, a section of the Southern Africa Union Conference, an attached field of the General Conference. It is situated near Mount Frere in Griqualand East, on 83 acres (35 hectares) of farmland, purchased from the Salvation Army, at the foot of a beautiful range of mountains, which can be seen from the outskirts of Umtata, the capital of the Transkei, 70 miles (110 kilometers) away. In 1974 there were 194 in the secondary classes, with seven teachers. The total enrollment, which included the higher primary, was 275, mainly Xhosa-speaking students.

Cancele was established through the self-sacrificing work of a succession of African and European teachers and missionaries. In 1927 J. N. de Beer and his family, with Charlie Mangcoto and Mountain Yaze, began mission work on the farm. Despite strong opposition, within a few months an elementary school was opened, and on Dec. 22, 1928, a church with a membership of 31 was organized.

The African district pastor who is in charge of the churches and companies in the surrounding district makes his home at the school. With the cooperation of members of the staff and the senior students, he cares for these companies and conducts public evangelism.

In 1954 secondary schoolwork was added and the school became the Cancele Secondary School. The majority of pupils continue their education at Bethel College, where a strong spiritual program is maintained.

Canright, Dudley Marvin

CANRIGHT, DUDLEY MARVIN (1840—1919). A onetime Seventh-day Adventist minister and writer who renounced his church affiliation and acquired prominence as the champion of theological opposition to SDA teachings. Ordained to the SDA ministry in 1865, he became a forceful preacher and a polemic writer of considerable ability. He took a prominent part in church administration and for two years was a member of the General Conference Committee. Capable and successful, he became intolerant of the opinions of others and chafed under the administrative control of his fellow ministers and the close guidance of testimonies from Ellen White. He also showed instability of temperament, losing heart and doubting his faith when disagreeable experiences came to him. Several times before his separation from the church he left the ministry, then returned and carried on with great vigor. A vision of greater achievement in the service of a cause more popular than that of SDAs finally led him to resign and sever his connection with the church in February 1887. In April of the same year he was ordained to the ministry of the Baptist church at Otsego, Michigan, his home. Two years later he resigned from this position and devoted his time to writing against SDAs. In 1889 he published a book entitled Seventh-Day Adventism Renounced. In it he set forth his arguments against the doctrine of the imminent return of Christ, denied the binding nature of the Ten Commandments, rejected the ministry of Ellen White, ridiculed the church leaders, and forecast the early disappearance of the SDA movement.

Canright's views are reviewed, analyzed, and refuted in W. H. Branson's book In Defense of the Faith (Review and Herald, 1933).

Cap-Haitien Adventist Academy

CAP-HAITIEN ADVENTIST ACADEMY (Collège Adventiste du Cap-Haitien). A coeducational secondary school owned and operated by the North Haiti Mission. In 1963 the North Haiti Mission committee took an action adding the secondary classes to the existing elementary school known as École Toussaint Louverture. At the end of the same year, the Franco-Haitian Union added its approval.

For the school year 1964—1965, the school offered the equivalent to seventh, eighth, and ninth grades, with an enrollment of 40 students. Amos Bossou, the principal of the elementary section, was chosen to be the principal of that new section.

Elie Henry, who became education secretary for the North Haiti Mission in January 1965, succeeded Bossou, who was called to be a district leader. In May 1965 the school was surveyed by Dr. Walton Brown, then Inter-American Division secretary of education. His report was encouraging, and the school was recognized by the Inter-American Division Department of Education. Before the end of 1965 the Haitian government's Department of Education also granted accreditation to the school.

In the beginning the development was slow. But under the leadership of Carolus Augustin the school made appreciable progress and the enrollment continued to increase.

In 1990 a vocational section was added. As of 1993 enrollment in the secondary school was 1,250 with 144 in the vocational section. In 1993 the headmaster was Daniel Calixte.

Cape Sanitarium

CAPE SANITARIUM. A medical institution operated from 1904 to 1934 about nine miles (14 kilometers) from Cape Town, South Africa, on a piece of property left vacant by the closing of the Plumstead Orphanage. This orphanage, begun in 1895 on another site (Timor Hall Estate), had been donated by the Mrs. E. A. Wessels family, and had cared for from 10 to 20 children for almost 10 years.

Dr. George Thomason, his wife, and his sister, Ida Thomason, arrived in South Africa from the United States in 1904 to operate the new sanitarium. Within a year there were no empty beds. Ida Thomason, who was a graduate nurse, was the matron and organized a nurse's training course. Among the young men and women trained here were some who entered mission service in the countries lying north of the Limpopo River. By 1908 the assets of the institution had risen to £6,270 and the bed capacity had increased to 24. In 1910, 10 more beds were added. In that same year Gen. Louis Botha, then serving as the first prime minister of the Union of South Africa, was a patient in the sanitarium. In addition to its other services, the institution served as a haven of peace for the missionaries who arrived from the north seeking to rebuild their health after arduous years in the tropics.

In 1911 Dr. Thomason was called to become medical secretary of the General Conference. However, Ida Thomason served the sanitarium until 1933.

In the middle 1920s the Cape Sanitarium became the Plumstead Nursing Home. Unable to survive the Depression of the early 1930s, it was closed in 1934.

Cape Verde

CAPE VERDE. A republic located in the Atlantic Ocean. An archipelago situated off the westernmost projection of Africa, it was discovered in 1460 by the Portuguese, and is composed of 10 main islands with about 425,000 inhabitants (1994 estimate), most of whom are of Portuguese descent.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. In January 1974 the Cape Verde Islands were joined with Guinea-Bissau in forming the Guinea-Cape Verde Mission. The territory of Cape Verde presently constitutes the Cape Verde Mission. It is a part of the Sahel Union Mission, which in turn is a part of the Africa-Indian Ocean Division. Statistics (1992) for Cape Verde: churches, 8; members, 1,483; church or elementary schools, 1; ordained ministers, 4; credentialed missionaries, 2; licensed ministers, 2; teachers, 2. The Cape Verde Mission headquarters are in Praia.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. The first SDA to visit Cape Verde appears to have been L. C. Chadwick, who stopped there in October 1892. In 1933 Antonio J. Gomes, who had emigrated to the United States, returned for a visit to his native village of Nossa Senhora do Monte on the island of Brava. Being an SDA, he aroused an interest in the teachings of his church. To follow up the interest, A. F. Raposo and his family were sent to Brava from Portugal, arriving on July 16, 1935. A Sabbath school of about 50 persons was organized in N. S. do Monte, and later another Sabbath school was organized in Vila de Nova Sintra. In March 1936, 15 persons were baptized, and in 1938 Gomes erected a building at N. S. do Monte to serve as a church, school, and residence. Pamphlets were sent from Brava to the other islands, and soon letters were received from São Vicente, São Tiago, and Fogo from those who had become interested in the SDA faith. Other missionary families were sent out, and now SDA work is established on each of these islands as well as on Brava.

Caprivi Zipfel

CAPRIVI ZIPFEL (also known as Caprivi Strip). A long narrow strip of land extending from the extreme northeast of Namibia (formerly South-West Africa) to the Zambezi River. It measures 300 miles (480 kilometers) in length and is nowhere more than 50 miles (80 kilometers) wide. The 1993 population was approximately 50,000. Its existence results from the aim of the German authorities at the end of the nineteenth century to unite their colony in South-West Africa with that in East Africa. The name is derived from that of Count Leo de Caprivi, who succeeded Prince Bismarck as imperial chancellor in 1890. Under his regime the area was ceded by Britain in 1893. The Caprivi Zipfel is almost dead flat, and having several large rivers, is of potential importance to the possible reclamation of the Kalahari Desert. Because of its isolation from South-West Africa, it was joined to Bechuanaland after World War I, and since 1939 has been administered from Pretoria. During the Bechuanaland administration of Caprivi its people approached the government in Mafikeng to send missionaries to teach the people the gospel and how to read and write. W. H. Anderson, who was then in Mafikeng, received the message and began immediately to respond to the call. He visited two regional chiefs in 1919 and agreed to send teachers. Two were sent from Rusangu Mission in what was then Northern Rhodesia, now Zambia. They were Henry Mabona and Nathan Muyapekwa. A school was opened in 1920 at Ikaba, marking the beginning of Seventh-day Adventist work.

In April 1921 G. L. Willmore was called from Congo (now Zaïre), where he was serving, to go to Caprivi. He was joined by N. Bulgin as the first White missionaries to the country. Schools were opened all over the area with a mission station at Katima Mulilo. Other missionaries were sent as evangelists. The last missionary was P. W. Owen. During his term of service the entire Caprivi work was shut down in 1943. The torch of the gospel continued to shine through dedicated former teachers. Men such as Joel Mwilima, Dickson Mutabelezi, Davison Mubonenwa, and Mixon Fwambi continued to hold believers in the faith for years without pay or encouragement from foreign workers until 1949, when W. M. Cooks began coming back once a year for camp meeting. He continued to strengthen the work until his retirement in 1972.

In that year the Caprivi Mission was organized as a part of the Zambesi Union, which was in turn part of the Trans-Africa Division. In 1975 there were nine churches, with a membership of 1,328.

At the end of 1972 the Caprivi Strip Field was organized. It continued to operate under the Zambesi Union until the end of 1981. In January 1982 the Caprivi Strip Field became the sixth suborganization of the Southern Union (Africa). In 1984 the territory was extended to take in the unentered territories of Kavango, with a population of about 170,000, and Tsumkwe, with about 10,000. These regions have been known as North East Namibia since declaring independence in 1990. In 1993 the field, by the authority of the Southern Africa Union, changed its name to North-East Namibia Field. In that year there were 28 churches with a membership of 6,525.

Carcich, Theodore

CARCICH, THEODORE (1905—1988). Administrator. Born in Yugoslavia, he began his service as pastor-evangelist in the New York Conference, eventually moving to the Southern New England Conference, where he became president. He continued his presidency in the Illinois, Washington, and Central union conferences until his election as vice president of the General Conference for the North American Division in 1962. In 1966 he became a general vice president of the General Conference. He died Feb. 12, 1988, near Moscow, Idaho.

Cardey, Elmer Lee

CARDEY, ELMER LEE (1884—1973). Pioneer, missionary, evangelist, administrator. A native of Wisconsin, he studied at Bethel Academy in that state and at Emmanuel Missionary College in Michigan. In 1906 he went to the Bay Islands in Central America. The Bay Islands Mission was the first to be organized in the Inter-American Division, and Elder Cardey became its first president. He returned to the United States, and in 1911 worked in the Atlantic Union, where he launched the first Bible correspondence course in the Seventh-day Adventist denomination. He engaged in evangelistic work in New York state and served as chaplain of the New England Memorial Hospital for four years. For a time he served as president of the Southern New England Conference and then went to Lincoln, Nebraska, for pastoral work.

In 1936 he became secretary of the Lay Activities Department of the Central Union Conference and then went to Lincoln, Nebraska, for pastoral work. A year later he was called to evangelism in the Columbia Union.

In 1938 he was appointed to evangelism in South Africa. Three new churches were raised up in Cape Town, the Intermediate School for European Youth was established, and a Bible correspondence school was organized.

In 1950 he returned to the United States, where he established a Bible correspondence school in the Southern Union Conference. More than 1 million students were enrolled during his leadership. He retired in 1963 after 58 years of service to the church.

Carey, Alexander

CAREY, ALEXANDER (1882—1970). Treasurer and manager. A native of London, he was among the first 12 to gain a scholarship from London County Council to Sir Walter St. John College.

In 1915 he was introduced to the Seventh-day Adventist message through a tent campaign. When the tent burned to the ground, Carey opened his home for the meetings and soon after took his stand for the truth.

In 1920 he went to Stanborough Park, Watford, beginning denominational service as treasurer in Granose Foods, Ltd. He then served as manager of the Stanborough Sanitarium for a brief period before transferring to the Stanborough College as manager in 1925. Three years later he was asked to serve as secretary-treasurer of the British Union Conference, which position he held for 22 years. When he was nearing 70, he became honorary secretary of Worldwide Advent Missions and served in this capacity for 17 years.

Caribbean Union College

CARIBBEAN UNION COLLEGE. A coeducational boarding school on the college level, with four-year degrees being offered in religion, theology, education, history, social studies, English, business, biology, and home economics. Associate degrees are offered in business, office management, elementary teaching, computer science, and religion. Minors are offered in industrial education, modern languages, music, chemistry, health, and other areas.

The college is located in Trinidad, West Indies. It is situated on 345 acres (140 hectares) of land in the beautiful Maracas Valley in the northwestern part of the island, about nine miles (14 kilometers) northeast of the capital city of Port of Spain. The mission of the college is to develop the whole person—mental, physical, social, spiritual, emotional, and vocational; to provide trained personnel for the church and its institutions as well as the wider community; and to enable students to continue their education at other institutions of higher learning.

The college is operated by the Caribbean Union of Seventh-day Adventists, which has a constituency of 121,882. The college draws students from inside and outside the Caribbean, extending as far as Europe, Africa, and North and South America. These students represent the four major languages of English, Spanish, French, and Dutch. The college curriculum is accredited by the SDA Board of Regents and in 1985 became affiliated with Andrews University through actions by the higher organizations and the boards of both institutions. At the end of 1993 the college enrollment was 660, with 46 faculty members and 30 part-time instructors. A secondary school with an enrollment of 450 and an elementary school are also operated in conjunction with the college.

East Caribbean Training School. The college was established in August 1927 under the name East Caribbean Training School. Its founder and first principal was C. J. Boyd, who was joined the day after his arrival by R.S.J. Hamilton and his wife, together with Eloise Williams and Linda Austin. (In 1963 Ms. Austin completed 36 years of continuous service in the school.) The school opened with five teachers and one student, a Trinidadian. By the middle of October other students had arrived from British Guiana, from some of the northern islands, and from Trinidad itself, increasing the enrollment to 26. At that time the school's main building contained the assembly room, the dining room, the business office, and the women's sleeping quarters. The men slept in tapia huts. Later a men's dormitory was built.

In 1929 the school was renamed Caribbean Training College. The next year two industries were begun—the college press and the broom shop. Agriculture and animal husbandry flourished.

By 1931 an enriched high school program on the American unit system was well established, and in 1935 the first graduating class of three students completed the twelfth grade. In 1938 another three students were graduated. From that time onward, except for 1941, yearly graduating classes became the rule. Also in 1938 the administration building was erected.

Caribbean Training College. A well-defined college preparatory course was organized in 1945, and in 1948 Caribbean Training College was made a junior college with two-year college courses in theology, teacher training, business, and secretarial science. A science department also was begun.

In response to the insistence on a type of education that from a scholastic point of view would meet the needs of an area with British culture, the secondary program was changed from the unit system to the British spiral system, leading to the Cambridge School Certificate or London General Certificate of Education. However, the pattern followed in the postsecondary or junior college section of the school remained unchanged until 1954. At that time the teacher-training program, on its purely professional levels, was modified to meet the requirements of the government of Trinidad and Tobago. The elementary school also was developed at this time, and the institution was then recognized as a teacher-training college qualified to offer candidates for the Trained Teachers' Certificate. The physical plant was enlarged and improved: the chapel was extended, a dining room and teachers' cottages were built, and the dormitories were enlarged. The print shop was expanded and became a profitable school industry. Several years later a laundry was built.

Caribbean Union College. In 1956 the name of the school was changed to Caribbean Union College. In 1957 the offices of president and business manager, until then united in one person, were separated, and B. R. Hamilton was chosen as the first business manager. By 1962 liberal arts, music, and secondary teacher-training courses were added to the junior college curriculum. This last course involves preparation for the London General Certificate of Education (advanced level) in addition to some professional training.

From 1935 to 1962, 370 students graduated from the high school and junior college. The spiritual program is maintained to fulfill the school's purpose to be "a light to the Caribbean." The majority of the ministerial workers and teachers in the union are alumni of the college.

In 1970 the Theology Department of the college was upgraded from a fourteenth-grade program to the sixteenth-grade B.Th. program. The college graduated its first B.Th. graduates in 1972.

In 1973 the college suffered two disastrous fires. The first, in March, destroyed the administration building. This building, which also housed the chapel, was built in 1939. The second fire, which came six months later, in September, completely wiped out such industries as the broom factory, the woodwork and maintenance shops, and the college store. The college program staggered under the heavy loss.

By mid-1974 two new important buildings were constructed—a new industrial arts center for teaching industrial skills, and a new industrial building for housing the new woodworking industry. A new broom industry building was built, and later the woodworking building was renovated to house the College Health Food Industry. The school operates a modern college press. A three-story science complex was completed in 1992. This building also houses the administrative offices.

Cariboo Adventist Academy

CARIBOO ADVENTIST ACADEMY. A grade K-12 school operated by the Williams Lake and Cariboo Central churches, which have a combined membership of 370. It is located on a 6.5-acre (2.6-hectare) site on South Lakeside Road, two miles (three kilometers) from the city of Williams Lake, in British Columbia. The academy is accredited both denominationally and provincially. Secondary enrollment in 1993 was 63, with a staff of 16.

The school had its beginnings in the logging camps of the D. Basabara and the Jacobson brothers in the 1950s. When they moved their logging companies into the city of Williams Lake, the school opened there in 1959. As the enrollment grew and the program developed, the school became inadequate in physical plant and location. In January 1971 the new school was opened on the present site. By 1973 a fifth classroom and a science room were added. In 1979 an expansion of the existing building provided for home economics classes, an industrial education workshop, and a general purpose room. In 1987 a gymnasium classroom complex was added. The school now has adequate facilities and a well-rounded program.

Carlstjerna, Carl Oscar

CARLSTJERNA, CARL OSCAR (1880—1953). Minister and administrator in Sweden and Finland. He was born in Odensjö, Halland, Sweden, under the name Carlsson and at the age of 19 was baptized by Birger Andersson. In 1902 he completed the three-year worker training course at the Nyhyttan mission school. In 1905 he preached in several places in Sweden and was ordained to the ministry in 1911. In 1912, when the South Swedish Mission was organized, he became its president. Two years later, in 1914, he became president of the Finland Conference. While in Finland he met a general's daughter, Dagmar Tavaststjerna, and married her in 1917. At the same time he adopted the family name Carlstjerna. The same year he returned to Sweden to head the Central Swedish Conference. In 1920 he left the presidency of the conference to assume charge of the Nyhyttan mission school (see Swedish Junior College and Seminary), where he remained until 1929. He then became the first president of the Finland-Swedish Conference. From 1932 until about 1940 he was chaplain of Hultafors Sanitarium.

Carmel Adventist College

CARMEL ADVENTIST COLLEGE. A coeducational boarding school on the senior high school level, operated by the Trans-Australian Union Conference, near Perth, Australia. The 1993 enrollment was 180, with an instructional staff of 18. This school offers courses leading to the West Australian Higher Secondary certificate, which is a prerequisite to taking advanced studies at Avondale College.

Carmel College began as the Darling Range School, established early in 1907 to provide local educational facilities for secondary students who otherwise would have had to go to the Avondale School for Christian Workers (now Avondale College) at Cooranbong, New South Wales.

On hearing of the search by the West Australia Conference officers for a suitable site for the proposed boarding school, Charles E. Ashcroft, one of the early Seventh-day Adventist converts, offered to donate his holdings situated 17 miles (27 kilometers) east of Perth in the Heidelberg (now Bickley) Valley in the Darling Range. On this property was believed to be the best spring in the district. After an inspection by L. V. Finster, the conference president, H. R. Martin, and the full committee, Ashcroft's offer was accepted and work was begun immediately.

H. R. Martin, who was appointed "teacher and foreman," recalled 19 years later, "I was asked to take charge and build up an intermediate training school, and as a start one pound was given me to buy an ax, grindstone, and digging fork." By the middle of 1907 the unfinished six-room residence already on the land was completed, and an annex built providing a kitchen, dining room, chapel, and recitation room.

Church members demonstrated their interest in the venture by contributing both time and money. The school opened Jan. 13, 1907, with only two students. By the end of the first week the number had grown to five, and by the close of the year to 14.

In 1908 a building program was initiated that was to be completed in three stages, envisaging a central administration block, with two dormitory wings to be built on a more desirable spot higher up the valley. When the 1909 school year opened, the first wing, a two-story wooden building, was sufficiently advanced to accommodate 30 women and a number of staff members. The men continued to occupy the original building. Stage two was completed in 1914—the central portion, containing a dining room and kitchen on the ground floor, and a chapel and classrooms above. Late in 1924 stage three began, when the men's old hall was demolished and the timber used to construct the second wing, completed in 1926, although occupied in 1925. H. R. Martin was both architect and builder. Also erected were several faculty homes and a laundry and bake house at the rear of the main building. In 1926 the school was renamed the West Australian Missionary School, and in 1934 the West Australian Missionary College. The present name dates from 1968.

In 1958 the Charles Ashcroft Hall, a single-story structure in brick and tile, affording accommodations for 50 men, was completed. In 1961 a similar women's dormitory, Kathleen Giblett Hall, was built.

In 1974 plans were laid for the construction of the first stage of a new central administration and classroom block that was erected in 1975.

The college estate was gradually enlarged, until it totaled 138 acres (56 hectares), of which 35 acres (14 hectares) are in orchard, mainly stone-fruit and citrus, and 45 acres (18 hectares) in pasture.

Caro, Margaret

CARO, MARGARET (1848—1938). Dentist, Bible instructor. Born in Wellington, New Zealand, she accepted the Seventh-day Adventist message under the evangelistic ministry of A. G. Daniells in 1888. While attending the first camp meeting in the Southern Hemisphere, she became closely associated with Ellen White. When Mrs. White was holding meetings in Wellington, she sent for Margaret Caro to extract her teeth and fit dentures. Large portions of The Desire of Ages were written while her gums were healing. Dr. Caro later attended Avondale College, where she trained under W. W. Prescott and engaged in Bible work in the North New South Wales Conference. She spent the remainder of her life in New Zealand in a continuing advocacy of health reform and was remembered for strength of character, courage, and enthusiasm for God's work.

History

History. Beginnings of the Work in North Carolina. Seventh-day Adventist work in the Carolinas began in the 1870s in the heart of the North Carolina mountains 50 miles (80 kilometers) and more from the nearest railroad. When SDAs papers sent by two women in the north to Watauga County fell into the hands of William Norwood and Larkin Townsend, they became agitated over the Sabbath question, especially when their pastor could give them no Bible proof for Sunday. A mountain preacher, Samuel H. Kime, also received publications. Almost simultaneously these three men, as well as William M. Baird, W. W. Jestes, Columbus (Lum) Fox, and Harrison Clark, began observing the Sabbath. In response to their request for help, C. O. Taylor, who had been one of the first SDA preachers in New York state, visited them as he and his wife traveled south in 1879 and conducted a series of evangelistic meetings at Shull's Mill, six miles (10 kilometers) from Valle Crucis.

That year a church was organized in Watauga County, known as the Watauga church. The next year J. O. Corliss, sent by the General Conference to survey and foster the work in the South, visited the members in the mountains, and on Nov. 21, 1880, he ordained L. P. Hodges and licensed C. F. Fox and Samuel H. Kime. In 1883 he ordained Kime, whose son Stewart later became a president of the conference.

The present Valle Crucis church, originally called the Bethel church, was organized by Hodges in the home of Larkin Townsend on May 15, 1881, with 11 charter members (including some from Banner Elk in an adjoining county, where a separate church was organized in 1912). The Bethel members walked as far as 10 miles (16 kilometers) to help build their church on Dutch Creek in 1882, on land donated by Larkin Townsend. This is believed to be the first church building erected by SDAs in the South.

For many years colporteurs selling Bibles and religious books were the only full-time workers in North Carolina, although occasionally a minister would spend a few months traveling through the state visiting interested groups.

S. H. Kime wrote in 1882 that there was no full-time minister in the state. In 1889, three years after North Carolina had been made a mission field, it had one minister, J. W. Bagby; there were about 80 members, mostly in the western part of the state, a state tract society, and a Sabbath school association.

In 1889 W. L. Killen and another colporteur sold the book Bible Readings for the Home Circle to several families in Stokes County. The Toab Young, Will Young, and F. A. Slate families soon became convicted of the Bible truths concerning the seventh-day Sabbath and the return of Christ.

The Slate family sold their lumber business in Stokes County in 1904 and moved to Kernersville, where a printing business was established near the present town square. A few Sabbathkeepers met faithfully in the homes of the Slates, the H. R. Hahns, or often in rooms above the printshop. In 1907 Elder Wood held meetings in the Macy Grove School building. Other ministers who helped establish the little group were George Thompson, Walter Nash, and George Brown. A number of denominational workers came from this small group. Joe Crews, former speaker of the Amazing Facts radio program, was a grandson of Arch McDowell, one of the first members of the Kernersville church. Joseph Slate spent 28 years in mission service in Africa and a number of the Slate family members gave many years of service in the General Conference or the Review and Herald.

Late in 1890 the General Conference transferred from Kansas City a colporteur and licensed preacher who was afterward ordained—D. T. Shireman (pronounced “Sherman”), of Iowa, a former brickmason, carpenter, and mechanic. Spending the first winter in Watauga County, he preached at Clark's Creek and Bethel, and held meetings on Grandfather Mountain; in 1891 he settled in Asheville. In his house-to-house evangelism he sent names of interested persons to SDAs in the North with a request for papers and personal letters. His reports in the Review and Herald record the beginnings of churches at Asheville (organized 1894) and at Greensboro (organized 1895). The latter was not the present Greensboro church established 40 years later; it moved within two years to Lego (and from this Lego church the present High Point church traces its origin). He also reports converts in many places where churches developed much later—in the southeast; at Durham (where there was a company in 1898, a church in 1914); at Raleigh (a company in 1897; a church, from a new start, in 1932).

Beginnings in South Carolina. C. O. Taylor had briefly visited several interested people in Darlington County in 1879, yet as late as 1891 not even a colporteur had been sent in, and there was not one known SDA in South Carolina. Then in 1893 another minister, E. W. Webster, from Wisconsin, was sent to Spartanburg, and soon afterward J. O. Johnston (not yet ordained) arrived at Greenville from North Carolina. Both used Shireman's correspondence method. In the spring of 1894 Webster and Johnston held a series of SDA tent meetings—the first in South Carolina—at Brushy Creek, a rural community near Greenville. The first church was organized at Spartanburg in August 1894. The Brushy Creek church (organized 1895) had the first church building (1897).

Meanwhile in October 1894 I. E. Kimball, a minister from Vermont, settled in Spartanburg, and Webster seems to have returned north. Johnston and Kimball held meetings in many places. They wrote in the Review and Herald of encountering kindness and prejudice, much indifference, some deep interest, and few converts. Kimball's report, from Greenwood, of visiting and giving Bible studies, especially among the "aristocratic and wealthy," was not the usual pattern.

Late in 1896 the Kimballs went to Charleston. At first they made personal contacts in churches and homes, then held small meetings in the WCTU chapel. From 1898 they operated night schools for African-Americans and a welfare mission for White unfortunates. In 1899 there was a group of eight White and eight African-American converts, all recipients of "Christian help work" apparently from the mission. A short-lived church of 17 was organized early in 1900 (the present Charleston church had a later beginning; it was organized in 1913). Kimball worked among the African-Americans also in Georgetown, South Carolina, and in Wilmington, North Carolina, early in 1901, then left for Virginia.

Meanwhile, B. F. Gowdy, a newly licensed preacher from Minnesota who replaced Johnston late in 1897, reported various meetings, mostly in the western part of the state. At Chick Springs a church was organized in January 1899, which briefly operated a church school and disbanded after 11 months when all but one family moved away. In February 1900 Gowdy opened an industrial school near Oakwood, Aiken County, in a tenant farmer's cabin, erecting "a substantial building" a year later. By the beginning of 1902, apparently, Gowdy's health broke, and he went West. South Carolina had no SDA worker until 1904.

Conference Organizations. Soon after the General Conference District no. 2 became the Southern Union Conference (spring 1901), the North and South Carolina missions were combined and organized Sept. 1, 1901, as the Carolina Conference, with J. O. Johnston as president. There were three ministers, four licentiates (all in North Carolina after Gowdy left), 10 churches, seven companies, and a total membership of 300. In February 1904 North Carolina was made a conference, and South Carolina, with two churches and 76 members, became a mission under the Southern Union Conference. South Carolina became a conference in 1907, with R. T. Nash as president, with four churches and 100 members. The North Carolina Conference published the North Carolina Messenger, which was discontinued in 1907 with the appearance of the Southern Union publication Report of Progress.

During the time the Southern Union was divided (1909—1932) the Carolinas belonged to the Southeastern Union Conference. The two conferences were reunited in 1918 as the Carolina Conference, comprising all of South Carolina and that part of North Carolina lying east of Ashe, Watauga, Avery, McDowell, and Henderson counties (from 1933, all of North Carolina except Cherokee County). The conference headquarters were established at Charlotte, North Carolina, and a church was organized there the next year. The conference office maintained its headquarters in Charlotte and built a new office in 1975 at 6000 Conference Drive. The 1990s brought about growth and change with plans for a new office in 1994—1995.

New Beginnings in South Carolina. In 1904 E. W. Webster returned as superintendent of the South Carolina Mission with another minister, R. T. Nash; a licensed preacher, E. W. Carey; and a colporteur, C. F. Dart. They visited the two surviving churches of a decade earlier (Spartanburg and Brushy Creek) and small groups of members and held evangelistic meetings. The next year, when meetings were begun at Columbia, the group included a Bible instructor supported by the Michigan Conference who was “gaining access to some of the best homes with The Family Bible Teacher” and holding Bible studies, although the people were “very cautious.” The first camp meeting in the state was held near Spartanburg in 1905. In 1907 the Spartanburg church acquired a building, paid for partly by offerings solicited in the Review and Herald. With stronger evangelistic help, more churches were established—for example, Charleston in 1913, Columbia and Greenville in 1916. When the two Carolinas reunited in 1918, South Carolina had 22 churches and 495 members, but only seven church buildings and seven church schools.

At that time the outgoing South Carolina president attributed the slowness of progress in that conference to the lack of workers who could stay long enough to build up permanent results; to the difficulty of working for the upper class, who were harder to reach; and to the frequent lack of adaptability to local situations. Spalding writes similarly (Origin and History of SDAs, vol. 2, pp. 168—171) of the early SDA difficulties in the South in general. In South Carolina in particular, conservatism and reluctance to accept new and unpopular religious ideas were strong.

Self-supporting Work in North Carolina Mountains. In the first decade of the century SDA work developed in a distinctive form in the rural mountain areas of North Carolina. In contrast to the rich lowlands of the Carolinas, which had been farmed originally in large plantations with slave labor, the mountains had been settled by hardy, independent, small farmers for the most part opposed to slavery (some of whom fought in the Union Army). They cleared their small plots, built their modest cabins, and struggled with the stubborn soil to raise only enough to subsist on. Isolated as they were, they did not have the more favored lowlanders’ opportunity for advancement. When Ellen G. White urged SDA families to go south and begin self-supporting work, one result was the founding of small institutions at Hildebran (by D. T. Shireman, 1897), Eufola (by J. O. Johnston, 1908), Glen Alpine, Cowee Mountain, Fletcher (1910), and Pisgah (1914; see Mount Pisgah Academy), in North Carolina (and at Math Mountain in South Carolina). Usually one or two families would move in, clear the land, and build up the soil to raise a variety of crops; then they would launch a small school and often a small sanitarium.

