In addition, the clerk keeps a record of special services, fills out the credentials for delegates to the conference session, and furnishes certain reports requested by the conference, among these, reports of membership from the clerk's records.

Church Communication Secretary

CHURCH COMMUNICATION SECRETARY. A local church's representative in its relations with the public through the use of the press and other news-distributing agencies.

If several churches in a city arrange for a central publicity committee, each communication secretary may be a member, and works in harmony with any general plan that will best facilitate the handling of news for the several churches.

Church Compass

CHURCH COMPASS (Kyohoi Chinam) (1916— ; monthly; published by Korean Publishing House in Seoul, Korea). The official organ of the Korean Seventh-day Adventist Church. This 44-page Korean language magazine contains Korean Seventh-day Adventist Church religious news and inspiration, “Week of Prayer” readings for church members, and promotional material for all departments of the organization.

The Church Compass was launched on Jan. 20, 1916. In December 1941, during the period of Japanese occupation, its name was changed to Church Guide. In August of 1941 the publication was discontinued. In December 1945, soon after Japanese occupation ceased, publication began again.

The present format was adopted in July 1969. It originally contained the general articles and the Morning Watch devotional articles. It was later separated into general articles from the Morning Watch devotional book according to the needs of the Korean church. The Church Compass consecutive numbers are no. 1 through no. 834 through December 1993.

Church Development Service

CHURCH DEVELOPMENT SERVICE. A service developed to provide fund-raising counseling and direction to local Seventh-day Adventist churches throughout North America. The first such service was established in 1957 by the Southwestern Union Conference. William J. Hubert, with background experience in professional fund-raising, served as the director. The success of this program in aiding church and school construction led the General Conference Committee to establish such a service for the churches throughout the North American Division. Hubert was called to the General Conference to direct the training of personnel in the various local and union conferences for the establishment of this plan.

During the 1959 spring meeting the General Conference Committee adopted the title “Seventh-day Adventist Church Development Service” for this fund-raising service. An intensive training program was begun, and by the 1962 General Conference session 21 Church Development Service directors in union and local conferences of the North American Division had conducted every-member canvasses that raised more than $15 million for local conference and academy building projects.

In such a “directed” canvass the local church was provided with a director from the union or local conference office for a period of two to five weeks, depending on the size of the church. He was a denominational worker trained in counseling churches in approved methods to raise funds for capital improvement. The director, who was responsible for the supervision and management of the canvass, trained the lay leaders and the pastor in spiritual methods of fund-raising through the preparation, organization, education, and solicitation phases of an every-member-canvass program. To assure the successful collection of pledged funds, the director also maintained a close contact with the church through a follow-up service.

The Church Development Service not only helped the churches raise funds for building projects but also, through emphasis on education in stewardship, promoted increased interest in the general church program. Surveys revealed that such increased giving most often brought an increase in other offerings of the church.

The Church Development Service no longer exists, but the work is carried on by stewardship directors.

Church Discipline

CHURCH DISCIPLINE. The action of the church in dealing with erring members. After every effort to reclaim an erring member has failed, and discipline becomes necessary to preserve the reputation of the church, two procedures are open: a vote of censure or a vote to disfellowship (to drop from membership). A vote of censure is taken when the offense is considered serious enough to warrant the disapproval of the church but not grievous enough to warrant loss of membership. It is intended to impress the member with the need of amending his or her life and to grant a period of time to do so. This action may be taken at any duly called meeting of the church, and the offending member may be present. A member is placed under censure for a stated period of time, during which he or she cannot hold any church office, vote on church affairs, or have public part in any of the exercises of the church, such as teaching a Sabbath school class. He or she may not transfer membership to another church while under censure. If at the end of the period of censure the member gives evidence of satisfactory conduct, he or she will be considered in good standing; if not, his or her case must be reconsidered.

Among the causes for disfellowshipping are denial of faith in the fundamentals of the gospel and in the cardinal doctrines of the church; fraud or willful misrepresentation in business; disorderly conduct that brings reproach on the church; persistent refusal to recognize properly constituted church authority; the use, manufacture, or sale of alcoholic beverages; the use of tobacco or addiction to narcotic drugs; open violation of the law of God, such as worship of idols, murder, adultery, fornication, stealing, profanity, Sabbathbreaking, willful falsehood, and remarriage of divorced persons except the innocent party in a divorce for adultery.

No minister, church, or conference has the right to set up tests of fellowship other than those agreed upon by the entire church. Action to disfellowship may be taken only at a duly called meeting of the church and by majority vote. The church board cannot disfellowship, and the member has the right to be heard in his or her own defense. Members cannot be dropped for nonattendance at church services nor for failure to render financial support to the church.

The members are urged to manifest friendship and love toward a disfellowshipped member and endeavor to win that individual back. He or she may be reinstated upon confession, evidence of repentance and amendment of life, and after rebaptism.

The one who has been disfellowshipped has a right of appeal to the committee of the conference in which the church is located. If the conference feels that injustice has been done, it may recommend reinstatement. If the church declines to receive him or her, the conference may then recommend him or her to membership in some other church.

The disfellowshipping of members seems to have been practiced from the time churches were organized. In the Review and Herald of Nov. 25, 1851, James White reported that the brethren in Washington, New Hampshire, had withdrawn fellowship from one in doctrinal error (2:52). J. H. Waggoner in 1853 made an official statement in the Review and Herald concerning an action taken by the church at Alden, Illinois, withdrawing fellowship from a certain W. A. Raymond for an unchristian course taken, and for accusing the church of injustice. This was written in semilegal terms, and was ordered by, and in behalf of, the Alden church (4:184, Dec. 13, 1853).

Later W. H. Littlejohn stated that there is no such thing as “dropping names” in the Seventh-day Adventist Church. There are three methods only by which a name is removed from the church list: by death, by letter of transfer, or by “withdrawing the hand of fellowship” (ibid. 62:427, July 7, 1885).

Church Elder

CHURCH ELDER. The highest officer in the local church, outranked only by the minister. He or she is elected by the church for a term of one year, and may be reelected for additional terms. After the initial election, the elder must be ordained to the office by an ordained minister (see Ordination), but does not have to be reordained when accepting the same office in another church. The elder also may act as a deacon without ordination to that office.

In the absence of the pastor, the elder is responsible for the church services, either conducting them or arranging for them. The elder also may conduct the Communion service. While the pastor usually is chair of the church board, the local elder may act in that capacity if it seems advisable (see Church Manual [1990], pp. 57—61, 88).

The work of a local elder is confined to the church electing him or her, although the elder may serve more than one church if other churches elect him or her. By special arrangement with the president of the conference or mission the elder may conduct a baptismal service when an ordained minister is not available. The elder is not authorized to conduct the marriage ceremony.

It is the church elder's duty to foster all the activities of the church, to cooperate with the conference, to see that the various officers carry out their responsibilities, and that delegates to conference sessions are elected. The elder is not a delegate ex officio to such sessions.

The earliest Seventh-day Adventist churches did not elect elders; the deacon appears to have been the only church officer. But as early as 1854 Joseph Bates in an article "Church Order" spoke of two kinds of elders in the New Testament church: those who rule and those who preach the Word (Review and Herald 6:22, 23, Aug. 29, 1854). The next year J. B. Frisbie, a pioneer minister in Michigan, wrote, in a two-part article under the same title, of (1) the elders who had the spiritual oversight of all the churches—the "traveling elders"—and (2) the "local elders" who had the pastoral care of one church. These he distinguished from the deacons, who were to look after the temporal affairs of the church (ibid. 6:155, Jan. 9, 1855). In the January 23 issue (p. 164), in answer to a question by John Byington as to whether elders and deacons were to be appointed in every church, James White urged that the New Testament church order be adopted and that in "every church where the numbers, and talents, and graces of individuals are sufficient," the officers of the church should be appointed. Further articles on "Church Order" by Frisbie appeared in June and July 1856. In the Oct. 15, 1861, issue of the Review and Herald, an address on church organization by J. N. Loughborough, Moses Hull, and M. E. Cornell appears. They state in the introduction (28:156): "The subject of organization having been referred to us by the late general conference, with the request that we hold a Bible class thereon, and address you through the Review, we have accordingly had the subject under investigation, and submit the following thoughts for your consideration.

"In the address the election and ordination of elders as well as deacons in the churches are clearly prescribed" (ibid., pp. 156, 157).

A series of articles in 1874 by G. I. Butler, entitled “Thoughts on Church Government,” further defined the office and work of church elders. While the office of elder was recognized as the principal one in the church, his powers were regarded as merely advisory, since the body of the church was the deciding authority (ibid. 44:69, Aug. 18, 1874). However, “the work of correcting, admonishing, and overseeing in the church” belonged to the elder far more than to anyone else (ibid. 44:92, Sept. 8, 1874), and the minister and the members were to support the elder against gossip and against idle complaints (ibid. 44:101, Sept. 15, 1874).

In a later article by H. A. St. John, the chief duties of church elders were again delineated (ibid. 46:165, Nov. 25, 1875). They should visit the members and seek the wandering, baptize, and conduct the ordinances in the absence of the evangelist, and call business meetings before the conference session, at the close of the year, and at other times when necessary. If the church had no deacon, the elder was to act in his place, look after the Sabbath school, and attend all meetings if possible. Elders should keep records of their work and the meetings.

By 1885 the work of the church elder was defined very much as it is at the present time. For example, in the report of the General Conference proceedings, beginning Nov. 18, 1885, at Battle Creek (SDA Yearbook, 1886, p. 47), the rule was laid down that a local elder if reelected, or if properly elected as elder of another church, need not be reordained. Apparently this rule was not immediately followed universally, because as late as 1896 the following question and answer appeared in the Review and Herald: “If a local elder moves to another church and is there chosen elder, does he need to be reordained?” “Yes; we think he should be ordained again, because his ordinations are local” (Review and Herald 73:121, Feb. 25, 1896).

Church Government (or church polity)

CHURCH GOVERNMENT (or church polity). A system for directing the affairs of the church in an orderly manner. Only a primitive organization existed in the early Christian church, for the obvious reason that organization came only when the growth of the church demanded it. In the New Testament church the bond of union was the common faith of the believers and the personal guidance of apostles themselves. The Jews, who accepted Christ at first, worshiped at the Temple (Acts 2:46; 3:1) and separated from the body of Judaism only when forced to. But it was not long before an elementary church government was established.

The setting apart of Matthias to take the place of Judas might be considered the first organized act of the Christian church body (Acts 1:23—26). Another major act was the appointment of seven deacons for the ministry of tables as distinct from the ministry of the Word (Acts 6:1—8). The council at Jerusalem (Acts 15:6—29), sometimes referred to as the first General Conference, represented a significant concerted effort by the church.

Paul's instruction with regard to the office of elders (1 Tim. 3:1—7) and to that of deacons (vs. 8—13) revealed a developing organization. Two Greek words described the leaders selected to supervise the New Testament churches: presbuteros, "elder," referring to a position of dignity, and episkopos, "overseer," referring to the responsibility to superintend.

As the church expanded rapidly in the postapostolic period, and as churches united in given areas, the "overseers," or bishops, assumed wider powers, and in time archbishops appeared, exercising still wider authority. The papal system of church government was the outcome. The bishop of Rome held that his peculiar authority rested on divine origin and sanction. This system has also been called monarchical or hierarchical. In it the supreme power is vested in the pope, who is the head of the various orders of priesthood.

Other systems of church government that developed were:

1. The congregational system, sometimes called "independent." It has the highest powers residing in the local congregation. No other authority can legislate for it or direct its life.

2. The presbyterian system. This provides for government by elected representatives, by teaching elders (ministers), and by ruling elders (laymen), functioning in such representative bodies as presbyteries, synods, and a general assembly as the supreme governing body.

3. The episcopal system. This centers in the bishops, who are successors of the apostles and have governing power in the church.

The polity of the Seventh-day Adventist Church contains both presbyterian and congregational elements. Its authority springs from the members, whose representatives govern through a five-stage organization—local church, conference, union, division, and General Conference. Beyond the local church level there is limited lay representation in the governing bodies, but the local church, in which every member has a vote, has distinct prerogatives of its own. The polity may be described as a representative system. See Organization.

Church Leader

CHURCH LEADER. A term used to describe a person elected in a new or small church in which no one possesses the experience or qualifications is necessary for an elder, or no one with such experience or qualifications is willing to assume the position of elder. The leader is to be “responsible for the services of the church, including the business meetings. The leader must either conduct these or arrange for someone else to do so. A church leader may not preside at any of the church ordinances, administer baptism, conduct the Lord’s Supper, perform the marriage ceremony, or preside at business meetings when members are disciplined. A request should be made to the conference president for an ordained minister to preside at such meetings” (Church Manual [1990], p. 61).

Church Manual

CHURCH MANUAL. An official handbook, issued by the General Conference, dealing with matters of local church organization, services, and operation, church officers, church membership, standards of conduct, and relationships of the church to conference officers, and workers. The Church Manual is to be distinguished from the Manual for Ministers.

The first serious attempt at a church manual was made in 1882, when a committee consisting of W. H. Littlejohn, J. O. Corliss, and H. A. St. John was appointed by the General Conference to prepare a church manual, to be printed first serially for discussion and criticism (13 articles came out in the Review and Herald from June 5 to Aug. 28, 1883). It covered such matters as the organizing of churches; the duties of church officers; the admission, transferring, and dropping of members; church trials; and the conducting of quarterly business meetings and the ordinances. However, the next General Conference, in November 1883, decided against publishing a church manual because it was deemed to be undesirable to take any step that could be construed as leading to a creed or discipline other than the Bible, or toward formalism. G. I. Butler, president of the General Conference, explained the action taken, in an article in the Review and Herald (60:745, Nov. 27, 1883).

In subsequent years a number of books or pamphlets were published by different writers on the work of the church and the duties of church officers, the most important being J. N. Loughborough's The Church, Its Organization, Order and Discipline (1907), a personal undertaking, but long considered the standard manual on church order. It was not until 1932 that an official Seventh-day Adventist Church Manual appeared, issued by the General Conference.

Revisions in the Manual were made in 1934 and 1940 to keep the contents in step with the developments of the world work. An extensive revision was made in 1951. Concerning this, the preface to the 1951 edition states: "There are two reasons why a new revision of the manual is now being issued. One is that actions taken in the General Conference sessions of 1946 and of 1950 have made necessary some very significant changes in what was contained in previous editions of the manual. Another reason is that our work has grown so remarkably in various parts of the world, and is meeting problems peculiar to certain areas, that it was felt necessary to have a general church manual setting forth basic matters of denominational policy and practice, with certain details of local application left to the division committees to decide and to present to their workers in written form. The General Conference Committee, therefore, in its Autumn Council held at Denver, Colorado, October 18—27, 1948, authorized a complete revision of the Church Manual, and in doing so provided that each division of the General Conference might publish a supplement to it. The action was as follows:

"That this new Church Manual be the manual for the world field, and that the divisions take in hand the matter of making it available in the languages of their respective language areas.

“That each division, including the North American Division[,] of the world field prepare a “Supplement” to the new Church Manual, not in any way modifying it, but containing such additional matter as is applicable to the conditions and circumstances prevailing in the division; the manuscripts of these “Supplements” to be submitted to the General Conference Committee for endorsement before being printed (Autumn Council Actions [1948], p. 1187).’

“This revision has been prepared by a body of men appointed by the General Conference Committee. The members of this special committee have had access to correspondence from the field and also to the latest developments in our denominational policies. These materials, together with what has been previously published, have been classified, and appear in the present volume. The contents of this manual deal with general matters of policy pertaining to church government. Details of application, as they might vary in the different divisions of our work, have been left to the handling of the division committees through supplements in accordance with the General Conference action cited” (pp. 19, 20).

The 1946 General Conference session took action that all changes and revisions of the Church Manual must be authorized by the General Conference in session. The 1963 edition incorporated all revisions and additions through the 1962 General Conference session. The revisions voted by the 1970 General Conference session were incorporated in the 1972 edition of the Church Manual. At the 1975 General Conference session in Vienna, Austria, further and numerous revisions covering the entire Church Manual were approved. Many of these were purely verbal changes made in the interests of style and lucidity. Others, though important in clarifying and enlarging certain areas, cannot be said to have constituted a basic revision of the Manual. They are incorporated in the 1976 edition of the Church Manual.

The 1980 General Conference session took action to make an in-depth editorial revision of the 27 fundamental beliefs of the Seventh-day Adventist Church. Prior to the action at the session there was a wide participation and input from the Church Manual Committee, the Administrative Committee of the General Conference, an ad hoc committee, all the divisions of the world, the Annual Council of the General Conference, and an editing committee appointed by the session to make recommendations for the final decision of the GC session. Changes were mostly in the way the beliefs were expressed, not in their content.

Probably the most important action regarding the Church Manual at the 1985 General Conference session was related to the organization of the church. This defined four constituent levels in the organization of the Seventh-day Adventist Church—local church, local conference or local field/mission, union conference or union field/mission, and the General Conference. Divisions are not constituent levels, but are sections of the General Conference with administrative responsibility assigned for a particular geographical area of the world. Other small revisions or amendments affected funds of the local church and conference/missions, Sabbath schools, Home and School Association, Health and Temperance Department, and administration of the local church. On this last item, conference officers were given the right to attend business meetings of local churches, and conference presidents to attend local church board meetings.

The 1990 General Conference session incorporated a new section establishing the proper procedure to make amendments or revisions in the Church Manual. Suggested revisions should be submitted to the General Conference Church Manual Committee through constituent levels of the church. The level on which the amendment originates will give study and consideration to it and, if approved, will send it to the next constituent level for wider study and counsel. If the amendment is approved, the suggested revisions are submitted to the next level for further evaluation. The Church Manual Committee will consider all recommended amendments or revisions and, if approved, will prepare them for presentation to the Annual Council and to the General Conference in session, which is the only body with authority to make any changes in the Church Manual. Other amendments include a rewriting of the baptismal vow to update the language, a definition that local elders can be ordained only by an ordained minister with credentials “from the local conference,” an exception allowing licensed or commissioned ministers ordained as local elders to perform marriage ceremonies in divisions in which their administrative committees have approved it, and a rewriting of the section on the Communion service to make its content more easily understood, in a more comprehensive way.

Church Ministries Department

CHURCH MINISTRIES DEPARTMENT. Department created at the 1985 General Conference session in New Orleans, formed from a merger of four former departments and a service of the General Conference (namely, Lay Activities, Sabbath School, Stewardship and Development, Youth, and the Home and Family Service).

As explained at the 1985 General Conference session, the action to bring these former entities together into one department would apply “only to the General Conference and its divisions.” Later it could “be implemented at the union and then the local conference levels.” It was not intended to change the organization of departments at the local church level. (See Adventist Review 162:29, July 2, 1985, pp. 10, 11.)

Philosophy. The Department of Church Ministries shares the responsibility for developing a global evangelistic strategy in consultation and harmony with administration and other departments of the church. It challenges the world church with objectives, goals, and plans to take the gospel to all the world. All of its activities are intended to be coordinated into a master strategy for soul winning and for nurturing the church membership.

The philosophy undergirding the department includes the following elements: (1) it is a support ministry to the church; (2) its support is developed through modeling spiritual leadership and training, producing resource materials, and providing consultant services; (3) its assignment is to integrate and coordinate the necessary groupings of specialty functions comprehended within the department: children’s ministries, family ministries, lay activities/personal ministries, stewardship and development ministries, Sabbath school ministries, and youth ministries; (4) its responsibility is to foster a wholistic ministry that involves worship, fellowship, nurture, stewardship, and outreach in order to provide a coordinated emphasis for the church.

The church ministries staff incorporates qualified personnel selected on the basis of their knowledge, skills, and abilities to care for the specialized functions, activities, and responsibilities encompassed by the work of the Department of Church Ministries. Their coordinated teamwork increases the potential for the best possible analysis, planning, material development, and implementation of plans to meet the needs of the target audience.

Early History: 1985—1990. Delmer Holbrook served as director from the inception of the department in 1985 until his retirement in June 1988. His expertise in the fields of management, leadership, and education equipped him with the skills necessary to work for unity of purpose and to provide a climate conducive to good interpersonal relationships. GC vice president Kenneth Mittleider served as the department’s liaison with administration.

Early issues included the development of the departmental philosophy and working policies. Considerable debate surrounded the extent to which the new department was an integration of the former entities, a coordination of their functions, or some combination of the two. Were the departmental associates to be generalists in church ministries or specialists in the work of the former departments and service? Would there be a universal model for presenting the various functions of the department? If so, what would such a model look like?

Delmer Holbrook conducted leadership seminars in the various divisions for the new CM staffs. A world advisory held at the General Conference headquarters in January 1987 brought division church ministries directors together for team-building and consultation on the issues facing the new department. Considerable freedom was given to the world divisions to develop approaches suitable for their particular needs.

“Ministries” became the standard term to describe the functions of the former departments and service. In addition to family ministries, lay activities/personal ministries, Sabbath school ministries, stewardship ministries, and youth ministries, two new ministries emerged. Children’s ministries received its impetus from the vision and prompting of Helen Craig, former Sabbath school associate director for children’s Sabbath school, Vacation Bible School, and child evangelism. The emergence of music ministries was stimulated by the enormous talent and enthusiasm of singing evangelist and Sabbath school specialist Charles L. Brooks. Under his leadership the Seventh-day Adventist Hymnal was produced in 1985, and the songbook for primaries, Sing for Joy, was published in 1989. His untimely death in that same year brought a great loss to the department, including the fledgling music ministry.

Representatives from each of the former departments and service comprised focus groups, which were established for each of the ministries. These focus groups enabled an integrative working relationship and the development of a sense of unity among personnel of the various ministries.

AMiCUS, a joint venture of Church Ministries, Education, and Adventist Chaplaincy Ministries, was formed in 1987 as a worldwide outreach and support ministry for college and university students in non-Seventh-day Adventist institutions.

Delmer Holbrook, longtime educator in the church, elevated the religious education aspects of the department. Curriculum specialist Charles Betz and his wife, Harriet, served as consultants during 1987 to help the department develop curriculum frameworks for each of the ministries. Stopping short of an integrated curriculum for the department, this effort acknowledged that the General Conference model would have a strong educational base and would be a coordination of functions of the former departments and service.

Alternative approaches took shape in some of the world divisions. For example, the North American Division configured church ministries along an age-level, developmental model featuring adult ministries, youth ministries, and children’s ministries, while the South Pacific Division offered an integrated thematic perspective with a four-part focus: worship, fellowship, nurture, and mission.

When Delmer Holbrook retired in 1988, George Knowles became the department director, serving until his retirement at the 1990 General Conference session. Knowles continued the building process, working through a number of committees to address the various structural aspects of the new department, encouraging the continuing development of a coordinated model and preparing for Church Manual changes to reflect the work of church ministries.

Serving the Church Ministries Department during the 1985—1990 quinquennium were the following: Malcolm Allen, youth; Maurice Bascom, personal ministries/general church ministries; Charles L. Brooks, Sabbath school/music (deceased 1989); Helen Craig, children’s ministries (retired 1989); Gilbert Bertochini, Sabbath school; Don Crane, stewardship;

Karen Flowers, family ministries; Ronald Flowers, family ministries; Erwin Gane, editor, Adult Sabbath School Lessons (appointed in 1986); Robert Grady, Sabbath school; Betty Holbrook, family ministries (retired in 1988); Delmer W. Holbrook, director (retired in 1988); George Knowles, lay activities/personal ministries (elected director in 1988); Israel Leito, youth (elected in 1986); Samuel Monnier, lay activities/personal ministries; Leo Van Dolson, department editorial director and editor, Adult Sabbath School Lessons (retired in 1987); Paul Smith, stewardship; Virginia Smith, children's ministries (elected in 1989); Michael Stevenson, youth (deceased 1993). James Joiner and Laurell Peterson were assistant directors.

After 1990. Israel Leito, formerly associate for senior youth, was elected director at the Indianapolis General Conference session of 1990 and served until Dec. 31, 1993, when he became president of the Inter-American Division. In addition to continuing in his responsibility as codirector of family ministries, Ronald Flowers was elected to serve as department director from Jan. 1, 1994, until the end of the quinquennium. Vice presidential adviser Matthew Bediako emphasized a close working relationship with General Conference administration.

With the provisional status of the Church Ministries Department lifted at the 1990 General Conference session, efforts were undertaken in earnest to prepare Church Manual documents and working policies for official action at the next General Conference session. In the face of a decrease in the number of specialists in the various aspects of church ministries throughout the world field and a downsizing of the General Conference Church Ministries Department itself, a higher profile was given to the six ministries dealing with children, youth, family, lay activities/personal ministries, Sabbath school, and stewardship. Smaller ministry committees replaced the larger focus groups, and associates in the department were given the title of director or in some cases codirector of their ministries. A world advisory held in February 1991 brought together division directors and associates with the headquarters team. The world staff shaped the agendas for their ministries for the quinquennium.

Closer ties and interfacing with other departments were also fostered. In cooperation with the Ministerial Association, a manual for local church elders was developed, and in 1993 the Year of the Pastor was promoted.

Major activities undertaken by the department included the Year of Youth Evangelism (1993), launched with the International Congress on Youth Evangelism, held in Prague, Czechoslovakia, in August 1992, which led to some 400,000 baptisms through youth efforts in 1993. The year 1994, named the Year of the Family, following the United Nations designation, led to a number of initiatives by family ministries. Research designed to provide demographic data as well as specifics about the functioning of SDA families was initiated in the world divisions. Regional consultations, such as the Pan-African Consultation on the Family in Kenya in 1992, in which 21 countries were represented, encouraged a proactive approach by the church in assisting families. The work of stewardship and development received new impetus at the Annual Council of 1993 with the mandate to establish stewardship commissions at the various organizational levels of the church.

Publications. A new publication, the Church Ministries Worker, was begun in 1985 under the acting editorship of Leo Van Dolson. Graham Bingham became editor in 1986, and the publication was discontinued in 1990. By 1994 in addition to a wide variety of training and resource manuals, regular publications by the various ministries included the Sabbath school/personal ministries quarterly Action, the family ministries annual Planbook, stewardship's monthly Resource, youth ministries quarterly publications Accent and Journal of Adventist Youth Ministry, and AMiCUS's quarterly publication Dialogue. Sabbath school teacher and student editions of quarterlies and publications produced in cooperation with the Review and Herald and Pacific Press publishing associations included the Adult Sabbath School Lessons (standard, large print, and easy English editions), Collegiate Quarterly, Cornerstone Connections, Junior Sabbath School Lessons, Earliteen Sabbath School Lessons, Primary Sabbath School Lessons, Kindergarten Sabbath School Lessons, and Mission (adult, teen, and children's editions). The department also produced program helps for cradle roll, primary, and junior/earliteen Sabbath school leaders.

The General Conference Church Ministries Department staff during 1990—1995 included Malcolm Allen, youth; Lyndelle Chiomenti, editor, Adult Easy English Sabbath School Lessons, and associate editor, standard Adult Sabbath School Lessons; Don Crane, stewardship; Karen Flowers, family; Ronald Flowers, family (elected director in 1994); Erwin Gane, editor, Adult Sabbath School Lessons; Charlotte Ishkanian, editor, Mission (appointed in 1993); Murray Joiner, personal ministries (resigned in 1993); Janet Kangas, editor, Mission (resigned in 1993); Andrea Kristensen, editor, Junior and Earliteen Sabbath School Lessons; Israel Leito, director, 1990—1993; Calvin Smith, Sabbath school/personal ministries; Virginia Smith, children's ministries; Michael Stevenson, youth/music (deceased 1993); Gary Swanson, editor, Collegiate Quarterly, Cornerstone Connections; David Wong, youth (elected in 1993); James Zachrison, personal ministries/Sabbath school (elected in 1994). Patricia Habada, curriculum specialist, and Laurell Peterson, Sabbath school production manager, were assistant directors.

Church Ministries Worker

CHURCH MINISTRIES WORKER (formerly Sabbath School Worker; 1885—1990; monthly; R&H). A journal designed for Sabbath school teachers and officers. It contained lesson helps for the teachers of the seven divisions, also articles on teaching methods, and on special topics such as Rally Day, Visitors' Day, branch Sabbath schools, Vacation Bible Schools, Sabbath school Investment, and child evangelism. From 1985 it contained material for all church ministries officers. It was replaced by Action in 1990.

In 1885 the Sabbath School Worker began as a 16-page quarterly printed in Battle Creek, Michigan (at 25 cents a year), providing no lesson helps, only articles on organization and teaching methods. In 1887 and 1888 in the interests of economy these articles were put into the Youth's Instructor as a supplement, but thereafter the Worker appeared again, printed this time in Oakland, California, by the Pacific Press. In 1890 it was made a 24-page monthly, including lesson helps and missions stories (the latter transferred in 1912 to a separate Missions Quarterly).

In 1901, when the International Sabbath School Association was reorganized as the Sabbath School Department of the General Conference, the Worker articles were combined with the Advocate of Christian Education; then from 1904 the Sabbath School Worker was resumed and published continuously by the Review and Herald.

At first brief lesson helps were given on only two levels; gradually they were expanded and subdivided. By 1923 lesson helps appeared for senior and youth divisions, and one section for the children's divisions in three subsections for junior and primary, kindergarten, and cradle roll. Later the helps for all these divisions were separated, and one added for earliteens.

The period from 1961 to 1970 was a time of great increase in size of the Worker. In 1961 a Worker of 56 pages was published; in 1964, 64 pages; and in 1970, 112 pages every month. About 80 of these pages were lesson helps. The year of the big change was 1971. The lesson helps had expanded to a point where they were too bulky and could serve better as separate loose-leaf entities for each division. During 1971 the journal reverted to material of a more general nature and the name was changed to Worker, Journal of Sabbath School Action.

After 1971 the Worker was a 16-page monthly and contained only promotional, inspirational, statistical, and instructional material. The Program Helps and Teaching Aids had become separate publications.

In 1985, when the Sabbath School Department became part of the new Church Ministries Department, the name was changed to Church Ministries Worker and it became a 32-page magazine. In 1990 it became Action.

Church, Nature of CHURCH, NATURE OF. “Church” is a translation of the Greek ekklēsia, literally, “a calling out.” This was a common Greek word for any called or summoned assembly, and reflects the fact that people were called to public meetings by heralds. The Septuagint uses ekklēsia to translate the Hebrew qahal, which in the OT designates Hebrew assemblies or all Israel, as a community. In the NT ekklēsia is used to designate (a) Christians gathered for worship (1 Cor. 11:18; 14:3, 28); (b) local congregations consisting of all Christians living in one place (Matt. 18:17; Acts 5:11; 8:3; etc.); (c) the entire body of Christians, the church universal to which believers in all places belong (Matt. 16:18; 1 Cor. 10:32; 12:28; Heb. 12:23; etc.). The nature of the church is clarified by the words used in the NT to describe it. Among these are body, temple, household, family, assembly, and by extension, fellowship.

Jesus Christ is the head of the church; the church is His body (Eph. 1:22, 23; 5:23). Thus Christ is Lord of the church and preeminent over it (Col. 1:18). If the church is fully subject to its divine Head, He can sanctify and cleanse it so that it will be holy and without blemish (Eph. 5:23—27). As head of the church, the seat or source of direction and intelligence, Christ will guide it in all its plans and activities, coordinating all parts and supplying wisdom and vital force to every member of the body so that all can work together effectually (Eph. 4:15, 16; Col. 2:19).

Jesus Christ “builds” His church (Matt. 16:18) into a holy temple “fitly framed,” exceedingly beautiful and symmetrical, with Christ Himself as the chief cornerstone and the apostles and prophets as the foundation (Eph. 2:21; cf. 1 Peter 2:6—8). The Christian church was founded when Jesus called the apostles. It grew as the Holy Spirit, through the apostles’ preaching and the witness of members, carved out other living stones (1 Cor. 3:16, 17; 1 Peter 2:5), which were to become the “habitation of God through the Spirit” (Eph. 2:22), a “spiritual house” in which men and women who have accepted Jesus as their Lord and Saviour offer “spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God” (1 Peter 2:5).

Converted men and women—living stones—become members of the “household of God” (Eph. 2:19), and are no longer strangers or foreigners in a revolted world, but a part of the “whole family in heaven and earth” (Eph. 3:15). “Believers on the earth and the beings in heaven who have never fallen constitute one church” (6T 366). Others in this household include the angels, the Holy Spirit, Jesus, the Father, and, doubtless, unfallen beings from other worlds (Heb. 12:22—24).

All the members of Christ’s church on earth constitute “the general assembly and church of the firstborn, which are written in heaven” (verse 23). Twice-born, faithful members of every local church are a part of this great universal church, “all that in every place call upon the name of Jesus Christ” (1 Cor. 1:2). They enjoy communion and fellowship with others who accept Christ as the head of the church (1 John 1:3).

Jesus Christ is founder of the church universal, in the inclusive sense of the whole family of God from Adam to the end of the world, and in the particular sense of the Christian church established during His incarnation. In rejecting Christ, literal Israelites, collectively as a nation, were cut off like dead branches from the true stock of Abraham. True Israel was then the faithful remnant that accepted the Messiah, and to this original stock Gentile Christians were grafted (Rom. 11:5, 17, 24, 26; cf. 9:6). Thus the tree now includes the spiritual, as well as literal, children of Abraham who believe in Jesus Christ (Gal. 3:16, 26—29).

Christ provided divine guidance for His church in the form of an inspired record of His own life and of His will as revealed through prophets and apostles (John 16:13; Heb. 1:1, 2; 1 John 1:1—3). He sent the Holy Spirit as His representative and as a helper for the church; He provides the church with a teaching ministry and other necessary spiritual gifts, manifested through various members of the church (Eph. 4:8—16; 1 Cor. 12:4—12, 28; Rom. 12:5—8); and He gave the church a commission to go into all the world proclaiming Christ, teaching all men to observe all that He commanded, making disciples and then baptizing into Christian fellowship those who would accept Him and obey His Word (Matt. 28:18—20). To the church He gave authority to ordain teachers (Acts 13:1—3), to admit members into the church, and to expel from it those who apostatized (John 20:22, 23; Matt. 16:19; 18:15—18).

It is apparent, therefore, that the church is a brotherhood of believers, a spiritual communion, a loving fellowship of those who accept Christ as Lord, who take up His cross and obey His Word, and who are thus accepted by God as His sons and daughters. God's universal church is more than an association or organization of people; it is a community of believers consisting of His elect of every land and age who have been united to Him by faith, forgiven by grace, and ennobled by the indwelling Spirit. This union with Christ's body is signified by baptism and is expressed visibly by participation in His ordinances, by meeting together for worship, and by service for His cause. Finite men and women cannot determine who is or is not numbered as part of the church universal, for the essence of the church is Jesus Christ existing in the minds, or hearts, of those who have accepted Him as their Saviour, who love Him and one another, and who obey His Word as they understand it. The essence of the church is a life union between Christ and His people, created by the mysterious working of the Holy Spirit.

From time to time, in order to convey to all people a particular message of warning or instruction, or to lead them to a more complete understanding of His will, God has raised up special movements. God's Spirit has manifested Himself through human instrumentalities, leading them to associate together to advance His purpose for humanity. Seventh-day Adventists believe that God raised up the Advent movement in the last days, immediately prior to the second coming of Christ, to this end. They believe their movement to be a fulfillment of prophecy (Rev. 14:6—12; 12:17). They also hold the basic evangelical truths, in common with conservative Christians generally, but believe that their special function in God's purpose is to draw the attention of the world to the imminent second coming of Christ and to God's holy law, both of which sublime truths are largely ignored by the world. Neglect of God's law has also obscured the seventh-day Sabbath of the fourth command of the Decalogue, the memorial of the creation of the world and of personal salvation through Christ. The accomplishment of this task demanded more than the devotion of a host of Christians scattered among many denominations. It called for a united, organized body dedicated to the common task and working together in unison to achieve the goal described in the prophecy. That prophecy specified how the people fulfilling it could be recognized, and what their task would be (Rev. 12:17; 14:6—12).

Seventh-day Adventists believe that the church is both visible and invisible—visible in a body of people God calls out and commissions to accomplish His purpose at a given period of history, and invisible in the multitude of sincere and devoted men and women of all churches, or no church, who worship Him in spirit and in truth to the extent of their knowledge of truth.

While they believe that the prophecies of Rev. 14:6—12 and 12:17 point specifically to their history and work, Seventh-day Adventists do not believe that they alone constitute the true children of God today. While they hold that the SDA movement is the visible organization through which God is proclaiming the last special message for the world at this time, they also heartily accept the words of Jesus, “Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold” (John 10:16).

They believe that God works in and through all organizations whose leaders are willing to accept divine guidance in their decisions, and to the extent that they do so. They believe, also, that the message they as SDAs are bearing to the world—and which, indeed, gave rise to the Seventh-day Adventist Church—was divinely ordained for this time, and that this sublime commission constitutes the Seventh-day Adventist Church, in a unique way, God’s visible church on earth today. They believe that while the leaders and ministers of the church, like other dedicated Christians, are subject to human limitations and that they may at times err in judgment, God nevertheless guides in the decisions they make, and overrules when an error in judgment or action would be fraught with grave consequences for the church. Furthermore, they believe that the General Conference in session, with representatives of the church from around the world present, constitutes the agency through which God guides and directs His cause on earth today.

Finally, they believe it to be God’s purpose to recover the remnant of His people, the multitude of earnest sincere believers in every church who are living up to all the light they have. All these are potential members of that final “remnant” described in Rev. 12:17. In the spirit of Christian humility SDAs consider it their solemn task and privilege to complete the work begun at the time of the Protestant Reformation in the sixteenth century by calling attention to certain great truths of Scripture that Christendom as a whole has lost sight of, and, by giving to the world God’s last great message recorded in Rev. 14:6—12, to reach all open-minded men and women with the announcement of Christ’s soon coming to earth in power and glory, and to help them prepare to meet Him in peace.

A magazine not intended for general circulation, but subscribed to by local churches to “furnish a medium for communicating the plans, policies, and instruction of the North American Division Committee to the church officers” to help them in building up their work.

It included programs for MV Society meetings, sermon and program material for the monthly and weekly church missionary services, special material for MV Week in the spring of each year (beginning 1922), poetry, discussions regarding the MV Reading Courses, and information to help plan the services and activities of the local church and to promote missions offerings; also, beginning September 1942, a section containing material for the Home and School Association. It was superseded by three new specialized periodicals—GO; MV Program Kit; and Adventist Home and School.

CHURCH RADIO (AND TV) SECRETARY. In North America the local church officer whose duty it is to lead the members in distributing announcements of Seventh-day Adventist radio and television programs and in securing enrollments to the Bible correspondence schools; to promote the annual radio and television offerings; and to work with the church communication secretary in arranging with local stations for radio or television programs.

Church School

CHURCH SCHOOL. In Seventh-day Adventist education, a day school conducted by a local church or by a group of churches (occasionally by a denominational institution) providing Christian training and general elementary education. The term church school is generally used synonymously with the term elementary school, although some churches conduct a nine- or 10-grade school, which is officially called an intermediate school, but in common usage a junior academy. See Schools, SDA.

Church School Board

CHURCH SCHOOL BOARD. The administrative body of an elementary or intermediate school operated by a church or group of churches. This body may be the church board or a separate school board elected by the church or a school committee of the church board appointed by the church board. Where two or more churches unite to operate a school, there is a union school board. See Schools, SDA.

Church Treasurer

CHURCH TREASURER. The custodian of all church funds. These include the tithe; funds designated for local, institutional, mission, or conference purposes, all collections and offerings from the Sabbath school, the Adventist Youth Society, Community Services center, and other departments of the church. He or she issues receipts for all monies received in church envelopes; he or she remits to the conference each month the tithe and various offerings given for missions or general work, but holds in a bank account in the name of the church all funds contributed to the local church or to its departments and societies, and any income from rentals or other sources. Funds that he or she may be holding for the church school or for the Adventist Youth Society, the Community Services center, and other church organizations are disbursed by him or her on the order of the school board or of the executive committee of the group concerned. Expenditures for local missionary work may be authorized by the Personal Ministries Council, if there is one. Otherwise, funds are disbursed by order of the church board in a regular meeting.

The church treasurer's books are audited annually by the conference treasurer or by someone appointed by the conference committee. The books and records of the church treasurer may be inspected only by the conference auditor, the pastor, the church elder, or one authorized to do so by the church board.

City Missions

CITY MISSIONS. A term applied in Seventh-day Adventist history to establishments of two different types.

- a. Centers for evangelism and distribution of publications.
- b. Welfare missions of one kind or another, ministering to the underprivileged.

Evangelistic Type

Evangelistic Type. Beginning about 1883, Seventh-day Adventists established a number of so-called city missions for the purpose of promoting evangelism in the large cities. These were, as J. H. Waggoner said, quite in contrast with what were (and are) generally known as city missions, of the welfare type; rather they were prototypes, in a sense, of the modern evangelistic centers. S. N. Haskell, who promoted these evangelistic missions, described their function as a center for pastoral work, the distribution of publications, the giving of Bible readings, and also the maintaining of good relations with the press (Review and Herald 61:278, Apr. 29, 1884; cf. 61:410, June 24, 1884, and 61:807, 808, Dec. 23, 1884).

Pioneer city missions were opened in New York, Chicago, and San Francisco. The Chicago mission was sponsored by the International Tract and Missionary Society for a year (1884) on an experimental basis and financed by the Michigan and Wisconsin conferences, then it was turned over to the Illinois Conference. Missions of this kind came to be established also in key cities in other conferences. Generally located in a residential area, such a mission provided a reading room or small lecture room, also living quarters for the staff, who distributed tracts, took subscriptions for periodicals, sold books, and thus found interested persons to whom they gave Bible studies in the homes or at the mission, and whom they invited to public meetings in the mission. Converts were organized into Sabbath schools to form the nuclei of future churches. (This was the method of beginning SDA work in Washington, D.C., for example. See Potomac Conference.)

Almost from the beginning, these missions gave in-service training in city evangelism to workers, especially to those who gave Bible readings, and who soon came to be known as Bible workers-later called Bible instructors.

These missions were intended to be supported by the colporteur work of the staff and by donations of food supplies or money from church members elsewhere. However, they proved to be such a heavy financial burden to the conferences that few lasted past the 1880s. In Chicago, the training function was carried on in the Central Bible School.

Welfare Type

Welfare Type. After the evangelistic-type of city missions was discontinued the term was used in the next decade for establishments to serve the needy. Beginning in 1893, an extensive slum mission work was conducted in Chicago under the sponsorship of the SDA (later, International) Medical Missionary and Benevolent Association, led by Dr.

Kellogg of the Battle Creek Sanitarium, for which workers were trained in several medical missionary training schools operated by the Battle Creek Sanitarium (see Yearbook of the International Medical Missionary and Benevolent Association, 1896, pp. 116—133; General Conference Bulletin, 1901, p. 175). The Chicago medical missionary institutions included a workingmen's home, where a penny-a-meal cafeteria, inexpensive overnight lodging, and supplies of clothing were provided for poor and homeless men; a rest home for unwed and destitute mothers; an evangelistic mission among the poor; several dispensaries; a community health and recreation center for mothers and children in the stockyards district of the city; an employment agency for released prisoners; and a mail-order catalog store, the profits of which helped to cover the expenses of the charitable work and at the same time provide goods at lower prices to customers in isolated communities. The mission published a monthly promotion magazine, the Life Boat. Missions of a similar type were established by SDAs in many other places.

The General Conference Bulletin of the fourth quarter 1900 reports city missions in 24 cities in 17 states and three countries outside the United States (Australia, New Zealand, and Sweden). Emphasis came to be placed on well-organized public evangelism, which resulted in the formation of many city churches. However, so great was the investment of money and effort in these missions that Ellen White warned against overinvesting in such work at the expense of the main emphasis of the church on the proclamation of the SDA message. By 1903, when the Battle Creek medical organization began to drift from denominational control, interest in slum missions had waned.

Welfare work was continued by the Dorcas Welfare Societies, and in recent years has been sponsored by the Department of Church Ministries in Community Services centers conducted by local churches.

Claremont Sanitarium

CLAREMONT SANITARIUM. A 51-room medical institution operated from 1897 to 1905 near Claremont, a suburb of Cape Town, South Africa, under the direction of the International Medical Missionary and Benevolent Association of Battle Creek Michigan (the organization headed by J. H. Kellogg). No expense was spared to make it the best-equipped medical institution south of the equator, the total cost amounting to £50,000, of which the Wessels family contributed £30,000. The first medical director was R. S. Anthony, M.D. (a former pioneer colporteur), who was later assisted by Kate Lindsay, M.D., who came from Battle Creek Sanitarium. Within a week of opening every bed was filled and it became necessary to rent adjacent buildings.

Early in 1900, while the Anglo-Boer War was raging, the British imperial government requisitioned half of the sanitarium building for the use of army officers sent south from the battlefields to convalesce. As a result the standards of the institution were rapidly broken down, particularly after the army set up a bar in its section of the building.

The war having brought heavy financial losses, members of the Wessels family who had invested heavily in the sanitarium requested and obtained permission to operate the institution and retain the profit. However, with the postwar depression, patronage dropped. For a time the institution was operated as a hotel, but ultimately it went into bankruptcy. In 1905 the four-story building burned to the ground.

Clark, Grace Agnes

CLARK, GRACE AGNES (1898—1955). Missionary. She was born in Gloucester, England. In 1921 she was a member of a large party of missionaries who sailed from the British Isles for East Africa to reestablish Seventh-day Adventist mission stations disrupted during World War I. Among the first places she was assigned was Kamagambo Mission, in Kenya, where she was active in establishing and developing a strong girls' school, of which she was headmistress for 12 years. Then she moved 14 miles (22 kilometers) north to Nyanchwa Mission, where, for four years, she pioneered girls' work. In 1937 she was appointed secretary-treasurer of the Kenya Union Mission, and held this position until Uganda, Tanganyika, and Kenya were merged into a new union in 1942.

During her years of service at Kamagambo and Nyanchwa, Miss Clark had become thoroughly familiar with the vernacular languages, particularly the Luo. In 1943, when the Advent Press at Gendia was expanding its facilities at a time when there was an ever-increasing demand for vernacular literature, she joined the staff as official translator, and held that position to the time of her death. Because she had become recognized throughout Kenya as an outstanding authority on the Luo language, she was invited by the British and Foreign Bible Society to participate in the work of translating the Bible into that tongue. For her contribution she was made a life member of that society.

Clausen, Niels

CLAUSEN, NIELS (1851—1925). Minister, editor. Born in Denmark, he emigrated to the United States at the age of 19. He attended Battle Creek College (1874—1877), preached in Wisconsin, Iowa, and Nebraska, and was ordained in 1879. From 1883 to 1886 he edited a Seventh-day Adventist Danish-Norwegian paper in Battle Creek, and then went to Norway to edit its Norwegian paper and to assist in evangelistic work. He returned to the U.S. in 1906, engaged in self-supporting work for two years, and then preached in Oklahoma for the next 10 years. He retired in 1917.

Clement, Lora E.

CLEMENT, LORA E. (1890—1958). Editor. After graduating from Union College in 1908, she became secretary to M. E. Kern in Washington (1908—1911). She then joined the Youth's Instructor staff under Fannie Dickerson Chase, and became associate editor in 1918. She became editor in 1923 and held that position until 1952. Her Let's Talk It Over column was a notable feature of the paper for many years. From 1952 to 1958 she was librarian of the Review and Herald Publishing Association. Her death occurred as the result of a traffic accident.

CLIFFORD, FRANCIS GEORGE (1899—1972). Administrator in Trans-Africa and Australia. Francis Clifford was born in Bath, England, and was baptized in 1913. Educated at Stanborough Park College and later Spion Kop College in South Africa, he completed the ministerial course in 1922. Commencing his service as an evangelist, he continued in the work until 1933, when he was called to departmental leadership. He served efficiently in this area at both union and division levels. In 1941 he was called to administrative responsibility as president of the South African Union Conference. In 1946 he became secretary of the South African Division, which position he held until his appointment to the presidency of the Australasian Division in 1954. In 1962 he retired from his responsibilities and returned to South Africa.

Clinics and Dispensaries

CLINICS AND DISPENSARIES. In general, medical facilities offering treatment or medicines to outpatients but not bed or house care. There is not always a clear line of distinction between the Seventh-day Adventist clinic and the dispensary; there is of necessity some overlapping. In general, it can be said that a clinic is a medical facility operated by an established hospital; it may be in close proximity to the hospital or remote from it. The work done at the clinic may or may not be charitable in nature; however, the word ordinarily connotes a reduction in the charges made. In contrast, dispensaries are operated in more remote areas, and the service, generally speaking, is either free or at a reduced rate. Either of these facilities may have physicians and nurses in attendance or they may be operated only by nurses and local helpers (called dressers in some areas).

First North American Clinic or Dispensary. The first attempt by SDAs to set up an institution for free medical service was made in Chicago in 1893 by J. H. Kellogg, M.D., noted as the director of the Battle Creek Sanitarium, Battle Creek, Michigan. He was assisted in this venture by Drs. W. B. Holden and David and Mary Paulson and opened the Chicago Medical Mission on Custom House Place. (Later the Paulsons moved to Hinsdale, Illinois, a suburb of Chicago, and eventually developed what is now the Hinsdale Sanitarium and Hospital.) From this beginning other dispensaries were developed in the Chicago area, which were known by such names as Life Boat Mission, the Maternity Free Dispensary, and Life Boat Rescue Service.

First Overseas or Foreign Clinic or Dispensary. What is said to have been the first clinic established outside the United States was opened in Guadalajara, Mexico, in 1894 by Dr. Lillis Wood and a nurse, Ida Crawford. The site for it had been selected in 1893 by D. T. Jones, representing the SDA Foreign Mission Board. The clinic prospered, and eventually a 50-bed sanitarium was established.

From these humble beginnings SDA clinics and dispensaries have spread until they belt the globe. At the close of 1993, statistics showed nearly 300 separate clinics and dispensaries, including some mobile clinics, plus medical launches and airplanes. These facilities, which treat more than 1 million patients annually, are found in Africa, the Far East, Europe, North America, South America, Mexico, India, Myanmar, Pakistan, and the South Pacific Islands. The mode of transportation ranges from the airplane to the oxcart; the accommodations range from the most up-to-date buildings and equipment to the rude shelters of bush clinics on the plateaus of the Andes or of Africa, where in some cases the only protection from the sun is the shade of a spreading tree. With modest facilities, each of these clinics or dispensaries treats daily up to 100 or more patients suffering with a wide variety of diseases such as leprosy, sleeping sickness, malaria, and many others.

Medical Launch. A specialized type of traveling medical facility is used in areas devoid of roads but having navigable waterways. In such areas, where live people who desperately need medical help, floating dispensaries bring help to remote villages and isolated families (see Missionary Vessels).

Clinton Theological Seminary

CLINTON THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY. An educational institution that operated at Clinton, Missouri, from 1910 to 1925 for a German-speaking constituency. Among the thousands of Germans who migrated to the United States during the nineteenth century and settled in the Midwest, many became Seventh-day Adventists and conducted worship in their native tongue. In order to educate German-speaking ministers, Union College (established in 1891) operated a German Training Department. Then, in 1910, a separate institution was established for this purpose at Clinton, Missouri, known as Clinton German Seminary, a junior college, with affiliated grade school and academy. It occupied the buildings of old Baird College. An emphasis was placed on the German language, and public meetings were held in German. From the first, interest on the part of the German-American youth was less than enthusiastic. They desired to become Americans and learn to use the English language without a handicap. The first year, 105 students were enrolled in the college and 17 in the junior department. From 1915 the Statistical Report listed the school as a senior college. The enrollment slowly climbed until in its peak year (1917) there were 210 students in grades 9 and above, but only 30 of these were in the important seminary years beyond the secondary level, where they would be trained especially for the German work. College enrollment reached an all-time high of 43 in 1922.

The anti-German feeling built up during World War I (reflected in the change of the name of the school to Clinton Theological Seminary in 1917), militated against teaching in German and further prejudiced the young people against segregation in a German school. After the war the shift of sentiment toward educating the young people in English, together with financial losses owing to small enrollment, caused the school to cease operation in 1925, at which time it united with Broadview College and Theological Seminary (see Broadview Academy).

Cobban, Franke Flowers

COBBAN, FRANKE FLOWERS (1886—1974). Nurse and administrator. A native of South Dakota, she entered denominational work in 1904 at Battle Creek Sanitarium. In succeeding years, she served at Washington Sanitarium and Hospital, the Harding Rural Rest Home in Ohio, and the General Conference Medical Department. She became instructor of nurses at the White Memorial Hospital and Glendale Sanitarium and Hospital in California. She also worked as director of nurses at the St. Helena Sanitarium in California. In 1971 she was chosen for the Hall of Fame in the Northern California Chapter of ASDAN (Association of SDA Nurses).

Cobban, Harold Henry

COBBAN, HAROLD HENRY (1882—1962). Assistant treasurer, missionary. He graduated from Mount Vernon Academy (1904), and was married to Grace Thornton (1905). For the next two years he worked in the treasurer's office of the General Conference, and then spent a term of service in Jamaica, Panama, and Trinidad. He again took up his work in the General Conference treasurer's office and remained there until his retirement in 1951. He helped establish treasury offices in South America and the Far East.

Coggeshall, Richard H.

COGGESHALL, RICHARD H. (1845—1930). Publishing house worker. Shortly after his baptism in 1867 he joined the staff of the Review and Herald publishing house as a compositor. In 1885 he was sent to Basel, Switzerland, to assist in the establishment of a publishing house there. Two years later he was sent to Oslo, Norway, on a similar mission. On returning to the United States, he continued with the Review and Herald until 1902.

Colcord, George W.

COLCORD, GEORGE W. (1843—1902). Educator, administrator. He was the founder of Milton Academy (1887) in Oregon, a forerunner of Walla Walla College (1892), and also of Graysville Academy (1892), which developed into the Southern Training School, Southern Missionary College, and now Southern College of Seventh-day Adventists. He was twice president of the Illinois Conference, and for the last several years of his life taught church school in Colorado.

Colcord, Willard Allan

COLCORD, WILLARD ALLAN (1860—1935). Minister, editor. Educated at Battle Creek College, he preached in Iowa (1886—1888) and engaged in editorial work for the General Conference (1888—1893). For two years during this period he served as secretary of the General Conference. He then went to Australia for editorial and administrative work (1893—1902). On returning to the United States, he taught for two years at Union College (1902—1904), then became a secretary (under the chair) of the Religious Liberty Department (1904—1910) and was also on the book committee of the Review and Herald publishing house (1907—1914). At this time he lost faith in the doctrines and leadership of the Seventh-day Adventist Church and disassociated himself from the church. About 20 years later, in 1934, he published a retraction of his position in the Review and Herald and was received back into church fellowship.

Cole, John Martin

COLE, JOHN MARTIN (1862—1937). Missionary, administrator. He was born in Ireland, but grew up in Nebraska, U.S.A. He entered the ministry in 1884, preaching in the North Pacific Conference (Oregon and Washington), was ordained in 1890, and in 1893 went on the second cruise of the Pitcairn for mission service in Fiji and Norfolk islands. On returning to the United States, he again preached in Oregon (1897—1909), and then served as president of the South Australian Conference (1909—1911). After terms as president of the New Zealand Conference (1911—1915), of the North New Zealand Conference (1915—1916), and of the New South Wales Conference (1916—1926), he returned to the United States and preached in Illinois and western Washington (1926—1928). His last appointment was to the Leeward Islands Conference, where he served as president (1928—1930).

College Food

COLLEGE FOOD. A food factory that operates in cooperation with denominational educational institutions in Korea. Soonan Euimyung School has operated a farm and produced various agricultural products from its early days.

In 1914 the Soonan Euimyung School purchased farmland with the assistance of the denomination and established an industrial department. Through this industrial program the school has offered its students an opportunity to earn their school expenses and be self-supporting.

In May 1927 a food factory was built, and the work of production and sales of health foods commenced in earnest. The foods produced at the Euimyung School food factory quickly gained public acceptance in Korea and won second place in the countrywide bazaar conference for Korean products, which opened in Seoul in April 1928. This happened even though the Euimyung School products exhibit was closed on Sabbath.

At that time there were 50 outlets in Seoul, one in Japan, and one in China. The school was subsequently taken over by the Japanese government, and because of religious persecution and the dissolution of the church, production halted.

Once Korea was liberated from Japan, the church reorganized and our college reopened. Because of our concept of education, the college planned a farm and a ranch, and purchased six milk cows in 1948. Milk customers at that time were missionary families, government dignitaries, and foreign embassy personnel. The milk output in 1955 was 5,500—6,600 pounds (2,500—3,000 kilograms) a day, and the milk was delivered by carriage.

In May 1959 George S. Haley was appointed as College Industrial Department head. He erected a milk plant. In 1972 College Food developed and produced different flavors of ice cream (chocolate, vanilla, and strawberry) and processed various vegemeat products, as well as soy milk and peanut butter.

After Korean Sahmyook Food was established by the church in 1978, the college food company stopped producing foods and devoted itself to milk production. In 1984 a new milk plant of 16,000 square feet (1,487 square meters) was built. Daily output of milk was 88,000 pounds (40,000 kilograms) in 1987, with 60 outlets.

In 1988 the name was changed to College Food and its operation separated from the college. In December of the same year College Food purchased 7.9 million square feet (736,201 square meters) of forestland near Hongchun, Kangwon-do for a new pasture site. After that, College Food began marketing developed chocolate milk, light milk, and yogurt and put them on the market.

Milk production at the plant is now 110,000—132,000 pounds (50,000—60,000 kilograms) a day, and the number of outlets is 90, with 98 employees involved in the production of chocolate milk, skim milk, light milk, yogurt drink, and ice cream. College Food has contributed greatly to the development of Korean Sahmyook University.

College View Academy

COLLEGE VIEW ACADEMY. A day school on the secondary level located in Lincoln, Nebraska, and closely associated with Union College. The faculty and staff numbered 13 in 1993. When Union College was founded in 1891, of the several hundred students enrolled, nearly all were taking work comparable to secondary or elementary grades. The courses were “English Preparatory Course,” comparable to the junior high school course of today (grades 7, 8, 9); the “Preparatory Course” of three years, comparable to the senior high school course today (grades 10, 11, and 12); and the regular college courses. Students were allowed to range over the offerings, taking classes on different levels. In 1907 for the first time an academy curriculum of four years was offered. However, the administration was the same for college and academy, and the college teachers taught academy classes. In 1915, for the first time college students outnumbered academy students in some departments, and graduating classes were separated. In 1924 the academy was organized as a separate department, and in 1932 a separate principal was named for Union College Academy.

On July 1, 1962, the Helen Hyatt Elementary School and the academy began operating as the Seventh-day Adventist Schools of Lincoln under the joint management of the College View church and Union College. At that time the name was changed to College View Academy.

Ground was broken for a $285,000 academy building Sept. 3, 1961, and the building was occupied Feb. 17, 1963. In 1964 the Seventh-day Adventist churches in Lincoln united as constituents of the K-12 system, combining under the name of “The SDA Schools of Lincoln,” with the College View Academy the cap sheaf of the system.

Principals: C. L. Newkirk, 1963—1964; G. E. Thompson, 1964—1970; Henry Wooten, 1970—1971; D. A. Potter, 1971—1973; Oren W. Hewitt, 1973—1975; G. G. Davenport, 1975—1977; Dean Holmes, 1977—1979; Gary Bollinger, 1979—1983; Kenneth Utt, 1983—1985; Gary Bollinger, 1985—1989; Michael Schwartz, 1989— .

Collegedale Academy

COLLEGEDALE ACADEMY. A coeducational day and boarding school on the senior high school level, affiliated with Southern Missionary College, at Collegedale, near Chattanooga, Tennessee. It is owned and operated by the Georgia-Cumberland Conference. The parent institution, founded in 1893 as the Graysville Academy (later Southern Training School) at Graysville, Tennessee, was moved to Collegedale, Tennessee, and reopened in 1916 as Southern Junior College, which became a senior college in the spring of 1944 (see Southern College of Seventh-day Adventists).

Until 1936 grades 9 through 12 were organized as an integral part of the junior college program, but in that year the secondary school was given a separate status and renamed Collegedale Academy. In 1968 the Greater Collegedale School System was organized with its own board of trustees (made up of personnel from the Georgia-Cumberland Conference of Seventh-day Adventists, the Collegedale and Ooltewah Seventh-day Adventist churches), and since that time has carried the entire responsibility for the financial support and management of Collegedale Academy.

Collegedale Academy has been accredited since 1938 by the Tennessee State Department of Education, the Southern Association of Colleges and Secondary Schools, and the SDA Board of Regents. At the beginning of the 1992—1993 school year, the academy had an enrollment of 229 and a staff of 18 full-time teachers, 13 of whom hold master's degrees.

Principals: D. C. Ludington, 1944—1947; J. C. Gaitens, 1947—1949; M. J. Sorenson, 1949—1951; W. B. Higgins, 1951—1957; P. J. Hoar, 1957—1959; J. R. Siebenlist, 1959—1961; Kenneth Stewart, 1961—1964; F. H. Hewitt, 1964—1968; R. M. Barrow, 1968—1980; Dean E. Maddock, 1980—1987; Hamlet Canosa, 1987—1991; Kermise Rowe, 1991—. Before 1944 the academy was under the direction of the president of Southern Missionary College.

Colombia

COLOMBIA. A republic in the northwestern part of South America. Included in its territory are the islands of San Andrés, Providencia, and Santa Catalina, in the Caribbean Sea about 130 miles (210 kilometers) from the coast of Nicaragua, and the islands of Malpelo and Gorgona in the Pacific Ocean. The mainland is bounded on the north by the Caribbean Sea, on the east by Venezuela and Brazil, on the west by the Pacific Ocean and Panama, and on the south by Ecuador and Peru. Colombia, with an area of 439,735 square miles (1.1 million kilometers), is the fourth-largest country in South America.

Although Colombia is situated in the tropics, its climate varies with altitude from hot near the sea level to temperate in the highlands and cold in the Andes, whose peaks are covered with perpetual snow. The population of the country (1994) is 35.6 million.