Of these, two are at present still operating independently—Fletcher Academy and Mountain Sanitarium. The school (Asheville Agricultural School) was founded by Sydney Brownsberger and A. W. Spalding on a 416-acre (170-hectare) farm 18 miles (30 kilometers) south of Asheville, and the sanitarium (developed from a health cafeteria and treatment rooms in Asheville), by Dr. John Brownsberger and the A. A. Jaspersons, with Lelia Patterson directing the school of nursing.

These mountain institutions endeavored by precept and example to improve the health and standard of living in the community as well as to preach the gospel. For example, Mountain Sanitarium staff members aided their mountain neighbors, who were living on an impoverished diet, by holding home nursing and first-aid classes and by organizing a Good Neighbor Club among the African-Americans to promote gardening and poultry raising. Prizes were awarded—not money but plants, such as strawberries or fruit trees; or sometimes a calf donated by a dairy. As a result of this program, some of the children tasted cow's milk for the first time.

Work Among African-Americans and Indians. Incidental mention has been made of SDA work for African-Americans, but the story of the work by and for African-Americans in the Carolinas belongs to another article. See South Atlantic Conference.

A church member with a burden for the North Carolina Indians arranged to have Bible School enrollment cards sent to 2,000 boxholders in Bladen County. There was a good response. P. G. Crestakos, with his wife, responding to students' requests, studied with them in their homes; a few were baptized. Some of these Indians had long believed that the seventh day was the Sabbath without knowing of others who believed it. Later J. O. Wilson carried on the work. In 1962 there were 35 adult believers, and Prestley Lowry, one of the Indian converts, had been trained and was working as an Indian minister. Today the Pembroke, North Carolina, church located in Robeson County serves the Lumbee Indians. A renewed evangelistic effort took place to reach this group in the 1990s.

Through evangelism, SDA work has expanded throughout the Carolina Conference, enabling it to incorporate a more multi-ethnic constituency, including Anglo-American, Hispanic, and Korean cultures. The first African-American pastor began serving the Beaufort, South Carolina, and Hilton Head Island, South Carolina, churches in 1992.

Layperson Involvement in Evangelistic Work. In 1992, using the book The Great Controversy, the conference conducted radio campaigns in major cities of the Carolinas. When encouraged to call a toll-free number to receive a free book, more than 10,000 listeners responded. Members of the participating churches hand-delivered most of these 10,000 copies to individual homes. Evangelistic meetings followed in several cities. The combined efforts of this program resulted in a record-breaking year for soul winning, and a renewed commitment to evangelism by the constituency.

Medical-Evangelistic and Welfare Work. Private medical-evangelistic work was carried on by physicians and dentists, for example, by Dr. Kenneth Mathiesen and his wife at Pittsboro, North Carolina, in 1938, joined later by others, resulting in a church of 40 members.

W. R. Winslow Memorial Home is a 146-bed nursing facility that provides skilled and intermediate nursing care. Located in Elizabeth City, North Carolina, the home is owned and operated by the Carolina Conference.

The original facility opened in December 1961 as a 40-bed rest home. W. R. Winslow, a Washington, D.C., businessman, friend of Seventh-day Adventists, and native of Elizabeth City, developed the facility because of his strong desire to help the senior citizens of his hometown. He provided funds for construction and established a "trust" for its continuous operation. Several years after opening the home, Winslow deeded complete ownership to the Carolina Conference.

During the next 12 years the home expanded to 60 beds. In 1973 the nursing home received a Certificate of Need and was enlarged to 121 beds and licensed for a nursing facility. The last addition of 25 beds began in 1991 after the home was awarded another Certificate of Need.

Carolina Living, Inc., is a 24-unit retirement center located adjacent to W. R. Winslow Memorial Home, Inc., in Elizabeth City, North Carolina. At its humble beginning in 1977, the administrator's home was converted to a six-unit retirement facility. In 1990 it was voted to demolish the old home and build a modern 24-unit facility at the same location. Construction was completed and admissions began in May 1991.

Nestled in the mountains of western North Carolina is a beautiful retirement community comprised of Pisgah Manor, a 118-bed skilled and intermediate care nursing facility, a 24-unit assisted living center, and 72 modern condominiums designed for independent living (Pisgah Estates). This retirement campus is located adjacent to Mount Pisgah Academy and provides employment for 60—65 students. The goal of Pisgah Estates, Pisgah Manor Health Care Center, and Pisgah Assisted Living Center is to make retirement an enjoyable and stress-free experience.

Nosoca Pines Ranch, a youth camp and convention center for the Carolina Conference, was purchased in 1971 and the first camp held there in 1974. The 170-acre (70-hectare) camp is located on the shores of Lake Wateree at Liberty Hill, South Carolina, approximately 23 miles (35 kilometers) northwest of Camden, South Carolina. With 18 cabins and a beautifully renovated auditorium/gym, cafeteria, tennis courts, racquetball courts, and lakeside campfire bowl, it offers much for the SDA and other denominational groups that make extensive use of the camp and its natural resources.

Carr, Septimus Walford

CARR, SEPTIMUS WALFORD (1878—1972). Missionary to Fiji and Papua. S. W. Carr was born in Sweden of British parents and migrated early in life to Sydney. He accepted present truth through reading the book Rome's Challenge. At Avondale College he became acquainted with Ellen White, and graduated in 1903 from the Missionary Course. In 1904 he became the first principal of the Buresala Training School (forerunner of Fulton College). In 1905 he married Edith Guilliard. In 1908 in company with a Fijian missionary, Benni Tavodi, he pioneered the work in Papua. He was ordained in 1910. From 1915 to 1916 he was engaged in evangelism in Queensland. The years 1917 to 1919 spent on Niue Island were followed by an extended term in Fiji, in evangelism, education work, and the translating of books, tracts, and Voice of Prophecy lessons. From 1939 to 1946 he served as a pastor in Queensland.

Carscallen, Arthur Asa Grandville

CARSCALLEN, ARTHUR ASA GRANDVILLE (1879—1964). Canadian-born missionary, administrator, and linguist. He was baptized in North Dakota in 1899, and attended Union College in 1900 and 1901. In 1902 he was sent to work as a colporteur in Scotland, Wales, and England. He also assisted in evangelistic meetings, and in 1904 entered Duncombe Hall Training College (now Newbold College), where he completed his course in September 1906.

In 1906 he accepted a call to open up Seventh-day Adventist work in Kenya, East Africa, with the arrangement that his fiancée, Helen Thomson, be sent out the next year. After his ordination, late in 1906, he sailed for Mombasa with Peter Nyambo, an African teacher from Nyasaland who had been attending school in England.

Carscallen spent the next 13 years pioneering in Kenya as superintendent of the British East Africa Mission. Under his direction a string of mission stations was established along the eastern shore of Lake Victoria: Gendia, Wire Hill, Rusinga Island, Kanyadoto, Karungu, Kisii (Nyanchwa), and last, Kamagambo. Returning from furlough in 1913, he brought back a small press and set up a small printing plant at Gendia to publish books, papers, and a small monthly journal (see Africa Herald Publishing House).

He mastered the Luo language and was the first to reduce it to writing. The grammar textbook he produced was widely used for many years. He spent more than two years translating portions of the New Testament into the Luo tongue, which were published by the British and Foreign Bible Society.

During World War I many of the missions were looted and damaged, and the workers, except Carscallen and one other, were kept from their stations for nearly two years. Carscallen held the workers together through it all.

In 1921 Carscallen returned with his family to the United States, where his wife died the same year in Oregon. In 1924 he married Anita Johnson. After some years in pastoral work in the Dakotas, he worked in British Guiana from 1931 to 1942. While he was president of the three united Guiana fields he helped demolish the old SDA church building in Georgetown and built another, doing much of the carpentry work himself.

Still a pioneer, he offered himself for work in the interior of British Guiana among the Davis Indians, and went about the close of 1936 to Waramadong, near Mount Roraima, where he opened a mission. Mastering the native dialect, he produced a dictionary and grammar in the local language. In retirement in the United States he settled in La Sierra, California, and continued to visit churches and camp meetings, seeking to kindle a missionary spirit among young and old alike.

Case, Hiram S.

CASE, HIRAM S. (fl. 1851—1854). Millerite preacher won to Adventism by S. W. Rhodes in 1851. In 1854 he joined an opposition group that for two years published a paper called the Messenger of Truth (see Messenger Party). In a letter to James White published in the Present Truth (1:85) he states that light concerning the two-horned beast of Rev. 13 came to him while Rhodes was showing him the third angel's message. His view was that "the image-beast is composed of church and state united—Protestant churches and Republicanism."

Casebeer, Homer David

CASEBEER, HOMER DAVID (1886—1948). Departmental secretary, missionary. Upon graduating from Pacific Union College in 1916, he was appointed to mission service in the West Indies. He was ordained in 1919. In 1921 he became head of the Spanish Department and later also of the Portuguese and North American Indian departments in the General Conference Bureau of Home Missions (see North American Division Multilingual Ministries). With the exception of a short term of service in South America and another in the Illinois Conference, he continued in the General Conference until 1946. Later he served for one year as pastor of the Los Angeles Spanish church.

Cash, Angelia Vesta

CASH, ANGELIA VESTA (1881—1953). Teacher, Bible instructor. She taught church school for eight years in Illinois and Wisconsin, and then became the first Bible instructor for Italian-speaking people in the United States, a work to which she devoted 40 years of her life. She worked in the following centers: Chicago (1912—1921, 1945—1952), New York City (1921—1939, 1941—1945), and San Francisco (1939—1941).

Castle Medical Center

CASTLE MEDICAL CENTER. Located in Kailua, Hawaii, a full-service acute-care hospital recognized for both its inpatient care and outpatient programs throughout the state. A nonprofit institution, Castle serves all of Oahu and is the primary health-care facility for windward Oahu. The hospital is operated by Adventist Health System/West.

The 160-bed facility offers a full spectrum of services, ranging from preventive health programs and maternity care to emergency medicine and critical care. Castle is staffed by more than 800 employees, 300 volunteers, and nearly 300 physicians. Each year Castle provides care for 7,000 inpatients.

Castle, which first opened its doors in 1963 with 72 beds, continues to grow and change to keep pace with the community's health-care needs. The most recent expansion and renovation project was a $10 million program that resulted in Hawaii's first single-room maternity-care unit, a progressive-care unit, and a state-of-the-art critical-care unit. Castle is widely recognized for its medical/surgical capabilities, emergency department, laboratory and X-ray facilities, mental health services, and alcoholism and addictions programs.

Many of Castle's most successful programs are focused on preventive care services that promote a healthy lifestyle. The Castle Center for Health Promotion, employee wellness program, and vegetarian restaurant (Pali Gardens), all support this mission. The hospital offers a wide variety of community classes and services, including physical fitness testing, stress management, coronary risk evaluation, smoking cessation, and aerobics.

Castle Quality, the hospital's continuous quality improvement program, earned Castle national recognition in the Commitment to Excellence program, which honors hospitals for their service, excellence, and quality leadership. Castle is the first hospital in the nation to implement patient—focused care—a program to increase efficiency, reduce costs, and improve patient care throughout the facility.

The administrative team includes Terry W. White, president; Ken Finch, senior vice president; Gwen Brownfield, Orvin Fillman, and John Monge, vice presidents; and Don Bieber, Adele Hoe, and Jon Larrabee, administrative directors.

Caviness, Agnes Elvira Lewis

CAVINESS, AGNES ELVIRA LEWIS (1889—1973). Pioneer, dean, teacher, educator, author. She was born in Minnesota and received her education at Union College, Southwestern Union College, Walla Walla College, and Pacific Union College, where she was the first degree candidate. That year she married Leon L. Caviness, and they returned to Union College. The following year they transferred to Columbia Union College. With her husband, she was a founder of the Seminaire Adventiste du Salève, in France, and was dean of women during its first year. Many of her articles appeared in denominational publications. She often wrote under the pen name of Mother Naomi. After serving overseas for 12 years, the family returned to Pacific Union College, where she taught French and German and pioneered in teaching classes in marriage and the family.

She is the author of the book The Way He Should Go.

Caviness, George W.

CAVINESS, GEORGE W. (1857—1923). Educator, missionary. A graduate of Battle Creek College (1882), he, with his wife, taught for three years in the Michigan school that developed into Cedar Lake Academy. He was ordained in 1886, and the next year taught at Battle Creek College. He served as principal of South Lancaster Academy from 1888 to 1894, and as president of Battle Creek College, 1894—1897.

Because of his knowledge of Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, he was asked in 1897 to go to Mexico as the Seventh-day Adventist representative on an interdenominational committee to revise the Spanish translation of the Bible. This was the beginning of 25 years of service in Mexico. In 1899 he pioneered SDA work in Mexico City and served in various capacities. For a time he was superintendent of the Mexican field, but perhaps his most important contribution was his work as editor of the Spanish paper. Ill health prevented active service from 1920 until the time of his death.

Caviness, Leon Leslie

CAVINESS, LEON LESLIE (1884—1955). Educator, departmental secretary, editor. Educated in Battle Creek, the University of Michigan, the University of Nebraska, and George Washington University (Ph.D.), he taught languages at Union College (1906—1913). Later he was professor of Greek at Washington Missionary Seminary (1913—1915), assistant and later associate editor of the Review and Herald (1915—1920), departmental secretary of the Latin Union (1920—1924), director of the Seminaire Adventiste du Salève (1921—1922), Sabbath school and educational secretary of the European Division (1924—1928) and of the Southern European Division (1928—1932), and professor of biblical languages at Pacific Union College from 1932 until his retirement in 1952.

Cayman Islands

CAYMAN ISLANDS. A crown colony of Great Britain, comprising Grand Cayman, Cayman Brac, and Little Cayman, situated about halfway between Jamaica and the southeast coast of Cuba, contains 102 square miles (264 square kilometers). The population of these islands is approximately 28,000 of whom about 27,000 live on Grand Cayman. The islands were probably named from the caymans (American alligators, genus Caiman) that were numerous in Little Cayman and Cayman Brac. These islands were settled mainly by English people from Jamaica, and until Jamaica became independent in 1962, they were regarded as its dependency.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. The Cayman Islands form the Cayman Islands Mission, a part of the West Indies Union Conference, which in turn is part of the Inter-American Division. Statistics (1992) for the Cayman Islands: churches, 9; members, 1,225; church schools, 1; ordained ministers, 5; church school teachers, 6. Cayman Islands Mission headquarters are at Georgetown, Grand Cayman.

The first Seventh-day Adventist in the Caymans was Gilbert McLaughlin, who had become acquainted with SDA teachings while living at Bonacca, Bay Islands, Honduras, sometime about 1894. Returning to Grand Cayman shortly after that date, he began teaching his newly found faith and erected a small church building. About the same time two colporteurs, F. I. Richardson and B. B. Newman, visited the islands. In 1895 W. W. Eastman, from the United States, arrived to do medical missionary work and remained until 1897, holding evangelistic meetings in the town of Georgetown, the main center.

Working on Grand Cayman from 1905 to 1909, Frank Hall, from Jamaica, baptized about 20 persons and organized Sabbath schools at Georgetown and East End. Cayman Brac learned of Adventist teachings through H. P. Lawson, who in 1925 sold books there and in 1929 held open-air meetings. Seventeen persons were baptized as a result of his work.

In 1929 the Cayman Islands were organized as a separate mission, with two churches comprising 33 members. I. G. Knight became the mission director. In the late 1930s the churches were transferred to the Jamaica Conference, and from there to the West Cuba Conference in the early 1940s. In 1944 they were again organized as a separate mission, but in the early 1950s for a brief period were included in the West Jamaica Conference. In 1954 the present Cayman Islands Mission was formed under the West Indies Union Mission. In 1992 there were seven churches on Grand Cayman and one on Cayman Brac, but no work had been established on Little Cayman, which continues to have a small population of 46.

CEA Adventist Secondary School

CEA ADVENTIST SECONDARY SCHOOL (Centro Educativo Adventista). A co-educational day school located in Santiago, Dominican Republic. It is part of the North Dominican Conference. The Centro Educativo Adventista offers grades K-12 and had an enrollment of 626 students during the 1992—1993 school year. It has received recognition from the Dominican government and the Inter-American Division.

This institution had its beginnings in the year 1920 as a church school with the name Escuela América and was situated on General Valverde Street. Grades 1—6 were taught.

The school went through good and bad times. By 1965 it had 150 students in eight grades, and four teachers who taught double shifts. Shortly after, a lot adjacent to the Central church on Salvador Cucurullo Street was purchased, and a one-story building was constructed. By 1981 the secondary level began functioning on grades 9 and 10 levels.

During the school year 1982—1983, its name was changed to Centro Educacional Adventista and later modified to Centro Educativo Adventista. By 1986 the last two levels, 11 and 12, were added, with a total of 400 students in attendance. The school building was enlarged by the addition of three new classrooms for a total of 10, besides the library, laboratory, physical education facilities, and administration offices.

In 1993 there were 626 students, of which 138 were on the secondary school level. There were eight teachers.

Principals: Mercedes Phipps, 1920; Josefa Contreras, 1946—1947; Dulce Luna, 1950; Irma Gómez, 1965; Esperanza Hidalgo, 1981; Gisela Molina, 1983—1984; Héctor Jiménez, 1985—1986; Carlos Cabrera, 1986—1987; Nereyda Olivo, 1989— .

Cedar Lake Academy

CEDAR LAKE ACADEMY. A coeducational boarding school on the senior high school level that was operated by the Michigan Conference on a 268-acre (110-hectare) campus at Cedar Lake, Montcalm County, Michigan. It is believed to have been the oldest Seventh-day Adventist boarding academy operating continuously in the same locality.

The school was established Dec. 29, 1898, with the purchase of a two-story public school building on a two-acre (.8-hectare) lot, and was opened as a 10-grade academy Jan. 16, 1899, with three teachers, Justus Grant Lamson, his wife, and H. W. Johnson, and with approximately 30 students in attendance.

During the first term, begun with the one building and makeshift rented quarters, two buildings were bought and moved up from the village. One of these was used as a barn and the other, a store building, was remodeled and enlarged as a dormitory. At first, the students had no separate rooms. The girls' dormitory was the first floor of the old store, with the beds around the walls, separated by curtains; the boys occupied the second floor. Construction of a basement and a front addition was completed little by little while the students lived in the unfinished building. Water was hauled from a spring and stored in a barrel in the basement kitchen.

In 1902, when the academy was incorporated under the name of Cedar Lake Industrial Academy, the curriculum included, in addition to Bible and the basic school subjects, such courses as printing, tentmaking, typing and shorthand, bookkeeping, agriculture, blacksmithing, rugmaking, sewing, food preparation, and carpentry. The school continued as a 10-grade school until the fall of 1919. It graduated its first twelfth-grade class in 1920.

In 1963 the farm shop was remodeled to provide training in woodworking, metalworking, and auto mechanics. The following year an airstrip was constructed and ground school and flight training were initiated.

A major development to improve the campus began in 1964 when the Michigan Conference began an every-member canvass to raise funds for the rebuilding of Cedar Lake Academy as well as to upgrade the conference's two other boarding academies operating at that time, Adelpian and Grand Ledge. By the end of May 1967 Cedar Lake's new brick dormitory housing 120 girls was completed and occupied. By the opening of the 1969 school year a dormitory of the same size and style was ready for the boys. Then followed a cafeteria-service building complex, and early in 1974 a new administration-classroom-chapel complex was completed. This new million-dollar structure completed the major rebuilding of the academy campus, with a total expenditure of more than $3 million.

In 1967 a modern building was erected to house a Rhodes Bake 'n' Serve frozen dough plant, which provided work for 50 students. The academy also owned and operated a woodworking mill, where 37 students earned a portion of their school expenses making redwood lawn furniture. Other buildings on the campus included a gymnasium, a number of farm buildings, and 18 faculty homes.

The enrollment reached a high of 320 students during the 1974—1975 school year.

Cedar Lake Academy officially closed in 1987 when it was merged with Adelpian Academy to become Great Lakes Adventist Academy. See Great Lakes Adventist Academy.

Celebration

CELEBRATION (1985— ; monthly; R&H; March 1995 circulation, 11,043; file in R&H). A 32-page paper for adult church leaders.

Celebration was formally introduced the fourth quarter of 1984 as a pilot publication to fill a need for “caring church” adult Sabbath school program helps. Regular monthly publication as the published voice of the NAD church ministries committee began in 1985.

Celebration nurtures adult local church leaders, providing program helps, resources, instructional material, and networking opportunities that fulfill the paper’s motto: “Meeting Needs, Empowering Members, Sharing the Gospel.”

Celebrations of Recovery

CELEBRATIONS OF RECOVERY. Seventh-day Adventists with dependency problems are finding new hope for continuing recovery in a series of weekend spiritual retreats especially for them. These Celebrations of Recovery are planned for SDA addicts and codependents and their families, and are being held annually in major parts of the United States. Gradually the concept is being introduced into other world divisions of the church.

The idea originated with the first celebration held at Andrews University in Berrien Springs, Michigan, in 1987. Since then, celebrations have been held in Washington, D.C., southern California, the Pacific Northwest, and New England. Additional ones are being organized in other areas.

The consistent sponsor of all these is the Association of Adventist Parents (AAP), with cosponsors often being hospitals or local conferences. AAP as an organization that dates from 1985 and was founded to help cope with the growing addiction problems in Adventist churches and families, especially for persons who are already involved in chemical or other dependencies.

The celebration is for the purpose of exploring spiritual resources for recovery; sharing experiences, strength, and hope; and bringing praise to God for the gift of continuing sobriety. Program specifics are directed by local organizing committees.

“The Joy of Serenity and Salvation,” as the celebration is titled, is a weekend convention following the guidelines of the Twelve Steps of Alcoholics Anonymous. During open speakers’ meetings, recovering persons tell their stories of God’s work in their lives. Workshops and closed discussions deal with various aspects of recovery.

“Clean Time” is celebrated with sobriety anniversaries at a Saturday night token ceremony. Concluding the weekend are a “Step Breakfast” and a group consciousness meeting for evaluation and future plans.

Hundreds of SDAs in recent years have found new strength and hope in the celebration.

Central Adventist Academy

CENTRAL ADVENTIST ACADEMY (Academia Regional Adventista Central). A secondary school situated in the city of Caguas, Puerto Rico, some 30 minutes away from the capital of Puerto Rico. It was founded in 1976 as a primary school and through the years grew to become a school offering grades K-12.

In 1993 it had 163 students on the high school level and 10 teachers.

Principals: Carlos Capote, 1988—1989; Carlos Molina, 1989—1990; Juan Cruz, 1990—1991; Ivette Lozada, 1991—1993; Juan E. Milian, 1993— .

Central African Publishing House

CENTRAL AFRICAN PUBLISHING HOUSE (Imprimerie Adventiste “IMA”). A publishing house with printing plant, established in 1954 in Yaoundé, the capital of Cameroon, by the Central African Union Mission, which has its headquarters also in Yaoundé. The house serves five countries, with a population of about 17 million speaking a number of languages.

This plant was established as a self-supporting aid to evangelistic work in a large and difficult field. The beginnings were modest; a secondhand press and other typographical equipment secured from France were installed in a small annex, about 150 square feet (140 square meters), of the newly established primary school of Yaoundé. There was only one workman, Jean Aké, who had been a printer earlier in life.

Soon this place became too small. After moving twice in 1958, the plant was installed in a house next to the union office. After remodeling and enlarging the building, the Central African Union had a well-established printing plant. In 1963 it was equipped with six presses and employed 11 Cameroon workers. In 1968 the first department offset in the union territory was purchased, enabling the plant to print and make separation in four colors. This purchase was made possible by the Publishing House Extension Fund. Since then the department has grown and a new offset machine was added in 1975. Among new equipment acquired since 1975 are two guillotine trimmers, one pasting machine, and one folding machine. The laboratory also is well equipped.

First place is given to denominational publications. The press issues the Sabbath school quarterly in the French language; all blanks needed by the churches, schools, and missions; the manuals of religious instruction, hymnbooks, and tracts for evangelistic work in French as well as the various African languages. Since the publishing department in Cameroon was organized in 1966, the publishing work has grown rapidly.

In 1973 it was decided that the publishing house should print paperback books and tracts for all the French-speaking countries in Africa. The annual sales in 1992 amounted to $327,605. There are 20 Cameroonian workers.

Managers: Kurt Scheidegger, 1954—1962; Jean Lafrancesca, 1962—1964; J. J. Hecketsweiler, 1965—1977; H. Bauder, 1977—1983; R. Bruinsma, 1984—1986; J. Teicheire, 1987—1988; G. Egwakhe, 1988—1991; M. Chaigne, 1991— .

Central African Republic

CENTRAL AFRICAN REPUBLIC. An independent African state since Aug. 13, 1960 (formerly a part of French Equatorial Africa), bounded on the north by Chad, on the east by the Sudan, on the south by the Congo and Zaire, and on the west by Cameroon. It has an area of 240,534 square miles (622,983 square kilometers) and supports a population (1994) of 3.1 million, mostly Negroid, the majority of whom are animists. Agriculture is the principal occupation, with cotton the most important export commodity.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. The territory of the Central African Republic constitutes the Central African Republic Mission and is a part of the Central African Union Mission, which in turn is part of the Africa-Indian Ocean Division. Statistics (1992) for the Central African Republic: churches, 44; members, 2,854; ordained ministers, 3; licensed ministers, 9. Central African Republic Mission headquarters are at Bangui.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. SDAs began their work in the Central African Republic on Jan. 14, 1960, when Jean Kempf and his wife settled on a property near the center of Bangui, the capital. Two additional lots, bought in April, provided land for a school and mission headquarters. In October, Kempf opened the first preparatory Bible course with 17 pupils, seven of whom were later given a special Bible course to train them as evangelists.

With the help of these students three secondary stations were opened in 1961 (in Bangui, Jan. 14; in Alindao, Apr. 8; in Sika, Dec. 31), and in 1962 one in Koukouma-Ngaza (Jan. 2), and two others a little later in Mobaye and in Doukoulou. For the 251 members in five Sabbath schools, lesson quarterlies were mimeographed in the Sango language.

On Mar. 8, 1962, the Association Centrafricaine de lutte contre l'Alcoolisme (Temperance Society) was organized, and the first bulletin was issued in February 1963. The association opened a cultural and social center in Bangui.

In March 1963 Kempf conducted his first baptism and organized the first group of converts.

In 1968 Manuel Martorell, a Spanish missionary, with his family was sent to Zima, a mission station in the eastern part of the country in the Bassekotto area. A Bible school for the training of workers in the Central African Republic functioned successfully. Martorell, then the mission president, opened a small dispensary to minister to the needs of the surrounding population.

A third mission station was founded in 1971 in Bouar, in the western section of the country. Jules Agasson with his wife and two daughters was sent there to carry on evangelistic work. In 1974 a new church building was dedicated in Bangui, the capital of the Central African Republic. This was the first SDA church to be built in the country. In 1989 an evangelistic center and a book center were established in Bangui.

Central American Adventist University

CENTRAL AMERICAN ADVENTIST UNIVERSITY (Universidad Adventista de Centro America). A coeducational boarding school on the college level, situated on a 120-acre (50-hectare) site one mile (1.6 kilometers) from the town of Alajuela, Costa Rica, and 13 miles (20 kilometers) from San José, the capital city. The institution is operated by the Central American Union Mission, which has a constituency of 241,798. It is accredited with the SDA Board of Regents. In 1993 the university enrollment was 498. The secondary enrollment was 215. A total of 45 full-time staff members served in the various teaching and industrial departments.

The forerunners of the Central American Adventist University were the secondary school at Las Cascadas, Panama, opened in 1925; and the Academia Adventista Centroamericana (later Colegio Adventista Latino), founded in 1927 in La Sabana, a suburb of San José, Costa Rica. The latter opened with 16 students and a faculty of three—Glen Ray, principal, and George W. Chapman and his wife. This was a coeducational secondary boarding school, established under the leadership of William E. Baxter, president of the Central American Union at that time, with the purpose of preparing workers to serve in the union.

In 1932 the school was moved to a small farm in the community of Tres Ríos, eight miles (13 kilometers) from the city of Cartago, and named Academia Adventista Hispanoamericana. In 1945 the name Colegio Vocacional de América Central was adopted. The name Centro Adventista de Estudios Superiores was adopted in 1971 and used for the junior college program. In 1987 the Costa Rica government recognized the institution's university status and the name was changed to Central American Adventist University. The secondary section is called Instituto Centroamericana Adventista.

In 1949 two years of study were added above the high school level in the fields of ministerial training, elementary education, and commercial subjects. The teachers' course was affiliated with Union College, Lincoln, Nebraska, until 1990.

Ministerial training was increased to a full baccalaureate program of four years, starting in 1971. In 1972 the secondary section received recognition from the Costa Rican Ministry of Education. During 1973 the college offered the first year of nurses' training in connection with the Adventist Hospital of Nicaragua. In 1974 the teachers' course achieved affiliation with the National University, College of Education. Since 1993, a full nurse's program functions under the authorization of the government and the SDA Board of Higher Education.

In 1950 the school was moved to its present site, which is at an elevation of 2,000 feet (610 meters), where climatic conditions are favorable. The central building, with a frontal structure of 280' x 175' (85 m. x 53 m.) in depth, for more than 40 years housed the women's and men's dormitories, the administration office, the cafeteria, and the assembly hall.

Beginning in 1975 the men's dormitory was relocated in a two-story building, which made space for more classrooms. Later, in 1991, a growth process was initiated on campus that involved the remodeling of the central building to which a lobby was added. The assembly hall was transformed into classrooms and a student center. Computer and nursing labs were added to the already-existing typing lab. The renovation also involved the cafeteria and administration offices.

A new library was inaugurated in 1985, but because of an earthquake in 1991 and the continuous growth of the university population, the library was installed in a two-story building of 24,748 square feet (2,300 square meters). This had been originally built as a men's dormitory. The new men's dorm was relocated in modules with a capacity for 160 students. Also in 1991, 16 rooms were added to the women's dormitory, bringing it to a capacity of 168 students.

The university church building was also seriously damaged by the 1991 earthquake, and it was relocated near the entrance of the campus. The former building was remodeled into an auditorium.

The campus also maintains homes for teachers, housing for married students, an elementary school, a gym and basketball court, football field, laundry, maintenance quarters, and a classroom building for the high school, which will be moved to a new two-acre (one-hectare) property campus.

The Adventist World Radio broadcasting station and the food factory, Fundacion CETEBEDI, administered by the General Conference and the Inter-American Division, respectively, also operate on the campus. The entire site of the Central American Adventist University consists of 120 acres (50 hectares), five acres (two hectares) of which belong to the campus proper, with the rest used for sugarcane, fruit trees, vegetable gardening, and cattle raising.

Central Brazil Academy

CENTRAL BRAZIL ACADEMY (Instituto Adventista Brasil Central). A boarding and day school with primary and secondary grades. The school is located in Planalmira in the Abadiania district, Goiás, Brazil.

There are 8.7 million square feet (816,750 square meters) of land for agriculture and cattle raising. It was purchased by the Central Brazil Conference in 1981 and is located 19 miles (30 kilometers) from Anápolis, the second-largest city in the state of Goiás.