Colombia was inhabited largely by the Chibcha Indians before the arrival of Europeans. In 1499 Alonso de Ojeda, a Spanish explorer, discovered what is now Colombia, and Spanish domination was established in 1538 by Jiménez de Quesada. In 1564 Colombia became a part of the presidency of New Granada under the viceroyalty of Peru.

The wars of independence are usually dated from 1781, when new taxation laws caused an Indian uprising. The rebellion was crushed, but the spirit of revolt persisted. Independence was gained in 1819, and on Dec. 17, 1819, Simón Bolívar united Venezuela and New Granada under the name of Republic of Colombia. Soon afterward this union, which in time included Ecuador also, became known as Gran Colombia and lasted until 1830. Since independence there have been repeated changes of government.

The language of Colombia is considered by some to be the purest Spanish in Latin America. Freedom of worship is guaranteed by the constitution, but Roman Catholicism was restored to the position of the state religion in 1957, some 20 years after its disestablishment in 1936. Protestantism is well represented among the different classes of society.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. The beginning of the work in mainland Colombia is usually dated about 1916 or 1917, although the area continued to be listed in the Adventist mission records as “unentered” until 1921. In 1894 Frank C. Kelley went from the United States to Bogotá as a self-supporting missionary, paying his expenses by teaching English and selling photographic goods. He returned to his homeland, married, and went again to Colombia, but his wife’s health required their return to the homeland in 1899, before any fruitage of their work was evident. The Kelleys returned again to Colombia in December 1920, when they worked for two and a half years before taking permanent return in 1923. About the turn of the century SDAs entered the islands of San Andrés and Providencia, which belong to Colombia but are situated some 200 miles (320 kilometers) north of Colón, Panama, and are inhabited mostly by non-Catholic English-speaking people. In 1901 S. Parker Smith (son of Uriah Smith) and his wife opened a school on San Andrés. In 1908 Smith wrote in the Review and Herald that there was a church of 19 members on the first island and a larger one on the other, and that SDA work was carried largely through the school on the islands. These islands were assigned to the West Caribbean Conference at that time.

A report in the Review and Herald late in 1915 states concerning mainland Colombia that “self-supporting workers have been in this field; but until a few weeks ago no regular conference work had ever been opened there.” Later reports show that B. E. Connerly, a minister of the West Caribbean Conference, had entered Colombia and had begun to prepare the field with health books for the eventual opening of a mission. He worked mainly in Barranquilla and Medellín. During 1916 and 1917, several colporteurs went into Colombia, among them Gilbert Schwerin, Harold C. Brown, and George A. Kneeland. They sold Guía Práctica de la Salud (“Practical Guide to Health”), Heraldos del Provenir (“Heralds of the Future”), and El Rey que Viene (“The Coming King”).

When Schwerin was in Bogotá, he sold a book to a shoe store owner by the name of Salvador Plata, who later became interested in SDA teachings. In 1921 another colporteur, L. V. Cleaves, went to Bogotá and also made contact with Salvador Plata, who introduced him to his brothers, Eugenio and Carlos. Cleaves studied the Bible with them, and when others joined the group (among them Francisco and Manuel Hernandez, Joaquin Rincón, and the Lemoine family), a Sabbath school was formed. Late in 1921 E. Max Trummer, then president of the West Caribbean Conference, of which Colombia formed a part, visited Bogotá and held the first SDA public meetings in the country. Two years later, in 1923, Francisco Hernandez and Eugenio and Carlos Plata were baptized in Bogotá. Trummer organized a church there in 1923.

In 1921 a box of SDA books was sent to the seaport of Cartagena. When no one claimed it, the books were finally distributed among the members of the local Presbyterian congregation, whose pastor, Antonio Redondo, became interested in SDA doctrines through reading them.

In 1922 Trummer conducted the first baptism in Colombia, at which time Antonio Redondo and his wife and daughter were baptized in the Sinú River near a small town called Cereté. Thereafter, Redondo became a Bible instructor and went to Barranquilla, where he gathered Moisés Valdés, Manuel Martínez, Modesto Mayorga, Sebastián Meléndez, and Gonzalo Luna Escandón into the first group to be baptized there. They formed the nucleus of a church that was organized in Barranquilla in 1924, the second in the Colombian Mission.

Organization and Growth. In 1922 Colombia was organized as a mission in the Central American Mission (the next year in the Caribbean Union Mission), with Trummer as its first superintendent, and headquarters at Bogotá. In 1925 the territory of Colombia was divided into four local missions: the Atlantic Colombia, with offices at Barranquilla; the Antioquian, with offices at Medellín; the Central Colombia, with offices at Bogotá; and the Pacific Colombia, with offices at Cali. However, it took several years to staff all these missions. Not until 1927 did George C. Nickle and his wife go to Cali to organize the work in that city.

In 1927 the Colombia Venezuela Union, composed of Colombia, Venezuela, and the island of Curaçao, was organized at a meeting held at the Inter-American Division office in Balboa, Canal Zone, Panama. The first union committee meeting in Colombia was held Aug. 15, 1929. The union headquarters were first established in Cali, Colombia. At that time H. E. Baasch was union president; J. B. Ross, secretary-treasurer; Fred Steeves, publishing secretary; and Carlos Plata, press secretary. On Feb. 23, 1930, the union offices were moved to Medellín, where they have remained. In 1932 the first church property in Bogotá was bought.

With minor variations, the territorial division of Colombia was maintained until on Jan. 17, 1941, the work on the mainland of Colombia was reorganized into three missions: the Upper Magdalena Mission, the Atlantic Colombia Mission, and the Pacific Colombia Mission, with headquarters in Bogotá, Barranquilla, and Cali, respectively.

In 1951 the Colombian Islands were transferred from the Central American Union to the Colombia-Venezuela Union and the Atlantic Colombia Mission. In 1955 they became a separate mission.

The Colombian Union Conference was reorganized in 1989 and in 1993, with five missions or conferences: the Atlantic Colombia Mission, the Colombian Islands Mission, the East Colombia Conference, the Pacific Colombia Conference, and the Upper Magdalena Conference.

Health, Education, and Welfare Work. In 1936 a union training school near the city of Medellín was established, later known as the Instituto Colombo-Venezolano, and now as Colombia Adventist University.

The Voice of Prophecy radio program is broadcast over several national radio stations and is favorably received by the public. Welfare activities fostered by the SDA Church are liberally supported by numerous merchants.

Seventh-day Adventists are well known in even the most isolated sections of the country for their health principles, clean living, and strict honesty. Except in the case of ecclesiastical opposition, which at times has developed into persecution during periods of political instability, government authorities generally grant liberty to SDAs to promote various activities.

Colombia Adventist University

COLOMBIA ADVENTIST UNIVERSITY (Corporacion Universitaria Adventista; formerly Colombia-Venezuela Union College). A coeducational boarding school on the junior college level situated in Santa Teresita, a suburb of Medellín, Colombia, on a 60-acre (25-hectare) farm known as El Noral. Operated by the Colombia Union Conference through a school board, the college serves a union constituency of more than 115,000 members.

The school year runs from February to October. Instruction is in Spanish. After operating on a yearly renewal of registration the school was granted an operating permit by the Colombian Ministry of Education on Dec. 19, 1958. Although the school was founded especially for the benefit of Seventh-day Adventist young people from Colombia and Venezuela, it receives a limited number of students of other faiths.

Established in 1936, the school opened on Feb. 15, 1937, with 12 students under the direction of G. W. Chapman, with Mrs. Chapman, R. D. Buckner, and Mercedes Castro on the faculty. Known as the Colegio Industrial Colombo-Venezolano (Colombia-Venezuela Industrial College), it occupied for one year a two-story house in a section of Medellín known as Aranjuez. Then for four years the school operated on a small rented farm known as La Mariela, five miles (eight kilometers) from Medellín, and the name was changed to Academia Colombo-Venezolano (Colombia-Venezuela Academy). The first class graduated in 1940.

In July 1941 the school was moved to El Noral (purchased for 21,000 pesos). Two concrete dormitories were built at the foot of a hill. During the first years the second floors served as dormitory rooms for students, and the ground floors were used as teachers' quarters, kitchen, dining room, chapel, and classrooms. Two teachers' cottages were also built, and farm buildings were remodeled to serve as a bakery, a carpenter and print shop, and a cottage for the caretaker.

In 1945 a reinforced concrete administration building was erected, the second floor housing an ample kitchen and a large dining room, and the first floor the administrative offices, classrooms, the laundry, and a small store. In 1948 the school adopted the name Instituto Colombo-Venezolano (also known as Colombia-Venezuela Union College and before 1948 as Colombia-Venezuela Union Training School).

In 1952 a large court for games and sports was built by student labor. The printshop and an elementary school were constructed in 1954. A new entrance to the school was opened in 1957, and was later paved. An auditorium was built in 1961 and furnished in 1962 with new benches and an electric organ. The organ was assembled on the campus and its cabinet built in the carpenter shop. Additional teachers' homes brought the total residences to 10.

The small-scale industries include a print shop, bakery, carpentry shop, book bindery, and farm.

The program followed for several years included five years of primary instruction, six years of secondary, plus one year of specialized training. In 1960 the addition of another year of specialized instruction gave the school junior college rating. During 1963 the school board standardized the graduation requirements of the ministerial, normal, secretarial, commercial, and music courses. Ninety percent of the SDA workers in the Colombia Union have graduated from this school.

The music building of the college was inaugurated Dec. 4, 1973. The facility provides four teaching studios, 10 practice rooms, a large hall for ensemble rehearsals and recital functions of the department, a group piano studio, a department office, and a broadcast/recording suite.

The school publishes a prospectus combined with the annual, called the Omega.

The secondary students attending from Providencia board with families in San Andrés. Until 1973 the secondary school used part of the facilities of the primary school, but in 1974 two classrooms were added to help accommodate the secondary students. The school was established in 1964 under the direction of Jaime Perry, and is recognized by the SDA Board of Regents and the Colombian government. In 1993 the school functioned in a new installation in Bahía del Cove. In 1993 the school had a faculty and staff of 14.

Colorado Conference

COLORADO CONFERENCE. A unit of church organization that included the state of Colorado and also San Juan County in New Mexico. (See also Central States Conference.) On Feb. 8, 1981, the Colorado Conference was merged with the Wyoming Conference to form the Rocky Mountain Conference. The Colorado Conference was part of the Central Union Conference.

History

History. 1. Beginnings of the Work in Colorado. Shortly after the gold rush to Colorado in the early 1860s a young Seventh-day Adventist girl came across the plains of Kansas and Colorado in a covered wagon and found work in the home of a miner in Denver. She later married a miner named Shaw and they made their home in Golden. Their son, J. L. Shaw, was for years the treasurer of the General Conference. The second SDA in Colorado was Mrs. Amy Dart, who settled in Boulder in 1872 and began to circulate SDA publications. That same year James and Ellen White spent some time in Colorado recuperating their health. They bought a 40-acre (15-hectare) tract in the mountains back of Boulder and made contact with the two lone SDAs in the state. D. M. Canright, who came to see the Whites in their retreat, visited the Shaws at Golden, and in August and September 1873 held meetings-the first Seventh-day Adventist evangelistic meetings in Colorado. Because of the resulting interests, the General Conference named Colorado a mission. In 1878 an experienced evangelist, M. E. Cornell, went to open work there. He held meetings at Boulder and Georgetown.

Because of the cold nights at that elevation, the meetings were closed Sept. 22, but as a result of the campaign two ministers accepted the SDA faith. Later that fall Cornell held meetings at Sunshine and won at least 15 converts. The next summer J. O. Corliss and A. O. Burrill joined him. They held meetings in Longmont, Boulder, Denver, St. Vrain, and Fort Collins. At Boulder on Aug. 2, 1879, a church of 26 was organized-the first in Colorado-and a Sabbath school of 40. At St. Vrain a church of 13 was formed in October. At Denver the membership increased from 3 to 30. James and Ellen White came and spoke at Boulder and Denver. At Denver Ellen White spoke at a temperance rally attended by more than 600. In 1881 the first Seventh-day Adventist church building in Colorado was completed at Boulder.

In the spring of 1880 A. J. Stover visited a group of adherents that had spontaneously arisen at Texas Creek as a result of reading the Signs of the Times and other SDA publications. Only one of the group had ever seen an SDA preacher. One had been a Methodist preacher in Missouri but was expelled for keeping the Sabbath. Nine "signed the covenant," and about eight expressed a desire for baptism.

After another series of meetings in Denver, begun on Aug. 18, 1880, a church of 21 members was organized. It met in a canvas tabernacle that accommodated the 60 persons who attended Sabbath school.

2. Colorado Conference Organized. The first Colorado camp meeting was held Sept. 26—Oct. 2, 1883, in the outskirts of Denver, with nine delegates representing four churches and “two classes,” and with an attendance of from 100 to 150. At this meeting the Colorado Conference was organized, with E. R. Jones president, J. W. Horner secretary, and H. H. Pierce treasurer. The Colorado Conference territory consisted of Colorado, New Mexico, and Wyoming.

3. Beginnings on the Western Slope. The Rocky Mountains, running from north to south, divide Colorado into two dissimilar geographical sections, almost like two different states, with travel difficult between them. In the autumn of 1885 George O. States with his family settled on Surface Creek and preached the first SDA sermon on the Western Slope at Eckert, in the home of the first member in the conference living west of the mountains, a man named Castle.

The next spring States canvassed in Delta County, selling Uriah Smith’s Marvel of Nations and Ellen G. White’s Great Controversy. In the summer of 1886 States and George Cram held the first tent meetings on the Western Slope, at Montrose. Because of disturbances caused by a lynching mob attacking the neighboring jail, the meetings were disrupted, but evangelism in the area went forward through personal work.

A series of meetings at Crawford in 1887 won five; by 1888 the persevering States had increased the number to 21 and organized them into the first church on the Western Slope. Churches were organized at Aspen in 1895 and at Glenwood Springs in 1899. Other western Colorado churches organized in the 1890s were Uncompahgre, Pitkin, Fruita, Telluride, Durango, Paonia, Grand Junction, and Eckert. At Farmington, in San Juan County, New Mexico, a church had been organized by 1899, and the first SDA church building in New Mexico had been dedicated.

4. Subsequent History. In the meantime new churches east of the mountains had been admitted to the conference in the 1880s and 1890s: Silver Cliff, 1888; Pueblo, 1889; Colorado Springs, 1890; North Willow, Lyons, and Alamosa, 1894; Monte Vista, Idaho Springs, and Alma, 1895; La Veta, Bellevue, and Timpas Valley, 1896; Salida, Wentz, Hygiene, Fort Morgan, Cripple Creek, Florence, and Howard, 1897; Niwot, 1899; Canon City was also organized in the 1890s.

By 1902, when Colorado became part of the new Central Union Conference, the Colorado Conference, embracing Colorado and New Mexico, had 42 churches and nine companies, with a membership of about 2,000.

5. Schools. The Delta church operated a school in 1897—1898, which possibly was the first one in Colorado. In 1898 Boulder, Denver, and Longmont operated church schools.

Several churches west of the mountains, under the leadership of H.M.J. Richards, opened the Palisade school in the fall of 1904, out of which grew the Western Slope Industrial School. This was later called Colorado Western Slope Academy, which by 1907 was a 12-grade school with an enrollment of 85. In the meantime, on the Eastern Slope the Eastern Colorado Academy opened in 1907 at Campion (see Campion Academy). By 1913 the western school disappeared from the records.

6. Inter-Mountain Conference, a Temporary Organization. After a time the members on the Western Slope asked to organize their own conference. Their request was not immediately granted, but a vice president, resident on the Western Slope, was elected in 1903, and special camp meetings were held from time to time on the Western Slope.

In 1908 the conference was split along the continental divide to make the new Western Colorado Conference, with headquarters at Grand Junction. The rest of the conference was renamed Eastern Colorado Conference, but in 1909 it took back the original name, Colorado Conference. (New Mexico, with the exception of San Juan County, had already been turned over to the Southwestern Union in 1907.) The Western Colorado Conference was enlarged in 1916 to take in Utah, renamed Inter-Mountain Conference, and joined to the Pacific Union Conference. In 1918 this new conference founded a new Western Slope Academy at Rulison, known as Inter-Mountain Academy. In 1920 the Inter-Mountain Conference was reorganized to include only the eastern part of Utah, western Colorado, and San Juan County, New Mexico, and was returned to the Central Union Conference. On Aug. 1, 1932, the Inter-Mountain Conference was dissolved, eastern Utah going back to the Pacific Union, and western Colorado and San Juan County, New Mexico, reuniting with eastern Colorado to reform the Colorado Conference. The Western Slope membership had grown from 300 at the division, in 1908, to 697 in 1932 at the reunion. With the dissolving of the conference, Inter-Mountain Academy ceased to operate.

7. Medical Institutions. In 1893 John Fulton visited Boulder for his health, and soon afterward persuaded J. H. Kellogg, head of SDA medical work, to establish a sanitarium there. This later became the Boulder Memorial Hospital, under the control of the Central Union Conference. The Porter Memorial Hospital, although never owned by the Colorado Conference, was opened in Denver, a private gift to the Central Union Conference, in 1930.

8. Evangelistic Projects and Methods. By 1906 the Colorado Conference was supporting 12 missionaries in other countries; in 1908 the conference began sending one third of its tithe quarterly to the General Conference. Colporteur work began early in Colorado. In 1886 canvassing companies were organized, which worked together for moral support as they traveled from place to place, covering section after section. One feature in the later 1890s was a “colporteur wagon.” The canvasser took his family in the wagon, and making a temporary headquarters, canvassed the area round about and then moved on to another base.

When in the 1880s the General Conference encouraged the establishment of urban centers for in-service training in evangelism, known as city missions, such an institution was opened in Denver in 1886 and operated for several years. In 1897 an 85-room building was rented and operated for several years as a “city medical mission and workingmen’s home.” The Bethel Mission, another center operated under the same management, was a rescue home for women. Another mission of the same type was opened in Boulder in 1893. Vegetarian cafés in Denver and Colorado Springs were prospering in 1902. Another training program for workers was the three-month Bible School. The one for 1894 taught various advanced grade and high school subjects and emphasized Bible, English, history, and canvassing.

9. Growth in the Denver Area. The membership in the city of Denver grew slowly from 21 members in one church in the fall of 1880 to 3,766 members in nine churches by 1974, as lay evangelism and branch Sabbath schools resulted in several churches around the periphery, and public evangelistic campaigns resulted in others. A Black church that belongs to the Central States Conference unites with the other local churches in support of the consolidated school. The first church school in Denver, a one-teacher school, opened in 1898—1899. In 1928 there were 10 grades, and by 1963 a full-fledged academy (see Mile High Academy).

Colorado was among the first conferences to have a young people's department. As early as 1894, the "Young People's Missionary Band of Denver" petitioned the conference for aid in extending young people's work through the conference. In time the Sabbath school department was given the responsibility of doing something for the young people. In 1904 the Central Union held a young people's convention at Union College. In 1905 before the General Conference Missionary Volunteer Department was founded, Meade MacGuire became the first field secretary of the young people's department for Colorado.

10. Workers From the East. Like other Western states, Colorado profited by numbers of SDA settlers coming from farther east. These did missionary work among their neighbors and aroused an interest that led to the establishing of several new churches.

Among the workers who came to Colorado for health and remained to work was G. W. Anglebarger, a minister of the Ohio Conference. Told that he could not live a year if he remained in a severe climate, he arrived at Denver in the late 1880s to take charge of the city mission, and remained to work, principally in Denver, for the next 40 years. F. M. Wilcox came with his wife to Boulder Sanitarium seeking to improve his health in 1895 and stayed as an employee of that institution 14 years. C. C. Holbrook, an unusual and influential man, not a conference worker, was judge of the twelfth judicial district of Colorado. Because his court did not convene on the Sabbath, he cleared a crowded docket by holding court in the evening. He held a ministerial license, was a member of the conference committee, and often preached.

11. Recent Developments. In 1950 the conference purchased Glacier View campsite, which now has 530 acres (215 hectares), a beautiful mountain lake, and 39 permanent structures. Construction of a new 660-seat chapel and a 52-room lodge housing 200 people was begun in the spring of 1974. The name was changed to Glacier View Ranch on Nov. 20, 1972.

A new conference office building near the Porter Memorial Hospital in Denver was occupied Jan. 1, 1958. A new wing was opened Sept. 1, 1971, to house the Adventist Book Center. On Apr. 1, 1963, the conference joined others in the support of the La Vida Mission for the Navajo Indians, 53 miles (85 kilometers) from Farmington, New Mexico.

By 1974 all non-English-speaking churches and companies had disbanded or joined English-speaking churches except for one Navajo and two Spanish churches.

The Rocky Mountain Conference, merging the Colorado and Wyoming conferences, was organized in 1981. See that listing for additional history and information.

Coltheart, John Frederick

COLTHEART, JOHN FREDERICK (1924—1974). Evangelist. A native of Tasmania, he was baptized into the church at 14 years of age. After graduation from Avondale College he received a call to labor in New Zealand. He left for that field immediately, saving money by sleeping on deck. In 1948 he married Raye Williams, and four years later he was ordained to the gospel ministry. He conducted large evangelistic campaigns in 10 countries, speaking to audiences as large as 10,000.

In 1967 he became evangelist for the Northern European Division. Later he served as secretary of the Ministerial Association. During this time he held successful campaigns in cities such as London, Bristol, Edinburgh, Rotterdam, Helsinki, and Oslo.

Columbia Adventist Academy

COLUMBIA ADVENTIST ACADEMY. A coeducational secondary school operated by a local constituency of 11 churches. It is situated on a 250-acre (100-hectare) tract in Meadow Glade, approximately 12 miles (20 kilometers) northeast of Vancouver, Washington, and 2.5 miles (four kilometers) southwest of Battle Ground, Washington. It is accredited by the state of Washington, the Seventh-day Adventist Board of Regents, and the Northwest Association of Secondary and Higher Schools.

The physical plant consists of an administration building, containing classrooms, science laboratories, library, registration and business offices; a classroom annex; a music conservatory-gymnasium; home economics building; shop; cafeteria; seven faculty cottages; two barns; loafing shed for cattle; machine shed; and industrial building.

The forerunner of the present academy was a church school established in 1899 in Vancouver, Washington, by John R. Clark and his wife, who had come from England. Myrtle Clark Atkins was the first teacher, and among other early teachers were John J. Clark and Nellie Clark. With the addition of a few boarding students in the fourth year, the Clarks moved to a large tract of land about 12 miles (20 kilometers) northeast of Vancouver. Of this tract they donated 20 acres (eight hectares) to the conference, in a wooded area, on which in 1903 the Meadow Glade school was begun in a building of rough boards. In 1906 the first permanent building was erected and the school was expanded to 10 grades, and about 1911 to 12 grades. Land north of the school was cleared in 1912—1913 by the schoolboys and the local church members.

Some of the early supporters of the school were L. D. House, a church elder; J. R. Clark and his son, John; L. F. Burdoin, board member and for 18 years business manager; H. W. Lashier; Joe Emmerson, Sr.; A. Elmer Fleck; John F. Gildersleeve; and G. E. Johnson, three times principal, whose leadership did much to mold the school.

In 1915 the Western Washington Conference placed the school under local church management. In 1922 the school was renamed Columbia Academy. Beginning in 1928, the principal's salary was paid by the Western Oregon Conference, to whose territory several southwest counties in the state of Washington had been transferred.

After years of hardship, including a fire in 1936 that destroyed the library, some of the boys' apartments, and the business office, the school came under the control of the newly formed Oregon Conference in 1939.

An extensive building program followed, including a girls' dormitory (1946, enlarged 1964), a church, a home-economics building, a laundry, a boys' dormitory, a combined music conservatory and gymnasium, service and industrial buildings, a masonry-and-steel barn housing an enlarged dairy herd and providing modern facilities for the dairy (operated from 1927 to 1986), a cafeteria and a classroom annex. Farmland and a new well and water tower were also added.

The school was renamed Columbia Adventist Academy in 1974. After three years of negotiations, planning, and preparation a Harris Pine Mills installation began production in 1975 and operated successfully until 1989.

Because of the cost of operating three boarding schools in the Oregon Conference and the decline in senior academy students, the Oregon constituency voted to make CAA a day academy beginning in the 1977—1978 school year. In the 1990s there was a school enrollment of 150 students.

Columbia Union College

COLUMBIA UNION COLLEGE. A coeducational four-year liberal arts college in Takoma Park, Maryland. Established as Washington Training College in 1904, it was renamed Washington Foreign Mission Seminary the same year. In 1913 its name was changed to Washington Missionary College, and to Columbia Union College in 1961. It is accredited by the Middle States Association of Colleges and Schools and by the SDA Board of Regents, and is a member of the American Association of Colleges. It is recognized by the State Board of Education of the state of Maryland for the preparation of elementary and secondary school teachers, by the National League for Nursing for its program in nursing, including public health nursing, and by the Committee on Allied Health Education and Accreditation of the American Medical Association for its medical laboratory technician and medical technology programs.

The campus comprises 20 acres (eight hectares) of land in the north-central area of the city of Takoma Park, on Carroll and Flower avenues. The 14 buildings include an administration building, residence halls, laboratories, library, and gymnasium. The total evaluation stands at more than $9 million.

The governing board is composed of not more than 38 members, including the president, executive secretary, treasurer, and director of education of the Columbia Union Conference; the presidents of the eight constituent conferences; the president of the college; the president of Washington Adventist Hospital, the pastor of the Sligo Seventh-day Adventist Church; and one trustee elected from among the principals of the senior academies of the Columbia Union Conference. Enrollment in 1993 was 1,159, and the staff numbered 125 (six administrators, 23 associate and assistant administrators, 47 instructors, four supervisory and 45 auxiliary personnel).

Washington Training College. The institution was founded when the denominational headquarters were moved to the Washington, D.C., area after two disastrous fires had destroyed the two largest institutions (Battle Creek Sanitarium, Feb. 18, 1902, and the Review and Herald publishing house, Dec. 30, 1902). Counseled by Ellen White not to rebuild in Battle Creek, but to find a favorable place in the Eastern states, the locating committee, composed of A. G. Daniells, W. W. Prescott, I. H. Evans, S. N. Haskell, H. W. Cottrell, S. N. Curtiss, J. E. Jayne, W. A. Spicer, C. D. Rhodes, and D. W. Reavis, investigated many properties from the Hudson River to the Potomac River. After weeks of searching and comparing, the committee selected and authorized the purchase, for $6,000, of the 50-acre (20-hectare) tract in Takoma Park on which Columbia Union College and the Washington Adventist Hospital now stand. The land was approved by Ellen White as the place for a college.

Their report was presented to a council convening in Washington, D.C., Oct. 7, 1903. The council recommended that a campaign be launched to raise $100,000 for the General Conference building, a school, and a sanitarium, and to pay for the land, moving, and equipment. By June 15, 1905, $103,054.20 had been received.

Thus, under the direct management of the General Conference, the construction of Washington Training College began June 1, 1904. Corporation papers were signed July 27, 1904, and the first college term began on Nov. 30, 1904, with 50 students and the following administration: James W. Lawhead, president; Benjamin G. Wilkinson, Bible and history; Mrs. B. G. Wilkinson, English; Mrs. M. H. Tuxford, matron and home economics; W. A. Colcord, English; J.A.L. Derby, science; Walton John, music; H. E. Rogers, business and shorthand.

During the first three years of the college's history, its spirit of sacrifice and devotion to missions manifested itself in the loyalty and unity of its faculty and students in a new venture in education. Three buildings, North Hall, Central Hall, and South Hall, now stood on the main campus. About a half mile (0.8 kilometers) away was a large dwelling house, the temporary residence of Ellen White, which served also in part as the women's residence hall. As more than an interested observer of a new educational institution, Mrs. White not only took an interest in the management, the faculty, and all the students of the college but she made it her personal duty to encourage the workmen who were constructing the walls and shaping the campus. She invited them to worship in the morning.

Washington Foreign Mission Seminary. At the biennial General Conference council of May 10, 1907, at Gland, Switzerland, the vexing problem confronting the delegates was the dearth of competent missionary personnel. To avoid sending out ineffectively prepared or unsuited missionary appointees to a foreign land, it was necessary to furnish preliminary training. The finger of circumstance pointed to Washington Training College as the most favorably situated for, and as most easily adaptable to, this special purpose. Thus in 1907 the Washington Foreign Mission Seminary was established, under the presidency of Homer R. Salisbury, who earlier had left the United States to be principal of Duncombe Hall Training College, London (see Newbold College), and from there had been assigned to the Levant Union Mission. The former principal of the denomination's school at Cape Town, South Africa, C. H. Hayton, was business manager. The members of the faculty were men with a variety of experiences and backgrounds, such as Arthur G. Daniells, William A. Spicer, George A. Irwin, Eugene W. Farnsworth, and Frederick E. Griggs; and Drs. Harry W. Miller and Daniel H. Kress.

The enrollment for the year 1907—1908 was 77. That was a year of new ventures and many firsts for the college. The first missionary faculty member left the college to go as a missionary to China, taking with him three new missionary recruits. The first full-time faculty member sailed for mission duty in South America. The first on-campus ordination service was held. The first electrically driven printing press was installed. The first administration building, College Hall, later known as Science Hall, was completed.

The mission training program was intensive and covered such backgrounds as the geography, history, and culture of the various countries. Both John L. Shaw, returning from mission service in India, and Milton E. Kern headed the seminary for brief terms. By the close of 1913 there had gone from its halls 90 trainees to preach and teach in 27 countries of the earth.

A Liberal Arts College. In the autumn of 1914 the seminary resumed the status of a liberal arts college, for which it already had a charter, and took the name Washington Missionary College. A program was begun for defining academic departments. Because of the need for a distinct line of demarcation between college preparatory and college work, certain college prerequisites were set up. A summer school was put into operation for the first time. At the first commencement exercises, held May 22, 1915, five received the Bachelor of Arts degree.

In 1915—1916 the college, whose plant had been built for 150 students, reached an enrollment of 270, and the dormitory overflow had to be housed in tents. A fund-raising campaign for more college buildings was begun in which, on Jan. 20, 1916, faculty and students banded themselves into an organization known as the Students' Association and raised $7,500. In April 1916 the first issue of the Sligonian, a monthly college paper (called the Columbia Journal since 1981), appeared with two main interests—more students and more money for the building campaign. Despite the material shortages created by World War I, an administration building, named Columbia Hall, was erected, and dedicated free of debt on Feb. 20, 1919. By the end of the second decade, in the fall of 1924, the institution looked proudly at its increased enrollment, now 400, its enlarged dormitories, an addition to the dining room, new laboratory equipment, new industrial shops, a better home-economics department, and more books for the library; also at the faculty's scholarship level and its unified effort in fulfilling the religious and scholastic purposes for which the college was founded.

In establishing a separate junior college under the name of Columbia Junior College in June 1933, the board of trustees separated the lower freshman and sophomore classes from the senior college and assigned them to certain faculty members who, as the faculty of Columbia Junior College, taught junior-level terminal courses. An entirely new organization was set up, a separate bulletin was prepared, and separate scholarship requirements were enforced. The new junior college was accredited in due time by the Middle States Association. This accreditation, needed for premedical and teacher training courses, in no way jeopardized the possibilities for future senior college accreditation. The program, originated and advocated by John P. Neff, secretary of education for the Columbia Union Conference, went into effect in August 1933. Dr. Benjamin G. Wilkinson, dean of theology of the senior college (and one of the few faculty members with a Ph.D. degree), was elected dean of the junior college. The junior college operated until 1944.

In 1936 a revitalized college building program began, including a building (now H.M.S. Richards Hall, housing the department of religion) to house the elementary school and the teacher training program (1939), a central heating plant (1940), a new library building (1942), named the Theofield G. Weis Memorial Library in 1970 to honor his many years of service, and an addition to Science Hall (formerly College Hall). The institution received senior college accreditation with the Middle States Association in 1942.

The growth of the college continued with ever-increasing momentum during the next two decades. The institution passed successfully through rigid accreditation inspections and internal difficulties. Young and highly trained teachers were brought to the campus. An almost defunct alumni association was revitalized. Halcyon Hall, women's residence, was completed in 1947 (enlarged 1963). A gymnasium was erected in 1950 and a swimming pool was added to the same building in 1955.

The early 1960s saw several additions to the campus. In 1962 Morrison Hall, a new men's residence, was occupied. It was named in honor of the former president, Harvey A. Morrison, and its chapel was named in honor of G. Eric Jones (dean of men, 1927—1936).

In the same year the interior of Columbia Hall was completely altered, except for the chapel, to accommodate the administrative offices and a modern self-service bookstore.

In 1963 a new wing was added to Halcyon Hall, housing an additional 110 girls. Long-range plans were laid for new buildings to be added.

The college operates a department of behavioral science offering a degree in psychology, the first of its kind in the denomination. The campus radio station, WGTS-FM, with a power of 29,500 watts, covers the metropolitan area and reaches out as far as New Jersey, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and central Virginia.

In 1950 the Washington Sanitarium and Hospital School of Nursing was reorganized and made a part of the college baccalaureate program in the Department of Nursing, but the sanitarium did not relinquish entire control of the nursing school until 1956. In 1961 full accreditation by the National League for Nursing, including public health nursing, was obtained, this in addition to the academic accreditation from the Middle States Association previously received.

In 1966 the Museum of Biblical Antiquities was dedicated in the H.M.S. Richards Hall of Religion. Also the John M. Keller Memorial Library was dedicated by the biology department.

Following the devastating fire that destroyed Columbia Hall on Feb. 19, 1970, the Campus Center was speedily completed and occupied. This new complex with 100,000 square feet (9,300 square meters) cost $3.1 million and houses the administrative offices, dining room, and some classrooms. It was renamed Wilkinson Hall in 1982 in honor of the first Bible/history teacher, B. G. Wilkinson.

Because of the tremendous need to provide for the burgeoning Medical Technology Department, the former press building has been renovated at a cost of $175,000. This new Health Sciences Building opened in November 1974, and was enlarged and renovated in 1983.

In 1984 the college began the adult evening program to meet the needs of adults in the community who are working full-time but wish to complete a baccalaureate degree.

In attempting to meet the needs of youth today who desire shorter college courses, eight two-year Associate of Arts degree programs are being offered. CUC is committed to providing the finest in Christian education in training its youth in the sciences, the arts, and the humanities. But its highest goal is to inspire them in spiritual commitment to Jesus Christ.

Communication, Department of COMMUNICATION, DEPARTMENT OF. A General Conference department formed by the merger of the Bureau of Public Relations and the Radio-Television Department in January 1973. The merger was suggested by the advisory committees of the two departments and approved at the 1972 Annual Council. At the 1990 General Conference session, the department's function was refocused to address primarily the press and media relations from the General Conference.

The Communication Department's concerns include the development and maintenance of a true image of the church, a clear understanding of the church's principles by the public, and the effective use of broadcast and audiovisual techniques and media in communicating the gospel to the world. To achieve this, the department utilizes every appropriate medium of public information and community relations.

The department offers services to its two primary publics, that of the church itself and of the church's various publics. Representing the entire church to the public media and the community at large, the department offers a variety of communication services—including media relations and broadcast and video productions—to other departments and entities. In this sense, it functions at headquarters much like an institutional public relations office. At the same time it maintains a departmental program throughout the world church along the same lines as other church departments, counseling and aiding the various church organizations and institutions on the corporate and local level in their communications and media programs.

Interests of the department are served by communication directors at division, union, local conference, and church levels.

The 1990 refocusing of the Communication Department established its primary function as that of the Office of News and Information. In 1994 the department included four units: (1) the Office of News and Information, with its Adventist News Network (ANN) serving the official press agency of the Seventh-day Adventist Church; (2) Media Services, a production center for video and information service broadcast programming; (3) SDAs On-line Forum on CompuServe, and (4) Public Relations and General Conference tours.

The General Conference Spring Meeting of 1993 established the Communication Strategy Commission to address the communication ministry of the Seventh-day Adventist Church. The commission had a fourfold purpose: (1) to establish an overall communication strategy/structure for the church to govern its broadcast media, public relations, and other communication activities both within the church and for the world at large; (2) to design this strategy for use at all levels and by all entities of the church; (3) to develop the strategy/structure in such a way that it will provide direction for all broadcast media, public relations, and communication activities; (4) to provide a basis in the strategy for all supporting ministries involved in communication activities to contribute to the overall communication strategy of the church. See also Seventh-day Adventist Media Center.

Community Hospital of Seventh-day Adventists

COMMUNITY HOSPITAL OF SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTISTS. A general acute hospital with a capacity of 61 beds and 10 bassinets, owned and operated by the Caribbean Union in Port-of-Spain, Trinidad, West Indies. The property consists of a modern, two-story, reinforced concrete structure situated on a leased five-acre (two-hectare) tract of land. The hospital, administered by a hospital administrator and a chief of staff, maintains medical, surgical, dental, and obstetrical departments.

The Community Hospital of Seventh-day Adventists developed out of an outpatient clinic opened by R. F. Dunlop in rented quarters at the corner of Charlotte and New streets, Port-of-Spain, Trinidad, on May 1, 1948, under the name of Port-of-Spain Seventh-day Adventist Clinic. Later in 1948 a building was purchased at 2A Mucurapo Road, and was used as a charity clinic. After a year the clinic was wholly self-supporting. After the need for inpatient facilities became apparent, a building was made available by the South Caribbean Conference in a desirable location at 7 Queen's Park West, and in these quarters a 16-bed nursing home, called the Seventh-day Adventist Medical Unit, was established on Apr. 19, 1953.

In 1955 R. F. Dunlop, medical secretary of the Caribbean Union, suggested a site at Cocorite, Western Main Road, controlled by the government of Trinidad, on which to construct a hospital plant. The site was leased, and construction began Feb. 1, 1960. The project was completed and patients were transferred from the nursing home on Sept. 17, 1962. At that time the institution was named Port-of-Spain Community Hospital. The first chairman of the board of directors was C. J. Ritchie.

On Sept. 3, 1970, the administrative structure of Port-of-Spain Adventist Hospital was changed from that of medical director-business manager to that of administrator and chief of staff. Mrs. Betty Robertson, M.A., who was director of nursing services, was appointed the first administrator of the hospital and Dr. W. H. Shea was appointed chief of staff. L. K. Hadley was appointed assistant administrator in charge of business.

On Nov. 30, 1973, the hospital board voted to change the official name of the hospital from Port-of-Spain Community Hospital of Seventh-day Adventists to Port-of-Spain Adventist Hospital. In 1994 the hospital's name was changed once again, to Community Hospital of Seventh-day Adventists.

In 1994 a staff of 23, including six physicians and dentists, served the hospital.

Medical Directors: R. F. Dunlop, 1962; V. J. Soloniuk, 1963—1964; W. H. Shea, 1964—1965; James Miyashiro, 1966—1967; Richard Larsen, 1968—1969; Daniel Patchin, 1969—1970.

Community Services

COMMUNITY SERVICES (formerly known as Health and Welfare Services). The generic name used to designate social and emergency services given by the church to individuals, families, and larger groups in the community. These services encompass giving material aid in such forms as clothing, bedding, furniture, and household furnishings. They sometimes take the form of small cash grants in emergency situations. Included also are adult-education classes in such areas as healthful cooking, home management and budgeting, dressmaking, child care, home nursing, first aid, and medical self-help. Other free services frequently offered are relief ministry to disaster victims, mobile health screening, and summer camping for inner-city children.

Community Services programs are promoted and directed by the Department of Personal Ministries, in cooperation with church administrative officers and other church departments. Program planning and decision-making are done through committees on local church, local conference, union conference, division, and General Conference levels.

On the General Conference level the board of the Adventist Development and Relief Agency (ADRA) deals with disaster relief assistance as well as international relief. On division, union conference, and local conference levels, Community Services planning and funding is the responsibility of a committee that serves as a subcommittee of the conference executive committee.

On the local church level the total Community Services program is under the direction of the church evangelism council. This council coordinates the outreach programs of all departments. It also is the planning committee for personal ministries, and it therefore makes all major decisions affecting church Community Services programs.

The particular subsidiary organizations within the Department of Church Ministries that are responsible for Community Services include: the Dorcas Society, an organization of church women, Adventist Men, and the Community Services center.

The Dorcas Society specializes in giving material aid to families and in supplying clothing and bedding for international disaster relief. Adventist Men, in addition to conducting lay preachers' evangelistic meetings, specialize in work for prisoners and their families and in disaster relief. The Community Services center not only serves as a vehicle for Dorcas Society distribution of life necessities, but is also the base for adult education.

Visiting in Community Services. Visiting homes in Community Services gives the program a community outreach. Three types of visits are made: the initial visit, intended to acquaint the family with Community Services plans and to find needy persons or those willing to donate materials; the pick-up call, to gather supplies to be distributed to the needy or to supply relief to the unfortunate; and the follow-up visit to homes, to give further aid and spiritual encouragement.

Every Member in Community Services. All members of the Seventh-day Adventist Church are encouraged to take part in Christian benevolence and welfare service. They are taught the biblical basis for their service in the example and the commission of Jesus (Matt.

4:23; 10:8; Luke 10:37) and the prophetic message of Isa. 58. Even before the organization of the General Conference in 1863 provision was made at Battle Creek, Michigan, for a fund to aid the poor (Review and Herald 16:192, Oct. 30, 1860). The early welfare ministry was carried out primarily by the deacons and deaconesses of the church.

After 1874 the organization of Dorcas Societies spread among the churches, beginning in North America. The activities of these women's societies were not confined to meeting the needs of church members, but reached out into the community. In her public messages and writings, Ellen White pointed out that "God calls upon every man to take up his neglected work," that is, the work of showing "mercy to the destitute, the suffering, the wounded, those who are ready to die" (WM 49).

Assignment of responsibility for this work to the Home Missionary Department in 1913, development of a Disaster and Famine Relief Service following World War II (see ADRA), and establishment of Health and Welfare centers beginning in the 1950s were all major factors in the growing support of Community Services by the whole church membership.

Ellen White wrote in 1913: "There is a wide field for service for women as well as for men. . . . The help of all is needed. . . . Even the children should be taught to do some little errand of love and mercy for those less fortunate than themselves" (ibid. 75).

The church's Manual for Health and Welfare Services outlines activities for all church members. Through such activities, young people are taught the spirit of sharing; the intuitive sympathies of the women are directed in caring for the sick, ministering to the poor, and comforting the sorrowing; and the talents of the men are challenged to equip centers to serve in disaster relief, and to teach skills in first aid.

Although the North American Division pioneered the SDA Community Services, other world division fields were quick to follow. The earliest welfare organization on record outside of America was an association founded in 1897 in Hamburg, Germany. Since 1928 the welfare agency of the church in Germany has been registered with and recognized by the Fifth Union and the German Liga, the organization of voluntary and public welfare agencies of Germany.

City Missions and Welfare Centers. Near the turn of the century Dr. J. H. Kellogg and others in the Battle Creek Sanitarium became interested in beginning welfare work in large cities. In 1893, with the assistance of a gift of $40,000 from John Wessels of South Africa, he opened in Chicago, Illinois, the Chicago Medical Mission. Connected with it in the city were about a dozen branch and associate institutions. From this beginning, for about a decade the work spread to many of the large cities of the United States. These centers were of various kinds, including not only the traditional city missions, places where persons received "soup, soap, and salvation," but also homes for orphans or delinquents and welfare centers of a more general type. In 1900 the denominational directory listed them in 24 cities in 17 states and three countries overseas. By 1904 there were few left outside the institutions in Chicago, which were backed by the Battle Creek medical group. In 1898 Dr. J. H. Kellogg began publishing a welfare magazine, The Life Boat, of which Dr. David Paulson, who later took charge of the Chicago mission, was editor for many years. It reached a circulation of 150,000 and was discontinued in 1932.

World Wars and Natural Disasters. The Dorcas Society remained as the principal SDA welfare agency. After World War II, which left millions homeless and destitute, appeals directed to the churches and Dorcas Societies for material aid met a substantial response in the form of food, clothing, and other supplies. Natural disasters demonstrated the need of preparation for Christian disaster relief service. In 1950 all churches were asked to stockpile food and clothing for emergency purposes. Most of the conferences in North America own mobile units for use in transporting and distributing clothing, bedding, and food.

The church has given help in many major disasters in the United States and in other countries. The international relief organization of the church, established in 1956, is now the Adventist Development and Relief Agency (ADRA). It is an internationally recognized, nongovernmental organization with offices throughout the world.

Community Services Centers. As the welfare work expanded, smaller churches were encouraged to secure a room in the church building or in a home in which clothing could be stored. The larger churches were encouraged to operate Community Services centers—usually separate buildings—where not only food, clothing, bedding, and first-aid supplies are stored, but where classes in first aid, home nursing, and mass feeding are taught. Community Services centers are under the charge of a director who is a member of the local Church Evangelism Council. Identifying pins, arm bands, and uniforms were adopted, and the name “Community Services Sponsored by Seventh-day Adventists” has come to be the official designation of the welfare services of the church.

Centers are open to the public on specified days and hours. Food, clothing, and bedding, and sometimes furniture and appliances are given to individuals and families on the sole basis of need. Medical and hospital equipment is lent without charge. Close cooperation is maintained with other agencies, public and voluntary, in order to avoid duplication, to help make possible more effective services, and to refer persons with special needs to the best sources of help that are available.

Civil Defense Training and Service. SDAs feel a special obligation to serve their country in noncombatant capacities such as Civil Defense. Since medical and welfare services are the special areas of Civil Defense in which the church is most deeply involved, training in rescue, first aid, home nursing, medical self-help, mass feeding, shelter management, and related activities have received special emphasis. These provide opportunity for all church members to serve the community and nation, to help preserve life and relieve human suffering.

On Apr. 6, 1942, the General Conference Committee voted to ask the Home Missionary Department to serve as the channel for promoting and exchanging information regarding Civil Defense by and in the churches. Later the same year, these activities were transferred to the Commission on National Service, but were returned in 1958 to what is now known as the Church Ministries Department.

At the Autumn Council of 1961 the General Conference Committee recommended that, in existing denominationally owned structures in North America, shelter areas be provided and stocked with the minimum water, food, and other necessities as recommended by Civil Defense authorities; that institutional personnel be organized and trained to provide protection in time of disaster and lay plans for disaster training; that members be encouraged to undertake similar protective measures for their families in their homes, and to enroll in first aid and similar training classes. The altruistic motive was thus stated: “That as the end of all things rapidly approaches we ourselves seek by the grace of God to be individually prepared and to do our utmost to help our fellowmen to prepare for the solemn events ahead” (Autumn Council, 1961).

Comoros

COMOROS. A federal Islamic republic that became independent in 1978, Comoros lies between the northern tip of Madagascar and the African mainland. The area of the islands is 838 square miles (2,170 square kilometers). The population (1994) is 530,000, made up of Africans, Arabs, and Indians. The religion is Muslim, the languages are Arab, French, and Comoran, akin to Swahili. Agriculture is the chief occupation, with vanilla, cacao, and oils for the world perfume makers (ylang-ylang, citronella, jasmine) as the principal products.

The islands form part of the territory assigned to the Indian Ocean Union Mission, which is part of the Africa-Indian Ocean Division. In 1955 Sulleman Ali Pax from M'sapere, island of Mayotte, visited Diégo-Suaraz, Madagascar, and became acquainted with our message through Elie Fayard. After many years of study and meditation he was baptized in Antananarivo, Madagascar, on June 9, 1965. Since 1967 and for a long time he has been the only Seventh-day Adventist on the island of Mayotte. Abner Ranaivoson, a former Islamic imam born in Comoros, converted to Seventh-day Adventism in Madagascar and went to Mayotte in 1986. He has helped many young Muslims in Mayotte through Bible correspondence courses. Fear has hindered decision-making. The first baptismal ceremony on the island took place in November 1992. In Comoros, SDA members immigrating from Madagascar have witnessed cautiously. The first baptism there was held in February 1991.

Company

COMPANY. A group of believers in an area organized for fellowship and worship, but not on the level of organization of a church. It may be organized by a district pastor or by a minister appointed by the conference or mission. In consultation with the members, he or she appoints a leader and a treasurer. Other officers, such as for the Sabbath school, are elected by vote of those who have been baptized. All who have been baptized are members of the conference church.

Companies are formed when a group of believers in an area wishes to organize, but its number is too small to warrant a church organization, or when believers do not wish to take upon themselves the responsibilities of a fully self-administered church organization.

The leader is not ordained to his office and does not have the authority vested in an elder of a church. The treasurer keeps a record of the funds of the company, and sends all money, except that given for local purposes, to the conference or mission treasurer. The company cannot administer church discipline. Such matters must be referred to the conference committee and to the president, who is the elder of the conference church.

It is always hoped that the company will develop into a church; therefore its leadership has the duty of promoting the activities that are usually associated with regular churches.

Comstock in 1907 and graduated in medicine at the University of Southern California in 1909. The Doctors Comstock spent seven years with the Glendale Sanitarium, where they initiated the visiting nurse organization and conducted health institutes. They were closely associated with the clinic of the medical school (now part of Loma Linda University). For more than 20 years Dr. Belle Comstock was in charge of the clinic in nutrition and endocrinology at the White Memorial Hospital.

Conference

CONFERENCE. A term used variously in the Seventh-day Adventist Church. Most often the word, when used alone, refers to the unit of church administration called a local conference, in which a number of local churches are associated for administrative purposes (see [Conference, \[local\]](#)); it is also used for the area in which this organization operates. The term conference is used similarly of the union conference (or union), comprising several local conferences; also of the General Conference, comprising all the union organizations, and of its quinquennial session.

Among early SDAs the word was used loosely to describe “general meetings” (most often over a weekend) of local groups of churches or of individual members, led by one or more of the leading ministers for the purposes of strengthening the churches, reaching converts, or studying any problem of common interest (as, for example, the “Sabbath conferences” beginning in 1848). They even used the term general conference for sessions of that nature before there was any denominational organization; for example, those held in the 1850s at Battle Creek, Michigan, to which a general invitation was issued and to which a few came from outside the state.

Conference (local)

CONFERENCE (local). A unit of Seventh-day Adventist Church organization composed of the local churches within a given area, such as a state. With other local conferences such a unit is a constituent member of a union conference. The conference officers are the president and the secretary-treasurer. The officers, together with the conference executive committee, form the administrative body.

Administration. The conference president is an ordained minister of experience and reputation, and is the ranking officer in the conference and in any of the churches within the conference at which the individual may be present. The president is at the head of the ministers in the conference and counsels in all their activities. A president has access to all the churches, their services and business meetings, and may preside over any of the meetings of the churches when it is deemed necessary. Although the president cannot set aside any of the duly elected officers of a church, they are bound to recognize this individual as the superior officer in the conference. The president is chair of the conference executive committee and of various other committees and boards, including boards of all conference institutions. The president is also a member of the union conference executive committee and the boards of union-operated institutions.

The conference secretary-treasurer is responsible for keeping the business records of the conference and for receiving and disbursing conference funds in harmony with conference policy or committee action. This individual also audits the books of the church treasurers within the conference, unless a regular auditor is appointed to that work.

Each conference has a legal association or corporation to carry on the financial transactions of the conference and to hold title to property. Church buildings and schools are held in the name of this legal association rather than in the name of the local church.

The executive committee (commonly referred to as the conference committee) is composed of from five to nine members and is elected at each regular session of the conference. The president is a member of the committee and is its chair. The ministry and the laity of the conference are also usually represented on the committee.

The conference issues credentials, licenses, and certificates to the various types of conference employees. (See Credentials, Licenses, Certificates.) It also directs the activities of the several departments. Its officers are also the officers of the conference church. It operates conference institutions, such as secondary schools, sanitariums, and hospitals, and subsidizes schools and church building projects. It pays the salaries of evangelists, local pastors (appointed to their churches by the conference committee), and Bible instructors (see Financial Policies). In cooperation with the local church school boards, it assigns elementary school teachers to these schools. (Most conferences receive the tuition collected by the churches and pay the church school teachers.)

Departments. The conference fosters various lines of denominational work among the churches through departments, at the head of which are directors or vice presidents, elected to their office at the biennial session of the conference and working under the direction of the conference committee. These directors do not have administrative authority; their relation to the field is advisory on matters that affect their own departments, unless otherwise requested by the conference president. While departmental directors are under the direction of the president and the executive committee, they also cooperate with the union departments, which in turn sustain a similar relation to the division or General Conference departments. See names of specific departments.

Sessions. A conference meets in session every two years, with delegates from the various churches represented. Such a session elects officers and the conference executive committee; receives new churches; hears reports on the work in the conference during the term then closing from the president, secretary-treasurer, and heads of conference departments; appoints the standing committees for the session; and acts on the recommendations of these committees.

The committee on nominations, with the union conference president (or one who has been designated by that individual) as chair and a General Conference representative meeting with it, recommends names for the officers, the departmental director, the executive committee, and institutional boards for the next biennial term. The committee on credentials and licenses makes recommendations on the renewing or issuing of credentials and licenses to conference workers. The committee on constitution and bylaws suggests changes in the constitution and bylaws. The plans committee studies and presents plans and policies for the promotion of the work of the conference during the ensuing term.

In addition, reports are presented to the delegates from the officers and departmental secretaries on the work in their charge.

Delegates to the conference session are elected by the churches on the basis of one delegate for each church and an additional delegate for a specified number of church members, as provided for by the constitution. There are no appointed or ex officio delegates.

Delegates are chosen to represent not only their church but the entire conference; hence it is not permissible for delegates to attempt to organize voting in blocs.

Under the present system a new conference is organized by the union conference, with the sanction of the division. For a history of the development of the local conference in the SDA denomination, see Organization. For other units of organization also composed of local churches, see District, Field, Mission, Section, Station.

Conference Church

CONFERENCE CHURCH. A church organization composed of scattered baptized members in a conference who do not live near enough to a local church to belong to it. The officers of this church are the officers of the conference. However, these conference officers have their membership in the church of the locality where they reside. The conference committee functions as the board of the conference church and the president as the church elder. It is not intended that aged or infirm or other persons who live near a local church but who are unable to attend its service should join the conference church, since it is considered the privilege of the local church to minister to them.

Congo

CONGO. An independent African state (capital, Brazzaville), which received its independence on Aug. 15, 1960. Congo is not to be confused with Zaïre, formerly also named Congo (capital, Kinshasa), which adjoins it on the south and east. Elsewhere it is bounded on the south also by Angola, on the north by Cameroon and the Central African Republic, and on the west by Gabon. It has an area of 132,046 square miles (342,000 square kilometers) and a population (1994) of 2.4 million, mainly Kongo. About 47 percent of the people are animists, and another 47 percent are Christians. The majority are engaged in agriculture, although important industries are developing. French is the official language.

The territory of Congo comprises the Republic of Congo Mission Station, a part of the Central African Union Mission, which in turn is a part of the Africa-Indian Ocean Division. In July 1972 Jean Kempf and his family were sent to Brazzaville to open the work in this country. Before this a young Congolese worker had begun to work in Brazzaville and had raised up a group of interested people. In 1978 the work in Congo was closed. Then in 1991 the church was reorganized by Gary Wagner. In 1993, in spite of many difficulties, there were 32 members.

Congregation

CONGREGATION. Literally, a gathering; in common Protestant usage (a) a group of people gathered for worship and religious instruction, the group of people who habitually so gather; (b) in some countries the organized local unit of any denomination other than the state church or churches.

In sense (a) a congregation is thought of in contrast with a secular audience: a minister addresses the congregation in a service in the church, but speaks to an audience in a public lecture on religious liberty, or possibly to an audience of miscellaneous listeners in an evangelistic tabernacle. In sense (b) congregation is an organization of the “sect” type, in contrast with a “church”; for example, in Germany or Scandinavia one attends or joins a Catholic or a Lutheran church, but a Baptist, Methodist, or Seventh-day Adventist congregation.

Conley, Annie Charlotte

CONLEY, ANNIE CHARLOTTE (1891—1990). Nurse, midwife. She was born in New South Wales, Australia, into the family of John and Charlotte Pocock. Her parents accepted the Seventh-day Adventist message under the ministry of Robert Hare and David Steed in Parramatta during 1892. In hard times Ellen White helped the Pocock family, and while Avondale College was being built, John stayed for some months in the White home. As a child Annie sometimes accompanied Mrs. White on visits in her horse-drawn vehicle, and she used to gather maidenhair fern for Mrs. White's table.

In 1911 Annie began the nursing course at Sydney Sanitarium and Hospital (now Sydney Adventist Hospital). After graduation she gained experience in Warburton, Victoria, and then established the Pine Hill Private Hospital near Avondale College. More than 1,000 children were born in her hospital or in their homes with the help of Annie's midwifery skills. Annie married Robert Conley on Oct. 12, 1926. Four children were born to this union.

Connerly, Brenton Ernest

CONNERLY, BRENTON ERNEST (1869—1937). Pioneer worker in the Inter-American Division. As a young man he went to Colorado in search of fortune in the gold mines. While there he met a Seventh-day Adventist minister, accepted the SDA faith, joined the church by baptism, and entered the colporteur work. In 1900 he married Lillian Snyder, of the Chicago city mission. After his ordination several years later he worked first in Puerto Rico and then in Panama. He was the first SDA minister to work in Colombia. In 1919 he returned to the United States after 17 years of service in Latin America. For the next 18 years he pastored churches and preached in the Potomac Conference.

Conradi, Louis Richard

CONRADI, LOUIS RICHARD (1856—1939). Evangelist and administrator; in his last years a Seventh Day Baptist minister. Born in Karlsruhe, Germany, he began studies leading to the Roman Catholic priesthood, but migrated to America at the age of 17. After working at various jobs, he found employment clearing land on the farm of a Methodist merchant in Iowa. He was converted in 1878 to the Seventh-day Adventist faith in the home of James Burton, a farmer, where he boarded. Applying himself diligently to his studies, he completed the four-year course at Battle Creek College in one third the usual time, at the same time working as a typesetter. He worked with energy for the German-speaking people of the Middle West and in 1882 was ordained.

In 1886 the General Conference sent him to work in Europe, with his headquarters in Switzerland. From there he traveled extensively in Russia and Germany. On an evangelistic journey to the Crimea the same year, he was accused of teaching Jewish heresy and was imprisoned for 40 days. After the General Conference session of 1888, he went in 1889 with a group of associates to work in Hamburg, Germany, where he made his home for the rest of his life. In 1891 Germany and Russia were separated from the Central European Conference and placed under the direction of Conradi. He became the first chairman of the General European Conference in 1901, and also vice president of the General Conference in 1903; he remained head of the work in Europe (later as president of the European Division) until 1922.

He traveled widely over Europe and visited Russia several times. He was often pursued by the police, but was never again arrested, although he was expelled from Romania, Turkey, and Hungary. He made repeated visits to Africa and the Middle East.

In 1909 and 1914 he traveled extensively in South America, where new conferences were being organized, and in 1926 he was invited to tour the Far East, where he fell seriously ill, but recovered.

His written works include a revision and enlargement of J.N. Andrews' History of the Sabbath and his own expositions (in German) of the books of Daniel and the Revelation, which were translated into several languages, also The Impelling Force of Prophetic Truth, and numerous pamphlets and articles including, through the years, many graphic reports of his missionary journeys published in the Review and Herald.

In 1932, at the age of 76, he separated from the Seventh-day Adventist Church and became a minister for the Seventh Day Baptists.

Conversion

CONVERSION. A supernatural transformation of the mind, affections, and life that restores the freedom, self-control, and spiritual union with God that were lost as a result of sin.

Conversion involves contrition and confession, that is, a recognition and acknowledgment of oneself as a sinner in need of forgiveness. It also involves an unconditional decision to reorient one's will, aims, and life to conform with the will of God, a corresponding effort to that end, and a willing dependence upon God for the necessities of life and eventually for the complete restoration of all that was lost as a result of sin.

A personal experience of conversion is essential to salvation. The Bible describes this experience by a variety of figurative expressions that call attention to various aspects of what is, in fact, a complex subjective (internal) experience accompanied by important objective (external) effects. It is described, on the one hand, as something a person does: a turning from one mode of life to another (Matt. 18:3; Acts 3:19; 11:21; 14:15; 26:18), a repentance, or change of mind (Acts 2:38; 3:19; 2 Cor. 7:9, 10). But it is also described as something done to or for a person: a rebirth (John 1:12—13; 3:3—7; 1 Peter 1:3, 23; 2:2; 1 John 5:18), a creation (Gal. 6:15; Eph. 2:10; 4:24), a resurrection from spiritual death (Eph. 2:1, 5, 6; cf. Col. 2:12, 13), a washing, or cleansing, from sin (Titus 3:5; 2 Peter 1:9), and an implanting of a new system of values (Eze. 36:26; Jer. 31:33; Heb. 8:10). It is an experience of the mind, or "heart": a coming to know God or religious truth (John 8:32; 17:3; Col. 3:10), a renewal of the mind (Eph. 4:23; cf. Rom. 12:2). It produces a new nature (Eph. 4:24; Col. 3:10), and marks the beginning of a new life in Christ (2 Cor. 5:17).

The precise form conversion may take varies from one individual to another, as determined by such factors as one's temperament, psychological maturity, intellectual capacity, external circumstances, degree of behavioral change required, and cultural background. Accordingly, no particular pattern of experience may be considered normative, either as to duration or depth of emotional involvement.

Conversion presupposes, as a minimum, awareness of (1) God's existence and His involvement in human affairs, (2) the distinction between moral right and wrong, and (3) the need for external help. There can be no self-surrender where there is no sense of need and dependence. Early religious training and direct contact with the revealed Word and with human witnesses are not necessarily essential to conversion, for it has occurred when none of these was present; so long as the mind is free to exercise genuine volition, environmental factors cannot prevent conversion. The function of these external factors is to encourage the human response to the call of God's Spirit. The mission of the church is to increase the number, frequency, and intensity of these contributing factors.

Conversion marks the beginning of a continuing operation of the Holy Spirit in a process of spiritual growth. This growth consists of an improved understanding of God's will and the gradual elimination of residual tendencies to sin.

Evidence of genuine conversion is both subjective and objective. The subjective evidence that conversion has occurred includes consciousness of love for, and trust in, God, awareness of the supreme importance of religious and spiritual values, and enjoyment of Bible reading, prayer, and worship. Absence of the objective evidence—continuing growth toward perfection in Jesus Christ—is conclusive proof that genuine conversion has not occurred.