Construction on the school building began on Apr. 22, 1982, under the leadership of Prof. José Borges dos Santos, the first director. Classes began on May 4, 1985, with 111 boarding students and 38 day school students. In 1993 there were 173 boarding students on the primary level and 149 on the secondary, studying accounting, teaching, and other courses, with a staff of 36.

The fruits and vegetables produced on school property supply most of what is used for the boarding students. The milk produced by the 80 good-quality cows supplies the school's need. There are two sports courts and a semi-Olympic pool that are used by the students for leisure. A large music conservatory of 6,456 square feet (600 square meters) was in the last phase of construction in 1993, along with an auditorium for 500 people.

History

History. For the beginnings in the area of the present Central California Conference, see California Conference.

J. N. Loughborough held meetings in San Francisco in 1871, and a church was formed. In 1873 D. M. Canright conducted evangelistic meetings in Watsonville, and a company of believers was organized. In Lemoore a church was organized in 1878 as a result of tent meetings by J. L. Wood; in 1883 a church at San Jose was organized with 12 charter members. The Fresno church was organized in 1884 as a result of lay preaching by Jackson Ferguson in 1872 and missionary work by Moses Church. The church building that they occupied in 1887 was the largest in the city of Fresno. Meetings held in Arroyo Grande in 1886—1887 by J. G. Smith, R. S. Owen, and Robert Hare resulted in the baptism of nine and the organization of a church in 1888. Other churches followed: Armona in 1888, Bakersfield in 1894, Hanford in 1894, and Modesto in 1902.

In the wake of church organization came church schools. As early as 1897, the Fresno church organized a school, with 25 enrolled. In 1901 the Hanford church started a school. The Bakersfield church operated a school for one year in 1902—1903, then began again in 1911. The San Jose church school came along in 1903 with an enrollment of 12. The Armona church also started its school in 1903.

Because of the steady growth of the work in the central areas of the state, the California Conference in 1911 relinquished the counties of Tulare, Madera, San Benito, Fresno, Kings, San Luis Obispo, Monterey, and the portion of Kern County north of the Tehachapis, in order to form the Central California Conference. The new conference covered an area of 29,850 square miles (77,312 square kilometers), with a population of 200,426; it had 26 churches with a membership of 1,115 served by 11 ministers. J. H. Behrens was appointed first president, and headquarters were located at 1048 O Street in Fresno. In 1932 the conference office was moved to San Jose: first to 85 East San Antonio, later to 685 S. Third Street, and then, in 1941, to 435 N. Third Street, and in 1957 to 1691 The Alameda. In 1984 it moved to its present location in Clovis at 2820 Willow Avenue.

The first 12-grade academy to be opened in central California was at Armona in 1911; the first boarding academy was Monterey Bay Academy, opened in 1949. In February 1932, when the California Conference terminated, the Central California Conference added to its territory counties in the area south of the San Francisco Bay and other territories to make up its present jurisdictional area. Earlier there had been several territorial changes.

In spite of the Depression, rapid strides in conference growth were made in the early thirties. In 1929 a campground of 3.5 acres (1.4 hectares) was purchased for $10,181. In 1931 a conference office was erected in San Jose, and five acres (two hectares) of land was purchased at Wawona for a summer camp. This camp has since been increased to 31 acres (13 hectares) and is within the boundaries of Yosemite National Park.

Several evangelists employed radio. By 1931 this limited working force had baptized 334. Several were baptized as a result of a weekly broadcast on station KMJ in Fresno. A Penny-a-Dish cafeteria made contacts in Fresno during the meager Depression days.

In 1923, through the personal work of Frank Iano, an Italian church was organized in Fresno, with 25 charter members. Frank Iano later became a minister and worked in San Francisco, where in 1928 an Italian company was organized and in February 1941 a church. Later both Italian churches were incorporated into English-speaking churches. Two churches were organized among the Spanish-speaking people. Four German churches were begun, but later discontinued the use of the German language. On Dec. 16, 1950, a church was organized in the largest Chinese community in the United States, San Francisco's Chinatown. As the congregation grew in size, the Chinese church moved in 1973 to a new facility on Geary Boulevard near the Cliff House. J. E. Christensen, P. V. Thomas, and John Oss did much to establish and build the work among the Chinese.

In order to accomplish a more effective evangelism for the Black people scattered throughout San Francisco, the Bay area Black believers requested that they be organized into a church. The original congregation met in Oakland. In 1924 J. E. Cox was called to head this work in San Francisco. Later O. A. Troy conducted public evangelism in San Francisco, and a church of 18 members was organized in 1930.

On Feb. 19, 1947, the Central California Conference purchased a 104-acre (40-hectare) campground site at Soquel, near Santa Cruz, on the coast. The property, first used for camp meeting during the summer of 1948, was later improved by the addition of buildings such as an auditorium, cabins, and dining area.

Hanford Community Medical Center, a 54-bed acute-care hospital, was founded in 1908 by Hanford citizens. It was gifted to the Central California Conference in 1963. The present campus was acquired in 1964.

San Joaquin Community Hospital in Bakersfield was established in 1910 under the noble efforts of two Catholic sisters. By 1937 the hospital had one owner, Dr. Joseph Smith. In 1964 Dr. Smith requested that the hospital be managed by members of the Seventh-day Adventist Church as a nonprofit entity. The hospital was joined with the Adventist Health System/West in 1987. With a bed capacity of 178, it is one of Kern County's largest employers with a full and part-time staff of 825 employees.

The Sonora Community Hospital was started in 1900 as the Bromley Sanitarium and Hospital. The present facility was built in 1957, donated to the conference in 1961, and 10 years later became part of the Adventist Health System/West. In 1971 the hospital merged with the Sierra Hospital. In 1993, with 143 beds, more than 500 employees, and 100 physicians, the institution provides acute- and long-term care services and an urgent care center.

In 1903 Armona Union Academy began as a home school and grew into a 12-grade academy by 1912. However, for 26 years it reduced to a 10-grade school. Since 1939 it has served the constituent churches with 12 grades.

At the beginning of the school year 1968—1969, Bakersfield Academy became a senior academy with 12 grades. A new academy facility has been constructed at a cost of $279,000.

In 1965 Fresno Central church purchased a 40-acre (15-hectare) farm and built a new elementary school at 5397 East Olive. The construction cost including the 40-acre (15-hectare) tract was $380,000. Grades 1—6 were moved to the new location in 1967. The Fresno Adventist constituency funded the building of a new academy facility at a cost of $620,000. Classes began in the new buildings for the school year 1972—1973. Thus the entire school was moved from its West Belmont location to East Olive. Fresno Central church donated 27 acres (11 hectares) of the farm to the academy constituency, plus the elementary school.

A church school was begun in Modesto in 1910. It grew rapidly, resulting in several moves to accommodate the increasing number of students. Currently serving K-12 in a functional facility on 10 acres (four hectares), it even provides a unique training opportunity to those interested in religious broadcasting. This is accomplished at the SDA-owned KADV-FM radio station, which covers the northern part of the San Joaquin Valley.

Established in 1949, Monterey Bay Academy, with 3,000 feet (914 meters) of ocean frontage, has continued to serve as the only boarding academy in the conference. All students are required to be involved in the work program and are employed in one of the many industries on the campus.

A new academy plant was built at a cost of $1,261,764 in 1967 at the same location where Mountain View Union Academy had been in operation since 1922. Subsequently, the gymnasium and church building were destroyed by fire, and a new gymnasium was built and occupied in May 1972 at a cost of $282,000. Later a new multipurpose building was erected and occupied in August 1972 at a cost of $384,000.

On Sept. 5, 1972, Miramonte School was moved from Villa Street to the new school facility. The cost of the new elementary building was $422,000. The new school is located in Los Altos.

Until its move to Nampa, Idaho, in 1984 the Pacific Press Publishing Association was located in Mountain View.

Central European Conference

CENTRAL EUROPEAN CONFERENCE. An organizational unit formed in the late 1880s (first listed in the 1889 Yearbook) to supervise the Seventh-day Adventist work in Eastern, Western, Southern, and Central Europe, in the Middle East, and in North Africa. In 1891, after Germany and Eastern and Southeastern Europe territories and the Middle East were separated from it, the conference comprised the West European countries that are now in the Euro-Africa Division. In 1902 it was reorganized into the Latin Union.

Central European Division

CENTRAL EUROPEAN DIVISION. A large unit of church organization that functioned from 1929 to 1972, when it merged with the Trans-Mediterranean Division to form the Euro-Africa Division.

The Central European Division, with headquarters in Berlin, was formed when the European Division was divided into four parts in 1928. It then included not only Germany but also Austria, Hungary, and Czechoslovakia; the Balkan States of Albania, Greece, and Bulgaria; territory in the Middle East—Cyprus, Egypt, Iraq, Palestine, Persia (Iran), Sudan, Syria, Transjordan, and Turkey; also Liberia and Spanish and Portuguese colonies in Northwest Africa; and the Netherlands East Indies (Indonesia) in the Far East. Under the Hitler regime, when the German church was not allowed to send mission funds abroad, and so could not support the distant fields, the division was partitioned: Section II, which functioned separately until 1941, included Czechoslovakia (which returned to the German orbit in 1939), Hungary (which went to the Southern European Division in 1941), detached organizations, and mission fields except the Netherlands East Indies (which went to the Far Eastern Division). These missions were supported and administered by the General Conference as detached organizations after 1941, until they were incorporated into other divisions—the Northern European and the Southern European—or organized into a new division (Middle East). At the end of World War II Czechoslovakia and Austria were transferred to the Southern European Division and the Netherlands to the Northern European. Thus the Central European Division, as reorganized in 1948, was comprised only of Germany. It occupied the same territory as the German Inter-Union Association, an organization that had been set up within the area of the former European Division in 1927.

H. Branson was president of Section II [the parts outside of Germany] of the division in 1938; and H. L. Rudy, 1939—1941.)

Central European Mission

CENTRAL EUROPEAN MISSION. The original organizational unit of the Seventh-day Adventist Church in Europe, which included (1) all of Europe except the British Isles and the Scandinavian countries, (2) the Middle East, and (3) North Africa. It dated from the arrival of J. N. Andrews in Switzerland in 1874 and was succeeded by the Central European Conference in the late 1880s.

Central Luzon Adventist Academy

CENTRAL LUZON ADVENTIST ACADEMY. A coeducational boarding high school located in Bucaran, Bodega, Floridablanca, Pampanga, approximately 75 miles (120 kilometers) west of Manila. The school is located on 104 acres (42 hectares) in a small valley. It is free from noise and pollution, making it ideal for learning activities.

The school site was acquired in 1982. School construction began during the same year under the direction of the administrators of Central Luzon Mission. First to be erected were the administration building, the classrooms, and the dormitories. The academy is still hoping to build a permanent chapel and an auditorium. The supply of electricity comes from a 15 KVA generator powered by a diesel engine that operates five hours every night. There is an ample supply of water from a deep well distributed through an elevated tank. The farm is irrigated year-round by a spring from the mountains.

The academy opened during the school year 1984—1985 with an enrollment of 64 students under 10 teachers. On June 23, 1989, the academy received government recognition. During the 1992—1993 school year, the enrollment rose to 158 students, with 11 teachers. The academy operates a livestock industry and a farm with a banana plantation, a fruit tree plantation, and a vegetable garden.

Central Philippine Adventist College

CENTRAL PHILIPPINE ADVENTIST COLLEGE. A senior college serving a constituency of more than 124,000 in the Central Philippine Union Mission. It is governed by a college board of 16 members representing the union and the medical institutions, the four missions, and the lay members in the union. The president of the union and the president of the college are the chair and secretary, respectively, of the board.

The college offers six curricula: B.S.A. (Bachelor of Science in Accountancy), B.S.B.A. (Bachelor of Science in Business Administration), B.S.N. (Bachelor of Science in Nursing), B.Th. (Bachelor of Theology), B.A.T. (Bachelor in Agricultural Technology), A.A.T. (Associate in Agricultural Technology), and J.S.C. (Junior Secretarial Course). As soon as government approval is secured, the B.S.E. (Bachelor of Secondary Education) with majors in English and Bible, and B.E.Ed. (Bachelor of Elementary Education), will be offered. With the addition of these two curricula, enrollment is expected to go beyond the present trend of 500—600 students.

Situated in Alegria, Murcia, 14 miles (23 kilometers) east of Bacolod City, on the island of Negros, CPAC rises against a backdrop of the beautiful tall mountains of the Marapara Range. Electricity comes from a government source, and springs on the property supply abundant clear, cool water, which is piped to the campus by gravity.

Industries include sugarcane production, cattle and poultry raising, rice milling, vegetable gardening, and bookbinding. The college also operates a small general store, a bakery, and a copying machine. These industries generate income as well as providing the students with work opportunities.

In 1993 there were 13 permanent buildings on the campus. A large multipurpose building (Noah's Ark) and the Far Eastern Division duplex for expatriates, with a guest apartment behind it, were made available in 1982. The bakery building, which has since been converted into faculty housing, was added in 1983. A rice mill-grain dryer and the motor pool building were erected in 1985. The women's dormitory, the nursing building, and the Quiet Hour clinic were added in 1987. In 1988 a cafeteria was built, and a faculty duplex added in 1991. The day-care center and the clinic have helped considerably in maintaining friendly relationships with the people in the surrounding area, which used to be controlled by rebels fighting against the government.

History and Development

History and Development. Not long after the organization of Central Philippine Union Mission in 1964, its leaders dreamed of having a college. Years of "site-seeing" activities all over the Visayas, with Negros as front-runner, followed. Finally, in 1979, property was purchased for P600,000, and in 1985 a donation of $64,000 by Mrs. May Chung of Hawaii enlarged the property by 86 acres (35 hectares), bringing the total land purchased to 262 acres (106 hectares).

After 1979 events moved more rapidly. The General Conference set aside the second quarter 1981 Thirteenth Sabbath Overflow Offering for the Central Philippine Union Mission College project, giving it a greatly needed funding boost. On Aug. 12, 1981, 15 years after the dream was born, groundbreaking ceremonies for the college took place. Keynote speaker was Dr. C. D. Hirsch, General Conference director of education; and the guest speaker was the Honorable Alfredo Montelibano, Jr., governor of the province of Negros Occidental. With R. R. Victoriano, a Seventh-day Adventist architect-contractor, donating his services as supervising engineer, actual construction began on Oct. 2, 1981.

When the college first opened its doors to students on June 14, 1982, it was registered with the Department of Education, Culture, and Sports (DECS) as Central Philippine Adventist School; this name was changed to Central Philippine Adventist College upon approval by the DECS of the four-year college agriculture course on Oct. 11, 1985. Initially there was only the one large multipurpose building to house the 100 pioneering students and 17 faculty members and their families, along with space for administrative offices, cafeteria, classrooms, library, and auditorium for chapel, church, and other gatherings (hence the nickname “Noah’s Ark”—surrounded by “oceans” of waving sugarcane, it had the likeness of its namesake). The student’s rooms had no window shutters, the faculty apartments lacked not only window shutters but also room divisions, and classrooms did not have desirable chairs or acoustics. Classes met as construction continued. At first only two-year courses were offered—rural health, building construction, and an Associate in Agriculture degree.

In September 1984 Typhoon Nitang destroyed the “ark’s” plywood walls, which later were replaced with concrete.

The following are milestones in the academic progress of the college. The DECS recognized the B.A.T. degree in 1985, the B.S.A. and the B.S.B.A. in 1989, and the B.S.N. in 1990. In March 1988 the Commission of Higher Education of the General Conference granted four-year senior college status to Central Philippine Adventist College, and in February 1993 the evaluating team of the General Conference Board of Regents recommended five-year accreditation for the college.

Presidents: David J. Recalde, 1981—1983; Mrs. Salvador G. Miraflores, 1983—1985; Eli A. Bingcang, 1985— .

History

History. Beginnings of the Work. Kansas was the cradle of the work for the Black race in the area of the Central States Conference. About 1880, in a movement known as the “exodus,” thousands of Blacks migrated from the Southern states to Kansas, seeking greater economic freedom, and scattered over the state wherever they could find homes.

On Oct. 12, 1885, C. M. Kinney (Kinny), who later became the first Black ordained minister in the denomination, began work in Topeka and Emporia. In May 1886 he reported in the Review and Herald that since October he had made 648 visits and distributed 16,525 tracts, and as a result five women in Emporia were professing to keep the Sabbath and two heads of families were much interested. Although there were few visible results of his work, the pioneer worker continued doggedly on. He began canvassing Nov. 11, 1887, with The Great Controversy, by Ellen G. White, in Kansas City, Kansas, and in Atchison, Hannibal, and St. Joseph, Missouri. A number of ministers bought his books, and he preached several times. In 1889 he spent six months canvassing in St. Louis. No churches were organized, but no doubt many of the converts attended services in the White churches.

In 1901 the Black members in Kansas City, Kansas, requested that they have their own meeting place and Sabbath school. In 1902, after meetings held by Sydney Scott and S. S. Ryles had added seven converts, a church of 19 was organized. After renting church space and meeting in halls for two years, the congregation built a church (completed Jan.

24, 1904) with the help of the Kansas Conference. Sydney Scott was the minister in charge at the time. In 1901 it was reported that the St. Louis Black members had formed their own company, which was growing, and that the Kansas City, Missouri, company (dating from 1899) was gaining in numbers. In February 1903 Scott reported two organized churches in Kansas City (Kansas and Missouri) of 16 and 14, respectively, the latter conducting “a Sabbath school of thirty and a Mission Sunday school of fifty.” The Kansas City, Kansas, church pioneered the church school work. H. M. Hiatt, educational superintendent of the Kansas Conference in 1909, reported that the Black members of Kansas City, Kansas, “have determined to be in line with the other churches of the conference, and accordingly have organized a school which is doing good work” (Kansas Worker 19:2, Oct. 6, 1909). Hiatt noted that this school was perhaps the only SDA school exclusively for Black children north of the Mason-Dixon Line.

The Bethel church, 713 Freeman, Kansas City, Kansas, was built in 1919. A schoolroom was later added in the basement. In 1966 V. Lindsay led out in the purchase of the present church building and parsonage located at 716—720 Nebraska Avenue. The Kansas City, Missouri, group at first met in a rented hall, then bought the lot and building vacated by a branch of the Pacific Press when it left Kansas City in 1926. In 1943 the Beacon Light church was erected on that lot. Elizabeth Hanks, later married to H. J. Miller, of this church, was the first full-time Black Bible instructor in the Central Union Conference. In December of 1972 the church moved its location to Linwood Boulevard and Spruce Avenue, changing its name to Linwood Boulevard Temple, under the pastorate of T. A. McNealy.

The work in Colorado began under the leadership of Charles Lightner and Thomas Branch. At the camp meeting in 1901 a committee of three presented a memorial to the assembled delegates, asking that one or more Black workers be employed to work for their own people. The request was granted by vote of the delegates. The memorial stated that at the time there were about 60 Black members in the conference. Shortly afterward Branch was sent to Pueblo, where he held meetings in a hotel. William North led in building a tabernacle in that city, dedicated Jan. 11, 1903, which was probably the first SDA church building for a Black congregation in the Central States area. This building, which was used for a mission, burned down in 1904. Although Lightner and others worked in Denver, there is no record that a church was organized there until 1909. In 1910 H.M.J. Richards (father of H.M.S. Richards), while pastor in Denver, sent out a call for money to help the Black members secure a lot on which to build a house of worship. Under the leadership of J. W. Owens a dwelling house was secured in 1913 and made into a comfortable church for the Denver members. This organization, known as the Denver Third church, was later renamed the Beth Haven Seventh-day Adventist Church, and still later the Park Hill Seventh-day Adventist Church.

In St. Louis, Missouri, before U. S. Willis was sent as a permanent worker in 1909, a layperson, M. E. George, had worked among the Black people for years, and through his efforts a company of 13 had been organized in 1904, which grew into the Berean Seventh-day Adventist Church, at the corner of Cook and Sarah avenues. On Sept. 29, 1927, a tornado laid waste about six square miles (16 square kilometers) of St. Louis, causing damages of $50 million and killing 87 persons. It completely demolished the Berean church, with the exception of the bell tower and church sign. The custodian, who was in the building at the time, escaped with minor injuries. The next Sabbath the congregation worshiped in an undertaker's parlor and after services went out visiting the 17 members whose homes had been entirely or partially destroyed. The General, union, and local conferences helped to buy another building. Later (1953) a church seating 700 was purchased. In 1963 a primary school of 60 pupils was taught by two teachers.

In the summer of 1964 E. E. Cleveland, of the General Conference Ministerial Association, conducted a field school of evangelism at St. Louis in cooperation with Andrews University. The evangelistic campaign resulted in the organization of another church, with a membership of 150—the Shreve Avenue church, later named Northside church. In 1974 a church of 38 members, known as Park Avenue, was established on the south side of St. Louis by S. T. Lewis, conference evangelist.

The year 1912 marked a real milestone in the history of the work, when, under the leadership of J. W. Allison, the first camp meeting was held for the Black membership of the Central Union Conference, at Lawrence, Kansas, Aug. 29 to Sept. 8. The next 15 years were marked by a steady growth of churches. Dan Coats and his wife moved from Clinton to Sedalia, Missouri, and opened a Sabbath school in their home; Ella Jackson, a Bible instructor, worked there as well. As a result, a church at Sedalia was organized in 1913. They met in homes and in an improvised storefront hall until 1935, when a frame church, known as the Sharon chapel, was erected. In 1913 J. W. Miller, assisted by local White members, formed a church at Atchison, Kansas, which met in homes for several years, but in time he secured a store, which was made into a meetinghouse.

In 1914 Miller went to Omaha, Nebraska, where the total Black membership consisted of two women who were members of the White congregation. After Bible studies and cottage meetings, a church of 25 was organized. In 1918 the church building formerly used by the White SDAs was purchased for the Sharon church. T. H. Allison pastored this church in 1929 and 1930. The church at Independence, Kansas, which probably was begun by Mrs. Gertrude Johnson, a Bible instructor, was admitted with its 13 members to the Kansas Conference on Aug. 22, 1924. The present building was erected in 1950. The Wabash Avenue church of Wichita, Kansas, received into the conference on Aug. 23, 1925, originated from lay meetings in the home of Charles Greadington in 1918. R. L. Bradford and H. A. Rossin later worked there. S. E. Wight, president of the Central Union Conference, reported in the Central Union Outlook in 1927 that the Black work had made great strides in the previous three years. Not only had many been added to the churches but excellent church homes also had been erected in Kansas City and Denver.

The College Avenue church at Topeka, organized Sept. 16, 1928, with 20 members, had its origin in a tent series conducted by the Black evangelist J. H. Lawrence and the White ministers C. S. Wiest and R. L. Boothby. The Philadelphia church at Des Moines came into being in May 1932 with 15 members as a result of meetings held by R. T. Hudson. At St. Joseph, Missouri, several laywomen held meetings in homes, and by 1911 they had gathered a little company. The present congregation, known as the Emmanuel church, was organized June 12, 1937. The Allon Chapel church of Lincoln, Nebraska, originated as a company of eight in 1943, resulting from the work of student colporteurs, with the help of Black Union College students, personal work, and house-to-house visits. It met in a rented hall, then in a building purchased in 1949. From a branch Sabbath school held by the Wichita people, the Wellington, Kansas, church of 12 charter members was organized in 1945.

Central States Mission. In 1946 the leaders among the Black people in the United States recommended that they be allowed to form their own church-governing bodies, in harmony with the new policy of forming Regional conferences. On Jan. 1, 1947, in the Jefferson Hotel in St. Louis, the Central States Mission was organized, with the Black members of the Central Union Conference (a membership of 798) forming the constituency. T. M. Rowe was elected president, and J. H. Jones, secretary-treasurer. The headquarters of the mission were at 2528 Benton Boulevard, Kansas City, Missouri. There followed a tremendous spurt in growth. In five years' time the mission had grown to the stature of a conference, with a membership increase of 76 percent—from 798 in 1947 to 1,408 in 1952, with baptisms averaging more than 100 a year. In 1948 the state of Iowa, of the Northern Union Conference, was added to the territory of the mission, thus adding the church at Des Moines.

The Central States Conference Organized. On Nov. 9, 1952, a constituency meeting held in the Beacon Light church in Kansas City, Missouri, organized the Central States Conference, with F. L. Bland, president, and H. T. Saulter, secretary-treasurer. Churches established since then include those at Kinloch, a suburb of St. Louis (20 members), in 1958; Sikeston, Missouri (22), and Junction City, Kansas, in 1960; Kirkwood, Missouri, in 1961; Springfield, Missouri, in 1962; Charleston, Missouri, in 1967; Coffeyville, Kansas (25 members), in 1972; Hayti, Missouri (16 members), in 1972. Membership rose from 1,408 in 1952 to 2,326 by the close of 1961, and the proportional gain by baptisms and profession of faith in 1961 was the second largest in North America. The number of primary schools is low because the churches are too far apart for consolidated schools, and also because in a number of places the children attend integrated primary schools.

The net gain in membership during the period of 1957—1962 was 524. In the same period eight houses of worship were acquired or constructed, including a quarter-million-dollar church in St. Louis and a modern stone structure in Omaha. In 1963 an intermediate school in St. Louis and a church in Denver were built.

An outstanding campaign was the “Contacts for Christ” program, whereby the laymen of St. Louis averaged 1,000 enlistments a month in the Bible correspondence courses, preparatory for evangelistic meetings by the Voice of Prophecy group. This evangelistic endeavor resulted in 100 baptisms.

In 1965 a new church building and a new elementary school building were erected in St. Louis; also church buildings were purchased in Wichita, Kansas, and Pueblo, Colorado.

Recent Developments. The conference office moved its headquarters in 1970 to 5737 Swope Parkway, Kansas City, Missouri, where a new building valued at more than $150,000 was erected during the administration of W. S. Lee, president, and J. E. Merideth, secretary-treasurer. The present location of the office is in Kansas City, Kansas.

When the Northern and Central unions merged in 1980 to form the Mid-America Union, the territory of the Central States Conference was extended to include Minnesota, North Dakota, and South Dakota.

The conference membership at the close of 1993 was 8,586. During that year more than $2.3 million tithe was returned to God, and total tithe and offerings was almost $4 million.

During the early 1990s Ebony Evangelism Project 2001 was conceived and put into operation as part of a comprehensive decade-long strategy for evangelism and church growth, representing the Global Mission focus of the North American Regional conferences and affirming the African-American heritage, talent, and potential to prepare a people to meet the Lord.

The first major interconference team evangelism activity involved 10 evangelistic efforts in Kansas City, Missouri (two meetings); St. Louis; Omaha; Topeka; Des Moines; Kansas City, Kansas; Denver; and Wichita.

The first Ebony Evangelism meeting was conducted in Wichita, Kansas, where Jerry Lee presented the great truths of the Advent message. As a result, 76 new members joined the Grove Heights church. In Des Moines, Iowa, Gene Donaldson held meetings in which 38 people joined the Philadelphia church there. David King presented the series in Topeka, Kansas, and 36 were baptized. Philip Willis held the Ebony Evangelism meetings in Omaha, Nebraska, and 91 people were baptized. In Denver, Colorado, despite a wave of violence, hundreds came to hear Raymond Sanders, and 156 joined the Park Hill church. In St. Louis, Missouri, Evangelist Calvin Watkins baptized 260 persons. George Rainey's meetings in Colorado Springs were also highly effective.

Taskforce Committee members included Alvin M. Kibble, chairperson; William C. Scales, Jr., cochairperson; DeWitt S. Williams, secretary; Robert Smith, NAD staff representative; Harold L. Lee, planning consultant; Owen A. Troy, communication consultant; Stennett H. Brooks; Willie J. Lewis; R. C. Brown, Sr.; J. Paul Monk, Jr.; Ralph Peay; Joseph W. McCoy; J. M. Doggette; and Robert Lister.

Central Texas Medical Center

CENTRAL TEXAS MEDICAL CENTER. A 109-bed hospital at San Marcos, Texas. Moved to its current location in 1983, the original hospital was built in 1960 by the commissioners court of Hays County and operated under a lease by the Texas Conference of Seventh-day Adventists. The contract was signed in December 1959 by county judge C. M. Decker, on behalf of Hays County officials, and by B. E. Leach, conference president. The hospital is a result of the reputation established by the Adventist-operated Menard Hospital and Retirement Home in Menard, Texas.

The original hospital location opened on Sunday, Mar. 6, 1960, and the first patients were admitted the next day. It provided 40 beds, a laboratory, an X-ray facility, two operating rooms, and a delivery room. In July of 1964 the facility changed its name to Hays Memorial Hospital. A training school for licensed vocational nurses began in 1966, under the direction of Hazel Kirkpatrick.

A growing community and medical staff, increasing patient needs, and a lack of availability of beds spurred fund-raising efforts to build a larger facility. In 1979 then Hays County judge Walter Burnett and Donald Welch, AHS president, led the way in planning and management of the current hospital. Hays Memorial Hospital opened its new doors in 1983 under a management agreement with AHS/Sunbelt.

In 1987 the name was changed to Central Texas Medical Center in order to reposition the hospital's image within the community and service area. In 1989 Central Texas Medical Center began a push to cut costs, revitalize patient services, and raise quality standards. Partnerships with the community and area businesses were reforged in order to develop strong networks of support. In 1992 Central Texas Medical Center accepted awards from Hospitals magazine's Turnaround competition: a nationwide measurement of health-care organizations on the rebound.

During 1992 Central Texas Medical Center added to its campus a three-story physicians' office building that houses a hospital-owned fitness center, magnetic imaging, and remodeled patient service areas (such as cardiopulmonary services) to keep up with the growing outpatient service. The center is accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Healthcare Organizations and is a member of the American Hospital Society.

Central Union Conference

CENTRAL UNION CONFERENCE. The North American administrative unit that comprised the Central States, Colorado, Kansas, Missouri, Nebraska, and Wyoming conferences, with headquarters at 4547 Calvert Street, Lincoln, Nebraska. Official organ: Central Union Reaper. Institutions situated in the union area included: Boulder Memorial Hospital; Campion Academy; Christian Record Braille Foundation, Inc. (now Christian Record Services); College View Academy; Enterprise Academy; Mile High Academy; Pacific Press Publishing Association; Platte Valley Academy; Porter Memorial Hospital; Shawnee Mission Medical Center; Sunnysdale Academy; Union College.

The Central Union Conference comprised Colorado, Iowa, Kansas, Missouri, Nebraska, and Wyoming, with a population of 8.7 million. In 1932 the Central Union Conference absorbed the Northern Union Conference (territory: Colorado, Iowa, Kansas, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, North Dakota, South Dakota, and Wyoming). The Northern Union Conference was reorganized in 1937. In 1980 it became part of the Mid-America Union.

Central Union Outlook

CENTRAL UNION OUTLOOK (1911—1932; superseded by Central Union Reaper; weekly; files in GC). A former official organ of the Central Union Conference. It had been preceded, 1902—1904, by Central Advance.

Central Union Reaper

CENTRAL UNION REAPER (1932—1980; superseded the Central Union Outlook and Northern Union Reaper; weekly; circulation was free to constituent members; files in GC). Official organ of the Central Union Conference. It was begun in place of the Northern Union and Central Union papers at the time when the Northern Union Conference was merged with the Central Union Conference, a combination that lasted only five years. In 1937, when the Northern Union was organized separately again, the name Reaper remained with the Central Union paper, and a new Northern Union Outlook was established. These continued until the formation of the Mid-America Union in July of 1980.