Conversion consists essentially in a transformation of the mind, of a man's attitude, and through the mind, of the entire life.

“The leaven of truth works secretly, silently, steadily, to transform the soul. The natural inclinations are softened and subdued. New thoughts, new feelings, new motives, are implanted. A new standard of character is set up—the life of Christ. The mind is changed; the faculties are roused to action in new lines. Man is not endowed with new faculties, but the faculties he has are sanctified. The conscience is awakened. We are endowed with traits of character that enable us to do service for God” (COL 98, 99).

Conversion begins with a reorientation of the mind to the will of Christ, and starts a person on the pathway that leads to a complete restoration, through the grace of Christ, of the divine character, which was lost when Adam sinned. See also Justification; New Birth; Sin.

Cook Islands

COOK ISLANDS. An archipelago lying in the south, central part of the Pacific Ocean, 1,800 miles (2,900 kilometers) northeast of New Zealand. It covers only 93 square miles (241 square kilometers), even though the islands are scattered over more than 620 miles (1,000 kilometers) from north to south. The northern group are coral atolls and include Manihiki, Nassau, Penrhyn, Pukapuka, and Rakahanga, while the southern islands are volcanic hills and include Aitutaki, Atiu, Mangaia, Mauke, Mitiaro, and Rarotonga, on which is located the capital of Avarua. The fertile soil of these southern islands produces an abundance of vegetables and tropical fruits that are at times exported by air to New Zealand. The climate is mild, and the islands and atolls support 18,552 people (1991), most of whom are brown-skinned Polynesians. Half this number live on the main island of Rarotonga. The southern islands are a popular tourist destination, and the people are known for their friendliness and hospitality.

In 1773 Capt. James Cook reached the southern islands, and in 1888 Britain took control until 1901, when administrative control passed to New Zealand. A new constitution gave the islanders authority over their internal affairs in 1965, with New Zealand retaining responsibility for defense and foreign affairs. Sir Albert Henry became the first prime minister in 1965, followed by Sir Thomas Davis in 1976. The prime minister in 1993 was Sir Geoffrey Henry. The country retains a queen's representative, Apinera Short (1993).

Christianity first came to the island of Aitutaki through two Raiatean teachers, Papeiha and Vahapata, who had been stationed there by John Williams in 1821. In 1823 two teachers from Tahaa were settled on the islands of Mitiaro and Mauke, and Papeiha introduced Christianity on Rarotonga. To assist these London Missionary Society national missionaries, Charles Pitman came from England in 1827. Henry Royal served on Aitutaki from 1839 to 1876. Pitman, Aaron Buzacott (1828), and Ta'unga contributed to the translation of the Bible into the Rarotongan language.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. On its first voyage the Pitcairn visited the islands of Mangaia, Rarotonga, and Aitutaki in April 1891. On Rarotonga books were sold by the Reads and the McCoys, with Francis Nicholas (Waugh), secretary to the islands' administrator making a purchase that eventually led to her acceptance of the SDA message. On the Pitcairn's third voyage, Dr. James Caldwell, Maude Young from Pitcairn Island, Dudley Owen, Mr. Wellman, and Lillian White were left on Rarotonga in June 1894. These self-supporting missionaries engaged in medical and educational (government) activities. J. D. Rice arrived on the Pitcairn in mid-1895, and taught in government schools. The first two Maori converts were baptized in April 1898.

Two Christmas days were observed in 1899 by order of the government, to enable the Cook Islands to correctly observe Western Hemisphere day sequence, as early missionaries hadn't made any day change on crossing the 180° meridian on their voyages eastward from Europe. Many Cook Islanders were reluctant to accept the change from Saturday to Sunday for their day of worship, and it took the threat of loss of land tenure to persuade them to keep the new day. For 75 years they had worshiped on the seventh-day Sabbath. Before the end of 1900 Edward Gates baptized 18 people at Titikaveka on Rarotonga, as some had still refused to keep the new day and had asked SDA missionaries to teach them Bible truth on the Sabbath. Some suffered for their stand, being fined and made to work on the roads. A. H. Piper, the first Avondale-trained missionary to enter service in the Pacific islands, arrived on Rarotonga on Oct. 31, 1900.

More Australian missionaries were added to teach school at Arorangi and Titikaveka: Evelyn Gooding, 1902—1905, and Mark Carey, 1906—1907. The first church building, erected by Piper and his supporters in Titikaveka, was dedicated by newly arrived missionary Griffiths Jones on May 23, 1904. George Sterling commenced work on Aitutaki island in 1912, and conducted the first baptism there in 1913. The first converts in the northern islands were made on Pukapuka in 1919.

In 1916 the Cook Islands became a section of the newly established Eastern Polynesian Mission, and remained in this organization until 1923, when they became a separate mission. In 1948 the mission became a part of the Central Pacific Union Mission.

Cook, J. B.

COOK, J. B. (1804—1874). Baptist minister, Millerite preacher, and editor. After the disappointment in 1844 he joined J. D. Pickands in publishing a small sheet, the Voice of the Fourth Angel, at Cleveland, Ohio. For a time he held a “shut door” view. In 1846, in his paper the Advent Testimony, and in O.R.L. Crosier’s Day-Dawn, he advocated the seventh-day Sabbath. However, by 1849 he was teaching that the Sabbath was not for Christians, but was a type of the millennial sabbath. He wrote extensively against the Sabbatarians in Joseph Marsh’s Advent Harbinger. Some of his earlier writings were reprinted by Seventh-day Adventists, for example, in the second issue of the Advent Review 1:7—16, August 1850; and in the Review and Herald 2:4, Aug. 5, 1851; 2:97, Mar. 2, 1852.

COOPER, ALFRED (1867—1945). One of the pioneer Seventh-day Adventist workers in Mexico. He was born in England but later lived in the United States. After working as a colporteur for a while, he studied at Battle Creek College. In 1893 he married Lillian Froom, who had been a Bible instructor in the Illinois Conference. The two completed a nursing course at Battle Creek, then joined the first group of SDA workers in Mexico and helped to open a mission at Guadalajara; he, by assisting in the medical work, and his wife, by teaching the mission school. In 1898 they went to Mexico City, where they taught nursing at a government hospital for a while. In 1904 Lillian Cooper died. Later Cooper engaged in self-supporting work in Mexico, and operated a cannery at Mexico City. He died in California in his seventy-ninth year.

Corliss, John Orr

CORLISS, JOHN ORR (1845—1923). Evangelist, missionary. Left fatherless at 5, young Corliss developed an independent mind that later helped him in his pioneering work. At 16 he became a sailor and saw service in the Civil War. In 1866 he became a Freewill Baptist and in 1868 a Seventh-day Adventist, having lived with the James Whites for some time, and having been tutored in SDA beliefs by Joseph Bates.

In 1868 he became superintendent and chaplain of the Western Health Reform Institute at Battle Creek, Michigan. He engaged in public evangelism in Michigan (1871—1875, 1881—1883) and in Maine (1875). He pioneered SDA work in Virginia (1876 and 1877), in Colorado (1879), and in California (1884).

With S. N. Haskell and others he pioneered SDA work in Australia (1885—1887). Against considerable opposition, his evangelistic campaigns in Melbourne, Adelaide, and other cities won many converts, chiefly from the professional and business classes, including an unusually large number of entire families. In 1886 he became one of the managing editors of the Bible Echo, supporting the journal largely from his private means. Because of poor health he returned to California, where he engaged in editorial and religious liberty work (1887—1893); then he went again to Australia for another term of service (1893—1896).

Corliss and A. T. Jones were the first SDAs to appear before legislatures to plead the cause of separation of church and state. In 1889, as a member of a General Conference press committee, Corliss appeared before a Senate Committee on Education and Labor that was considering Sunday rest legislation. When he came before a committee of the Arkansas legislature, he was credited with bringing about the defeat of a bill to repeal a clause exempting Sabbathkeepers.

He served for a period as Bible teacher for the Battle Creek Sanitarium nurses' and medical classes (1897—1898), and in ministerial work in Canada (1898—1899). Then he worked in California until near the time of his death, with the exception of a term spent in England in school and evangelistic work (1902—1904). Having inherited some private means, he used it largely in paying tuition for young students attending SDA schools and in supporting other church enterprises.

Cornell, Merritt E.

CORNELL, MERRITT E. (1827—1893). Pioneer evangelist on the Pacific Coast. A former Millerite, and then a member of the Advent Harbinger group who taught the “age to come” doctrine (see Messenger Party), he was won to the Sabbatarian Adventists by Joseph Bates in 1852, and immediately set out with great energy to proclaim his new faith. At Battle Creek, Michigan, in 1854 he and Loughborough conducted the first Adventist meetings held in a tent.

His wife, Angeline, worked with him, sometimes remaining to instruct further those who had become interested in the meetings, while her husband went on to the next place. In a sense she was the forerunner of today’s Bible instructors.

In 1871 Cornell worked with Loughborough in the first Seventh-day Adventist tent meetings in San Francisco, California, and in 1874 with Canright in Oakland. In 1875 he gave a series of lectures in Dallas, Texas. Shortly after this, in 1876, he was disconnected from the organized work of the church, although he did some freelance preaching for several years. Then after some years of isolation he returned to Michigan from Maryland in 1889. A reconciliation was effected, and he again served in the ministry from 1890 until his death.

Coronella Retirement Village/Nursing Homes

CORONELLA RETIREMENT VILLAGE/NURSING HOMES. Centers for the aged, owned and operated by the Victoria Conference of Seventh-day Adventists. In 1952 homes for the aged in the Victorian Conference had been established at Croydon and were known as Coronella Homes for the Aged, "Coronella" being the name of the guest house purchased to form the nucleus of the venture. On Jan. 19, 1958, the first units were opened at Nunawading, Victoria, Australia, adjoining the Victorian Conference campground. Additional units have been added as finances, including government subsidy, permitted. In 1993 each institution was operating in its own right, with a separate board of management. However, they operate under a single constitution and are answerable to the Victorian Conference. Some details of each of these retirement villages follow.

Alawara Retirement Village, Bendigo

Alawara Retirement Village, Bendigo. Began with 20 units in 1976. In 1993 there were 20 single bedroom units, a 35-bed hostel, and an activity center. It had 56 residents.

CORPORACION UNIVERSITARIA ADVENTISTA. See Colombia Adventist University.

Corporations

CORPORATIONS. Legally incorporated entities formed for the transaction of such legal and fiscal matters of the denomination as require corporate agents under the various laws of the places where the church might have its material interests. For example, corporations have been formed to hold real estate and other church assets, and to operate medical, educational, manufacturing, charitable, custodial, and evangelistic enterprises. In some countries incorporation of church bodies is a prerequisite to conducting any public activity.

In the United States and in many other places, the church itself is not an incorporated body, and neither are its ecclesiastical administrative organs (such as conferences, unions, and other such subdivisions). Instead, parallel to the ecclesiastical organization are legal corporations on the conference, union, and General Conference levels that transact the necessary legal business on behalf of the respective denominational units. The membership (constituency) of the corporation usually is the executive committee on the corresponding denominational unit or the delegates to the sessions of that unit. The officers of both entities are often the same persons.

In the Seventh-day Adventist Church the church edifices and real estate are not held in the name of individual congregations, and the holding of properties by trustees is discounted. Instead, local church properties are held by the conference corporations.

Most of the institutional activities of the church are conducted by separate, local corporations, and the board chair of each institution is usually the president of the respective church organizational unit. In ordinary usage an institution is referred to as being owned by a certain conference or union conference, but the actual ownership is vested in the corporation that is controlled by or affiliated with that conference or union conference.

On the General Conference level the 1993 Yearbook listed the following corporations or associations: Adventist Development and Relief Agency International (ADRA); Adventist Health System/Loma Linda, Inc.; Adventist Historic Properties, Inc.; Chan Shun International Foundation; Christian Record Services, Inc.; Ellen G. White Estate, Inc.; General Conference Corporation of Seventh-day Adventists; Gencon Insurance Service, Inc.; Gencon Insurance Company of Vermont; Gencon Financial Services, Inc.; Harris Foundation; Seventh-day Adventist Radio, Television, and Film Center (Adventist Media Center).

Costa Rica

COSTA RICA. A Central American republic, bounded on the north by Nicaragua, on the northeast by the Caribbean Sea, on the southeast by Panama, and on the southwest and west by the Pacific Ocean. It has an area of 19,575 square miles (50,699 square kilometers) and a population (1994) of 3.3 million. The inhabitants of Costa Rica are predominantly of Spanish ancestry, with a minority of Blacks and a few small, dwindling Indian tribes. The principal exports include coffee, bananas, and ornamental plants. The state religion is Roman Catholicism, but there are (1993) some 1 million Protestants of different denominations.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. For several years about the turn of the century, F. J. Hutchins, pioneer SDA missionary in Central America, made frequent visits to Costa Rica in the missionary schooner the Herald, and began work in Limón. About 1902 H. Louie Mignott, C. N. Moulton, and two other colporteurs named Horton and Brooks worked there. In 1903 I. G. Knight, who succeeded Hutchins, reported in the Review and Herald (80:15, Dec. 3, 1903) 10 baptisms and the organization of a church of 26, presumably at Pacuarito, some distance from Limón. The reports in the Review and Herald indicated that by 1906 there were several churches in the country and that a worker, T. M. Brown, was doing evangelistic work in San José, the capital city.

The first primary school was established at Limón in 1921, with D. P. Abbott as teacher. A secondary school, which later developed into Univeridad Adventista de Centro America (Central American University), was opened in October 1927, with G. S. Ray as the first principal. Also in 1927 SDA work in the republics of Costa Rica and Nicaragua, until then included in the West Caribbean Conference, was organized as the Costa Rica-Nicaragua Mission, a part of the Central American Union, with the officers of the union serving as administrators. There were eight churches and 216 members in the mission by the end of that year. In 1928 the work in Costa Rica became a separate mission with four churches and 148 members.

In 1973 a seven-acre (three-hectare) tract was obtained in Hatillo, a suburb of the capital, and construction began on an elementary school/evangelistic center complex. The following year the first buildings were started for a youth camp located on a 45-acre (18-hectare) site near Orotina.

Costa Rica Secondary School (San José)

COSTA RICA SECONDARY SCHOOL (San José) (Centro Educativo Adventista de Costa Rica). A K-12 institution operated by the Costa Rica Mission in the heart of the capital city of San José.

In November 1974 the first classroom building with three rooms was inaugurated by R. H. Pierson, then president of the General Conference. In 1975 classes started at the elementary level with a total of 13 students and three teachers. The institution began under the name of Escuela Adventista de Hatillo.

Later junior high was added, and the enrollment increased to 339 students and seven teachers. In March 1984 grades 10 and 11 were added. The first graduation was held in that year, with a class of 12. Also, in 1984 the school was approved by the Ministry of Public Education to operate as a government-recognized institution under the name of Centro Educativo Adventista de Costa Rica.

In 1993, 472 students were enrolled on all levels. The staff includes 25 instructors, a chaplain, an adviser, a secretary, and an accountant-cashier.

Besides the academic program approved by the government, Costa Rica Secondary School offers English, Bible, and computer classes, the latter begun in 1993 in both the elementary and high school programs. The classrooms are distributed in four buildings covering a total area of more than 107,600 square feet (10,000 square meters).

Côte d'Ivoire

CÔTE D'IVOIRE. A West African republic, which received independence on Aug. 7, 1960, but retained close ties with France. It has an area of 124,503 square miles (322,463 square kilometers), and a population (1994) of 14.3 million. The country (formerly known as the Ivory Coast) is bounded on the west by Liberia and Guinea, on the south by the Gulf of Guinea, on the north by Mali and Burkina Faso, and on the east by Ghana. Agriculture is the chief occupation of the people, with yams, manioc, bananas, maize, rice, and millet the principal crops. The chief exports are coffee, cocoa, bananas, pineapple, and timber. The country has long been famous for its gracefully carved figurines made from elephant tusks, which gave this area its name. The majority of the people are animists.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. The first SDAs to enter the Ivory Coast were two traders named Bley and Essien, who came from Ghana. Sometime after 1920, these two men settled at Tiemelekro and established a company of adherents. About the same time, Joseph Kouamé Djouman and Pierre Kouamé Adingrah, who were members of the Dida tribe of the southern part of the Ivory Coast, and who went to Ghana to learn to grow cocoa, met some Adventists there, accepted their doctrines, and returned to their home village preaching their newly discovered faith.

When the officers of the Ghana Mission heard about the interested companies in the Ivory Coast, they sent a national worker, J. K. Garbrah, to visit them. As a result of this visit, six persons later were baptized at Agbahou.

From 1937 until World War II, except for a visit made by Jesse Clifford, the president of the Ghana Mission, SDAs in the Ivory Coast had contact with the denomination only through the paper Les Signes des Temps, published in France.

The first national workers in the Ivory Coast were two young men, Felix Donkor and John Zakka, who were sent to Ghana to study. The work was organized in 1946 when the first foreign missionaries, G. M. Ellstrom and J. L. Jespersen came from the United States. When they arrived with their families, they were housed for several years in army surplus beach huts until they were given permission to purchase land and construct permanent houses. In 1953 the first national colporteur, Jacob Gbessin, started work. In the same year J. R. Buzenet, from France, and a converted Senegalese Muslim, Bah Amadou, opened a primary school in Bouake. A secondary school soon followed.

Cottrell, Hampton Watson

COTTRELL, HAMPTON WATSON (1852—1940). Evangelist, administrator. After attending Battle Creek College, he engaged in business (1877—1885), and then opened a city mission in Cleveland, Ohio. Then for three years he was superintendent of the Maritime Mission (Canada), for two years, an evangelist in New England, and for five years, president of the Atlantic Union Conference. During that period, he also represented the General Conference at numerous meetings in Europe, and assisted in the removal of the denominational headquarters to Washington, D.C. Following this, he was president of the Pacific Union (1905—1910), the Western Oregon Conference (1912—1922), and the North Pacific Union (1922—1923). Because of serious illness, he was forced in 1925 to take up less active work.

Cottrell, Roswell F.

COTTRELL, ROSWELL F. (1814—1892). One of the early Adventists; writer, poet, minister. He descended from the Huguenots and was born in a Seventh Day Baptist family in the state of New York. Through reading the Review and Herald some time about 1851 and comparing its message with the Scriptures, he was led to join the developing group of Seventh-day Adventists and immediately began to contribute his talents as a writer and poet to the propagation of the faith that he had espoused. He wrote one of the earlier (1854) series of Bible lessons for the young people that was published in the Youth's Instructor. In 1855 these lessons were bound together into a book that served as a guide to biblical study among the churches for several years afterward. After the publication office of the Review and Herald was moved to Battle Creek in 1855, he served as a member of the editorial committee. As a minister he worked with J. N. Loughborough and W. S. Ingraham in New York and Pennsylvania. At the time of the organization of the denomination, he was among those opposed to a formal structure, and expressed his views through several mildly worded communications published in the Review and Herald that provoked heated rejoinders from James White. In the end he accepted the organization and continued through the years, almost to his death, actively working for the church. A number of his poems have been set to music, and three of them appeared in the Church Hymnal.

Cottrell, Roy F.

COTTRELL, ROY F. (1878—1970). Missionary, author, pastor. He was born in New York state into a family of Adventist pioneers. In 1902 he married Myrtie Ball, and six years later they sailed for China, where he served until 1920. During those years he wrote 10 books that were published in the Mandarin language. After returning to the United States, he continued to write, authoring 15 books and booklets, eight series of Sabbath school lessons, and hundreds of articles that appeared in church journals. During his later years he served as a pastor in the Southern California Conference. He gave 60 years of devoted service to the church.

Courville, Cyril Brian

COURVILLE, CYRIL BRIAN (1900—1968). Neuropathologist, teacher, author, founder of medical institutions. He was a native of Michigan and received his early education at Cedar Lake Academy and Emmanuel Missionary College. After completing his medical training at the College of Medical Evangelists, he took a three-year course in neuropathology, neurology, and neurosurgery, and returned to teach at his alma mater. He wrote nearly a score of books, one of which is the standard textbook on neuropathology. In 1934 he founded the Cajal Laboratory of Neuropathology and later helped with the organization of the Medical Cadet Corps. With fellow faculty members, he founded the forty-seventh General Hospital Unit, which served in New Guinea and the Philippines during World War II.

A physician at Johns Hopkins University referred to Dr. Courville as “the world’s greatest neuropathologist.” At the time of his death he was still serving on the faculty of Loma Linda University.

Covenant

COVENANT. In Scripture, a term usually referring to the various agreements into which God has, from time to time, entered with individuals—Noah, Abraham, and Israel, for example. Jeremiah and the writer of Hebrews also speak of a “new covenant” God promised to make with His people (Jer. 31:31—33; Heb. 8:8—13).

A human covenant may be either a mutual agreement between equals who share in formulating its terms or one imposed by a superior upon an inferior. The parties to a divine-human covenant are not equals. The purpose and conditions of such a covenant are determined by God and voluntarily accepted by human beings. All covenants between God and humanity are based on the principle that obedience to the will of God means life; disobedience brings death. This was true before sin entered; it is true now. Because of the fallen nature inherited from Adam, men and women cannot render perfect obedience to the will of God by their own power. The covenants made with humanity since the Fall are designed to meet men and women in their fallen condition so as to enable them to achieve the obedience required of them through faith in Christ. The purpose and terms are basically the same in each divine-human covenant, but the form of statement and the mode of operation may vary according to the historical circumstances. From God’s point of view there has ever been only one such agreement—the “everlasting covenant.” But from humanity’s point of view there seem to have been a number of covenants. This is because of the dissimilarity of the outward forms.

God’s covenant with Abraham at the time of his migration to Palestine included the promise that his posterity would become a great nation, and appointed the patriarch an ally of Heaven in the task of bringing a knowledge of salvation to all men (Gen. 12:1—3). This covenant was formalized a few years later, as recorded in Gen. 15. At Mount Sinai Abraham’s descendants voluntarily accepted God as their ruler, and their role as the chosen people (Ex. 19:5—8; 24:5—8; PP 370—373). The immediate objective of the covenant at Sinai was the establishment of the Hebrew nation in Palestine, and the ultimate objective, the evangelization of the world (Deut. 7:7—14; Isa. 49:3, 6, 8). Under the covenant, Israel became God’s chosen people and He became their acknowledged ruler. The covenant was the basis of all His dealings with them. Their form of government under the covenant relationship was a theocracy. Their place of worship was the tent of the covenant. Their Sacred Scriptures were the book of the covenant.

The everlasting covenant between Christ and the Father for the salvation of humanity was formulated in eternity past (Eph. 1:4; Heb. 6:18). It became operative the moment sin entered, and was formally ratified by Christ’s death on the cross. Even as Moses mediated the old covenant, Christ became the mediator of the new covenant (Heb. 9:15—17). It is a “better covenant” in that it is established on Christ’s own eternal promise to die for sinners, instead of on the people’s fickle promises, as with the old covenant (Heb. 8:6). Whereas under the covenant mediated at Sinai God’s law was written upon tables of stone, the covenant mediated at Calvary is to be written in living letters on the heart, or mind, of all who accept the salvation afforded by the blood of the “everlasting covenant” (Heb. 13:20).

Early Seventh-day Adventist comment on the covenants arose out of the relationship of the Ten Commandments—and thus of the seventh-day Sabbath—to the old covenant. As early as 1857, Roswell F. Cottrell, formerly a Seventh Day Baptist minister, pointed out that far from abolishing God’s law, the new covenant called for it to be inscribed in men’s and women’s hearts (Heb. 8:10, 11; Review and Herald 9:124, Feb. 19, 1857). D. M. Canright answered the contention of critics that the old covenant was a covenant of works and the new covenant one of faith thus: “We think that the connection between faith and works has ever been the same under both covenants. Faith in Christ was as necessary to salvation in the days of Noah, or Adam, as it is today” (Review and Herald 27:161, Apr. 24, 1866).

The fact that Abraham was justified by faith did not release him from obeying God’s commands.

The first major exposition of the two covenants was a series of articles by J. O. Corliss in the Review and Herald between March and May 1883. He explained that the old covenant was an agreement made with respect to the Ten Commandments but that the two are separate and distinct (Deut. 10:2; cf. 31:26). In contrast, the Decalogue was a covenant commanded (Deut. 4:13; ibid. 60:196, Mar. 27, 1883). The old covenant was ratified by the shedding of blood before the Ten Commandments were engraved on the tables of stone. The new covenant, like the old, was made with Israel (Heb. 8:10; 1 ibid. 60:213, Apr. 3, 1883).

N. J. Bowers listed 12 biblical reasons against the argument identifying the Ten Commandments with the old covenant, which was done away at the cross. The Decalogue was in existence long before the old covenant became effective at Mount Sinai. The covenant was made with respect to the Decalogue, not identical with it. The old covenant was made with the people, whereas they were commanded to keep the Ten Commandments. The old covenant consisted of divine and human promises, not commands (Ex. 24:7; cf. Heb. 8:6). The human promises were faulty, whereas the Ten Commandments were perfect (Heb. 8:7; cf. Rom. 7:12, 14). Under the new covenant the law is written on the believer’s mind (Heb. 8:10). The old covenant ended at the cross, but the Ten Commandments did not (Matt. 5:17—20). He also called attention to the fact that Paul refers to the covenant and the law as distinct entities (Rom. 9:4; 1 ibid. 62:579, 580, Sept. 15, 1885).

Uriah Smith discussed the old and the new covenants at considerable length in a series of eight editorials from September to November 1887. He referred to them as two editions of God’s everlasting covenant with human beings (ibid. 64:584, Sept. 13, 1887). There is nothing in the nature of mutual agreement in the Ten Commandments; they were commanded (ibid. 64:600, Sept. 20, 1887). According to Deut. 5:3, “The Lord made not this [the old] covenant with our fathers, but with us, even us, who are all of us here alive this day.” If Moses here refers to the Decalogue, its principles were not binding on men and women before Sinai; they were free to violate its precepts at will—an impossible situation (ibid. 64:617, Oct. 4, 1887). The new covenant, like the old, was made with Israel (God’s people), not Gentiles, but the latter might be included in it by becoming spiritual children of Abraham (Gal. 3:29; 1 ibid. 64:632, Oct. 11, 1887). On their part the Jews must believe in Christ in order to enjoy its blessings (Rom. 2:28, 29; Gal. 3:29; 1 ibid. 64:648, Oct. 18, 1887). God’s law is the basis of both covenants (ibid. 64:680, Nov. 1, 1887). See also Sabbath.

Covenant, Church

COVENANT, CHURCH. A written pledge, at one time used to enroll members uniting to organize a local church; also a pledge signed by an individual convert upon taking his or her stand. In 1861, at the formation of the first Seventh-day Adventist conference organization, in Michigan, it was voted to recommend that churches in organizing use a covenant, a practice apparently common in other denominations at that time, and already followed by SDAs in some places. The form adopted was as follows:

“We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together, as a church, taking the name, Seventh-day Adventists, covenanting to keep the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus Christ” (Review and Herald 18:148, Oct. 8, 1861).

The essence of the covenant, as it concerned the individual, was the pledge “to keep the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus Christ.” There is also mention of a covenant to keep the Sabbath, which may have been identical, signed by converts before taking the step of becoming church members (see, for example, Review and Herald 60:694, Nov. 6, 1883).

Crager, Cuno Parker

CRAGER, CUNO PARKER (1886—1945). Mission administrator, educator. A graduate of South Lancaster Academy (1907), he was preceptor of Mount Vernon Academy (1907—1908); principal of Claremont Union College, Capetown (1909—1915); educational, Missionary Volunteer, and Sabbath school secretary of the Austral Union in Argentina (1916—1920). Ordained to the ministry in 1920, he was president of the Chile Conference (1920—1923); educational, Missionary Volunteer, and Sabbath school secretary of the South American Division (1923—1929); educational secretary of the Central Union (1929); associate educational secretary in the General Conference (1930—1935); superintendent of the Central American Union Mission (1935—1941); superintendent of the Central Colombia Mission (1941). He supervised erection of buildings for Colegio Vocacional y Profesional in Montemorelos, Mexico (1942); taught Bible in the Colegio Adventista de las Antillas (1943); and in 1945 became superintendent of the Puerto Rico Mission, but held this office for only four and a half weeks, when he became ill and died a month later.

Craven, Joseph Harrison

CRAVEN, JOSEPH HARRISON (1906—1964). Treasurer and publishing house manager. He began denominational work in 1923 on the staff of the British Publishing House, where he served for 12 years. After this, he was treasurer of the Stanborough Hydro for 10 years, until his appointment in 1946 as secretary-treasurer to British Advent Missions, Ltd. In 1949 he became manager of the Stanborough Press, where he served until his death. Under his leadership the press acquired new departments that lifted it to much higher levels of technical skill and productivity.

Crawford Adventist Academy

CRAWFORD ADVENTIST ACADEMY (formerly Toronto Junior Academy). A K-12 educational institution located in Toronto, Canada. It was established in 1953 through the efforts of Dr. Erwin Crawford. Enrolled for the 1993—1994 school year were 227 elementary school students and 166 secondary school students. There were 34 teachers and staff.

Principals: Eugene W. Rau, 1980—1987; Vernon Langdon, 1987— .

Creation

CREATION. Seventh-day Adventists believe that the entire universe came into being through divine creative acts (Isa. 40:26; Ps. 19:1; 33:6), but that the narrative of Gen. 1 and 2 focuses primarily on this earth and life upon it. They consider the Creation to have been a direct, supernatural event by divine fiat in which both the Father and the Son participated, with the Son as the active agent (Gen. 1:26; Col. 1:16, 17). The Holy Spirit is also mentioned in connection with the Creation account (Gen. 1:2).

Since their beginning SDAs have held the doctrine of a literal creation in one week of time and have used the belief to support the doctrine of the Sabbath (Review and Herald 1:1, November 1850). They have considered the Sabbath as an institution inseparable from the Creation, “a safeguard against atheism and idolatry,” “a weekly memorial of the living God,” who created all things in six days of time (ibid. 5:101, Apr. 18, 1854).

SDAs have always affirmed belief in creation ex nihilo—that God was not indebted to previously existing matter when He brought the earth into existence. They have generally taken it for granted that it was on the first day of Creation week that He brought into existence the matter that composed the earth and that He proceeded immediately with the work of the six days. However, almost from the first, some SDAs have allowed that the Genesis account can be understood to mean that God spoke into existence the substance of the earth sometime prior to the events of the six literal days of creation. For example, as early as 1860 the Review and Herald reprinted a selection from The Bible True, in which appeared the statement that there is not “anything in revelation which forbids us to believe that the substance of the earth was formed long before it received its present organization” (Review and Herald 16:49, July 3, 1860).

On the other hand, J. N. Andrews declared in 1861: “On the first day of the week God created the heavens and the earth. The earth thus called into existence was without form and void” (ibid. 19:1, Dec. 3, 1861).

A few years later D. T. Bourdeau wrote: “The Bible says that God made heaven and earth as well as all that in them is, in six days. It is in the beginning of the first day, therefore, that God created the heaven and the earth, as spoken of in Gen. 1:1” (ibid. 29:98, Feb. 5, 1867).

Representing the other school of thought, J. P. Henderson wrote in 1887: “The creation of the material substance of the heaven and the earth may have been ages prior to the six days’ work in which it was prepared for the abode of man, and yet do no violence to a single statement in the Bible” (ibid. 64:418, July 5, 1887).

Seven years later J. G. Matteson, leader of SDA work in Scandinavia, made the following observation: “In six days God created heaven and earth and all that in them is. Ex. 20:11. He created the heaven and the earth in the beginning. John 1:1. The solar system to which we belong, and the orb on which we live were consequently made on the first day of the week. Before that time there was nothing in this part of God’s great universe. But the Lord spake, and it was done; He commanded and it stood fast. Ps. 33:9” 1 (ibid. 71:722, Nov, 20, 1894).

While not denying observed facts, Seventh-day Adventists have rejected arguments from geology used to support the theory that the days of Creation week were actually long geologic periods (see Science and Religion). They point out that the integrity of the Creation week was attested when the law was given at Sinai (Ex. 20:8—11), and that there is no other satisfactory explanation for the origin of the weekly cycle. Since it is absurd to suppose that matter and energy can arise spontaneously out of nothing, the only reasonable solution is to postulate a Creator. SDAs have taken apparent purpose, intricate design, and order in nature as evidences of a Creator of infinite wisdom and limitless power.

SDAs consider the doctrine of a divine creation as the indispensable foundation for Christian and biblical theology. This fact is emphatically attested from Genesis to Revelation. God’s position as Creator is often pointed to as distinguishing Him from all false gods (1 Chron. 16:24—27; Ps. 96:5—6). The God of creation is the God of the moral law, in the heart of which the Sabbath is given as a sign, symbol, and memorial of His creative power (Ex. 20:8—11; 31:13—17; Eze. 20:20).

The God of creation is also the God of salvation and judgment (Ps. 89:11—15; 146:6—10; Rev. 14:7). He who has power to create has power to redeem, to restore, to create anew the heavens and the earth, to create within man a clean heart (Isa. 44:21—28; 65:17—25; Ps. 51:10). The Christ of creation is before all, He upholds all things by the word of His power, and by Him all things consist (Col. 1:16, 17; Heb. 1:1—3). He was in the beginning with God; He became flesh and dwelt among us with power to save (John 1:1—14). The great fact of Creation is thus essential to the fundamental facts of the Christian faith. See also Evolution; Science and Religion.

Credentials, Licenses, Certificates

CREDENTIALS, LICENSES, CERTIFICATES. Certificates issued to persons in various categories of denominational employment by a mission, a conference, a union, or the General Conference or its divisions. The most frequently issued certificates are: (1) ministerial credentials for ordained ministers; (2) ministerial licenses for unordained ministers; (3) commissioned minister credentials to employees with not less than five years' experience (divisions are free to bestow such a credential if they choose) for associates in pastoral care, Bible workers, treasurers, uncredentialed departmental directors, institutional chaplains, presidents or vice presidents of major institutions, auditors, and field directors of Christian Record Services (employees with less than five years' experience in these categories are issued commissioned minister licenses); (4) missionary credentials for unordained experienced employees, including elementary or secondary teachers; (5) missionary licenses for field medical, educational, and office workers, which may also be granted to miscellaneous office, institutional, and industrial workers who have been in denominational employ more than five years, who do not qualify for missionary credentials; (6) literature evangelist credentials for permanent colporteurs; and (7) literature evangelist licenses for beginning colporteurs with three months' experience. Some divisions also offer (8) teaching-ministry credentials for teachers having more than five years' experience (teaching-ministry licenses for those with less than five years); (9) ministerial internship certificates to college ministerial graduates during their ministerial internship years. All credentials and licenses are granted for a specified period and may be withdrawn in harmony with the constitutional provisions of the issuing organization.

Before the development of formal organization in the Seventh-day Adventist Church, cards signed by "the leading brethren" were issued to the church's ministers. When the first conference (Michigan) was organized, in 1861, it voted to issue its ministers certificates of ordination and annual "credentials to be signed by the chairman and clerk of the conference" (Review and Herald 18:148, Oct. 8, 1861). An individual desiring to preach was, after thorough examination, granted a license to preach, and after a year or more of acceptable ministry, was ordained. A clear distinction was made in the Church Manual articles of 1883 (Review and Herald 60:586, Sept. 11, 1883) between ministerial credentials and licenses, the former being for ordained persons only.

Creed

CREED. A formal, official statement of doctrinal beliefs, as for instance the Apostles' Creed or the Westminster Confession. Seventh-day Adventists have no formal creed, although a statement of beliefs may be found in the denominational Yearbook and Church Manual (see Doctrinal Statements). Seventh-day Adventists consider the entire Bible to be their creed: "The Holy Scriptures, Old and New Testaments are the written Word of God, given by divine inspiration through holy men of God who spoke and wrote as they were moved by the Holy Spirit. In this Word, God has committed to man the knowledge necessary for salvation. The Holy Scriptures are the infallible revelation of His will. They are the standard of character, the test of experience, and the authoritative revealer of doctrines, and the trustworthy record of God's acts in history" (Church Manual, p. 23).

This is in harmony with what James White declared as early as 1847: "The Bible is a perfect, and complete revelation. It is our only rule of faith and practice" (A Word to the Little Flock, p. 13) The earliest SDA periodical, Present Truth, made a similar declaration: "The Bible is our chart—our guide. It is our only rule of faith and practice, to which we would closely adhere" (Present Truth 1:46, December 1849).

The covenant signed by those organizing themselves into a church contained the simple declaration: "taking the name, Seventh-day Adventists, covenanting to keep the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus Christ" (Review and Herald 18:148, Oct. 8, 1861).

Crews, Joseph Archie

CREWS, JOSEPH ARCHIE (1924—1994). Pastor, teacher, radio and television speaker. A son of the South, Crews was graduated in 1946 as president of the first class to graduate with a four-year bachelor's degree from Southern Missionary College. In 1947 he earned an M.A. in systematic theology from the SDA Theological Seminary. That year he also married Lu Ann Tunison and began a five-year ministry in Florida.

From 1952 to 1957 the Crewses did evangelistic work in India. Upon their return they pastored in Texas and Kentucky. In 1965 the Chesapeake Conference called Crews to develop a radio program that would generate interests for the conference's evangelistic outreach. The broadcast was named Amazing Facts, and it first aired during the spring of 1966 on WBMD, Baltimore, Maryland. Currently Amazing Facts airs radio and television programs on 120 stations around the world.

Crews was known for his inspiring, straightforward conservative preaching. He authored 58 books and many magazine articles, and he recorded 553 radio and television sermons. In July 1990 he received the American Broadcaster's Award for 25 years of gospel broadcasting. On Oct. 10, 1994, he succumbed to a cerebral hemorrhage.

Crisler, Clarence Creager

CRISLER, CLARENCE CREAGER (1877—1936). Secretary, mission administrator. He was born in Brooklyn, Iowa, and was reared in a Seventh-day Adventist home, his parents having accepted the SDA faith when he was 5 years old. He graduated from the Orlando, Florida, high school in 1892 and later taught in the Seventh-day Adventist academy in Graysville, Tennessee. He was baptized in 1893. For two years (1895—1897) he attended Battle Creek College. The next three or four years he worked in the General Conference office in Battle Creek as private secretary for such leaders as O. A. Olsen, G. A. Irwin, and A. G. Daniells.

In July 1901 he began working for Ellen White in her Elmshaven office in California and continued there until one year after her death in 1915. In 1916, while accompanying A. G. Daniells, the president of the General Conference, on a trip to the Orient, he was made general secretary of the Far Eastern Division. There I. H. Evans ordained him in 1922.

In 1930, when the China Division was organized, he became its secretary. He was editor of the Far Eastern Division Outlook and later of the China Division Reporter and was associate editor of the Chinese church paper. He contributed much to the development of books and pamphlets in the Chinese language. He also served as a member of the managing boards for the Chinese publishing house, the college, and the sanitarium.

In 1936 he was asked to go with G. J. Appel and other missionaries on a trip to Tibet. He seemed apprehensive of the long and hazardous journey, but willingly accepted his assignment. On Mar. 3, 1936, the group set out for but never reached Tibet. At Titao, Kansu, a little village six miles (10 kilometers) south of Lanchow, China, Crisler died of pneumonia and was buried in Lanchow.

He wrote two books published posthumously: one describing the work in the remote regions of China, entitled China's Borderlands and Beyond; another, on church administration: Organization; Its Character, Purpose, Place, and Development in the Seventh-day Adventist Church.

Cristobal, Juan D.

CRISTOBAL, JUAN D. (1909—1962). Church leader in the Philippines. He was born in the Philippines and joined the Seventh-day Adventist Church in 1927, after attending evangelistic tent meetings and about 1933 entered denominational service as a teacher in the East Visayan Mission. Later he was secretary of the Religious Liberty Department and of the Home Commission of the Mindanao Mission, the first there to hold this office. He was later secretary of the Education and Young People's departments of Southern Luzon Mission (1946—1949), president of the Southern Luzon Mission (1949—1953), and secretary of the Religious Liberty and Temperance departments of the North Philippine Union Mission (1953—1962). In 1962 he was killed in an automobile accident.

Croatia

CROATIA. A republic in southeastern Europe bordered by Slovenia, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Yugoslavia, Hungary, and the Adriatic Sea. It has an area of 21,829 square miles (56,537 square kilometers), and a population (1994) of 4.7 million. The principal language is Serbo-Croatian; the main religion is Roman Catholicism.

For more than 800 years Croatia was politically aligned with Hungary. It was also under Turkish, French, and Austrian influence. In 1918 Croatia became part of the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, which became Yugoslavia in 1929. Croatia declared independence from Yugoslavia in 1991, precipitating fighting between the Croats and the Yugoslavian army units and their Serbian supporters.

Crosier (Crozier), Owen Russell Loomis

CROSIER (CROZIER), OWEN RUSSELL LOOMIS (1820—1913). Millerite preacher and editor, of Canandaigua, New York, first writer on what was to become the Seventh-day Adventist sanctuary doctrine. He was baptized in autumn 1843 by E. R. Pinney. As a young itinerant preacher he was associated with Hiram Edson and F. B. Hahn, and in March 1845 collaborated with Hahn in publishing, at Canandaigua, the Day-Dawn, a small Millerite paper. According to J. N. Loughborough, he was with Edson in the cornfield at Port Gibson on the morning after the sad vigil of Oct. 22, 1844. In any case, he accepted Edson's explanation of the Millerite disappointment, joined with Edson and Hahn in intensive Bible study in the winter of 1844—1845, and wrote out their joint findings on the subject of the sanctuary and its cleansing. As the concept of the sanctuary ministry of Jesus developed, a progression of increasingly clear articles came from the pen of Crosier during 1845 and 1846. The first was in the Day-Dawn, first published in March 1845 (it appears as a part of a Canandaigua newspaper, Ontario Messenger, Mar. 26, 1845). Articles on the sanctuary types by Crosier appeared in the Day-Star during the latter part of 1845; these culminated with a lengthy essay in the Feb. 7, 1846, Day-Star Extra, published in Cincinnati, Ohio. Crosier's exposition was endorsed by Edson and Hahn, who also provided funding for the special issue. Crosier's presentation convinced Joseph Bates, James White, and other New England Adventists. Bates, in turn, presented the Sabbath doctrine to the Port Gibson group in a conference at Edson's home. Crosier kept the Sabbath for a time and advocated it in the Day-Dawn in December 1846 (see Review and Herald 3:8, May 6, 1852), but soon repudiated it and his early sanctuary view. In 1847 he anticipated the "new view" of the daily. Crozier (as he spelled it after about 1850) served on the staff of Joseph Marsh's Advent Harbinger, 1847—1853. He placed the three angels' messages (and the Sabbath) after the Advent. In 1850 he, Marsh, and others taught a doctrine of the millennium ("the age to come") opposed by Adventists in general, a view foreshadowed only partly in one section of his sanctuary article of 1846. In 1858 he was an evangelist for the Michigan Conference of the Advent Christian Church.

Cross, Chester G.

CROSS, CHESTER G. (1913—1981). Administrator. A native of Des Moines, Iowa, he served the church for 45 years, mostly in the publishing work in the Northern and Central unions. He also served as publishing director of the Southern European Division. From 1958 to 1974 he was manager of Christian Record Braille Foundation. After that time he worked in the Trust Services Department of the Southern Union.

Cruzeiro do Sul Adventist Academy

CRUZEIRO DO SUL ADVENTIST ACADEMY (Instituto Adventista Cruzeiro do Sul). A coeducational boarding and day school on the senior high school level, owned by the Rio Grande do Sul Conference and operated by a board representing that conference. It is situated on a 180-acre (75-hectare) tract of rich pasture land two miles (three kilometers) from the town of Taquara, state of Rio Grande do Sul, Brazil.

The plant consists of 22 buildings, including a large church auditorium, a school edifice, two dormitories, homes for teachers, a carpenter shop, a store, and a dairy.

The property originally belonged to Ernesto Bergold, who maintained a small clinic there, offering simple, natural treatments. In 1928 A. C. Harder obtained this property for the purpose of opening a school to be named Colegio Cruzeiro do Sul. Harder, investing his own money as well as his wife's inheritance, and receiving no salary, acted as principal and teacher and was aided in his efforts by Jose Mendes, another self-sacrificing teacher. By 1932 the school had two buildings, and in 1935 it became the property of the Rio Grande do Sul Conference. In 1937 the conference invited Dr. Otávio Espírito Santo, an engineer with considerable teaching experience, to administer the institution. Under his leadership the school was approved by the government in 1939 on the junior high school level and took the name Ginásio Adventista de Taquara. A commercial course was added in 1957 that conformed to the government standards, and as a result, the name of the school was changed in 1961 to Instituto Cruzeiro do Sul, with its present academic status.

Cuba

CUBA. A republic occupying a large island and several small islands situated in the northern part of the Caribbean Sea, having an area of 44,218 square miles (114,524 square kilometers) and a population (1994) of 11 million. Spanish is the national language, with English widely used as a second language. Church and state are separate, though the population is predominantly Roman Catholic. In 1962 there were about 265,000 Protestants in Cuba. About half the island consists of flat or rolling terrain; the remainder is hilly or mountainous. The climate, except in the mountains, is semitropical, the temperature never varying more than about 10 degrees from an average of 77°F (25° C). Cuban economy is based largely on the exportation of sugar and tobacco, and until the present government (1994) assumed power in 1959, the island was generally recognized as being the world's largest producer of sugar.

Historical Background

Historical Background. Originally inhabited by Arawak Indians, Cuba was discovered by Columbus, Oct. 28, 1492. It was used by the Spaniards as a base, first for further exploration and later for the fleets of treasure ships returning to Spain. The island developed an agricultural economy, but relative prosperity came only after the Treaty of Ryswick (1697) ended the raids of the British, French, and Dutch buccaneers, which had seriously disrupted the economy. Even then Spain's policy of economic exploitation and monopolistic control, together with discrimination against the Creoles (Cubans of Spanish descent), fostered discontent, which erupted in several open revolts by the tobacco growers.

Cuba was held by the British from 1762 to 1763. During the American Revolution the island served as a base of operations for the French and Spanish allies against Great Britain.

The early nineteenth-century spirit of independence engendered in Spanish America by Napoleon's occupation of Spain was ruthlessly suppressed in Cuba, although not eradicated, by the Spanish forces on the island. The most notable unsuccessful revolt was the Ten Years' War (1868—1878).

Another revolution, in 1895, led by José Julián Martí, ended in American intervention and the Spanish-American War (1898). The United States occupied the islands until 1902, at which time the Republic of Cuba was formed, with the United States reserving the right to intervene to preserve Cuba's independence and stability. Under this provision, when in 1906 a revolution broke out, United States forces occupied the island until 1909. The provision was revoked in 1934.

For the most part, until 1952 the presidents and congress were elected. Since that time the government has been a dictatorship.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. Until 1967 the territory of Cuba consisted of the East Cuba and West Cuba conferences, part of the Antillian Union Mission, which in turn was a part of the Inter-American Division. Since 1967 the church has been reorganized in order to fulfill the requirements of the new system of government. For many years the church operated as the National Association of the Seventh-day Adventist Church in Cuba with three province offices, called delegations, to run the church's affairs in the provinces. From Apr. 21—24, 1989, the tenth National Association Congress of the Seventh-day Adventist Church in Cuba was held. It established the Cuban Union Conference with three delegations: Central, East, and West. Statistics (1992) for Cuba: churches, 112; members, 11,235; ordained ministers, 48; licensed ministers, 35. Cuban Union Conference Headquarters are in Havana.

Statistics (1992) for the delegations—Central Delegation: churches, 29; members, 2,739. Headquarters: Camaguey. East Delegation: churches, 47; members 4,884. Headquarters: Holguin. West Delegation: churches, 38; members 4,598. Headquarters: Habana.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. In the winter of 1902—1903, W. A. Spicer spent a few days in Cuba. Returning, he urged Seventh-day Adventists to begin missionary work there (Review and Herald 80:15, Aug. 11, 1903). A few months later the first missionaries arrived and began self-supporting colporteur and medical work. Reporting in the Review and Herald (82:12, Mar. 9, 1905) on the work in this early period, Isaiah E. Moore, a self-supporting nurse, who with his wife arrived in Havana in May 1904, said: “Brother and Sister Hall and Brother and Sister Sterquel came to Cuba about two years ago [i.e. 1903] and settled at La Gloria. . . . Brother and Sister [Joseph]Clark [who also came in 1903] are holding up the banner at Ceballos, and have been distributing literature. . . . Brother Stytych, who has doubtless been on the island longer than any other Seventh-day Adventist, is now at Bahia Honda. . . .

“Brother and Sister O[tis]L. Dart, of Graysville, Tenn., arrived in Havana the last of November [1904]. They are all self-supporting workers.”

The Cuban Mission was established in 1904 and organized in 1905, with E. W. Snyder as director. The first church was organized in 1905, in La Lisa, a suburb of Marianao, near Havana. This church became known as the Havana Adventist Church.

The first Cuban converts were Pedro Cruz and Manuel Avila. Cruz was the first to become interested in SDA teachings and invited his friend Avila to attend meetings that were being held in La Lisa. Together they studied the SDA doctrines with the missionaries, and were baptized May 18, 1907. Later the same year eight more became members by baptism (Oct. 26).

About that time a church was organized in eastern Cuba and another at Omaja, an American colony, 100 miles (160 kilometers) from Santiago. The Havana church was registered under the name Iglesia Adventista del Septimo Dia de Cuba (Seventh-day Adventist Church of Cuba). The next year this name became official.

In 1905 there were only six SDA members in Cuba, but by 1908 this number had grown to 53. From 1911 to 1914, work was developed among the Americans and English living in Cuba, and many joined the church. In 1911 H. A. Birbeck-Robinson came from Mexico to give strong leadership to the publishing work.

In 1917 there were 47 added by baptism, raising the total membership to 173. For the next 15 years there was a steady increase of members, so that at the end of 1932 there were 1,001 members reported. Churches were organized at Guanabacoa, El Cerro in Havana, Santiago, and other cities of the island.

The Cuban Mission was reorganized as the Cuban Conference, which, during its first session held in Havana from Jan. 31 to Feb. 9, 1935, elected as its president E. J. Lorntz, who had been president of the Cuban Mission since 1933.

From 1,001 at the end of 1932, membership rose to 2,108 by the end of 1937. Membership continued to rise, though a little more slowly, during the next three years. In a special conference session December 1940 to January 1941, the Cuban Conference was divided into the East Cuba Conference (provinces of Camagüey and Oriente) and the West Cuba Conference (provinces of Las Villas, Matanzas, Habana, and Pinar del Río).

Education. SDA educational work had its origin in a school on the San Claudio farm near the town of Cabañas, in Pinar del Río. The school's first principal was Mrs. S. H. Carnahan. This school was the forerunner of the Colegio de las Antillas, which was later transferred to Puerto Rico (1962), and of the Seminario Adventista de Cuba (now Cuba Adventist Seminary). Cuba had 40 elementary church schools before all private schools were prohibited by law in 1961.

Radio Work. Radio work in Cuba began in 1935 over a station in Havana. The program called La Voz del Atalaya ("The Voice of the Watchman") was broadcast Sundays (9:00 a.m.), with Miguel Vasquez as speaker. In 1942, when the General Conference Radio Department appointed Braulio Pérez to prepare and record Spanish radio programs to be transmitted to Spanish-speaking countries overseas, CMQ, the most important radio station in Cuba at that time, accepted the program to be broadcast on Sundays. Later, a radio Bible school was begun, which still functions, although the radiobroadcasts have been discontinued because of government restrictions that have been imposed.

Cuba Adventist Seminary

CUBA ADVENTIST SEMINARY (Seminario Adventista de Cuba). A coeducational boarding school on the junior college level, situated on a 331-acre (134-hectare) site five miles (eight kilometers) from Santa Clara, approximately in the center of the island of Cuba. It is operated by the Cuban Union Conference and serves the constituency of the church in Cuba. Until recently the elementary and secondary curriculum had state recognition. At present (1993) only the equivalent of grades 10 through 14 is permitted and mainly seminary courses are offered. Whereas the 1962 school enrollment was 313, it is now about 24. The total school staff numbers five.

The physical plant includes two dormitories, 14 classrooms, a library, a chapel, administrative offices, six industrial buildings, 14 homes for teachers and other employees, and 29 student apartments.

From the beginning of Seventh-day Adventist work in Cuba until 1922, several elementary schools were established in different parts of the island, but these were short-lived. In the summer of 1922 the first secondary school with boarding facilities and industries was established on a small farm in Oriente province, near the town of Bartle. Charles J. Foster was its founder and constructed the first buildings. The school grew slowly and eventually served the Spanish-speaking fields of the Antillian Union, becoming known as the Colegio Adventista (Antillano). However, its site on the extreme end of the island, the poor land, and the scarcity of water hindered normal development. When J. S. Marshall became principal of the school, he made plans for moving the institution to a more appropriate location.

In February 1940 the Antillian Union committee purchased the present site, and in May 1940 the school began to function in temporary quarters on the Santa Clara campus as the Colegio Adventista de las Antillas.

In 1945 the school was authorized to offer two years of advanced training in theology and elementary education, raising the school to junior college status. Two years later the first students graduated from these courses.

Under the administration of F. G. Drachenberg, who became principal in 1947, a canning industry was established, which was a principal source of student employment.

In 1949 commercial and secretarial courses were added to the curriculum to meet the need for workers in these areas in the Antillian Union. The following year the college, having fulfilled the requirements, became affiliated with the Department of Education of Union College, Lincoln, Nebraska. At the same time a junior college course for Bible instructors was established, and in 1952 a course in agriculture was added. At first only the elementary school was recognized by the Cuban government, but in 1952 the school received state recognition of its secondary classes.

In the summer of 1955 plans were completed for establishing a four-year college program to serve the needs of the Spanish-speaking constituency in the Inter-American Division. The senior college ministerial course was approved by the General Conference Department of Education and the Inter-American Division in May 1958. That year plans were also laid for offering a degree in elementary or secondary education, and these were first made available in the 1958—1959 school year.

One hundred additional acres (40 hectares) of land bordering the school property were purchased in 1959. This new addition expanded the work possibilities for students.

After the 1960—1961 school year senior college classes were not offered because of the difficulty of retaining trained professors in Cuba and of bringing in students from the other Spanish-speaking countries in the Inter-American Division. The senior college courses were subsequently offered at the Puerto Rico school, thus effecting a move of Antillian College to that country, leaving the Cuban school operating on the junior college level.

In February 1967 government representatives took possession of the institution's buildings, industries, land, cattle, and equipment, excepting the library books and the academic records. This action terminated 27 years of efforts and progress in what was up to that time the main educational institution of the Antillian Union.

After three years of negotiation with officials of Cuba's Ministry of Education, authorization was given for the opening of a very small institution strictly for seminary purposes, with a maximum enrollment of 20 men. School opened again in March 1970, downstairs in the former Antillian Union office building in Rancho Boyeros near the city of Havana.

In this new phase, the Cuban Adventist Seminary continues to operate at the 14-grade level.

Cult

CULT. A system of religious belief and worship, especially one peculiar to a particular national or ethnic group. In this sense the religion of ancient Israel with its feasts and sacrifices has been referred to as a cult. Other ancient civilizations such as those of Phoenicia and Egypt had their cult worship. When applied to contemporary groups, the term is usually used in a derogatory sense and implies that the groups thus described deviate from what is considered to be the accepted norm of belief and practice.

Occasionally some ultraconservative writers classify Seventh-day Adventists as a cult, usually because of a misunderstanding of SDA teachings or a deliberate intent to misrepresent these teachings. SDAs do not consider that the term “cult” is accurately used of them, in view of the fact that they accept without reservation the historic tenets of the Christian faith, such as the inspiration of the Bible, the Bible as the Christian’s sole rule of faith and practice, the Trinity, the deity and preexistence of Christ, His vicarious death, salvation by faith in Christ alone, and the second coming of Christ in power and glory to annihilate evil and to establish His eternal kingdom.

Cummings, Jonathan

CUMMINGS, JONATHAN (fl. c. 1852). A Millerite Adventist who began to preach in 1852 that the second coming of Christ was to take place in the autumn of 1853 or in the spring of 1854. After the passing of the set time, his followers, whose belief in the doctrine of conditional immortality separated them from the main body of Millerite Adventists, organized themselves into an Adventist body that since 1861 has borne the name Advent Christian Church, and which now is the largest of the Adventist bodies that do not observe the seventh-day Sabbath.

Curdy, Joseph

CURDY, JOSEPH (1862—1947). Swiss evangelist, editor, translator, teacher, and administrator. Born in a Catholic home, he became a Seventh-day Adventist in 1884 and the next year entered denominational work. It appears that he worked in the Waldensian valleys of northern Italy in the 1890s. In 1888 he married Amélie Jaquet. In 1896 he was ordained to the ministry. In the early years of the twentieth century he preached in Belgium. About the same time he was one of the editors of Les Signes des Temps and Le Messager de la Prophétie. In 1907 he became president of the French-Swiss Conference, an office he held until 1910. Afterward, he worked in France and Switzerland, and in 1920 went to Canada and took charge of the French Department of Oshawa Missionary College (now Kingsway College). Also in 1920 he married Emma Clerc, his first wife having died. While in Canada, he edited Les Signes des Temps (Canadian). He returned to Switzerland in 1926 and engaged in pastoral work there.

Currow, May Lacey White

CURROW, MAY LACEY WHITE (1873—1969). Pioneer. She was born at Cuttack, near Calcutta, India. She attended school in England and traveled with her family to Tasmania at the age of 9.

Her family was converted to the Seventh-day Adventist Church in the late 1880s. Desiring to be a Bible worker, May attended the Seventh-day Adventist school at Melbourne. There she met W. C. White, a widower and son and helpmeet of Ellen White. At the time of their marriage May was 21 and Willie was 40. The marriage proved highly successful, with May becoming a real mother to Willie's two daughters, Ella, 13, and Mabel, 8. May herself became the mother of five children, including twin boys. She passed to her rest at Eden Valley, Colorado, just one day short of her ninety-sixth birthday.

Curtis, Eli

CURTIS, ELI (fl. 1845—1851). A Millerite of New York City who wrote articles in the Day-Dawn (Canandaigua, New York) and the Day-Star (Cincinnati, Ohio), and published at least two ephemeral sheets of his own in New York (extant examples: the Girdle of Truth Extra, 1848, and the Sharp Sword With Two Edges, 1851). In 1845 he wrote letters to the Day-Star, indistinguishable from those of the Millerites advocating the “shut door,” but by 1851 he was a full-fledged spiritist, reprinting alleged spirit messages intended to prepare the world for the Second Advent. Ellen White, who had seen some of his articles written before he was a spiritist, wrote to him in 1847 agreeing with him on some points (for example, the millennium beginning and ending with the two literal resurrections and followed by the new heavens and new earth), but disagreeing on other points (in James White’s A Word to the “Little Flock,” pp. 11, 12). By 1848 he was reprinting some of her writings without her consent. His misuse of them in garbled form called forth her protest against his “inconsistent course for some time past” and “his [unfavorable] influence on the cause of truth” (Present Truth 1:80, May 1850).

Curtis, Jessie Weiss

CURTIS, JESSIE WEISS (1881—1972). Well-known minister in the Pennsylvania Conference. She received her education at Battle Creek, Michigan, and was the youngest student in her class. She began her work as a Bible worker in New Jersey, Washington, D.C., and Pennsylvania. During her early ministry she worked with H.M.J. Richards, father of H.M.S. Richards, of the Voice of Prophecy. Mrs. Curtis also worked with Ned Ashton, a former pastor of Sligo church in Takoma Park, Maryland, N. R. Dower of the General Conference, and F. H. Robbins, former president of the Columbia Union Conference. She conducted her own tent meetings throughout northeastern Pennsylvania, and as a result organized many new churches in the conference. The last three churches that she pastored were Beaumont, Tunkhannock, and Montrose, all three of which were built under her supervision. During her ministry she conducted an abundance of Bible studies, and as a result hundreds have become Seventh-day Adventists. Many young interns worked under her instruction. In 1932 she married John Curtis, a prominent businessperson who was generous to the denomination. He preceded his wife in death. Mrs. Curtis was still witnessing until shortly before her death.

Curtis, Will D.

CURTIS, WILL D. (1851—1907). Pioneer Seventh-day Adventist missionary in Australia. He accepted SDA beliefs when about 30 years old. Joining the church, he entered the ministry and in 1887 went to Australia. On the way there, he assisted with the establishment of SDA work in Hawaii, and visited in New Zealand. He returned to the United States in 1892 on the Pitcairn. He then served as superintendent of education for the Illinois and Indiana conferences and the Lake Union Conference.

Curtiss, Spencer Nelson

CURTISS, SPENCER NELSON (1862—1925). Publishing house manager. He began serving an apprenticeship with the Review and Herald Publishing Association in 1881, graduated from Battle Creek College in 1882, joined the Pacific Press in 1887 as manager of the Book Department, and later became superintendent of the factory. In 1893 he established and managed the first Pacific Press branch at Kansas City, and later was transferred to the New York branch. From 1903 to 1912 he was manager of the Review and Herald Publishing Association. After again serving as manager of the Kansas City branch, he served as manager of the new international branch at Brookfield, Illinois (1916—1922).

Cyprus

CYPRUS. An island republic situated in the eastern end of the Mediterranean Sea, with a land area of 3,572 square miles (9,251 square kilometers) and a population (1994) of 730,000. Four fifths of the inhabitants are Greek Christians and most of the rest are Turkish Muslims. English, Greek, and Turkish are spoken on the island. In its history Cyprus passed through the hands of many empires. From 1878 until it achieved independence in 1960, Great Britain administered Cyprus. In 1964 and again in 1974 civil strife on the island interfered with Seventh-day Adventist missionary activities.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. Cyprus constitutes a section in the Middle East Union Mission, which is an attached union under the General Conference. Statistics (1993): churches, 1; members, 38. The headquarters are in Nicosia, Cyprus.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. The first Seventh-day Adventist to go to Cyprus was Moses Boursalian, an Armenian who fled there with his family from Antioch, Turkey, about 1912. For years he quietly plied combs made by his family from village to village on donkey back and talked of his beliefs to his neighbors. Later his son John became the first SDA colporteur on the island. In 1930 there was a company of about 10 adherents in Nicosia.

Except for visits by SDA ministers to baptize new converts and hold Communion services, there was no official SDA work for many years. Finally in 1932 R. S. Greaves and his wife, former missionaries to Turkey and Greece, made Cyprus their home and became pioneer workers on the island, having emigrated from Canada.

At the close of World War II A. N. Barlas and Aram Ashad and his wife arrived to establish the work on a more permanent basis. The small group of SDAs worshiped in their homes. In 1953 Fred Veltman, an American missionary, became president of the newly organized Cyprus Mission. The welfare work carried on by the SDAs included the rebuilding in Paphos of a home destroyed by an earthquake. In the mid-1950s a correspondence school was opened in Nicosia, and the first Seventh-day Adventist church building on the island was erected at Nicosia in 1956, and the church took part in the Cyprus International Fair.

The work on the island was directed from Beirut between 1956 and 1959. The first large-scale evangelistic meetings were held by Robert L. Mole in 1959, with simultaneous translations into Greek and Armenian. J. Sherwood Jones was appointed president in 1964, but did not move there until June 1965, because of political disturbances. Soon after, Moses Elmadjian, a Cypriot and the grandson of the first SDA in Cyprus, was appointed mission secretary-treasurer.

During the disturbances the church and offices were looted and damaged, and the workers were obliged to move to new quarters in Nicosia. Temperance work served as the main approach to the public, and in 1967 the first Five-Day Plan to Stop Smoking conducted in the Greek language was held in the capital, sponsored by the mayor of Nicosia. That same year the church was able to gain official recognition by the government. A new center was purchased and occupied in a residential area in Nicosia, which in 1993 was still serving as church headquarters. Attempts were made in 1970 to establish a dental clinic on the island, but these attempts were unsuccessful. Early in 1972 Manouk Benzatian pioneered work in the Turkish section of Cyprus by holding the first Five-Day Plan in that language on the island.

Dean McDaniel was the director of the work in Cyprus at the time of the 1974 civil strife. Unable to continue work, he was obliged to return to the United States.

Evangelist Dinos Mastromihalis came to Cyprus from Australia in 1992 to hold the first Greek evangelistic campaign in Nicosia. Approximately 250 people attended, some of whom are attending church services regularly.

Efforts have been very successful in the area of literature evangelism, stop-smoking plans, health and stress seminars, and Revelation seminars.

Czech Republic

CZECH REPUBLIC. A country in central Europe bounded on the north by Poland, on the east by Slovakia, on the south by Austria, and on the west by Germany. It has a territory of 30,344 square miles (78,591 square kilometers) and a population (1994) of 10.4 million.

The country of Czechoslovakia was formed after World War I out of the ancient Czech principalities of Bohemia, Moravia, and a part of Silesia, together with Slovakia, all of which were contained in the former Austro-Hungarian empire. The present Czech Republic was constituted in 1993. Ethnically the people are about 95 percent Czechs and 5 percent Slovaks, Germans, and Poles. Forty percent of the people belong to the Roman Catholic Church; 20 percent are Protestant, independent Catholic, Orthodox, or Jewish; and 40 percent are unchurched.

The present Czech Republic is one of the most advanced countries in Europe culturally and industrially, Prague (its capital) being the site of one of the oldest European universities. The Slavs in the territory of the present Czech Republic had established a great empire by the ninth century. About that time Christianity was introduced there by the Greek missionaries Cyril and Methodius, who not only preached but also gave the Slavs their written alphabet, the Cyrillic. Later the Roman Catholic Church caused the adoption of the Latin script in Czechoslovakia, but the Cyrillic was retained as the script of the countries of Russia, Bulgaria, and Serbia.

From the tenth century, the combined pressure of Magyars and Germans gradually eroded the Slavic state, although until the wars of the Reformation, which began in Bohemia, the Czechs maintained a considerable degree of local political and cultural independence. Near the beginning of the fifteenth century, the Reformation movement sprang up in Bohemia, where John Huss preached in the national language. He was burned as a heretic at Constance. In the Roman Catholic Counter Reformation that followed the Reformation, Protestantism was seriously weakened in Czechoslovakia.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. Seventh-day Adventist tracts in the Czech language were prepared as early as 1890 by the Hamburg Publishing House. A Czech Baptist in Hamburg by the name of Antonin Simon read these tracts, accepted the SDA doctrines the same year, and at once translated some other tracts. After returning to Bohemia, he settled in Roudnice and later in Malesice, near Prague. The members of the Simon family were active missionaries and soon made converts of many of their associates and neighbors. The son, Joseph Simon, entered the work in 1918 and later was principal of a school in Lodenice. In 1894 L. R. Conradi, of Germany, made arrangements for a Protestant publisher at Pardubice, Bohemia, to print a Czech-language edition of Ellen White's Steps to Christ. The next year Conradi reported visiting a group of adherents near Prague and celebrating the Lord's Supper with them, the first such celebration by SDAs in Bohemia.

The first Seventh-day Adventist minister to conduct systematic evangelistic work in Prague was J. P. Lorenz, who arrived there in 1901 and found a group of Sabbathkeepers. He organized a church that by 1902 had 20 members. The early converts developed into strong church workers; one of them, a man by the name of Skakal, living at Nymburk, became the first editor of the Czech paper Hlasatel Pravdy ("Herald of Truth"), when it was launched by the Hamburg Publishing House in 1906.

In 1907 and 1908 general meetings of SDAs in the old Austro-Hungarian empire were held in Prague. By 1911 the work in Bohemia and Moravia had become so well established that the territory was divided into the Bohemian Mission field, with 114 members, and the Moravian-Silesian Mission, with 135 members.

The government of the old Austro-Hungarian monarchy strongly opposed efforts to teach Protestant doctrines, especially through the circulation of publications. Early SDA colporteurs (among them, Josef Doubravsky, J. Popelka, and K. Polednik) were arrested several times while doing colporteur work in 1912. However, obstacles did not prevent the printing of books and papers. The Hamburg Publishing House continued the monthly paper Hlasatel Pravdy until World War I. In 1913 the same house printed a new Czech edition of Steps to Christ, and in 1915 Ellen G. White's Thoughts From the Mount of Blessing, as well as certain books by L. R. Conradi.

In 1919 the Czechoslovakian Union Conference, composed of the North Bohemian, the West Silesian-Moravian, and the Polish-Silesian conferences, and the Central Bohemian and the Slovakian missions, was organized, with E. E. Frauchiger, from Switzerland, as the first president. Its headquarters were established in Opava, Silesia. At the end of 1920, the union had 55 churches, with 1,691 members. In 1920, when the eastern part of Silesia was ceded to Poland, the consequent transfer of 535 members to the Polish Union reduced Czechoslovakia's membership.

A publishing house (listed in the Yearbook as the Czechoslovakian Publishing House) was established soon after the war, with F. Ludwig in charge. It issued publications in Bohemian, Slovakian, Polish, Slovenian, German, and Hungarian.

In 1921 the first training course was offered in Czechoslovakia. A permanent training school (listed in the Yearbook as Czechoslovakian Mission School) was opened in 1925 at Lodenice. Many evangelists trained in this school determined to continue the Reformation begun by John Huss and John Amos Komensky (Comenius), and to turn the people of Czechoslovakia to God.

During the years between the two world wars encouraging progress was made. At the outbreak of World War II in 1939 there were 97 churches, with 3,157 members, in Czechoslovakia. When Germany occupied Czechoslovakia, the activities of the Seventh-day Adventist Church were greatly hindered. The publishing house and the training school were closed. However, during the years between 1939 and 1945, baptisms took place, and despite adversity, the membership increased, although the majority of the German-speaking Seventh-day Adventists had to return to Germany after the war.

After the war the publishing house flourished again, and plans were laid for its enlargement and the reestablishment of the training school. A property was bought in a suburb of Prague for this purpose, and building operations were proceeding well. In 1951 the local conference organizations were dissolved by the government. From 1952 to 1956 the public activities of our denomination were stopped, and the churches were closed. Nevertheless, the work continued, and in spite of many hardships new converts were baptized and the holy ordinances celebrated. In 1956 all Seventh-day Adventist churches were reopened. In 1968 the local conferences—Bohemian, Moravia-Silesian, and Slovakian—were reorganized, and the Czechoslovakian Bible Seminary and the Czechoslovakian Publishing House were reestablished in Prague.

In 1993, after the split of former Czechoslovakia into two independent states—the Czech Republic and Slovakia—the union was renamed the Czecho-Slovakian Union Conference and was granted complete freedom of operation.

Until 1938 Czechoslovakia was a part of the Central European Division, then of the Central European Division Section II. In 1946 it was made a part of the Southern European Division, now the Euro-Africa Division.

Czecho-Slovakian Publishing House

CZECHO-SLOVAKIAN PUBLISHING HOUSE (Advent-Orion Publishing House) (Vydavatelstvi a Nakladatelstvi Advent-Orion). A publishing house operated by the Czecho-Slovakian Union Conference in Prague. In the early years Seventh-day Adventist publications were imported from Hamburg, Germany, and the United States. After World War I the Czecho-Slovakian Publishing House was established, but before World War II the church was forced to close it, and only a few church publications were printed by a private company. In 1968 the publishing house was reestablished with its own printing and bindery facilities. The printing of the Signs of the Times and the Sabbath school quarterly was done by the government press, and other publications in the denominational facility. In addition to booklets, tracts, and periodicals (Signs of the Times and Our Little Light for children), many books have been printed, including Patriarchs and Prophets, Prophets and Kings, The Desire of Ages, The Acts of the Apostles, The Great Controversy, Christian Service, and two large hymnals (one with music and one without). Most publications are in the Czech language, but some are printed in the Slovakian and Hungarian. In 1990, after the fall of Communism in Czechoslovakia, the publishing house was reorganized and renamed. Following the split of the Czech and Slovak republics, the Slovakian branch was established in 1993.

Czechowski, Michael Belina

CZECHOWSKI, MICHAEL BELINA (1818—1876). Converted Catholic priest who first carried the Seventh-day Adventist message to Europe. A Pole by birth, he was educated for the priesthood in Cracow, but was forced to flee his native land in the wake of revolutionary activities in that area. After considerable wandering throughout Europe, he became disillusioned with the Catholic Church, married, and came to America. For a while he attended Grand Ligne Mission, a French Baptist school, near Montreal, Canada, and then was sent as an evangelist to work among the French-speaking people across the border in the United States. Faced with reverses, he left the field and went west. He came upon an Adventist tent meeting at Findlay, Ohio, and there joined the Adventist Church in 1857. (His name then appeared in the Review and Herald as M. Belina Czechowski.) Thereafter, he worked in association with D. T. Bordeau in Canada, northern New York, and Vermont.

Czechowski had a great desire to go to Italy as a missionary for the denomination, but the leaders felt that the young Seventh-day Adventist organization was not yet ready for such an enterprise. Disappointed, but determined to carry out his plans, he sought assistance from another Adventist denomination. This enabled him to go to Europe in 1864, 10 years before the church sent J. N. Andrews as an official missionary to Europe. He came to Torre Pellice in a Waldensian valley in Piedmont, northern Italy, where he formed a company of believers whom he taught the SDA doctrines, even though he himself was no longer associated with the SDA Church. Encountering much opposition in Italy, he left the country after 14 months and went to Switzerland, where he worked for four years with great energy and perseverance, establishing a periodical entitled L'Evangile Eternel (“The Everlasting Gospel”), which was published for about two years.

Through his teaching and prolific writing, he proclaimed the Sabbath and the second coming of Christ, and as a result of his efforts several companies of believers were established in Switzerland, the largest being in Tramelan. The group in Tramelan has been later regarded as the first SDA church to be established in Europe. Czechowski's efforts formed a foundation on which to establish a European mission under Andrews' leadership.

From Switzerland he went to Romania, where he again preached Adventism and laid the foundation for future growth. He died in Vienna in 1876. Several libraries in the United States hold many original documents and Czechowski's correspondence with SDA leaders, including Ellen White, and political luminaries of the day.

Until 1975 it was not known where he was buried, but minutes before the adjournment of the 1975 General Conference session in Vienna, official word was received that the grave had been located in the Central Friedhof Cemetery in that city where he had been laid 99 years before.

In 1976 an international historical symposium held in Warsaw, Poland, studied Czechowski's life and work as an SDA “trailblazer” in Europe and published its conclusions.

Dail, Guy

DAIL, GUY (1871—1934). Minister, division secretary. He was converted in 1881 and baptized by M. Enoch the same year. From 1886 to 1891 he attended Battle Creek College, where, according to his own words, he was reconverted and rebaptized. Next he enrolled in Union College and in 1895 became its first graduate from the classical course with a B.A. degree.

From 1895 to 1901 he worked for the Seventh-day Adventist Foreign Mission Board in Battle Creek, Philadelphia, and New York. In 1901 he was called to Europe, where he served until 1904 as the recording and corresponding secretary of the German Union. Then from 1904 to 1920 he was secretary of the European Division, with headquarters in Hamburg. During a part of this time (1917—1920) he also was president of the German-Swiss Conference and had his residence in Bern. He was ordained in 1911.

In 1920 he returned to America and taught Bible at Pacific Union College until 1924, when he was urgently invited to return to Europe to head the Bible Department in the Baltic Union Training School. In 1928, when the old European Division was divided, he was elected secretary of the Central European Division, with headquarters in Berlin. He held this position until 1932, when he was appointed director of the Bulgarian Mission. He remained with the mission until 1934, when he returned to the Central European Division headquarters to serve as departmental secretary.

Daily, The

DAILY, THE. As used in the prophecy of Daniel, a cryptic term for what was taken away by a power described as “a little horn, which waxed exceeding great” in the vision of Dan. 8 and as the “king of the north” in Dan. 11. In each instance an apostate form of worship variously designated “the transgression of desolation” (Dan. 8:13) or “the abomination that maketh desolate” (Dan. 11:31; 12:11) is set up in its place. The Hebrew word translated “daily” is tamîd. Aside from its five occurrences in Daniel, it occurs nearly 100 times elsewhere in the OT, usually as an adverb but frequently as an adjective, and meaning “continual(ly),” “perpetual(ly),” “regular(ly).” In Daniel 1 tamîd is an adjective used substantively; that is, no noun is supplied. Readers are left uncertain as to the noun that should be supplied to complete the sense. But tamîd is a key word in the visions of Dan. 8 and 11—12, and a correct understanding of it is relevant to the interpretation of these prophetic passages. The KJV translators supplied the English word “sacrifice”: for example, “the daily sacrifice was taken away” (Dan. 8:11). The RSV renders the corresponding clause: “The continual burnt offering was taken away.” The KJV and RSV renderings are identical in meaning, the translators holding that in Daniel tamîd referred to the “daily” or “continual” sacrifice offered in the Jewish temple every morning and every evening.

History of Interpretation

History of Interpretation. 1. Literal and Symbolic Interpretations. Through the centuries, long before the Advent movement (see Millerite Movement) of the 1840s, there had been two classes of interpretations of “daily,” or “continual.” The literal view saw the “daily” as meaning the Jewish sacrifices in the Temple, and the taking away of the “daily” as their interruption by Antiochus (2nd century B.C.), or by the Romans (A.D. 70), or by a last-day antichrist. In this view, the “two thousand three hundred evenings and mornings” (Dan. 8:14, margin) are 2,300 (or 1,150) literal days, and the 1290 days (Dan. 12:11) similarly literal days. The symbolic view, also widely held, saw the periods as symbolic days, that is, as literal years, extending into the Christian Era; and the “daily” as a symbol of true worship or sound doctrine in the church, taken away by either the Papacy or the Muslim conquest (or, from the Catholic side, as the sacrifice of the Mass abolished by Protestants, or by a future antichrist).

2. Two Interpretations Among Seventh-day Adventists. Adventist writers have given two symbolic interpretations of the “daily”: (1) the so-called old view, inherited from the Millerite movement, namely, that the “daily” means ancient Roman paganism; and (2) the so-called new view, also advocated by at least one unnamed Millerite writer but not adopted by the others, that the “daily” represents Christ’s priestly mediation in the heavenly sanctuary. Both of these views agree that the desolating little horn described as taking away the “daily” and treading down the sanctuary and the people of God represents the Papacy. According to the first view the “daily” that was taken away is the first phase of the Roman horn's oppressive power (paganism, replaced by the papal phase in the role of treading down God's sanctuary and people); but according to the second view the "daily" is the object, rather than the agent, of the little horn's attacks (the true mediation of Christ, our high priest, replaced by the false mediation of a human priesthood).

3. Origin of the "Old" View. The identification of the "daily" as paganism originated with William Miller. Seeking the meaning of the term as he found it in Daniel, he searched, with the aid of a concordance, in the King James Version of the Bible for other occurrences of the English word "daily." He described his search thus: "I read on and could find no other case in which it was found, but in Daniel. I then took those words which stood in connection with it, 'take away.' He shall take away the daily, 'from the time the daily shall be taken away,' &c. I read on, and thought I should find no light on the text; finally I came to 2 Thess. ii. 7, 8. 'For the mystery of iniquity doth already work, only he who now letteth, will let, until he be taken out of the way, and then shall that wicked be revealed,' &c. And when I had come to that text, O how clear and glorious the truth appeared. There it is! that is 'the daily!' Well, now, what does Paul mean by 'he who now letteth,' or hindereth? By 'the man of sin,' and 'the wicked,' Popery is meant. Well, what is it which hinders Popery from being revealed? Why, it is Paganism: well, then, 'the daily' must mean Paganism" (William Miller, quoted in Apollon Hale, Second Advent Manual, p. 66).

Protestants before Miller had applied this text in Thessalonians to the replacing of Roman paganism by apostate Christianity; he now applied it thus: The "daily" (Roman paganism) was taken away and the place of its (pagan) sanctuary (Rome) was cast down, or polluted; and in its place the abomination (the papal system) was set up in the church. Then God's sanctuary, which was trodden down first by paganism and then by the Papacy, was to be cleansed. He at first identified this as "the temple at Jerusalem and the worshipers therein"; later as "the Earth and the Church." (See his Evidence . . . on the Second Coming ["Miller's Lectures"] [1838 ed.], pp. 36—38; Letter . . . on the Cleansing of the Sanctuary [1842], p. 8.)

Miller gave the date A.D. 508 as the time when the "daily" would be taken away (explained as the triumph of the Roman church over Roman paganism) and the 1290 days (Dan. 12:11), counted as years, would begin. According to his reckoning, the date A.D. 508 also marked the end of a period of 666 years (arrived at by his application of the number 666 mentioned in Rev. 13:18), during which Roman paganism would dominate the people of God, first the Jews and later the Christians (Evidence, p. 81).

4. Opposition to Miller's Interpretation. Miller's explanation of the "daily" soon drew fire from his opponents on two scores: (1) his chronology and (2) his identification. His chronology was objected to on historical grounds and his identification of the "daily" on exegetical grounds—the latter especially from those who held the literal view that the "daily" and the time periods (1290 and 2300 days) meant literal sacrifices and literal days.

5. Shift in Millerite Position. Miller's colleagues generally accepted his identification of the "daily" but disagreed with his application of the number 666. The most widely used Millerite prophetic chart (designed by Fitch, 1842) omitted any explanation of 666 or any identification of the "daily." In 1843 a view at variance with Miller's appeared in the Midnight Cry (5:52, 53, Oct. 4, 1843). This view, which was disclaimed in an editor's note, identified the "daily" as the "continual mediation of Jesus Christ" taken away by the papal little horn, which “cast down the place of his gospel sanctuary” when it “cast down the sacraments and gospel truth” and “the true doctrine of the cross of Christ.”

Yet in spite of differences of opinion on Miller’s detailed interpretation, the Millerites stood united against the opponents who contended for the literal rather than the symbolic interpretation. Time and again Millerite writers insisted that the word “sacrifice” was not in the original Hebrew but was supplied by the translators, that therefore the “daily” did not mean the literal Jewish sacrifices taken away by Antiochus, and that the 2300 days were not literal days but years, to be dated from 457 B.C. Not until the period of confusion and division following the 1844 disappointment did a group arise (the “Age to Come” party) supporting the old literalist view, looking to literal sacrifices in the future at Jerusalem; and this view was repudiated by the majority of those who remained with Miller and Himes, and also by the small group that became the Seventh-day Adventists.

6. Forerunner of Seventh-day Adventist Views. When the Sabbatarian Adventists moved on, after 1844, to develop their new doctrine of the heavenly sanctuary, they left behind William Miller’s identification of the sanctuary of Dan. 8:14, of the two beasts of Rev. 13, and of the number 666 as pertaining to the “daily,” but they retained Miller’s idea that the “daily” and the “transgression of desolation” were two successive phases of the Roman power, pagan and papal.

However, in the very beginning a suggestion was made in a new direction, when O.R.L. Crosier, after joint study with Hiram Edson and F. B. Hahn, wrote out the first exposition of the sanctuary doctrine. The first article appeared in the Day-Dawn in 1845. His article in the Day-Star Extra, Feb. 7, 1846, expressly stated that Daniel’s various references to the sanctuary as being cast down (Dan. 8:11), polluted (Dan. 11:31), trodden underfoot (Dan. 8:13), and cleansed (v. 14) applied to the heavenly sanctuary of the new covenant. This, he said, can be trodden underfoot figuratively in the same way as the Son of God has been.

“This ‘politico-religious’ beast polluted the Sanctuary (Rev. 13:6), and cast it down from its place in heaven, (Ps. 102:19; Jer. 17:12; Heb. 8:1, 2) when they called Rome the holy city (Rev. 21:2) and installed the Pope there with the titles ‘Lord God the Pope,’ ‘Holy Father,’ ‘Head of the Church,’ &c., and there, in the counterfeit ‘temple of God’ he professes to do what Jesus actually does in his Sanctuary; 2 Thess. 2:1—8. The Sanctuary has been trodden underfoot (Dan. 8:13), the same as the Son of God has; Heb. 10:29” (Day-Star Extra, Feb. 7, 1846, p. 38).

This was a definite step away from Miller’s two sanctuaries, that of Dan. 11:31 as a pagan sanctuary belonging to the daily, and that of Dan. 8:13, 14 as the temple of God. He does not define Daniel’s “daily.” He does say, “The daily service described was a sort of continual intercession” (ibid., p. 39, col. 3), but the context of this statement shows that he is clearly speaking of the Levitical sacrifices performed daily throughout the year in contrast with the special yearly service of the Day of Atonement. Crosier describes these services as a type of the heavenly priesthood of Christ, lasting from His ascension to the end of the 2300 years; not as Daniel’s “daily,” taken away when the Papacy was set up.

But by 1847 Crosier had clearly rejected Miller’s “daily equals paganism” equation for a new definition. He read in Dan. 8:11 (taking the margin): “from him [Christ] the daily” was taken away. He defined the “daily” as the doctrine “that Christ ‘WAS CRUCIFIED FOR US” (cf. “true doctrine of the cross” in col. 1, sec. 5), replaced by the Papacy, “with its human merit, intercessions and institutions in place of Christ's" (Day-Dawn 2:2, Mar. 19, 1847). This was almost the later SDA "new view."

7. Development of Seventh-day Adventist "Old" View. Crosier had identified the sanctuary in Dan. 8:11, 13, 14 and 11:31 as the heavenly sanctuary. Adventist writers thereafter agreed that the sanctuary described in Dan. 8:14, the one to be cleansed after 2300 days, meant the heavenly sanctuary. In the other three passages, Adventist writers in general followed Crosier also (perhaps with the single exception of David Arnold) in applying the sanctuary described in Dan. 8:13, the one that was trodden underfoot, to the heavenly sanctuary, even though they continued to hold, with Miller, that the "daily" was paganism and that the sanctuary referred to in Dan. 8:11 and 11:31 (cast down, and polluted) belonged to the "daily," and represented a pagan sanctuary. Joseph Bates identified the "daily" as paganism in 1846 (The Opening Heavens, p. 31), so did J. N. Andrews in 1853 (Review and Herald 3:145, Feb. 3, 1853; cf. p. 129, Jan. 6, 1853), and later Uriah Smith (ibid. 24:180, Nov. 1, 1864) and James White ("The Time," in his Sermons on the Coming and Kingdom of... Christ [1870 ed.], pp. 116, 117; cf. pp. 108, 118, 122—125). In an early article (Review and Herald 1:28, 29, January 1851) White had followed Crosier in arguing at length that the sanctuary trodden down was the one in heaven, but he did not define the "daily" in this article. When he later did define it, he emphatically described "the daily, and the transgression of desolation" as "two desolating powers; the first paganism, then, Papacy" (Sermons, p. 116).

Other Adventist writers subsequently followed this interpretation, and Smith gave a more detailed exposition in Thoughts on Daniel and the Revelation.

8. A Variant View and Its Results. Oddly enough, however, an isolated and atypical interpretation had appeared in March 1850, in the earliest article on Dan. 8 in any Adventist periodical—an article by David Arnold (Present Truth 1:60). It was significant in relation to one of several attempts among the larger group of non-Sabbatarian Adventists—those who had abandoned the 1844 date—to find a new and later time reckoning for the 2300 years. A few of them, expecting the end of the period in 1850, were advocating that believers go to Jerusalem (among those who went was Mrs. Clorinda S. Minor).

Arnold opposed the 1850 expectation but appeared to echo some of the current Holy Land enthusiasm. Explaining the "daily" as meaning the literal Jewish sacrifices at Jerusalem that were taken away in A.D. 70, he equated the treading down of the host with the oppression of the Jews through the centuries, and saw the cleansing of the sanctuary as involving their deliverance.

It was the 1850 expectation, and its effect on a few Sabbatarian Adventists, that occasioned a statement by Ellen White in that year mentioning the "daily." She said that the word "sacrifice" is not in the original text and that the Millerites had held "the correct view" of it. (The Millerites, as already noted, had repeatedly emphasized this view of the word "sacrifice," namely, that the word had been added; they had insisted that the "daily," or continual, did not mean any actual Jewish sacrifices.) Mrs. White also warned against the setting of any new dates after 1844 and against looking for a gathering of the saints to old Jerusalem before the Second Advent (Present Truth 1:87, November 1850, reprinted in EW 74, 75).

9. Ellen G. White on the "Daily." Many years later Mrs. White's 1850 statement—after its setting, and the specific errors at which it was aimed, were forgotten—was cited (from EW 74, 75) in controversy as an endorsement of the prevalent Millerite identification of the “daily,” namely, as paganism. When questioned, however, on the meaning of the “daily,” Mrs. White “usually said that she has no clear light on the subject, and that our brethren would have to study the matter for themselves” (W. C. White letter to J. E. White, June 1, 1910, in White Archives, Ellen G. White Estate, Inc.). According to A. G. Daniells’ report of an interview with her concerning the “daily,” she made it clear that her 1850 statement was not intended to settle the identity of the “daily,” which she did not profess to know, but to state that the Millerites had the right view of the “daily” as to that period of time (the 2300 days); that she had written with reference to the errors current at that time, especially the attempts to revise the dating of the 2300 days (statement of A. G. Daniells, Sept. 25, 1931, in White Archives). Time was the point at issue—as it had been between the Millerites and their opposers who made the “daily” the literal Jewish sacrifices—not the identity of the “daily.”

In 1910 Mrs. White rebuked those who differed over “the true meaning of ‘the daily,’” saying that it was “a subject of minor importance,” and that she “had no instruction on the point under discussion.” Her advice was: “While the present condition of difference of opinion regarding this subject exists let it not be made prominent” (SM 164—168).

10. The “New” View. Feeling the need of a more accurate linguistic and historical basis for interpreting the “daily,” a growing number of SDA leaders set forth what came to be called—somewhat inaccurately—the “new view.” Two flaws in the argument for paganism as “the daily” were pointed out (see for example, W. W. Prescott, “The Daily,” pp. 9—11): first that the historical events cited for the taking away of the “daily”—the victory of Clovis, Catholic king of the Franks, over the Arian Visigoths—actually constituted a victory over Arianism, not paganism; and second, that Clovis’ success did not occur in 508.

About 1900 L. R. Conradi, who soon thereafter became head of SDA work in Europe, wrote to Mrs. White in Australia, asking her to give him any light she might have on the subject, and if not he would proceed to publish what he and his associates had arrived at. Since she had none, he issued his work on the book of Daniel in German (see W. C. White letter to J. E. White, June 1, 1910, in White Archives). Conradi’s work, the first SDA book to offer a substitute for the “daily = paganism” interpretation, was Die Weissagung Daniels, which was later translated into several European languages and was recommended in 1905 for circulation in America among foreign-speaking readers.

In a letter to Mrs. White, Apr. 17, 1906 (in White Archives), Conradi recalled how he came to his conclusions that: (1) the word “sanctuary” meant “the sanctuary of God as it was in type on earth and as it is in antitype now in heaven”; (2) the “daily,” or continual, was the true sanctuary service; (3) the taking away of the “daily” was the papal church’s displacement of “the true sanctuary service by its own human service,” the Mass, setting “aside the true High Priest by placing the pope in His stead”; (4) the prophecy of the cleansing of the sanctuary assured Daniel, at a time when the Jerusalem Temple lay in ruins, “that not only would the typical service in the earthly sanctuary be restored, but that there would be a true service in heaven which should be carried on unto the end.” He stated further that he was surprised to find that some of the Reformation writers thought “the idolatrous mass” “to be the abomination predicted in Daniel 8”; and thus he linked his “new” view with an interpretation much older than Miller’s “old” view.

Conradi discussed his interpretation with A. G. Daniells (who in 1900 was passing through Europe en route to the 1901 General Conference session), H. P. Holser, W. W. Prescott, and W. A. Spicer. Daniells later reported hearing of it then from Conradi and further from Prescott. In America thereafter Prescott, and Daniells especially, and others advocated this interpretation.

Although for a time there was considerable controversy in ministerial circles, Mrs. White's counsel-to avoid divisive argument on a minor point-eventually prevailed. Debate on the subject has long since ceased.

Dakota Adventist Academy (DAA)

DAKOTA ADVENTIST ACADEMY (DAA). A coeducational boarding school on the senior high school level situated northwest of Bismarck, North Dakota, overlooking the Missouri River. The school is owned and operated by the Dakota Conference, under the jurisdiction of the Mid-America Union.

Jeannette Johnson received an academy scholarship for coming up with the name for the new academy-Dakota Adventist Academy. Dakota Adventist Academy opened its doors for the first school year September 1977 with a very incomplete building. The academy building houses classrooms, dorm rooms, chapels, gymnasium, and cafeteria all under one roof. The boys' and girls' dorms consist of three wings each on alternate sides of the building, with a total of 96 student rooms plus guest rooms. Each two-room unit is connected by an adjoining bathroom. Only two of the nine classrooms were finished, forcing teachers to meet with their classes in partially finished dormitory chapels, recreation rooms, and the dining room. Completion of the building went forward at an irregular pace until 1993, when it was mostly finished. During the summer of 1992, volunteers donated time and money to finish the library area in the basement of the atrium.

The school board and staff of the school made a concerted effort to meet the needs of both the college-bound and the non-college-bound students, but even with 180 students the first year, it was apparent that high school-age students were not often ready to make the choice of which track to emphasize. The four industries that were meant to provide work-study programs for the students all failed and left the decreasing enrollment with standard shop classes including some emphasis on auto mechanics and auto body.

One week before school was to start in 1987, the constituency voted to close the school until the accumulated bills and building costs could be paid. The students were encouraged to attend schools in surrounding states. The church members throughout the Dakota Conference and friends from all over the world helped raise the money to pay bills to the vendors and the nearly $1 million that was still owed on construction costs. The $100,000-plus that was owed to vendors was paid by January of 1988, and in April the constituents voted to reopen for the next school year if the $300,000 subsidy, needed to operate in the black, could be raised before June 30. With the help of the alumni associations of Sheyenne River Academy and Plainview Academy, the money was raised and school reopened in August of 1988.

The school continues to operate a strong academic program, and its graduates find they can compete on an equal basis with other students in the advanced schools of their choice. Starting in 1992—1993, the students were able to work as literature evangelists for their work-study program. Also, during that year students entered the Vocational Industrial Clubs of America Skills Olympics for the first time. Out of approximately 1,000 students from schools all over North Dakota that competed in auto body skills events, DAA students took second, third, and fourth place. A leadership skills contest also showed that DAA has quality education and students. DAA students received first place in the auto body written test and second place in extemporaneous speaking. The academy development program continues with the goal of raising approximately $300,000 in advance of each fiscal year. In 1993, 83 students registered at DAA, including three students from Japan, two from Australia, and other students from states as distant as Alaska and Oregon. From 1978 through 1993, 321 students received diplomas from Dakota Adventist Academy. Camp meeting is held annually at the academy along with other conference meetings, alumni gatherings, and training programs. The conference Adventist Book Center is a part of the main academy building. See Sheyenne River Academy for earlier information, as DAA replaced the school at Sheyenne River Academy.

History

History. Beginnings of the Work in the Area. On Oct. 12, 1980, the North Dakota Conference voted to merge with either or all of Minnesota, South Dakota, and/or Wyoming conferences. The South Dakota Conference voted on Apr. 26, 1981, to merge with the North Dakota Conference. A special merger committee consisting of the executive committees from both the North Dakota and the South Dakota conferences met and voted on May 6, 1981, that the merger of the two conferences would take effect on July 1, 1981. It was voted that the Adventist Book Center remain in North Dakota and the conference office would stay in South Dakota. On July 1, 1981, the North Dakota Conference had 45 churches and a membership of 3,316. The South Dakota Conference had 25 churches and a membership of 1,932. The two conferences had already been working together in support of secondary education in the building and funding of Dakota Adventist Academy near Bismarck, North Dakota. Dakota Adventist Academy was opened for the 1976—1977 school term.

The Dakota Conference has two youth campsites. Flag Mountain, near Hill City, South Dakota, and Northern Lights near Bottineau, North Dakota. Camps were operated at both camps during the summer months until 1991, when it was decided to rotate where camp was held each summer. Currently camp is held in South Dakota on odd-numbered years and in North Dakota on even years.

Pine Ridge Mission (South Dakota) has been in operation since 1969 in order to reach out to Native Americans. Up until 1988 the mission supported an elementary school. At that time a study was taken to see how many people who had gone through the school had actually joined or were involved in the Seventh-day Adventist Church. Also, a study was done to determine the best way to reach the Indian people. It was decided to try a pilot program with new methods of outreach. The school was closed at the end of the 1988 school year, and instead emphasis was placed on alcohol support groups, felt needs seminars, Bible studies, self-help classes, worship services, and home visitation. In 1993 the mission was staffed by five individuals, only one of which receives a full salary. Two people are full-time volunteers. The mission has been successful in reaching souls with this new emphasis of outreach. Several improvements to the mission occurred in the past few years, including a new bus barn. In 1993 an additional staff house was built. Each year groups from various academies and colleges bring groups of students to help paint and repair the mission as well as to provide Vacation Bible Schools and other special meetings for the Native Americans. Periodically Native American evangelists are also brought in to hold evangelistic meetings.

The Dakota Conference members have always been strong supporters of Christian education. This became apparent in the late 1980s. In 1987 the conference administrators felt a need to share with the constituents of the conference how deep in debt the conference was, primarily because of expenses incurred for Dakota Adventist Academy. The original cost estimates of DAA were $2.5 to $3 million. The General Conference and Mid-America Union put in $7.5 million toward the academy debt and left the rest to the conference to cover. Adding to the DAA debts was the fact that the conference had experienced a $130,000 loss in tithe for 1986. The conference no longer had the reserves to increase subsidies to the academy and was getting deeper in debt because of the interest. At the 1987 constituency meeting $90,671 was needed to pay off the industrial arts building, the farm owed $200,000 to denominational organizations, $925,000 was owed to the General Conference of Seventh-day Adventists, and bills to Bismarck vendors were also outstanding. The North American Division offered to match $200,000 if the conference could come up with the same amount by the end of 1987. The North American Division also agreed to pay the interest owed, which amounted to between $80,000 to $85,000, and promised to match funds for the next two years to help liquidate debts. Other conferences in the Mid-America Union had already been paying one half of 1 percent of tithe to apply to the debt. It was voted to raise the $200,000 by selling the Jamestown office, three empty parsonages, and Northern Lights Camp. (Enough money was raised without selling the camp. It was later voted to take Northern Lights off the market.) The industrial arts building debt was paid off with the sale of farm equipment and the cattle. After many meetings and much emotion, it was voted to close Dakota Adventist Academy for the 1987—1988 school year. The vote was 189 to 173. By Aug. 16, 1987, $354,439.82 had been raised for debt reduction and $72,228 had been raised for DAA operating, but $92,000 in accounts payable was still owed from the previous school year. At the close of 1987, debt reduction amounted to $706,259. The remaining DAA debt stood at $1,334,314. The Mid-America Union wrote off $105,000 owed them by the Dakota Conference in 1987. On Feb. 28, 1988, the constituency voted to reopen DAA in the fall of 1988 after being closed for one year. A development committee was formed, and $300,000 was raised before the school year began in order to cover the 1988—1989 operating expenses. By March of 1990, $2,828,000 had been paid in interest as well as money for operating expenses because of the strong support of the Dakota people. Each subsequent year through 1991—1992, the academy ended the fiscal year operating in the black.

Two new churches were built by Maranatha Flights International between 1983 and 1986. These churches were in Harvey, North Dakota, and McClusky, North Dakota. In 1986 the Devils Lake church was sold and the church from Langdon, North Dakota, was moved to Devils Lake to replace the previous church. The Ortley, South Dakota, church was organized in 1985. Because of district realignments, several parsonages were bought and sold between 1985 and 1993. Parsonages sold include the ones in Gackle, Beach, Turtle Lake, Beulah, Williston, and Pierre. New parsonages were bought in Wahpeton and Minot and two parsonages were built in Pierre to house conference workers. In 1993 the declining Gackle membership decided to sell their church and rent it instead. A new church was built in Aberdeen with the help of Maranatha in the fall of 1993.

Membership in the Dakotas has been declining since 1985, when the membership total was at 5,323, until in 1993 the membership stood at 4,402. Because younger members were leaving home in search of employment, smaller churches had to close their doors—including Killdeer, North Dakota, in 1986, Belle Fourche, South Dakota, in 1989, Max, North Dakota, in 1991, and Kenmare, North Dakota, in 1993. White River, South Dakota, was disbanded in 1990, although it had not been active for several years. Hoping to turn this trend around, several new outreach ministries were implemented in the nineties. The conference subsidized the Ken Cox videos to any members in the conference who were willing to use them. Several people have been won because of these videos. A Family Life Department and a Women's Ministries Department was formed to strengthen the homes of members and their friends. Special retreats for women have been held each fall since 1989. During the 1992—1993 school year student literature evangelists started canvassing near Bismarck, North Dakota, and toured several towns during the summer. The group had exceptional book sales and left a free Desire of Ages or Great Controversy in every home that bought any book. Also in 1993 student youth worked in the Pierre area doing community service projects. After several years of only part time staffing in the trust department, a full-time trust director was hired for the conference in 1990. Since that time the Trust Department has been updating all of the conference trusts.

Besides reaching out to the Dakota people, constituents felt a burden to help when doors opened to receive the gospel in the Ukraine. During the summer of 1992, an evangelistic team went to the Ukraine totally supported by gifts from Dakota members. In 1993 another group went to the Ukraine to train sister churches how to conduct Sabbath school classes. See also North Dakota Conference and South Dakota Conference for historical information.

Daniel, Interpretation of

DANIEL, INTERPRETATION OF. The various interpreters of the prophecies of Daniel may be divided into three basic schools, according to their views of the events referred to in the book.

1. Events in Ancient History. Expositors of one school assign Daniel's depiction of great tribulation and deliverance mostly to an episode of Jewish history 2,000 years or more ago, under Antiochus Epiphanes, a tyrant who sought to abolish the Jewish religion in 168 B.C. Those who hold this view see Antiochus as the "little horn" of Dan. 7 and 8, and interpret the four kingdoms of Dan. 2 and 7 as culminating with the Greco-Macedonian Empire, which is considered to be the fourth.

Many of this group of expositors reject the validity of the predictive element in prophetic literature, and attribute the book of Daniel to an unknown writer who is supposed to have lived about 165 B.C., and who presumably employed the device of representing himself as Daniel, the prophet, to spur his fellow Jews in their revolt against Antiochus Epiphanes. They consider Daniel's predictions to be vaticinium post eventum, "predictions" actually made after the events "foretold" took place. The noteworthy resemblance between certain details of Daniel's prophecy and incidents during this critical episode in Jewish history, or later during the wars with Rome, gives this interpretation an appearance of plausibility. Some who accept the book of Daniel as authentic predictive prophecy likewise assign its climax to the time of Antiochus or to the Roman Empire of the first century of the Christian Era.

As for the Antiochus theory, despite certain similarities between some of the aspects of Daniel's predictions and the events connected with the Antiochus Epiphanes episode, Seventh-day Adventists find compelling reasons for rejecting this interpretation. For one thing, Antiochus reigned about midpoint of the Hellenistic kingdoms that followed Alexander the Great, not "at the latter end of their rule," as Daniel specifies (Dan. 8:23, RSV). His oppression of the Jews was a temporary affair, and by no stretch of the imagination can it be said that he "prevailed over them, until the Ancient of Days came, and judgment was given for the saints of the Most High, and the time came when the saints received the kingdom," as Daniel explicitly declared the future tyrant would do (Dan. 7:21, 22, RSV). It is a simple historical fact that God did not establish His eternal, righteous reign on earth in the long ago when the Jews were still His chosen people. Antiochus did not prove to be the imposing personage required by the prophecies of Daniel, nor was his reign in any sense a prelude to the Messianic Age. Furthermore, the resurrection of Dan. 12:2, which was to take place immediately upon the downfall of the tyrant king, did not follow Antiochus' expulsion from Judea. No events connected with his oppression of the Jews correspond to the time periods of Daniel. In fact, the attempt to identify Antiochus Epiphanes as the tyrant prince of Daniel breaks down at every major point. As if to clinch the matter, two centuries after Antiochus, Christ categorically declared that the tyrant prince and the great tribulation of Daniel's prophecies were still in the future (Matt. 24:15—20). Thus, to apply Daniel's prophecy to Antiochus is to reject Christ's own interpretation.

2. Gap Theory (Events in Ancient Times and at the End). Another school of expositors splits the book of Daniel between ancient history and the future, finding Antiochus in the little horn of Dan. 8 but applying the little horn of Dan. 7 to a last-day antichrist (connected somehow with a Roman fourth kingdom). Most of these expositors are premillennialists of the variety known as dispensationalists (see Premillennialism), who hold that prophecy "is concerned only with history as it affects Israel and the Holy Land" (Scofield Reference Bible, note on Dan. 11:35), past and future. Holding that God's rejection of the Jewish nation at the cross was only temporary, they believe that Daniel's predictions were fulfilled in order up to the time of Christ, at the end of the sixty-ninth "week" of Dan. 9:27, at which time, according to their understanding, the clock of prophecy stopped, to resume only at or immediately preceding Christ's return. According to this theory, "the entire church age" intervenes "between the sixty-ninth week, after which Messiah was cut off, and the seventieth week, within which the 'little horn' of Dan. 7, will run his awful course," and in the midst of that future "seventieth week" the Jews, restored as a nation to their role as a chosen people, will undergo a three-and-one-half-year tribulation, during which their renewed Temple sacrifices will be taken away (ibid., note on Dan. 9:24). Advocates of this theory point to the new state of Israel and to the return of some 2 million Jews to Palestine as the first steps toward the fulfillment of these prophecies and toward the bestowal of world dominion on the Jews in a 1,000-year Messianic world rule.

As for the gap theory, Seventh-day Adventists consider that only by removing the OT kingdom promises completely from their literary, historical, and covenant context can they be made to apply to literal Israel in the present or future. Taken at face value, the statements of the inspired writers themselves clearly preclude such an application. (See SDACom 4: 25—38.) Adventists see the OT promises of restoration to covenant status, and of universal dominion, as strictly conditional (see Jer. 18:6—10). When the Jews rejected their Messiah, our Lord specifically rejected them as the chosen people (see Matt. 21:43; 23:38), but as individuals the Jews continued to be recipients of grace and could be saved by accepting Christ. Furthermore, the Scriptures nowhere support or provide for a gap of some 2,000 years postulated by this theory, between the sixty-ninth and seventieth "weeks" of Dan. 9:27.

3. A Third View-Continuous Fulfillment. A third school of expositors is that represented by the early church interpreters and those of the Protestant Reformation. They saw prophecy as fulfilling continuously in history. They identified the four empires of Dan. 2 and 7 as Babylon, Persia, Greece, and Rome; the 10 horns of Dan. 7 as the tenfold partition of the Roman Empire followed by antichrist. The early Christians expected the antichrist in the future. They did not believe in a "gap" that makes prophecy skip over the period of the church, but in continuous fulfillment, operating even in their day.

Jerome (c. A.D. 400), whose interpretation of Daniel was accepted as standard during the Middle Ages, believed the partitioning of the Roman Empire, then in progress, to be the fulfillment of the tenfold division of the fourth empire of prophecy. He listed several of the divisions by name. He expected the imminent overthrow of Rome to make way for the little horn, the antichrist who would reign in the church, oppressing the saints for three and one-half literal years, after which would come the judgment and the Second Advent.

Augustine, however, a few years later, interpreted the stone kingdom-the kingdom of God-as the church in the present age.

The late Middle Ages saw a revival of interest in the historical fulfillment of the prophecies, with the addition of two new features-identification of the little horn of Dan. 7 with the Papacy (apparently introduced by Archbishop Eberhard II of Salzburg, Austria, in 1240), and the application of the year-day principle to the prophetic time periods.

Thus developed the idea of the little horn-identified with the NT antichrist and the “man of sin” connected with a great apostasy-as a religiopolitical power, successor to the Roman Empire, enforcing its authority on the people of God and continuing down to the last days. The three and one-half times of this horn were computed as 1260 years (see Year-Day Principle). There were various datings assigned to this period, but the capture and banishment of Pope Pius VI by the French in 1798 and his death without an immediate successor led a number of expositors to mark this as the ending of the 1260 year-days.

4. The 2300 Days and the 70 Weeks. During the decades following 1798, there was an increased interest in ascertaining the time when the 2300-day period of Dan. 8:14, counted as years, would end, and in discovering the relation of the 70 weeks of Dan. 9 to the 2300 days (see Twenty-three Hundred Days).

There had long been universal acceptance of the 70 weeks as “weeks of years,” with Christ’s death generally placed in the seventieth week. A large number of expositors who took part in the Old World Advent Awakening of the early decades of the nineteenth century followed Johann P. Petri (d. 1792) in using the 70 weeks of Dan. 9 as the key with which to unlock the 2300 “days” of Dan. 8:14, by beginning both synchronously. Many of them fixed upon 457 B.C. or thereabouts as the beginning, and A.D. 33 to 34 as the end of the 70 weeks with the cross either in the midst or at the end of the seventieth week. These looked for the end of the 2300 years in 1843, 1844, or 1847. Identifying the little horn of Dan. 8 as the Papacy or as Islam, they differed on the nature of the events to mark the close of the 2300 years, interpreting the cleansing of the sanctuary of Dan. 8:14 variously as the rescue of Palestine from the Muslims, the fall of the Papacy, the purification of the church, the restoration of the Jews, the beginning of a millennial kingdom, or the Second Advent.

The distinctive features of William Miller’s message were his identification of this event as the cleansing of the earth by fire at the second coming of Christ, which he anticipated “about the year 1843”; and his rejection of the two popular interpretations of the kingdom of God on earth-(1) as a golden age preceding Christ’s coming, and (2) as a kingdom set up after the Second Advent, with the restored Jews in a position of leadership. Instead, he saw the Second Advent as ending human probation and introducing the eternal kingdom of the glorified saints on a re-created earth. For the Millerite views see Millerite Movement.

The link between the Millerite and the Seventh-day Adventist interpretation of the cleansing of the sanctuary was furnished by Hiram Edson’s explanation, following the 1844 Millerite disappointment (written out by O.R.L. Crosier after joint study with Hiram Edson and Dr. F. B. Hahn), that the heavenly sanctuary of the book of Hebrews is the one referred to in Dan. 8:14 (Day-Star Extra, Feb. 7, 1846).

5. Daniel 11. By the time of William Miller, expositors were largely agreed on the application of the earlier part of Dan. 11 to Ptolemies and Seleucids, but they differed on where to introduce Rome. Miller explained the willful king of Dan. 11:36 as the Papacy, but took the king of the north in v. 40 to represent England, and in vs. 40—45, Napoleon. There was division of opinion between recognizing the Papacy or the Turk in the interpretation of the latter part of Dan. 11 among SDAs for nearly a century. Some, such as James White, found the Papacy represented, while Uriah Smith identified Turkey as the power. His classic exposition, Thoughts on Daniel, which was printed in the Review and Herald from January 1869 to July 1871, perpetuated his view for three quarters of a century. Many SDAs today follow the position taken by White.

6. Seventh-day Adventist Interpretation. SDAs follow a continuous historical interpretation. (For the classical exposition of Daniel, see Uriah Smith, Thoughts on Daniel and the Revelation; for a contemporary exposition, see SDA Bible Commentary on Daniel.) Adventists identify the nations of the metallic image of Dan. 2 as the Babylonian, Medo-Persian, Greco-Macedonian, and Roman empires, and the 10 toes as the barbaric kingdoms that succeeded Rome and grew into the nations of modern Europe. The “stone” that demolishes the image is Christ’s eternal kingdom, the “great mountain” that fills the earth. This same succession of political powers is represented by the four beasts of Dan. 7, with the 10 horns as the kingdoms in the area of the old Roman Empire and the little horn of Dan. 7 as the Papacy. Adventists understand the great horn of the Grecian goat in Dan. 8 to represent Alexander the Great (the book itself explains the symbolic ram and he-goat of Dan. 8 as the Persian and Grecian kingdoms); and the four horns the Hellenistic kingdoms into which his empire was divided, with the little horn of Dan. 8, which grows exceeding great, as representing Rome in both imperial and papal phases, with emphasis on the latter. The cleansing of the sanctuary in v. 14 is understood to refer to the blotting out of confessed and forgiven sins from the books of record in the heavenly sanctuary, beginning at the close of the 2300 “evening and mornings” in A.D. 1844 (figured on the day-for-a-year principle of prophecy from 457 B.C.). See Investigative Judgment.

Seventh-day Adventists understand the angel’s explanation of Dan. 9:24—27 to be the second installment of the explanation of the vision begun in Dan. 8, with emphasis on the “70 weeks,” or 490 years, that were to be “cut off” as the first portion of the 2300 years of Dan. 8:14 and assigned to the Jewish nation. They consider that the carrying out, in 457 B.C., of Artaxerxes’ decree authorizing the complete restoration of the Jewish law and administration in Jerusalem marks the beginning of the “70 weeks,” or 490 years, and that this prophetic period terminated in A.D. 34, with Christ’s crucifixion in A.D. 31 in the midst of the seventieth week of the prophecy (v. 27).

Adventists understand Dan. 11 to be a continuous delineation of history beginning with Daniel’s time, with the kings of the “north” and “south” as the Seleucid and Ptolemaic dynasties of Syria and Egypt. Rome is usually understood to come into the picture from v. 14 onward, and vs. 36—39 are applied by some to the Papacy and to its persecution of God’s people, by others to France during the Revolution. The closing verses are applied by some to the Papacy and to its persecution of God’s people, by others to France during the Revolution. The closing verses are applied by many to the Papacy during the “time of the end,” beginning in 1798, at the close of the three and one-half “times,” or 1260 days, or years, of Daniel’s prophecy, although others hold the view that these verses are still unfulfilled prophecy. Christ’s standing up in Dan. 12:1 is understood to mark the termination of His ministry in the heavenly sanctuary at the close of probationary time. Christ’s deliverance of His people foretold in Dan. 12:1 is correlated with the prophecies of Revelation.

Daniel was instructed to “shut up the words, and seal the book, until the time of the end” (Dan. 12:4), implying that it could not be understood until that time, but would be then, in terms of its actual fulfillment in history. Evidently not all was sealed, for the angel’s explanation applied certain symbols to specific nations and persons (Dan. 8:20—22; 11:2). SDAs believe that the things revealed to Daniel were afterward complemented in the revelation made to John and recorded in the book of Revelation.

Daniells, Arthur Grosvenor

DANIELLS, ARTHUR GROSVENOR (1858—1935). Minister and administrator. He was born in Iowa, the son of a Union Army physician and surgeon, who died in the Civil War. At the age of 10 he was converted to the Seventh-day Adventist faith, and in 1875 entered Battle Creek College, remaining only one year because of ill health. After he and his wife taught in public schools for one year, he received a call to the ministry. Feeling timid and unprepared, he hesitated, but after praying earnestly, he came under conviction. He began his ministry in 1878 with Robert M. Kilgore in Texas. He was then secretary to James and Ellen White for one year, and later an evangelist in Iowa.

In 1886 he was called as pioneer SDA missionary to New Zealand, and remained in the antipodes for 14 years. From 1889 to 1891 he was president of the New Zealand Conference and from 1892 to 1895 of the Australian Conference. When Ellen White went to Australia in 1891, he became closely associated with her. On the formation of the Central Australian Conference in 1895, he became its first president. Later he was president of the Australasian Union Conference.

He assumed the presidency of the General Conference in 1901 at a difficult period in the history of the church, but he met with ability financial and organizational problems and the task of moving the headquarters of the denomination to Washington, D.C. He traveled extensively on all continents, convinced of the necessity of getting his information firsthand. The reforms and reorganization that took place during his period of office led to great expansion of the church throughout the world. In 1922 he relinquished the presidency of the General Conference and held the post of secretary for four years. During that time he visited Australia and New Zealand, lands to which he was warmly attached, and made the last of his many journeys to South America.

Daniells was concerned with the development of a spiritual ministry, and led in the formation of the Ministerial Association and Ministry magazine. He was one of the denomination's most dynamic leaders. He authored The World War, A World in Perplexity, Christ Our Righteousness, and The Abiding Gift of Prophecy.

Danish Junior College

DANISH JUNIOR COLLEGE (Vejlefjordskolen). A coeducational boarding school on the junior college level, operated by the Danish Union of Churches located about six miles (10 kilometers) from Vejle, a town on the Danish mainland overlooking Vejle Fjord. Campus and orchard make up a 100-acre (40-hectare) estate. Besides the main building, which accommodates an assembly hall, dining room, kitchen, administrative offices, theological library, and student housing, there are dormitories for men and women, and a school building with offices, ordinary classrooms, facilities for the teaching of sciences, music, and modern languages, general library, and a swimming pool. In addition to these, there are buildings for faculty housing and the elementary school.

Enrollment in 1993 numbered approximately 300, including the 105 pupils of the elementary school. The faculty numbered 27 teachers including 10 part-time instructors.

After a seven-year elementary school course, there is a three-year course in secondary work (realskole), at the end of which students sit for government examinations. In 1972 another three-year course (gymnasium) was added, this leading up to university entrance requirements (studentereksamen). The language of instruction is Danish.

A mission and colporteur school was established by M. M. Olsen in Copenhagen in 1890. The student body consisted of 12 young men and women from Norway and Denmark and 10 Scandinavians from the United States. After four years 16 students had finished the twelfth grade and three took their student examination from the University of Copenhagen.

On Aug. 31, 1894, Olsen moved the school to a newly erected building in Frederikshavn, where it opened with an enrollment of 36. This school is listed in the General Conference Bulletin as Frederikshavn High School, but there have been references to it under the name of Frydenstrands School. In 1898 the school was discontinued. L. H. Christian and L. Muderspach reopened it in 1903 in Copenhagen, with 24 students, but later moved it to a large manor house, Høgholt, in north Jutland. After one year it was brought back to its previous site in Frederikshavn. On Sept. 13, 1908, Erik Arnesen opened the school in a large villa in Skodsborg, 10 miles (16 kilometers) north of Copenhagen. The following year it was moved into new quarters on the sanitarium grounds, where it remained for nine years. Then it was moved to Naerum, a site two miles (three kilometers) from the coast, where it made steady growth for 12 years. Until 1921 Denmark's schools served the Norwegian constituency also.

In October 1930 the school was transferred to its present site near Vejle Fjord. H. M. Johnson, who had come from La Sierra College in California, served as principal for eight years, building up the school and developing farm and garden work and a state-recognized scholastic program. In 1957 the school became a junior college. From 1952 to 1958, while there was no denominational school in Norway, the Vejlefjord School served as training school for Norwegian young people as well.

Danish Publishing House

DANISH PUBLISHING HOUSE (Dansk Bogforlag). A denominationally owned and operated publishing house, situated in Naerum, Denmark. It has five employees in editorial-production and distribution.

In the early years Seventh-day Adventist publications in Denmark were imported, first from the United States, later from Norway. When Tidernes Tegn (“Signs of the Times”) began to be printed in Kristiania (Oslo), Norway, in 1879 a number of copies went to Denmark, and in July 1881 Sundhedsbladet (health journal) was issued also for both countries.

In harmony with a vote taken at the second annual meeting of the Danish Conference (at Helligum, 1882), a depot for publications was opened at C. C. Hansen’s home in Asaa, and in May 1886 a depot was opened in Copenhagen. In 1889 Denmark had four colporteurs, who met with strong opposition. A colporteur institute was held in 1892 under the leadership of H. L. Henriksen, and the work began to develop.

In 1893 C. C. Hansen and H. L. Henriksen organized a private firm, registered under the name C. C. Hansen and Company, which made a contract with the Norwegian Publishing House, Kristiania, to distribute its literature in Denmark. This firm, operated in Copenhagen, in the Ebenezer church building, continued until 1905, when the Danish Conference voted to establish a publishing house in Copenhagen, which they registered in the chamber of commerce under the name Dansk Bogforlag, København (Copenhagen Publishing House, also listed in the Yearbook as Denmark Publishing House). The first publishing committee was composed of the following: P. A. Hansen, chair; J. C. Raft; Jens Olsen, manager; L. Muderspach; H. L. Henriksen; N. P. Nelson; and P. Hansen, publishing secretary. In 1906 arrangements were made with the firm of C. C. Hansen and Company to transfer all assets to the Copenhagen Publishing House. In 1966 the publishing house was moved to Odense, where it is located in a new building. In 1993 it moved to Naerum, where accommodations already existed.

Periodicals: The house publishes Tidernes Tegn (“Signs of the Times”), Sundhedsbladet (health journal), Adventnyt (a church paper), Sabbath school lesson quarterlies for adults and children, missions quarterly, and an annual Ingathering paper.

Managers: J. G. Matteson, 1877—1881; C. C. Hansen, 1881—1893; C. C. Hansen and H. L. Henriksen, 1893—1905; Jens Olsen, 1905—1910; Chr. Hedebaek, 1910—1927; Johan Nielsen, 1927—1935; R. F. Dar Es-Salaam Hospital DAR ES-SALAAM HOSPITAL (“The House of Peace” Hospital). A general hospital formerly owned and operated by the Middle East Division of the General Conference (from 1946 to 1959) at Baghdad, Iraq.

Seventh-day Adventist medical work began in Baghdad in the early 1930s when Marie Huehner, of Germany, opened a maternity home. Dr. E. G. Essery and Stanley Johnson began remodeling the premises of what had been one of Baghdad’s busiest hotels into a temporary 25-bed hospital. Called to other work, these two were succeeded by Drs. Joseph Saaty and S. D. Karmy. Joined by two nurses, Joyce and Lucille Henderson, and Melville Seitz, they opened Dar es-Salaam (also transliterated Dar El Salaam) Hospital and received the first patients in November 1946. A School of Nursing was founded in October 1948, with the first students coming from various countries in the Middle East. That same year the hospital registered 7,685 patient visits and admitted 347 persons.

In June 1951 the General Conference signed a 90-year lease with the Iraq government on 5.7 acres (23,000 square meters) of land in an exclusive section of Baghdad for the purpose of erecting a modern hospital building. On June 8, 1952, the minister of health of Iraq laid the cornerstone. The new Dar es-Salaam Hospital was dedicated Nov. 27, 1954.

Financial support for the hospital stemmed mainly from the church organization and its members, notably the brothers Bashir and Nasif Hasso, members of the Baghdad church.

Dar es-Salaam Hospital was reputed to be the finest medical facility in Iraq. Village clinics conducted by the staff extended the services of the hospital. More than 1,000 patients were hospitalized in 1955, the first full year of operation in the new 46-bed unit. The total was 1,269 in 1956, 1,589 in 1957, and 1,761 in 1958. From the School of Nursing, recognized by the Iraq Ministry of Health in 1958, the total number of graduates reached 24. By the end of that year the hospital staff included 90 national employees and 12 foreign workers.

The revolution in Iraq, beginning July 14, 1958, brought a trend toward nationalization of medical services, which became readily apparent by early 1959. In May the Iraq government announced its intention to nationalize the Dar es-Salaam Hospital. It was closed in early June; late the following month, it was reopened as a government-managed hospital staffed by medical personnel from Eastern Europe. Several members of the former staff were transferred to the Benghazi Hospital in Libya.

Negotiations with the revolutionary government concluded with an agreement that provided for the recovery of a sizable percentage of the church’s net capital investment.

Medical Directors:—, 1946—1949; Clarence H. Schilt, 1949—1952; K. H. Pihl, 1952—1955; William Wagner, 1955—1959.

Administrators: M. V. Jacobson, 1949—1956; Richard G. Ubbink, 1956—1959.

Directors of the School of Nursing: Mrs. Joseph Saaty, 1948—1949; Evelyn Welch, 1949—1951; Evangeline Voth, 1951—1958; Gladys Hurd, 1958—1959.

Dar-Es-Salaam School

DAR-ES-SALAAM SCHOOL. An educational institution on the secondary level that was located at Karadet Mariam, Baghdad, Iraq. The school was established in 1947. This school was nationalized, along with all other private schools in Iraq, in 1974.