Chad

CHAD. An African republic independent since Aug. 11, 1960. Chad is bounded on the north by Libya, on the east by the Sudan, on the west by Niger, Nigeria, and Cameroon, and on the south by the Central African Republic. It has an area of 495,755 square miles (1.2 million square kilometers), and a population (1994) of about 5.5 million, most of whom are Negroid, speaking Sudanic dialects. Nearly half are Muslims. Most of the people support themselves by agriculture.

The territory of Chad constitutes the Chad Mission, a part of the Central African Union Mission, which in turn is part of the Africa-Indian Ocean Division. Statistics (1992) for Chad: churches, 28; members, 788; elementary schools, 3; ordained ministers, 1; licensed ministers, 8. Chad Mission headquarters are at N'Djamena.

Work was begun in Chad in 1967 with the arrival of Albert Bodenmann and his family in Fort-Lamy, the capital, later named N'Djamena. A medical center was constructed in Béré, under the supervision of Armin Krakolinig.

Chae Tae Hyun

CHAE TAE HYUN (1888—1943). One of the pioneer Korean evangelists and church leaders. He was a graduate of Won Heung Middle School and studied at Korean Baptist Seminary. He was baptized into the Baptist Church in 1906. In 1910 he joined the Seventh-day Adventist Church and entered evangelistic work, serving as a licensed minister in the Central and West Chosen missions (1910—1922). After his ordination in 1922, he served as district leader of Kando district in Manchuria (1922—1926), president of Central Chosen Mission (1926—1930), Bible teacher at Korean Union Training School at Soonan (1930—1932), president of Central Chosen Mission (1932—1934), president of West Chosen Mission (1934—1940), and president of Chosen Union Mission (1941—1942). He was placed at the head of the SDA Church administration in Korea during World War II, but his service was cut short by the Japanese, who then controlled the country and whose policy it was to suppress Christianity. They imprisoned him along with many other Christian leaders and tortured him to death four months later, on June 2, 1943. He was probably the first SDA martyr in Korea. His name is also transliterated Choi Tai Hyun.

Chamberlain, E.L.H.

CHAMBERLAIN, E.L.H. (1798—1855). Layperson of Middletown, Connecticut. He and his wife were among the first Seventh-day Adventists in that state who accepted the seventh-day Sabbath. He invited James and Ellen White to visit neighboring Rocky Hill, Connecticut, where the first of a series of “Sabbath Conferences” was held on Apr. 20, 1848, and where the Whites had their headquarters at the time they launched the first SDA periodical, Present Truth, in July 1849.

Chan Shun International Foundation

CHAN SHUN INTERNATIONAL FOUNDATION. An international foundation established by Dr. Chan Shun and his sons, Drs. Tom and Caleb Chan, in June 1989. The purpose of this foundation is “to support nonprofit organizations in their pursuit of educational, medical, missionary, and charitable endeavors that substantially reflect the purpose, mission, and philosophy of the Seventh-day Adventist Church.” A gift of US$10 million was delivered to the General Conference by the Chan family at the Annual Council of 1989 as initial capital for the new foundation. A similar foundation in Hong Kong, the Chan Shun Foundation, had been set up in 1974 by Dr. Chan Shun.

Before retiring, Dr. Chan Shun was a businessperson in Hong Kong. With a profound gratitude to his Creator and Saviour, who had abundantly blessed him, Dr. Chan decided, from the very beginning of his career, to return to God a significant portion of his wealth as a good steward, and to keep the Sabbath. For 40 years the signs of Sabbath closing on the doors of his garment factories and more than 30 retail stores witnessed to God’s love and His commandments before the community. When Dr. Chan Shun retired in the late 1980s, his sons took over and continued to build up the family business.

During the past 20 years the Chan family has from time to time contributed large sums of funds to increase the assets of these foundations, and from them millions of dollars have flowed to scores of Seventh-day Adventist organizations for various projects. From 1989 to 1992 more than US$13.6 million was committed to fund 40 projects. Most of the recipients are universities, colleges, and other educational institutions.

Drs. Tom and Caleb Chan have established other foundations to enhance the functions of the Chan family charities around the world. Major projects by the Chan family foundations in Asia included the full cost of a 400-seat chapel at Hong Kong Adventist College in 1965; HK$1 million to initiate the building fund for the Hongkong Adventist Hospital in 1969; HK$5 million for the Hong Kong Adventist College Foundation in 1983; HK$10 million for the Tsuen Wan Adventist Hospital from 1982 to 1990; and HK$10 million for the new 1,500-student Adventist school in Macao in 1993.

Other projects supported by the Chan Shun International Foundation included an endowment for Adventist World Radio-Asia; the School of Business at Andrews University; a scholarship endowment for Loma Linda University; the Academic Center at the Adventist International Institute of Advanced Studies; the science complex and an endowment for Pacific Union College; the Dining Commons at Atlantic Union College; the School of Engineering at Walla Walla College; the Science Center at Canadian Union College; and others.

Chaney, Frank L.

CHANNEY, FRANK L. (1872—1963). Missionary, educator, and administrator in Australia, New Zealand, Philippines, West Indies, and Mexico. He was born in Nebraska and educated at Union College. He and his wife, née Bertha Shanks, studied nursing at Battle Creek Sanitarium. In 1901 they went to the Australasian field, and while there established and directed the first Seventh-day Adventist academy in New Zealand. In 1916 he was headmaster at Avondale College.

Returning to the United States, he joined the staff of Washington Missionary College (now Columbia Union College) as dean and teacher of English. Several years later he went to the Philippines, where he was secretary-treasurer and home missionary leader for about four years, until his health failed and he returned home. In 1936 he volunteered to serve in the Inter-American Division as a self-supporting worker and served there as secretary-treasurer of the Antillian Union and of the Jamaica Mission. Between 1942 and 1951 he promoted educational work in northern Mexico, reputedly establishing 13 schools in the Sonora Mountains. After the death of his wife he married Leonora Lacey Warriner.

Chapman, Minerva Jane (Loughborough)

CHAPMAN, MINERVA JANE (LOUGHBOROUGH) (1829—1923). Financial administrator; treasurer of the General Conference (1877—1883); editor of the Youth's Instructor (1875—1879, 1884—1889). She was a daughter of Nathan and Minerva Loughborough and a sister of J. N. Loughborough. She became an Adventist early in her life and remained a firm and consistent follower of her religious convictions until her death at nearly 94 years of age. She married Oscar A. Chapman in 1857. In 1866 the couple moved to Battle Creek, where she joined the staff of the Review and Herald as a typesetter. Her ability and faithful service led to her advancement in 1875 to the position of treasurer, and in 1876 to that of secretary of the Central SDA Publishing Association (now the Review and Herald Publishing Association). She held the latter position until 1883. From 1877 to 1883, she was treasurer of the General Conference, and in the 1885, 1886, and 1887 Yearbooks, she is listed as corresponding secretary of the General Conference. In 1875 she was elected to her first period of service as editor of the Youth's Instructor. In 1884 she returned to the editorial office, from which she retired in 1889, although she continued as editorial contributor. She retired from the Review and Herald in 1893, after 26 years of service.

History

History. Beginnings of the Work in the Area. The Adventist message was preached in the territory of the present Chesapeake Conference as early as 1851 by that hardy pioneer, Joseph Bates. In the Review and Herald of that year he reported visiting “Advent believers,” that is, former Millerites, in Baltimore for five days and holding several meetings. Seven years earlier, as one of the leaders in the Millerite movement, he had preached the 1843 message on Kent Island, in Chesapeake Bay, accompanied by H. S. Gurney. The two Adventist preachers defied the threat of being ridden out of town on a rail and went on to preach in several places on Maryland's Eastern Shore, which is the portion of the state east of the Chesapeake Bay. At Centreville, Chestertown, Three Corners, and Elkton these preachers made a marked impression on both the Whites and the Black slaves.

Beginning in 1876, the Review and Herald carried intermittent reports from preachers and colporteurs, telling of converts made and churches established in Maryland and Delaware. The first baptisms in Maryland were in Calverton, now a portion of Baltimore. The church organized there had a curious beginning. Early in 1876 a Mr. Pope from Washington came teaching the Sabbath but not keeping it himself. He was followed by a fanatical Sabbathkeeper who taught many errors and confused the interested people. In June, D. M. Canright held meetings there for a week, baptized seven, and organized a church, with John F. Jones as elder. Canright crossed to the Eastern Shore to visit five Seventh-day Adventist families who had moved into Caroline County for the purpose of doing missionary work among their neighbors. He preached 15 times and organized 11 members into the second Seventh-day Adventist church in Maryland. The next year Roswell F. Cottrell held meetings at Baltimore and on the Eastern Shore. In 1879, according to reports by I. Sanborn from the region of Baltimore, the brethren requested to be included in what was then the Virginia Mission.

During the next few years the groups in Baltimore and on the Eastern Shore dwindled as families moved away until in 1886, when Victor Thompson arrived, there were only 16 or 18 adherents, including children, in Maryland, and there was no organized church. However, in mid-1888, D. E. Lindsey and D. C. Babcock reported 28 Sabbathkeepers in Maryland and Delaware, and in October a church of 16 members was organized at Baltimore. Evangelism was conducted in several places in northern Maryland and the Eastern Shore and also in Delaware. In 1890 the Pleasant Grove church, near Hollandsville, Delaware, dedicated the first church building in the newly organized Atlantic Conference, a large part of which later became the Chesapeake Conference. Work was conducted by S. J. Hersum in Wilmington, Delaware, in 1891.

In 1892 churches at Rock Hall and Ford's Store, now Grasonville, Maryland, were organized as a result of meetings held by R. D. Hottel, E. E. Franke, and others. In the same year began a series of prosecutions for violation of Sunday laws, and John N. Judefind of Rock Hall was jailed for husking corn on Sunday. The next year there were seven other cases in court at one time, involving six members of the Ford's Store church—Isaac Baker, C. O. Ford, J. Alex. Dodd, George W. Marvel, Milton A. Bryan, and Joseph H. Warran. In 1894 the sixteenth church in the (then Atlantic) conference was organized at Church Hill, Maryland, after evangelistic meetings held by three ministers, S. B. Horton, R. D. Hottel, and H. E. Robinson. Sunday prosecutions continued. By 1896 it was reported that at least one from each church in Maryland had been arrested. In 1898 J. H. Rhodes and John Curlett were jailed in Centreville, and the latter was arrested again in 1907.

Chesapeake Conference Organized. In 1899 in a subdivision of the territory of the Atlantic Conference, the Chesapeake Conference was organized, composed of Delaware, all of Maryland except three of its northwestern counties (which were connected with the West Virginia Conference), and the District of Columbia. K. C. Russell was elected as the first president. At the time of organization the conference, in an area population of 1.5 million, had a membership of more than 700, two ordained ministers, two licentiates, three Bible instructors, four canvassers, and one tentmaster. The largest church, in Baltimore, had 130 members.

When the General Conference of 1901 effected a major administrative reorganization, the Chesapeake Conference became part of the new Eastern Union Conference, which in a redistribution of territory shortly afterward was renamed the Atlantic Union Conference. This union included also all of the present Columbia Union except Ohio.

Subsequent History. In 1901 the first year of the new century, the Chesapeake Conference had 10 churches and five church schools. In the first decade of the twentieth century there were often financial difficulties. Poor years in the Chesapeake Bay fishing industry affected many Eastern Shore members, and some moved away.

In 1903 with the establishment of the General Conference headquarters and of the Review and Herald Publishing Association in Washington, D.C., the churches of the District of Columbia and Takoma Park were placed under General Conference administration. In the same year the counties of Garrett, Allegany, and Washington in western Maryland, and of Morgan, Berkeley, and Jefferson in eastern West Virginia were added to the Chesapeake Conference.

Churches were organized at Cambridge, Maryland (1902), Fairmount, Maryland (1903), and near Cheswold, Delaware (1903). This Cheswold (now Forest Grove) church, described as “the only one of its kind in our country,” was composed of “Moors,” descendants, according to two traditions, either of a family of Irish and Black origin who intermarried with the Nanticoke Indians, or of shipwrecked Moorish sailors. This mixed group had long remained separate from its White and Black neighbors, attending its own schools. F. H. Seeney, “a Moor from Cheswold,” spent many years in evangelistic work among the Blacks.

The work in Baltimore went through several stages of development. The First church, having sold its building in 1904, met in a succession of halls, as did the Second church. In evangelistic endeavors during this time, speakers from the denominational headquarters at Washington assisted in meetings and religious-liberty lectures. A Young People’s Society (organized 1906) mailed letters and tracts to ministers and rabbis. Another type of literature work was the distribution of foreign-language tracts aboard ships in the harbor. A one-day meeting (1907) in Glen Burnie opened the way for an evangelistic series that resulted in a church there. Ten campaigns were conducted in Baltimore, some in English, others in German.

The difficulty in reaching the mass of the White population in segregated Baltimore led, as in Washington and farther south, to the establishment of separate work for and by the Blacks, which resulted in the Third church, organized in 1909. In Dover, Delaware, in 1907 F. H. Seeney found his tent meetings for the Black people filling up with White listeners in such numbers that a minister by the name of Nutter was sent to take care of the additional interest. In 1912 the conference reported one Black church each in Maryland and Delaware, apparently the Baltimore Third and the Wilmington Second.

In 1907 the Chesapeake Conference, and the conferences of Virginia, West Virginia, East Pennsylvania, West Pennsylvania, and New Jersey were taken from the Atlantic Union, and, with the addition of Ohio, were constituted as the Columbia Union Conference. The Chesapeake Conference at this time was not self-supporting, but help was soon provided by other conferences that were. The Iowa Conference sent two young men for two years; Ohio sent two, supporting one for a year while the Northern Union supported the other. In 1909 two ministers held meetings in Baltimore, G. P. Gaede in German and Carlyle B. Haynes in English. Three new churches were organized: Smithsburg, Maryland, Dover, Delaware, and the new Baltimore church, formed by disbanding and recombining the old First and Second churches. In 1910 and 1911 several other churches were admitted: the Baltimore German, Crystal Falls (later Ponds ville), Rock Hall (reorganized), and Blythedale.

In 1911 Haynes's Baltimore evangelism continued. A feature of his meetings was Monday night health lectures by doctors from Washington. Another feature was a series of articles that he prepared for the local newspapers under the instruction of a recent convert, Walter L. Burgan of the staff of the Baltimore American. Of 88 articles submitted, 84 were accepted.

In 1912 a new evangelistic venture was launched in Baltimore. The purchase of a building on Ellamont Street provided space for the conference headquarters, and for a training center called the City Mission Home, in which lived the city evangelist F. W. Paap, and his helpers, including young Bible instructors in training.

Recent Developments. The conference membership increased by 1916 to 582, and in 1917 to 700. In 1920 there were seven ordained ministers, 21 churches, and a membership of about 1,200, which rose to 1,415 by 1922 and then declined to a low of 1,096 by 1931 (with seven ordained ministers and 23 churches). The total rose to 2,642 (with eight ministers and 35 churches) by the end of 1944. Then the transfer of the Black constituency (728 members) to the new Allegheny Conference (organized 1945) reduced the Chesapeake totals to 1,914 members, five ministers, and 31 churches. But the membership rose again steadily and reached 3,204 in 1960, with 19 ministers and 38 churches.

The development of the work was reflected also in the expansion of facilities. The headquarters building on Ellamont Street had been purchased for $1,700. On Dec. 16, 1924, the old seven-acre (three-hectare) Schermerhorn estate in Catonsville, a western suburb of Baltimore, was purchased for $19,500. This provided a site for a permanent campground until 1971. It was also used for the conference office until it was moved to newer and larger quarters, acquired in 1951 when Dr. Maurice Pincoffs sold his 13-acre (five-hectare) estate to the conference.

In 1942 major improvements were begun on the campground by the erection of a large pavilion. In 1947, with the lifting of the last vestige of old conference debts, a new era of progress began. The acquisition of a 300-acre (120-hectare) tract in the foothills of Mount Aetna, near Hagerstown, furnished a site for a new summer camp, the 12-grade Mount Aetna Academy, and six church-owned residences. In Baltimore a new day academy was established. Throughout the conference several additional 10-grade schools came into being. Four schools were established in as many unentered counties, and work was begun in three others. With 22 new church buildings, these improvements represented, in all, an expenditure of far more than $1 million.

On Sept. 3, 1967, Highland View Academy replaced the former Mount Aetna Academy. The same year a new $400,000 conference office building was completed and opened in Columbia, Maryland, on a seven-acre (three-hectare) site donated to the conference by Mr. and Mrs. Elmer D. Snook. Besides the land, the Snooks gave a sizable sum of cash toward the erection of the buildings.

In 1971 the old Catonsville campgrounds were sold and the campsite was relocated at Highland View Academy, Mount Aetna, Maryland. A new conference warehouse and a complete trailer city were added the same year.

The youth camp was completely rebuilt at Mount Aetna in 1974. In 1991 it was completely demolished and rebuilt in 1992.

Chiang Mai Adventist Educational Center

CHIANG MAI ADVENTIST EDUCATIONAL CENTER. A coeducational boarding school that includes a tribal adult school for young people, an academy, and a primary church school. The tribal adult school began in 1971 under the direction of Jon Dybdahl as a literacy program for tribal young people above the age of 14, offering grades 1—4. This was later upgraded to grades 1—9.

The Thailand Adventist Academy was established in 1974, offering grades 7—10. Chalaw Artamapadung was the first principal. In 1980 the academy and tribal adult school merged to become Thailand Adventist Educational Center, with Nancy Bassham as administrator. In that same year the academy was upgraded to a full senior academy, offering grades 7—12.

An elementary church school with grades 1—6 was opened in 1992. The combined schools now operate under the name Chiang Mai Adventist Educational Center.

Chicago Sanitarium

CHICAGO SANITARIUM. A medical institution in Chicago, Illinois, established in 1893 and listed in the Yearbook until 1905. It was conducted as a branch of the Battle Creek Sanitarium in a building formerly occupied by the Chicago Mission and Bible School (otherwise called Central Bible School) at 28 College Place (apparently later renamed Thirty-third Place). For many years the sanitarium served as a center for various medical missionary activities in the Chicago area. The purchase of the property, held by the American Medical Missionary College, was made possible through a gift of $40,000 by Henry S. P. and Francis H. Wessels, of South Africa, who wanted to see Seventh-day Adventist medical missionary work established in Chicago. Drs. E. H. Mathewson and H. E. Brighthouse were in charge in 1896; later David Paulson and Frank J. Otis superintended the work there.

Chicago Seventh-day Adventist Academy

CHICAGO SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST ACADEMY. A nonboarding educational institution formerly known as Shiloh Academy. It was started in 1913 at the corner of 48th and D avenues. In 1925 a new church and school was built at 46th and St. Lawrence. High school grades 9—12 were introduced in 1933. In 1942 the institution moved to 39th and Lake Park, and in 1952 the school moved to its present location at 7008 South Michigan Avenue.

Chicago Seventh-day Adventist Academy is recognized by the state of Illinois and accredited with the Board of Regents of Seventh-day Adventists and the North Central Association of Colleges and Schools.

Child Dedication

CHILD DEDICATION. A custom of presenting infants to the Lord in a simple dedication ceremony during a regular worship service in the church. The practice seems to have developed gradually among the church pastors, without official action by the Seventh-day Adventist Church. The purpose is to acknowledge with gratitude the goodness of God, who has brought the children into Christian homes; to help parents recognize the serious responsibility of teaching and training the children from earliest years for the service of God; and to acknowledge the claim the children have upon the prayers and the services of the church.

A typical dedication service might take the following form: Appropriate scriptures, such as Deut. 6:4—7; Matt. 18:10, 5, 14, are read as the parents stand before the pulpit holding their child, or children, and the minister says: “Do you now present this child [or these children] before God in solemn dedication? Do you seriously resolve that, guided by the Spirit of God and seeking the grace of Christ, you will bring him or her up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, and always regard this as your constant duty and sacred trust? Do you seek so to order your home, your words, your deeds, that this your child shall at all times be encompassed about with pure thoughts, holy living, and Christlike example, so that the child will most naturally come to an open confession of Christ by baptism at the proper age, and thus into the fellowship and the service of the church of Jesus Christ?” Parents may respond in the words of Jesus: “And for their sakes I sanctify myself, that they also might be sanctified through the truth” (John 17:19).

Then the minister prays for God’s blessing to be with both child and parents. At the close of the service some ministers present a certificate of dedication to the parents.

The child’s name may be officially recorded in the back of the church record book, not as a member but as belonging to the “household of faith.”

Chile

CHILE. A republic situated on the southwest coast of South America, with Argentina and Bolivia on the east, Peru on the north, the Pacific Ocean on the west, and on the south, the pole.

It has an area of 292,256 square miles (756,945 square kilometers) of continental and insular territory, plus 482,625 square miles (1.2 million square kilometers) of Antarctic territory. The estimated population (1994) is 14 million, 75 percent of Spanish descent, 20 percent from other nationalities, mostly European, and 5 percent Indian. Spanish is the national language. In religion, 89 percent are nominal Roman Catholics. The remaining 11 percent are Protestants (Presbyterian, Baptist, Methodist, Christian and Missionary Alliance, Pentecostal, Assembly of God, Lutheran, Jehovah's Witnesses, and Seventh-day Adventist), Jews, those without religion, and Indians with primitive religious beliefs. The Indians practice an indigenous monotheistic religion that involves shamanism and magic. The country consists of a valley enclosed between two mountain ranges, the Andes on the east and the Coastal Range on the west. The Andes chain, with more than 25 peaks more than 20,000 feet (6,000 meters) in elevation, contains mountains second in height only to the Himalayas. From north to south there are roughly three natural climatic zones: warm deserts in the north, a temperate central valley, and cold channels and archipelagos in the south. Chile is the principal mining country in South America. There are more than 115,000 square miles (297,850 square kilometers) of arable soil, forests, and pastureland.

Historical Background

Historical Background. The aboriginal inhabitants of what is now Chile were Araucanian Indians. During the fifteenth century the Inca Indians from Peru pushed south into northern Chile, but were unable to subjugate the Araucanians of central and south Chile. The first European to land in Chile was Magellan, in 1520. In 1535 the Spaniard Diego de Almagro began a conquest of the country, which was continued under Pedro de Valdivia. Spanish priests introduced Catholicism, which in time became the religion of the majority of people. Spain ruled Chile through Peru for the next three centuries, but on Sept. 18, 1810, the first national government was proclaimed. The struggle for independence led by Bernardo O'Higgins, aided by the Argentine general José de San Martín, ended successfully in 1818. The formative period of the republic took place between 1818 and 1830. In 1823 slavery was abolished, Chile being the first country in South America to do so. When President Prieto took office, he ended a period of anarchy, and together with his minister, Portales, consolidated the republic. A constitution was issued in 1833 that established a presidential type of government. This constitution lasted until 1925, thus permitting a long period of stability and prosperity with reaffirmation of democratic institutions. It established the Catholic Church as the state religion. During Prieto's government there was a war against the Peru-Bolivian Confederation (1836—1839) that ended with the victory of Chile, but did not increase its territory. The discovery of nitrate in the northern pampa later on and the fact that boundary definitions were left in abeyance at the fall of the viceroyship created conflicts with Bolivia. The discussions resulted in the War of the Pacific (1879—1883) when Bolivia, with Peru as an ally, lost. As a consequence Chile received the territory of Tarapaca (Peru) and Antofagasta (Bolivia). Later on (1929), Chile returned Tacna to Peru. Because of the different interpretation given to the constitution of 1833 by the Parliament and the executive power, there was a revolution (1891). The Parliament won, and for more than 30 years a parliamentary government system prevailed until a new constitution was issued (1925). It definitely established the presidential government system, declared separation of church and state, and recognized religious liberty. Chile maintained diplomatic relations with the Vatican.

In 1925 advanced social legislation was begun. Human rights were definitely established in the constitution. After World War II, when the United Nations issued the document entitled “Declaration of Human Rights,” Chile was represented. The democratic system became a way of life of the citizen, and made possible the Marxist government that was elected (1970), even against the wishes of almost two thirds of the voters. On Sept. 11, 1973, the armed forces overthrew that government.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. Forerunners. A Chilean Jesuit, Manuel de Lacunza y Diaz (1731—1801), was among the first in the Americas to herald the premillennial second advent of Christ. His book, written in Italy, La Venida del Mes'as en Gloria y Magestad (“The Coming of the Messiah in Glory and Majesty”) was not printed until after his death, but it was circulated in Spain and South America in manuscript form before his death, and aroused widespread interest among both Catholics and Protestants in Europe and the Americas. Lacunza’s prophetic interpretation was futurist, a usual Catholic view, but by exalting the Bible above dogmatic tradition and by identifying the second beast of Revelation 13 as the future Catholic priesthood he undermined the authority of, and thus incurred the ire of, the Roman hierarchy. The work was placed on the Index of Prohibited Books (1824), but continued to be circulated and studied surreptitiously in spite of the church. Lacunza was a direct forerunner of modern Protestant futurism, but in one respect he was also the forerunner of the Adventist view—in that he taught that there was to be no millennium before the Second Advent (see Premillennialism).

Beginnings (1885—1905). As far as extant records reveal, the first SDAs in Chile were Claude Dessignet and his wife, who accepted the Adventist message from D. T. Bourdeau in France, and later emigrated to Chile (1885) and settled near Traiguén, Cautín.

Early Sabbathkeepers in Chile are mentioned in The Home Missionary magazine, which in its issue of July 1892 reports: “Some years ago a copy of our French paper [Les Signes des Temps] fell into the hands of individuals in North Africa, and resulted in a company of Sabbathkeepers being raised up in Algeria. From this company went out a number of families, who have settled in [Chile], where we may expect to find them preparing the field for the entrance of laborers” (p. 152).

It is not known if there is any connection between the Dessignets and these people, or what part, if any, these people had in the establishing of SDA work in Chile.

Apparently the first SDA missionary to work in Chile was Clair A. Nowlen, a colporteur, who came from Argentina to Valparaíso, Chile, around October 1894. About two months later, on Dec. 10, 1894, he was joined by Fredrick W. Bishop and Thomas H. Davis, who came from San Francisco, California. Shortly after the arrival of Davis and Bishop, Nowlen went to the province of Magallanes in the extreme south to canvass. Davis canvassed in Victoria, Malleco, and Bishop stayed in Valparaíso to look after the ordering of books, while doing what canvassing he could on the side. Nowlen soon returned to Argentina, but Davis prospered in his work and remained in the region around Victoria for “nearly six months” (Missionary Magazine, May 1900, p. 217), after which he returned to Valparaíso. Bishop then left for Iquique, Tarapaca, by ship. On the way he met an Englishman who became interested in the SDA message and accepted it some time before November 1895 (Home Missionary, November 1895, p. 240). He is apparently the William Springer who became an SDA under the efforts of Bishop at Iquique and was probably the first person to accept the SDA message in Chile (Review and Herald 73:284, May 5, 1896).

On Oct. 12, 1895, while Bishop was in Iquique, G. H. Baber arrived as superintendent for the new Chile Mission. A short time later, he began to do missionary work, and his efforts were rewarded when a German woman in Valparaíso “kept her second Sabbath on the 14th” of March 1896. Some time before this, Bishop returned from Iquique, where already there were at least eight or nine interested persons.

While Bishop stayed in Valparaiso, Davis returned to Victoria. On this trip he sold Bible Readings to Enrique Balada, “a Bible Society colporteur.” After “nearly six months” Davis again returned to Valparaiso, probably around May or June of 1896, where he and Bishop decided to canvass in Santiago together. It was on this trip that Balada and his wife became SDAs (Missionary Magazine, May 1900, p. 218). Balada later became a prominent SDA minister in Chile.

About July of the same year, two young immigrants from Switzerland, Edward W. and Victor E. Thomann, were led to become SDAs through a remarkable dream Victor had in which he saw Davis and Bishop on one of the streets of Santiago. Edward in time became editor of the Revista Adventista (“Adventist Review,” a Spanish language church paper) and Las Señales de los Tiempos (“The Signs of the Times”), and Victor became a valuable worker as a canvasser. Some time before Dec. 13, 1896, Baber and Balada went to Iquique, where seven were baptized and a former Methodist lay preacher, Julián Ocampo, was ordained to the SDA ministry. On his return Baber baptized eight persons in San Felipe and organized them into a company. He also baptized 10 persons in Santiago. At the end of 1896 there were some 70 Adventists in Chile. In 1898 the Chilean Mission Field included also the territory of Bolivia, Peru, and Ecuador.

Chile Publishing House. As early as May 1898, Baber was laying plans for the publication of a missionary paper (Missionary Magazine 10:184, May 1898). In January 1900 the first issue of Las Señales de los Tiempos (“Signs of the Times”) was printed at the shop of G. A. Rhode and Co., in Valparaiso. About the middle of that year an old handpress was bought, and in September Las Señales was being published in the El Pacifico Press (“The Pacific Press”). Edward Thomann was editor, administrator, pressman, and circulation manager. In 1902, 8,000 copies were printed each month. La Revista Adventista was begun in January 1901, and was also published there. Both periodicals were published in Iquique from the middle of 1902 until the middle of 1904. Then the press returned to Valparaiso. The building burned on Nov. 10, 1905, but printing was done by a commercial firm. By December 1906 a cylinder press and other smaller machines had been bought. From 1904 to 1906, the Sabbath school quarterly (Lecciones Internacionales de las Escuelas Sabáticas) was published there. In 1904 La Revista Adventista became the official organ of the South American Union Mission, and in 1906 the South American Union Conference decided to transfer its publication to Argentina. In 1907 the press and the offices of the Chilean Conference were moved to Lo Espejo, a Santiago suburb. In 1910 the Chile Publishing House was absorbed by the Buenos Aires Publishing House and the press was transferred to Florida, a suburb of Buenos Aires, Argentina.

Through action taken in the middle of 1964 by the Buenos Aires Publishing House, the South American Division, the Austral Union Conference, the North Chile Mission, and the Chile conferences, it was decided to establish a branch of the Buenos Aires Publishing House in Chile, to print forms, leaflets, Sabbath school lessons, and magazines, and to import and provide subscriptions for the church books to the fields of Chile. These actions were implemented in September 1964, when Roberto Rojas and Aroldo Winkler went to Chile from Buenos Aires to begin work on the Chile branch. The first book imported by the branch entered the country in January 1965, and the first magazines printed in Chile are dated January 1965.

Early Organization. On May 1, 1902, the name West Coast Mission was given to the Chilean mission field. With the River Plate Conference and the Brazil Conference it formed the newly organized South American Union Mission.

The superintendent was H. F. Ketring. The West Coast Mission headquarters were moved to Iquique, then moved back to Valparaíso in 1904. In 1902 the first Seventh-day Adventist primary school in Chile was opened in Santiago, but it was short-lived. In 1905 Victor Thomann established the Filadelfia school among the Araucano Indians of Baja Imperial.

On Nov. 4, 1904, Frank H. Westphal arrived in Chile to be superintendent of the mission, which he directed until 1916. In 1906 the mission had seven churches, 237 members, four ordained ministers, three licensed ministers, three licensed missionaries, and four colporteurs.

In 1906 the West Coast Mission was divided into three parts: the Chile-Bolivian Mission, the Peruvian Mission, and the Ecuador Mission. Also in 1906, the Púa Training School was opened (see Chile Adventist Educational Center), and the Pitrufquen church was organized with a total membership of 20.