Dark Ages

DARK AGES. A standard historical term used by historians to mean the period of intellectual and cultural stagnation and decline in Europe lasting from the overthrow of the Roman Empire by the barbarians to the revival of learning (the Renaissance). Although some make the term equivalent to the Middle Ages as a whole (the thousand years from 500 to 1500 at the latest), most historians equate it with the early Middle Ages (roughly from the sixth to the eleventh centuries). The “darkness” began to be dispelled first in the Renaissance, and further in the Reformation and the age of exploration. With the sixteenth century we reach the beginnings of modern history. The phrase is sometimes misused in expositions of the historical fulfillment of the time prophecies.

Dark Day

DARK DAY. As defined in Merriam-Webster Third International Dictionary (1950 and earlier editions): “Any day characterized by great darkness, whether due to cloudiness, smoke, volcanic ashes, or the like; esp., May 19, 1780, when an unexplained darkness extended over all New England (possibly due to forest fires).” Because of its preeminence as the most outstanding occurrence of this sort, unequalled in intensity, extent, and duration-as dark as at “candle-lighting” for some hours in a large area of New England, and also because of its timing, the Dark Day of May 19, 1780, was cited by Millerites and by later Adventists as a fulfillment of certain prophecies (Matt. 24:29; Rev. 6:12). For eyewitness accounts describing the meteorological phenomena and the effect of this notable obscuration, see SB 562ff.

Daugherty, Frank J.

DAUGHERTY, FRANK J. (1902—1984). Missionary, educator. He and his wife, Ila, served in Alaska at Shungnak from 1929 to 1934. It was considered one of the most isolated and run-down villages in the Arctic. Frank went as a community worker, but found himself wearing many hats.

From 1934 to 1937 he taught more than 100 children at Point Barrow while working for the United Press. During this period he organized the rescue party searching for Will Rogers and Wiley Post.

He next labored at Gambell, St. Lawrence Island, during the period of 1937—1944. He was both principal and teacher there, and organized the first group of Sabbathkeepers in the Arctic. There is now an organized church in this place.

In 1949 he was asked to reopen the Navajo Mission School at Holbrook, Arizona, where he served as principal, business manager, construction superintendent, teacher, and pastor. After 17 years of this his health began to fail, but he continued to do voluntary work at the mission until he passed away. He gave out more than 3,000 copies of Steps to Christ at tourist centers.

Daugherty was the key person in obtaining both Thunderbird Adventist Academy and Monterey Bay Academy properties from the government for $1 each.

David, Deacon

DAVID, DEACON (1895—1954). Minister, pioneer worker in the Delta area of Burma (Myanmar). He was a son of David Hpo Hla (the first ordained Burmese SDA minister) and began work in the church in 1919 as a teacher at the Meiktila School. Later he was sent to a Seventh-day Adventist theological training school at Lucknow, India, and upon return was sent to open Adventist work in Bumah Chaung in the Delta area of Burma, where he spent many years as pastor-evangelist. A number of his converts there later became evangelists. In 1926 he married Daw Mya May. In 1931 he was ordained to the ministry. In 1941 he was elected as a delegate to the General Conference session, the first Burmese to attend the general council of the church. He spent the war years in Rangoon and afterward served as pastor of the Rangoon church and Bible teacher of Myaungmya Middle School. He retired because of poor health a few years before his death.

Davidian Seventh-day Adventists—Shepherd’s Rod

DAVIDIAN SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTISTS—SHEPHERD’S ROD. An offshoot launched by Victor T. Houteff, a member of a Seventh-day Adventist church in Los Angeles, California, in 1929, popularly called the “Shepherd’s Rod,” after the title of his first publication. His organization took the name of “Davidian Seventh-day Adventists” in 1942. Houteff, who regarded himself as a divinely inspired messenger of God, set forth succinctly the primary subject of his teaching in his first publication as follows: “This publication contains only one main subject with a double lesson; namely, the 144,000 of [Rev. 7:4—9; 14:1] and a call for reformation” (The Shepherd’s Rod, first ed. [1930], vol. 1, p. 11).

In May 1935 Houteff and 11 followers (including children) migrated from California to Waco, Texas, and established a colony on a nearby farm, which they referred to thereafter as Mount Carmel Center. This center was intended to be the temporary headquarters for the assembling of the 144,000 sealed ones, preparatory to their transfer to Palestine as the re-established kingdom of David under a theocratic regime, there to direct the closing work of the gospel on earth prior to the second advent of Christ.

Prior to his death on Feb. 5, 1955, Houteff had appointed his wife to lead his flock until the Lord should choose another prophet to take charge of it. The Waco Tribune-Herald of Feb. 27, 1955, reported shortly after Houteff’s death that at one time there had been as many as 125 persons living at the Mount Carmel Center, including children and some invalids in the rest home.

Immediately after Houteff’s death the Shepherd’s Rod party began to break up into splinter groups. The main body, under Mrs. Houteff’s leadership, announced in print to the public that the prophetic period of 1260 days foretold in Rev. 11 would end on Apr. 22, 1959, and that on that date God would intervene in a remarkable manner in Palestine to clear out both the Jews and the Arabs for the establishment of the Davidic kingdom in that country. Responding to an official call to assemble at their Waco headquarters during Apr. 16—22, 1959, in readiness to move to Palestine as soon as Providence should indicate, several hundred persons gathered at the Mount Carmel Center to await the fulfillment of the prediction. When the date passed uneventfully, most of the people-disappointed, confused, and embarrassed-scattered slowly from Waco to begin life anew elsewhere as best they could. Some returned to the SDA Church, some lost all faith in the Bible and strayed off into the world, and some joined splinter groups, such as “the Branch” (which actually sent a few colonizers to Israel in a mission that has ended in failure). Some stayed with the Waco leaders to face the future.

Mrs. Houteff and her associate leaders frankly and publicly acknowledged in print on Dec. 12, 1961, and Jan. 16, 1962, that the Shepherd’s Rod party and its peculiar teachings were not sound. Finally, on Mar. 11, 1962, they resigned, declared the Davidian Association dissolved, closed their Mount Carmel Center, and put the property up for sale. Having done this, they scattered.

Subsequent to Mrs. Houteff's disbanding of the organization, several groups persisted, each claiming to be the authentic successor to the Shepherd's Rod party. One of these groups, calling themselves Branch Davidian Seventh-day Adventists, established a center, again near Waco, which in 1984 came under the control of Vernon Howell, who in 1981 had been disfellowshipped from the Tyler, Texas, Seventh-day Adventist Church. Late Howell changed his name to David Koresh, a name adopted from the Semitic form of the name of Cyrus, the Persian ruler of the sixth century B.C. In addition to pressing his claim to the prophetic gift, he presented himself as a latter-day fulfillment of the roles of David and Cyrus as deliverers of God's people.

Howell (Koresh) traveled widely, recruiting members for his community, especially in Australia and Great Britain. His special teachings, based on an interpretation of Ezekiel 9 and the seven seals of Revelation, led to a heightened sense of impending attack, for which in preparation a large quantity of firearms was stockpiled in the Davidian headquarters.

On Feb. 28, 1993, the Davidian community was surrounded by law-enforcement authorities, leading to extensive gunfire and the death of several persons, both within the building and of officers outside. A tense state of siege continued, until on Apr. 19, 1993, during an attack by officers, fire broke out in the building, destroying the wooden structure and killing approximately 90 persons inside.

Since destruction of the Branch Davidian community, several other splinter groups remain as remnants of the Shepherd's Rod movement.

Davis, Marian

DAVIS, MARIAN (1847—1904). Secretary to Ellen White. Prior to 1879, when she entered the employ of Ellen White as a literary assistant, she taught a country school for a short time, and worked as a proofreader in the Review and Herald printing office for several years. She accompanied Mrs. White in her travels in America, to Europe in 1885, and to Australia in 1891. She returned with Mrs. White to California in 1900.

Davis Memorial Hospital

DAVIS MEMORIAL HOSPITAL. A 54-bed general acute hospital situated in Georgetown, the capital and chief city of Guyana. It is owned and operated by the Caribbean Union Conference. It was named in memory of O. E. Davis, a pioneer Seventh-day Adventist missionary to the aboriginal Indian people of British Guiana (now Guyana), who died among them in 1911.

The present staff consists of two overseas and one local physicians, one local dental surgeon, two local dentists, 13 graduate national nurses, 18 practical nurses, three nurses' aides, one pharmacist, two X-ray technicians, and four laboratory technicians.

SDA medical work in Guyana dates from 1952, when the mission committee, with R. E. Delafield as chair, took action to build a clinic on the mission's Queenstown property in eastern Georgetown. Materials were secured from the United States air base nearby, and the construction was under the direction of F. Todd, a contractor. The cornerstone was laid on Nov. 9, 1952, by the mayor of Georgetown, R. B. Gajraj.

A physician, E. C. Duerksen, called to head the clinic, arrived on Feb. 24, 1954, and by the end of the year had treated a total of 5,295 persons, about half of them charity patients. At that time the staff totaled nine workers. An open house was held on Oct. 28, 1954, which was attended by the governor and a number of local dignitaries.

When the clinic proved inadequate for the needs of the area, early in 1955 a large house was rented, and on July 21, 1955, after another physician, O. J. Pogue, had joined the staff, a hospital was opened. The first surgery performed at the hospital was a hernia repair on a church member by the name of DeJonge, for which, in the absence of a surgery light, L. A. Kraner, mission president at the time, provided illumination by holding a gooseneck desk lamp. Until an autoclave was installed in 1956, sterilization of supplies was done at a government hospital. When the water supply improved in 1957, it was no longer necessary to pump water by hand. A part of a Thirteenth Sabbath Offering overflow in 1960, together with donations solicited locally and hospital earnings, provided a fund to finance the construction of a 40-bed hospital, which was opened in December 1965. It was not until Apr. 16, 1967, that the hospital was officially opened by the lord mayor, Mrs. Dorothy Bailey, in the presence of a capacity crowd, including the governor-general.

The present building houses a laundry, patient rooms, kitchen, surgery, labor and delivery rooms, laboratory, X-ray, Outpatient Department, and other essential units. It has two private rooms, three semiprivate rooms, four private wards, and four clinic wards.

This building, with ground floor and one story, was a dream of Dr. Oliver J. Pogue, who was instrumental in transforming the dream of a modern Davis Memorial Hospital into a reality.

In 1971 Shirley Field-Ridley, minister of health, opened the dental clinic. The audience included several officials of government and a good cross section of the community.

The institution was operated under a medical director/business manager form of administration until 1966.

Medical Directors/Administrators: E. C. Duerksen, 1954—1957; O. J. Pogue, 1957—1966; H. N. Gates, 1966—1971; R. D. Neufeld, 1971—1976; R. P. Woodruff (acting), 1976—1977; Jess C. Davis, Ovid Elbert DAVIS, OVID ELBERT (1869—1911). Missionary to Guiana. A ministerial graduate from Emmanuel Missionary College, he began his service as a self-supporting missionary in Canada and Alaska. He pioneered the work among the Indians at Port Simpson, British Columbia, near the southern end of the Alaska panhandle, and on Dec. 11, 1903, established there the first Indian church in the province, and possibly in the Pacific Northwest. After working there for three or four years, and for a brief period in Washington and Michigan, he took charge of the Guiana Mission in 1906. He had established three stations among the Indians of the interior when he died of blackwater fever on a missionary trip to Mount Roraima. Because of his work among the Arecuna and Akawaio tribes, these Indians have been called “Davis” Indians by Seventh-day Adventists. One of their chiefs reported that he had had a vision telling him of the second coming of Christ, and promising him that a man with a “black book” would be sent to his tribe to teach them more about God and the seventh-day Sabbath.

Davis, Thomas H.

DAVIS, THOMAS H. (d. 1911). One of the pioneer Seventh-day Adventist colporteurs who brought SDA publications to Chile and Ecuador. He and F. W. Bishop were sent to Chile in 1894. Ten years later, in 1904, he entered Ecuador and served as field secretary and colporteur until 1909. He died at the River Plate Sanitarium in Argentina.

Davis, William C.

DAVIS, WILLIAM C. (1760—1831). A Presbyterian minister, founder of an Independent Presbyterian Church (which had about a dozen congregations) in South Carolina, and apparently the first in America to explain (in his 1811 pamphlet The Millennium) the 70 weeks and the 2300 days as beginning together, the latter ending with 1847. This ending point, however, he allowed as possibly four years earlier, since, as he remarked, the Christian Era was generally thought to be four years too late. Thus he implied 1843, William Miller's date for the end of the 2300 years. Said Miller: "One or two in every quarter of the globe have proclaimed the news, and agree in the time," and mentioned Davis and several others who dated the end of the 2300 years in 1843 or 1847. But what Davis looked for was not the Second Advent but "the downfall of popery, and the dawn of the church's glory," that is, the millennium, which, like many other postmillennialists of his day, he explained (in his 1827 book A Treatise on the Millennium) as 360,000 years, to be followed by the Second Advent.

Davy, William Ludlow

DAVY, WILLIAM LUDLOW (1886—1957). Missionary in Nyasaland (Malawi). He was born in Plymouth, England, where he received his grammar school education. During his boyhood years he was deeply impressed by reading the life and missionary experiences of David Livingstone. He also attended a lecture by John G. Paton, the famous missionary to the South Seas. These two things strongly influenced him to give himself to mission service some years later. At the age of 21 he emigrated to Canada, where he studied for three years at Battleford Academy. Shortly after this he married Elsie Annie Little.

In 1920 Davy and his wife traveled to Africa and spent the first four months at Solusi Mission. From there they went to Nyasaland, where Davy was appointed director of the Matandani Mission, a station some 70 miles (112 kilometers) west of the city of Blantyre. At this station they worked together for four years.

In 1924 Mrs. Davy became ill with blackwater fever. Because the exceptionally heavy rainy season that year had washed away the bridge over the Shire River, no medical help could reach her, and she died. Alone, Davy conducted his wife's funeral and the same year, with his three children, returned to the United States.

In 1926 he married Lydia Stickle, and together they went to Africa. After nine months in Bechuanaland, he returned to Nyasaland. For the next five years he was again stationed at Matandani, and afterward he was called to assist at the Malamulo Mission Training School. The first year there he taught in the school, and in 1935 acted as director of the mission. It was at Malamulo that he was ordained to the ministry by H. M. Sparrow.

After his return from furlough in 1936, Davy and his wife were sent to Luwazi, the northernmost SDA mission in Nyasaland, situated some 24 miles (38 kilometers) from Lake Nyasa, where they worked together for almost 20 years. Davy walked for hundreds of miles through the hills, established dozens of outschools, and watched churches grow. When failing health at length forced him to leave Africa, he retired in Modesto, California.

Day-Dawn

DAY-DAWN (1845—1847). An Adventist (not Seventh-day Adventist) paper published, apparently irregularly, at Canandaigua, New York, by F. B. Hahn, and edited by O.R.L. Crosier. Its first issue appeared on Mar. 26, 1845, in the Ontario Messenger. The Day-Dawn was also published as a separate paper for distribution among Adventists. Only the Ontario Messenger article is known to be extant. The Day-Dawn was reported in the Day-Star 5:36, Apr. 15, 1845. The Day-Dawn carried the first sanctuary article that was closely connected with the “Bridegroom” concept as advocated by Joseph Turner and Apollos Hale in the January 1845 Advent Mirror. O.R.L. Crosier wrote his more definitive article on the sanctuary in the Feb. 7, 1846, Day-Star Extra. Later issues of the Day-Dawn carried Crosier’s 1846 advocacy of the Sabbath (extract, Review and Herald 3:8, May 6, 1852); also more on the sanctuary (reprint: ibid. 1:78—80, May 5, 1851) and notes on his “new view” of the daily, both in March 1847.

Day-Star

DAY-STAR (1843—1847?). A Millerite periodical founded in Cincinnati as The Western Midnight Cry, with J. V. Himes as publisher; first edited by George Storrs, who was succeeded in December 1843 by Enoch Jacobs. After the disappointment of 1844 Jacobs took over publication of the paper and renamed it the Day-Star, beginning Feb. 18, 1845. Because the Day-Star dissented from Himes's Advent Herald in holding that the 1844 movement was valid and that the 2300 days had ended in October 1844, many of those who shared the Day-Star view, including James White and others who became the pioneers of the Seventh-day Adventist movement, read the Day-Star and wrote letters to its editor. In its columns appeared the first published communications from Ellen Harmon (White) and an extended exposition of the doctrine of the sanctuary written by O.R.L. Crosier (based on joint study with Hiram Edson and F. B. Hahn). Crosier had first written of the importance of the sanctuary in the March 1845 Day-Dawn. He began a more complete presentation of the types in the Day-Star, beginning on Sept. 26, 1845. This culminated in the publication of the Day-Star Extra.

SDA pioneers found themselves parting company with the Day-Star after Jacobs in 1846 went over to the “Spiritualizers,” whose doctrine he had formerly denounced (see [Spiritualism \[1\]](#)). Soon afterward he joined the Shakers; the paper was moved to a Shaker settlement, Union Village, near Lebanon, Ohio, and in May 1847 became a Shaker publication.

Deacon

DEACON. The local church officer next in rank to an elder. Deacons have care of the church's temporal business, are responsible for the care of the church property (all bills for upkeep are referred to the treasurer), assist the elders in the celebration of the Lord's Supper by receiving the bread and wine from the pastor or elder and serving the members, help in making the physical arrangement for the Communion service and the baptismal service, and have a particular charge of relieving the poor, the unfortunate, and the needy sick.

The deacon is elected to office by the church for a term of one year, and must be reelected if he is to continue in office. He must be ordained to his office (see Ordination) by an ordained minister holding credentials from the conference. A deacon once ordained need not be reordained upon reelection, provided he has maintained his church membership. If one who has been ordained as an elder is elected as deacon, he need not be ordained as a deacon, for his ordination in the one office qualifies him to function in the other as well. In a large church a board of deacons is organized, which is presided over by a head deacon.

The first reference to deacons in the Seventh-day Adventist Church is probably the mention of a committee of seven chosen at Washington, New Hampshire, in 1851 "to attend to the wants of the poor" (Review and Herald 2:52, Nov. 25, 1851). In 1853 the Review and Herald mentions two men, one in Fairhaven, Massachusetts, and the other in Dartmouth, Massachusetts, who were named deacons to administer the ordinances during the absence of a minister. These were approved by a full assembly of the churches and set apart by Frederick Wheeler by prayer and the laying on of hands (ibid. 4:199, Dec. 27, 1853). Similarly the next year Charles Glover was chosen and set apart as a deacon at Sylvan, Michigan, and Cyrenius Smith at Jackson, Michigan. Apparently each church had only one officer, a deacon.

At first the office of deacon in the SDA Church seems to have combined the functions of deacon and elder. It was some time later that elders were appointed to carry the responsibilities outlined in Scripture, and deacons were assigned specifically to the temporal affairs of the churches.

It is generally thought that the incident mentioned in Acts 6:1—6 is a record of the origin of the office of a deacon in the Christian church. However, the seven men set apart are not called deacons; nevertheless their duties and responsibilities corresponded closely to those of the deacons whose qualifications Paul enumerated in 1 Tim. 3:8—13. The New Testament shows that the office of a deacon implied more than caring for the material needs of the church. See Church \(local\); Deaconess.

Deaconess

DEACONESS. A woman elected in a local church to perform functions analogous to those of a deacon. The term deaconess (Greek diakonos, which can refer to either males or females) occurs in Rom. 16:1, RSV, in a context (compare v. 2) that suggests that the office of deaconess may have been established by the time the Epistle to the Romans was written, toward the close of the sixth decade of the Christian Era. Deaconesses cooperate with the deacons in caring for the sick, poor, and unfortunate. They prepare the bread for the Lord's Supper and arrange the Communion table. They also take care of the towels and basins used in the ordinance of foot washing. They assist the women candidates in the baptismal service and take care of the baptismal robes. In larger churches, a board of deaconesses is formed, with a chairman and sometimes a secretary. In many churches deaconesses help at the regular Sabbath service by welcoming people to church, especially visitors.

Deaf Persons, Work for

DEAF PERSONS, WORK FOR. Seventh-day Adventist work for deaf persons is mentioned as early as 1879. At that time Ellen White wrote, “We were interested in Brother Kimbal, who is a mute and has been a missionary among the mutes” (4T 300).

Although for many years Seventh-day Adventists had no organized work for deaf individuals, there were persons who devoted their time to giving the SDA message to them. As early as 1914 Agatha Kroeker, of Lincoln, Nebraska, instructed a young deaf woman in the SDA message in exchange for instruction in the use of sign language. Miss Kroeker then proceeded to carry on active evangelistic work for deaf persons, and even published a small missionary paper, The Best Friend of the Deaf. In one year she had collected more than 4,000 names of deaf persons in the United States.

In 1949 E. H. Adams, an SDA minister, and his wife became burdened for deaf people, and began work among them in the Oakland, California, area.

At the General Conference session in 1950 a committee, consisting of A. V. Olsen, A. L. Ham, and E. D. Dick, was commissioned to make recommendations concerning a proposal presented by a young man, John Issler, that a mission for deaf persons be organized. In a letter to the General Conference two years earlier, he had stated that he had a burden to work for deaf people in the North American Division. He had been told that his burden was appreciated, but that at that time there were no plans to open a special department among deaf persons.

In 1953 the following recommendation was adopted by the General Conference as presented from the union conference presidents: “We recommend, That a survey be made in each local conference to secure names and addresses of deaf people, and that plans be laid in the conference to send them literature of the message” (North American Division Committee on Administration, Minutes, Apr. 13, 1953, pp. 53, 54).

In the meantime, from 1951 to 1953, Issler had canvassed in the Los Angeles, California, area and had collected 7,000 names of deaf persons.

The next year responsibility for directing work for deaf persons was assigned to the Home Foreign Committee. The General Conference recommended “that efforts be made to develop workers to preach the present truth in the sign language to the deaf-mutes, and that in North America the Home Foreign Committee be encouraged to study this problem with interested union conferences” (General Conference Reports, vol. 131, no. 29, p. 224).

At the 1958 General Conference session, held in Cleveland, Ohio, the following recommendations were made to enlarge the work for deaf persons:

“1. That the General Conference Committee study ways and means to strengthen the work on behalf of persons thus afflicted and to encourage the training of workers in the use of the sign language.

“2. That the responsibility of fostering our work among the deaf-mutes be assigned to one of the departments of the General Conference as may be determined by the General Conference Committee.”

The same year (1958) Arthur W. Griffith, a lay worker for deaf persons, joined Issler in the development of a monthly newsletter for SDA deaf persons called Dawn, standing for Deaf Adventist Witness News. It is now called New Dawn and is published bimonthly by Christian Record Services.

About this time (1958) C. N. Kohler, an SDA minister, was called to work for deaf persons in the Central and Northern California conferences, especially in the Bay Area. He served in this phase of the work until 1960, when he returned to ministry for those with no loss of hearing.

In 1960 the North American Missions Committee was given the responsibility of the work for deaf persons. The same year (1960) Neil Davidson and his wife were invited by the Southern California Conference to fill the vacancy left by Issler, who resigned because of ill health. Arthur Griffith was called by the Oregon Conference committee to work for deaf persons part-time on salary. In July 1961 he was taken on as a full-time licensed minister to deaf individuals. In the same year Rex Rolls, a colporteur from Nevada, was invited by the Central and Northern California conferences to take up the work laid down by Kohler.

In 1968 Alfred Griffith, son of Arthur Griffith, graduated from Walla Walla College and was called to the Potomac Conference to work for deaf students in the Washington, D.C., area. He conducted a six-week evangelistic effort for deaf persons at Gallaudet College. By 1971, 20 students in that area had joined his group.

In 1970 Arthur Griffith was the first deaf person to be ordained to the gospel ministry, and, in addition to his work in Oregon, began spasmodic work for scattered deaf persons in Vancouver, British Columbia. In 1975 he was called to the Potomac Conference and continued the ministry at Gallaudet College. Rex Rolls then accepted a call to succeed Griffith in working for deaf persons in the Oregon Conference.

In 1979 the Northern California Conference called Alfred Griffith to work for deaf persons in the Bay Area. Alfred expanded his work to most parts of northern California. In 1993 Alfred was still working in northern California.

In 1980 the General Conference called Thompson Kay, who had taught at the Ohio State School for the Deaf and was then teaching at Alcy Junior Academy in Memphis, Tennessee, to start a deaf ministry. Kay became director of Deaf Services at what is now Christian Record Services. He worked with the Adult Sabbath School Lesson editors to produce an Easy English Adult Lesson Quarterly designed for those who had a limited vocabulary as a result of their hearing problem. Kay also was responsible for the production of such Easy English materials as The Story of Redemption, Amazing Facts, and sign language coloring books. He conducted numerous deaf awareness programs for SDA churches throughout the world field.

In 1987 a deaf layperson, Max Gallimore, was called to work for Deaf Services as editor. He edited Deaf-Light, an inspirational outreach magazine, and New Dawn, a newsletter for deaf persons.

In 1993 four deaf persons were working for the SDA Church: George Belser in the Oregon Conference, Raj Witteborg in the Potomac Conference, Paul Kelly in the New York Conference, and David M. Trexler as editor in the Deaf Services at Christian Record Services.

Church Membership and Population. The exact total of deaf members among the SDA churches in North America is not fully known, but CRS serves approximately 600 SDA deaf persons in North America. According to the 1990 census, there are 23 million deaf and hearing-impaired persons in the United States alone.

Death

DEATH. The cessation of life and the state that follows. The Scriptures speak of: (1) the first death, the common lot of all humans as the natural result of Adam's sin (Rom. 5:12; 1 Cor. 15:22; Heb. 9:27); (2) "the second death," the "wages," or penalty of sin, at the end of the millennium (Rom. 6:23; Rev. 2:11; 20:14; 21:8); (3) spiritual death "in trespasses and sins," the condition of those who have never accepted Christ, or who, having accepted Him, fall away (Rom. 8:6; Eph. 2:1, 5, 6; Col. 2:13; 1 Tim. 5:6); and (4) death to sin, which accompanies the new birth (Rom. 6:2—11; Gal. 2:20; Col. 2:13; 1 Peter 2:24; 1 John 3:14). This article is concerned with the first and second deaths.

Seventh-day Adventists conceive of humanity as an integral unity in which the component parts are interdependent. Upon the disintegration of this unity at the "first" death, conscious existence is no longer possible—the condition of humanity in death is "one of unconsciousness" (Church Manual [1990], p. 181). The second death is the consuming of the wicked (ibid., p. 180). Seventh-day Adventists believe that men and women are by nature mortal beings, that immortality is conditional on accepting Christ, and that it will be bestowed simultaneously on all the saved of all ages, at the second coming of Christ (1 Cor. 15:22, 23, 51—54).

Origin and Development of the Seventh-day Adventist View. The majority of adherents to the Millerite movement believed that human beings are conscious in death, and that the wicked will suffer eternal punishment. However, through the influence principally of George Storrs, a Methodist minister, a number espoused the doctrine of unconsciousness in death. Storrs got his doctrine from Henry Grew, a devout and critical student of the Bible, who in 1835 published a tract titled The Intermediate State. This tract set forth the concept that all of humanity is subject "to the dominion of death, and that hope of all future existence must be founded on the glorious doctrine of the resurrection from the grave" (Henry Grew, The Intermediate State [1844], preface, p. 2).

Two years later (1837) Storrs read Grew's pamphlet, but was at first skeptical of its teachings. However, being a sincere and diligent Bible student, Storrs searched the Scriptures on this point and, after three years, finally espoused Grew's view. Soon after accepting this new teaching, he withdrew from the Methodist communion. He wrote three letters to an intimate friend, a prominent minister in the Methodist Church, in which he set forth his new convictions. A few months later Storrs had an interview with this minister, who advised him to publish the views expressed in the three letters. Taking his friend's advice, Storrs issued An Enquiry; Are the Souls of the Wicked Immortal? In Three Letters (1841). After further intensive investigation of the subject, he expanded this work, which appeared in 1842 as a book titled An Enquiry; Are the Souls of the Wicked Immortal? In Six Sermons. This work, popularly known as Storrs' Six Sermons, received wide circulation throughout the United States and exerted a profound influence on William Miller's followers.

Through the influence of Charles Fitch, a prominent Millerite leader, Storrs accepted, in mid-1842, the Millerite teaching concerning the imminence of the Second Advent.

Later Storrs himself became prominent in the movement and led many of the Millerites to accept his views concerning humanity's unconscious condition in death and the ultimate extermination of the impenitent.

At first Storrs did not introduce his "peculiar" views directly into his public preaching, apparently so as not to distract attention from the more important message of the Lord's imminent return.

But as it was known that he held these views he was constantly met with inquirers, both ministers and private Christians, to whom he frankly stated his belief that "all the wicked will God destroy" (Six Sermons on the Inquiry: Is There Immortality in Sin and Suffering?[1855], p. 13).

When, on several occasions in the fall of 1842, the Millerite periodical The Signs of the Times censured a minister who felt it his duty to preach not only the coming of the Lord but also what the end of the wicked would be, Storrs felt that he should keep silent no longer, and so he published 5,000 copies of a revised edition of his Six Sermons and scattered them over the United States. The following year (1843) he started the Bible Examiner, a periodical issued occasionally, whose object was expressed by its motto, "No Immortality, or Endless Life Except Through Jesus Christ Alone" (ibid., p. 17). In this journal he answered his critics and propagated his views.

On Jan. 25, 1844, Charles Fitch, who had convinced Storrs of the imminence of the Second Advent, took his stand for the doctrines of unconsciousness in death and the destruction of the wicked. Concerning this he wrote, as quoted by Storrs in the later edition of his Six Sermons: "As you have long been fighting the Lord's battles alone on the subject of the state of the dead and of the final doom of the wicked, I write this to say that I am at last, after much thought and prayer, and a full conviction of duty to God, prepared to take my stand by your side" (ibid., p. 15).

Storrs' writings convinced many Millerites that his positions were correct. Many other ministers in various other parts of the country also came to the same view. With few exceptions, however, the leaders of the Millerite movement were strongly opposed to Storrs' teachings. This is clearly indicated in a letter by I. E. Jones, a Millerite preacher of Boston, to William Miller, dated Apr. 6, 1844: "I had the pleasure of seeing Brother Litch and Brother Whiting last week, and the last, and again this week, and they think as do our Boston brethren, Himes, Bliss and Hale, that something ought to be done to separate our influence from Brother Storrs' views of the end of the wicked; for, as it now is, he virtually wields from our silence, the whole, or almost the whole, advent influence" (quoted in F. D. Nichol, The Midnight Cry, p. 192).

It seems apparent that Storrs had a substantial following among the rank and file of the Millerites. But since the leaders as a whole were opposed to his views, opposition manifested itself. William Miller, among others, took Storrs to task for his views, and in a letter disclaimed "any connection, fellowship, or sympathy with Br. Storrs' views of the intermediate state, and the end of the wicked" (Midnight Cry 6:355, May 23, 1844).

Another opponent, Josiah Litch, editor, organizer, and preacher in the Millerite movement, became so agitated that he published a paper against Storrs' views, called the Anti-Annihilationist.

But in spite of opposition from various sources, Storrs' views took root. Among those who accepted them was Ellen G. Harmon (later Ellen G. White), who subsequently became a prominent leader and writer in the Seventh-day Adventist Church. In the book Life Sketches . . . Experience and Extensive Labors of Elder James White and His Wife, Mrs. Ellen G. White (1880) Mrs. White relates how she came to adopt the conditionalist view concerning death and the annihilation of the wicked. She says: "One day I listened to a conversation between my mother and a sister, in reference to a discourse which they had recently heard, to the effect that the soul had not natural immortality. Some of the minister's proof texts were repeated. . . .

"I listened to these new ideas with an intense and painful interest. When alone with my mother, I inquired if she really believed that the soul was not immortal. Her reply was that she feared we had been in error on that subject, as well as upon some others.

'But, mother,' said I, 'do you really believe that the soul sleeps in the grave until the resurrection? Do you think that the Christian, when he dies, does not go immediately to heaven, nor the sinner to hell?'

'She answered: 'The Bible gives us no proof that there is an eternally burning hell. . . .'

"It was some months after this conversation before I heard anything further concerning this doctrine; but during this time my mind had been much exercised upon the subject. When I heard it preached, I believed it to be the truth" (pp. 170, 171).

The impact of Storrs' views on the Millerites may be judged by the fact that one of the 10 fundamental principles adopted at the conference held in Albany, New York, on Apr. 29, 1845, stated that the inheritance of the departed saints is not received at death but at the Second Advent. Also indicative of the influence of Storrs' views on the Millerites is the fact that in 1961 at least four of the five surviving religious bodies whose origins may be traced to the Millerite movement still held that man is unconscious in death, and at least three of the five held that the wicked will be destroyed in the second death. The exception is the Life and Advent Union, which holds that those who are not saved "will remain in their graves forever" (Frank S. Mead, Handbook of Denominations in the United States [1961], p. 23).

About the time that Ellen Harmon accepted the views of humanity's unconsciousness in death and of the destruction of the wicked, James White and Joseph Bates, Millerite preachers who later became prominent Seventh-day Adventist leaders, accepted them also. In A Word to the Little Flock (1847, pp. 3, 8, 10), one of the first publications of the group that later developed into the Seventh-day Adventist Church, White repeatedly speaks of the saints as being in their mortal state prior to the Second Advent, and Bates in his book Second Advent Waymarks and High Heaps (1847, p. 49) speaks of events that will come "after immortality" (see Immortality).

The first clear statement by a Seventh-day Adventist leader concerning humanity's unconscious condition in death appears to have been made by Roswell F. Cottrell, an early SDA leader, in the Review and Herald (4:157, Nov. 22, 1853), in which he declares: "The dead know not anything,' and never will till they are raised from the dead, and that will not take place till Christ is seen in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory."

The first extended exposition of the SDA view on the end of the wicked appears to have been written by James White in a series of articles entitled "Destruction of the Wicked," beginning with the Review and Herald (6:82, 83) issue of Oct. 24, 1854, in which he proposed to "describe the different kinds of hell believed in by men," to "show the nature of the hell of the Bible," and to "prove from the Bible what will be the final destiny of the wicked." A year and a half later, he wrote in the Review and Herald (7:164, Feb. 21, 1856) that by the term annihilation he meant “destruction as conscious beings.” In 1874 an article entitled “A Declaration of the Fundamental Principles of Seventh-day Adventists” declared that “the wicked” become “as though they had not been” (Signs of the Times 1:3, June 4, 1874).

The first SDA book dealing with the (question of the first and second deaths was written by D. P. Hall, an SDA minister who later apostatized, and was titled Man Not Immortal: The Only Shield Against the Seductions of Modern Spiritualism (1854). This appeared first as a series of articles in the Review and Herald beginning in the Aug. 29, 1854, issue (6:17). These articles were followed a few months later by another series of articles by J. N. Loughborough, a pioneer leader, entitled “Is the Soul Immortal? An Examination of the Scripture Testimony Concerning Man’s Present Condition and His Future Reward or Punishment,” which first appeared in the Sept. 4, 1855, issue of the same periodical (7:33). These articles were published in book form in 1856 under the same title as the articles. By the mid-1850s SDA teachings concerning unconsciousness in death had become a settled doctrine.

Among early SDA books on this subject were: Which? Mortal or Immortal? or An Inquiry Into the Present Constitution and Future Condition of Man, by Uriah Smith (1860); The Transgressor’s Fate, or A Short Argument on the First and Second Deaths, by Moses Hull (1861); History of the Doctrine of the Immortality of the Soul, by D. M. Canright (1871); and Man’s Nature and Destiny, or The State of the Dead, the Reward of the Righteous, and the End of the Wicked, by Uriah Smith (1884).

Basis of the Seventh-day Adventist View. The Scriptures consistently teach that all created things subsist by the power of God (Acts 17:25, 28; Col. 1:16, 17). They continue to exist by virtue of the fact that God wills them to exist. God created human beings with a free will capable of choosing to disobey; thus they would reap the consequence—death (Gen. 2:16, 17). Continued existence was made contingent upon continuing obedience.

When Adam and Eve chose disobedience they would have been annihilated had not the Son of God in mercy offered to provide a vicarious atonement (Gal. 1:4; Titus 2:14; cf. Gen. 3:15; John 3:16). But the life that Adam and Eve—and their posterity—now had was a temporal, probationary life. It was henceforth “appointed unto men once to die” (Heb. 9:27; cf. Rom. 5:12).

However, this death, which is the common lot of all humanity, is not annihilation but a temporary unconscious state, until the resurrection. The Scriptures repeatedly and explicitly declare this intermediate state to be a period of unconsciousness. The following are some of the Bible passages that Seventh-day Adventists have used to support this view.

“In death there is no remembrance of thee: in the grave who shall give thee thanks?” (Ps. 6:5).

“The grave cannot praise thee, death cannot celebrate thee: they that go down into the pit cannot hope for thy truth” (Isa. 38:18; cf. Ps. 88:10—12).

“Put not your trust in princes, nor in the son of man, in whom there is no help. His breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth; in that very day his thoughts perish” (Ps. 146:2—4).

“The dead praise not the Lord, neither any that go down into silence” (Ps. 115:17).

“[When a man dies] his sons come to honour and he knoweth it not; and they are brought low, but he perceiveth it not of them” (Job 14:21).

“The living know that they shall die; but the dead know not any thing” (Eccl. 9:5).

“There is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave, whither thou goest” (v. 10).

SDAs also have used texts that refer to death as a “sleep,” a figure, they believe, that implies unconsciousness:

“Now shall I sleep in the dust; and thou shall seek me in the morning but I shall not be” (Job 7:21).

“Man dieth, . . . and where is he? As the waters fail from the sea, and the flood decayeth and drieth up: so man lieth down, and riseth not: till the heavens be no more, they shall not awake, nor be raised out of their sleep” (Job 14:10—12).

“Lazarus sleepeth. . . . Lazarus is dead” (John 11:11, 13).

“They stoned Stephen. . . . And . . . he fell asleep” (Acts 7:59, 60).

“They . . . which are fallen asleep in Christ” (1 Cor. 15:18).

De Beer, Johannes Nicholas

DE BEER, JOHANNES NICHOLAS (1881—1967). Colporteur, pioneer, missionary, administrator. Johannes was the grandson of the owner of the farm on which the Kimberley diamond mine was discovered. He was born in the Boshoff district of the Orange Free State and accepted the truth while very young. When he was 19 he went to Claremont Sanitarium, where he trained as a nurse and headed the Swedish Massage Department. After the old sanitarium closed he served the church as a colporteur for a time.

In 1910 Pastor and Mrs. De Beer went to Rhodesia, where for 12 years they served on various stations, pioneering the work in several areas. In 1922 he was called to the presidency of the Free State Conference.

In 1927 De Beer moved to Transkei and established the Cancele mission station. His work was always characterized by answered prayer and miracles of grace. Later he served as president of the Cape Field and the South Bantu Mission, where he labored until 1951.

He retired after more than 40 years of service to the church. During his retirement he ministered to a number of Cape churches.

Debre Tabor Adventist Church School

DEBRE TABOR ADVENTIST CHURCH SCHOOL. A coeducational boarding school operated by the Northwest Ethiopia Field near Debre Tabor, 50 miles (80 kilometers) east of Lake Tana in northern Ethiopia. Known formerly as Begemder Mission School, it was the first school in Begemder province. This area is a Coptic Christian area, although there are some of other faiths.

The school was established in 1932 with about 20 students. Sheik Zekarias (or Zacharias), a Muslim, claiming a revelation from God, had predicted that people would come from abroad and teach the gospel more clearly and openly (see Ethiopia). This school was considered a fulfillment of his prediction.

Interrupted by the Italian war against Ethiopia, the school was reestablished, after five years, by G. Gudmundsen. Although originally a day school, it was soon made a boarding school, with about 20 boarding students. It grew gradually, until in 1973 there were 24 boarding and 197 day students. Debre Tabor Adventist School was nationalized in 1976.

Principals: E. E. Saarinen, 1957—1961; Rudolf Andersen, 1961—1964; Agedew Bezuneh, 1964—1966; Sherard Wilson, 1966—1970; C. Vander Mei, 1970—1973; Gebregziabier Guddaye, 1973—1976.

Decker, Henry W.

DECKER, HENRY W. (1837—1926). Administrator. Son of a pioneer Baptist minister in Wisconsin, he accepted the Seventh-day Adventist faith about 1859. In 1863 he was one of a committee of three in the Wisconsin Conference that appealed to the governor of the state on behalf of SDA service personnel in the Civil War. After his ordination in 1875, he was president of the Wisconsin Conference for a total of some 10 years, and for a short time headed the North Texas Conference. He preached in Illinois and then for many years preached and directed conferences in the Pacific Northwest. He was the chief promoter in the building of Walla Walla College and of the Portland Sanitarium.

Decrees, Divine

DECREES, DIVINE. The doctrine that all events in the natural and spiritual realms were sovereignly determined by God from all eternity. According to Reformed theologians, the divine decrees are, in fact, part of one plan that embraces all human acts whether good or evil. In regard to evil, God's agency is said to be permissive.

On this subject the Seventh-day Adventist position approximates that of Arminian theology (see Arminianism), in contradistinction to the Calvinist. SDAs believe that God decreed a holy, happy life for all His creatures, and that sin was never part of God's sovereignly determined, eternal plan. The Reformed position, as John Wesley pointed out, brands God as responsible for the existence of sin, and produces antinomianism. "The doctrine of the divine decrees," wrote Ellen G. White, "unalterably fixing the character of men, had led many to a virtual rejection of the law of God" (GC 261).

God foresaw that some of the holy beings He planned to create would exercise their free wills, with which He endowed them, to sin. "From the beginning, God and Christ knew of the apostasy of Satan, and of the fall of man through the deceptive power of the apostate. God did not ordain that sin should exist, but He foresaw its existence and made provision to meet the terrible emergency" (DA 22).

In the eternal ages prior to Creation, on the basis of God's foreknowledge, it was decreed that Christ should pay the penalty for human transgression. Accordingly, God eternally decreed the availability of saving grace to all who should accept the proffered sacrifice, and that those who rejected it should eventually be annihilated, along with sin itself. Infinite wisdom devised a plan by which the universe would become forever secure; all who should choose to cooperate with the divine purpose should live forever, while those who refused to do so should cease to exist. But God endowed created beings with the power to choose, individually, the group with which they would be associated. Those who chose to be associated with the group predestined to annihilation would die an eternal death, while all who chose to be associated with the group predestined to life eternal would live forever.

Defense Literature Committee

DEFENSE LITERATURE COMMITTEE. A committee instituted in 1943 by the General Conference Committee to study and answer publications against the church. At the request of the General Conference officers, this committee issued replies to attacks on the denomination and to teachings of offshoot groups. The name Defense Literature Committee was not adopted until some time after its founding. In 1969 this committee was merged with the Committee on Biblical Study and Research under the title Biblical Research Committee.

Chairs: L. H. Christian, 1943—1946; M. E. Kern, 1946—1952; W. E. Read, 1952—1958; H. W. Lowe, 1959—1969.

De Fluiter, Henry

DE FLUITER, HENRY (1872—1970). Musician and pastor. A native of Holland, De Fluiter came to the United States in 1881. The following year he attended a meeting held by Dwight Moody and Ira Sankey and resolved to make the music field his lifework.

In 1902 he wrote his first hymn, “Matthew 24.” Fifty-eight years later he wrote his last, “The Day Must Be Near.” In the intervening years he wrote and published more than 200 hymns.

He associated with H.M.S. Richards in 1926, directing large choirs in crusades across the nation.

During his ministry he pastored numerous churches in southern California. Considered to be the Seventh-day Adventist Church’s best-known hymn writer, his influence will continue through songs such as “Homesick for Heaven,” “Longing,” “Over Yonder,” “Lord, Keep Us Faithful,” and “Ride On, King Jesus.”

De Forest, Perry Alfred

DE FOREST, PERRY ALFRED (1867—1947). Leader of Seventh-day Adventist medical work in Switzerland. He was born in Canada. Losing his mother at the age of 4, he was placed in a foster home, where he remained until at the age of 18 he was converted and joined the Salvation Army. At the age of 20 he became an SDA, perhaps through the influence of his uncle, George King, a prominent colporteur. About the same time (1888), he married Amy H. Gee. He then went to Battle Creek Sanitarium, where he obtained a nursing diploma and soon thereafter enrolled in the medical school of the University of Cincinnati. With no material support but his hard work and strong will, he graduated in 1894 with a medical degree. He also obtained postgraduate diplomas in the areas of eye, ear, nose, throat, and dentistry. His aim was to become a mission doctor, but when it was decided to open health work in Switzerland, the General Conference in 1895 sent him there as medical superintendent. He opened Institut Sanitaire (Health Institute) at Basel in 1896 and started a school of nursing and a health food factory. Later, he assisted in the establishment of the Lake Geneva Sanitarium (La Lignière) and served first as its director and then as house doctor until his retirement in 1935.

In his first year in Switzerland, he edited a health journal, Le Vulgarisateur (“The Popularizer”), and later was the first editor of the German magazine Gute Gesundheit (“Good Health”), begun in 1897. He also authored a number of popular health and hygiene books in the French language.

Delhove, David E.

DELHOVE, DAVID E. (1882—1949). Belgian missionary to Africa. He was born into a Protestant family in Belgium. When he was 17 he accepted the Sabbath from a tract sent by an uncle in America. At 24 he was baptized. In 1909, wishing to go to Africa as a missionary, he went to England to study English. He attended Stanborough College and supported his family by working as a nurse's aide in the sanitarium.

In 1913 he was sent by the British Union to Kenya, East Africa. He left his family in Belgium, intending to return for them in two years. However, the following year war cut off all communication with Belgium. Delhove was quickly drafted into the Belgian Army, and served for four years as a reconnaissance officer. Traveling during this time across Ruanda-Urundi several times, he felt that it would make a fruitful mission field.

After a separation of more than five years, he was reunited with his family, and, while in Belgium, he persuaded Henry Monnier to go with him to Africa. Entering the former German territory of Ruanda-Urundi (now Rwanda and Burundi), which had been assigned to Belgium as a mandate in 1919, they were permitted to occupy three mission stations previously operated by a German Protestant society.

In 1921 Delhove founded the Gitwe Mission on a site where no Africans would live because it had been cursed by a previous chief. From Gitwe he pushed out in all directions, and encouraged the founding of the Rwankeri (1922) and Buganda (1925, later moved to Ndora) missions. The following year, Delhove was ordained.

He pioneered the work on several stations. In 1929 the Ruanda-Urundi field was taken over by the African Division and eventually joined to the Congo Union. After 10 years as mission director on Songa and Kirundu, Delhove was asked to pioneer the opening up of the Rweze Mission.

Although retired in 1944, he continued to live and work in the Congo until his death. Appreciated for his wide knowledge of local problems, he served as a member of the council of the governor-general of the Belgian Congo. Several children of the Delhove family, born in Ruanda-Urundi, later became second-generation missionaries in the Congo.

Delhove died of a heart attack at Rutshuru on Mar. 12, 1949. The doctor who was with him stated that only 10 minutes before taking his last breath Pastor Delhove was seeking to convert the native orderly attending him.

Dell Residential Care Home, The

DELL RESIDENTIAL CARE HOME, THE. A home for aged Seventh-day Adventists, operated by the British Union Conference and situated near Lowestoft, Suffolk, England. The building and grounds, formerly a private home, were donated by a church member. The building was opened on July 3, 1953, with room for 15 residents, but later it was enlarged to accommodate 27. A matron and her husband are resident at the home and are responsible for 24 staff members, including care assistants, domestic, kitchen, and maintenance workers. Ten apartments for retired church members were built on the grounds in 1974.

Denmark

DENMARK. A 1,000-year-old kingdom of 16,000 square miles (41,000 square kilometers) in Northern Europe with a population (1994) of a little more than 5 million. The Faroe Islands (population 47,500) and Greenland (population 57,000) belong to Denmark. Manufacturing and farming are the principal occupations. The teachings of Luther were introduced into Denmark during the early part of the sixteenth century. In 1536, after a series of civil struggles, Lutheranism became the state religion. More than 95 percent of the people are members of that church.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. The SDA message reached Denmark from the United States in 1872 by means of the Danish monthly Advent Tidende, which John G. Matteson, a native son of Denmark, had started primarily for the Scandinavian people in America. During May of the same year, Matteson received a letter from a man who had already begun to keep the Sabbath and who was distributing the papers among his neighbors in order to win others. In June Matteson sent 20 taler ($11) to another man in Denmark and asked him to have a tract on the Sabbath printed and distributed. Later Matteson received word that 1,000 copies had been printed and given out, and also received many encouraging letters from readers of the Advent Tidende in Denmark, stating that they had begun to follow the teachings of the Bible as they had found them taught in the papers.

In 1875 M. A. Sommer wrote from Denmark that he had been reading the Advent Tidende for two years. As the printer of a monthly paper with a circulation of 4,000, he asked for and received permission of the officers in Battle Creek to incorporate articles from the Advent Tidende into his paper. But when he boldly attacked the ministers of the state church he was arrested and imprisoned for two months in 1876.

In March 1877 one of the interested readers wrote of some of his attempts to win others. "I hope that the Lord in His mercy will allow His workers to visit Denmark, so that souls also here may be won for the Lord." After receiving several such letters from different parts of Denmark, Matteson wrote to James White, the president of the General Conference, asking for permission to leave his work in the U.S. and take up missionary work in Denmark. His request was granted, and he was promised the prayers and financial support of American SDAs. Thus, 22 years after leaving his homeland, Matteson arrived in Denmark on June 6, 1877, as the pioneer SDA worker to all the Scandinavian countries. J. N. Andrews at that time had been in Switzerland for three years.

Soon after arriving, Matteson printed a hymnbook containing 70 psalms. He organized Sabbath schools wherever he found a few interested persons, and began the first temperance society in Denmark. After a few months, in spite of great opposition and even threats on his life, he baptized nine converts. In May 1878 he organized the first Seventh-day Adventist church in Denmark, the Alstrup church in Vendsyssel, with 27 members. This was the first SDA church in Northern Europe.

In September 1878 Knud Brorson arrived from America, having been sent by the General Conference to assist Matteson and thus release him to make frequent trips to Norway and Sweden, where he was fostering a growing work. To aid him further, Matteson selected qualified laymen whom he trained; others he taught how to sell books and papers. On July 1, 1881, Matteson sent out the first issue of Sundhedsbladet, an eight-page monthly health magazine, still being published. By this time Matteson had written 30 different pamphlets and tracts, which were being distributed all over Scandinavia.

At the time of the Denmark Conference session held in June 1906, there were in Denmark 18 churches with 746 church members. Although the membership and resources in Denmark were small, they joined other Scandinavian countries in opening mission work in Ethiopia. Seven years later Denmark sent two licensed ministers to the Faroe Islands as colporteur evangelists. In recent years work was opened in Greenland.

The first church school in Denmark was opened in Dronninglund in 1883. Seven years later another school was started at Helligum, which functioned for many years under the name of Jerslev Friskole, then in 1964 combined with another school to form the Jerslev-Ostervraa church school. By 1898 there were six church schools in Denmark, one in Copenhagen, and the others in Jutland.

In 1887 M. M. Olsen came from America and in 1890 started a mission school that became the Vejlelfjord Højer Skole (Danish Junior College).

In September 1897 a small sanitarium was opened in Frederikshavn in north Jutland. Later the institution was sold to a private church member, who for years continued the medical work that the denomination had begun.

A second medical institution opened in 1898 at Skodsborg, 10 miles (16 kilometers) north of Copenhagen, in two small buildings that had once belonged to the royal family. Through the years this sanitarium grew to be one of the largest operated by SDAs anywhere in the world (see Skodsborg Sanitarium). There are also more than 60 private clinics scattered throughout Denmark. Shortly after the sanitarium was founded, a food factory was established in Copenhagen, which was operated at Bjaeverskov, near Ringsted (see Nutana). Both the sanitarium and food factory are still operating, but no longer belong to the church.

A publishing house was organized in 1905 to distribute literature printed in Norway, a function which had been handled by a private firm since 1893 (see Danish Publishing House).

Organization. Less than three years after his arrival in Denmark, on May 30, 1880, Matteson organized the first conference outside of North America—the Denmark Conference, with seven churches and 120 adherents, of whom 91 were baptized members. From 1902 to 1931 the Denmark Conference was part of the Scandinavian Union Conference, which was made up of Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Finland, Iceland, and Greenland. At a session held Mar. 18—22, 1931, the Scandinavian Union was divided to form the East Nordic and the West Nordic Union conferences. The latter included the countries of Denmark and Norway. In the same year, Denmark was divided to form the East Denmark and the West Denmark conferences. In 1992 the West Nordic Union Conference was dissolved, and the Danish Union of Churches was formed.

Dental Education

DENTAL EDUCATION. Interest in dentistry as part of a well-rounded program of professional training in the field of medicine and health education within the denomination was reflected in the charter of the College of Medical Evangelists (now Loma Linda University), which proposed the degree of Doctor of Dental Surgery. However, nothing was done about it. In the 1932 spring meeting of the General Conference Executive Committee it was voted to “explore the feasibility of establishing a school of dentistry in connection with the school of medicine of the College of Medical Evangelists, or of making a group arrangement with some standard dental college where our young people can have the safeguards of Christian home life.”

To explore the possibilities, a committee of five was appointed, one of whom was Dr. J. Russell Mitchell, a practicing dentist on the faculty of the Atlanta (Georgia) Southern Dental College. On the recommendation of this committee to the Autumn Council in 1933, the General Conference Department of Education made arrangements with the Atlanta Southern Dental College to accept Seventh-day Adventist students and to grant them Sabbath privileges. The first group of SDA students was admitted in the fall of 1934.

In a 1938 meeting of the College of Medical Evangelists constituency, the feasibility of establishing a dental school was discussed, and later studies were made. Dr. Herbert G. Childs, chair of the Department of Stomatology of the medical school, in 1939 presented a report on the advisability of establishing an SDA dental school, using the existing facilities of the medical school, offering the first two years of basic sciences in Loma Linda and the two years of clinical training in Los Angeles. On seeing a brochure describing this plan, Dr. M. Webster Prince, an SDA layperson who was a practicing dentist in Detroit and a member of the Council on Dental Education (the accrediting agency for all dental schools within the United States), pointed out that the proposed plan was not in keeping with the council’s policies on four major points: Dental education should be a university discipline, taught entirely on one campus, by a highly selective faculty, with preference given to well-qualified full-time teachers, and operated on an eleemosynary basis, with autonomy and adequate financial support. This evaluation resulted in discarding the then-existing plans.

When Atlanta Southern Dental College found it necessary to affiliate with Emory University, the effect was to rule out the SDA arrangement with the school. Serious study was undertaken again in 1944 for the establishment of an SDA dental school. In 1947 the General Conference Committee terminated the agreement with the Atlanta Southern Dental College and authorized the sale of the denominationally owned student home.

Four years later the General Conference Executive Committee launched new plans that resulted eventually in the establishment of an SDA School of Dentistry. The first class graduated in 1957. Presently, the total student body consists of 80 students enrolled in each year of the dental curriculum, 40 students each year in the dental hygiene curriculum, and 60 graduate dentists are enrolled in nine postdoctoral programs of dental specialty education.

The original physical plant (Prince Hall) was enlarged and remodeled in 1976, approximately doubling the size of the original structure.

The School of Dentistry offers more than 135 continuing education courses each year to practicing dentists. More than 6,000 enrollees each year include dentists from 15 or more countries outside the United States. See Loma Linda University.

DEPARTMENTS. Functional subdivisions of the denominational work on various administrative levels. In the General Conference there were, in 1994, seven departments and 31 services, corporations, and other organizations. In their respective territories, each division, union, conference, and mission also has departments in the same or similar categories, working under their respective executive committees but with the aid and guidance of the General Conference departments.

For the departments and their various spheres of service, see General Conference Departments; also names of specific departments.

DETACHED ORGANIZATION (conference, mission field, etc.). A unit of church organization not forming a part of the next higher unit. An example would be a detached mission that is not a part of any union mission but is operated directly by the division.

Detamore, Fordyce W.

DETAMORE, FORDYCE W. (1908—1980). Educator, missionary, evangelist. Born in Minnesota, he attended Emmanuel Missionary College, and after graduating, he and his wife, Aletha, entered denominational work as teachers. Later they served in ministerial work in the Indiana and Michigan conferences, then accepted a call to the Far Eastern Division, where he served as educational superintendent in two unions.

In 1942 H.M.S. Richards, Sr., asked him to help out with the Voice of Prophecy as the broadcast went coast to coast. Detamore was responsible for originating many features at the Voice, such as the slogan “Forward in Faith,” the Voice of Prophecy News, and the Book-of-the-Month Club. He also wrote the first lessons for the Bible school, including the junior course.

He was responsible for setting up telephone evangelism and assisted in the organization of the Voice of Prophecy evangelism association.

Later he worked as an evangelist in China and throughout the Far East and in the Texas and Florida conferences.

After retirement he volunteered his services for the Voice of Prophecy and worked full-time, including one campaign a year overseas in Manila, Hong Kong, Singapore, Indonesia, and Australia.

He passed to his rest in Orlando, Florida.

Detamore, Francis Arthur

DETAMORE, FRANCIS ARTHUR (1872—1938). Missionary administrator in Malaya, minister, and teacher. He spent his early days on a farm in Minnesota and began his education in the public schools there. After being baptized into the Seventh-day Adventist Church at the age of 13, he attended a conference school in Minneapolis, Minnesota. Afterward he returned to his home community and taught in a public school, but became so impressed that SDA children should have the benefits of denominational education that in 1898 he taught the first Adventist church school in Minnesota without pay. He was principal of the Minnesota Industrial School (1899—1901), teaching in the winter, studying in the summer at Battle Creek College, and assisting in evangelistic meetings whenever possible. From 1898 to 1908 he served as educational secretary, field secretary, and pastor in the Minnesota Conference. Later he transferred to the Oregon Conference, where he served as educational secretary and also as principal of Laurelwood Academy (1909); and later (1910—1912) he worked in the Upper Columbia Conference. In 1912 he went to Southern Asia to superintend the Malay missions. There under his leadership, the Malaysian publishing house (now Southeast Asia Publishing House) was built, and the Singapore Training School (now Southeast Asia Union College) was established. After 10 years the condition of health in his family made a return to the homeland necessary. After his return, he worked in departmental offices in the Indiana (1923—1929), Upper Columbia (1929—1936), and Oregon (1936—1938) conferences.

Detwiler, Howard Johnson

DETWILER, HOWARD JOHNSON (1889—1951). Administrator. After graduating from Mount Vernon College, he worked as an evangelist in the East Pennsylvania Conference until 1920. Then he became Bible teacher at, and shortly afterward principal of, Mount Vernon Academy. He was president of the West Virginia Conference (1924—1928), the New Jersey Conference (1928—1932), the Columbia Union Conference (1932—1942), and the Potomac Conference (1942—1951).

From 1906 to 1910 he was president of the Eastern New York Conference. Appointed superintendent of the Japan Mission in 1910, he later became vice president of the Asiatic Division (1917), and then president of the Southern China Union Mission (1918). On returning to the U.S. in 1926, he was elected president of the Louisiana-Mississippi Conference, an office he held until 1932. He was next appointed pastor of the Jackson, Mississippi, church, whose congregation he served until his retirement in 1938.

M. C. Dhamanwala English High School of Seventh-day Adventists

M. C. DHAMANWALA ENGLISH HIGH SCHOOL OF SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTISTS. An institution that began as a church school in 1945, using a room at the Women's Wadia College just opposite the mission hospital campus in Surat, Gujarat, India. It was reorganized by Shalini Shinde in 1958. After relocation to the church vestry in 1966, where classes were held for 10 years, a temporary shed was erected to accommodate the expanding student body. Then in response to a challenge by the Central India Union committee, G. Jacob, the region director, and the principal, Pramod Gaikwad, set about raising funds that were to be matched by the union. The school building was completed in 1978 and named after the principal donor. During the next two years the staff quarters and another floor were added and the school was upgraded to ICSE level.

This institution, which started with less than 15 students in 1945, now serves not only the Seventh-day Adventist children in Surat, but also more than 3,500 students, both Christian and non-Christian. It is providing an education along the lines of Seventh-day Adventist principles.

Diet

DIET. The subject of diet has received strong emphasis among Seventh-day Adventists. This is because of the bearing of nutrition on the individual's mental, social, and spiritual welfare as well as the physical welfare, and consequently on the person's ability to serve God and humanity and to comprehend spiritual things. SDAs find both a scientific and a biblical basis for this emphasis: (1) the teaching of science that what we eat and drink affects not only our bodies but also our brains, and (2) biblical admonitions to the Christian to "glorify God in your body, and in your spirit, which are God's" (1 Cor. 6:20), and "whether therefore ye eat, or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God" (1 Cor. 10:31).

Since SDAs, as creationists, accept the Genesis record as literal history, they believe that the diet there described was the original diet that God provided, and is therefore the best possible diet. This diet consisted entirely of the products of plants—grains, fruits, nuts, and vegetables (Gen. 1:29, 30; 3:18). A modification of this diet, permitting the use of flesh as food, occurred after all plant life had been destroyed by the Flood (Gen. 9:1—4). Further specific instruction was given to Moses regarding the unclean meats that were to be excluded from the diet (Lev. 11; Deut. 14:3—20). Because the original diet did not include the flesh of animals, the Seventh-day Adventist Church recommends a lacto-ovo-vegetarian diet, a diet consisting essentially of plant foods supplemented by a moderate use of milk and eggs—natural foods of animal origin. The recommendation of this type of diet is only a part of the comprehensive health program of the church. See Health Principles.

SDAs regard proper diet and a care for health as the Christian's duty. They advocate abstinence from harmful foods and drinks not on the basis of religious taboo, but on the basis of the law of cause and effect. They believe that the prohibition to the Hebrews of the flesh of certain animals, such as hogs, for food was based on the unfitness of the flesh of these animals for humanity's diet, and was not a mere ceremonial restriction. Abstinence from tobacco and alcohol and the abuse of drugs is required of SDAs, because these are poisons. On the other hand, vegetarianism, for example, is advocated as a way of health but has not been made a requirement of church membership. The SDA doctrine is that attention to diet is a Christian duty because of its effect on health.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Position on Diet. In the middle of the nineteenth century, when the SDA Church was formed, the average American diet was a monotonous one of meats, fats, starches, and sweets, with fresh fruits and vegetables often limited to summer months. Impaired health and sickness because of poor dietary practice were prevalent. At a time when there was a marked dearth of the concept of healthful diet in the scientific world, the basic principles of healthful dietary were urged upon the church through the pen of Ellen White, beginning in 1863.