Later Reorganizations (1907—1950). On Apr. 4, 1907, Bolivia was separated from the Chile-Bolivian Mission, and all of Chile was reorganized as a conference, with headquarters in Valparaíso. Westphal continued as president. At the time there were nine churches, 290 members, three ordained ministers, three licensed ministers, three licensed missionaries, and seven colporteurs. Late that year the press and officers were moved to a recently purchased property in Lo Espejo, a suburb of Santiago. The first Young People's Society in the South American Union was organized at the Púa Training School in 1908, and by 1912 there were three societies. In 1914 the Chilean government officially recognized the corporation of the Seventh-day Adventist Church and the same year the union created the Punta Arenas Mission in the southernmost part of the continent, which was later renamed Magellan Mission.

The Magellan Mission included the Chilean territory of Magallanes, the island of Tierra del Fuego, and the Argentine territories of Santa Cruz, Chubut, and the Falkland Islands. The first superintendent, A. G. Nelson, settled in Punta Arenas, Chile, in 1914. Interest had been aroused in the city by Nowlen, who canvassed there in 1893—1895, and by Bishop, who canvassed there in 1908—1909. In 1918 F. H. Westphal spent about five months in Punta Arenas holding a series of gospel meetings. As a result nine persons were baptized and a church was organized. In 1941 the mission, with headquarters at Punta Arenas, had two churches, 36 members, and one ordained minister. When the mission was reorganized in 1942, the Chilean section of the Magellan Mission became part of the Chile Conference.

In 1919 the Austral Union created a new mission called North Chile Mission under direct supervision of the union. It extended from Tacna in the north as far south as Caldera and Copiapó. Its headquarters were in Antofagasta. Abraham A. Berchín was its first missionary. By 1923 a church of 40 members had been organized in Antofagasta. In 1924 the North Chile Mission was administered by the Chile Conference and soon became again an integral part of it.

In 1930 the Chile Conference, with headquarters at Santiago, had 29 churches, 1,771 members, eight church schools, four ordained ministers, eight licensed ministers, 12 licensed missionaries, 26 canvassers, five church buildings, 12 teachers, and 344 students. The Depression affected hundreds of members in Santiago, and in 1931 a special offering was taken to buy food for them.

Work among the Araucano Indians, begun by Victor Thomann in 1905, and subsequently interrupted, was opened again in 1931 at Rucapangue, near Nueva Imperial, where a school was established with Pablo Mora as director. Later (1941), Juan Lefimil worked for the Araucanos near Galvarino, but since that time little has been done to evangelize the Indians.

In 1943 the Voice of Prophecy radio program was first broadcast—in Spanish—on seven stations. Later the name was changed to La Voz de la Esperanza (“The Voice of Hope”). In 1948 the radio correspondence school had 1,773 students in Chile. In 1954 the Chile branch was organized, with offices in Santiago. In 1973 the program was broadcast by 35 radio stations. In November 1974 there were 5,700 active students.

In 1931 Samuel Fayard, a nurse, had opened the Instituto Hidroterápico. This institute did not function in 1935. Later it functioned intermittently until it was definitely closed. In 1958 the Instituto Médico Adventista (Chile Adventist Clinic) was established in Santiago under Dr. Arnaldo Galano. It cared for 204 patients, with two doctors and one nurse. In 1960 there were 1,773 patients, and in 1962 the number was 2,591. In 1973, 6,348 patients received assistance with the help of six doctors, two psychologists, one kinesiologist, one dentist, one nurse’s aide, and one secretary. The South Chile Conference, in connection with OFASA (SAWS), established two treatment rooms for tuberculosis patients under the direction of volunteers who provide food and supervise the treatment recommended by the National Health Service. One of these rooms is located in Temuco and the other in Chillán. A dental office in Temuco also gives assistance. At Chile College there is a medical dispensary operated by a physician and a dentist.

In 1963 the Liceo Adventista de Santiago (Santiago Academy) was founded, with Sergio Olivares as director. In 1929 there had been a school in Santiago that offered six years of primary school and some secondary courses. Beginning in 1944, this school offered three years of secondary work, but after some years, because of lack of finances and personnel, it continued as a primary school. The Liceo opened with three years of secondary school, 186 students, and nine teachers.

In 1953 a colporteur found some interested people on the island of Chiloé, and in 1958 Mariano Renedo conducted a short series of meetings, organizing the first Sabbath school in Ancud. In 1962 Andrés Gutiérrez was sent to work there. Some 30 people were soon baptized. Property was purchased and a church established there.

The first youth camp was held in 1941 at the Colegio Adventista de Chile, in Chillán.

In 1959 a Pathfinder Club, the second in the South American Division, was organized in Temuco, Cautin, and by the end of the year there were seven in the conference. The next year, the Voice of Youth was introduced in six churches in the field.

In 1958 the Obra Filantrópica y Asistencia Social Adventista, abbreviated OFASA (“Adventist Philanthropic and Social Assistance Work”), under the direction of O. R. Scully, was officially authorized by the government to carry on welfare work. The welfare activities were greatly increased as a consequence of the 1960 earthquake. At the time of the earthquake, trucks, Butler buildings (Quonset-type buildings), food, vitamins, clothing, paints, and tents were received for wider distribution. In July 1963 Adan Mayer was named the first administrator of OFASA for all of Chile to carry on school-lunch and food-distribution programs and all welfare activities. Assistance agreements are maintained with the following institutions: Consejo Nacional de Menores (National Council of Minors); Consejo de Defensa del Niño (Children Defense Council); Carabineros de Chile (Chilean Police); Servicio Nacional de Salud (National Health Service). These agreements cover food, clothing, medicines, equipment, and instruments. They also include temperance programs against tobacco, drugs, and alcohol, with adequate audiovisual equipment; nutrition programs (cooking and nutrition); installation of food processing plants in some centers belonging to the above-mentioned institutions.

In 1971 a request was received to establish work on Easter Island. Because of geographic and administrative reasons the South American Division decided that it should depend directly on the Chile Union. In 1973 Gastón Aguilera and colporteur Eliel Medina were sent to the island. When they returned in June of the same year, 11 persons had been baptized.

Recent Developments. The increase of churches and their extension along a territory of 2,650 miles (4,270 kilometers) made it necessary within a short time to make three reorganizations: the first one took place in 1950, when the Chile Conference was divided into two fields: North Central Conference, with jurisdiction from the Peruvian border to the provinces of Linares and Maule inclusive; and the South Conference, from the province of Nuble to the extreme south of the territory. Both were still part of the Austral Union. The second reorganization took place in 1966, separating the two Chilean conferences from the Austral Union and establishing a new union with three local fields.

The third reorganization took place in 1989 when the Chile Central Conference territory was divided, and the union was left with four fields—two conferences and two missions. Another important event was the creation in 1989 of the Chile Adventist Educational Center, when the old Chile Adventist College was given accreditation by the Education Ministry and became a university.

In the area of evangelism, Francisco Milanovic, a member of a Gypsy tribe, was converted to the gospel in 1978, and five years later an evangelistic campaign was held among the gypsies who lived in the city of Santiago. From this the first Gypsy SDA church was begun in South America, with 40 members. The congregation meets every Sabbath under a tent and the gospel has been preached to 95 percent of all gypsies who live in the country, reaching approximately 1,500 people who are favorable toward the Seventh-day Adventist Church.

Chile Adventist Educational Center

CHILE ADVENTIST EDUCATIONAL CENTER. Foremost educational institution of the Chile Union, located 250 miles (400 kilometers) south of Santiago, the capital city, in a building on 890 acres (360 hectares). It offers preschool, full elementary, high school, a professional institute (college level), and university education. Boarding capacity (1993) is 540 youth, and the total number of students is 1,847.

Tertiary level academic programs. The Adventist Professional Institute, accredited by the government, offers three levels in the area of theology (four years, completing 16 years of study) and five in education (three and a half to four and a half years).

Chile Adventist University offers career preparation of up to six years' duration in engineering, agronomy, agro-industries, administration, and electronics. It also has a postgraduate program in public health.

History. In 1901 Carlos Krieghoff, one of the pioneers in Chile, donated 44 acres (18 hectares) of land that was 185 miles (300 kilometers) south of the present location. He, along with his wife and a handful of students, built the necessary buildings and established courses that provided elementary and secondary education, as well as courses for colporteurs, teachers, and pastors.

The Púa Adventist School, as it was called, opened on Apr. 15, 1906. In 1918 the name was changed to Chilean Adventist Academy. In 1921, because of climatic problems, it was transferred to the present location, seven miles (12 kilometers) from Chillán, adopting the name Chillán Adventist College. In 1928 the name was changed to Adventist Industrial College. Later it assumed the name Chile Adventist College. The accreditation of the higher education program came about when the Adventist Professional Institute was formed in 1982 and the Chile Adventist University in 1990. These institutions, operating on the same campus, form the present Chile Adventist Educational Center.

Facilities. The Las Mariposas campus, where the center operates, has a modern and attractive administration building, independent buildings for the elementary and secondary levels, a classroom building for laboratories for the university and the institute, a library with 35,000 volumes and 160 titles of publications and periodicals, four residences for males and two residences for females, a cafeteria for the boarding students, homes for personnel, and a supermarket and dairy production installations.

China Division

CHINA DIVISION. A large unit of church organization that functioned as a division of the General Conference from 1931 to 1951 and comprised the SDA churches in China and adjacent territories. Before 1919 these churches had been a part of the Asiatic Division, and afterward of the Far Eastern Division. The China Division was organized in 1930, retaining the former Far Eastern Division headquarters at Shanghai and comprising the territory of China (including Manchuria, Mongolia, Tibet, and Sinkiang), and the islands controlled by China, together with Hong Kong and Macao (estimated area population, 480 million), with 150 churches and 9,010 members. It began to function on Jan. 1, 1931. In 1951, when connections with the worldwide church organization were severed, the China Division became an autonomous Chinese church. (For 40 years the denominational Yearbook continued to print the last available [1951] statistics for China: 278 churches and 21,168 members.)

After World War II, and while the China Division was still functioning, the territory of Tibet was assigned to the Southern Asia Division. After the separation of the membership in the Chinese People's Republic in 1951, the districts of Hong Kong and Macao, together with Taiwan (Formosa), Pescadores, and other islands in the area, were organized as the South China Island Union Mission, under the Far Eastern Division.

China, People's Republic of CHINA, PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF. A republic in East Asia bounded by Vietnam and Laos on the south; Myanmar, India, Bhutan, Nepal, Pakistan, and Afghanistan on the southwest; Russia on the northwest and northeast; Tajikistan and Kazakhstan on the west; Mongolia on the north; Korea on the east; and the Pacific Ocean on the east, southeast, and south. China is one of the world's largest countries, with an area about 3.8 million square miles (9.8 million square kilometers), and contains more than one fifth of the world's population: the estimated population of the Chinese mainland (1994) is approximately 1.2 billion.

Ethnically the people are about 94 percent Chinese, with the rest composed of the Zhuang, related to the Thais, in the province of Guangxi; the Uigurs, a Turkic people in Xinjiang; the Hui, Chinese-speaking Muslims of the northwest; the Yi (formerly called Lolo), related to the Tibetans, in the southwest; the Tibetans and the Miao (a distinct group of the Sino-Tibetan family) in the south and southwest; the Mongols, concentrated mainly in Inner Mongolia along the Mongolian border; the Puyi, related to the Thais, in the southwest; and Koreans in the northeast, along the Korean border. There also are numerous smaller ethnic groups numbering less than 1 million persons each.

Chinese, the principal language of the country, is a monosyllabic, tonal language written in ideographs, each of which represents a concept. The script is the same throughout China, but its pronunciation varies greatly from one locality to another, so that its several distinct dialects are incomprehensible outside of their own area. The Mandarin dialect of central China is spoken by about two thirds of the people, and its Beijing branch is recognized as a national language. Among the leading southern dialects are the Shanghai dialect and the Guangdong dialect, the language of many of the Chinese emigrants. The non-Chinese minorities have their own distinctive languages and scripts.

The religion of the Chinese and of most of the ethnic minorities is an eclectic blend of Buddhism and Taoism thoroughly permeated by the ethical and philosophical concepts of Confucianism. In 1953 there were some 10 million Muslims in China, predominantly in the western areas, according to the census figures. Christianity was represented by 3 or 4 million Roman Catholics, who declared independence from the Roman See and about 750,000 Protestants.

Historical Background

Historical Background. Early History. China is one of the world's oldest nations, tracing its recorded history from the beginning of the second millennium B.C. The Chinese began to build their civilization on the middle Yangtze River in the third millennium B.C. By the beginning of the Christian Era, the Chinese state reached nearly its present dimensions, and its influence extended into Annam (modern Vietnam). The beginning of the Christian Era was also the time that the Great Wall (which later extended for 1,500 miles [2,400 kilometers] across the mountains and valleys of Northern China) was begun as a defense against the invasions from the nomadic Mongolian tribes. Before A.D. 1000, Chinese civilization reached its greatest brilliance and made notable achievements in sciences and technology: the Chinese invented paper, printing from movable type, and gunpowder (which they used for fireworks); they also made celestial observations with great accuracy.

During the Mongol period (China succumbed to the Mongolian invasion in the thirteenth century) China was the central part of an empire stretching from the Japan Sea to Poland in the west.

European Contacts With China. The Europeans had made contacts with China in the Roman times and then, after the lapse of many centuries, Marco Polo made an overland journey to Beijing, bringing back stories of a fabulous empire. Afterward Catholic missionaries came overland from Europe and established themselves in South China. The Portuguese explorers and traders were the first to make contact with the Chinese by sea, in the sixteenth century. They established an enclave at Macao about 1557, but China followed an isolationist policy until defeated by the British in the Opium Wars, 1840 and 1855, when the first few ports were opened to foreign traders. Near the end of the nineteenth century Taiwan (Formosa) was ceded to Japan, and several Western states likewise obtained important territorial and commercial concessions from the Chinese. In the wake of foreign political penetration came modern Christian missionaries, and in the eyes of many Chinese the two often became associated. This association, at times justified by the behavior of missionaries, impeded the development of Christianity in China.

End of the Monarchy. In 1911 the monarchy fell and was replaced by a republican form of government. However, the political structure of China soon disintegrated, with the result that many areas came to be controlled by local war lords and contending political factions. When, in 1927, a national government was established in Nanjing by Chiang Kai-shek, for a while unification appeared near, but the Japanese attack on China in 1931 in Manchuria and again in 1937, all along the coast, disrupted the social and political development of China. Then at the end of World War II a rival Communist government gained strength. In 1949 it replaced the Nationalist Government (which thereafter operated on the island of Taiwan) and proclaimed a people's republic in mainland China.

Christianity in China. According to Christian tradition, Christianity was first brought to China by the apostle Thomas, but the first historically authenticated evidence of Christianity dates from the middle of the seventh century. In 635 a Nestorian missionary named Alopen, arriving in the capital of China, was received by the emperor, who had some parts of the Scriptures and Christian books translated and placed in the imperial library. Nestorian Christians prospered in China for about two and a half centuries, then unaccountably disappeared for a time, but again reappeared after the Mongols established their empire, which embraced the Christian communities in the Near East. In his account of travels in China, Marco Polo reported the existence of several Nestorian churches there, with a Nestorian metropolitan in the capital of the empire.

Near the end of the thirteenth century, the first Roman Catholic missionaries reached China. However, in succeeding wars evidences of Christianity in China were obliterated. After the Portuguese established an enclave at Macao, in the sixteenth century, Roman Catholic missionaries carried on work from this center, although against resistance from the Chinese.

The first Protestant missionary, Robert Morrison, of England, settled near Guangzhou (Canton) in 1807 and undertook the translation of the Bible into Chinese. But the Chinese opposed the foreign encroachments and interference in their way of life. In the first 35 years of Protestant work, less than 100 converts were won. Although, on the one hand, missionary penetration was aided by the opening of China for trade by Western military power, on the other hand, the defeat of China and its humiliation caused much resentment against all things foreign, including Christianity.

It is interesting to observe, however, that the nucleus of the great T'ai-p'ing rebellion of the mid-nineteenth century was composed of a society of worshipers of the Supreme Being, who believed in one God, held that Jesus was His Son, and observed the seventh day by ceasing all business on that day and holding services. As the movement developed, leaders and followers went to almost unbelievable lengths in fanaticism, and the outcome of this rebellion created numerous problems for Christians in China. Nevertheless, it is a remarkable coincidence that about the time that a small group of Adventists in America reminded the world that the seventh-day Sabbath is binding upon Christians, a group in China included the observance of the day in its code of beliefs.

The Christians in China increased rapidly after the opening of the country to trade and the issuance of edicts of toleration in 1844 and 1860. By the time the first interdenominational missionary conference was held in Shanghai in 1877, there were 13,000 Protestants in China. Unlike the early attempts at Christianizing China, the main effort of the Protestant missionaries was directed toward the common people. The church historian Latourette observed that "they founded and maintained some of the best educational institutions in the country. . . . The modern medical and nursing profession owed to them their inception and most of their development. . . . They promoted education in public health, helped in relieving famine, and aided the study of agricultural problems and methods. . . . Protestants prepared and distributed an extensive religious literature" (The Chinese: Their History and Culture, p. 484).

Also, in most cases, they placed stress on the development of a strong indigenous ministry and on direct evangelization of the people of the interior provinces.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. China, with Outer Mongolia, constituted the territory of the China Division of the General Conference of Seventh-day Adventists until that division became autonomous in 1951. For the next 40 years statistical reports on the Chinese church were not available. In 1951 there were, in China: churches, 278; members, 21,168; church or elementary schools, 112; ordained ministers, 134; licensed ministers, 213; teachers, 156.

In 1979 the communication between China and the Outside World took a positive turn with the establishment of diplomatic relations. Therefore the General Conference has been able to obtain information in various ways about the progress of the work there. As of December 1992, it was estimated that there are more than 400 churches and more than 150,000 members in China. Also, since 1979 many opportunities have opened for radio educational work, health education, foreign language teaching, and literature distribution.

Institutions

Institutions. The 1951 Yearbook listed the following institutions: Canton Sanitarium and Hospital; Central China Union Academy; Chiaotou Sanitarium and Hospital; China Training Institute; Chungking Wuhan Sanitarium and Hospital; East China Union Academy; East Lake General Hospital; Honan Junior Academy; Kiangsu Junior Academy; Little Eden Hospital-Dispensary; Nanning Seventh-day Adventist Hospital; North China Sanitarium and Hospital; North China Union Academy; North Fukien Junior Academy; Northeast China Union Academy; Northwest China Sanitarium and Hospital; Northwest China Union Academy; Shanghai Medical Center; Shenyang Clinic-Hospital; Shenyang Sanitarium and Hospital; Signs of the Times Publishing House; South Chekiang Junior Academy; South China Island Union Academy; Southeast China Union Junior Academy; Tibetan Mission Hospital; Tibetan Mission Press; Tsingtao Sanitarium and Hospital; Wai On Hospital-Dispensary; West China Union Academy; West Szechwan Junior Academy; Yencheng Sanitarium-Hospital; Yünnan Junior Academy. Most of these no longer function.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings by Pioneer Layperson. SDA work in China began as a project of one layperson, Abram La Rue, an American gold miner, sailor, and shepherd, who became an SDA at an advanced age. Perceiving that the Advent message was to be given to the world, he attended Healdsburg College to prep are himself for the gospel work, and requested that he be appointed to China. The Mission Board, considering him too old (he was about 65 at the time), suggested instead that he bear his witness on one of the islands in the Pacific Ocean. He went first to the Hawaiian Islands, where his work led to the establishment of permanent SDA work on the islands. Still longing to carry the SDA message to China, he went, in 1888, to the British colony of Hong Kong, situated on an island scarcely a mile off the South China shore. In the same year, he visited Guangzhou and in 1889 went to Shanghai, in both places selling and distributing SDA publications among the English-speaking residents there.

In 1890 S. N. Haskell, on his missionary tour around the world, visited Hong Kong and Shanghai and was greatly impressed with the need to establish SDA work in the great land of China. During the next decade the subject of mission work in China was held before the leaders and church members through SDA periodicals, but no worker was sent there.

In the meantime, although La Rue never learned Chinese, he requested one of his Chinese acquaintances to translate for him a tract called The Judgment, of which he had 2,500 copies printed in 1891. Later he had the chapter "The Sinner's Need of Christ," from Ellen White's Steps to Christ, translated and printed. These two tracts represented the beginning of SDA publications in the Chinese language.

First Regular Missionaries. In 1892 what was described by W. A. Spicer (later president of the Mission Board) as the "clear call" from Ellen White to establish missions far and wide was given. She specifically mentioned China as one of the fields that the SDA Church should enter. At a council held at Battle Creek in 1898, it was voted to open work in China in that year, but nothing was done until, at the General Conference session of 1901, J. N. Anderson and his wife, volunteered for service in China. The Andersons and Ida Thompson

(Mrs. Anderson's sister) arrived at the British colony of Hong Kong in February 1902. They began the study of the language, meanwhile canvassing among the English-speaking population, and Ida Thompson opened an English school for Chinese children. In December 1902 Edwin H. Wilbur and his wife, the former Susan Haskell, both trained nurses, went to Guangzhou, becoming the first permanent SDA workers in China proper. About that time, an elderly Chinese SDA returned from America to his ancestral home at Sun Ling, not far from Hong Kong, and there aroused interest in SDA teachings among his relatives and neighbors.

Soon after their arrival, the pioneer workers were joined by Eric Pilquist, formerly an employee of the British and Foreign Bible Society in Central China (who had recently become an SDA while on furlough in America, and who had encouraged the Andersons to go to China). Pilquist opened SDA evangelism in Central China in the Mandarin-speaking province of Henan. It appears that, even before he joined the other workers, he had six persons ready for baptism. On Feb. 14, 1903, the first SDA baptism in China took place at Xinyangzhou, about 125 miles (200 kilometers) north of the city of Hankow (Hank'ou, Wuhan), and the next day J. N. Anderson organized the first Seventh-day Adventist church in China, with eight members. Several of these early members became leaders in the church in China.

In April 1903 J. N. Anderson moved to Guangzhou, and made that city the SDA headquarters in China (Review and Herald 81:147, June 9, 1904). In response to Pilquist's call for more workers, four physicians, Harry W. and Maude A. Miller and Arthur C. and Bertha E. Selmon, with two nurses, Charlotte Simpson and Carrie Erickson, went in the autumn of 1903 to Central China to develop the work in the province of Henan.

In November 1903, in the first SDA ordination service in China, J. N. Anderson and H. W. Miller ordained Eric Pilquist to the ministry at Xincui, the site of the mission station in Central China. In the middle of 1904, Pilquist moved to a new station at Loshan, where, with the help of national teachers and evangelists, he opened a boys' school. In September 1904 the Millers left Xincui to open another station at Shangcai, and later the Selmons moved to Xiangcheng.

National Missionaries. It was a characteristic of the early Chinese converts that they began immediately to share their faith with their neighbors. As a result, much pioneer work was accomplished even before the missionaries learned enough Chinese to conduct extensive public evangelism. The activities of the laymen resulted in the formation of groups of inquirers in towns and villages where the foreign missionary had not visited.

In 1904 a young Chinese SDA, Timothy Tay, whom R. W. Munson had baptized in Singapore, went to Amoy (Xiamen), a seaport in South China northeast of Guangzhou, to perfect his knowledge of the local dialect so that he could work more effectively among the Amoyese emigrants in Singapore and in the Malay States. There he met a Chinese Protestant minister, Keh Ngo-pit (N. P. Keh), who in an attempt to prove to Tay from the Bible that the seventh-day Sabbath had been changed, himself became converted and joined the SDA workers. Apparently Keh and Tay later went to Swatow (Shant'ou), another large seaport in South China, where they preached to the Christians living there and where they made the acquaintance of a Chinese Christian leader, T. K. Ang, who also attempted to disprove the SDA message, only to accept it himself and enter the work.

When a large interest developed near the port city of Amoy in Fujian, to the northeast of Guangzhou, W. C. Hankins joined Keh and another national preacher there, settling near the city on the island of Gulangyu. The first inland station in the province of Fujian was established in the spring of 1905 at the village of Dogong (Dokong), some 30 miles (50 kilometers) from Amoy, where a meeting place was put in the charge of a national evangelist. The brunt of the work was borne by nationals, some of whom went out preaching even before they were themselves baptized. For their benefit, a training institute was held at Guangzhou in December 1905, the first of its kind.

First Institutions. In the spring of 1904 Ida Thompson opened a Chinese school for girls in Guangzhou, taught by a national woman teacher. She named it Bethel School in honor of Bethel Academy in the Wisconsin Conference, which supported the schoolwork in Guangzhou for a number of years. In the same year, 1904, a school for boys also was opened at Guangzhou.

At the end of 1904 J. N. Anderson summarized the progress of the year's work: two schools opened; regular public preaching begun during the summer; publication inaugurated with the printing of 2,000 copies of a tract written by Keh of Amoy, and a number of new or improved translations of other tracts ready for the printers—among them a tract on the true God, a tract on the Sabbath, a revised translation of the chapter "The Sinner's Need of Christ" from Ellen White's Steps to Christ, and school texts prepared by Pilquist. In that year there were 64 members in all of China.

In 1905 a Chinese physician from America, Law Keem, arrived with his family in Guangzhou and began SDA medical work in South China. Also in that year, SDAs established their first printing press in China at Shangcai in Central China, when Dr. Miller set up a small handpress that had been donated to him by a manufacturing firm in Chicago when he left for China. Although he knew little of printing, he planned the production of SDA literature in Chinese. He began publication of a monthly paper, called Fu Yin Hsuen Pao ("The Gospel Herald"), first issued in November 1905, also a number of small tracts, and, in the spring of 1906, a Chinese hymnbook, printed from wooden blocks.

The early work in China was built through the self-sacrifice of members everywhere. An SDA family in Wisconsin by the name of Peterson wrote to the General Conference in 1904: "Last Sabbath, when reading the Review and Herald, we became much impressed by the stirring appeal from China. God has blessed us, and by hard work and economy we have saved up just one thousand dollars, which we have decided to give to this needy mission field. . . . This is about all we own in this world, but we feel assured that God will provide the necessities for us as long as we are to stay here, so we give it cheerfully, and hope and pray that much good may come out of it" (Review and Herald 81:5, Feb. 25, 1904).

That the gift came at an opportune time can be seen from the fact that the General Conference appropriation for the year 1905 for China was only $8,400.

In the spring of 1906 J. N. Anderson ordained the first Chinese Seventh-day Adventist worker, N. P. Keh, to the ministry at Amoy. Later in the year SDAs entered the inland province of Hunan, due north of Guangzhou. In September of that year, P. J. Laird, formerly in the service of the Church of England, and his wife, Emma Perrine Laird, M.D., a former SDA missionary in Japan, opened a school and a dispensary at Changsha, the capital of that province. In the same year, B. L. Anderson opened another school at Amoy and laid the foundations for a strong SDA educational center in South China, from which numerous workers later entered the service of the church. In the vicinity of Amoy, the interest in SDA teachings was developing rapidly, and by 1906 there were chapels at Dogong, Tokoe, and Chinchen, with adherents and converts in each place. In that year plans also were made for the work among the Hakka people of Fujian Province (in which Amoy was situated). In preparation for this work, J. P. Anderson, newly arrived from America, began studying the Hakka language.

Early Organization—China Mission. The missionaries in China during the early years received no regular appropriations beyond their salaries. They used their salaries and any other funds they could obtain to care for the needs of the expanding work as best they could. The work throughout China during the earlier days was under the informal administration of J. N. Anderson in Guangzhou, where the distribution of funds and the promotional plans from the General Conference were handled.

As the work grew, it was felt both by the missionaries in China and by the Mission Board that the workers needed to get together and lay concerted plans. In 1906 the General Conference sent W. W. Prescott, then editor of the Review and Herald, to China to counsel with the missionaries in the field. After visiting Japan, Korea, and North and Central China, he arrived in Shanghai to attend the first general meeting of the workers in China, which convened in that city from Feb. 10 to 20, 1907.

At this meeting, several resolutions intended to strengthen the work and to ensure its more rapid advance were adopted. The China Mission was more fully organized, with three local missions: Guangdong, Henan, and Fujian. General headquarters were to be established at Shanghai. Committees were formed to foster the Sabbath school, publishing, and other phases of the work, and a general financial plan was adopted. "Actions were taken to maintain high standards for baptism and church membership and the training of national workers. Urgent calls were placed with the Mission Board for workers for the different areas" (John Oss, Mission Advance in China, p. 109). Plans were also laid at this meeting for a well-developed organization that could deal with local problems and with various details on the spot instead of referring them to the General Conference Committee at Washington, D.C., as heretofore.

Meanwhile the work continued to grow and develop. In 1907 Keh found a group of about 50 persons some 25 miles (40 kilometers) away from the city of Swatow (Shant'ou), at a place called Chowchowfoo, endeavoring to observe the seventh-day Sabbath to the best of their knowledge; several among them had already given up wine and tobacco. During the year two new stations were opened in the province of Guangdong: one at Fatshan (Fuoshan), some 10 miles (16 kilometers) out from Guangzhou, where Dr. Law Keem opened a clinic, and another at Kongmoon (Jiangmen), some 50 miles (80 kilometers) away, with the Wilburs in charge. Early in 1907 the printing press was moved to Xinyangzhou, on the Beijing-Hankou Railway, where a suitable office building was erected and where H. W. Miller, the manager and editor of the press, F. A. Allum (recently arrived from Australia), Orvie Gibson, and Esta Miller (students from America who had volunteered as missionaries) made their residence. In December of that year the first regional meeting of Seventh-day Adventists held in China was held at Xiangcheng, Henan. About 50 adherents were in attendance, and during the session seven were baptized. A church with 11 members was organized at that place. As a sign of a complete break with the past, the men broke their pipes and women unbound their feet.

Early in 1908 it was decided to sell the press shop at Xinyangzhou and begin printing at the headquarters at Shanghai. After this transfer was made, the title of the monthly paper was changed to Shi Chao Yueh Pao (“Signs of the Times”). It was estimated that from 1902 to the end of 1908 a total of 18 million pages of SDA publications was printed and distributed in China. In 1908 there were 128 Seventh-day Adventists in the country. Several new missionaries arrived in the course of that year, among them Roy F. Cottrell, who together with his wife and Pauline Schilberg, the first appointee from the Washington Foreign Mission Seminary, went to the Changsha station; also H. H. Winslow, B. N. Roberts, and Bothilde Miller joined the headquarters and publishing staff.

China Union Mission Organized. In 1909 the second meeting of workers, convened at Shanghai, resulted in the reorganization of the China Mission into the China Union Mission, composed of six mission fields: Eastern, Central, Northwestern, Northern, Western, and Southern. Also the outlying areas of China (Manchuria, Mongolia, Xinjiang, and Tibet) were to become independent mission fields, and plans were made to staff them as rapidly as possible. For this purpose, a call was placed with the General Conference for 40 families for China during 1909 and 1910. Departmental leaders were appointed, and plans were made to enlarge the medical, publishing, and educational activities. At the same time it was decided to purchase sufficient property in Shanghai to allow for the construction of a publishing house to supply the Chinese language literature for SDA work everywhere, a sanitarium, general headquarters offices, and a training school.