In more recent times basic principles advocated by Mrs. White have been fully substantiated and repeatedly emphasized by the scientific researches of such people as Henry C. Sherman, Elmer V. McCollum, Clive McCay, Frederick J. Stare, and many others whose outstanding studies have proved that the liberal use of whole-grain cereals, vegetables, fruits, and nuts is the proper means of enhancing and improving the dietary.

Counsels to the church from Mrs. White presented first the injurious effects of alcohol, tobacco, tea, and coffee, and then the undesirability of flesh foods, the free use of sugar, refined flour, "grease" (especially animal fats), rich foods, spices and condiments, overeating, irregularity in eating, and improper food combinations.

Those counsels recommended a diet without flesh foods, consisting of a liberal variety of fruits, whole grains, legumes, nuts, and vegetables prepared in a simple, appetizing manner, with some dairy products and eggs, when proper precautions were taken in regard to the latter two to lessen the risk of disease. Possible necessity of the eventual replacement of dairy products and eggs because of the increase of disease among animals was foreseen. The need for skill and intelligence to make the diet palatable and nutritious was recognized, and homemakers were encouraged to study and put into practice the principles of healthful cookery, based on the best scientific data currently available.

From the large body of instruction from Mrs. White on foods and dietetic practices for the church, a 477-page volume has been compiled, Counsels on Diet and Foods. The author (p. 198) set down broad principles regarding diet: "Those who understand the laws of health, and who are governed by principle, will shun the extremes, both of indulgence and of restrictions. Their diet is chosen, not for the mere gratification of appetite, but for the upbuilding of the body. They seek to preserve every power in the best condition for the highest service to God and man. The appetite is under the control of reason and conscience, and they are rewarded with health of body and mind. While they do not urge their views offensively upon others, their example is a testimony in favor of right principles."

Nutritional Adequacy of the Vegetarian Diet. During a period of many years, scientific studies have been made of meatless dietaries. Wherever well-controlled studies have been made not hampered by inability to obtain a full variety of food or by social customs that restrict proper choice, the results have shown the adequacy of a diet without flesh foods.

A lacto-ovovegetarian diet does not differ markedly from the average Western diet. The principal difference is that it replaces flesh foods with a greater variety of cereals, legumes, and nuts, supplemented by a moderate intake of milk and eggs.

The effects of such a diet have been tested by various methods, including studies of endurance, metabolic rate, blood constituents, growth and development of the young, adequacy for pregnancy, and maintenance of adults. One of the most thorough and comprehensive investigations yet reported was done by Mervyn G. Hardinge and Frederick J. Stare (1954), who made a comparative study of three types of dietaries—the lacto-ovovegetarian, pure vegetarian (no animal products), and nonvegetarian (meat diet). These scientists studied representative groups of adults, adolescents, and pregnant women. Although the average food intake varied widely among individuals, the average intake of the three groups approximated or exceeded the recommendations of the National Research Council of the National Academy of Sciences. Their findings indicated that a lacto-ovovegetarian diet is adequate as a lifetime program under normal as well as stress conditions. (See "Nutritional Studies of Vegetarians," The American Journal of Clinical Nutrition 2:73—88, March-April 1954.) Hardinge and Hulda Crooks prepared an extensive review of the subject of vegetarianism ("Non-Flesh Dietaries," Journal of the American Dietetic Association 43:545—558, December 1963; 45:537—542, December 1964).

Disease in Relation to Diet. In addition to nutritional diseases that stem from a lack of various food constituents, a number of illnesses are related in part to overnutrition and an imbalance of nutrients. The possible relationship between dietaries high in total calories, total fats, saturated fats, and cholesterol, and the frequency of diseases of the heart and blood vessels and cancer has been the subject of large-scale investigations.

Selection of Food. Nutritional research and human experience have shown that there is no indispensable food and that a good diet can be compounded in many ways. Moderation in calories in order to maintain the ideal body weight and the selection of a variety of wholesome unrefined foods without undue emphasis on, or extreme restriction of, any one nutrient, remain desirable nutritional goals in the light of instruction given to the church and of current scientific literature.

Dime Tabernacle

DIME TABERNACLE. A former large Seventh-day Adventist church, the fourth to be built in the city of Battle Creek, Michigan. Stonelaying for the foundation began on Aug. 19, 1878, and by the following February the name Dime Tabernacle had been acquired (denominational members had been invited to donate dimes for the project). The erection of the tabernacle was considered a fitting climax to the career of James White, who that year (1879) accepted for the last time the presidency of the General Conference.

Seating about 4,000, the tabernacle was considered the logical meeting place for the 1901 General Conference session, where worldwide expansion and organization plans were laid. The tabernacle continued to be a meeting place for large gatherings of SDAs until it was destroyed by fire in 1922.

Dinbandhu Adventist Hospital

DINBANDHU ADVENTIST HOSPITAL. The Dinbandhu Charitable Hospital Trust of Kholwad (12 miles [20 kilometers] north of Surat City, India) and the Surat Hospital Trust Association of Seventh-day Adventists combined to operate a hospital in Kholwad village. The Dinbandhu Charitable Hospital Trust constructed, furnished, and partially equipped a 50-bed hospital that it turned over to the Surat Hospital Trust Association to operate. However, because of a severe shortage of personnel and funds, the Surat Hospital Trust Association had to withdraw from this contract and turn back the running of the hospital and its programs to the Dinbandhu Charitable Hospital Trust in 1991. Thus the word “Adventist” was dropped from the title, and SDAs no longer had any responsibility in operating this hospital.

Medical Directors: A. T. Jonahs, 1988—1991; Mathew K. Philip, 1991.

Director, Departmental

DIRECTOR, DEPARTMENTAL. Formerly departmental secretary. A person in charge of one or more departments in a conference, union, or other unit of church organization.

In some cases the term secretary is used. See Departments.

Directories

DIRECTORIES. The official directory of the denomination is the Seventh-day Adventist Yearbook, published by the General Conference. It covers the geographical and administrative subdivisions, from the General Conference organization and its departments, commissions, and services, down to local administrative offices; the various denominational institutions-educational, medical, publishing, and others; and a list of workers. In it also appear the General Conference constitution and bylaws, the Statement of Fundamental Beliefs, a list of countries with their organizational locations, and statistical summaries.

There are also church directories, listing the addresses of local churches, published by some world divisions.

The local conferences in North America have unpublished directories, which they circulate among those who have need for statistics and information on specific local conferences.

There are other directories, not of the church but of Seventh-day Adventist groups, such as the yearly directories of SDA physicians and dentists in the Alumni Journal of the Loma Linda University School of Medicine and the Journal of the National Association of Seventh-day Adventist Dentists, and the Adventist Services and Industries Laymen's Directory.

Dirksen, Henry J.

DIRKSEN, HENRY J. (1859—1929). Minister; one of the pioneer Seventh-day Adventist workers on the Canadian prairies. He was born in Europe, somewhere near the Black Sea, and at the age of 23 came to America with his parents, settling in South Dakota, where he married Mary Derkson in 1887. His name appears in the Yearbook in the list of workers first in 1893, as a licentiate in the Minnesota Conference (there spelled Duerkson), and the next year his address is given in North Dakota (still under the Minnesota Conference listing). He afterward worked in Wisconsin, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Washington. About 1905 he moved to Portland, Oregon, and with the exception of some time between 1912 and 1915, which he spent in Manitoba again, he lived in Portland the rest of his life. His son, Henry Dirksen, was one of the first SDA workers in Iran.

Dispensation

DISPENSATION. A biblical term used by Christians in general, of the old and new dispensations, corresponding to the Old and New Testaments, or to the Jewish and the Christian systems, which are different, yet form part of one plan of salvation.

But the original two biblical dispensations were later expanded by some theologians. For example, there was some subdividing or adding of dispensations by ecclesiastical writers such as Tertullian and Origen, by Joachim in the Middle Ages, and by Cocceius in more modern times, yet nothing as far-reaching as the system of dispensations described in the present “dispensationalist” system of interpretation. Modern dispensationalism is the product of the elaborations of John N. Darby (founder of the Plymouth Brethren), and appears in its most popular form in the notes of C. I. Scofield in the Scofield Bible. This system partitions world history into seven ages, or “dispensations”-time periods-in each of which God is supposed to deal differently with humanity. In this scheme the “church age” (the Christian Era) is regarded as a “parenthesis,” or gap, in prophecy; as an age of pure grace between a past Jewish dispensation of law and a future one in which the Jews will be again the people of God and will rule the nations under a restoration of the Mosaic code. This system of seven dispensations is claimed by its adherents as basic to or synonymous with premillennialism, so that in the public mind it is likely to be attributed mistakenly to several classes of premillennialists who do not hold it. It is in complete contrast to the Seventh-day Adventist type of premillennialism.

District

DISTRICT. A term used in Seventh-day Adventist Church organization in several senses:

1. Formerly (1889—1901), one of the six (later eight) areas called General Conference Districts, each comprising several conferences and/or missions, which were under the leadership of a superintendent. These districts, designated generally by number, though sometimes by name (such as no. 1, Atlantic; no. 2, Southern; etc.), were replaced by union conferences. See Organization, III, 2; IV, 2.

2. A group of neighboring churches served by one minister but not otherwise considered a unit.

3. An administrative unit smaller than or subordinate to a mission, a field, or a union, under a director, with whom may be associated a group of other ministers and/or missionaries. Such a district may comprise the area of an entire country, one or more subdivisions of a country, or a smaller unit.

District of Columbia

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA. See Allegheny East Conference; Potomac Conference.

District of Columbia Conference

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CONFERENCE. A former unit of church organization, existing from 1909 to 1924, embracing the District of Columbia and neighboring areas in Maryland and Virginia. In 1903 the District of Columbia and Takoma Park, Maryland, which had formerly belonged to the Chesapeake Conference, had been set up as a detached district, composed of three churches, and 300 members, administered directly by the General Conference. This was done soon after the General Conference moved its headquarters and the Review and Herald to Washington, D.C., and procured land in suburban Takoma Park, Maryland, for the erection of the Washington Sanitarium and Hospital and the school that is now Columbia Union College. Later this district was expanded to take in the Washington metropolitan area, including two adjacent counties in Maryland and six in Virginia, and was made a conference in 1909 under the Columbia Union Conference. In 1924, when it was last listed in the Yearbook, it included the District of Columbia, the Maryland counties of Montgomery, Prince Georges, Charles, and St. Marys, and the Virginia counties of Alexandria, Fairfax, Loudoun, Prince William, Fauquier, Stafford, Northumberland, King George, Westmoreland, Richmond, and Lancaster. In 1924 it was organized, with the rest of Virginia, as the Potomac Conference, with the headquarters remaining in Takoma Park.

Divine Decrees

DIVINE DECREES. See Decrees, Divine.

Division

DIVISION. The largest geographical and administrative unit next to the General Conference, embracing a number of unions, missions, conferences, sections, etc. Theoretically, each division administration is the section of the General Conference that operates in that area; it is therefore called in the constitution a division section, although in customary use, the term division alone is sufficient. The president of the division is a vice president of the General Conference. For the development of the divisional administration, see Organization, V. Divorce

DIVORCE. The legal dissolution of marriage, which has for the Christian believer not only a social and a psychological impact but also a religious one. The following 11 points state as clearly as possible the position of the Seventh-day Adventist Church on the subject of divorce and remarriage:

“1. ‘In the sermon on the mount Jesus declared plainly that there could be no dissolution of the marriage tie, except for unfaithfulness to the marriage vow.’ -Thoughts From the Mount of Blessing, p. 63. (Matt. 5:32; see also Matt. 19:9.)

“When Jesus said, “‘Let not man put asunder,’ He established a rule of conduct for the church under the dispensation of grace which must transcend forever all civil enactments which would go beyond His interpretation of the divine law governing the marriage relation. He here gives a rule to His followers, who must adhere to it whether or not the state or prevailing custom allows larger liberty.

“2. Even though the Scriptures allow divorce for ‘unfaithfulness to the marriage vow,’ earnest endeavors should be made by those concerned to effect a reconciliation urging the innocent spouse to forgive the guilty one and the latter to amend his or her conduct, so that the marriage union may be maintained.

“3. In the event that reconciliation is not effected, the innocent spouse has the biblical right to secure a divorce, and also to remarry.

“4. A spouse found guilty of adultery by the church shall be subject to church discipline. Even though the transgressor may be genuinely repentant, he or she shall be placed under censure for a stated period of time, in order to express the church’s abhorrence of such evil. The transgressor who gives no evidence of full and sincere repentance shall be disfellowshipped. In case the violation has been so flagrant as to bring public reproach on the cause of God, the church, in order to maintain its high standards and good name, shall disfellowship the individual even though there is evidence of repentance.

“5. A guilty spouse, who is divorced, has not the moral right to marry another while the innocent spouse still lives and remains unmarried and chaste. Should he or she do so, he or she, if a member, shall be disfellowshipped. The person whom he or she marries, if a member, shall also be disfellowshipped.

“6. When a divorce is secured by either spouse, or when both mutually secure a divorce on any grounds other than that of ‘unfaithfulness to the marriage vow,’ the party or parties securing the divorce shall come under the censure of the church except as provided later in this paragraph. In the event that either spouse who is a church member remarries-unless in the meantime the other party has remarried, committed adultery or fornication, or died-the one remarrying shall be disfellowshipped from the church. The person whom he or she married shall also be disfellowshipped. It is recognized, however, that sometimes there may be conditions that make it unsafe or impossible for husband and wife to continue to live together. In many such cases the custody of the children, the adjustment of property rights, or even personal protection may make necessary a change in marriage status. In such cases it may be permissible to secure what is known in some countries as a legal separation. However, in some civil jurisdictions such a separation can be secured only by divorce, which under these circumstances would not be condemned. But such a separation or divorce, in which ‘unfaithfulness to the marriage vow’ is not involved, does not give either one the scriptural right to remarry, unless in the meantime the other party has remarried, committed adultery or fornication, or been removed by death. Should a member who has been thus divorced remarry, he or she, if a member, shall be disfellowshipped; and the one whom he or she marries shall also be disfellowshipped from the church.

“7. A guilty spouse who has violated his or her marriage vow and has been divorced and disfellowshipped and who has remarried, or a person who has been divorced on other than the grounds set forth in section 1 and has remarried, and who has been disfellowshipped from the church, shall be considered as standing under the disapproval of the church and thus ineligible for membership except as hereinafter provided.

“8. The marriage contract is not only more sacred but also infinitely more complex than ordinary contracts in its possible involvements; for example, in the factor of the children who may be born. Hence, in a case where any endeavor by a genuinely repentant offender to bring his marital status into line with the divine ideal presents apparently insuperable problems, his or her plea for readmittance shall, before final action is taken, be brought by the church through the pastor or district leader to the conference committee for counsel and recommendation as to any possible steps that the repentant one, or ones, may take to secure such readmittance.

“9. Readmittance to membership of those who have been disfellowshipped for reasons given in the foregoing sections shall be on the basis of rebaptism.

“10. When a person who has been involved in divorce proceedings is finally readmitted to church membership, as provided in section 8, every care should be exercised to safeguard the unity and harmony of the church by not giving such a person responsibility as a leader; especially in an office which requires the rite of ordination, unless by very careful counsel.

“11. No Seventh-day Adventist minister has the right to officiate at the remarriage of any person who, under the stipulation of the preceding paragraphs, has no scriptural right to remarry” (Church Manual [1990], pp. 172—174).

In 1976 the General Conference established a set of guidelines and procedures to assist pastors and church administrators in the implementation of the instructions quoted above (cf. Review and Herald 154:7, Feb. 17, 1977).

Djibouti

DJIBOUTI. A country located on the east coast of Africa. It is about the size of New Hampshire, with an area of 8,950 square miles (23,200 square kilometers) and a population (1994) of 413,000. Its neighbors are Ethiopia on the north and west and Somalia on the south. Djibouti gained independence from France on June 27, 1977. The country was formerly known as French Somaliland and the French Territory of the Afars and Issas. The great majority of the inhabitants are Muslim.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. In 1992 an agreement was signed between the republic of Djibouti and the Eastern Africa Division of Seventh-day Adventists to build a dental clinic in the city of Djibouti with a high priority of preventive care and appropriate health education for the general public.

Construction of the clinic was completed early in September 1992 on land given by the government. This medical ministry may well serve as a stepping-stone in spiritual ministry to the needs of the people.

The country of Djibouti is part of the Ethiopian Union Mission in the Eastern Africa Division.

Doctrinal Statements, Seventh-day Adventist

DOCTRINAL STATEMENTS, SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST. Throughout their history Seventh-day Adventists have affirmed that “the Bible and the Bible only” should be the Christian’s creed and that they have no creed but the Bible. However, over the years they have issued various statements of belief gradually moving toward the 27 fundamental beliefs published in the denominational Yearbook since 1981 and in the Church Manual (1990).

1. James White’s Informal Statement. In August 1853 James White, as editor of the Review and Herald, replied to an inquiry from a Seventh Day Baptist in what was perhaps the first SDA statement of faith—merely the all-inclusive scriptural phrase “the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus” (Rev. 14:12).

“As a people we are brought together from divisions of the Advent body [the Millerites], and from the various denominations, holding different views on some subjects; yet, thank Heaven, the Sabbath is a mighty platform on which we can all stand united. And while standing here, with the aid of no other creed than the Word of God, and bound together by the bonds of love—love for the truth, love for each other, and love for a perishing world—“which is stronger than death,” all party feelings are lost. We are united in these great subjects: Christ’s immediate, personal second Advent, and the observance of all of the commandments of God, and the faith of his Son Jesus Christ, as necessary to a readiness for his Advent” (James White, in Review and Herald 4:52, Aug. 11, 1853).

In December of the same year, White proposed a “Charter” for gospel order in a series of four articles. The second article, on doctrine, explains the relationship of gospel order (church organization) to unity of belief. This was evidently a delicate subject, as numerous reproofs for “creed-making” were published in the Review and Herald. Carefully the editor suggested a basis for “doctrinal purity” as essential to order in the church: “Is the church of Christ,” he asked, “to be left without a rule of faith? We answer, that she is provided with a creed that is sufficient. ‘All scripture is given by inspiration of God’” (ibid. 4:180, Dec. 13, 1853).

2. Review and Herald Masthead Statement. A list of five “leading doctrines taught by the Review” was published in the masthead of the Review and Herald from Aug. 15 to Dec. 19, 1854. The author is not identified, and no reason was given for its omission in future issues. The doctrines read as follows:

“The Bible and the Bible alone, the rule of faith and duty.

“The Law of God, as taught in the Old and New Testaments, unchangeable.

“The Personal Advent of Christ and the Resurrection of the Just, before the Millennium.

“The Earth restored to its Eden perfection and glory, the final inheritance of the Saints.

“Immortality alone through Christ, to be given to the Saints at the resurrection.”

3. “Fundamental Principles.” In 1872 the press at Battle Creek issued a pamphlet containing 25 propositions, unsigned. The introductory statement reads in part: “In presenting to the public this synopsis of our faith, we wish to have it distinctly understood that we have no articles of faith, creed, or discipline, aside from the Bible. We do not put forth this as having any authority with our people, nor is it designed to secure uniformity among them, as a system of faith, but is a brief statement of what is, and has been, with great unanimity, held by them” (“A Declaration of the Fundamental Principles Taught and Practiced by the Seventh-day Adventists,” p. 3).

These were reprinted in Signs of the Times (1:3, June 4, 1874); then in the last of four installments of Uriah Smith’s “The Seventh-day Adventists . . .” in the Review and Herald (44:171, Nov. 24, 1874); again in Signs of the Times (1:108, Jan. 28, 1875); it appeared as a pamphlet, both as “Fundamental Principles” and as part of the reprint of all four articles in 1875 and later, for example, in 1877—1878, 1884, and 1888, under the same or slightly varied titles, and with identical or similar introductions, declaring that Seventh-day Adventists “have no creed but the Bible; but they hold to certain well defined points of faith, for which they feel prepared to give a reason” (1875 Signs reprint, and 1877—1878 complete pamphlet).

In the 1889 Yearbook of the denomination, which was a larger volume than usual, containing general information about the church and its activities, these “Fundamental Principles” were included in a slightly revised and expanded form in 28 sections (pp. 147—151). This was not continued in subsequent issues, but it was inserted again in the Yearbook in 1905 and continued to appear through 1914.

Twenty-eight “Fundamental Principles,” “by the late Uriah Smith,” were reprinted in the Review and Herald (89:4, Aug. 22, 1912). They also appeared in pamphlet form as no. 5 of the Words of Truth Series, with 29 sections, the additional one being no. 14, on religious liberty.

4. Fundamental Beliefs-1931. On Dec. 29, 1930, the General Conference Committee voted that a statement of beliefs be prepared by a committee of four, including the General Conference president and the editor of the Review and Herald. This was printed first in the 1931 Yearbook and the next year in the Church Manual. At the 1946 General Conference session it was voted that it, as well as any other portion of the Church Manual, should be revised only at a General Conference session. This statement, entitled “Fundamental Beliefs of Seventh-day Adventists,” containing 22 sections, was still published with minor revisions in those two books until 1980. It was considered to be a summary of the principal features of Adventist beliefs.

5. Fundamental Beliefs-1980. During the General Conference session in 1980, in Dallas, Texas, the delegates from the world church approved a revised edition of the Statement of Fundamental Beliefs. The process of revision was initiated by the President’s Executive Advisory and went to the Church Manual Committee. The chair of the committee and the president of the General Conference, Robert H. Pierson, following a recommendation from PRADCO, appointed an ad hoc committee, chaired by W. Duncan Eva, to work on the revision of the document. The first revised draft of the statement was circulated among a group of theologians for their input. This document was taken to the Annual Council in 1979 and voted in principle to recommend it to the General Conference session for final approval. The Annual Council also recommended that the statement “receive wide exposure to the world field” and that written suggestion should be welcome. Consequently, the document was sent to members of the division committees, to all the unions in North America, and to all the union colleges of the church. In addition, the statement was published in the Adventist Review (157:8, Feb. 21, 1980), inviting church members “to consider it carefully and to send comments or suggestions” to the committee. For the first time in the history of the church, the world church was actually involved in the revision of the Statement of Fundamental Beliefs.

Copies of the statement, incorporating the suggestions received from the world fields, were sent to the delegates to the GC session six weeks before the session convened in the summer of 1980. The statement was extensively discussed during the session and finally approved by the delegates. This statement is published in the Church Manual and the Yearbook. In its introduction it is stated that the fundamental beliefs “constitute the church’s understanding and expression of the teaching of Scripture.” It is also affirmed that the church has no creed except the Bible. Following is the statement as it appears in the 1994 Yearbook (pp. 5—8):

“Seventh-day Adventists accept the Bible as their only creed and hold certain fundamental beliefs to be the teaching of the Holy Scriptures. These beliefs, as set forth here, constitute the church’s understanding and expression of the teaching of Scripture. Revision of these statements may be expected at a General Conference session when the church is led by the Holy Spirit to a fuller understanding of Bible truth or finds better language in which to express the teachings of God’s Holy Word.

1. The Holy Scriptures

“1. The Holy Scriptures

“The Holy Scriptures, Old and New Testaments, are the written Word of God, given by divine inspiration through holy men of God who spoke and wrote as they were moved by the Holy Spirit. In this Word, God has committed to man the knowledge necessary for salvation. The Holy Scriptures are the infallible revelation of His will. They are the standard of character, the test of experience, the authoritative revealer of doctrines, and the trustworthy record of God’s acts in history. (2 Peter 1:20, 21; 2 Tim. 3:16, 17; Ps. 119:105; Prov. 30:5, 6; Isa. 8:20; John 17:17; 1 Thess. 2:13; Heb. 4:12.)

2. The Trinity

“2. The Trinity

“There is one God: Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, a unity of three co-eternal Persons. God is immortal, all-powerful, all-knowing, above all, and ever present. He is infinite and beyond human comprehension, yet known through His self-revelation. He is forever worthy of worship, adoration, and service by the whole creation. (Deut. 6:4; Matt. 28:19; 2 Cor. 13:14; Eph. 4:4—6; 1 Peter 1:2; 1 Tim. 1:17; Rev. 14:7.)

3. The Father

“3. The Father

“God the Eternal Father is the Creator, Source, Sustainer, and Sovereign of all creation. He is just and holy, merciful and gracious, slow to anger, and abounding in steadfast love and faithfulness. The qualities and powers exhibited in the Son and the Holy Spirit are also revelations of the Father. (Gen. 1:1; Rev. 4:11; 1 Cor. 15:28; John 3:16; 1 John 4:8; 1 Tim. 1:17; Ex. 34:6, 7; John 14:9.)

4. The Son

“4. The Son

“God the eternal Son became incarnate in Jesus Christ. Through Him all things were created, the character of God is revealed, the salvation of humanity is accomplished, and the world is judged. Forever truly God, He became also truly man, Jesus the Christ. He was conceived of the Holy Spirit and born of the virgin Mary. He lived and experienced temptation as a human being, but perfectly exemplified the righteousness and love of God. By His miracles He manifested God’s power and was attested as God’s promised Messiah. He suffered and died voluntarily on the cross for our sins and in our place, was raised from the dead, and ascended to minister in the heavenly sanctuary in our behalf. He will come again in glory for the final deliverance of His people and the restoration of all things. (John 1:1—3, 14; Col. 1:15—19; John 10:30; 14:9; Rom. 6:23; 2 Cor. 5:17—19; John 5:22; Luke 1:35; Phil. 2:5—11; Heb. 2:9—18; 1 Cor. 15:3, 4; Heb. 8:1, 2; John 14:1—3.)

5. The Holy Spirit

“5. The Holy Spirit

“God the eternal Spirit was active with the Father and the Son in Creation, incarnation, and redemption. He inspired the writers of Scripture. He filled Christ’s life with power. He draws and convicts human beings; and those who respond He renews and transforms into the image of God. Sent by the Father and the Son to be always with His children, He extends spiritual gifts to the church, empowers it to bear witness to Christ, and in harmony with the Scriptures leads it into all truth. (Gen. 1:1, 2; Luke 1:35; 4:18; Acts 10:38; 2 Peter 1:21; 2 Cor. 3:18; Eph. 4:11, 12; Acts 1:8; John 14:16—18, 26; 15:26, 27; 16:7—13.)

6. Creation

“6. Creation

“God is Creator of all things, and has revealed in Scripture the authentic account of His creative activity. In six days the Lord made ‘the heaven and the earth’ and all living things upon the earth, and rested on the seventh day of that first week. Thus He established the Sabbath as a perpetual memorial of His completed creative work. The first man and woman were made in the image of God as the crowning work of Creation, given dominion over the world, and charged with responsibility to care for it. When the world was finished it was ‘very good,’ declaring the glory of God. (Gen. 1:2; Ex. 20:8—11; Ps. 19:1—6; 33:6, 9; 104; Heb. 11:3.)

7. The Nature of Man

“7. The Nature of Man

“Man and woman were made in the image of God with individuality, the power and freedom to think and to do. Though created free beings, each is an indivisible unity of body, mind, and spirit, dependent upon God for life and breath and all else. When our first parents disobeyed God, they denied their dependence upon Him and fell from their high position under God. The image of God in them was marred and they became subject to death. Their descendants share this fallen nature and its consequences. They are born with weaknesses and tendencies to evil. But God in Christ reconciled the world to Himself and by His Spirit restores in penitent mortals the image of their Maker. Created for the glory of God, they are called to love Him and one another, and to care for their environment. (Gen. 1:26—28; 2:7; Ps. 8:4—8; Acts 17:24—28; Gen. 3; Ps. 51:5; Rom. 5:12—17; 2 Cor. 5:19, 20; Ps. 51:10; 1 John 4:7, 8, 11, 20; Gen. 2:15.)

8. The Great Controversy

“8. The Great Controversy

“All humanity is now involved in a great controversy between Christ and Satan regarding the character of God, His law, and His sovereignty over the universe. This conflict originated in heaven when a created being, endowed with freedom of choice, in self-exaltation became Satan, God’s adversary, and led into rebellion a portion of the angels. He introduced the spirit of rebellion into this world when he led Adam and Eve into sin. This human sin resulted in the distortion of the image of God in humanity, the disordering of the created world, and its eventual devastation at the time of the worldwide flood. Observed by the whole creation, this world became the arena of the universal conflict, out of which the God of love will ultimately be vindicated. To assist His people in this controversy, Christ sends the Holy Spirit and the loyal angels to guide, protect, and sustain them in the way of salvation. (Rev. 12:4—9; Isa. 14:12—14; Eze. 28:12—18; Gen. 3; Rom. 1:19—32; 5:12—21; 8:19—22; Gen. 6—8; 2 Peter 3:6; 1 Cor. 4:9; Heb. 1:14.)

9. The Life, Death, and Resurrection of Christ

9. The Life, Death, and Resurrection of Christ

“In Christ’s life of perfect obedience to God’s will, His suffering, death, and resurrection, God provided the only means of atonement for human sin, so that those who by faith accept this atonement may have eternal life, and the whole creation may better understand the infinite and holy love of the Creator. This perfect atonement vindicates the righteousness of God’s law and the graciousness of His character; for it both condemns our sin and provides for our forgiveness. The death of Christ is substitutionary and expiatory, reconciling and transforming. The resurrection of Christ proclaims God’s triumph over the forces of evil, and for those who accept the atonement assures their final victory over sin and death. It declares the Lordship of Jesus Christ, before whom every knee in heaven and on earth will bow. (John 3:16; Isa. 53; 1 Peter 2:21, 22; 1 Cor. 15:3, 4, 20—22; 2 Cor. 5:14, 15, 19—21; Rom. 1:4; 3:25; 4:25; 8:3, 4; 1 John 2:2; 4:10; Col. 2:15; Phil. 2:6—11.)

10. The Experience of Salvation

“10. The Experience of Salvation

“In infinite love and mercy God made Christ, who knew no sin, to be sin for us, so that in Him we might be made the righteousness of God. Led by the Holy Spirit we sense our need, acknowledge our sinfulness, repent of our transgressions, and exercise faith in Jesus as Lord and Christ, as Substitute and Example. This faith which receives salvation comes through the divine power of the Word and is the gift of God's grace. Through Christ we are justified, adopted as God's sons and daughters, and delivered from the lordship of sin. Through the Spirit we are born again and sanctified; the Spirit renews our minds, writes God's law of love in our hearts, and we are given the power to live a holy life. Abiding in Him we become partakers of the divine nature and have the assurance of salvation now and in the judgment. (2 Cor. 5:17—21; John 3:16; Gal. 1:4; 4:4—7; Titus 3:3—7; John 16:8; Gal. 3:13, 14; 1 Peter 2:21, 22; Rom. 10:17; Luke 17:5; Mark 9:23, 24; Eph. 2:5—10; Rom. 3:21—26; Col. 1:13, 14; Rom. 8:14—17; Gal. 3:26; John 3:3—8; 1 Peter 1:23; Rom. 12:2; Heb. 8:7—12; Eze. 36:25—27; 2 Peter 1:3, 4; Rom. 8:1—4; 5:6—10.)

11. The Church

“11. The Church

“The church is the community of believers who confess Jesus Christ as Lord and Saviour. In continuity with the people of God in Old Testament times, we are called out from the world; and we join together for worship, for fellowship, for instruction in the Word, for the celebration of the Lord's Supper, for service to all mankind, and for the worldwide proclamation of the gospel. The church derives its authority from Christ, who is the incarnate Word, and from the Scriptures, which are the written Word. The church is God's family; adopted by Him as children, its members live on the basis of the new covenant. The church is the body of Christ, a community of faith of which Christ Himself is the Head. The church is the bride for whom Christ died that He might sanctify and cleanse her. At His return in triumph, He will present her to Himself a glorious church, the faithful of all the ages, the purchase of His blood, not having spot or wrinkle, but holy and without blemish. (Gen. 12:3; Acts 7:38; Eph. 4:11—15; 3:8—11; Matt. 28:19, 20; 16:13—20; 18:18; Eph. 2:19—22; 1:22, 23; 5:23—27; Col. 1:17, 18.)

12. The Remnant and Its Mission

“12. The Remnant and Its Mission

“The universal church is composed of all who truly believe in Christ, but in the last days, a time of widespread apostasy, a remnant has been called out to keep the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus. This remnant announces the arrival of the judgment hour, proclaims salvation through Christ, and heralds the approach of His second advent. This proclamation is symbolized by the three angels of Revelation 14; it coincides with the work of judgment in heaven and results in a work of repentance and reform on earth. Every believer is called to have a personal part in this worldwide witness. (Rev. 12:17; 14:6—12; 18:1—4; 2 Cor. 5:10; Jude 3, 14; 1 Peter 1:16—19; 2 Peter 3:10—14; Rev. 21:1—14.)

13. Unity in the Body of Christ

“13. Unity in the Body of Christ

“The church is one body with many members, called from every nation, kindred, tongue, and people. In Christ we are a new creation; distinctions of race, culture, learning, and nationality, and differences between high and low, rich and poor, male and female, must not be divisive among us. We are all equal in Christ, who by one Spirit has bonded us into one fellowship with Him and with one another; we are to serve and be served without partiality or reservation. Through the revelation of Jesus Christ in the Scriptures we share the same faith and hope, and reach out in one witness to all. This unity has its source in the oneness of the triune God, who has adopted us as His children. (Rom. 12:4, 5; 1 Cor. 12:12—14; Matt. 28:19, 20; Ps. 133:1; 2 Cor. 5:16, 17; Acts 17:26, 27; Gal. 3:27, 29; Col. 3:10—15; Eph. 4:14—16; 4:1—6; John 17:20—23.)

14. Baptism

“14. Baptism

“By baptism we confess our faith in the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ, and testify of our death to sin and of our purpose to walk in newness of life. Thus we acknowledge Christ as Lord and Saviour, become His people, and are received as members by His church. Baptism is a symbol of our union with Christ, the forgiveness of our sins, and our reception of the Holy Spirit. It is by immersion in water and is contingent on an affirmation of faith in Jesus and evidence of repentance of sin. It follows instruction in the Holy Scriptures and acceptance of their teachings. (Rom. 6:1—6; Col. 2:12, 13; Acts 16:30—33; 22:16; 2:38; Matt. 28:19, 20.)

15. The Lord’s Supper

“15. The Lord’s Supper

“The Lord’s Supper is a participation in the emblems of the body and blood of Jesus as an expression of faith in Him, our Lord and Saviour. In this experience of communion Christ is present to meet and strengthen His people. As we partake, we joyfully proclaim the Lord’s death until He comes again. Preparation for the Supper includes self-examination, repentance, and confession. The Master ordained the service of foot washing to signify renewed cleansing, to express a willingness to serve one another in Christlike humility, and to unite our hearts in love. The Communion service is open to all believing Christians. (1 Cor. 10:16, 17; 11:23—30; Matt. 26:17—30; Rev. 3:20; John 6:48-63; 13:1-17.)

16. Spiritual Gifts and Ministries

“16. Spiritual Gifts and Ministries

“God bestows upon all members of His church in every age spiritual gifts which each member is to employ in loving ministry for the common good of the church and of humanity. Given by the agency of the Holy Spirit, who apportions to each member as He wills, the gifts provide all abilities and ministries needed by the church to fulfill its divinely ordained functions. According to the Scriptures, these gifts include such ministries as faith, healing, prophecy, proclamation, teaching, administration, reconciliation, compassion, and self-sacrificing service and charity for the help and encouragement of people. Some members are called of God and endowed by the Spirit for functions recognized by the church in pastoral, evangelistic, apostolic, and teaching ministries particularly needed to equip the members for service, to build up the church to spiritual maturity, and to foster unity of the faith and knowledge of God. When members employ these spiritual gifts as faithful stewards of God's varied grace, the church is protected from the destructive influence of false doctrine, grows with a growth that is from God, and is built up in faith and love. (Rom. 12:4—8; 1 Cor. 12:9—11, 27, 28; Eph. 4:8, 11—16; Acts 6:1—7; 1 Tim. 3:1—13; 1 Peter 4:10, 11.)

17. The Gift of Prophecy

“17. The Gift of Prophecy

“One of the gifts of the Holy Spirit is prophecy. This gift is an identifying mark of the remnant church and was manifested in the ministry of Ellen G. White. As the Lord's messenger, her writings are a continuing and authoritative source of truth which provide for the church comfort, guidance, instruction, and correction. They also make clear that the Bible is the standard by which all teaching and experience must be tested. (Joel 2:28, 29; Acts 2:14—21; Heb. 1:1—3; Rev. 12:17; 19:10.)

18. The Law of God

“18. The Law of God

“The great principles of God's law are embodied in the Ten Commandments and exemplified in the life of Christ. They express God's love, will, and purposes concerning human conduct and relationships and are binding upon all people in every age. These precepts are the basis of God's covenant with His people and the standard in God's judgment. Through the agency of the Holy Spirit they point out sin and awaken a sense of need for a Saviour. Salvation is all of grace and not of works, but its fruitage is obedience to the Commandments. This obedience develops Christian character and results in a sense of well-being. It is an evidence of our love for the Lord and our concern for our fellowmen. The obedience of faith demonstrates the power of Christ to transform lives, and therefore strengthens Christian witness. (Ex. 20:1—17; Ps. 40:7, 8; Matt. 22:36—40; Deut. 28:1—14; Matt. 5:17—20; Heb. 8:8—10; John 15:7—10; Eph. 2:8—10; 1 John 5:3; Rom. 8:3, 4; Ps. 19:7—14.)

19. The Sabbath

“19. The Sabbath

“The beneficent Creator, after the six days of Creation, rested on the seventh day and instituted the Sabbath for all people as a memorial of Creation. The fourth commandment of God's unchangeable law requires the observance of this seventh-day Sabbath as the day of rest, worship, and ministry in harmony with the teaching and practice of Jesus, the Lord of the Sabbath. The Sabbath is a day of delightful communion with God and one another. It is a symbol of our redemption in Christ, a sign of our sanctification, a token of our allegiance, and a foretaste of our eternal future in God's kingdom. The Sabbath is God's perpetual sign of His eternal covenant between Him and His people. Joyful observance of this holy time from evening to evening, sunset to sunset, is a celebration of God's creative and redemptive acts. (Gen. 2:1—3; Ex. 20:8—11; Luke 4:16; Isa. 56:5, 6; 58:13, 14; Matt. 12:1—12; Ex. 31:13—17; Eze. 20:12, 20; Deut. 5:12—15; Heb. 4:1—11; Lev. 23:32; Mark 1:32.)

20. Stewardship

“We are God’s stewards, entrusted by Him with time and opportunities, abilities and possessions, and the blessings of the earth and its resources. We are responsible to Him for their proper use. We acknowledge God’s ownership by faithful service to Him and our fellowmen, and by returning tithes and giving offerings for the proclamation of His gospel and the support and growth of His church. Stewardship is a privilege given to us by God for nurture in love and the victory over selfishness and covetousness. The steward rejoices in the blessings that come to others as a result of his faithfulness. (Gen. 1:26—28; 2:15; 1 Chron. 29:14; Hag. 1:3—11; Mal. 3:8—12; 1 Cor. 9:9—14; Matt. 23:23; 2 Cor. 8:1—15; Rom. 15:26, 27.)

21. Christian Behavior

“21. Christian Behavior

“We are called to be a godly people who think, feel, and act in harmony with the principles of heaven. For the Spirit to re-create in us the character of our Lord we involve ourselves only in those things which will produce Christlike purity, health, and joy in our lives. This means that our amusement and entertainment should meet the highest standards of Christian taste and beauty. While recognizing cultural differences, our dress is to be simple, modest, and neat, befitting those whose true beauty does not consist of outward adornment but in the imperishable ornament of a gentle and quiet spirit. It also means that because our bodies are the temples of the Holy Spirit, we are to care for them intelligently. Along with adequate exercise and rest, we are to adopt the most healthful diet possible and abstain from the unclean foods identified in the Scriptures. Since alcoholic beverages, tobacco, and the irresponsible use of drugs and narcotics are harmful to our bodies, we are to abstain from them as well. Instead, we are to engage in whatever brings our thoughts and bodies into the discipline of Christ, who desires our wholesomeness, joy, and goodness. (Rom. 12:1, 2; 1 John 2:6; Eph. 5:1—21; Phil. 4:8; 2 Cor. 10:5; 6:14—7:1; 1 Peter 3:1—4; 1 Cor. 6:19, 20; 10:31; Lev. 11:1—47; 3 John 2.)

22. Marriage and the Family

“22. Marriage and the Family

“Marriage was divinely established in Eden and affirmed by Jesus to be a lifelong union between a man and a woman in loving companionship. For the Christian a marriage commitment is to God as well as to the spouse, and should be entered into only between partners who share a common faith. Mutual love, honor, respect, and responsibility are the fabric of this relationship, which is to reflect the love, sanctity, closeness, and permanence of the relationship between Christ and His church. Regarding divorce, Jesus taught that the person who divorces a spouse, except for fornication, and marries another, commits adultery. Although some family relationships may fall short of the ideal, marriage partners who fully commit themselves to each other in Christ may achieve loving unity through the guidance of the Spirit and the nurture of the church. God blesses the family and intends that its members shall assist each other toward complete maturity. Parents are to bring up their children to love and obey the Lord. By their example and their words they are to teach them that Christ is a loving disciplinarian, ever tender and caring, who wants them to become members of His body, the family of God. Increasing family closeness is one of the earmarks of the final gospel message. (Gen. 2:18—25; Matt. 19:3—9; John 2:1—11; 2 Cor. 6:14; Eph. 5:21—33; Matt. 5:31, 32; Mark 10:11, 12; Luke 16:18; 1 Cor. 7:10, 11; Ex. 20:12; Eph. 6:1—4; Deut. 6:5—9; Prov. 22:6; Mal. 4:5, 6.)

23. Christ's Ministry in the Heavenly Sanctuary

“23. Christ's Ministry in the Heavenly Sanctuary

“There is a sanctuary in heaven, the true tabernacle which the Lord set up and not man. In it Christ ministers on our behalf, making available to believers the benefits of His atoning sacrifice offered once for all on the cross. He was inaugurated as our great High Priest and began His intercessory ministry at the time of His ascension. In 1844, at the end of the prophetic period of 2300 days, He entered the second and last phase of His atoning ministry. It is a work of investigative judgment which is part of the ultimate disposition of all sin, typified by the cleansing of the ancient Hebrew sanctuary on the Day of Atonement. In that typical service the sanctuary was cleansed with the blood of animal sacrifices, but the heavenly things are purified with the perfect sacrifice of the blood of Jesus. The investigative judgment reveals to heavenly intelligences who among the dead are asleep in Christ and therefore, in Him, are deemed worthy to have part in the first resurrection. It also makes manifest who among the living are abiding in Christ, keeping the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus, and in Him, therefore, are ready for translation into His everlasting kingdom. This judgment vindicates the justice of God in saving those who believe in Jesus. It declares that those who have remained loyal to God shall receive the kingdom. The completion of this ministry of Christ will mark the close of human probation before the Second Advent. (Heb. 8:1—5; 4:14—16; 9:11—28; 10:19—22; 1:3; 2:16, 17; Dan. 7:9—27; 8:13, 14; 9:24—27; Num. 14:34; Eze. 4:6; Lev. 16; Rev. 14:6, 7; 20:12; 14:12; 22:12.)

24. The Second Coming of Christ

“24. The Second Coming of Christ

“The second coming of Christ is the blessed hope of the church, the grand climax of the gospel. The Saviour's coming will be literal, personal, visible, and worldwide. When He returns, the righteous dead will be resurrected, and together with the righteous living will be glorified and taken to heaven, but the unrighteous will die. The almost complete fulfillment of most lines of prophecy, together with the present condition of the world, indicates that Christ's coming is imminent. The time of that event has not been revealed, and we are therefore exhorted to be ready at all times. (Titus 2:13; Heb. 9:28; John 14:1—3; Acts 1:9—11; Matt. 24:14; Rev. 1:7; Matt. 24:43, 44; 1 Thess. 4:13—18; 1 Cor. 15:51—54; 2 Thess. 1:7—10; 2:8; Rev. 14:14—20; 19:11—21; Matt. 24; Mark 13; Luke 21; 2 Tim. 3:1—5; 1 Thess. 5:1—6.)

25. Death and Resurrection

“25. Death and Resurrection

“The wages of sin is death. But God, who alone is immortal, will grant eternal life to His redeemed. Until that day death is an unconscious state for all people. When Christ, who is our life, appears, the resurrected righteous and the living righteous will be glorified and caught up to meet their Lord. The second resurrection, the resurrection of the unrighteous, will take place a thousand years later. (Rom. 6:23; 1 Tim. 6:15, 16; Eccl. 9:5, 6; Ps. 146:3, 4; John 11:11—14; Col. 3:4; 1 Cor. 15:51—54; 1 Thess. 4:13—17; John 5:28, 29; Rev. 20:1—10.)

26. The Millennium and the End of Sin

“26. The Millennium and the End of Sin

“The millennium is the thousand-year reign of Christ with His saints in heaven between the first and second resurrections. During this time the wicked dead will be judged; the earth will be utterly desolate, without living human inhabitants, but occupied by Satan and his angels. At its close Christ with His saints and the Holy City will descend from heaven to earth. The unrighteous dead will then be resurrected, and with Satan and his angels will surround the city; but fire from God will consume them and cleanse the earth. The universe will thus be freed of sin and sinners forever. (Rev. 20; 1 Cor. 6:2, 3; Jer. 4:23—26; Rev. 21:1—5; Mal. 4:1; Eze. 28:18, 19.)

27. The New Earth

“27. The New Earth

“On the new earth, in which righteousness dwells, God will provide an eternal home for the redeemed and a perfect environment for everlasting life, love, joy, and learning in His presence. For here God Himself will dwell with His people, and suffering and death will have passed away. The great controversy will be ended, and sin will be no more. All things, animate and inanimate, will declare that God is love; and He shall reign forever. Amen. (2 Peter 3:13; Isa. 35; 65:17—25; Matt. 5:5; Rev. 21:1—7; 22:1—5; 11:15.)”

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. When Charles Moulton, a Jamaican, came to the Dominican Republic from Puerto Rico in 1907 as a colporteur, he found seven Sabbathkeepers already there. In 1908 a Sabbath school was organized at Central Consuelo, and the first Dominican converts, María Williams, her six sons, and a daughter, were baptized. The two older children, James and John, later became workers for the church. James became a colporteur and later a minister, and was the first to carry the SDA teachings to the south of the country. The second Sabbath school was organized about 1909 at a place called Cruz de Mendoza in the capital city of Santo Domingo, where Charles Moulton had worked as a colporteur and self-supporting minister. His first convert in that city was Casiano Carrión.

The first Seventh-day Adventist church was organized in the city of Santo Domingo in 1917, when H. D. Casebeer arrived to take charge of the work. Two years later the first church-owned building in Santo Domingo was erected at 89 Avenida Mella. On that same site a new church with seating capacity for 500 was built in 1962.

In 1918 Moulton went to the region of Cibao and began preaching in Santiago de los Caballeros. He later took up residence in Moca. His work there resulted in the organization of the second SDA church in the Dominican Republic, at Jábaba, in 1921. Its charter members included Luis Gómez and his family.

In 1922 James Phipps and his wife, national converts, went to Barahona to establish a primary school. With their help in April 1924, 16 persons were baptized and a church was organized. Among the converts were Andrea de González and her two daughters, Leonela and Caridad, who years before had bought SDA publications from James Williams. Another of the members baptized into the new group was Adolfo Moretta, who became a worker for the church.

Probably the first SDAs in San Juan de la Maguana were the Milanés family. Later a layperson, George Ogando, was sent there to preach, and in 1942 the San Juan church was organized.

Organization and Growth. The early SDA work in the Dominican Republic was administered from Puerto Rico. In 1924 the Dominican Mission (Santo Domingo Mission) was organized, with William Steele as its first superintendent. At that time there were 147 members in two organized churches. During Steele's administration O. A. Jones and his wife divided the city of Santo Domingo into several zones and founded numerous branch Sabbath schools, as a means of evangelism. In 1929 Peter Nygaard became the mission president. By 1936 the church membership reached 743 in 10 organized churches. In 1943 there were 21 organized churches, with 1,559 members. In 1950 there were 23 church groups and 2,000 members; in 1961 there were 40 organized churches and 3,998 members. The year 1962 saw a remarkable advance of the SDA Church in the Dominican Republic, when by the end of that year the membership of the mission reached 5,248.

In 1964, 32 of the 40 churches met in their own church buildings. The Voice of Prophecy radio program was transmitted weekly over three stations, and there were several thousand active members enrolled in the radio Bible correspondence school.

On Aug. 1, 1963, the Dominican Mission achieved conference status and became the Dominican Conference, with Gabriel Castro as the first president. On Jan. 1, 1964, Eligio González became president.

At a special biennial session held on Jan. 1, 1972, the Dominican Conference was reorganized as the Central Dominican Conference and the North Dominican Mission. The Central Dominican Conference was established with 47 churches and 9,297 members. Its first president was E. Galvá. The North Dominican Mission was established with 30 churches and 4,242 members. Its first president was J. Espinosa. At the end of 1973 there were 52 churches, with 11,566 members, who contributed a total of $272,461.93 in tithe in the Central Dominican Conference; and 36 churches, with 6,749 members, who contributed a total of $100,813.34 in the North Dominican Mission.

In July of 1990 the North Dominican Mission was reorganized as the North Dominican Conference with 73 churches, and 21,614 members, with Oreste Natera as the first president.

On July 7, 1986, the South Dominican Mission, with 23 churches and 5,432 members, was organized. Diógenes Suero was the first president.

At a special session held in July 1990 the Central Dominican Conference was reorganized as the Central Dominican Conference and the East Dominican Mission. The East Dominican Mission was established in July 1990 with 45 churches and 12,918 members. Its first president was Feliberto Martínez.

At the end of 1992 there were 119 churches, with 32,515 members, who contributed a total of $1,431,876.06 in tithe in the Central Dominican Conference, and 56 churches, with 16,231 members, who contributed a total of $474,920.29 tithe in the East Dominican Mission.

In January 1994 the Antillian Union was reorganized into two unions: the Puerto Rico Union Conference and the Dominican Union Mission.

Dorcas Societies

DORCAS SOCIETIES. An organization of Seventh-day Adventist women established to minister to those in sickness and want. Its work and name were inspired by the life of Tabitha, or Dorcas (Acts 9:36). The first society (called “Dorcas and Benevolent Association”) was formed in October 1874 and developed from a prayer band meeting in the home of Mrs. Henry Gardner in Battle Creek, Michigan. Eight women became charter members, and Mrs. George Amadon (daughter of the first General Conference president, John Byington) was the first president. When the Dime Tabernacle was dedicated (1878), society meetings were held in the northwest belfry. Activities included making garments and supplying food for needy families, caring for the fatherless and widows, and ministering to the sick. This pattern was followed by other churches in America and across the seas. With the organization of the Home Missionary Department in 1913, Dorcas Society work came under that department’s direction.

Every church is encouraged to organize a Dorcas Society. By 1973 there were 10,425 societies in operation. Although the downplaying of reporting in recent years makes it impossible to give current statistics, the number continues to grow. Local officers include a leader, who is a member of the church board and of the Church Evangelism Council, and a secretary-treasurer. Membership is open to all ages and is not confined to church members.

Objectives and Services. The objective of the Dorcas Society is to help people physically and spiritually, in the name and spirit of Jesus. Its concern is for every case of need, irrespective of creed, class, nationality, or ethnic origin. The society attempts to meet emergency needs not provided by other agencies. The repair and distribution of good clothing is a specialty; surplus supplies are shipped abroad through ADRA. In addition to continuing services, it carries on occasional projects, such as supplying shoes for needy children and sending disadvantaged children to summer camps.

Each society is encouraged to secure at least one room for use as a welfare unit. It should provide work space and a place for storage of emergency supplies, including a reserve of clothing, blankets, food, etc., for use in disaster-relief service. Materials and funds are donated, and service is voluntary. Where the local church operates a Community Services center the society supplies a major part of the working force.

Federations. In 1934 the first Dorcas Welfare Federation was formed by the churches of the Chicago, Illinois, area. Such federations, composed of the individual Dorcas Societies and Community Services center personnel of a given area within the conference, offer opportunity for exchanging ideas, sharing experiences, combining forces in common projects, and unifying Community Services activities. Although such federations originated locally and are formed by local societies in counsel with pastors and conference lay activities secretaries, the General Conference Lay Activities Department has offered guidance and encouragement. Mrs. Grace D. Mace, who served the department for 28 years, first as office secretary and later as assistant secretary, played a major part in guiding the development of the Dorcas Welfare Societies and their organization into federations.

The federation exercises no authority over its constituent Dorcas Societies and centers, which work under the direction of their individual church officers. Federation officers are elected biennially.

Many conferences also appoint a conference federation president, who assists the conference lay activities secretary in directing Community Services activities for the entire conference.

The 1964 Fall Council recommended that a substantial portion of the church welfare fund be made available by the church board to the Dorcas Welfare Society for exclusive use in health and welfare projects benefiting non-SDA indigent families and disaster victims in the community.

The 1978 Annual Council recommended that a minimum of 30 percent of all solicited Ingathering Reversion funds returned to conferences be assigned to conference- or church-sponsored Community Services projects, including building or renting Community Services centers and the expense of operating these centers.

Dress

DRESS. Seventh-day Adventists advocate neatness and simplicity in dress in harmony with good taste, and the avoidance of fashions that are detrimental to health. These principles have been summarized by Ellen White as follows: “I beg of our people to walk carefully and circumspectly before God. Follow the customs in dress so far as they conform to health principles. Let our sisters dress plainly, as many do, having the dress of good, durable material, appropriate for this age, and let not the dress question fill the mind. Our sisters should dress with simplicity. They should clothe themselves in modest apparel, with shamefacedness and sobriety. Give to the world a living illustration of the inward adorning of the grace of God” (CG 414).

Since early in their history Seventh-day Adventists have spoken out against improper dress. The editor of the Review and Herald inserted in the July 10, 1855, issue John Wesley’s pronouncement on the evils of improper dress. At a conference held at Battle Creek, Michigan, May 27, 1856, Mrs. White delivered a message deploring the “conformity of some professed Sabbathkeepers to the world.” These, she said, “have a disposition to dress and act as much like the world as possible, and yet go to heaven” (1T 131).

In 1858 John Byington, later elected first president of the General Conference, wrote: “Are sleeves which are largest at the little end, and round tires like the moon, (or hoops,) [Isa. iii, 18] articles of dress that are modest apparel? 1 Tim. ii, 9. If so, let them be recommended to the church generally.”

These positions were taken at a time when the styles of women’s dresses were unhealthful and extravagant. It was the day of the hoop skirt, trailing skirts, bustles, and whalebone corsets. Many besides SDAs were protesting against the fashions of the day. For example, M. Angeline Merritt, writing in 1852, declared in Dress Reform Practically and Physiologically Considered: “Every lady who has any experience in domestic life must understand the abundant inconvenience attendant upon a style of dress, the dimensions of whose superfluties may be adduced in yards and pounds. The utility of skirts for sweeping floors and sidewalks, and for mopping stairways and passages, has become a proverb” (p. 79).

In 1862 Ellen Beard Harman, another dress reformer, wrote in Dress Reform: Its Physiology and Moral Bearings: “Viewed in any aspect, the common style of dress for women is one of the greatest barbarisms ever known, especially considering the age in which we live. Only think of the women of the nineteenth century wearing apparel incompatible with the laws of their being—with health, comfort, and convenience, protection and neatness, disproportioned to the body, awkward and burdensome!” (p. 26).

In an endeavor to correct these evils, some reformers went to extremes in the invention of dress styles so radically different as to be offensive to good taste. One of the more popular such fashions became known as the “American costume,” invented by a Ms. Austin, which has been described as being composed of mannish trousers covering the legs with a dress coming to the knees, and in some cases coming to midway between the hips and the knees.

It was against both the extravagances of the prevailing dress styles and the fanatical extremes of some of the dress reformers that Ellen G. White wrote: “No occasion should be given to unbelievers to reproach our faith. We are considered odd and singular, and should not take a course to lead unbelievers to think us more so than our faith requires us to be.

“Some who believe the truth may think that it would be more healthful for the sisters to adopt the American costume, yet if that mode of dress would cripple our influence among unbelievers so that we could not so readily gain access to them, we should by no means adopt it, though we suffered much in consequence. But some are deceived in thinking there is so much benefit to be received from this costume. While it may prove a benefit to some, it is an injury to others.

“I saw that God’s order has been reversed, and His special directions disregarded, by those who adopt the American costume. I was referred to Deuteronomy 22:5: ‘The woman shall not wear that which pertaineth unto a man, neither shall a man put on a woman’s garment: for all that do so are abomination unto the Lord thy God.’

“God would not have His people adopt the so-called reform dress. It is immodest apparel, wholly unfitted for the modest, humble followers of Christ” (1T 420, 421).

Seventh-day Adventists have considered proper Christian dress and ornamentation so important that a statement to that effect was included in the fundamental beliefs published in 1889: “XV. That the Scriptures insist upon plainness and modesty of attire as a prominent mark of discipleship in those who profess to be the followers of Him who was ‘meek and lowly in heart,’ that the wearing of gold, pearls, and costly array, or anything designed merely to adorn the person and foster the pride of the natural heart, is to be discarded, according to such scriptures as 1 Tim. 2:9, 10; 1 Peter 3:3, 4” (SDA Yearbook [1889], p. 150).

In the Statement of Fundamental Beliefs prepared by the Battle Creek church in 1894 the same ideas were expressed in a slightly modified form: “That the Scriptures insist upon plain and modest attire as a mark of discipleship in those who profess to be followers of Christ, and therefore that the wearing of gold, pearls, and costly array, merely for adornment, is contrary to Scriptures, and should not be indulged in by Christians.”

The Statement of Fundamental Beliefs of 1931, although using a more general language, still expressed clearly the church’s positions on this subject: “17. That the followers of Christ should be a godly people, not adopting the unholy maxims nor conforming to the unrighteous ways of the world, not loving its sinful pleasures nor countenancing its follies. That the believer should recognize his body as the temple of the Holy Spirit, and that therefore he should clothe that body in neat, modest, dignified apparel” (SDA Yearbook [1931], p. 379).

A year later the Church Manual (1932) dealt with the subject in a more explicit way. Among a list of principles of Seventh-day Adventism to be accepted by candidates for baptism the individual was to be asked: “17. In matters of dress will you follow the Bible rule of plainness and simplicity, abstaining from the wearing of gold as ornaments and costly array, observing the principles of modesty and Christian dignity?” (p. 78).

The revised Statement of Fundamental Beliefs approved during the 1980 General Conference session in Dallas, Texas, include, under the section entitled Christian Behaviour, this sentence: “While recognizing cultural differences, our dress is to be simple, modest, and neat, befitting those whose true beauty does not consist of outward adornment but in the imperishable ornament of a gentle and quiet spirit” (SDA Yearbook [1981], p. 7).

The statement was interested, like the previous one, in general principles. The more specific details were published in the Church Manual (1990). Relative to dress, it states: “Christians should avoid gaudy display and ‘profuse ornamentation.’ Clothing should be, when possible, ‘of good quality, of becoming colors, and suited for service. It should be chosen for durability rather than display.’ Our attire should be characterized by ‘beauty,’ ‘modest grace,’ and ‘appropriateness of natural simplicity (Messages to Young People, pp. 351, 352). That it may not be conspicuous, it should follow the conservative and most sensible styles of the time.

“The adoption of fads and extreme fashions in men’s or women’s dress indicates a lack of attention to serious matters. Regardless of how sensibly people generally may dress, there are always extremes in style that transgress the laws of modesty, and thus have a direct bearing on the prevalence of immoral conditions. Many who blindly follow the styles are at least partly unconscious of these effects, but the results are no less disastrous. The people of God should always be found among the conservatives in dress, and will not let ‘the dress question fill the mind’ (Evangelism, p. 273). They will not be the first to adopt the new styles of dress or the last to lay the old aside” (p. 143).

On the matter of adornment, referring to jewelry and ornaments, the Church Manual continues with this summary: “‘To dress plainly, abstaining from display of jewelry and ornaments of every kind, is in keeping with our faith’ (Testimonies, vol. 3, p. 366). It is clearly taught in the Scriptures that the wearing of jewelry is contrary to the will of God. ‘Not with broided hair, or gold, or pearls, or costly array’ is the admonition of the apostle Paul (1 Tim. 2:9). The wearing of ornaments of jewelry is a bid for attention which is not in keeping with Christian self-forgetfulness. . . .

“Let us remember that it is not the ‘outward adorning’ which expresses true Christian character, but ‘the hidden man of the heart . . . a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price’ (1 Peter 3:3, 4). The use of cosmetics not in keeping with good taste and the principles of Christian modesty should be avoided. Cleanliness and Christlike deportment should be observed in the care and grooming of the individual who is seeking at all times to please and rightly represent Christ our Lord” (pp. 143, 144).

The wedding ring has never been condemned by the church in countries in which the ring was considered to be a criterion of virtue, a symbol of a commitment and not an ornament (ibid., pp. 143, 144). In these countries it is considered imperative for married persons to wear a wedding band. Until recently, this was not regarded to be the case in the North American Division. However, changes in the understanding of the function of the wedding ring among church members in this division led the leaders to vote, in 1986, “to recognize that, in harmony with the position stated in the Church Manual (pp. 145, 146 [1986]), some church members in the North American Division as in other parts of the world feel that wearing a simple marriage band is a symbol of faithfulness to the marriage vow and to declare that such persons should be fully accepted in the fellowship and service of the church” (Adventist Review 165:31, Aug. 4, 1988).

In recent times many simpler and more healthful dress styles have been promoted, and the question of dress has become less of an issue among Seventh-day Adventists, but SDAs still are encouraged to dress in a manner that befits Christians, particularly Christians who are aware that they are living in the time of the final day of atonement (Ex. 33:5, 6; Lev. 16:29, 30).

Drew, George R.

DREW, GEORGE R. (1835—1905). Pioneer colporteur and ship missionary in England. He was an Englishman, who, after 15 years as sailor and ship captain, heard the Seventh-day Adventist message and accepted it while in San Francisco Harbor. For seven years he stayed in California studying the Bible and spreading his new faith. In 1882 he returned to England with John Loughborough and a group of SDA workers and engaged in the sale of publications and in ship missionary work at Liverpool. One of his first contacts was with a Finnish sea captain, A. F. Lundqvist, who is credited with introducing SDA work into Finland.

Drinhaus, Paul

DRINHAUS, PAUL (1886—1930). Evangelist and administrator in Germany. He was born of Seventh-day Adventist parentage and educated at Friedensau Missionary Seminary. Upon graduation, he preached throughout Germany. He became president of the Saxon Conference in 1913, president of the West German Union in 1918, home missionary secretary of the European Division in 1926, and president of the East German Union in 1927. On a trip in West Africa, during which he investigated the opportunities of opening new work in Liberia, he died of malaria.

DRINHAUS, PETER (1889—1950). Pastor, missionary. Born in Germany, he was trained at Friedensau Missionary Seminary, did pastoral work in Germany for several years, then went in 1914 as a missionary to German East Africa, where he was interned during World War I. He returned to Germany, and in 1921 went to the Netherlands East Indies Union Mission, of which he later became president. In 1940 he was again interned, spending time in Java, Sumatra, and India, and upon his release in 1946 went to the United States. For a short time (1947—1948) he was pastor of the Brooklyn, New York, German church, then retired because of ill health.

DRUILLARD, ALMA (d. 1903). Early colporteur, missionary in South Africa. A businessman from the midwestern United States, he joined the Seventh-day Adventist Church about 1879, and entered colporteur work. In 1889 he and his wife, Nellie H., went to South Africa, where he worked for nearly six years, and where he is reported to have been a “favorite missionary” of Cecil Rhodes and Dr. L. Jameson. After his return to the United States in 1896, he served as treasurer of Boulder Sanitarium for several years. About 1901 he was on the staff of Emmanuel Missionary College.

Druillard, Nellie Helen (Rankin)

DRUILLARD, NELLIE HELEN (RANKIN) (1844—1937). Founder of Riverside Sanitarium, cofounder of Madison College, financier. She was a member of the Rankin family that furnished a number of women church workers. A graduate of Wisconsin State Normal College, she superintended Boulder, Colorado, and Furnas County, Nebraska, public schools. Later she worked at Battle Creek Sanitarium. She was married to Alma Druillard, a businessman of means. In 1886 she served as Tract Society secretary in the Nebraska Conference, and in 1888 as treasurer of the Nebraska Conference. In 1889 she and her husband went to South Africa. While there she was treasurer and auditor of the conference and secretary of the Tract Society. She spent her spare time as a nurse in a small sanitarium opened by the Wessels family. She was also secretary of the South African Woman's Christian Temperance Union. Upon return to the United States in 1896, she served as matron and accountant for the Boulder Sanitarium, where her husband was treasurer. Later she served as treasurer of Emmanuel Missionary College until 1903.

In 1904, at the age of 60, she became one of the founders of a school. When her nephew, E. A. Sutherland, and Percy T. Magan, a young man to whose education she had contributed financially, left their positions at Emmanuel Missionary College to go South, she joined them in establishing a school at Madison, Tennessee (see Madison Institutions). She lent the money for the purchase of the land, and for 20 years afterward was the institution's treasurer and fiscal adviser. She was the organizer of the Madison Sanitarium and its School of Practical Nursing, in which she was the first instructor. At the age of 78 she was injured in an automobile accident in California, and while recuperating, she determined to do something specific for the Blacks in the southern United States. Returning to Tennessee, she established Riverside Sanitarium and School of Nursing and devoted more than 10 years of her life to its development before transferring it to General Conference management. Two years before her death she retired to the campus of Madison College and there, to the last days of her life, attended board meetings and counseled self-supporting institutions that grew around Madison.

East Java Academy

EAST JAVA ACADEMY (Sekolah Lanjutan Advent). A boarding school on the senior high school level operated by the East Java Mission near Sukorejo, about 30 miles (50 kilometers) south of Surabaya, Java, Indonesia. Opened on Feb. 1, 1967, the school operates in rented buildings owned by one of the church members. The enrollment was 24 students. The East Java Mission had purchased a piece of land of 25 acres (10 hectares) located about 10 miles (15 kilometers) from Sukorejo. It was the plan to build permanent structures on the newly purchased property, but the government refused to give permission to build because the people living in the area were afraid that their children would be converted to Christianity. In 1972 the government gave permission for the school to be built on the property, and in September of the same year the academy moved to its present location.

It is at an elevation of 1,300 feet (400 meters), which gives it a cooler climate and a gentle breeze, making it more pleasant for the students to study and live there. The school has been able to add buildings and facilities and the campus has been landscaped and taken care of by the faculty and students. Presently it has a beautiful campus that well represents Seventh-day Adventist educational institutions.

In 1992, under the direction of Dr. S. Tabuchi, Far Eastern Division director of education, the Japan and Korean Teachers Association donated equipment for a water system that supplies the needs of students and teachers. The 1993 enrollment of junior and high school is 232 students. There are 121 boys and 111 girls; of these, 178 live in the dormitories on campus. Eighty-five percent of the students are Seventh-day Adventist. The staff comprises 14 full-time faculty, including administration and three part-time teachers.

Principals: C. Kainde, 1967—1968; C. E. Dompas, 1968—1974; Agus Ricky, 1975 (one semester); M. Pardosi, 1975—1978; Sukamto, 1978—1979; C. E. Dompas, 1979—1985; R. B. Matahari, 1986—1987; E. T. Panjaitan, 1988— .

East Pasco Medical Center

EAST PASCO MEDICAL CENTER. An 85-bed community hospital in Zephyrhills, Florida, owned and operated by Adventist Health System/Sunbelt Health Care Corporation with headquarters in Orlando.

Adventist Health System/Sunbelt acquired the former Jackson Memorial Hospital, a 53-bed doctor-owned facility in Dade City, Florida, in 1981. Shortly after this acquisition, ground was broken for an 85-bed hospital in nearby Zephyrhills. Within two weeks of opening on Jan. 23, 1985, the 85,000-square-foot (7,900-square-meter) hospital was full. Since then East Pasco Medical Center has had eight expansion programs. In addition to acute-care beds, it also has an 11-bed skilled nursing unit and a 10-bed observation unit where patients can stay for up to 23 hours.

In 1993 more than 30,000 square feet (2,800 square meters) were added to the hospital at a cost of approximately $14 million. The new area includes a state-of-the-art outpatient surgical center, an expanded wellness center, a Cardiopulmonary Department, a support services area, and physical, speech, and occupational therapy areas.

East Pasco Medical Center hosts a number of activities and programs to help members of its community learn to stay well and to acquaint them with the mission of Seventh-day Adventist health care.

East Visayan Academy (Bulacao)

EAST VISAYAN ACADEMY (Bulacao). A coeducational boarding school on the senior high school level, operated by the Central Visayan Mission at Bulacao, Talisay, Cebu, Philippines. In 1974 the secondary enrollment was 245 and the staff numbered 11. The students are mostly Seventh-day Adventists.

The school opened June 23, 1931, on F. Ramos Street, Cebu City, with Mrs. W. Riffel and Silvestre Ygay as teachers, and with six students enrolled in the first year of high school. Classwork was not recognized by the government. The next year (1932—1933) the school operated in the Cebu City SDA chapel, with 47 pupils in the elementary grades and seven in the first and second years of high school. However, for the next three years it was only an elementary school.

In 1936 the Philippine Union Mission authorized operation as a government-accredited first year of high school. For the school year 1938—1939, the school was moved to the present site on approximately 20 acres (eight hectares) of land along the highway a few miles (several kilometers) south of the city of Cebu. About 30 students enrolled in the first three years of the high school course. An administration building, two dormitories, a dining hall, and teachers' cottages were constructed. During the 1939—1940 school year the institution became a four-year academy, serving the then East Visayan Mission and, until the Mindanao Mission Academy was established in 1947, also the Mindanao Mission.

During World War II the school was closed but in 1946 the buildings were rebuilt and school was reopened, with U. M. Oliva as principal. Two years later the academy was granted full recognition by the Department of Education of the republic of the Philippines; it also became a member of the Far Eastern Association of SDA Colleges and Secondary Schools. The school has a small farm and a garden.

In 1978 the union and the mission decided to build a new two-story building to house the administrative offices, the library, the teachers' rooms, and the chapel. Upon completion of the building, enrollment in the elementary and secondary levels increased tremendously. The new edifice cost the organization a huge sum of money.

In 1990 the province of Cebu was struck by a super typhoon that brought immense destruction upon people and property. Even the seemingly strong edifices on the campus were not spared. The boys' and girls' dormitories, the cafeteria, the administration building, a number of teachers' cottages, and the elementary school building were badly hit. It took the school administration several months to rehabilitate the campus.

A year after the calamity, the mission and the school officials came up with a proposed rebuilding project that was presented during the constituency meeting of the mission in the summer of 1991. Construction of a large multipurpose auditorium soon began.

By the end of 1992 the new gymnasium was completed. This new structure has a seating capacity of 7,000 and cost the organization more than 4 million pesos. As a result, East Visayan Academy has become the center of huge gatherings, religious or secular in nature.

East Visayan Adventist Academy (Leyte)

EAST VISAYAN ADVENTIST ACADEMY (Leyte). A coeducational boarding high school established in 1992 at Leyte, Philippines.

The members of the East Visayan Mission had long wanted a secondary school in their field. In the late 1980s they were able to purchase a 35-acre (14-hectare) plot of land for 200,000 pesos. Construction of the first building began in 1990, and the school was officially opened June 15, 1992. The beginning enrollment was 167, with six teachers.

Industries include farming and hollow brick making. The school owns a tractor, a turtle-type power tiller, a rice thresher, a rice mill, a truck, and welding equipment. Recently the academy was presented with a 20-passenger jeepney, the gift of Pastor and Mrs. S. Suzuki, visitors from Japan.

Easter

EASTER. The annual festival celebrating the resurrection of Christ, which now falls on the first Sunday after the first full moon on or after the spring equinox (Mar. 21). The word “Easter” is from Ēastre, Anglo-Saxon name for the goddess of spring during whose month (April) the old Teutonic spring festival was observed. With the coming of Christianity the name was transferred to the Christian Passover, which fell at the same season.

The NT gives no clear evidence of a commemorative celebration of the Resurrection (in Acts 12:4, KJV, “Easter” is a mistranslation for “Passover”). However, early Christians seem to have continued the observance of Passover (Acts 20:6) and may have thought of it as a memorial of the Passion (cf. 1 Cor. 5:7, 8). The apostles John and Philip are reported to have kept Passover in this way, and such a celebration seems definitely to have been an established practice from the time of Bishop Xystus I (c. A.D. 116—c. 125) of Rome.

About A.D. 150 the Quartodeciman (“fourteenth”) controversy arose as to whether Easter should commemorate the Passion and fall always on the fourteenth day of Nisan, the Passover (as was the practice in Asia), or whether it should celebrate the Resurrection and come on a set annual Sunday, regardless of date, according to another tradition that by then had become general practice. These two points of view may reflect differences between the Pharisaic and the Qumran calendars. The controversy was finally resolved at the Council of Nicaea (A.D. 325) in favor of the latter view.

Regarding baptism as the biblical commemoration of the Resurrection (see Rom. 6:3—5), and mindful of the pagan origin of the day, early Seventh-day Adventists did not celebrate Easter. In 1887 Uriah Smith wrote that Easter “savors of the customs of the Protestant Church not wholly weaned from Mother Rome” (Review and Herald 64:179, Mar. 22, 1887). The next year (ibid. 65:217, Apr. 3, 1888) L. A. Smith gave as the reason for SDA nonobservance of the day the fact that “we find there [in the Bible] no mention of Easter, or of Lent, or of Good Friday, or of any of the numerous other feast and fast days which the Church of Rome has always made, and which Protestant churches are fast coming to make, so prominent.”

Ebeye Seventh-day Adventist High School

EBEYE SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST HIGH SCHOOL. A coeducational day school on the senior high school level operated by the Guam-Micronesia Mission of Seventh-day Adventists. It is located in the Kwajalein atoll, part of the republic of the Marshall Islands.

Educational work began on Ebeye in 1981 when a K-6 school was operated. The following year this was expanded into a K-9 school, and each successive year another grade was added, until in 1985 it became a full 12-grade high school, the first high school on this atoll. The spring of 1986 marked the first high school graduation experienced on Ebeye.

The institution serves as a true mission school, serving a community of about 12,000, where SDA students comprise only about 2 percent of the student body. Instruction is in English, the students' second language, and the teaching staff consists of SDA volunteers. The present enrollment (1993) is 230. Each year some students are baptized as a result of the ministry of this mission school, and these comprise about one third of the church membership.

The high school began under the direction of Jack Penner, who served as the first principal in 1982, the year the high school was started with grade 9.

Principals: Jack Penner, 1982; Steven Krunich, 1983; David Reynolds, 1984—1985; Verlin Leer, 1986—1987; William Fralick, 1988— .

Eccles, John

ECCLES, JOHN (1850—1902). Pioneer Seventh-day Adventist medical missionary in Central America. He was born at Madras, India, of Irish parentage. When he was about 13 years of age his parents moved to Canada. From there he went to Michigan several years later. Entering Battle Creek Sanitarium as a patient in 1877, he became acquainted with the SDA message and was baptized. Shortly after that he married Martha Crane, of Sheboygan, Michigan. After working eight years at Battle Creek Sanitarium and several years elsewhere as a nurse, he entered the medical school of the University of Pennsylvania and graduated as a physician three years later, in 1896. In March 1900 he and his wife went to the Central American Mission Field as self-supporting Adventist medical missionaries and settled on the island of San Andrés, Colombia. From there he visited settlements along the coasts of Panama and Costa Rica. In September 1901 he fell ill of septicemia and died in January 1902 at the United Fruit Company's hospital at Bocas del Toro, Panama.

Eckenroth, Melvin K.

ECKENROTH, MELVIN K. (1914—1975). Educator, evangelist, departmental chair, pastor, administrator. A native of Pennsylvania, he was orphaned at an early age and left in the care of his maternal grandmother. By the age of 13 he was preaching in local churches and meeting houses. After graduating from Shenandoah Valley Academy, where he early showed leadership ability, he enrolled at Washington Missionary College (now Columbia Union College). He arrived with 38 cents in his pocket, ready to commit his life to Christian endeavor. As a college senior he transferred to Emmanuel Missionary College (now Andrews University), from which he graduated in 1937. Subsequently he received his master's and Bachelor of Divinity degrees from the SDA Theological Seminary and his doctoral degree from Howard University.

In 1938 Eckenroth married Margaret Hope Lawry and that same year began his ministry as pastor of a 13-church district in Indiana. This was followed by pastorates in Florida and Michigan.

He later served as an evangelist in Minnesota, and in 1947 joined the General Conference Ministerial Association as an associate secretary, to that time the youngest person ever called to the General Conference. From 1951 to 1958 he was chair of the Department of Field Ministries at the Adventist Theological Seminary and also the teacher of Graduate Overseas Extension Schools for the church. During this time he became known as “Mr. Evangelism” around the world.

In 1959 he was called to be president of the New Jersey Conference, and four years later joined the faculty of Columbia Union College as chair of the Department of Religion and Philosophy, a position he held until his death.

During his years of service he wrote widely for church publications. He is listed in Who's Who in American Education, Directory of American Scholars, Distinguished American Educators, Distinguished Americans of the South, and Who's Who in Maryland.

Ecuador

ECUADOR. A republic situated on the northwest coast of South America, bounded on the south and east by Peru, on the north by Colombia, and on the west by the Pacific Ocean, with an area of about 105,000 square miles (270,670 square kilometers), according to the United Nations Statistical Office, though Ecuador claims an additional 112,000 square miles (290,000 square kilometers) held by Peru. Ecuador's population (1994) is 10.7 million. Since the Spanish conquest the Ecuadorians have been predominantly Roman Catholic, and the country traditionally has been one of the strongholds of Catholicism in Latin America. Though church and state are separate, the state still retains strong ties with the Vatican. It was estimated (1991) that there are approximately 54,000 Protestants in the country. The official language is Spanish, which is spoken by 93 percent of the people, the remaining 7 percent speaking Quechua and other Indian languages. Some of the Indian tribes, such as the Jivaros and Aucas, live in primitive conditions.

Topographically Ecuador is divided into three distinct regions: (1) the Costa, a low, rolling coastal plain between the Pacific Ocean and the Andes; (2) the Sierra, formed by two parallel ranges of the Andes running north and south the length of the country, with a valley 70 to 180 miles (110 to 290 kilometers) wide between, where the bulk of the people live; and (3) the Oriente, which consists of humid jungles in the upper Amazon basin. The climate varies with the region; the eastern lowlands are hot and rainy, the highlands are temperate the year around, and the coastal plain is hot and humid from January to May and cool and dry throughout the rest of the year. The economy of the country is basically agricultural and pastoral. About 25 percent of the working population are employed in handicrafts and manufacturing.

Historical Background

Historical Background. The territory that is now Ecuador was inhabited originally by Indian tribes that came down from Central America. During the first half of the fifteenth century these tribes formed the kingdom of Quito, which after a bitter struggle was incorporated into the Inca Empire in 1493. Francisco Pizarro, the Spanish conqueror, began his conquest of the Inca Empire by landing with his forces at the Bay of San Mateo in Ecuador in 1531. In 1534 Sebastian de Belalcázar (Benalcázar), one of Pizarro's lieutenants, completed the conquest of the part of the Inca Empire that is now Ecuador and incorporated it into the viceroyalty of Peru. But being situated between this viceroyalty and that of New Granada, the territory was transferred from one to the other several times during the colonial period.

For many years the spirit of revolt, engendered by centuries of Spanish oppression, gave rise to a series of unsuccessful rebellions. The turning point in the struggle for independence was reached when the patriots gained control of Guayaquil in 1820, but it was not until the victory of Pichincha (May 24, 1822) that José de Sucre, at the head of the Ecuadorian army, with the assistance of troops from the neighboring countries, was able to throw off the Spanish yoke. It then joined Bolívar's short-lived republic of Greater Colombia (Gran Colombia), which embraced the territory of the former viceroyalty of New Granada and Peru. This republic lasted less than a decade, and on May 13, 1830, Ecuador declared its independence.

The next 30 years of Ecuadorian history were turbulent politically, reaching a climax between 1845 and 1860, when five different presidents succeeded one another in office and the constitution was changed several times. Finally a strong leader, Gabriel Garcia Moreno, emerged, who served as president for two periods (1861—1865 and 1869—1875). An austere Roman Catholic, he sought peace and consolidation for his country by strict religious discipline. The Roman Catholic Church was invested with complete control of education, and a concordat with the Vatican (1863) guaranteed to the church a large measure of control in civil affairs.

However, in spite of his assumed dictatorial powers, Moreno was unable to suppress the growing spirit of liberalism, which continued to develop after his second administration, and reached a climax in the revolution led by General Eloy Alfaro (1895), a liberal. This political turnover split the country into two main camps, which have persisted since, with the liberals dominating the coastal plain and the Catholic conservatives dominating the highlands. The result has been a succession of weak liberal administrations, which have not been able to enforce the religious freedom guaranteed in the constitution. However, recent Ecuadorian history has shown slow but steady progress toward democratic ideals and toward greater stability in government.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. Until 1985 Ecuador was part of the Ecuador Mission, a part of the Inca Union Mission. After that up until Jan. 6, 1993, the Ecuador Mission was a detached mission in the South American Division. On Jan. 7, 1993, Ecuador was divided into two missions. Statistics (1992) for Ecuador: churches, 41; members, 18,800; elementary schools, 11; ordained ministers, 20; licensed ministers, 13; credentialed missionaries, 17; teachers, 67. North Ecuador Mission headquarters are at Quito and South Ecuador Mission headquarters are at Guayaquil.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. The first SDA to come to Ecuador was Thomas H. Davis, a colporteur, who arrived in Guayaquil with his family about Aug. 30, 1904, and went to work selling SDA publications. On Nov. 7, 1905, George W. Casebeer, a minister, arrived with his wife to take charge of the interest aroused by Davis's work. A few months after Casebeer's arrival the South American Union Mission recommended that Ecuador be separated from the West Coast Mission (Chile, Bolivia, Peru, and Ecuador) and be made a separate mission, with Casebeer as its superintendent. The prospects for SDA work looked bright as in various places doors opened. Many seemed interested and several were keeping the Sabbath. The first convert to be baptized was C. E. Yepez, whom J. W. Westphal baptized at Ambato about the middle of 1907 (Review and Herald 84:18, Sept. 26; 84:14, Dec. 12, 1907). In a short time an English language school was opened.

The first blow to this encouraging prospect was the death of Mrs. Davis at Ambato on July 16, 1907. Soon afterward unrelenting persecution broke out. Added to these perplexing circumstances were the political instability of the country and the unhealthy climatic conditions along the coast. Before the end of 1908 both the Casebeer and the Davis families left the country and accepted calls to work in Chile. Their places were taken by Octavio Navarrete, a colporteur, and William Steele, who was appointed mission director. A short time later William W. Wheeler, a minister and practical nurse, arrived with his wife, but in a few months Mrs. Steele's illness forced the family to leave the country. They were replaced by John Osborne and his family, who arrived in Ecuador shortly before October 1910.

Early in 1911 Wheeler baptized what appears to be the second Ecuadorian convert, a "Brother Espinoza, of Machala" (Revista Adventista 11:10, April 1911). Slowly the work seemed to be gaining a foothold so that by the middle of the year a mission church of some seven or eight members, composed of the Sabbathkeepers in all of Ecuador, was organized (ibid. 11:10, July 1911). But again there were reverses. Before the end of 1911 both Osborne and Wheeler were taken ill with tropical diseases, and although Osborne recovered sufficiently to stay on for a time, Wheeler was compelled to leave Ecuador.

The Osbornes were joined by César Lopéz of Peru and Santiago Mangold of Argentina early in 1912, and on June 15 of that year what appears to be the first local Seventh-day Adventist church in Ecuador was organized in Quito with eight members (ibid. 2:8, October 1912). Again hopes revived that SDA work would prosper in Ecuador, but they were soon dashed when Mrs. Mangold became ill and died, and before the end of 1913 her husband and little daughter had to return to Argentina. For a time the Osbornes were the only foreign workers in Ecuador.

In the summer of 1914 two more missionary families arrived—C. E. Knight, originally from the United States, and Enrique Mangold of Argentina. Knight took over the superintendency of the mission from Osborne, who had been weakened by disease, and Mangold led in the canvassing work. However, their work was seriously hampered by a revolution that lasted for more than two years and by illness caused by unhealthy climatic conditions (ibid. 16:18, March-April 1916). SDA work in Ecuador came to a virtual standstill for the next several years. In 1916 there were 23 SDAs in the country; by 1921 this number had decreased to 20.

Later Developments. In 1921 Orley Ford, who had been working among the Indians of Peru for several years, was sent to Ecuador, where he began work among the Indians of Lake Colta, near the city of Riobamba, early in 1922. The work was popular with the Indians and with the government, but no converts were made, so that by 1924 SDA membership in Ecuador had dwindled to 17, and the foreign workers had decreased to two. Writing in the Revista Adventista of Nov. 12, 1928, Ford said: "For many years the work in Ecuador has progressed under serious difficulties and seeming failure, and the workers, on encountering the wall of opposition that rose up before them, have become discouraged" (p. 10). But a break came when in 1927 G. A. Schwerin arrived with his family to do evangelistic work.

As a result of his work the membership, which stood at only 31 in 1927, more than doubled to 65 in 1928.

On Jan. 10, 1929, the Ford and Schwerin families, who were vacationing together at Colta Lake Mission Station, narrowly escaped death in an Indian uprising against Whites. Later that same year the Ford family came close to death at the hands of a fanatical mob in the town of San Miguel, Bolívar province.

By 1931 membership in Ecuador climbed to 108, and although for the next 10 years the figure remained around 120, there was never any doubt that SDA work in Ecuador had come to stay. In 1941 the foundations of the first SDA church building in Ecuador were laid in Quito.

Beginning with 1943, membership in Ecuador began to climb steadily. From 143 in that year the number increased to 262 in 1949. But the most significant rise in membership came after a series of evangelistic meetings held by Walter Schubert in the city of Guayaquil in 1950. At the end of that year membership stood at 395. By 1957 there were 1,035 members; in 1963, 1,639; in 1973, 4,236; and in 1992, 18,800.

Educational Institutions. In 1991 SDAs had three secondary schools in Ecuador. Ecuador Mission Academy, established at Guayaquil in 1961, is now a boarding academy known as Colegio Adventista del Ecuador (Ecuador Adventist Academy). There also are two day academies, one in Quito and the other in Guayaquil.

Medical Work. The Clínica Adventista de Quito (Quito Adventist Clinic), inaugurated in February 1961, is the only SDA medical institution in Ecuador. In 1990 property was purchased 37 miles (60 kilometers) from Quito on which a Better Living center was built in 1993.

Ecuador Adventist Academy

ECUADOR ADVENTIST ACADEMY (Colegio Adventista del Ecuador). A boarding academy on the senior high school level, owned and operated by the Ecuador Mission. It is located on a 407-acre (165-hectare) property, 90 miles (145 kilometers) west of the capital city of Quito, about 160 miles (260 kilometers) north of Guayaquil and about nine miles (14 kilometers) from Santo Domingo de los Colorados. It is in a forest area, at an altitude of between 2,000 and 2,500 feet (610 and 760 meters) above sea level. Its climate is quite tropical and humid.

The school was first opened in Guayaquil as a day academy in 1961, and was moved to its present location in 1968. Since that time an attractive little campus has been developed, including an expanding boys' dormitory, a girls' dormitory, a multipurpose kitchen and dining room, an administration building, and two classroom buildings.

A yucca starch industry operated for a while, but had to be closed. There is a carpentry and a repair shop.

Ecumenism

ECUMENISM. From the Greek oikoumenē, “the inhabited world,” “the whole world,” and thus “universal.” Generally “ecumenism” is associated with the movement to bring the Christian churches together in united action and belief, and eventually in some form of organic union. However, as the end of the second millennium approached, the goal of most “ecumenists” was no longer organic unity, but “visible unity.” Oikoumenē occurs 15 times in the NT, as, for example, in Luke 2:1 of the extent of the Roman registration mentioned and in Matt. 24:14 of the extent of the preaching of the gospel. During the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries Protestant ecumenical efforts began to focus on social service and foreign missions, through such organizations as the YMCA (founded in London in 1844), the Evangelical Alliance (formed in London in 1846), the Federal Council of Churches (in America, 1900), and Christian World Communions, such as the Lutheran World Federation, World Methodist Council, Baptist World Alliance, and what is called the World Alliance of Reformed Churches. The world Missionary Conference at Edinburgh, Scotland, in 1910 is often referred to as the first important step in the ecumenical movement. Two Seventh-day Adventist delegates participated, including W. A. Spicer, secretary of the General Conference. Significant also was the International Missionary Council that met at Jerusalem in 1928, and at Madras in 1938. Since that time, ecumenism has focused on the home front. The organized ecumenical movement developed in three major streams: International Missionary Council, Faith and Order, and Life and Work. The Faith and Order Movement met at Lausanne, Switzerland, in 1927 and at Edinburgh in 1937. The other movement, known as Life and Work, had been sponsored since 1920 by Nathan Söderblom, the Lutheran archbishop of Uppsala, Sweden. Life and Work conferences were held at Stockholm, Sweden, in 1925 and at Oxford, England, in 1937. Ecumenical cooperation for Christian youth was considered at Oslo in 1947, and this was followed by a series of World Christian Youth conferences and the World Council for Christian Education.

The capstone of ecumenical effort came with the creation of the World Council of Churches (WCC) at Amsterdam in 1948 when the Faith and Order and Life and Work movements merged. The World Council met again at Evanston, Illinois, in 1954. The only requirement for membership in the World Council in those early years was acceptance of “our Lord Jesus Christ as God and Saviour.”

At the New Delhi Assembly of the WCC in 1961, there were delegates from 197 member churches representing 300 million Christians in 90 countries. The Greek Orthodox Church already was a member of the council, and the Russian Orthodox Church, with 50 million members, was accepted for membership together with some other Orthodox churches. The International Missionary Council merged with the WCC at that time. The original simple prerequisite for membership was enlarged to read: “The World Council of Churches is a fellowship of churches which confess the Lord Jesus Christ as God and Saviour according to Holy Scripture and therefore seek to fulfill together their common calling to the glory of one God, the Father, Son and Holy Spirit.”

This change was necessary in order to incorporate the Orthodox churches. Many Protestants doubt that organic unity is possible without theological unity, and fear that the attempt to present a united message to the world under such circumstances is contrary to the Protestant concept of the individual interpretation of Scripture. Ecumenism does not have the undivided support of the laity. However, the ecumenical movement has been gradually bringing some churches together in formal union ("union churches"), as well as in less formal but united action through such organizations as the National Council and the World Council of Churches. There are more than 100 national councils of churches, most of them associated with the WCC. The Roman Catholic Church is a member of more than one-third of these councils.

Several major Protestant denominations are not members of the World Council, including the Southern Baptist Convention, the Seventh-day Adventist Church, the Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod, and the great majority of Pentecostal churches. The Catholic Church appointed observers to attend the New Delhi meeting, this being the first official ecumenical gesture of the kind on the part of the Vatican, although unofficial Roman Catholic observers have attended most of the major ecumenical gatherings since the Edinburgh meeting in 1937.

Formerly aloof from matters of ecumenical concern, or even quite openly hostile (several warnings were issued by the Vatican), the Roman Catholic Church began to take an active interest in the ecumenical movement in connection with Vatican Council II, under Pope John XXIII, who appointed a Secretariat for the promotion of Christian Unity to promote closer relations with the non-Catholic churches. Through this Secretariat, which now has been upgraded to the level of a Council, arrangements were made for Protestant observers to attend the council and for them to express their opinion on matters before the council. A decree promulgated by Session III of the council, entitled "On Christian Unity," outlined the Catholic approach to the problem. Early in 1965 the World Council of Churches appointed a working group to enter into formal dialogue on matters of mutual interest and concern, with a similar group to be appointed by the Secretariat for the Promotion of Christian Unity.

However, high-ranking Catholic spokespersons have made it clear that Catholic concessions to facilitate unity cannot alter either the magisterium (the teaching authority of the church) or the papacy (its governing authority). Therefore, structural rapprochement between Protestantism and Catholicism will involve Protestantism's ultimate acceptance of the doctrine and authority of the Roman Catholic Church, including the primacy of the pope. The many and far-reaching concessions the Catholic Church is able and willing to make in order to bring about the reunion of Christendom will not affect the essential substantive factors that constitute the Catholic Church.

The General Conference Committee has never voted an official statement regarding the Seventh-day Adventist relationship to the ecumenical movement as such. A book has been written dealing at length with the subject (B. B. Beach, Ecumenism-Boon or Bane? [Review and Herald, 1974]), and a number of articles have appeared over the years in SDA publications, including the Adventist Review. Thus, while there is not exactly an official position, there are clear indications regarding the Seventh-day Adventist viewpoint.

Generally it can be said that, while the Seventh-day Adventist Church does not completely condemn the ecumenical movement and its main organizational manifestation, the World Council of Churches, it has been critical of various aspects and activities. Few would wish to deny that ecumenism has had laudable aims and some positive influences. Its goal is visible Christian unity. No SDA can be opposed to the unity Christ Himself prayed for. The ecumenical movement has promoted kinder interchurch relations with more dialogue and less diatribe and helped remove unfounded prejudices.

Through its various organizations and activities, the ecumenical movement has provided more accurate and updated information on churches, spoken for religious liberty and human rights, combatted against the evils of racism, and drawn attention to socioeconomic implications of the gospel. In all this the intentions have been good and some of the fruit palatable. However, in the total picture the banes tend to outweigh the boons.

On the basis of Bible prophecy and the writings of Ellen G. White, SDAs anticipate the eventual success in some form or another of the ecumenical movement, both in eliminating the divisions of Protestantism and in reuniting Christendom by bridging the gulf that separates non-Catholic communions from Rome. The ecumenical movement will then become a concerted effort to unite not only Christians but also the entire world and to secure universal peace and security by enlisting the power of civil government in a universal religiopolitical crusade to eliminate all dissent. Seventh-day Adventists envision this crusade as the great apostasy to which John the revelator refers as “Babylon the great.” They understand also that God’s last message of mercy to the world prior to the return of Christ in power and glory will consist of a warning against this great apostate movement, and a call to all who choose to remain loyal to Him to leave the churches connected with it. (See Rev. 13:15—17; 14:6—11; 16:12—14; 17:1—6; 18:1—4; GC 444, 445, 573, 588, 589, 615.)

F. D. Nichol, editor of the Review and Herald, has summarized the SDA attitude toward the ecumenical movement thus: “We can heartily agree with World Council leaders that the endless divisions in Christendom are a tragedy. Accordingly, we must agree that it is laudable to seek to remove these divisions and thus produce unity. That far we can go with them in their reasoning.

“We doubt the wisdom of the method they are employing to secure unity. And we take issue with the evident assumption that underlies their thinking; namely, that if the various religious bodies will adjust their government and doctrines here and there, they can be fitted together harmoniously. We believe that true unity is possible only in terms of Bible truth, and that any unity short of that is a deception. . . . God’s true church in the world must be distinguished first and above all else by its devotion to the revealed will of God as found in the Holy Scriptures” (Review and Herald 131:14, Sept. 23, 1954).

In an editorial entitled “Why We Cannot Join” (ibid. 142:15, Mar. 18, 1965), Nichol explained why Seventh-day Adventists decline to participate in such organizations as the National Council of Churches: “At the heart of the ecumenical movement is the policy to soft-pedal what its communicants cannot agree on. How else could such a movement gain cohesion or make progress at all? At the very heart of the Advent movement is the conviction that we should emphasize our distinctive doctrines. . . . True, we hold certain prime Christian doctrines in common with all other Christian people, but let us never forget that it is not our theological points of agreement but our points of difference that justify our existence as a separate people. And it is only as we keep those points of difference clear that we protect against blurring out the edges of Adventism in a disordered world.”

A person’s attitude toward ecumenism will be determined by the individual’s concept of the nature of the church. Seventh-day Adventists believe that all sincere Christians, of whatever communion, constitute the people of God. But they believe also that the SDA Church has been given a special message for the world in this generation—the message of Christ’s imminent, personal, visible return to earth in power and glory to establish His universal, righteous, eternal reign, and of preparation for that event—and that eventually, sincere Christians everywhere will recognize the validity of this message and of the Seventh-day Adventist Church as God’s remnant church. SDAs welcome Christian fellowship with other denominations but believe that the message with which they have been entrusted is for the entire world, and that the proclamation of this message is not compatible with membership in the World Council of Churches. Furthermore, in view of their conviction that the message they have to give must go to all the world, they could not accept the assignment of a limited area for missionary work. They regret that their sense of world mission makes membership in the National Council and the World Council impracticable. However, SDAs seek to work in fellowship with other Christians in every way that does not involve a compromise of what they understand to be their mission as a people.

SDAs are concerned regarding not only the ecumenical understanding of unity, but the approach of many ecumenists, especially in the setting of the World Council of Churches, to belief, understanding of Scripture and mission, sociopolitical responsibility, and eschatology.

Should SDAs cooperate ecumenically? SDAs should cooperate insofar as the authentic gospel is proclaimed and crying human needs are being met. The Seventh-day Adventist Church wants no entangling memberships and refuses any compromising relationships that might tend to water down its distinct witness. However, SDAs wish to be “conscientious cooperators.” The ecumenical movement as an agency of cooperation has acceptable aspects; as an agency for organic unity of churches, it is much more suspect.

Back in 1926, long before ecumenism was in vogue, the General Conference Executive Committee adopted an important statement that is now a part of the General Conference Working Policy (075). This declaration has significant ecumenical implications. The concern of the statement was for the mission field and relationships with other “missionary societies.” However, the statement has now been broadened to deal with “religious organizations” in general. It affirms that Seventh-day Adventists “recognize those agencies that lift up Christ before men as a part of the divine plan for evangelization of the world, and . . . hold in high esteem Christian men and women in other communions who are engaged in winning souls to Christ.” In the church’s dealings with other churches, “Christian courtesy, frankness, and fairness” are to prevail. Some practical suggestions are made in order to avoid misunderstandings and occasion for friction. The statement makes it very clear, however, that the “Seventh-day Adventist people” have received the special “burden” to emphasize the Second Coming as an event “even at the door,” preparing “the way of the Lord as revealed in Holy Scripture.” This divine “commission” makes it, therefore, impossible for SDAs to restrict their witness “to any limited area” and impels them to call the gospel “to the attention of all peoples everywhere.”

Experience has taught that generally the best relationship to the various councils of churches (national, regional, world) is that of observer-consultant status. This helps the church to keep informed and to understand trends and developments. It helps to know Christian thinkers and leaders. SDAs are provided the opportunity to exert a presence and make the church’s viewpoint known. Membership is not advisable. Those ecumenical organizations are usually not “neutral.” They often have quite specific goals and policies, and play sociopolitical advocacy roles.

Today the World Council of Churches has as its goal not so much organizational union as “mutual recognition.” What this means is that the different churches and denominations are to recognize each other’s baptism, Communion service (Eucharist), and ordained ministry. During the last decade of the twentieth century a key ecumenical term is koinonia, that is, communion, fellowship, cooperation, and caring partnership.

It would appear that the organized ecumenical movement reached a pinnacle of enthusiasm and influence in the late sixties, in the immediate aftermath of Vatican II. Since then the WCC has gone into a period of ecumenical doldrums and even decline. Much ecumenical activity now takes place outside of the WCC on the local level in the form of unstructured interdenominational youth and lay Bible study and prayer groups, fellowships, and community service endeavors.

Edmed, Herbert John

EDMED, HERBERT JOHN (1864—1934). Evangelist, administrator, and missionary. He was born in Surrey, England, and while in his teens went to South Africa in an effort to build up his health. He became interested in Seventh-day Adventist teachings through reading a copy of Daniel and the Revelation sold to him by one of the pioneer colporteurs. Shortly after reading the book he attended a series of meetings by I. J. Hankins, and was baptized. He was married in 1890, and shortly after that opened a hardware store.

While visiting South Africa a few years later, S. N. Haskell was deeply impressed by Edmed's capabilities and persuaded him to enter the ministry. In spite of a depression, Edmed was able to sell his business profitably within three weeks. His first duties were pastoral and evangelistic. He held meetings in many of the principal cities and towns of South Africa, establishing groups of converts, which later became strong churches. Edmed was president of two conferences—the Natal Transvaal Conference and the Cape Conference.

He was ordained by W. W. Prescott in 1912. Except for several years in England as Bible teacher at Stanborough (now Newbold) College, he spent the rest of his working years in the West Indies. For a few years he served as an executive, and after that as pastor of various churches.

Edmer School

EDMER SCHOOL. A coeducational mission day school operated at Georgetown, Grand Cayman, Cayman Islands, West Indies, by a local school board. The 1993 enrollment was 67, with a teaching staff of five.

The school was named in memory of Mrs. Clara Edmer and George Merren, two early Seventh-day Adventist believers in the Cayman Islands who made substantial contributions to the support of Christian education.

Edmer School was founded in September 1968 as a junior high school, with permission to add forms until senior high school status was achieved. Edmer gained high school status, but discontinued operating as a high school in 1986, when the government of the Cayman Islands opened a middle school, attracting a number of students who had been attending the Edmer High School.

Edson, Hiram

EDSON, HIRAM (1806—1882). A layman (later ordained) of Port Gibson, New York, the pioneer responsible for introducing, among those who became Seventh-day Adventists, the fuller understanding of the sanctuary and its cleansing. Edson was a respected Methodist steward in 1843 (or possibly 1844), when he accepted the message of the imminent Second Advent. As the Millerites' day of expectation approached, he held evening cottage meetings in his home. On Oct. 22 he invited the people to come to the last meeting, and bade goodbye to those who declined, never expecting to meet them again. Concerning this meeting he said, "We looked for our coming Lord until the clock tolled twelve at midnight. The day had then passed, and our disappointment became a certainty. Our fondest hopes and expectations were blasted" (Hiram Edson, fragment of a manuscript on his "Life and Experience," fol. 8v).

But Edson kept musing in his heart: "My advent experience has been the richest and brightest of all my Christian experience. . . . Has the Bible proved a failure? Is there no God, no heaven, no golden city, no Paradise?" (ibid., fols. 8v, 9r).

After waiting and weeping until dawn, many of the Advent believers slipped away to their desolate homes. To some of those who remained Edson said, "Let us go to the barn" (ibid., fol. 9r). They went into the almost-empty granary and prayed until the conviction came that their prayers had been heard and accepted, and that light would be given and their disappointment explained.

Later Edson said to one of his companions, "Let us go and see, and encourage some of our brethren" (ibid., fol. 9v; according to Loughborough this second man was O.R.L. Crosier). They shunned the road, perhaps to avoid scoffers, and crossed Edson's field, where the corn was still in the shock and the pumpkins were on the vines. Suddenly Edson stopped. As he stood there an overwhelming conviction came over him "that instead of our High Priest coming out of the Most Holy of the heavenly sanctuary to come to this earth on the tenth day of the seventh month, at the end of the 2300 days, he for the first time entered on that day the second apartment of that sanctuary and that he had a work to perform in the Most Holy before coming to this earth. That he came to the marriage at that time an allusion to the parable of the bridegroom in [Matt. 25; see "Midnight Cry"]; in other words, to the Ancient of Days, to receive a kingdom, dominion, and glory; and we must wait for his return from the wedding" (ibid., fol. 9v).

Edson's mind was also directed to Rev. 10, a chapter presenting the symbol of the sweet, then bitter, book. The Adventists' experience had indeed been as honey in their mouths. Now in the aftermath it had suddenly become as bitter as gall (Rev. 10:9, 10). The prophecy also indicated that they must testify again, and furthermore that when the seventh angel began to sound, the ark of his testament was seen in the temple of heaven (Rev. 11:19). These were the principal thoughts that coursed through Edson's mind as he stood there in rapt meditation. Meantime his companion—evidently Crosier—who had been accompanying him, likewise deep in study, suddenly noticed that Edson had stopped. He called back, asking why he had paused. And Edson responded, “The Lord was answering our morning prayer, giving light with regard to our disappointment” (ibid., fol. 10r).

That concept threw a floodlight upon their disappointment. Christ had indeed fulfilled what the type had actually called for. It would be a while before He would complete this cleansing of the sanctuary, and not until then would He come forth as king.

Edson, Crosier, and their mutual friend Dr. Franklin B. Hahn agreed to meet as a study group to search the Bible intensively along these lines. Their study continued for some months. Their joint conclusions were published in articles by Crosier in the Day-Dawn of March 1845 (which appears as part of the Mar. 26, 1945, Ontario Messenger), a number of issues of the Day-Star in late 1845, and the Day-Star Extra of Feb. 7, 1846, published in Cincinnati, Ohio.

Crosier’s presentation came into the hands of Joseph Bates, James White, and various other Eastern Adventists, and many readily accepted the position set forth. Thus was opened up correspondence between the New York trio and this New England group. Later a conference was appointed for Edson’s place to which these Eastern brethren were invited. White was unable to be present, but Bates attended, and converted Edson (and Hahn) to the seventh-day Sabbath. Edson had already caught certain glimpses of the Sabbath through his study of the sanctuary, the ark, and the Ten Commandments and through reading certain lines from T. M. Preble, but he had not yet seen its importance. This was the first public instance of joining in united relationship the sanctuary and Sabbath positions, two distinctive tenets of faith characterizing the slowly forming body of Seventh-day Adventists. A little later, in 1848, one of a series of important conferences was held in Edson’s barn.

Edson was not only a thoughtful Bible student and an earnest evangelistic helper but also a self-sacrificing contributor, putting his possessions into the upbuilding of the growing cause that he loved. He sold his farm in 1850 to help defray evangelistic expenses of the infant Sabbatarian movement. His next farm, in Port Byron, he likewise sold, two years later, and from the proceeds lent James White the money to purchase his printing press at Rochester.

Edson was ordained in 1855. Whether this ordination was understood at the time to be to a local or general ministry is not clear. He was awarded credentials in 1870. It was he who introduced young J. N. Loughborough to the Adventist ministry and traveled with him around the circuit of churches early in Loughborough’s ministry.

Education, Department of EDUCATION, DEPARTMENT OF. In the General Conference, the branch that, with its director, associate directors, and staff, fosters and directs the worldwide Seventh-day Adventist educational system. The department counsels with the officers of the General Conference relative to educational matters and leads in formulating the major educational policies of the denomination; assists the General Conference Appointees Committee in selecting educational workers for overseas duty; makes recommendations to the General Conference Executive Committee relative to requests made by schools to offer programs on the tertiary level; issues promotional posters and leaflets; prepares annual analytical reports of the educational systems of SDA schools in various countries (known as the World Report) and assists school officials in evaluating the credits presented by foreign students through a publication known as World Patterns of Seventh-day Adventist Education; encourages teachers in maintaining high standards of instruction; develops standards for teacher education and issues; influences through its Board of Regents the standards and trends in secondary schools and tertiary schools, and accredits those that meet acceptable standards; conducts educational councils and workshops; maintains liaison with various governmental agencies that may affect the operation of SDA schools; publishes The Journal of Adventist Education, a professional periodical devoted to the interpretation of Christian education for the SDA teacher and school administrator; assists the schools and teachers in creating a strong spiritual atmosphere on the campuses of SDA schools in which children and youth may be nurtured in Christian growth; visits and inspects schools; assists in educational planning; and helps with educational meetings and councils in the various places around the world.

The director of the department is the chair of the Board of Regents.

Organizational units such as divisions, unions, and conferences each have an educational director.

History

History. The Department of Education goes back to 1887. Article II, section 1, of the constitution of that time states “the officers of this [General]Conference shall be a President, a Recording Secretary, a Corresponding Secretary, a Home Missionary Secretary, a Foreign Missionary Secretary, and an Educational Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of seven, of whom the President shall be one” (Yearbook [1888], p. 91).

Among the list of officers of the General Conference elected in November 1887 was “W. W. Prescott, Educational Secretary.”

In the revised constitution adopted in 1889, the Bylaws, Article I, section 4, defined the work of the educational secretary as follows: “The Educational Secretary shall have the general supervision of the educational work of the denomination. It shall be his duty to visit the different educational institutions; and he may, with the concurrence of the Executive Committee, call teachers' institutes, when the circumstances seem to demand. It shall be his duty to suggest plans and devise means for the development of the educational work of the denomination. He shall also make a report to the General Conference at its sessions, of the progress of the work, and of the general standing of the educational institutions" (ibid. [1890], p. 116).

As the first educational secretary of the General Conference (1887—1897), W. W. Prescott, a graduate of Dartmouth College, gave vigorous leadership to the denomination's growing educational system, traveling back and forth across the continent promoting the cause of Christian education and counseling the boards and faculties of new schools. During part of his term as educational secretary he was also president of Battle Creek College (1885—1894) and the first president of two new colleges, Union College (1891—1893) and Walla Walla College (1892—1894). A principal in each of these three colleges cared for the daily administration of the school. He organized the first North American-wide teachers' institute for SDA educators, which met for six weeks in 1891 at Harbor Springs, Michigan, with more than 100 in attendance. Thirty had attended the first SDA teachers' institute held at Battle Creek, Michigan, June 21—26, 1888.

In 1897 the office of educational secretary was abolished by a change in the constitution, and the work of supervising the church's schools was assigned to the corresponding secretary of the General Conference. In the reorganization of 1901, by means of General Conference departments, a system was developed whereby the president of the General Conference and major officers could be assisted by full-time specialists in promoting and guiding various aspects of the church's life and activity.

Against this background the Department of Education was organized. The General Conference elected an educational committee of seven members who appointed their own chair and secretary. In the early years it was the secretary who reported to the General Conference session on the work of the department; the chair did not devote full time to the department, and sometimes did not even reside at the denomination's headquarters. However, when Frederick Griggs became chair (1904), that post became the major position, and he himself reported to the General Conference sessions. The provision for both a chair and secretary of the department continued until 1909, when Frederick Griggs, who had been chair since 1904, was appointed secretary of the department, and the position of chair was abolished. The new plan then adopted, under which the president of the General Conference is the head of all departments, has continued to the present. By 1914 an assistant secretary was added, and in following years associate and assistant secretaries were chosen to help carry the growing work of the department. The term director was substituted for secretary in 1974.

With minor variations resulting from financial problems or the capabilities and interests of the staff, since 1931 the organization of the department has been essentially as follows: the director of the department, who has general oversight of all departmental activities; and associate directors having specified responsibilities.

Under the reorganization of 1901 the duties of the Department of Education were outlined as follows:

- “1. To act as a committee of reference in relation to all educational matters.
- “2. To assist in an advisory way in supplying properly qualified teachers for the different schools.

“3. To suggest plans for promoting and properly representing the educational work at the camp meetings and other large gatherings.

“4. To act as a Book Committee in relation to the different educational books, providing for the securing and writing of books by suitable authors, and planning for the introduction of suitable books into our schools.

“5. To promote the development of church and conference schools in all fields” (tenth meeting of General Conference Committee, Battle Creek, Michigan, Apr. 25, 1901).

In 1903 the Department of Education called a nationwide conference of SDA educators at Union College, Lincoln, Nebraska, “to study all the phases of schoolwork which are general in character, and to devise and inaugurate plans that will be of universal application” (General Conference Bulletin [1903], p. 224). At that meeting “a general scheme for the organization of the school interests of our denomination was planned and adopted”; the Department of Education was asked to “advise and assist in the conduct of schools and to foster educational interests throughout the world” (ibid. [1909], p. 77). Plans were laid whereby each union and state conference would establish a department of education patterned after that of the General Conference. Each union conference was to establish a college or training school, and the local conferences were to assume responsibility for primary and intermediate schools.

The basic pattern then adopted for promoting and directing the SDA parochial (church school) system remains to the present. Within a few years after 1903, union and state conferences in North America set up departments of education, and a decade or two later, overseas Seventh-day Adventist conferences and missions had done likewise.

At various times since that first nationwide conference of SDA educators, the Department of Education of the General Conference has organized other conventions (some of them worldwide and some as joint councils with the Missionary Volunteer Department), which set the tone and direction of Christian education in the SDA denomination. The major conventions were held at Lincoln, Nebraska, 1903, 1904, and 1906; Berrien Springs, Michigan, 1910; St. Helena, California, 1915; Lincoln, Nebraska, 1917; Colorado Springs, Colorado, 1923; and Blue Ridge, North Carolina, 1937. The rapid increase in the number of schools and teachers has made it inadvisable to hold large conventions of that type in recent years.

The department assists the division departments of education in holding conventions and workshops in addition to holding at least one annual Institute for Christian Teaching in various world educational centers.

In 1993 the department functioned under the structure of a director, three associate directors, the editor of the Journal of Adventist Education, and three secretaries. The purposes and duties of the department are defined in the General Conference Working Policy and implemented through the following functioning committees and boards: General Conference SDA International Board of Education, Committee on Seventh-day Adventist Theological Education, and the Board of Regents.

Education, Graduate, Commission on EDUCATION, GRADUATE, COMMISSION ON. Two commissions set up in 1961: the Commission on Graduate Education in the North American Division; the Commission on Graduate Education in Overseas Divisions. Primary functions of these two commissions were to guide and coordinate the graduate program in the denomination's higher schools, to pass upon requests for curriculum expansion, and to make recommendations to the General Conference Committee pertaining to graduate work. The North American section was merged into the North American Division Commission on Higher Education in 1967.

The Commission on Graduate Education in Overseas Divisions became what is known as the International Board of Education.

Education, Seventh-day Adventist Philosophy of EDUCATION, SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST PHILOSOPHY OF. All philosophies of education tend ultimately to rest on the concept of the nature of human beings that is held by the founders of that particular educational system. It has been truly said that until what people are born as and what they are born for is known, a system of education that will meet people's needs and help them achieve the purpose for which they are destined, or of which they are capable, cannot be planned. Many education philosophies are based on the assumption that human beings are born good, and that the purpose of education is to develop the good latent in children. This premise naturally leads to a child-centered or subject-centered philosophy of education. Certain other educational systems are built on the premise that children are born to serve the state, and that therefore the educational program is designed to shape the product entirely for the ends of the government.

Seventh-day Adventists base their philosophy of education on the belief that the ultimate purpose of human beings is to love and serve God and others, and that all instruction and learning must be directed toward helping them achieve that end.

The Bible clearly teaches that since the Fall all people are born with a tendency toward evil; this tendency has strengthened with the passing centuries. Because SDAs hold this religious concept, they have no faith in the perfectibility of humanity through natural means of instruction. Fallen humans cannot achieve the purpose for which they were created without a God-centered education that teaches them to open their minds to the unseen but all-powerful Spirit of God, the only agency that can bring a rebirth of the original nature and an enduring reformation of life habits and mental outlook. Ellen G. White, who was the denomination's first and major writer on educational theory, states this viewpoint: "To bring man back into harmony with God, so to elevate and ennoble his moral nature that he may again reflect the image of the Creator, is the great purpose of all the education and discipline of life" (CT 49).

The same writer has set forth the basic educational philosophy of Seventh-day Adventists thus: "True education means more than the pursuit of a certain course of study. It means more than a preparation for the life that now is. It has to do with the whole being, and with the whole period of existence possible to man. It is the harmonious development of the physical, the mental, and the spiritual powers. It prepares the student for the joy of service in this world and for the higher joy of wider service in the world to come" (Ed 13).

Accordingly, one of the major objectives of the SDA school system is to bring about the salvation of young people through acceptance of and faith in Jesus Christ as their personal Saviour, and following that, to help them achieve growth in character so that they will become God-fearing, honest, stable, and productive members of society. The curricula in SDA schools are designed to instruct the students in a biblical view of the origin of life, of humanity's duty, and of humanity's destiny; and to safeguard them from errors arising from humanistic and materialistic worldviews.

In order that young people may attend school in an atmosphere conducive to spiritual development, contemplation, and study undisturbed by the distractions of cities, efforts have been made to locate SDA schools, and particularly the boarding schools, in rural areas in which the students may have numerous opportunities for the study of nature. It is hoped that they will recognize early that the physical world, with its orderly laws and processes, is the handiwork of the divine Creator and Sustainer of all life. Wherever possible, agricultural enterprises are carried on in connection with SDA schools, and students are encouraged to work in these. The philosophy behind this is the value in learning the secrets of growing things, and becoming aware of the fact that the earth is the source from which comes all food as well as the storehouse of all raw materials from which people fashion their implements and machines, build their homes and factories, and obtain sources of power.

In order to allow adequate physical development before children undertake the duties of the schoolroom, which tax the eyes and the emotions, the church urges parents to provide a good home environment for growing children and not to send them to school until they reach a minimum age of 7 years.

Seventh-day Adventists hold that it is a right of all children of SDA parents to receive a Christian education, and that although a major share of the responsibility for providing it rests upon the parents, the local church too bears a responsibility to see that all children of the church are provided as much education in SDA schools as a young person desires or as can benefit him or her.

Generally speaking, SDA elementary schools (see Church School) are operated by the local churches in cooperation with the local conferences, the secondary schools by the local (state) conferences, the colleges by the union conferences, and graduate schools by the General Conference. See Schools, Seventh-day Adventist.

SDAs recognize the right of the government to require that children be educated to an extent that will enable them to fulfill their duties as citizens. However, since God has given children to parents, and not to the state, the parents have the right to determine where and how their children are to be educated. SDAs appreciate and financially support the public schools of the countries in which they reside. They believe these schools are doing an excellent work, but hold that religious instruction should not be a part of the public school curriculum (see Church and State). Hence, even though the worldwide system of SDA schools is costly, SDAs finance it gladly, believing that the results justify whatever the cost may be. SDA parents are urged to send their children to denominational schools wherever they can be operated, but no religious sanctions are used to force them to do so.

In order to implement this overall philosophy, SDAs endeavor to operate their schools in such a way that the curriculum, the extracurricular activities, and every school experience contribute to reaching the following objectives:

1. To maintain in each school a spiritual atmosphere in which prayer, worship, and doing the will of God will be, in the eyes of the majority of the students, the ideal and accepted pattern of living.
2. To make the Bible and the biblical worldview the center of all study and teaching.
3. To enable all students to achieve a Christian philosophy of life and to have opportunities to acquire the attitudes, knowledge, and skills necessary to express their philosophy in Christian character.

4. To promote a high level of scholarship, with emphasis on independent thinking and the highest achievement possible for each individual, and with reference to its practical application to the needs of the world.

5. To give students the opportunity to learn habits of healthful living, so that their physical development may be enhanced not so much by a program of games and competitive sports as by employment in school-related industries or agricultural enterprises in which they may learn a useful trade or skill, gain a sense of achievement, find in physical activity release from the tensions resulting from a heavy study program, learn a respect for the dignity and worth of physical labor, obtain a balanced view that will prevent the development of intellectual snobbery, and, at the same time, continue the educational process by developing habits of industry, promptness, reliability, accuracy, thoroughness, and self-reliance.

6. To promote social, cultural, and emotional growth, resulting in stable, balanced citizens who are a credit to their community, who are fitted to bear life's responsibilities, and who have developed insights and outlooks that make life worth living.

7. To give instruction in homemaking and in skills necessary to make and maintain happy marriages.

8. To encourage the students to make a personal commitment of their capacities and strength to the service of God, humanity, and their church, choosing professions that enable them to serve others and to participate in the promulgation of the Christian faith.

Edwards, Eva Elizabeth

EDWARDS, EVA ELIZABETH (1884—1981). Musician, educator, dean. She was born in Auckland, New Zealand, of Seventh-day Adventist parents won to the faith by A.G. Daniells. Her father died when Eva was a girl, and her mother then moved to Avondale, Australia. Eva, as a teenager, worked in the home of Pastor J. E. Fulton, pioneer missionary to Fiji. In the Fulton home she caught a vision for mission service and went with them when they returned to serve in Fiji. A keen musician, Eva translated many hymns into Fijian. She was one of the first teachers at Buresala Training College (later Fulton College) in Fiji. She also taught at the Avondale church school and was secretary to the Tongan Mission. For many years she served in the Sabbath school departmenta of conferences in both Australia and New Zealand, finally becoming Sabbath school secretary (director) for the Australasian Division. Eva also served as dean of women at Western Australia Missionary College and Longburn Adventist College, New Zealand.

Edwards, Josephine Cunningham

EDWARDS, JOSEPHINE CUNNINGTON (1904—1993). Author, educator, missionary, storyteller. Born in Muncie, Indiana, she received her B.A. degree from Andrews University, her M.A. from Vanderbilt University, and her Doctor of Humane Letters from Andrews. She married Lowell A. Edwards in 1923, and they served as missionaries to Africa, the source of many of her stories. Besides her two sons, she adopted three African children, including Alice Princess Siwundhla, for whom Josephine arranged a surprise appearance on the This Is Your Life nationwide television program. She was the author of more than 30 books and was known and loved internationally for her storytelling. A scholarship fund in journalism, education and communication was established in her memory.

Edwards, Otis Bernard

EDWARDS, OTIS BERNARD (1901—1971). Educator. A native of Florida, he accepted the Seventh-day Adventist doctrine at an early age and enrolled in Oakwood College to better prepare himself for the Lord's service.

His teaching career began in Montgomery, Alabama, in 1924, and two years later he was called to Oakwood, where he served in various positions, including director of music, dean of men, professor of history, dean of the college, and chair of the Department of Social Sciences.

In 1926 he married Roberta Adele Clairborne. He is the composer of the Oakwood College song, "To Thee, Our Dear Oakwood."

At the time of his retirement in 1968 he had served Oakwood College for 42 years. His death, on Oct. 23, was the result of a car accident.

Edwards, William Herbert

EDWARDS, WILLIAM HERBERT (1854—1938). Secretary, treasurer. After his baptism in 1877 he joined the staff of the Review and Herald Publishing Association and served first as manager of the Book Department (1878—1888), and then as secretary and treasurer (1888—1891). Between 1891 and 1901 he served variously as treasurer of the General Conference, secretary and treasurer of the General Conference Association, and treasurer of the Foreign Mission Board. He was also for a time treasurer of the Michigan Conference. From 1901 to 1912 he was secretary-treasurer of the Lake Union, and then served as secretary-treasurer and auditor of the Northern Union (1912—1918). After 1918 he was in charge of the printshop at the General Conference.

Effort

EFFORT. In Seventh-day Adventist evangelistic usage, a word that crept into use as a technical term for a public evangelistic campaign. This sense may have been derived from, or at least developed out of, the frequent appearance of the word in Ellen White's urgent appeals, beginning in the 1880s, to evangelize the cities. Following are examples: "In efforts made in large cities one half of the effort is lost because they close up the work too soon" (Ev 328). "How much better if some of the same speakers who arouse the interest of the people during the largest attendance at the meeting would remain to follow up the work begun, by a thoroughly organized protracted effort" (ibid. 83). In her usage "making public effort" (ibid. 445; cf. 429) was equivalent to "holding public meetings." It was perhaps from this equivalence that the expression "hold efforts," arose among ministers and laity. However, in her terminology an effort was made, put forth, entered upon, or engaged in (ibid. 42, 325, 399, 457), not held. Today the rather incomprehensible phrase has generally been replaced; "campaign" or "program" supplants "effort" as a term for a series of meetings.

Egypt Academy

EGYPT ACADEMY. See Nile Union Academy.

Egypt, Arab Republic of EGYPT, ARAB REPUBLIC OF. A republic situated in Africa including the eastern Sahara, the Nile Valley, the isthmus of Suez, and the Sinai Peninsula. It has an area of 386,650 square miles (1 million square kilometers). Of the country's 59.3 million people (1994), most live in the Nile Valley.