China in the Asiatic Division, 1909—1918

China in the Asiatic Division, 1909—1918. At the General Conference of 1909 the work in Eastern and Southern Asia was organized into the Asiatic Division, with headquarters at Shanghai, and was placed under the supervision of I. H. Evans. W. A. Westworth came as superintendent of the China Union, but when he retired soon after, the leadership of the work in China fell to the superintendent of the division.

A Series of Advances. In 1909 SDA work penetrated into the inland province of Anhwei, due west of Shanghai, where Han Tsung-djen, a Chinese Christian pastor at Yingshang, in the western part of the province, and his congregation joined the SDAs. Having received some tracts from a friend in Henan, he had inquired for more information, and was visited by Allum. In 1910 Frederick Lee joined Han at Yingshang. About the same time another Christian minister, in Guangdong, the province in which Guangzhou is situated, also accepted the seventh-day Sabbath; he brought a part of his congregation with him into the SDA Church.

In 1909 J. P. Anderson began to work among the Hakka people in the province of Guangdong, at Waichow (Huizhou), about 75 miles (120 kilometers) east of Guangzhou. From there some years earlier several young people had come to the SDA office in Guangzhou and had asked for a teacher to come to their area. Some of them were baptized at Guangzhou at the time of their visit. By the end of 1919 there were in the province of Fujian five stations and the following workers: five national evangelists, two colporteurs, two teachers, and two women Bible instructors. There were two schools at Amoy: a boarding school for boys under the direction of B. L. Anderson and a day school for girls directed by Mrs. Anderson. In the province of Hunan the first converts were baptized by Roy F. Cottrell, at Changsha.

The printing and distribution of publications also prospered. It was estimated that in 1909 some 40 million pages were produced and circulated in China by the enlarged publishing facilities at Shanghai. Dr. Miller reported that SDA publications had the largest circulation of any Christian publications at that time.

In 1909, in an effort to preserve the health of the workers in the rigorous climate of China, a rest home was built at Mogan Shan in the mountains of Zhejiang Province southwest of Shanghai, and there the first specifically medical institution was established.

In October 1910 a school for the training of Mandarin-speaking workers was opened under the direction of Dr. Miller in a temporary location at Zhoujiakou in the province of Henan, in Central China. Because of its meager facilities and the large proportion of poorer students, it was nicknamed "The Beggars' School." Nevertheless, some of the strongest SDA workers in China were educated there. Later this school, transferred to Nanjing, became the China Union Mission Training School.

The SDA work reached the Gulf of Tonkin in southwestern China in 1910, when a former missionary for another denomination joined the SDAs and began preaching at Pakhoi (Peihai), Guangdong. In the same year public and personal evangelism was begun in the city of Shanghai, where F. E. Stafford, a printer from the city, joined the workers and preached in the first public evangelistic meetings. Bothilde Miller assisted in this work in the city and in the surrounding villages through personal evangelism and the training of national women Bible instructors. The city of Nanjing also was entered in that year when a group of national colporteurs and evangelists led by Allum and Pilquist went there to introduce SDA teachings to the many visitors from around the country who were attending the Chinese National Exposition.

In 1910 or 1911 F. A. Allum and Esta Miller opened the first SDA chapel in the province of Hubei (on the middle Yangtze River), where some Chinese believers from Changsha had scattered SDA publications in the city of Hankou, often called the Chicago of China. By 1913 there was a church of 40 members in that city, and there were several companies in its vicinity. The work also was developing in southern China, where in 1911 W. F. Hills and his wife opened a school at Swatow (Shant'ou), Guangdong. By that time a local Chinese evangelist, T. K. Ang, cared for the work there with only an occasional visit from overseas workers.

In 1911, when the Chinese monarchy was overthrown and the contending factions of the succeeding republican government plunged the country into a period of turbulence that for a number of years unsettled the social, economic, and political life of the people, the orderly development of SDA work in China was greatly hindered, yet it was not halted. In 1911 construction was begun on the headquarters building in Shanghai, voted upon in 1909. In 1912 Dr. Selmon made first use of a tent to hold public evangelistic meetings in China. By 1912, when the worldwide mission work of Seventh-day Adventists had acquired permanence and stability and attention could be turned to the preservation of the health of the workers, the China Union Mission benefited from the "$300,000 fund" raised by the General Conference for the erection of additional schools, hospitals, and workers' homes. Until then the overseas workers in China had used mostly whatever buildings they could find in their territory.

Reorganization of 1912. In 1912 the China Union Mission was dissolved and the missions were placed directly under the Asiatic Division and given responsibility for local matters.

In 1913 a number of advances were made. In the east F. E. Stafford, while recuperating from an illness in the more healthful climate of Shantung (one of the oldest Chinese provinces, where Confucius was born and buried), canvassed in company with a national evangelist, with the Shi Chao Yueh Pao ("Signs of the Times"), in the city of Chefoo (Chifu), now Yantai, and thus laid the foundations for future work in that area. In the south, Keh, having mastered the Fuzhou dialect, began work in that part of Fujian province where the Fuzhou dialect was being spoken. Also in the south a call for a minister came from a group in the province of Jiangxi (west of Fujian) who had learned of SDA doctrines through reading literature sold by colporteurs. A colporteur from the south went to Taiwan (Formosa), even though the island was not a part of China at that time.

During 1912 and 1913 the China Union Training School was operated in rented quarters in Nanjing. During the political disturbances of 1913 it was transferred to the headquarters compound in Shanghai.

In the next year, 1914, SDA work was established in several more provinces. F. A. Allum, M. C. Warren, and two national workers from Henan, Dju Dzi-ih and Shi Yung-gwei, opened the work in the province of Sichuan, in the interior of western China on the upper Yangtze River. For a number of years afterward Warren directed the work there from his station at Chongqing, making journeys through Sichuan, Gueizhou, Yunnan, and the Tibetan borderland.

In 1914 Bernhard Peterson, O. J. Grundset, and Feng Cheng-chun entered Manchuria. Feng had learned of SDA teachings from a Russian SDA at the large railway shops at Harbin and later, when the entry into Manchuria was planned, had gone to the Shanghai school for training. Evangelism in Manchuria began in the city of Shenyang (Mukden), and later it spread to Changchun. The work in Manchuria progressed slowly at first, but the early efforts had built up a strong foundation for later advances.

Also in 1914 Law Keem, M.D., began evangelistic and medical work in the province of Guangxi, west of Guangzhou, establishing a station at Wuzhou, in the eastern part of the province. Because colporteurs had been there previously and had aroused considerable interest in SDA teachings, he was asked to preach immediately upon his arrival, even before he had had an opportunity to settle at his new location. Shortly thereafter he was informed of a group of Sabbathkeepers some distance away, at a place where a convert from Guangzhou had come to live and had shared his knowledge of the Bible with the people.

Other developments in the course of the year were the arrival of the first director of the colporteur work, H. M. Blunden, from Australia; the reestablishment of the work at Pakhoi (Beihai), in the southwest, near the Gulf of Tonkin, by E. H. Wilbur; the use of a houseboat, the Hayes Gospel Boat, as a floating chapel and mission station on the many waterways around the city of Swatow (Shant'ou); the organization of a church at Fuzhou by Keh; the first general meeting of SDAs in the Fujian province, held at Fuzhou, at which 47 were baptized, and the membership of the Fuzhou church was enlarged to 55; the opening of boys' and girls' schools at Fuzhou; the extension of the work begun in 1910 in Shanghai to the whole province of Jiangsu; the organization of a church at Nanjing by O. A. Hall and H. J. Doolittle, and a general meeting of members in that area held at Yingshan; and the penetration of the province of Hebei north of Beijing by colporteurs.

In 1915 C. P. Lillie, settling at Yantai, began permanent work in Shantung, Eastern China. That year also marked the ordination of the first Mandarin-speaking workers: Lin Djen-bang and Hwang Dzun-dao. In the same year a boys' school building was erected at Amoy and an Amoyese evangelist ordained; a site for mission homes, school, and chapel was purchased in Swatow; five church schools were opened in Hakkaland and a church building erected at Waichow (Huizhou); in Guangxi province a new station was opened at Nanning, its capital, where Dr. Law Keem established a small hospital; the Shi Chao Yueh Pao reached a circulation of more than 60,000 monthly; a call for a minister came from Shanxi, in northern China, where a colporteur gathered a group of inquirers in a Christian community called the Gospel Village; the city church in Shanghai raised funds to build a sanctuary; the workers in the Asiatic Division sent a special memorial to the Mission Board calling for 35 or more missionaries and for $100,000 in funds, in response to which the largest group of SDA missionaries sent out up to that time sailed for the Orient, many of them for China, bringing a new impetus to the work.

In 1916 one of the new arrivals, D. E. Davenport, M.D., opened Yancheng Dispensary-Hospital and a school at Yancheng (Loho) in the province of Henan. Later, that station developed into one of the strongest centers of SDA work in China. Also in 1916, the first subscription book appeared, published by the Signs press in Shanghai. Reports for that year included: more than 200 new converts by the South China Mission; the two training schools in the Central China Mission well filled; homes for missionaries erected at Chongqing; 14 baptized in Mukden (Shenyang), Manchuria.

Reorganization of 1917. In 1917 the territory of China was reorganized into two unions: the North China Union Mission, with work in Zhejiang, Anhwei, Giangsu, Shandung, Henan, Hubei, Hunan, Gianxi, Sichuan; and the South China Union Mission, composed of Fujian, Guangtung, and Guangxi. The rest of China was considered mission territory in the Asiatic Division. In that year Warren and Andrews made an exploratory visit to Yünnan, far to the west near the borders of Burma. In the southwest, Dr. Law Keem opened a hospital in the capital of Guangxi, Nanning. J. G. White opened a station in the province of Shaanxi, in the central part of China.

The 1918 annual report mirrored the growth of the work. At that time there were two union missions (North and South China) with 14 local missions, 70 churches, 2,862 baptized church members, and 490 workers (including 106 teachers and 86 colporteurs), 67 schools (of which six were secondary schools), with an enrollment of 1,781, one publishing house, and one sanitarium. In that year the second station was opened in the province of Sichuan, at Chengdu, under the leadership of C. L. Blandford; and R. F. Cottrell began preaching in Beijing. About that time an annual campaign soliciting support for SDA welfare and educational work (see Ingathering) in China among the people of China themselves was inaugurated in connection with the construction of the Yancheng hospital. Since then contributions from local sources made it possible to expand the work, especially in the medical field, throughout the country much more rapidly than would have been possible from foreign gifts alone.

China in the Far Eastern Division, 1919—1930

China in the Far Eastern Division, 1919—1930. When early in 1919 the Asiatic Division was reorganized, China became a part of the newly formed Far Eastern Division. The two Chinese union missions were discontinued, and a number of smaller union missions were organized that became more directly responsible to the division. In 1920 there were six such unions.

New Missions Organized. During 1919 the work in the Zhejiang province, lying immediately south of Shanghai, was organized into a mission under the leadership of G. L. Wilkinson; a mission was established at Jiujiang in the province of Giangxi (inland between Fujian and Hunan), where there had been a group of adherents since 1913, when colporteurs sold SDA publications there. J. N. Andrews, M.D. (grandson of the first SDA worker overseas), opened a dispensary on the border of Tibet, at Dajianlu, Xikang (now included in Sichuan).

On their tour of the western regions of China, Warren and Andrews came upon several people who had become interested in SDA doctrines through colporteurs. From among these people, a Miao tribesman came to Chongqing in 1919 and was baptized, the first from that tribe. At the eastern end of China, the Manchurian Union Mission was organized. According to the Statistical Report, by the end of the year there were 3,255 Seventh-day Adventists in China.

Educational Advance. In 1922 advanced training for Chinese and foreign workers was offered in China through the facilities of the Far Eastern branch of the Fireside Correspondence School (now Home Study Institute). In 1925 another step in the development of SDA educational work was taken—the training school was moved from Shanghai to Qiaotouzhen, a rural location about 40 miles (65 kilometers) from Nanjing, and its curriculum was expanded to include vocational training, thus introducing this particular type of education into China. Shortly afterward the Chinese government attempted to introduce a plan of registration and accreditation that would have completely eliminated Bible classes, all religious training, and missionary influence. But the vocational aspects of SDA education saved the school for the church. In harmony with its vocational emphasis, the name of the school was changed to China Training Institute. The institute “was regarded as a school that was ‘different,’ and officials and educators from all parts of China came to inspect what was looked upon as a ‘unique experiment’ in the field of education” (John Oss, Mission Advance in China, p. 191). Two years later hostilities between warring political factions forced the school to close temporarily. In the same year, 1927, the Shanghai Hospital and Sanitarium building was completed (dedicated in the spring of 1928).

In 1928 C. B. Miller and Dallas White opened the first station in the western province of Yünnan, in the city of K’unming. At the same time a station was opened at Gueiyang, in neighboring Gueizhou province; and permanent work also was established far to the northeast, in north central China, in the province of Shanxi. Also in 1928 the Far Eastern Division office moved into its own new building at Shanghai.

The year 1930 was marked by the establishment of the headquarters for the Mongolian work at Kalgan (Zhangjiakou), north of Beijing. At the end of 1930 there were in China six union missions, 29 local missions, 156 churches, 9,456 church members, 947 workers (76 were ordained ministers, 123 licensed ministers, 364 licensed missionaries, 132 colporteurs, and 152 teachers), 103 church schools, and 3,325 students. There were 17 educational institutions of secondary and college level, one publishing house, two smaller local presses, and 11 medical institutions. About 250 of the 1,900 hsiens (counties) had been entered.

Russian SDAs in China. In 1920 for the first time an effort was made to spread the SDA message among the thousands of Russian settlers along the Manchurian part of the Trans-Siberian Railroad and among the Russian émigrés who were coming into that country in large numbers after the Russian Revolution of 1917. This work was assigned to the China Division. A Russian mission was established in 1920 at Harbin, Manchuria, under the direction of Theophil T. Babienco (the son of a pioneer Russian minister), from Canada. He was assisted by Max Popow, also from Canada, who, after his arrival, went throughout the Russian communities in Manchuria selling SDA publications. (There had been a church in Harbin by 1912, composed largely of SDAs who had come from Russia, but apparently few were left of the earlier group.) For a while this work was administrated directly by the Russian unions, but in 1925 it was organized as a detached mission, Sungari-Mongolian Mission.

China Division, 1930—1950

China Division, 1930—1950. In 1930 China was separated from the Far Eastern Division and, together with Hong Kong and Macao, was formed into the China Division. It was felt that the work in China was of sufficiently distinct character that its problems could best be solved on the local level. Furthermore, as the Chinese workers assumed more and more responsibility and came to participate in the division councils, they were confronted with a language barrier in councils where division officers could not understand Chinese. The China Division began to function on Jan. 1, 1931, with H. W. Miller, M.D., a veteran missionary, as its first president. Chinese became the working language of the administrative councils.

Public Evangelism. Public evangelism played an important role in the development of the SDA Church in China. Early evangelists had adapted the custom of public storytelling to attract masses to the message of Christianity. Large-scale meetings were used extensively in the 1920s in the large cities. In the 1930s, after the formation of the China Division, public evangelism received a new impetus and was extended from the large cities to smaller cities and even to remote towns. In 1932 the promotional slogan “Into every hsien [“county”]” was adopted.

At the same time economic and social developments were transforming China. The land was awakening out of its age-old sleep, and new and improved means of transport were introduced. As motor roads were built where only footpaths had existed, SDA mission trucks were among the first to roll over them. As air routes were established, SDA workers, flying into distant places establishing the work, were among the first to take advantage of them.

Youth Missionary Movement. The movement to reach every corner of the great land involved not only the workers but the membership as well. The young people at the China Training Institute organized a small group called The Frontier Missionary Band. From this nucleus sprang a strong missionary movement among the young SDAs throughout China. This movement reached into Tibet, the long-closed land, and contributed to the promotion of the work on other borderlands of China, for example, among the Mongols. The first entry had been made earlier, about 1926, by Russian workers who, from a base in northern Manchuria, seem to have penetrated into the areas that became the Mongolian Republic; yet their work later had to be suspended. To renew this work, in 1930 a plot of land was purchased at Kalgan (Zhangjiakou), a town north of Beijing on the borderland between China and Inner Mongolia. In 1931 two Russian workers named Rodionov and Maltsev, under Otto Christensen as leader, opened the work in that area.

Advances on the Frontiers. In the same year two Chinese colporteurs, Beh Djin-djen and Dzeng Hsiang-pu, carried SDA publications deep into Xinjiang, even to its westernmost boundaries at Kashgar (Shufu, K'oshih). In 1932 the territory north of Beijing was entered by Goh Djaoliang, who preached in Chongde; by 1934 another station was opened in that area. Also in 1932 Chen Wen-hsioh, a minister, held public meetings in a tent pitched in the town square at Xining, in the western province of Qinghai; and in November of that year the first baptisms were reported and a church was organized. Many Mongolians, Tibetans, and other non-Chinese people live in that area. In 1932, soon after a new province of Ningxia had been formed in western Inner Mongolia on the edge of the Gobi Desert, Shao Djen-siu began evangelistic meetings there. Only a short while later a group of converts were baptized and a church was formed, and two years later, in 1934, the Ningxia Mission was organized under the direction of Wu Dzeh-shan. By 1934 there was permanent SDA work in 402 hsiens, that is, in about one in every five counties of China.

Hospitals and sanitariums were opened or developed in 1931 at Yancheng (Loho), Kalgan (Zhangjiakou), Mukden (Shenyang), and Canton (Guangzhou). In 1935 a mission was organized on the island of Hainan, off the south China coast, where a colporteur had been sent in 1932 by the MV Society of the Guangzhou school. In Yunnan, where C. B. Miller had begun tribal work in 1928, Milton Lee entered a new tribal district in 1937.

China During World War II. As war clouds hung over China in 1937, D. E. Rebok and J. H. Effenberg launched a Medical Cadet Corps program for training SDA youth, which had the sanction of the government. During the summer session at the China Training Institute, about 150 young men took the training. The war ultimately caused the transfer of the division headquarters to Hong Kong. From 1940 to 1942 N. F. Brewer, a seasoned China worker, was president of the China Division with S. L. Frost as secretary and M. D. Howard as treasurer. As the war progressed, he and many other overseas SDA workers were captured and placed in internment camps in Hong Kong, Guangzhou, Shanghai, Amoy, and the Philippines.

In this crisis the Chinese workers took complete charge in the occupied parts of China, operating from Shanghai. In the unoccupied parts of China, E. L. Longway and G. J. Appel carried on from Chongqing, a temporary center.

Postwar Reconstruction. At a general meeting of workers held in the spring of 1946 in Shanghai, the leaders took an inventory of the destruction. Wang Fu-yuan, SDA leader in Manchuria, who had spent 50 grim days in a Japanese prison under torture to compel him to give up his Christian beliefs, summed up the experience of most of the Chinese workers in these words: "We had to sell our clothes, and our land, but we didn't sell our faith or our souls, and thus God brought us through this time of trial."

The Seventh-day Adventist Church came out of its baptism of fire stronger than before. At the end of 1945 there were 22,940 church members, organized in 261 churches, with 10 medical institutions and 1 publishing house. The net gain in church membership during the last five years of the war period was 3,461; there were almost the same number of ordained ministers as there had been in 1930, but the proportion of nationals increased from less than one half to three quarters. By 1948 the China field had been almost fully manned by Chinese and overseas workers and almost all SDA institutions had been reopened.

Postwar Developments. The end of World War II unfortunately did not mean peace in China. In a short time fratricidal civil war swept the country from one end to the other. Nevertheless, in the first few postwar years the work of the SDA Church in China regained almost its prewar magnitude. The church reconstructed most of its medical, educational, and evangelistic institutions, many of which had been ruined and destroyed in the course of many battles and plunderings. Public evangelism, always a prominent part of the work in China, received a tremendous impetus from the turmoil. The China Division Reporter from 1947 to 1950 carried accounts of evangelistic campaigns from one end of the country to the other. Because the greatest hindrance to reconstruction and advance was the lack of trained personnel, especially in the medical work, an attempt was made to remedy the lack by offering some medical training at the China Training Institute.

In 1946 Voice of Prophecy broadcasts began in China, first on a station at Shanghai (Nov. 10, 1946), and within one year on 12 other stations, at Nanjing, Hankou, Guangzhou, Changsha, Xian, Lanchow, Shenyang (Mukden), Changchun, and Ningpo. The Signs Bible Correspondence School, operated in conjunction with radiobroadcasts, enrolled about 12,000 students in its first year of operation. In 1950, after temporary interruption in broadcasting caused by the revolutionary war in China and the change in government on the mainland, the Voice of Prophecy again went on the air in the Shanghai area, and the Bible correspondence school reported more than 30,000 active students.

More than 90 percent of the Bible correspondence school enrollment came from persons under 30 years of age. It was believed that social and political upheaval caused the youth of China to become interested in religious things. At the same time the lack of trained evangelists was compensated for by the drive and the dedication of the students from the Chinese training schools who were sent out to preach. The success of the evangelistic work was notable. The last available issue of the China Division Reporter (for the first quarter of 1951) indicates that in 1950 the total number of baptisms was about 3,000 in the division. As long as they could, colporteurs conducted their work throughout the country.

Soon after the change of government on the mainland, the work there was separated from the rest of the SDA body. After a brief period when the China Division Committee functioned in Hong Kong and the north China provisional division committee of national workers took care of the organization in the country, the provisional division became, on Jan. 1, 1950, the China Division, while the parts of China not under the control of the mainland government, together with Hong Kong and Macao, became the South China Island Union Mission under the Far Eastern Division.

For some time regular relations between the General Conference and Chinese Seventh-day Adventists were not maintained, but it was reported that because of the prevailing antireligious and antimissionary attitudes of the government, SDAs in China underwent severe persecution. As a result, the institutional and organizational structure of the church there was destroyed. In 1979 conditions opened to the extent that the denomination now has contact with the work in China, and a growing work is being administered by the Eastern Asia Administrative Committee of Seventh-day Adventists.

China, Republic of CHINA, REPUBLIC OF (Matsu, Pescadores, Quemoy, Taiwan). Islands off the coast of China administered by the nationalist government of the Chinese republic. The territory of Taiwan is composed of a group of 14 islands with a combined area of approximately 13,900 square miles (36,000 square kilometers). The main island of Taiwan, situated about 110 miles (177 kilometers) from Xiamen, China, is about 240 miles (386 kilometers) long and 90 miles (145 kilometers) wide, and is bisected by the Tropic of Cancer. West of southern Taiwan, and administratively a part of it, are the Pescadores, composed of a group of 64 islands with an estimated area of 49 square miles (127 square kilometers).

Population. An influx of 1.5 million refugees from the mainland after the revolution and a high birth rate contributed to a rapid increase of population from about 5 million in 1945 to almost 12 million in 1962. In 1993 the population was 20.4 million. Density was 1,530 per square mile (590 per square kilometer) at the end of 1992, the highest in the world. Nearly 4 million people live in the capital city of Taipei.

The people of Taiwan are primarily of Chinese origin, and, before the refugee influx the majority were from two language groups, Xiamen and Hakka (both of South China), with the Xiamen group predominant. The refugees, on the other hand, came from all parts of China. Mandarin has been made the official language on the island and, because of the long Japanese occupation, Japanese is understood by most adult Taiwanese. Besides those peoples of Chinese origin, there are scattered in villages throughout the mountain ranges an estimated 265,000 brown-skinned Malayo-Polynesians, the aborigines of Taiwan. Their language, religion, customs, and even facial characteristics differ greatly from the Chinese living in the plains. The religion of the general population has tended lately toward a polytheistic amalgam of Buddhism, Confucianism, and Taoism, whereas animism is the religion of the indigenous tribes.

Historical Background. The first Chinese immigrants settled along Taiwan's coast about A.D. 600. In 1590 Portuguese traders named the island Ilha Formosa, meaning "Beautiful Island." In 1624 Dutch traders built a fort near what is now Tainan and operated there about 40 years. Taiwan was officially incorporated into China in 1683. The Treaty of Tientsin (1858) opened Taiwan to foreign trade, and Christian missionaries soon followed. On May 8, 1895, Taiwan was ceded to Japan and for the next 50 years was part of the Japanese Empire. At the close of World War II, Taiwan reverted to China. When the Chinese nationalist government withdrew from the China mainland to Taiwan in 1949, it made Taipei, Taiwan, its capital.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. The first known SDA to enter Taiwan was T. S. Yang, a colporteur from south Fujian, China (Taiwan was then assigned to the South China Union Mission), who went there in 1907. In spite of persecution and occasional imprisonment, he faithfully carried on his work, and, before leaving Taiwan in 1912, had gathered a company of 10 converts. In 1931 at the time the China Division was organized, Taiwan was assigned to the Far Eastern Division and was later made a part of the Japan Union Mission. In 1934 Nagao Wachi was sent to Taiwan to open work in the city of Tainan. There was opposition and the work progressed slowly. The 1938 SDA Yearbook lists only six members. When the work came to a standstill in 1942, there was a reported membership of 14.

The Work Reestablished. Sometime after World War II Taiwan reverted to the South China Union Mission under the China Division. In the spring of 1947 K. T. K'ang and C. C. Kuo were sent to Taiwan to find loyal SDAs and to rent housing in preparation for opening mission work on the island. In a three-month survey they found only one Seventh-day Adventist, W. K. Wang, who had arrived from China after the war. Because of high costs, no housing was arranged at that time. In December 1947 the China Division appropriated $10,000 for the purchase of property on the island. The following spring (1948) C. H. Davis, union mission president, T. C. Chin, union mission treasurer, and B. S. Lin visited the island and purchased street chapels in Taipei and Taichung. During the summer of 1948 three Chinese workers, B. S. Lin, T. T. Lee, and T. H. Yang, with their families, arrived. In that first postwar year of SDA missions on Taiwan, about 20 members met in two companies and six baptisms were reported.

Organization and Growth. In December 1948 the Taiwan Mission was organized with H. Carl Currie as its first president and Alva Appel as secretary-treasurer. The Appel and Currie families arrived on Jan. 1, 1949, to become the first overseas SDA missionaries stationed on the island of Taiwan.

Among the million and more refugees from the mainland was a sprinkling of SDAs, who strengthened the fledgling Taiwan church. One of them, a government official, gave valuable assistance in legal matters. Additional help came from two Taiwanese SDAs who had been in Japan during the war. T. O. Su, who came back in December 1949, was sent to school in Hong Kong in 1949 and later became the first Taiwanese ordained SDA minister. R. F. Swen returned to his home in Taiwan in the late spring of 1947, and working as a layperson, contributed much to establishing the work in south Taiwan.

The first Seventh-day Adventist church on the island was organized at Taipei in early 1949, with the majority of its charter members coming from among the refugees from the mainland. In late 1949 the first postwar public evangelistic campaign was conducted in Taipei by H. C. Currie and A. R. Appel, who spoke in Mandarin, with T. C. Lee translating into Taiwanese. This resulted in 16 baptisms.

Reorganization. In 1950 Taiwan was separated from the China Division, and the South China Island Union was organized as a detached union mission under the General Conference, to include Taiwan, Hong Kong, and Macao. Headquarters at first were in Hong Kong, and later, from 1952, on Taiwan. The availability of missionaries evacuated from the Chinese mainland and the stabilization of the political situation on Taiwan made it possible to expand the work on the island in this period. During the summer and fall of 1951, six such missionary families arrived. At the same time funds were appropriated for a training school, a Voice of Prophecy Bible Correspondence School, homes for overseas workers, and budgets for enlarging the national staff. In addition, a Thirteenth Sabbath Offering overflow, previously designated for China, was made available to Taiwan, thus making possible the construction of seven new churches.

Name of Mission Changed. The Taiwan Mission had grown so by 1964 that the island was divided to form two missions: the North Taiwan Mission and the South Taiwan Mission. However, it was necessary to divide again in 1968. The names became Tai An Chyu Hwei (Mountain Mission) and Tai Ping Chyu Hwei (Plains Mission), with all the mountain area in Taiwan, including Orchid Island, being the Tai An Mission territory, and north, south, east plains, and offshore islands of Matsu, Quemoy, and the Pescadores being the Tai Ping Mission territory. The Mountain Mission moved to a new location in Pingtung, South Taiwan, and the Plains Mission remained in Taichung, Central Taiwan. The membership of these missions increased with baptisms totaling 28 and 24, respectively, by the third quarter 1974. In 1975 the missions were combined once again to form the Taiwan Mission. By the end of 1992, membership had increased to 6,594.

Tribal Work. In the spring of 1953 work was begun among the mountain tribal people in the village of Ta She, which had a population of 800 persons. The work grew rapidly in the southern mountains. By 1963 the Ta She church had nearly 200 members and conducted the largest Sabbath school on the island. The tribal work had been extended to seven of the 10 tribes, and more than half of Taiwan's SDA church membership and at least two thirds of the Sabbath school membership were from among the aborigines. In 1963, 36 acres (15 hectares) of land were purchased at the foot of the mountains in southern Taiwan on which to establish a training center specifically for the aboriginal tribes. From this center trained workers have gone to tribes all over the island.

Recent Developments. For several years mission work grew rapidly all over Taiwan. During 1962 an average of one newly organized Sabbath school was added to the total every 11 days, and 69 new Sabbath school members every Sabbath. Vacation Bible Schools were conducted throughout the island.

The Pathfinders organized a strong program in 1971 and in a three-year period increased from one to 293 members. The Sungshan church in Taipei replaced the former meeting area on the second floor of the South China Island Union Mission Office, and began meeting in March 1974 in its beautiful new edifice.

Radio and Television

Radio and Television. In 1958 Milton Lee began two broadcasting projects on the island of Taiwan. One was the revival of the weekly Chinese Mandarin Voice of Prophecy program, which had been discontinued after the evacuation from the Chinese mainland. (This program was later released to mainland China.) The other program was the introduction of a daily bilingual program, which presented Christian principles over the air accompanied by the study of a series of English-Chinese booklets. Thousands of students enrolled by purchasing these textbooks from the Voice of Prophecy office as well as from bookstores on the island. This daily broadcast proved so successful that a second set of books was prepared in 1962. In 1968 a weekly broadcast in Taiwanese began, with James Su as speaker. It was later continued by C. H. Yang. By this time the VOP recorded its own programs under the technical supervision of William Yang. In April 1974 a weekly television program was inaugurated over the Chinese Television Company, with Edwin Less as director and producer. The production of local television programs has increased the mail with as many as 10,000 letters received for one broadcast.

China Training Institute

CHINA TRAINING INSTITUTE (Chung Hua San Yü Yen Chiu She). An educational institution that was established in 1910 for the training of Mandarin-speaking evangelistic workers in China. It operated until 1951 successively on several campuses and under several names. During most of the period it offered elementary, secondary, and junior college work (approximately grades 1—14). The school opened October 1910, under the name China Union Training School and under the direction of Dr. H. W. Miller. Classes were held in temporary quarters at Zhoujiakou. Because of its meager facilities and the large proportion of needy students, the school was nicknamed “The Beggars’ School.” Nevertheless, it produced some of the strongest Seventh-day Adventist workers in China.

During the Chinese Revolution of 1911—1912, the school was transferred to Nanjing and there it had about 35 students. Then it was moved to Shanghai about 1913, where it became known as China Missions Training School. In 1919 it was renamed Shanghai Missionary College. As the enrollment swelled toward 300 students in 1925, the college was transferred to Qiaotouzhen, a rural location about 40 miles (64 kilometers) northwest of Nanjing on a property of 125 acres (50 hectares). The school was renamed China Missionary Junior College. Its student capacity varied between 300 and 450 on this campus. In 1927 it was renamed China Theological Seminary, and in the early 1930s it was given the name China Training Institute. At that time its library holdings of 8,000 volumes were the largest among overseas denominational schools. In the late 1930s during the Sino-Japanese conflict, the school was evacuated to Hong Kong, where it was temporarily combined with the South China Training Institute. It then had about 200 students.

Overtaken by World War II, the school was again moved and combined with West China Union Training Institute at Dabao, Tsitsikow, in the Chongqing province of Sichuan. Its enrollment there was 288 in 1944. At the end of the war it was renamed San Yü Theological Seminary. About 1947 it returned to its own campus at Qiaotouzhen and assumed its former name of China Training Institute. In 1948 there were 465 students in 14 grades. When the civil war front reached the province of Jiangxi, the school was again removed to Hong Kong and joined with the South China Island Union Training Institute. After a period there it resumed operations at Qiaotouzhen, but was apparently closed soon thereafter, although the exact time of its closing is not known abroad.

Christchurch Adventist School

CHRISTCHURCH ADVENTIST SCHOOL. A coeducational day school operated by the South New Zealand Conference at Papanui, Christchurch, providing five years of high school work in addition to the full range of primary education. In 1993 the secondary section had an enrollment of 55, with five full-time teachers, and the primary section had an enrollment of 71, with three full-time teachers. The school draws its pupils from all the Christchurch suburban churches.

The school began as the Papanui Private School, under the control of the South New Zealand Conference. It opened in 1925 with an enrollment of 25 children and was taught by Miss M. M. Smart. As the enrollment grew, a three-room open-air type of school was built on adjoining property, and the first year of high school work was added. A second extension provided an extra classroom. In 1933 complete high school courses were offered, and the school's status was changed to that of a central school. Additions in 1959 and in 1961 provided two extra classrooms, a science laboratory, a woodwork room, a library, and a headmaster's office. In 1965 a swimming pool was added.

In 1983 an ultramodern secondary school complex was built, incorporating specialist classrooms, general classrooms, library, staff room, and office facilities.

The Christchurch Adventist School is registered as a high school with the New Zealand government's Education Department, and trains its pupils up to the University Bursary Examination level.

Christchurch Sanitarium

CHRISTCHURCH SANITARIUM. A medical institution, operated from 1900 to 1921 at Christchurch, New Zealand, by the New Zealand Conference through the Medical Missionary Benevolent Association formed in 1897. Forerunner of the sanitarium was the Health Home at Christchurch, opened by G. A. Brandstater, of Australia, a nurse, in 1898. After operating in a rented cottage of six rooms for a time, the Health Home moved to a house of 13 rooms at 71 Hereford Street. In 1899 Dr. F. E. Braucht arrived from Samoa to take charge.

In mid-1900 a two-story building with 20 rooms and large grounds, situated on Harewood Road, Papanui, Christchurch, was purchased for a sanitarium for £1,800.

After the addition of treatment rooms and the enlargement of guest accommodations, the Christchurch Sanitarium, accommodating 10 inpatients, was opened on July 1, 1900. Provision was made for both medical and surgical cases as well as for outpatients from the city. The staff consisted of 12 nurses and helpers receiving training.

Some 12 months after the opening Dr. Braucht returned to Samoa, and Dr. P. N. Keller took charge. Later Dr. G. H. Gibson filled the position of medical superintendent. Largely because of serious financial difficulties the institution closed its doors in September 1921.

Christian, Lewis Harrison

CHRISTIAN, LEWIS HARRISON (1871—1949). Evangelist and administrator. He graduated from Union College in 1896, and in 1897 began preaching in Minnesota. In 1899 he turned to evangelism among the Scandinavians of Chicago, and the next year was ordained. As further preparation for working for the Scandinavians he worked in Denmark from 1902 to 1904. On returning to the United States, he served briefly as president of the Northern Illinois Conference, before taking up responsibilities as secretary of the Danish-Norwegian Department of the North American Foreign Department, a position he held from 1905 to 1913. During this period he helped establish the Danish-Norwegian Seminary in Hutchinson, Minnesota. He was successively president of the Lake Union Conference (1914—1918), secretary of the Bureau of Home Missions of the General Conference (1918—1920), then General Conference associate vice president for Europe (1920—1922), and president of the European Division (1922—1928), where he traveled extensively rebuilding denominational work that had suffered during World War I.

On the separation of the European Division in 1928 into four administrative sections, Christian served as president of the Northern European Division, with headquarters in London. In 1936 he became a general vice president of the General Conference. After serving for 10 years, he was appointed a field secretary of the General Conference. Along with his other duties he taught religion at the SDA Theological Seminary, and devoted time to writing. Among his books are Facing the Crisis, Modern Religious Trends, and The Fruitage of Spiritual Gifts.

Christian Record Services, Inc. (CRS)

CHRISTIAN RECORD SERVICES, INC. (CRS). A multinational, nonprofit corporation that develops, produces, and distributes free publications and services that help meet the educational, recreational, social, and motivational needs of the sight- and hearing-impaired and of those with other physical disabilities. It has its headquarters at 4444 South 52nd Street, Lincoln, Nebraska 68516.

History

History. Beginnings of the Work for the Visually Impaired. As early as 1897 the General Conference, in its awakening awareness of a duty to give the message of the Bible to all the world, gave consideration to reaching the visually impaired. In an effort to fulfill this recognized duty, the International Tract Society, with headquarters in Battle Creek, Michigan, purchased a stereotype machine for making plates for raised point print and issued a number of tracts. In 1899 a new era opened. A 27-year-old young man from Nebraska named Austin O. Wilson, sightless since the age of 9, and a former student of the Nebraska School for the Blind, enrolled at Battle Creek College and began to urge the church leaders to do more for the visually impaired. As a result, the General Conference Committee decided to publish a journal for the visually impaired, the Christian Record, a 10-page monthly that would present choice reading matter and Seventh-day Adventist doctrines to sightless readers. The first editors of the paper were L. A. Hoopes, secretary of the General Conference, and L. T. Nicola, of the International Tract Society. As far as possible, sightless persons were to be used to do the mechanical work necessary to print the magazine. Wilson was employed to put out the first number. The facilities were crude. After the embossing plates were made with the old stereotype machine, he and his wife (also sightless) used a common clothes wringer to print the sheets that made up the first issue of 75 copies printed in January 1900. The stated aim of the Christian Record was “to educate, and to suggest lines of work that would supply many blind people with an independent livelihood.” The cover of the magazine carried ink-print advertisements of articles that would be good items for sightless salespersons.

Also called to service in the new venture in 1900 were two Nebraska friends of Wilson, L. N. Muck and his wife. They were graduates of the Nebraska School for the Blind, and she was a teacher in that institution. Together with the Wilsons, they worked on the production of the magazine the first few years. When Wilson spoke at the General Conference of 1901 in behalf of sending the new magazine to all schools and libraries for the visually impaired, the delegates showed keen interest in the new undertaking by the questions they asked. His recorded answers inform us that at that time an issue had 20 to 24 pages, each containing about half as much as the ordinary typewritten page, and that they were sending out about 200 copies a month. L. A. Hoopes, the editor, stated that already some converts had been won as a result of reading these publications for the visually impaired. The Christian Record was no more than well begun when the Review and Herald publishing plant burned in December 1902, destroying all the equipment, including the special facilities of the Christian Record. The work for the visually impaired was moved to College View, Nebraska, in May 1904. By 1905 the circulation had increased to between 600 and 700.

Means of Financial Support

Means of Financial Support. When the paper was begun, church members were urged to make offerings for the support of the new missionary project. They also were urged to visit the visually impaired in their neighborhood and solicit their subscriptions to the Record. If the sightless person was too poor to subscribe, the solicitor was urged to give him or her the money ($1.50 at first) to pay for a subscription. At the General Conference session of 1909 it was recommended that the union and local conferences endeavor to place the Christian Record in the hands of every sightless person in their territories who could read it. Several unions appropriated $300, and each local conference was urged to raise 10 cents a member annually for the work. Accordingly, Muck visited camp meetings, promoting the work for the visually impaired and urging the conferences to raise their goals. At the Autumn Council of 1911 it was voted to support the Christian Record on the same basis as other mission work, by yearly appropriation. In 1912 the periodicals of the publishing house were accorded free mailing privileges in the United States; no subscription price was to be charged.

By 1915 a plan of public solicitation of funds from business firms and individuals for the support of the work had evolved. This in time became the permanent plan of support of the organization. Beginning in a small way with part-time solicitors or retired people, the solicitation program has grown as the increased services have demanded. It was enlarged during the administration of D. D. Rees, beginning in 1927. As a result, the finances of the institution have been placed upon a firm footing.

Beginning in 1960, Seventh-day Adventist churches in the North American Division give an offering every year to provide the denominational services; the public contributes the funds that provide the nonsectarian services.

Nature of Publications and Other Services

Nature of Publications and Other Services. Very early the need of a circulating library was seen, especially as a means of making available the braille Bible, in 18 volumes, and other inspirational books. In 1909 C. N. Miller, a sightless editor, reported that such a library had been established. The library contains choice inspirational and religious volumes, circulated postage free, as is all matter for the visually impaired in the United States and Canada.

Mrs. C. W. Degering (1948—1958) and Mrs. C. G. Cross (1958—1974), both sighted librarians and skillful braillists, have been largely responsible for the rapid development of the institution's large lending library, which is considered to be not only the best but also the largest of its type.

By 1926 there were enough SDAs among the visually impaired to create a demand for braille Sabbath school lesson quarterlies. In response that year, the institution began publication of the Sabbath school lessons, including notes and helps (now called The Student).

In January 1937 a monthly magazine for the thousands of junior-age sightless children, called The Children's Friend, was begun. Under the leadership of C. W. Degering (1949—1958), an expanded program of publication was inaugurated. In 1951 the institution received permission to braille the magazine Life and Health, issued monthly.

Two evangelistic magazines—The Bible Expositor and later These Times—were published for some years, but these were dropped in the fifties in favor of Bible correspondence courses and doctrinal tracts. In 1954 a magazine for teenagers, The Youth, was begun.

In February 1955, in response to an obvious need, the Christian Record Talking Magazine was introduced. Issued quarterly on disks, this medium allows the visually impaired and others with physical disabilities to enjoy talking features: nature, adventure, and informative interviews relevant to current events. This method reaches those who cannot read braille.

During the fifties a number of inspirational books, such as Thoughts From the Mount of Blessing, Steps to Christ, and The Desire of Ages, by Ellen G. White, and Alone With God, by Matilda Andross, were recorded as talking books. These are distributed by the United States Library of Congress and its 50 regional libraries.

In January 1959 a magazine in large print was launched for those who, although legally sightless, are partly sighted and can read large print. Gauged for youth and young adults, it was called Happiness. In April 1961 the two magazines were combined under the name Youth Happiness and were brailled as well as published in large print. In January 1976 the magazine was renamed Young and Alive.

In 1959 a new experiment was made in the production of storybooks for sightless parents of sighted children. These books are trademarked FULL VISION books. The sightless parent reads the brailled story on the left-hand page while the child's attention is held by the picture on the right-hand page. The series of storybooks includes Bible stories, stories about nature, science, and patriotism, and poems for small children.

Projects include the printing of more material in large or sight-saving type for partially sighted readers. Steps to Christ, the first of these books, was completed in May 1965. Since 1962 considerably more talking books have been produced, including the Conflict of the Ages Series and many other books. In February 1961 the taped edition of The Student was started. It contained senior-division lessons, mission stories, and 30 minutes of articles from the church paper. Since 1972 The Student has been produced in braille and on flexible disc. It contains only the adult Sabbath school lesson quarterly information. In 1962 the tape-lending library was begun. Volunteers from many parts of the U.S.A. read assigned books onto tapes for the organization. These are duplicated and put into circulation in the tape-lending library.

Christian Record employs many area representatives in the United States. The representatives assist thousands of people each year who are sightless or have other physical disabilities. The representatives introduce people to the free services of CRS and assist them in making adjustments to a different way of life, both physically and spiritually.

Beginning in January 1965, a quarterly braille edition of the Review and Herald (now the Adventist Review) was issued for SDA braille-reading adults, to enable them to keep up with the progress of SDA activities in all parts of the world.

The institution makes no charge for any subscription, book, or other benefit. Students who have visual, hearing, or other physical disabilities, have the opportunity to receive scholarship money from CRS.

Having outgrown its plant, the institution erected a larger plant with ample provision for expansion and occupied it the summer of 1963.

CRS helps SDA conferences overseas by sending publications and Bible courses. Most of the services are sent directly to English-speaking people in 70 countries.

Contracted Services

Contracted Services. The original motive of the sightless people who encouraged establishing the Christian Record was to bring SDA teachings to the visually impaired. As time went on, it was decided to make the magazine nonsectarian, since many copies went to schools for the visually impaired and to others who were zealous members of other churches. The new policy was to use the Christian Record as a benevolent nonsectarian enterprise, and announce in its pages any tracts and other publications of a sectarian nature, which those interested could receive free upon request. Such sectarian work conducted by the Seventh-day Adventist Church, and paid for by the church at actual cost, is carried on the organization's books as "contracted services."

Longtime Workers

Longtime Workers. Among the sightless workers who have given long and faithful service to Christian Record are Mrs. Armenta Zadina (50 years), Albert Macy (35 years), Mrs. N. L. Muck (more than 25 years), N. L. Muck (more than 20 years), Lyle Harris (more than 20 years), and Mrs. A. O. Wilson (nearly 20 years).

Longtime sighted workers include Mrs. A. S. Bringle (more than 50 years) and Dean Duffield (40 years). D. D. Rees was editor and manager for the longest period—22 years. Among others who worked more than 30 years are E. R. Corder, F. G. Corder, Mrs. Ora F. Lightcap, Mrs. D. F. Bush, Mrs. J. L. Derby, and H. F. Drake.

Recent Developments

Recent Developments. After the appointment on Mar. 1, 1958, of C. G. Cross as manager and editor, surveys were conducted dealing with the facts on, and trends among, sightless people and organizations serving the visually impaired. The information from these surveys and the work of the institution were studied by a committee appointed by the General Conference. The Christian Record Board voted favorably on the recommendations of this committee, and made them the framework for subsequent progress.

As a result, emphasis has been focused on reorganizing and developing the field work; dropping and combining certain magazines, and initiating new periodicals to meet specific needs; meeting the demands of the state and local permit-issuing organizations in order to qualify for the thousands of solicitation permits that are needed annually (the public is asked to pay for the nonsectarian services only; the Seventh-day Adventist Church pays for the sectarian services it promotes); launching publications in large print for people of dimming sight or with partial vision; greatly increasing the capacity of the free lending library of braille, recorded, and large-print books; encouraging closer cooperation with ministers in following up Bible interests; producing a new type of book for sightless parents who rear their young sighted children; developing more services specifically for visually impaired SDAs participating more actively in professional meetings within the industry; maintaining a constant public relations program both within the church and among the public; launching a new department of magazines, books, music, and special programs on magnetic tapes; inaugurating a system of volunteer workers in the plant and in the field; and producing more books on long-playing records, and cassettes.

An addition to services is CRS's National Camps for Blind Children. Since its beginning in 1967, more than 34,000 sightless campers have attended camps throughout the United States and Canada. Activities enhance self-confidence, boost morale, and offer hope. Since 1980 a winter camp at Winter Park, Colorado, has been offered. Approximately 45 campers participate in downhill skiing, snowmobiling, cross-country skiing, and many other winter sports.

The deaf services department serves more than 4,000 individuals, and programs are added each year to help those who are hearing-impaired. A videotape-lending library, youth camps, workshops, easy English publications with simple sentences for adults, coloring books for children, and Bible lessons are offered those with hearing impairments.

In 1963 the organization changed its name from Christian Record Benevolent Association, Incorporated, to Christian Record Braille Foundation, Inc., so as better to identify the organization.

In 1989 the organization changed its name from Christian Record Braille Foundation, Inc. to Christian Record Services, Inc. Because CRS offers services for deaf and others with physical disabilities, the name needed to encompass more than braille work.

As of June 1993 circulation of the publications of Christian Record were: Christian Record, braille, 6,500; Christian Record Talking Magazine, flexible disk, 13,300; Children's Friend, braille, 3,400; Deaf Light, easy English, 3,800; Encounter, recorded, 6,300; Lifeglow, large print, 29,000; New Dawn, easy English, 700; Review, braille, 800; The Student, braille, 2,900; The Student, cassette, 150; The Student, recorded, 2,700; Viva Radiante, Spanish, large print, 1,000; Young and Alive, braille, 7,000; and Young and Alive, large print, 26,000.

Christiansen, Jakob

CHRISTIANSEN, JAKOB (1848—1934). Missionary sailor. He was born in Norway and spent his youth on the seas as a sailor and as a teacher of navigation. He later emigrated to the United States, where he became a Seventh-day Adventist in 1866, and entered the colporter work. After attending a training school in Oregon in the school year 1887—1888 he became an evangelist. In 1890 he went out on the first cruise of the mission ship Pitcairn as a mate. After the death of Captain Marsh, he brought the ship back and then commanded it on its second cruise. In 1893 he came to New York and there served as ship missionary from the Sentinel, a mission boat in the New York Harbor. In 1896 he returned to Norway, where he worked as a colporter for two years, after which he was invited to take charge of the ship mission at Hamburg. Six years later, he went to Stettin (now Szczecin) and established a ship mission there. From 1906 to 1913 he worked in the Netherlands. During the winter months he repaired camp meeting and preaching tents at Friedensau. In 1914 he went to Friedensau to stay, and retired at the old people's home there in 1916. Unable to settle down, he went out to preach and organized congregations at Prenzlau and Ferdinandsdorf in Germany. In 1925 he returned to Norway and engaged in evangelism for the next four years. He finally gave in to age and retired in 1929, past the age of 80.

Christman, Harry Krum

CHRISTMAN, HARRY KRUM (1892—1982). Publishing director, circulation manager. Born in Pennsylvania, the second of six children, he was educated at Mount Vernon College in Ohio. After graduating in 1914, he dedicated himself to the colporter ministry and accepted his first denominational position as publishing director for the West Pennsylvania Conference. He had planned to follow his father into the practice of medicine, but God had other plans. In 1915 he married Ruth Robbins, a musician. Continuing his ministerial career, he was asked in 1919 to join C. V. Leach in the Home Missionary Department of the General Conference. During the time that they worked together, the book Christian Service was compiled from the writings of Ellen White.

In succeeding years he labored in various conferences—Michigan, Pennsylvania, Ohio—and the Columbia Union before moving to Nashville to begin 26 memorable years as circulation manager for Seventh-day Adventist journals, seven years at Southern Publishing Association promoting Watchman magazine (later These Times), and 19 years at Pacific Press promoting Signs of the Times, where he worked closely with editor Arthur Maxwell. He retired in 1962 after 48 years of service for the church he loved.

Christmas

CHRISTMAS. The Seventh-day Adventist Church does not follow the Christian, or church, year of festivals and fasts, and hence does not celebrate Christmas as an ecclesiastical festival. However, it is customary in some SDA congregations to have a special program or special music with a Nativity theme on the Sabbath that falls on or near December 25.

SDAs have ignored Christmas as a church festival because of the absence of any divine command to observe the day. Furthermore, Christ's birth date is unknown, and December 25 was chosen by the Roman churches late in the fourth century, to coincide with the "birthday of the sun," the pagan solstice festival. On the other hand, SDAs have utilized the spirit of the Christmas season to direct people to the biblical teachings concerning Christ's birth and have encouraged the giving of liberal offerings to missionary purposes.

In SDA publications apparently the first mention of Christmas in connection with the story of Christ's birth is a poem by Jane Gay entitled "A Christmas Lyric," which appears in the Review and Herald (15:30, Dec. 15, 1859). A few years later, in the same periodical, the following advertisement by J. M. Aldrich, secretary of the SDA Publishing Association, appeared: "CHRISTMAS AND NEW YEARS COMING!—The little folks of course must be remembered on these occasions. This is right. I would suggest, however, that, instead of filling the children's stockings with candy, sugar-birds, and rubber-dogs, and telling them that that mythical creature—old Santa Claus—came down the chimney or through the keyhole, and paid such respect to their suspended hosiery, you had far better send to this Office and procure for them one or more of the following named, really beautiful, interesting and valuable little books: viz: Bethlehem and Her Children; Morning Star; Sweet Story of Old; Promised One; Joseph and His Brethren; History of Paul; Sketches From Jericho" (ibid. 27:8, Dec. 5, 1865).

In the 1870s it appears that it became customary in some SDA churches to have a Christmas tree in church, on which offerings were placed.

In 1879 there was considerable discussion in the Review and Herald with regard to the use of these Christmas trees for raising money for church projects. The following question, answered apparently by James White, sparked the dialogue: "Is it right to have Christmas trees and festivals? Is there any authority in the Bible for so doing?"

"Ans. We do not see any necessary connection between Christmas trees and festivals. . . . We can have Christmas trees without . . . [a festival]. Such trees as were provided in Battle Creek and Oakland, and we trust in many other of our churches, last Christmas, to bear our gifts to some important enterprises in the Lord's cause, we believe are all right. Is there anything in the Bible against so doing?" (ibid. 53:24, Jan. 16, 1879).

In the discussion that followed, Uriah Smith wrote that he thought that it was all right to celebrate the occasion of Christ's birth on December 25 without any particular regard for the day (ibid. 53:28, Jan. 23, 1879). E. Lanphear, apparently a layman, remarked: "It is a question whether Christ is honored by the practice of celebrating the day as people generally are accustomed to celebrate it" (ibid. 53:43, Feb. 6, 1879). S. N. Haskell took the position that it is all right to celebrate the event of Christ's birth with a Christmas tree and a religious service (ibid. 53:64, Feb. 20, 1879). J. P. Logan, apparently a layperson, suggested that it might be better not to have Christmas trees at all, "especially as its disuse would injure no one, while its use does hurt the weak" (ibid. 53:163, May 22, 1879).

The next December Ellen White recommended various books as Christmas gifts to children in place of "candies and useless toys." She also pointed out that while many people spend the Christmas season "in frivolity and extravagance, gluttony and display . . . it is our privilege to depart from the customs and practices of this degenerate age" (ibid. 54:189, Dec. 11, 1879). In regard to the Christmas tree, she made no specific comment on its use in the home, but stated that "there is no particular sin in selecting a fragrant evergreen, and placing it in our churches" (ibid.). Gifts for the church were to be placed upon its branches.

In 1888 in an announcement of the Week of Prayer, the suggestion was made that on the Sabbath preceding Christmas a meeting should be conducted to lay plans for the Week of Prayer and also for the "Christmas meeting." "Daily readings" for the Week of Prayer and "Christmas programs" had been sent out to the churches.

In 1890 the Week of Prayer was announced as coming during the Christmas season from December 20 to 27, and the General Conference president reminded SDAs that "it will be a time when the world around us is indulging in much feasting and folly. . . . Let us deny ourselves . . . and bring large contributions to the foreign missions" (ibid. 67:745, 746, Nov. 26, 1890).

On the matter of gifts, Ellen White said: "It is pleasant to receive a gift, however small, from those we love. It is an assurance that we are not forgotten, and it seems to bind us to them a little closer.

"Brethren and sisters, while you are devising gifts for one another I would remind you of our heavenly Friend, lest you should be unmindful of His claims. . . .

"While urging upon all the duty of first bringing their offerings to God, I would not wholly condemn the practice of making Christmas and New Year's gifts to our friends. It is right to bestow upon one another tokens of love and remembrance if we do not in this forget God, our best friend. We should make our gifts such as will prove a real benefit to the receiver" (ibid. 59:788, 789, Dec. 26, 1882).

Christoffers, Siegfried

CHRISTOFFERS, SIEGFRIED (1912—1959). Editor and publishing house administrator. He was born in a Seventh-day Adventist minister's home in Hungary and received his education at Neandertal Missionary Seminary. After leaving school, he served as colporteur and preacher in Germany until 1937, when he joined the Hamburg Publishing House as archivist. In 1939 he studied at the SDA Theological Seminary in Washington, D.C. During World War II he attempted to return home via the Far East, but was stranded in Japan for about five years. After returning to Germany, he was appointed in 1947 as head of the Editorial Department of the Advent-Verlag (Hamburg). It fell to him to restore SDA writing and editing in Germany and after 1950 to rebuild and develop the publishing plant of which he had become manager. His motto in this work was taken from Hosea 10:12: "Break up your fallow ground: for it is time to seek the Lord, till he come and rain righteousness upon you." He was killed in an automobile accident in 1959.

Christology

CHRISTOLOGY. That branch of theological study that deals with the person, attributes, and mission of Jesus Christ. The Greek word Christos, “Christ,” was originally a title, equivalent to the Hebrew Mashîach, “Messiah,” but came to be used as a name, or surname, of Jesus. Hence, while Christology might be expected to deal more specifically with Jesus’ Messiahship, in actual use it includes every phase of His person and work. Seventh-day Adventists hold that “forever truly God, [Jesus] became also truly man. . . . He was conceived of the Holy Spirit and born of the virgin Mary. He lived and experienced temptation as a human being, but perfectly exemplified the righteousness and love of God” (Church Manual [1990], p. 24).

The role of Jesus Christ is suggested by the title “Lord,” which is frequently applied to Him. NT scholars commonly recognize that the simple declaration “Jesus is Lord” was the earliest confession of Christian faith (Acts 2:36; Rom. 10:9, 10; 1 Cor. 12:3; Phil. 2:11), made, perhaps, by every convert at baptism. But this simple declaration by no means implies a simple Christology. The Greek-speaking Jews referred to God as Kurios, “Lord.” In the Septuagint, Kurios is not only a translation of the Hebrew word ’Adonai, “Lord,” but also of God’s covenant name Yahweh, or “Jehovah.” Therefore to any reader of the Septuagint, Kurios, “Lord,” was a common title for the God of the OT, denoting His power over the world and humans as Creator, Ruler, and Giver of life. By designating Jesus as “Lord,” Christians attributed deity to Him, and ascribed to Him supreme authority and power.

It is evident in the NT that Jesus was regarded as both God and human being. But no attempt was made to interrelate these two phases of His nature. The NT stresses Jesus’ mission and work, and attempts no explanation of the mystery of His nature. But the historical Christ is set forth as at once fully God and fully human.

By the second century, however, the church felt compelled by one-sided distortions to work out the philosophical implications of the Incarnation. The heretical Ebionites, for example, conceived of Christ as a merely human Messiah and denied His divine nature. The Docetists and Gnostics, on the other hand, denied the reality of His humanity, for they believed that matter is evil. The church had to meet these heresies.

The Christological controversies of the fourth and fifth centuries centered on two main problems: the relation of the nature of Christ to that of God, and the relation between the divine and the human nature in the person of Christ. Arius (250—336) denied the eternity and absolute deity of Christ, and made Him the first and highest of created beings. The Council of Nicea (325) adopted a creed asserting that Jesus is of one substance (homoousios) with the Father. Apollinaris the Younger (d.c. 390), on the other hand, being especially concerned to maintain the deity of Christ, denied the integrity of His human nature. He taught that in the Incarnation the divine Logos was united with the purely animal elements present in human nature, without the mind or soul. Theodore of Mopsuestia (d. 428) and his pupil Nestorius (d. after 451) separated the divinity and humanity in Christ almost to the point of making Him into two persons, a view that was condemned by the Council of Ephesus in 431. Eutyches (d. after 454) held that although before the Incarnation there were two natures in Christ, at the Incarnation they were coalesced into one. The Council of Chalcedon in 451 formally defined the church's position, that in the person of Christ there was an abiding union of Godhood and humanity without the integrity of either being impaired: "one . . . Christ . . . in two natures, inconfusedly, unchangeably, indivisibly, inseparably."

Some of the earliest Seventh-day Adventists—for example, James White and Joseph Bates—had formerly been members of the "Christian Connection" (later part of the Congregational Christian Church, now merged into the United Church of Christ), a church that at that time held to a form of the Arian belief concerning Christ's nature. These people did not deny that Christ was divine, the Creator of heaven and earth, Son of God, Lord, and Saviour; they mostly argued that the terms "Son" and "Father" indicated that the Son had a beginning, even though in the inconceivably remote past. Upon becoming SDAs they retained this belief, which found expression in their writings. But not all Seventh-day Adventists held this view, and it was not an essential part of the SDA doctrine. For nearly a half century, difference of opinion on this point persisted, but open controversy was avoided and the anti-Trinitarian view died a natural death. The two leading anti-Trinitarians, James White and Uriah Smith, changed their opinions considerably. James White, for instance, had at first rejected the "old trinitarian" idea "that Jesus Christ is the very and Eternal God" (Review and Herald 3:52, Aug. 5, 1852), although he believed in Christ's divinity (ibid. 4:66, Sept. 8, 1853); he later wrote that SDAs "hold the divinity of Christ so nearly with the trinitarian" position that very little real difference existed (ibid. 48:116, Oct. 12, 1876), and that the Son "was equal with the Father in creation, in the institution of law, and in the government of created intelligences" (ibid. 56:56, July 15, 1880). Uriah Smith, in the first edition of his Thoughts on Revelation (1867, p. 59), called the preexistent Christ "the first created being." But he soon came more nearly into harmony with his brethren by modifying this statement by the time the first combined edition of Daniel and the Revelation came out (1882), in which he explained (p. 488) that the Only-begotten of God could hardly be "any being created in the ordinary sense of that term." He later spoke against degrading Christ to a created being (Looking Unto Jesus, [1898], p. 12). Other early Adventist leaders who showed Arian tendencies were J. H. Waggoner, his son, E. J. Waggoner, and W. W. Prescott, who, as late as 1896 (Review and Herald 73:232, Apr. 14, 1896), spoke of Christ as having had two births—one in eternity, and one in the flesh.

Early SDA anti-Trinitarians opposed the Trinitarian concept on the basis that such a belief was contrary to common sense and to NT statements indicating Christ's subordination to the Father, that it was of pagan origin, and that it depreciated the personality of Christ and the importance of His vicarious death. It was largely through the writings of Ellen White that the Trinitarian view finally prevailed. Although never trained in the intricacies of theology, she carefully avoided, through the years, the pitfalls of the Christological controversies of past generations.

She apparently did not find it necessary to take issue with her close associates on Christology, but she repeatedly asserted Christ's equality with God, as early as 1869, and increasingly in the 1870s and 1880s (1869: 2T 200; 1875: 3T 566; 1880: 4T 458; and many other statements). She described Christ as "the Majesty of heaven, . . . equal with God" (1883: 1SM 69); "Sovereign of heaven, one in power and authority with the Father" (1888:

GC 459); “of one substance, possessing the same attributes” with the Father (Signs of the Times 20:54, Nov. 27, 1893); “the only-begotten Son of God, who was with the Father from eternal ages” (1895: FE 382); “The Lord God . . . clothed with the habiliments of humanity” (1895: FE 379); “Infinite and omnipotent”; “the eternal, self-existent Son” (Ev 615). In her masterpiece The Desire of Ages (1898) she wrote: “In Christ is life, original, unborrowed, underived” (DA 530; also in an article of the year before, Signs of the Times 23:214, Apr. 8, 1897). Later, she said: “He did not cease to be God when He became man. . . . The Godhead was still His own” (1903: Ellen G. White, in SDACom 5:1129). In 1906 she wrote: “Christ was God essentially, and in the highest sense. He was with God from all eternity,” “a distinct person, yet one with the Father” (Review and Herald 83:8, Apr. 5, 1906).

With reference to the relationship between the two natures, she declared that Christ “did not cease to be God when He became a man. The human did not take the place of the divine, nor the divine of the human. . . . The two expressions . . . were, in Christ, closely and inseparably one, and yet they had a distinct individuality” (Signs of the Times 25:2, May 10, 1899).

Overemphasis on the deity of Christ is sometimes pressed to the point that it obscures His real and true humanity, with the result that He ceases to be an example of how we in our humanity can, through Him, overcome as He overcame.

“It would have been an almost infinite humiliation for the Son of God to take man’s nature, even when Adam stood in his innocence in Eden. But Jesus accepted humanity when the race had been weakened by four thousand years of sin. Like every child of Adam He accepted the results of the working of the great law of heredity” (DA 49).

“Our Saviour took humanity, with all its liabilities. He took the nature of man, with the possibility of yielding to temptation. We have nothing to bear which He has not endured” (ibid. 117).

Christ was tempted by Satan as we are tempted, but “on not one occasion was there a response to his manifold temptations” (Ellen G. White, in SDACom 5:1129).

“He took upon Himself human nature, and was tempted in all points as human nature is tempted. He could have sinned; He could have fallen, but not for one moment was there in Him an evil propensity” (ibid. 5:1128).

He was tempted “like as we are, yet without sin” (Heb. 4:15).

Chronology

CHRONOLOGY. Seventh-day Adventists always have been interested in biblical chronology, both historical and prophetic. The founders had participated in the Millerite movement, and had belonged to the segment that after 1844 still held that the 2300 prophetic days of Dan. 8:14 were fulfilled on Oct. 22, 1844, although they abandoned the Second Advent as the expected event for that day. Seventh-day Adventists believe that no time prophecies extend beyond the 2300 days; they thus set no dates for the Second Advent.

In historical biblical chronology, SDA scholars generally hold that the time statements in the Bible are valid but not necessarily all-inclusive; that exact B.C. dates cannot be assigned, for example, to the Creation or to any biblical events before the time of the later Hebrew kings (see SDACom 1:196). Formerly, SDA publications, like others, cited Ussher's seventeenth-century chronology (as printed in Bible margins since 1701); this scheme was once useful, as an approximation for the later periods of biblical history, but is now superseded by better attested dates in historical chronology as established by archaeology, and in some cases fixed by astronomy. Newer denominational textbooks employ these more exact findings. Seventh-day Adventists do not, however, accept the vast periods of the prehistoric time scale based on the evolutionary theory (see Evolution).

SDA scholars have made contributions to knowledge in the field of biblical and historical chronology—for example, Edwin R. Thiele, The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1951), a Judah-Israel chronology; and Siegfried H. Horn and Lynn H. Wood, The Chronology of Ezra 7 (Washington, D.C.: Review and Herald, 1953). There are several summaries and discussions of biblical and historical chronology in this Reference Series (see SDACom 1:174—196; 2:36, 77, 124—164; 3:45, 85—110, 326—327; 4:17—24; 5:227—266; 6:97—107; also SDADic, “Chronology”). Chuharkana Hospital Dispensary

CHUHARKANA HOSPITAL DISPENSARY. A medical institution operated variously as a clinic, a dispensary, and a hospital, at Chuharkana Mandi, about 30 miles (50 kilometers) west of Lahore in Pakistan, by the Pakistan Union.

Seventh-day Adventist medical work in the area began in 1914, when F. H. Loasby and V. L. Mann, a physician, toured the villages surrounding Lahore Punjab by oxcart, preaching and treating the sick. When it was decided to establish a medical center to which the sick could be brought and where workers could be trained to operate village dispensaries, land was purchased in 1916 at Chuharkana. During the next two years bungalows, a hospital, and a dispensary building were erected. Dr. Olive Smith and her husband were called to assist and later to succeed Dr. Mann, who returned to the United States in 1919. Dr. Smith became ill and left in 1920, and with no other doctor available, E. R. Reynolds, a young licentiate with some medical training, took charge of the dispensary until Ilma Dowling, an Australian nurse, arrived. In 1923 the hospital building was converted into a school, and only the dispensary work was continued. However, from 1930 to 1936, SDA medical services were available to the residents of the area at Chichoki Mallian, 15 miles (25 kilometers) from Chuharkana, where Dr. R. C. Lindholm was operating a hospital.

In 1946 Dr. Carrie J. A. Robbins, and her husband, C. W. Robbins, arrived in Chuharkana and opened a hospital there. In 1949 C. W. Robbins died, and a short time later Dr. Robbins returned to the United States. Robert Shrewsbury, M.D., succeeded her and developed the hospital into a 20-bed unit. After he left in 1955, the medical work again was limited to a dispensary, with K. E. Deweltz and his wife in charge.

In 1968 the Deweltz family departed, and since that time the institution has been limited to a school clinic staffed by a faculty nurse. See also Pakistan Adventist Seminary.

Church (local organization)

CHURCH (local organization). The basic organizational unit of the church at large, a group of baptized believers united by their common faith (see Church, Nature of), and also by an organization based on the New Testament pattern of church government. The local Seventh-day Adventist church acts either through its elders, deacons, and other officers constituting the church board, or by vote of the whole congregation, in matters of local administration, the admission and dropping of members, the operation of a church school, and the election of its officers. It works in cooperation with its pastor, who guides the church activities, and it belongs to a group of churches organized into a conference, under relations defined in the constitution and bylaws of the conference (or mission, or some other such unit). The handbook for the guidance of the local church is the Church Manual.

I. Church Membership

I. Church Membership. 1. Admission. There are three prerequisites for admission to membership in the Seventh-day Adventist Church: (1) conversion, (2) acceptance of the principles and doctrines of the SDA Church, (3) baptism by immersion. Those complying with these prerequisites are granted membership by vote of the members. For those requesting admission by baptism, the vote may be taken prior to baptism (that is “subject to baptism”) or after baptism. Those requesting membership who have previously been baptized by immersion may be received on their profession of faith. In this category come those who have been members of other denominations that practice baptism by immersion, and who wish to be received on their former baptism. SDAs whose membership records are unavailable may also be received on profession of faith. In their case, a careful study is made of the circumstances, usually in consultation with the conference president. If it is found that the person applying for membership on profession of faith is still a member of another church in the denomination, he or she cannot be received unless granted a letter from the church to which he or she belongs (see “Transfer of Membership” below). If the church refuses such a letter and the member regards the refusal as unfair, he or she may appeal to the conference committee. Rebaptism is required of those who have been disfellowshipped and wish to regain their membership.

Because church membership involves a spiritual relationship to God and to humanity, only those who have experienced regeneration should seek entrance into the church. The minister is urged to give due emphasis to this requirement.

Candidates for baptism are fully instructed in the church’s doctrinal beliefs and the principles of conduct, which are summarized in the Church Manual (1990 ed., pp. 179—182). Preceding baptism, the candidates, in the presence of the church, or, if that is not practicable, before the church board, take the baptismal vow as given in the Church Manual (1990 ed., pp. 44, 45).

2. Transfer of Membership. Church members moving to a new locality where they expect to stay longer than six months are expected to transfer membership to the church near their new location or, if there is no church nearby, to the conference church. They make request for transfer to the clerk of the church they desire to join; the clerk then notifies the clerk of the church where membership is held, who transmits the notification, through the minister or church elder, to the church board. If the board deems these members to be in good and regular standing, the request for transfer is presented to the church the first time in what is called a first reading, that is, the first presenting of the members' names in a duly called meeting of the church (usually the Sabbath service). Upon a second reading, usually a week later, a vote on whether to grant a letter of transfer is taken. The interval allows opportunity for any objection, which is usually made privately to the pastor or elder.

The letter, if granted, is sent to the clerk of the church the member proposes to join. There the member's request is submitted through the pastor or elder to the church board, and finally to the church, which votes on the request after a second reading, as in the case of the church granting the letter. If the vote is affirmative, the member is enrolled as a member and a notification is returned to the clerk of the church from which the member has been transferred. Until the clerk receives this notification of acceptance the member retains his or her former membership. If because of disrupted communications it is impossible to receive a letter from the member's previous church, the local church may accept the member by vote without a letter after taking counsel with the local conference or mission.

If a church declines to receive a member seeking admission by letter, the clerk returns the letter to the church that issued it, with a full explanation for the refusal of membership.

Letters are not granted to members who are under church discipline (qualifying statements being out of order). Under no circumstances may a letter be granted or accepted by a church without the request of the member involved. Members can never be added or removed (except in case of death) without a vote of the church. On the dismissal of members, see Church Discipline.

II. Church Administration

II. Church Administration. Every church member has a voice in electing the local church officers, who, with the pastor, lead in the administration of church affairs.

1. Pastor. The pastor is primarily the spiritual leader of the church, but is also the leader and adviser of the officers, ranking above the local elder, and is usually the chair of the church board. But the pastor is not an elected officer of the church; all pastors and assistant pastors are appointed by the executive committee of the conference (or mission) to which the church belongs. The minister is responsible for the church services and for the planning of all church activities, with the assistance of the elders. If the pastor is a licensed minister (see Licentiate) rather than an ordained minister, the local elder presides at the Lord's Supper and at business meetings, but an ordained minister presides at all meetings unless that individual appoints the elder to do so on occasion. The pastor leads and instructs the officers and the membership in evangelistic activities.

2. Church Officers. The church elder(s) and the deacon(s) are the leaders in the spiritual and practical functions, respectively. Other general officers are deaconess(es), church clerk, and church treasurer. Under some circumstances a very small or incompletely organized church may have a church leader instead of an elder. The Sabbath school and other auxiliary organizations and departments of the church have their own officers, but all are elected annually by vote of the church.

In the broadest sense the term church officers includes all persons chosen in the annual church election. Following is a typical list:

- Elder or elders
- Deacon or deacons
- Deaconess or deaconesses
- Clerk

Such other officers as the church may deem advisable

Officers are elected annually. Nominations are made by a nominating committee that is chosen by a special committee elected by vote of the church. This special committee may be chosen in one of two ways: By nominations from the floor or by voting to authorize the church board, together with five to seven persons nominated from the floor, to recommend the personnel of the nominating committee. The nominating committee prepares a list of names to submit to the church for officers and assistants. Any member of the church may appear before the committee during its sessions to make suggestions or objections. When the nominating committee is ready to render its report, the report of this committee may be presented at the Sabbath service or at a specially called meeting of the church.

It is the right of any member to raise an objection to the nominating committee's report. He may move that the whole report be referred back to the committee for further consideration. If the motion carries, the member making the objection, or any other member who desires to do so, may appear before the committee to make objections to any name. When the committee makes its final report to the church, the church proceeds to vote. The election is by the majority vote of those present and voting.

If an office of the church becomes vacant during the year, the church board nominates a successor to fill the vacancy and submits the nomination to the church for election.

For the beginnings of local church officers in the Seventh-day Adventist Church, see Church Elder; Deacon; Organization.

3. Church Board. The representative administrative body of the local church is the church board, elected annually. It customarily includes the elder or elders, the head deacon, the head deaconess, the treasurer, the clerk, the personal ministries leader, the personal ministries secretary, the Sabbath school superintendent, the Community Services leader, the AYS leader, and such other members as may be deemed advisable. The pastor serves as chair, but may arrange for the elder to preside at the board meeting. The number that will constitute a quorum should be determined at a church business meeting. It is recommended that church board meetings be held at least once a month.

The church board, as the governing body of the church, considers details of the church business, is concerned with anything that pertains to the spiritual life of the members, and is responsible for coordinating the various activities of the church. It may delegate authority to persons or committees. It receives requests for letters of transfer and makes recommendations to the church concerning the names, but it cannot disfellowship members, grant letters of transfer, or receive or dismiss members; that must be done by vote of the church.

4. Church Business Meetings. Church business meetings are held annually, or may be called more often as the need may arise. They are customarily announced in advance at a regular Sabbath morning service. Any matters pertaining to the business or other affairs of the church are taken up, and, in addition, in the annual meeting, reports may be received from the church clerk, reporting on membership and perhaps certain board actions; the personal ministries secretary, on the missionary activities of the church; the treasurer, on funds received and disbursed for the church; the deacons on visitation and any other matters that come under their care; the Adventist Youth Society secretary, on the activities of the society; the Sabbath school secretary on membership and other Sabbath school items; the principal or teachers on any developments in the church school; and the Home and School Fellowship leader on the activities and needs of that organization.

The pastor usually presides at church business meetings, although an elder may do so. The routine operations of the church are directed by the church board, but major items are taken to the church business meetings, usually after study by the board.

III. Organizing or Disbanding a Church

III. Organizing or Disbanding a Church. 1. Procedure of Organizing. The formation of a new church is presided over by an ordained minister—either the president of the conference or mission or a minister designated by him. If among the group desiring to form a church there are members of the conference church or of other SDA churches, these should bring with them to the meeting of organization letters of transfer from their churches. Such persons form the nucleus of the new church, and vote on the names of persons joining the Seventh-day Adventist Church for the first time. If there are none with previous church membership, then, under the direction of the presiding minister, three newly baptized believers of good reputation are selected by the officiating minister to form the nucleus, and they proceed to vote on the names of the other candidates for membership. Each of these, upon being voted in, may vote on accepting the remaining candidates.

When all have been received into membership, a nominating committee is chosen, with the officiating minister as chair, to bring in names for the various offices to be filled. After election of the officers and the ordination of the elder and deacon (if not already ordained), an action may then be taken requesting the conference (or its equivalent unit) to receive the new church into the family of churches at its next session. For the organization of a company as a preliminary step toward organizing a church, see Company.

As early as 1883, it was recognized (Review and Herald 60:393, June 19, 1883) that, in order to safeguard the unity of the church, a local church body should be organized only in consultation with the state conference committee. Before any conference organizations existed, only an ordained minister was considered competent to perform the work of organization. For some years a key step in the procedure of church organization was the signing of a church covenant by the charter members. A typical early procedure is that outlined in the 1861 “Address” submitted to the newly organized Michigan Conference (see Review and Herald 18:156, Oct. 15, 1861).

2. A Union of Two Churches. Sometimes a new church is formed by the union of two existing congregations. For such a step, approval of the conference committee is first obtained, and then a meeting of each church is called, the conference president or the pastor presiding, that each church may vote on the proposed union. After an affirmative vote by both churches, they hold a joint meeting under the leadership of the conference president or someone appointed by the conference. A written agreement is drawn up, stating the conditions of union (such as disposal of property, financial obligations, the name of the new church, etc.) and providing for release from office of all the officers of both churches. After this, a nominating committee brings in names for officers of the united church, and a copy of the agreement is filed with the local conference.

No member of either church may be dropped at the time of the uniting. The new church is then received into the conference at its next session.

3. Disbanding a Church. Churches may be disbanded because of loss of members, for disciplinary reasons, or for apostasy. When loss of members threatens the existence of the church, the conference committee customarily takes action recommending its disbanding. Before such a step is taken, the remaining members are given opportunity to transfer their membership to other churches, either by letters voted by the church, if enough members remain, or upon recommendation of the conference committee.

Rarely is a church disbanded for disciplinary reasons. The conference studies the proposal to disband and presents the case to the union committee; then the matter is referred to the church in question. Action to disband should be by a majority vote of the members.

In a case of apostasy of a majority of the members of a church, or their refusal to submit to order and discipline, the conference committee customarily presents a statement of the case to a conference session, which, by majority vote, may expel the offending church from the sisterhood of churches. If there are remaining loyal members, they may establish a new church or be recommended for membership in other churches by vote of the conference committee.

IV. Denomination-wide Relationships

IV. Denomination-wide Relationships. The local church aids the pastor in evangelism, and under the pastor's leadership and under the counsel of departmental leaders from the conference and higher organizations it carries on lay evangelism and other local activities; and it is the local church that receives the new recruits into a fellowship of worship and work that embraces older members, new members, and prospective members. But the local church is an integral part of a worldwide organization.

A group of local churches forms a conference (or mission, or section, or otherwise named unit); and a group of these units forms a union conference. The unions, grouped under divisions, form the General Conference organization.

The church, being a constituent unit of a conference, participates in conducting the conference affairs by sending its delegates to the biennial sessions to help elect the conference officers and other members of the conference executive committee and to transact business. In this standing conference committee is vested the delegated authority of all the constituent churches.

The local churches send their tithes and offerings, except those funds given for local expenses, to the conference (or mission, or other such unit), and the conference provides the pastors and evangelists. The conference holds title to all local church properties, and the conference and higher units of organization may contribute to building funds and to the operation of the church school.

The conference president is the chief elder, or overseer, of all the churches, and each of them has access to the president's counsel and to the counsel of the departmental secretaries of the conference. Local church schools are under the guidance of a conference educational superintendent. Union and General conference leaders and departmental staffs furnish counsel and promote projects for the work of the local church. Thus the local unit bears responsibilities toward, and receives aid from, the entire church body.

Church (territorial organization)

CHURCH (territorial organization). In some parts of the world, a term used in phrases such as the Bulgarian church, Spanish church, or the Seventh-day Adventist Church in Canada, designating the units of SDA organization in those respective areas. More commonly such organizational units are designated as conference, mission, section, or field.

Church and State

CHURCH AND STATE. The Seventh-day Adventist denomination from its very beginning has been a staunch advocate of church-state separation, especially in the United States, where there is clear constitutional provision for such separation, holding that the distinction between church and state is drawn in the New Testament: “Render therefore unto Caesar the things which are Caesar’s; and unto God the things that are God’s” (Matt. 22:21). On the one hand, civil government is ordained of God (Rom. 13:1—4); therefore, whether the civil authority is wielded by a Christian, a Jew, a Muslim, or a pagan, it finds its source in God; all citizens are under the protection of, and are subject to, the civil power. Civil government’s legitimate concern relates to temporal affairs; the Bible says that in this sphere it is ordained by God. On the other hand, the church was given spiritual authority, and Christ was careful to emphasize that the authority of the church was distinct from temporal power (Matt. 18:17, 18; John 18:36). Only those citizens who have professed allegiance to Christ can be counted as subjects of the spiritual kingdom of Christ. The church concerns itself, as a matter of priority, with the soul and conscience of the individual.

History reveals that frequently the state has used the church to gain its ends and that conversely, in other instances, the church has dominated the state. In either case persecution has resulted. Therefore, Seventh-day Adventists believe that the distinctly different purposes of Caesar’s kingdom and of Christ’s kingdom are best achieved when neither is subservient to the other and neither encroaches in the area that belongs to the other.

The 1948 Autumn Council of the General Conference Committee issued the following statements regarding church and state relationships: “We believe in civil government as divinely ordained to protect men in the enjoyment of their natural rights, and to rule in civil things, and that in this realm it is entitled to the respectful and willing obedience of all.

“We believe that all legislation which unites church and state is subversive of human rights, potentially persecuting in character, and opposed to the best interests of the church and of the state: and therefore, that it is not within the province of human government to enact such legislation.

“We believe it to be our duty to use every lawful and honorable means to prevent the enactment of legislation which tends to unite church and state, and to oppose every movement toward such union, that all may enjoy the inestimable blessings of religious liberty . . .” (Actions of the Autumn Council of the General Conference Committee [1948], p. 13).

The committee passed the following resolutions: “Relation of Church and State. WHEREAS, ‘The union of the church with the state, be the degree never so slight, while it may appear to bring the world nearer to the church, does in reality but bring the church nearer to the world’ (GC 297), and,

“WHEREAS, The state should never invade the distinctive realm of the church to affect in any way the complete freedom of conscience, or the right to profess, practice, and promulgate religious beliefs; and the church should never invade the distinctive realm of the state,

“We recommend, 1. That we, the representatives of the Seventh-day Adventist Church in biennial Autumn Council assembled, reaffirm our full belief in the historic doctrine of the separation of church and state, and our resolute purpose as a church to maintain that doctrine unimpaired in our relations with all earthly governments, remembering always that the trend toward union may be gradual and subtle.

“Loyalty to Government: WHEREAS, Governments have been set up among men, under God, to regulate human relationships (Rom. 13:1—3; 1 Peter 2:13—17); and,

“WHEREAS, Civil government includes the exercise of the police powers inherent in sovereignty, to prevent whatever may jeopardize the health, morals, safety and general welfare of society;

“We recommend, That we reaffirm our loyalty to civil government, pledging our sincere obedience to its laws, and praying for the peace of the country and for all those in authority. That we reaffirm, however, at the same time, our inalienable right to worship God according to the dictates of our own conscience and to promulgate our religious beliefs among all men (Acts 5:29; Mark 16:15)” (ibid., pp. 14, 15).

Church-State Separation in the United States. The Constitution of the United States erected safeguards to ensure the separation of church and state—a policy rare among eighteenth-century governments—and this separation has promoted prosperity and harmony for both the churches and the civil government in the United States.

Separation of church and state is most often tested where money is involved. Complete separation of church and state means that state money, which is tax money, is intended for the support of legal and recognized activities that belong to the state. It means that church money, the tithes and offerings of believers, is intended for the support of the religious activities of the church.

Church Schools and the State. Perhaps the greatest area of concern in church-state relations in the United States is in education. As the number of students has multiplied, and as the cost of education has increased, church-affiliated institutions have found it increasingly difficult to support their schools. When government funds became available, the temptation was great for the church to accept them.

The argument against the use of government funds for a church-controlled school is twofold:

1. These government funds, received through the taxing power of the state, would be used to teach religious doctrines in which many of the taxpayers do not believe.

2. Control usually follows subsidy. If the church school accepted state money, it would sooner or later have to accept an unwarranted degree of government control.

When a religious organization tries to dip into the public treasury to support its church school system (teach its distinctive beliefs), it invites the state to trespass in an area that belongs to God and not to Caesar. Parents who refuse the education public schools offer their children and patronize a religious school, in the United States at least, should assume the responsibility of financing that religious-oriented education.

Therefore, to protect religious freedom the Seventh-day Adventist Church opposes the use of government funds to teach religion. The official action of the General Conference regarding state aid to SDA schools reads: "WHEREAS, The Seventh-day Adventist Church in the United States is in full accord with the principles of the separation of church and state as set forth in the federal Constitution, and has through the years supported this principle;

"We recommend, That in the United States the denominational policy for our schools of all grades shall be to refrain from accepting gifts of money, land, buildings, or equipment from government; or grants from public tax money for the salaries of teachers; or the maintenance, operation, or support of the services that the schools supply.

"This shall not be construed to prejudice the acceptance of the regular functions of the Public Health Department, such as public health nurses' services, vaccinations, inoculations, or tuberculosis surveys; nor shall it forbid the acquisition, for a consideration, of war surplus" (ibid. [1949], p. 26).

Medical Institutions. The same principles apply to the church's medical institutions. In the official action referring to the medical work a careful distinction is made between capital development and operating expenses. The policy reads: "WHEREAS, Our medical institutions are an integral part of our denominational program;

"We recommend, 1. That in the United States our medical institutions refrain from accepting any government aid for operating or maintaining these institutions.

"2. That inasmuch as our medical institutions render a recognized service to the medical needs of the communities in which they are located, government grants for capital development may be accepted. However, it shall be understood that a grant shall be received only after careful study by the operating board, and approval by the union and General Conference committees" (ibid., pp. 26, 27).

A Complex Situation. Relations between church and state in recent years have been distinguished by an ever-increasing complexity of new problems for which no precedent exists. Frequently it is difficult to discover the line between involvement and separation, for instance, in the proposals of government loans at low interest to parochial schools, tax exemption for tuition payments to church schools, the donation of government equipment to church-affiliated college laboratories, government subsidies for teaching certain subjects in private colleges, and other plans, such as tuition vouchers paid from tax funds to be used by parents or students at the schools of their choice.

Areas in which church-state problems may be encountered include public aid to sectarian schools; religious exercises in public schools; shared time or released time for religious instruction; censorship; chaplaincies; divorce; birth control; Sunday laws; ambassador to and from the Holy See; tax exemption for church properties; government aid to church and clergy; immigration quotas and naturalization requirements; military service; state aid to church-affiliated charity and welfare organizations; adoption regulations; and nondiscrimination in church employment.

In many countries of the world additional difficulties between church and state are: Saturday attendance at state schools, compulsory religious services in the armed forces, restrictions on the holding of religious services, evangelistic work, sale of religious literature, baptism of converts, operation of religious institutions, visits by church leaders living in other countries, and publishing of religious literature.

Principles and Application. SDAs support the principle of church-state separation, even though in the application of the principle in the complex issues and conditions of many lands they allow differences in practice. Where church-state separation does not exist or where, as in some countries, the governments to a large extent depend on Christian mission institutions to render public services in educational or medical areas, subsidies are accepted. It is recognized, however, that the acceptance of aid involves the risk of encountering government control or of a setback through the sudden loss of the financial aid. In some countries, governments have given land and property for institutions, or have aided in the operation of schools, hospitals, or clinics where such facilities would otherwise be lacking, or where the medical help or welfare work was greatly needed for the benefit of the local people.

Regarding the application of the principle of church-state separation in other countries the General Conference Executive Committee in the Autumn Council of 1948 recommended: “That we reaffirm our belief that this fundamental principle of the separation of church and state should be worldwide in application; recognizing, however, that the applying of certain details of the principle may be different in different parts of the world, due to varied forms of government.

“That in view of these considerations, it must, therefore, be left to the discretion of Division Committees to determine just how this principle shall be applied in their respective fields; but maintaining that in any overlapping of activities, the state should not enter the spiritual realm of the church nor the church the civil rights of the state” (Action of the Autumn Council of the General Conference Committee [1948], p. 14).

Thus, although there may be differences in application, the basic Seventh-day Adventist doctrine is the same around the globe: The church member is a loyal citizen, rendering to his or her government “the things that are Caesar’s,” and he or she is equally a loyal follower of Christ, rendering to his or her Maker “the things that are God’s.” The church asks religious liberty for its members and for all others. It regards its function as that of calling people to their duty toward God and fellow humans and to their privileges as children of God—not as that of gaining preferred position or material advantage from the state. See also Religious Liberty; Sunday Laws.

Church Buildings

CHURCH BUILDINGS. Throughout their history Seventh-day Adventists have erected various types of church buildings. The first church in which a group of Adventists became Sabbathkeepers in 1844 was one erected in 1842 or 1843 by the Christian Brethren of Washington, New Hampshire. (A group of 15 organized the SDA church there in 1862, but it was many years before Seventh-day Adventists had full ownership of the building.)

This church is a simple rectangular frame building 30' x 40' (9 m. x 12 m.), with clapboard exterior and a plain gable roof. There are two separate entrance doors at the front, leading into a small vestibule, from which two more doors open into the church auditorium, and a narrow stairway leads up to a small balcony. The interior walls are plastered, and there is a series of plain glass windows on two sides, one of which overlooks the church cemetery about 75 feet (25 meters) away. The church seats about 120.

This simple style of architecture is typical of many early SDA church buildings. Even in Battle Creek, Michigan, where SDAs had the largest numbers, the first three church buildings, erected 1855, 1857, and 1866, and the first Review and Herald building were constructed in the same simple architectural style as the Washington, New Hampshire, church.

The large central church in Battle Creek, called the Dime Tabernacle, built 1878—1879, was finished outside with a brick veneer over frame construction. There was a tall spire, or belfry, a balcony, and a basement. Movable partitions in the main auditorium permitted the closing off of certain sections for committee rooms when the building was used for General Conference sessions. There were four entrances, one at each corner. The building, 130' x 105' (40 m. x 32 m.) and seating 3,200 people, burned in 1922, and has been replaced by a substantial light-brick, square-looking building of modest but dignified design.

Seventh-day Adventists never developed a distinctive style of architecture. In fact, variety in style and design is the vogue in churches, educational buildings, sanitariums, publishing houses, and conference buildings. However, the newer buildings are much more functional than their earlier prototypes. The larger churches are designed to care not only for the spiritual but also for the social and educational needs of its members. Such buildings are equipped with modern conveniences such as baptistries, with heated water; air conditioning; acoustical systems so all can hear the speaker; glassed-in noise-proof rooms in which mothers with small children may see and hear the services; separate rooms for Sabbath school classes; offices for the pastor and treasurer; perhaps libraries and auxiliary rooms with kitchens for cooking classes or social occasions, and in some cases rooms for elementary schools and Community Services rooms for the missionary activities of the church.

The building may be of stone, of a simplified Neo-Gothic design, with open vaulted ceiling, buttresses, and colored rose window. The Alexandria, Virginia, church is an example of brick Colonial, while the church in Grasonville, Maryland, is of ultramodern design, with a tall, pointed roof descending almost to the ground on the sides. Brick and cement block, built around a steel frame, are commonly used in the newer buildings. The Covina, California, church, a modern structure, is built with its church school and other accommodations around an open court.

In various countries institutional architecture is determined largely by the means available, the climate, and the building-construction methods of each country, ranging from the simplest forms of thatch and bamboo, through sunbaked brick, frame construction, and stucco; and in Europe brick or stone from traditional to very modern pattern, the cross forming a part of the design. The beliefs of the church are reflected in certain features of its buildings, such as the absence of altars and the presence of baptistries for immersion.

Church Calendar

CHURCH CALENDAR. Special days designated annually by the General Conference to be observed by the churches for the study or promotion of the work of the various departments of the church, and for the receiving of offerings for specified purposes. (Seventh-day Adventists do not follow the church year, or Christian year, used by the liturgical churches and increasingly by other denominations.)

In the preparation of the calendar, ordinarily the General Conference departments make their recommendations to the Annual Council, and if there are any special problems involved, a committee of the General Conference studies the recommendations before they are presented to the council. After being passed by the council, the list is published from time to time in the various church papers and annually in the Yearbook.

The plan goes back at least to Nov. 14, 1918, when the General Conference Committee, on the recommendation of the treasurer and the departmental secretaries of the General Conference, voted 11 special offerings to be received in the ensuing year, for Intensive Training, European Relief, Rural Schools, Religious Liberty, Colored Work, Midsummer and Annual Offerings (for missions), and four Thirteenth Sabbath Offerings. Five special days were set apart for the Missionary Volunteer Department, Medical Department, Sabbath School Rally, and the Education Department (two). Much earlier than that the fourth (now the first) Sabbath of each month was designated for the promotion of local missionary work, and the second Sabbath for the promotion of worldwide missions.

By 1923 there were 23 special days, weeks, and offerings designated in the calendar, and on Apr. 25, 1935, it was noted by the General Conference that the calendar was becoming overcrowded, and the plan was restudied. However, the calendar for 1965 listed 39 special days, weeks, and offerings, in addition to the four Thirteenth Sabbath Offerings taken in the Sabbath school.

Church Clerk

CHURCH CLERK. A local church officer who is the secretary of all the business meetings of the church, including its board meetings, and keeps up to date the church record book containing a record of these meetings and the membership list. The clerk adds or drops names from the membership list, but only by vote of the church (except when a member dies, then the clerk records the date of death without church action). The clerk also carries on the correspondence in connection with transfer of members to or from other churches.