The racial groups that through many centuries entered Egypt have been assimilated to produce an Arabic-speaking indigenous Egyptian race, basically Mediterranean-type, with Arab and Negroid elements. Many Armenian and Greek colonies are found in the cities and large towns. More than 90 percent of Egyptians are Muslims. The largest religious minority is the 8 million-strong Monophysite Christian community known as the Coptic Orthodox Church, dating from before the Muslim period. The Roman Catholic Church began missionary work in Egypt around the turn of the thirteenth century. It was not until the nineteenth century that Protestants took an active interest in Egypt. In 1993 there were about 750,000 Protestants in Egypt in no less than 17 denominations. The oldest university in the world is in Egypt, the Al-Azhar in Cairo.

Ancient Egypt, whose pyramids were already old in the days of Abraham, Joseph, and Moses, saw the last of its pharaohs in the closing period of the Old Testament, yet it still exists as a nation, outliving all the empires that successively ruled it—Persian, Macedonian, Roman, Byzantine, Arab, and Turkish.

In Alexandria, as a center of Hellenistic culture, were blended Greek and Eastern thought. There Jewish scholars produced the Septuagint—the Greek translation of the Old Testament that was used by the apostles. Alexandrian astronomers gave to Rome—and thence to us—the ancient Egyptian 365-day year; the early Alexandrian Church Fathers blended Greek philosophy with Christianity and developed their own brand of theology; and Egypt gave monasticism to the church.

In the seventh century the Egyptian Christians, oppressed by the Byzantines as heretics, welcomed the invading Arabs as liberators. Egypt accepted Islam and the Arabic language and became a stronghold of Muslim orthodoxy. However, a Christian minority held out; their present descendants in the Coptic Orthodox Church still use in their liturgy the old Coptic dialects, derived from the ancient Egyptian language. (The terms Copt and Coptic, now ordinarily applied specifically to indigenous Egyptian Christians, originally meant merely “Egyptian.”)

Early in the nineteenth century the country began to move toward modernization. In 1882, after a massacre of foreigners in Alexandria, Britain stepped in, though Egypt remained a part of the Turkish Empire. World War I made Egypt a British protectorate; in 1922 it became a kingdom, under Fuad I; in 1953, a republic.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Egypt was the first of the Middle Eastern countries to be entered by the SDAs. Beginning sometime in 1877, the Italian SDAs in Naples sent the French paper Signes des Temps to their acquaintances among the Italians in Alexandria and corresponded with them about the SDA doctrines. In the spring of 1878 Romualdo Bartola, an Italian commercial traveler and self-supporting missionary, visited Alexandria on business and formed a group there, baptizing seven persons. In 1879 Dr. Herbert Panmure Ribton, a graduate of Dublin University, who was one of the first to be baptized in Italy and who pioneered the work in southern Italy, moved to Alexandria, then the largest commercial port on the Mediterranean, and began missionary work. He opened a school and had some tracts translated into Arabic. However, two years later, on June 11, 1882, he and two Italian converts, Giuseppe Rupp and one Aligretti, were killed in Alexandria during a riot against foreigners there. As a result, the group of members was scattered.

About 15 years afterward several Armenian SDA families from Turkey settled in Cairo and Alexandria and spread the SDA doctrines there. About the same time, J. Leuzinger, from Italy, went to Port Said to do ship missionary work. In 1899 Louis F. Passebois, and his wife and Ida Schlegel, trained nurses, were sent from Europe. They opened a health home and restaurant in Cairo. Their work resulted in several converts, and in 1901 L. R. Conradi of the European Division organized the first Seventh-day Adventist church in Egypt.

In 1902 the Oriental Union Mission, with headquarters in Cairo, was formed and placed under the direction of W. H. Wakeham, a Canadian-born missionary from the United States. Sometime before 1906 the publishing work was begun with the printing of a small book in Arabic on the prophecies of Daniel.

Between 1906 and 1908 the first national SDA minister in Egypt, Awaida Abd es-Shahid, was ordained. But apostasy among the Armenian members developed about that time and depleted the membership so that it was necessary to build up the work again. The work in Egypt was put under the Egyptian-Syrian Mission of the newly formed Levant Union Mission. George Keough, of Ireland, came in 1908 to take charge of the work, and set out to master the Arabic language.

Progress was slow. In 1912 there were only 18 members, with two ordained ministers, one Bible instructor, four colporteurs (at Cairo), and two nurses. But in the same year a group of upper Egyptian Christians, led by former Presbyterian Yacoub Beshai Yacoub, from the village of Beni Adi, near Assiut, learned about Keough, a White man who kept the Sabbath. They had been keeping the seventh-day Sabbath for about six years. When they invited him to visit, Keough found a ready-made community of Sabbath observers. He soon baptized 24 people, of whom 17 were men, and, in 1913, organized them into the first indigenous Seventh-day Adventist church in the country.

Shortly before World War I the country was divided into two missions: Lower Egypt, with headquarters in Cairo, led by W. K. Ising; and Upper Egypt, with headquarters in Beni Adi, with George Keough in charge. There were about 40 SDAs in Egypt, coming from the Greek, Armenian, and Coptic communities. During the war Ising, a German national, was interned, but Keough continued the work, organizing churches in Tataliah and Deirut. When the Levant Union was dissolved in 1923, and the Egypto-Syrian Mission of the European Division was organized, with Keough in charge, there were 70 members in Egypt.

In 1923 plans were laid for the development of work among the Arabs and for opening a publishing work at Matariah, near Cairo. C. H. Rieckman was called to head the bookwork. An edition of 7,500 copies of The Sure Word of Prophecy was printed in Arabic, as well as smaller books. Five colporteurs worked in the field. The main SDA work was carried on at that time in Cairo, Beni Adi, Tataliah, and Deirut. There were members also in Masra, Sohag, and Luxor.

In 1927 the Arabic Union Training School was opened in Matariah, with V. E. Toppenberg as director and Ibrahim Khalil as a teacher, but continued only a few years. (See Nile Union Academy.)

Egypt was included in the territory of the Arabic Union Mission, which was organized in November 1927 as part of the European Division (from 1928, of the Central European Division). In the 1930s work was resumed in Alexandria by M. C. Grin. Twelve persons were baptized.

When the events leading up to World War II separated the work in Egypt from the Central European Division headquarters, American missionaries were sent in by the General Conference, and E. L. Branson became director of the Egyptian Mission. The northern Sudan was included in the Egyptian Mission, an arrangement that continued until 1950.

At the time of the organization of the Middle East Division in 1950, the Egypt Mission became part of the Nile Union Mission (to which was assigned the territory of Egypt, Libya, northern Sudan, that part of Arabia bordering on the Red Sea, and Aden). In 1955 the Egypt Mission was divided: the Lower (Northern) Egypt Mission came under the direction of Hilal Dose and the Upper Egypt Mission was directed by C. V. Brauer. The area was further divided in January 1957, when Hilal Dose was placed in charge of the Central Egypt Section, Hilmy Berbawy as president of the Upper Egypt Section, and W. R. Leshner in charge of the Delta Section. These divisions proved unwieldy, and by December 1958 the work was reunited in one Egypt Section. This was administered by the officers of the Nile Union. At the Nile Union biennial council of 1960 it was decided to Egyptianize the church organization. A new constitution was adopted that provided for a national church, called the Coptic Adventist Denomination in Egypt. Hilal Dose became the first national president.

In 1962 the Nile Union was discontinued, leaving the Middle East Division to deal directly with the Egyptian church.

In the reorganization of 1970 the administration of Egypt was placed under the Egypt Field, a part of the Middle East Union, which was, in turn, part of the Afro-Mideast Division.

In 1941 there were two schools, one at Beni Adi and another at Tataliah. In a decade and a half the educational work grew to 12 schools. In 1946 the Egypt Training School (later the Nile Union Academy, now called in English the Adventist Theological Institute of Egypt and the Nile Union Academy, and in Arabic a name translated literally the “Coptic Adventist Theological Seminary”) was established at Fayoum (Seila) and in 1954 moved to Gabal el-Asfar. When in the mid-1950s government curriculum requirements caused the church to close most of its schools, this school, along with the Heliopolis Adventist School, remained open. The Heliopolis elementary school was moved to property at nearby Zeitoun. In 1993 only the Nile Union Academy was still in operation.

Welfare work of various types has been developed in recent years. In 1947 an orphanage, named the Matariah Mercy Home, was established in Matariah, with Erna Kruger as matron. During 1963 the orphanage was rebuilt and its capacity doubled. Welfare centers have been established by the major churches. Special government awards were given in 1963 to the Seventh-day Adventist Welfare Societies in Fayoum and Assiut for outstanding service.

A limited medical work has been done in recent years. During the 1940s Erna Kruger did some medical missionary work in Cairo; Dr. Maher Bishai operated a small clinic in Heliopolis in 1953; and a small clinic was operated at Maghagha for a few months in 1956 by Dr. Youssiff Bishai.

About the end of 1959 an evangelistic center was opened in Cairo.

Beginning in 1971 steps were taken to establish a health food factory in Cairo. Land was purchased and construction began in 1974. The Adventist Health Education Foundation (Egypt Food Factory) was operating in 1993.

Work in Egypt has been carried on through the conducting of junior camps, Vacation Bible Schools, evangelistic meetings, and temperance programs.

Ehlers, Waldemar

EHLERS, WALDEMAR (1879—1929). One of the pioneer Seventh-day Adventist workers in Brazil. Born and educated in Germany, he began his service in the office of the Hamburg Publishing House in 1896, then in 1898 went to Brazil as a teacher, and in 1901 entered evangelistic work. He was the first president of the Santa Catarina and Paraná Conference (1906—1909) and later was president of the Rio Grande do Sul Conference (1909—1914). Failing health forced his return to Germany, where he taught at Friedensau for two years, then preached and was president of three different conferences until 1923, when he could no longer continue in active service and retired to Brazil.

Elder (ordained minister)

ELDER (ordained minister). A title used by Seventh-day Adventists to designate an ordained minister, although “pastor” is more often used. However, “pastor” is also applied to licensed ministers. Believing that “reverend” belongs properly only to God (Ps. 111:9), SDAs do not address their ministers by this title. “Elder” as used in the Bible did not necessarily mean an old person, but one who has attained maturity and experience. In the OT the title was used for those of certain official rank and position, such as heads of families, households, or tribes (Gen. 50:7; Ex. 3:16; 2 Sam. 5:3). The NT applies presbuteros (“elder”) also to church leaders (see Church Elder).

SDAs of the late 1840s and early 1850s did not use “elder” in referring to their own ordained ministers, preferring to call them “brother.” They did, however, refer to non-SDA ministers by “elder.” With the rise of church organization and the need for a fully qualified ministry, “elder,” referring to an ordained minister, came into general use among Seventh-day Adventists in North America. In recent years “elder” has declined in popularity somewhat, but continues as an alternative for “pastor.”

Eldridge, Clement

ELDRIDGE, CLEMENT (fl. 1885—1895). Publishing and religious liberty leader. His name first appears in the denominational Yearbook in 1887, when he was auditor at the Central Publishing Association (Review and Herald) in Battle Creek. In December 1888 he became a member of the first press committee appointed to bring the issue of religious liberty before the public. In 1889 he apparently was chair of the second committee that prepared the way for the founding of the National Religious Liberty Association, of which he became the first president. In that same year he was a member of the building committee for the schooner Pitcairn. In 1889 his name appeared also as the general manager of the Central Publishing Association, a position he held until 1892 or 1893, when he joined a private publishing firm in Chicago. In 1890 his name appeared as the first general canvassing agent for the International Tract and Missionary Society, thus making him a forerunner of the General Conference Publishing Department directors.

Eldridge, Retha Hazel

ELDRIDGE, RETHA HAZEL (1910—1990). Teacher, writer, missionary, linguist. After growing up in New York City, she graduated from Atlantic Union College in 1934. She and her minister husband, Paul H. Eldridge, accepted a call in 1937 to teach in Japan. Surviving World War II included internment in a Japanese prison camp and a dramatic rescue by American paratroops which provided material for her first book, Bombs and Blessings, published in 1946. Back in Japan again after the war, she began serving as director of the Voice of Prophecy Bible Correspondence School, and became the only Seventh-day Adventist woman to develop proficiency in reading Japanese. The publishing house asked her to make prepublishing comparison of translated materials to verify accuracy and ensure preservation of nuance. She read the entire handwritten Japanese manuscript for The Desire of Ages, a massive undertaking.

Her second book, From the Rising of the Sun, telling the story of the Voice of Prophecy in Japan, was published in 1964. Retiring in 1975 after serving 38 years in the Far Eastern Division, she produced her final literary work at the request of Home Study International—a course of study in prophetic guidance, published about 1978. Having completed a lifetime of service, that included homemaking, teaching, accounting, writing, management roles, and loyal support of her husband, she died in 1990, shortly after her eightieth birthday.

Ellen G. White Estate, Incorporated

ELLEN G. WHITE ESTATE, INCORPORATED. An organization created by the last will and testament of Ellen G. White to act as her agent in the custody of her writings, handling her properties, “conducting the business thereof,” “securing the printing of new translations,” and the “printing of compilations from my manuscripts.” Her will, dated Feb. 9, 1912 (printed in its entirety as Appendix Q in F. D. Nichol’s Ellen G. White and Her Critics), named five church leaders to serve as a board of trustees: Arthur G. Daniells, president of the General Conference; William C. White, her son; Clarence C. Crisler, a secretary; Charles H. Jones, manager of the Pacific Press; and Francis M. Wilcox, editor of the Review and Herald. Four of the five were members of the Executive Committee of the General Conference.

Appointment of the trustees was for life, Ellen White providing that “if a vacancy shall occur for any reason among said trustees, or their successors, a majority of the surviving or remaining trustees are hereby empowered and directed to fill such vacancy by the appointment of some other fit person”; or if this provision were to fail, the General Conference Executive Committee should appoint someone to fill such a vacancy. The will dedicated the major portion of the existing and potential royalty incomes from her books to the work of the trustees. (For additional information, see Appendix B, “The Settlement of Ellen G. White’s Estate,” in volume 6 of A. L. White’s biography of Ellen White, Ellen G. White: The Later Elmshaven Years.)

At the death of Ellen White, July 16, 1915, this self-perpetuating board began to function. It soon sold Ellen White’s real estate, consisting mainly of Elmshaven, her home property near St. Helena, California, then began the continued care of her literary properties. Under the terms of the will, such responsibilities fell into three areas: (1) possession of the copyrights to her writings and the care and promotion of her books in the English language; (2) preparation of manuscripts for, and the promotion of the translation and publication of her writings in other languages; and (3) custody of the files of manuscripts and other files, and the selection of matter from the E. G. White manuscript files for publication. The board now carries a fourth responsibility, which has developed naturally through the years—acquainting Seventh-day Adventists and others with Mrs. White and her work.

Organization

Organization. The Original Board. When the board was organized in 1915, A. G. Daniells served as president. The secretaryship, after being held for a short time by C. C. Crisler, passed to W. C. White, the only member of the board devoting full time to the work of the trustees. He filled this office until his death in 1937. From 1915 to 1937 the work was carried on at Elmshaven in a rented office building with a vault that was used to house the E. G. White materials.

During the 19 years they worked together, the original members, in addition to routine tasks, (1) published 10 posthumous compilations (for an annotated bibliography of the E. G.

White books, see White, Ellen G., Writings of, and Appendix D in the Comprehensive Index to the Writings of Ellen G. White); (2) produced an 865-page Comprehensive Index to the Writings of Ellen G. White, published in 1926; (3) carried forward the thorough indexing of the Ellen G. White manuscript files; and (4) in counsel with the leading officers of the General Conference in 1933 and 1934, laid the foundation for continuing the trusteeship in perpetuity. The steps taken to ensure the perpetuation of the trusteeship were: (a) in 1933 the trustees, as the constituency, formed a corporation under the laws of the state of California “to carry out and perform the provisions of the charitable trust created by the last will and testament of Ellen G. White deceased”; (b) the General Conference agreed to provide adequate financial support for the work of the trustees in the form of an annual budget; the trustees, in turn, assigned to the General Conference all royalty incomes produced by the Ellen G. White books; (c) it was agreed to move the property and work of the trustees at some appropriate future time to Washington, D.C., thus placing it close to the world headquarters of the church.

Period of Transition. When three of the original trustees died—one in 1935 and two in 1936—the vacancies were filled in harmony with the provisions of the will and the bylaws of the 1933 corporation. The full-time secretary, W. C. White, died on Sept. 1, 1937. He was replaced by his son, Arthur L. White, who for nine years had served as his secretary and for four years as assistant secretary of the White Estate. The work of the White Estate was moved to the General Conference, Washington, D.C., in January, 1938.

Present Organization. With the demands upon them increasing steadily with the growth of the church and numerous constituencies to be represented, in 1950 the trustees increased the board’s membership from five to seven, and in 1958 amended the bylaws of the corporation to provide for a constituency and board of nine, seven to be life members and two to be elected for a term corresponding to that of General Conference elected personnel (originally four years, but now five). In 1970 the board was increased to 11; in 1980, to 13; and, in 1985, to 15. The number of life members has remained at seven. At quinquennial meetings the board also elects the secretary and associate secretaries, as well as officers of the corporation, as provided for in the bylaws.

Relationship to General Conference

Relationship to General Conference. Through the years a close working relationship has obtained between the White trustees and the General Conference. Most of the trustees are members of the General Conference Executive Committee. Various matters, such as promoting the overseas publication of the Ellen G. White material, appropriation of funds to assist in the foreign language publication of Ellen G. White books, and overall planning of Spirit of Prophecy promotion, including preparation of materials for the annual Spirit of Prophecy Sabbath, although intimately related to the work of the White trustees, are beyond the sphere of their direct responsibility. These are handled by the General Conference Committee through a sub-committee known as the Spirit of Prophecy Committee. This committee includes several of the White trustees. The duties of this subcommittee and the working relationship between the General Conference Committee and the White Estate are currently set forth in a joint agreement adopted by the General Conference Committee and the White Estate trustees on Oct. 10, 1957. There is an interlocking and at times overlapping of responsibilities; nevertheless, a smooth and efficient working relationship between the two organizations is maintained.

The Work of the White Estate

The Work of the White Estate. Routine Work. The paid staff members: (1) safeguard and maintain the records in the custody of the trustees, and the indexes thereto, in such a manner as to serve the church; (2) handle the copyrights to the Ellen G. White works; (3) conduct such research in these works and the related historical materials as may be called for; (4) respond to questions that may be directed to the White Estate in personal interviews and in a worldwide correspondence; (5) assemble, when authorized by the trustees, materials for compilations from Ellen G. White's writings; (6) foster, in conjunction with the Spirit of Prophecy Committee, the ever-widening publication of these writings in various languages and at times make selections or abridgments as called for and authorized; (7) fill assignments in church, institutional, and field visitation as the needs and best interests of the advancing work of the church require; (8) conduct tours of historical sites of denominational interest, especially in the New England states; and (9) prepare articles, correspondence lessons, and text materials.

Productions of special value to the church include the four-volume Comprehensive Index to the Writings of Ellen G. White (1962, 1992); the six-volume facsimile reprints of the Ellen G. White Present Truth and Review and Herald articles; the four-volume Ellen G. White Signs of the Times articles; the Ellen G. White Youth's Instructor articles; the Periodical Resource Collection volumes; the six-volume biography of Ellen G. White, by A. L. White; and The Published Writings of Ellen G. White on Compact Disc (CD-ROM), a tool of inestimable value to users of computers.

Branch Offices and Research Centers

Branch Offices and Research Centers. The White Estate maintains two branch office research centers—one at Andrews University, Berrien Springs, Michigan, and the other at Loma Linda University, Loma Linda, California. These offices contain duplicates of the Ellen White documents and other historical materials housed in the main office at General Conference headquarters. Beginning in 1974, the White Estate also has set up Ellen G. White-SDA Research Centers on the campuses of 11 Seventh-day Adventist colleges and universities outside North America, in the countries of Argentina, Australia, Brazil, England, India, Korea, Mexico, Nigeria, Philippines, Russia, and South Africa.

Use of E. G. White Manuscript Materials

Use of E. G. White Manuscript Materials. During the later years of her life, Ellen White often drew upon her unique 50,000-page manuscript file in the preparation of published works. The White trustees have continued to draw upon this for the compilations made since her death. These manuscripts constitute an invaluable basic file of historical records and of counsel to the church. The copyright of these manuscripts resides solely with the White trustees.

While all of Ellen White's writings are available for research, the unpublished letters, manuscripts, and other materials in the Ellen G. White files do not constitute a public archive. The sacred nature of the files generally and the confidential nature of many of the communications in the files require that they be cared for and used responsibly. Even manuscripts whose primary value is historical in nature must not be used in a solely secular manner. "Spiritual things are spiritually discerned" (The Desire of Ages, p. 55; see also 1 Cor. 2:14). Because of this, during the first few decades following Ellen White's death, careful policies governing the use and release of unpublished materials were set up, ultimately resulting in the publication of 21 volumes known as Manuscript Releases. In recent years the earlier restrictive policies have been adapted to accommodate the needs of increased research.

Officers of the Board

Officers of the Board. The two chief officers of the board are the chair and the secretary. The chair is also president of the corporation. The secretary serves not only as secretary of the board but as executive secretary of the organization, being responsible for the day-to-day operations of the office and staff. Beginning in 1915, when the terms of Ellen White's will went into effect, the White Estate has had 10 chairs and four secretaries.

Chairs: A. G. Daniells, 1915—1935; J. E. Fulton, 1935—1936; J. L. Shaw, 1936—1937; F. M. Wilcox, 1938—1944; M. E. Kern, 1944—1951; D. E. Rebok, 1952; A. V. Olson, 1952—1963; F. D. Nichol 1963—1966; W. P. Bradley, 1966—1980; Kenneth H. Wood, 1980— .

Ellingworth, George Albert

ELLINGWORTH, GEORGE ALBERT (1881—1942). English missionary to Africa. Born in Bedfordshire, England, he went to South Africa in 1902. After becoming a Seventh-day Adventist in 1904, he canvassed for a few months, then entered Claremont Union (now Helderberg) College. When an urgent need arose at Solusi Mission, he answered the call, returning to the college nine months later. About 1908 he accepted his first regular appointment, going to the Maranatha Mission in the Kaffirland field.

Called in 1909 to Nyasaland (Malawi), he worked there for 18 years, for many years as a teacher at Malamulo, at first with Joel C. Rogers, then, from 1912 to 1920 with Christopher Robinson. While in Nyasaland he was joined by Mary Long, who became his wife. Many teachers trained in Ellingworth's classes went out to build up mission schools established throughout southern Nyasaland.

During World War I Ellingworth served for two years in the Medical Department of the British Army in Nyasaland. It was a time of real hardship for the Ellingworth family. A little daughter, Jessie, died of malaria. In 1920 Ellingworth succeeded Christopher Robinson in charge of the Nyasaland field, which in 1925 was separated from the Zambesi Union and organized as the Southeast African Union Mission, with headquarters at Malamulo, with Ellingworth as the first president.

In 1928 Ellingworth accepted a call to head the Tanganyika Field (Tanzania) and in 1937 became president of the Congo Union, with headquarters at Gitwe. In 1939, when failing health made it necessary for him to move to a lower elevation, he took charge of the South Congo Field, and in 1941 he moved to Songa Mission. The following year, while on a tour of the schools around Elisabethville, he died suddenly in April from a heart attack. He was buried in the Protestant cemetery of that city, the service being conducted by Bishop John M. Springer, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, according to the outline of the burial service as found in the SDA Manual for Ministers, which the bishop found in Ellingworth's briefcase.

Elliott, Henry Thomas

ELLIOTT, HENRY THOMAS (1888—1967). Educator, departmental and General Conference secretary. Elliott was born in Wisconsin and received his education at Emmanuel Missionary College, graduating in 1912. He served as preceptor and teacher at Bethel Academy for a time and was principal of the school from 1914 to 1920. He was ordained to the ministry in 1920 and, after two years as MV secretary of the Lake Union, he became an associate secretary of the General Conference MV Department. In 1930 he was elected general secretary of the department, and three years later he became associate secretary of the General Conference, a position he held for 25 years.

Elliott, Walter Paul

ELLIOTT, WALTER PAUL (1892—1967). Administrator, departmental secretary, board chair. He was born in Illinois and received his education at Bethel Academy and Emmanuel Missionary College. He was married in 1911 to Alice Garton, and six years later began denominational service in Michigan. Beginning in 1922, he was in charge of the Haitian Mission for five years. Following this he served as assistant to the president of the Potomac Conference, and from 1929 to 1933 was president of that conference. From 1933 to 1946 he was connected with the Review and Herald Publishing Association, serving as general manager of that institution for 10 years. He then became publishing secretary of the General Conference. In 1950 he was elected chair of the board of trustees of the College of Medical Evangelists, where he served for nine years.

During this time the university established the School of Dentistry and Graduate School, and constructed the present White Memorial Medical Center in Los Angeles. During this period he also served as chair of the board of the Pacific Press Publishing Association. He retired in 1959.

El Salvador

EL SALVADOR. The smallest but most densely populated of the Central American republics, bounded on the northeast and east by Honduras, on the east by the Gulf of Fonseca and Nicaragua, on the south by the Pacific Ocean, and on the northwest by Guatemala. It is about 160 miles (260 kilometers) long and 60 miles (100 kilometers) wide and covers 8,236 square miles (21,300 square kilometers). It is a land of lakes and volcanoes, of mountain ranges and fertile valleys. Its climate is tropical but not unbearably hot. It has been an independent republic since 1839.

The population of El Salvador (1994) is 5.7 million. The language is Spanish and the dominant religion is Roman Catholic, though the constitution provides religious liberty for all.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. The territory of El Salvador constitutes the El Salvador Conference, part of the Central American Union Mission, which in turn is part of the Inter-American Division. Statistics (1992) for El Salvador: churches, 194; members, 54,666; church or elementary schools, 11; ordained ministers, 16. The El Salvador Conference headquarters are strategically located in the heart of a new center of government buildings, corner of 19 Calle Poniente and 3rd Avenida Norte, Urbanización Guadalupe, San Salvador, El Salvador.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. The first SDA missionaries in El Salvador were John L. Brown and his wife, who arrived there in the fall of 1915. Through the sale of publications, they introduced SDA teachings to the people, so that by the end of the year there were several Sabbathkeepers and many friends. Early in 1916 public meetings were held and 14 persons were baptized. The first church was organized at San Salvador, the capital, on Oct. 21, 1916, with a membership of 19, and soon afterward a church school was opened. Next Brown went to Santa Ana, the second-largest city, and held another series of evangelistic meetings. Soon a church was organized there also and a small church school opened. About this time U. M. Cooke went to El Salvador to begin the colporteur work, and several new converts were recruited. J. A. Bodle and his wife, who colportured there, contributed much to the success of SDA work in Santa Ana.

C. F. Staben, who became director of the El Salvador Mission in 1918, reported a membership of 50 in that year. Thereafter, despite many political upheavals, SDA work grew steadily in El Salvador. All principal towns and many smaller towns and villages have well-organized SDA churches. Church schools were opened soon after the work was organized in San Salvador and continued with increasing success. In 1992 there were 70 teachers and 124 students. In 1944 the Voice of Prophecy broadcasts began, and the radio correspondence school was opened a few months later. The Dorcas Society has played an important part in the mission work in El Salvador. Youth camps and Voice of Youth broadcasts also helped the growth of the Seventh-day Adventist Church. In 1992 there were 337 Youth Societies and 40 Dorcas Societies in the country.

Empress Zauditu Memorial Adventist Hospital

EMPRESS ZAUDITU MEMORIAL ADVENTIST HOSPITAL. A 110-bed hospital operated for 44 years by the Ethiopian Union Mission in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia. The hospital was established in 1932 by Emperor Haile Selassie I. On the occasion of his being crowned (Nov. 2, 1930), the Scandinavian Union Conference of Seventh-day Adventists had sent him congratulations, and he had expressed a desire to present a gift to the SDA mission. Realizing the needs of his people, and being well acquainted with SDA medical work, he asked the church to operate the new hospital. Dr. George Bergman was appointed the first medical director.

The Italians took over the hospital about the beginning of 1939. In the last year of its operation during the Italian administration, the hospital was listed in the Yearbook as the Adventist Sanitarium and Hospital.

When the emperor returned in May 1941, Mrs. Della Hanson, wife of the mission superintendent, approached him regarding the restoration of the hospital. He turned it over to the mission at once. Nurses Lisa Johansen (Johannesson) and Rasmine Hofstad moved in, and beginning in 1942, they operated it with the help of a local eye specialist. Merlin G. Anderson, M.D., came in 1945 and served eight years as medical director.

On Jan. 26, 1971, the new Empress Zauditu Memorial Adventist Hospital was officially opened by Emperor Haile Selassie I. In addition to facilities offered by the old hospital, the new hospital had a sauna bath, hydrotherapy, inhalation therapy, Bacteriology Department, improved X-ray department, dental clinic, and a dresser school. A new nursing school complex, built with Norwegian aid in 1971, provided housing for 40 student nurses, and had a library, chapel, four classrooms, two offices, a lounge, and three apartments.

During the first six months of 1971, 20,750 new patients were seen in the outpatient clinic (return visits not included) and 7,823 patient visits were made in the appointment clinic.

Empress Zauditu Hospital was nationalized in 1976.

English Language Schools (Far East)

ENGLISH LANGUAGE SCHOOLS (Far East). A name applied to church-sponsored community schools designed to assist indigenous people to learn the English language, and at the same time to teach them the message of the Seventh-day Adventist Church. Small schools of this kind have been operating on and off in most countries of the Far East ever since overseas missionaries first arrived.

The organized language school idea did not materialize until the colleges of North America started a student missionary program.

History

History. The organized English language school idea started in the fall of 1966 at the Osaka Center in Japan, when a young American evangelist, M. T. Bascom, discovered soon after he arrived in that city that one of the most effective evangelistic programs in the Osaka Center had been the English language classes started by Bobbie Jane Van Dolson when the center was opened and that most Japanese young people wanted to learn English. Bascom and his wife started a school with an enrollment of 16. This grew very rapidly until it was necessary for him to call on students from the United States to assist with the program. The school continued to expand until, in early 1975, there were eight schools in Japan alone. Bascom returned to the United States to work on his doctorate, and a former student missionary, Bruce Bauer, took over as director of the language schools. He remained in that position until 1983, when Roy Castlebuono took over. In 1991 the language schools were reorganized and were directed from the English Language School Department at the Japan Union Conference. In 1993 Mark Duarte was serving as director.

In September 1969 Dean Hubbard, then finishing his Korean language study, started a similar school in Seoul, Korea, and it was an immediate success. A second school started shortly thereafter in Pusan, Korea. In 1973 the former city hall in Kwangju, Korea, was purchased by the Seoul school and thus a third school started in Korea. See Seventh-day Adventist Language Institutes, Korea.

The idea spread, and soon there were schools in Djakarta and Bandung, Java, Indonesia; Phnom Penh, Cambodia; Haad Yai, Thailand; and Menado, Celebes, Indonesia. In early 1975 there were 16 English language schools operating in the territory of the Far Eastern Division.

In the fall of 1974 the Far Eastern Division committee appointed a full-time English language school director for the division. The first director was Dr. M. T. Bascom.

Enoch, George Francis

ENOCH, GEORGE FRANCIS (1876—1944). Evangelist, missionary for 36 years. He was educated at Battle Creek College, Walla Walla College, and Pacific Union College. In 1898 he married Bertha Graham. In that same year he was appointed to the West Indies, where he worked for three years each in Jamaica, Trinidad, and Barbados. In 1907 he went to India, where he carried on aggressive evangelism in many centers, including Lucknow and Bombay, and for several years edited the Oriental Watchman.

Enriquillo Adventist Secondary School

ENRIQUILLO ADVENTIST SECONDARY SCHOOL. A 12-grade educational institution that is accredited by the Inter-American Division and the Department of Education of the Dominican Republic. It is situated in Jábaba, a small town some 2.5 miles (four kilometers) from Moca, the nearest city.

The school began in 1925 when Luis G-mez donated the land on which the school was constructed. The first teacher was Adolfo Miranda. It originally was named Academia Arturo Roth and functioned as a primary school until 1979, when the secondary school courses were started. It is interesting to note that this campus has one of the best vegetable gardens functioning in the entire North Dominican Conference. In 1993 a total of 230 students were in attendance and the school had seven teachers. Primary school principals have included Adolfo Miranda, Nena Cabrera, Ana Cabral, Salvador Alvarez, and Germania G-mez (28 years).

Principals: Ramon Alberto, 1980—1982; Gladys de Lora, 1982—1984; Moises Lora, 1984—1985; Daniel Fana, 1985—1990; Librael G-mez, 1990— .

Enterprise Academy

ENTERPRISE ACADEMY. A coeducational boarding school on the senior high school level, situated on the south edge of the small town of Enterprise, Kansas, and overlooking the Smoky Hill River valley. Owned and operated by the Kansas-Nebraska Conference, it is one of three academies serving this conference of 10,964 members. During the school year of 1993—1994 there were 21 full- and part-time staff members, including the Industrial Department heads.

Immediate forerunners of Enterprise Academy were schools at Downs and Oswego, Kansas.

With the financial aid of local businesspersons, the conference expanded an existing two-teacher school in Oswego, an intermediate school operated since 1901, and opened the Strode Industrial Academy on Sept. 16, 1908. In addition to the regular academy subjects, the academy offered courses in practical training in agriculture and taught certain trades. N. W. Kauble, a former president of Union College and of Emmanuel Missionary College, was the first principal. In 1917 the name of the school was changed to Oswego Academy. After the East Kansas Conference and the West Kansas Conference, in existence since 1910, combined in 1914 to form the Kansas Conference, the leaders of the united conference considered it desirable to have one strong school in a central location. Accordingly, in 1919 a Methodist school property at Enterprise, Kansas, was purchased. At that time the property consisted of 23 acres (nine hectares), with four buildings. An additional 47 acres (19 hectares) were purchased. All the original buildings have since been replaced. Enterprise Academy opened on Sept. 17, 1919.

Years of drought, causing many Seventh-day Adventists to move to other states that were not affected by the adverse weather conditions, brought losses in enrollment. With the establishment of an academy in Missouri in 1946, students from that state no longer attended Enterprise Academy. This brought a further decrease in enrollment.

Of the present buildings, the gymnasium was built in 1943, the cafeteria-chapel in 1946—1947, and the campus store in 1951. At a constituency meeting called in May 1959 to consider the future of the academy, it was voted overwhelmingly to rebuild the plant and continue to operate Enterprise Academy as the school for the Kansas Conference. Since that time, new buildings added were the girls' dormitory (completed in 1960), the administration building (completed in 1962), and the boys' dormitory (completed in 1963). A 12-room addition was added to the girls' dormitory in 1965, and in 1974 a new dean's quarters, worship room, and recreation room were added to the boys' dormitory, plus additional dormitory rooms.

A larger gymnasium was built in 1966, allowing the first gymnasium to house school industries until 1972, when a large industrial building was built to house them. The first gymnasium and an adjacent building are now a functional industrial education complex, which house classes in auto mechanics, welding, woodworking, and photography, as well as housing the Grounds/Maintenance Department.

Industries at Enterprise Academy include Midco Plastics and the academy farm. The 1,200-acre (500-hectare) farm grows feed grain, forage, hay, and wheat, plus maintaining a herd of 55 range cows plus calves.

Enterprise Academy is accredited by the SDA Board of Regents. The academy publishes the yearbook Our Yesterdays and the school paper Our Todays.

Equatorial Guinea

EQUATORIAL GUINEA. The former Spanish Guinea, consisting of Río Muni, on the west coast of Africa (with several adjacent islands), and the islands of Bioko (formerly Fernando Pó; Mac'as Nguema) and Annobón. The total area is 10,831 square miles (28,000 square kilometers) in size and it has a population (1994) of 400,000. Agriculture is the chief occupation, with cocoa, coffee, wood, fruits, and vegetables the chief exports. Río Muni lies just north of the equator, bounded on the north by Cameroon, on the east and south by Gabon, and on the west by the Gulf of Guinea.

Equatorial Guinea comprises the Equatorial Guinea Mission, which is part of the Central African Union Mission, which in turn is part of the Africa-Indian Ocean Division. Statistics (1993) for Equatorial Guinea: churches, 6; members, 259; ordained ministers, 3; licensed ministers, 2.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. On Bioko there were 14 Seventh-day Adventist members and one ordained minister in 1963. The first missionary was sent in 1960, although two African SDA families from São Tomé had lived on this island for some time. José Lopez, minister and nurse, with his wife, also a nurse, arrived from Spain on Sept. 9 of that year and opened a dispensary and held meetings with the resident members. On May 19, 1962, the first two people were baptized, and in 1963 four more—two from São Tomé, one from Nigeria, and the fourth, a member of the indigenous Bubi tribe.

Because of the political situation, there were no foreign missionaries in Equatorial Guinea for some time after 1972. Four Equatorial Guineans carried on the work. In June 1974 a young graduate from the Bible course at the Séminaire Adventiste (Cameroon Training School) was sent to Bata, the capital of Río Muni. This was the first time that the SDA message entered the part of Equatorial Guinea on the African continent. Within a few months 25 were meeting regularly every Sabbath. By 1993 the membership was more than 250.

Erickson, J. M.

ERICKSON, J. M. (1854—1931). Minister, teacher. He was born in Dalsland, Sweden, and confirmed in the Swedish state church (Lutheran). While in the military school in Stockholm, he was converted and sought immediate release from the military, which was finally obtained with great difficulty. In the autumn of 1879 he sailed for America, and in Minneapolis became an active member of the Baptist Church. Convinced that God was calling him to the ministry, he spent three years in the Baptist Theological Seminary in Morgan Park, Chicago, Illinois. On completion of his studies, he accepted the pastorate of the Worcester, Massachusetts, Baptist Church. Feeling the need of more training, he returned to Sweden and enrolled as a student in Bethel Seminary in Stockholm. After finishing his studies, he returned to the United States and became pastor of the Baptist church in Campello, Massachusetts.

In 1886, through the work of D. M. Canright, Erickson accepted the Seventh-day Adventist faith and began to sell SDA books. In the fall of 1887 he entered South Lancaster Academy to become better acquainted with SDA doctrines. He was ordained in 1888 and began his preaching for the church in Boston and Providence. Before the end of the year he was invited by the General Conference to work in Sweden. Two years later he was called back to head the Swedish Department at Union College, where he remained six years (1890—1896). After this he worked as an evangelist in Connecticut, Michigan, and Massachusetts. Then in 1901 he was called back to Sweden again, where he preached for 10 years. In 1911 he returned to America and for 10 years headed the Bible Department in the Broadview Swedish Seminary at La Grange, Illinois. Then until 1928 he engaged in pastoral work in the cities of Chicago, Minneapolis, and Providence.

Ernst, Luis

ERNST, LUIS (1874—1952). Pastor and administrator. He was born in Uruguay of Swiss descent and was the first student of River Plate College.

In 1898 Ernst sold his land and cattle, transferred the cheese factory he owned to his brother, and one Monday afternoon, probably Sept. 26, with a Bible in one hand and his suitcase in the other, presented himself before the leaders of the Seventh-day Adventist work gathered in Crespo, Entre Ríos, Argentina. His purpose was to attend the SDA school in Entre Ríos, which did not yet exist. The mission committee decided to establish the school immediately, and Luis Ernst stayed in Entre Ríos.

He finished digging the first well for the school, and helped to build the first edifice. He later accompanied F. H. Westphal during his pastoral visits. Westphal used the time to teach him in return for Spanish lessons from the young man, who served as his translator.

He entered evangelistic work in 1903, and in 1905 was ordained to the ministry. He was the first president of the Alto Paraná Mission from 1906 to 1909. In 1907 he, with Ignacio Kalbermatter, raised a church with 12 members in Asunción, Paraguay. Later he worked in Bahía Blanca, Rosario, and other cities in the Argentine Conference, and from 1921 to 1935 he worked in Uruguay. He served as a worker until 1938, at which time he retired.

Erzberger, Heinrich

ERZBERGER, HEINRICH (1884—1953). Administrator, missionary. He was born in Basel, Switzerland, and was baptized in his boyhood. After he attended Friedensau Missionary Seminary for one year (1904—1905), he joined the staff of the East German Conference as Bible instructor, and for eight years served as an evangelist in eastern and western Germany. In 1913 he went to the Middle East as superintendent of the Syrian Mission. In 1917 he succeeded Emil E. Frauchiger as the head of the Levant Union Mission. Six years later, in 1923, he went to preach in Alsace, France, and in Italy. In 1926 he began a term of Bible teaching at Seminar Marienhöhe, near Darmstadt, Germany. From there he went in 1928 to Neandertal Missionary Seminary to serve as its president, then returned to head the Darmstadt school in 1935. From 1939 to 1947 he served as a minister in Germany, and was listed in the Yearbook in the South Bavarian Conference. In 1947 he returned to his native Switzerland, and after four years in the ministry there, he retired in 1951 after 46 years of service to the church. He married Louise Zange in 1912.

Erzberger, James H.

ERZBERGER, JAMES H. (1843—1920). First Seventh-day Adventist minister in Europe. His name is sometimes spelled Erzenberger or Ertzberger. He was born at Eltisberg, near Basel, Switzerland. In 1864 he entered a Protestant training school to prepare for ministerial work, and later worked for a short time as chaplain and evangelist. Before long he met a small group of Sabbathkeepers in Tramelan, Switzerland, who had been instructed by M. B. Czechowski, a converted Polish priest who had brought the SDA message from the United States to Switzerland. Erzberger joyfully accepted the SDA faith, and was baptized by Albert Vuilleumier late in 1868, six years before J. N. Andrews, the first SDA foreign missionary, arrived in Switzerland.

In 1869 the Swiss SDAs established by Czechowski sent Erzberger to the General Conference session, which convened in Battle Creek in May of that year, to plead for a minister. Unfortunately, he arrived too late for the session, but he remained 15 months in the United States, living most of the time in the home of James and Ellen White, who took a special interest in him. Early and late he worked to perfect his knowledge of the English language and to become acquainted with all phases of SDA work.

In September 1870 he returned to Switzerland, having first been ordained. Soon after J. N. Andrews arrived in Switzerland in 1874, Erzberger accompanied him on a visit to a group of Sabbathkeepers in Elberfeld, Rhenish-Prussia, who had accepted the Sabbath truth through the study of their Bibles. Andrews did most of the preaching while Erzberger, who was proficient in German, French, and English, did the translating.

Erzberger remained in Germany more than three years, and while there conducted the first baptism and organized the first church (1876) in Germany.

Thereafter, with the exception of the years 1905—1912, when he and his family lived in Hamburg, Germany, Erzberger made his home in Switzerland to the time of his death in 1920. His work carried him to France, Belgium, and other countries.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. SDA work gained a foothold in Estonia when two ministers, H. J. Loeb sack and Gerhard Perk, visited Reval (now Tallinn) in the summer of 1897. They had been invited there by a woman living in St. Petersburg, then the capital of Russia, who requested them to visit her Baptist parents in Reval. The group of interested people gathered secretly in the home and later in an old barn in a backyard, where Perk preached in German with someone translating into Estonian. There were three converts, all women who in due course were baptized. On Sept. 5, 1897, Perk organized the first SDA church in Estonia, at Tallinn. Gradually new members were added.

In 1898 in Helsingfors (now Helsinki), Finland, the first SDA publication in the Estonian language was printed. It was a tract entitled Taanieli Raamatu Seletus (“Explanations of the Book of Daniel”). The first printing of SDA tracts within the confines of the Russian Empire proper (Finland was autonomous) was done in Riga, Latvia, in 1899. The languages were Latvian and Estonian, not Russian. This work was later suppressed by the government, and afterward all printing for Estonia was done in Germany at the Hamburg Publishing House. In 1905 came Tee Kristuse Juurde (“Steps to Christ”); in 1908, Kristlik Kasinus (“Christian Temperance”); in 1914, Mõtted Índsakskíitmise MŠlt (“Thoughts From the Mount of Blessing”)-all three by Ellen G. White. The magazine Siioni Vahimees (“Zion’s Watchman”) and the church paper Siioni Tööline (“Zion’s Worker”), as well as Sabbath school quarterlies and other church papers, were also published there.

As the work spread throughout the country, churches were organized in several cities. In 1901, when the work in Russia was divided according to ethnic lines, Estonia, along with Latvia, Lithuania, and Poland, was included in the North Russian Mission, under D. P. Gaede. When Gaede worked in Tallinn about 1902, a number of talented young men joined the church, three of whom trained at Friedensau Missionary Seminary and became the first national ministers.

Estonia Between the Wars. After the Russian revolution, Estonia acquired independence, and with it religious freedom. By that time the church numbered about 1,000 adherents, organized into the Estonian Conference. In 1917 the Estonian Publishing Department was organized, and from then until Estonia lost independence in 1940, SDA publications were printed within the country. Martin Bärengrub was in charge of the work. He with L. Hallang, Eduard Ney, Eduard Magi, and Harald Pild, served as editors of various magazines published during that time: Tõe Sõnumud (“Messages of Truth”), Noorte Sõber (“Friend of Youth”), Meie Aeg (“Our Time”), Missioni Teated (“Mission Records”), and Noorte Juhised (“Youth Instruction”). Thousands of tracts and books were also printed during this period. The books and periodicals produced by the publishing house found a ready market in the general public. Nevertheless, the work did not continue without difficulties. When outside pressures were removed, internal difficulties sprang up and led to a division within the church, caused by differences among the leaders. But at the first conference session held after the war, in 1920—attended by L. H. Christian and Aarne Rintala—the church was largely reunited. The work continued to grow rapidly. Public meetings were held in large cities, and for a number of years the church conducted a series of radiobroadcasts from Tartu by Eduard Magi. The membership grew to about 2,200, and the church acquired six church buildings, including two at Tallinn.

In 1923 the Estonian Conference was united with Latvia and Lithuania in the Baltic Union Conference. In that same year the Baltic Union School (Suschenhof) to train workers was opened at Riga, Latvia. From 1935 a small school was operated in the city of Tallinn, with about 60 to 80 students and six to eight teachers. In 1932 and again in 1935 Estonian young people participated in the Baltic Union youth congresses. Later, after the Baltic Union Mission School was closed by the Latvian government, the Estonian Conference opened its own theological school at Tallinn from 1937 to 1940. The school, headed by R. W. Vinglas, taught all subjects required by the state plus denominational theological subjects.

At the time when Estonia was incorporated into the Soviet Union in 1940, the church's institutions were closed, and its stock of literature was confiscated. However, the publications were found during the time of German occupation and bought back by the church as scrap paper. Needless to say, they were quickly distributed. For a time the churches were permitted the use, at a high rent, of their buildings, which had been nationalized. Then, after a time, the various churches were obliged to share buildings with other denominations, especially after some were bombed during the war. However, worship services were permitted. During the war SDAs were active in welfare work.

Later on, when small congregations were merged and the minimum size of a congregation was set at 50 members, this reduced the number of Seventh-day Adventist congregations to 13, in the charge of 13 ministers. Special permission was required for ministers to visit outside of their own churches. Because Sabbath school supplies were no longer available, the churches arranged for a Bible reading hour before the preaching service.

In 1944 the territory of Estonia became part of the Federation of Seventh-day Adventists in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. All denominational organizations except for local churches were dissolved in the 1960s. Although the Estonian Conference ceased to exist in the legal sense, it continued in a de facto sense. The Estonian Conference and the Baltic Union Conference were restored in 1989.

ESTONIAN MISSION SCHOOL (Adventusühingute Usuteaduse Kool). A former training school with an elementary school department established in 1935 and operated by the Estonian Conference at Tallinn, Estonia. The Yearbook lists it from 1936 to 1946 and names R. Vinglas as its principal.

Eternal Life

ETERNAL LIFE. The life without end promised those who believe in Jesus Christ and receive His saving grace (John 3:15, 16; Titus 1:2; 1 John 5:11). The Hebrew word ‘ôlam, commonly translated “eternal,” or “everlasting,” means, basically, “something hidden,” and thus designates a long time whose limits are unknown, or “hidden.” The duration of ‘ôlam is always relative to, and determined by, that to which it is applied. Thus ‘ôlam may refer to a lifetime (Ex. 21:6), or a period the beginning of which is lost in antiquity (Gen. 6:4; Joshua 24:2; Prov. 22:28). When used with the figure of sleep it means death (Jer. 51:39); when applied to God (Ps. 90:2; Isa. 40:28) its designation is limitless. The expression “everlasting life” (chayyê ‘ôlam) occurs in the OT only in Dan. 12:2. Compare v. 7, where God is characterized as chê ha-‘ôlam, “he who lives eternally.” The contextual implication is thus that eternal life is a sharing in the life of God. The Hebrew mind conceived of God as living in limitless time, and not abstractly in the sense of being beyond time. The same mind also conceived of those whom God resurrects as living this way.

The Greek term corresponding to ‘ôlam is aiōn, also designating a long but relative extent of time, and thus an adequate translation of ‘ôlam in the LXX. However, with Plato aiōn came also to stand for the abstract, qualitative concept of “eternity” in contradistinction to time—a timeless situation to which the limitations of time do not apply. It has been suggested that the NT gives to aioōn both quantitative and qualitative dimensions, and that particularly in the Johannine writings, where the expression “eternal life” recurs frequently (John 3:16; 5:24; 17:2; 1 John 1:2; etc.), is this qualitative aspect salient.

Often eternal life is referred to simply as “life” (zōē), or “the life” (Gr. hē zōē). Eternal life is granted to those who “believe,” that is, to those who have faith (John 3:16; 11:25, 26); to make it available to humanity is the particular object for which Christ came (John 6:51, 57, 58; 14:6, 19); to know God and His Son, Jesus Christ, is eternal life (John 17:3).

In John two dimensions of eternal life are especially intertwined: eternal life as a gift, in principle, when a person believes in Christ (John 5:24, that individual has eternal life), and as a literal possession to be bestowed in actuality at the Parousia (John 5:28, 29). Commenting on these two dimensions, Ellen White said: “‘ This is the record, that God hath given unto us eternal life, and this life is in His Son. He that hath the Son hath life.’ And Jesus said, ‘I will raise him up at the last day.’ Christ became one flesh with us, in order that we might become one spirit with Him. It is by virtue of this union that we are to come forth from the grave—not merely as a manifestation of the power of Christ, but because, through faith, His life has become ours. Those who see Christ in His true character, and receive Him into the heart, have everlasting life. It is through the Spirit that Christ dwells in us; and the Spirit of God, received into the heart by faith, is the beginning of the life eternal” (DA 388).

The Seventh-day Adventist point of view considers eternal life as “exclusively the property of God” (Ellen G. White, in SDACom 5:1130). It was given to Adam conditionally and mediated to him by the tree of life (Gen. 2:9; 3:22; PP 60). He forfeited eternal life by his sin, but it is restored by Christ on condition of “perfect righteousness, harmony with God, perfect conformity to the principles of His law” (MB 76). It is ours now if we are in Christ (1 John 5:11, 12). We possess it now on condition of maintaining our relationship to Christ.

In a sense, eternal life is a reward to the obedient, but it is not earned, for it is a “free gift” to those who believe in Christ as their personal Saviour (1SM 297). SDAs emphasize the literalness of the eternal life bestowed in the resurrection. Eternity is conceived of as endless time in which the saved will have ample opportunity to learn ever more concerning God’s infinite purpose for them, to enjoy and study the wonders of the universe, and to realize their highest ambitions. See Immortality.

Ethiopia

ETHIOPIA. An ancient independent empire, formerly governed by a constitutional monarchy and now governed by a transitional government, in northeast Africa, bounded on the east by Djibouti and Somalia, on the north by Eritrea, on the south by Kenya, and on the west by Sudan. It has an estimated area of 437,800 square miles (1,134,000 square kilometers) and a population (1994) of 58.7 million. Agriculture is the principal occupation of the people, the chief exports being coffee, pulses, oilseeds, hides, goatskins, and sheepskins.

Much of eastern Ethiopia is low, hot, and dry, with some territory below sea level. The western and northern areas are high, with 8,000-foot (2,400-meter) plateaus and mountain peaks as high as 15,000 feet (4,600 meters). There are many hot springs, craters from extinct volcanoes, and large areas of volcanic rock and soil. Addis Ababa, the capital, is in central Ethiopia at an elevation of about 8,000 feet (2,450 meters). The Blue Nile rises in north central Ethiopia. Amharic is the official language, but many other languages and dialects are spoken. The peoples of Ethiopia include the Amhara, the Tigrean, the Oromo, the Somali, the Falasha or Ethiopian Jew, and the Gurage. Southern areas are mostly Muslim; central and northern areas are Christian (constituting the majority). Emperor Haile Selassie I became regent in 1916 and was crowned emperor in 1930. In 1974 he was deposed, and a Provisional Military Administrative Council was established to govern the land.

Historical Background

Historical Background. Ethiopia has had a knowledge of God from ancient times. The former constitution of Ethiopia declared that the line of Haile Selassie I descended without interruption from the dynasty of Menelik, the son of the queen of Sheba and King Solomon of Jerusalem. Jewish priests, Levites, and workers are said to have been brought to Ethiopia at that time to assist in establishing the new religion and government. Jewish religious influence in Ethiopia in NT times is evident from the narrative of the Ethiopian courtier who was baptized by Philip (Acts 8:26—39). About A.D. 330 Frumentius and Aedesius, two young Christians who were shipwrecked on the Red Sea coast and brought to the king of Aksum, won him to Christianity. Frumentius, who brought this news to Alexandria, was proclaimed the first bishop of Ethiopia. Through the centuries until 1950, when an Ethiopian was consecrated archbishop, the Ethiopian Church was headed by Egyptians.

During the sixteenth century, under invasion by Muslim neighbors, Ethiopia invoked Portugal's assistance. Portuguese intervention repulsed Muslim attempts to subdue the highlands of Ethiopia, but the Catholic priests, builders, and artisans who came in with the Portuguese Army greatly influenced the religion of the country. In 1622 King Socinius accepted Catholicism. His decree prohibited the observance of Saturday, which the people had observed along with Sunday (see SB, Nos. 1462—1465), and a revolt resulted. In 1633 the Jesuits were expelled from Ethiopia, and the country closed its doors to foreign influences until the twentieth century.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. L. R. Conradi, General Conference vice president for Europe, is credited with first proposing SDA mission work in Ethiopia. In 1906 he reported visiting the Ethiopian church in Jerusalem, where services were held on Friday night, Sabbath, and Sunday.

What was called the Abyssinian Mission began in 1907 as a project of the Scandinavian Union Conference under the direction of the General Conference Committee in Europe. The first two missionaries sent out, P. N. Lindegren and J. Persson of Sweden, opened a mission station in Eritrea, then an Italian colony, since Ethiopia proper was not open to missionaries. In 1909 they were joined by Anol Grundset, V. E. Toppenberg, and Dr. F. W. Vasenius, and later Hans Steiner and E. J. Lorntz. The work was disrupted by World War I. The first three national converts were baptized in Eritrea in March 1914. Toppenberg was the first to enter Ethiopia proper in 1921, moving his family to Addis Ababa. There he purchased property for mission headquarters and a girls' school. In 1922 three Scandinavian missionaries came to Asmara, Eritrea, and established a dispensary and a school.

The first SDA doctor to work in Ethiopia was Dr. G. C. Bergman, who arrived in 1927 and opened the Taffari Makonnen Hospital in Dessie the following year. In 1933 he opened the Empress Zauditu Memorial Hospital in Addis Ababa, where Dr. T. C. Nicola joined him in 1934.

In the Debre Tabor district SDA missionaries made many converts from among the followers of one Sheikh Zacharias (or Zekarias), a Muslim trader who had been converted to Christianity of a sort after having had visions and dreams about the Sabbath (though he himself never became an observer of the Sabbath), the return of Jesus, and the coming of White missionaries with the Bible truth.

In 1923 the Ethiopian Union was organized, with V. E. Toppenberg as first president. It included the Eritrean, Central Abyssinian, and Gallaland missions. For a period after the conquest of Ethiopia by Italy in 1936, these areas became part of the Italian Union Mission. After the liberation the Ethiopian Union Mission was reorganized, but it was administered for several years from North America by the General Conference. In 1949 the mission was made a part of the Northern European Division, and in 1970 a part of the newly organized Afro-Mideast Division. It became part of the Ethiopian Union Mission in the newly formed Eastern Africa Division in 1983.

The Italian forces, who set up their administration in Addis Ababa in 1936, had as their objective the elimination of Protestant missions and the control of Catholic missions by Italians. By early 1939 all SDA institutions had been expropriated. Other Protestant missions were similarly treated. Moving into huts on the outskirts of the city, the SDA missionaries who remained, N. B. Nielsen, Rasmine Hofstad, and Lisa Johansen, attempted to carry on their work, and in 1940 the Hansons and Mae Mathews returned from furlough.

When Ethiopia was liberated in 1941, the union headquarters and school began to function again, and a few months later the Zauditu Memorial Hospital was reopened by two nurses. In 1943 H. M. Hanson opened a boys' school (moved from Addis Ababa) in Akaki, Ato Gobazei opened a school in Dessie, and G. Gudmundsen began the work in Debre Tabor (see Debre Tabor Adventist Church School; Haile Selassie I Hospital), where he was joined the next year by Nurse Shake' Nalkranian. M. J. Sorensen returned in 1945 and reopened the mission work in Ghimbi (see Gimbi Adventist Hospital; Wollega Adventist Academy). In 1947 V. E. Toppenberg, pioneering again in southern Ethiopia, established the Ethiopian Adventist Training School (now Ethiopian Adventist College) at Kuyera. Two visitors to the school in Kuyera, who were much impressed by the teachings of the blind pastor, Tekle-Haimanot, were from a group of Protestant converts who had carried on the work of their foreign missionaries expelled during the war and who had won thousands of converts. Soon a petition with many signatures and thumbprints arrived from a place in Wollaita called Sakie, asking for an evangelist. One of the students was sent down to Sakie during the summer vacation, and in 1955 evangelistic work was begun there by a pastor, Negarie Mulatta. In 1957 a church was organized with 293 members; and by 1959 there was a church building, a school, and a clinic. As work developed in the Wollaita and Cambatta districts, government permission was obtained in 1961 for the erection of a mission station in the latter, at Abonza, as a central station. Establishment of a number of churches, clinics, and schools throughout southern Ethiopia followed.

In Addis Ababa a modern church building was dedicated in February 1961, with Emperor Haile Selassie I and other members of the imperial family in attendance. In 1968 a boarding school, Wollega Adventist Academy, opened in Wollega province, and in 1970 the new Empress Zauditu Memorial Adventist Hospital was officially opened. It was nationalized in 1976.

By 1993 many of the six-grade schools had been taken over by the military regime, but 10 still were being operated, along with 10 eight-grade schools, three boarding academies, and one junior college. Eleven clinics were in operation. A small printing establishment was serving the field.

In 1993 Eritrea declared itself independent from Ethiopia, and the North Ethiopia Field became the Eritrea Field. See Eritrea.

Ethiopian Advent Press

ETHIOPIAN ADVENT PRESS. A publishing firm with printing facilities operated by the Ethiopian Union Mission in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia. The first Seventh-day Adventist book published in Amharic, the official language of Ethiopia, was Ellen G. White's Steps to Christ, which was sold by colporteurs from about 1930 until the Italian occupation in 1936. The book The Bible Speaks (in two volumes) was published in the 1940s. As a result of reading this book, entire companies of adherents have sprung up.

The Ethiopian Advent Press was built in 1955 largely through the interest and effort of W. S. Jensen from Denmark, secretary-treasurer of the Ethiopian Union Mission. In 1963 the firm had three small presses and a bindery, and employed eight people. Recently a new Minabinda was purchased, and a used Heidelberg offset press installed. These, together with three presses, a typesetter, folder, guillotine, stapler, and stitching machine, provide employment for 12 people. Since the Amharic language has more than 250 letters in its alphabet, typesetting and printing are extremely complicated.

In 1993 the Ethiopian Advent Press was publishing primary, youth, and adult Sabbath school lesson quarterlies; Ellen G. White's Counsels for the Church, Steps to Christ, and The Story of Jesus, as well as Bible Truth, The Bible Made Plain, The Bible Speaks, Life at Its Best, Ways to Health and Happiness, and a book on stewardship; also tracts and Voice of Prophecy correspondence lessons and union mission printing. A two-story addition to the front of the plant was constructed in 1974, and more recently a warehouse was completed.

In the earlier years this publishing house was listed in the Yearbook under the names of Ethiopian Press and Ethiopian Union Mission Publishing House.

Ethiopian Adventist College

ETHIOPIAN ADVENTIST COLLEGE (formerly Ethiopian Adventist Training School). A coeducational day and boarding school on the senior high and junior college levels, situated at Kuyera, 150 miles (240 kilometers) south of Addis Ababa, at an elevation of 6,500 feet (2,000 meters). It holds 650 acres (260 hectares) of land under leases from the Ethiopian government and has a teaching staff (1993) of 27. The 10-acre (four-hectare) campus is dotted with more than 50 structures of wood and stone. Upon completion of the secondary school, the students sit for the Ethiopian School Leaving Certificate Examination (college entrance). The school now offers training on the college level (two years after grade 12) to prepare students for business, theology, education, and agriculture.

The school is supported by a denominational subsidy, fees, and industries. Work is provided for students in the usual school departments, a 500-acre (200-hectare) grain farm, a flour mill with a capacity of 1,000 pounds (450 kilograms) per hour, a garden, an orchard, a store, a furniture (wood and metal) factory, and a metal trailer factory. Water supply for irrigation comes from a river that flows through the property. In 1962 a well 385 feet (120 meters) deep was drilled, which supplies all of the domestic needs.

The school was established in 1947 by V. E. Toppenberg. It occupied old and temporary buildings until 1952, when the lease for the land was obtained. Immediately an extensive building program was begun, and more than 30,000 square feet (2,800 square meters) of educational, service, and industrial buildings, and dwellings were erected. Also in 1952, 12 students completed the first teacher-evangelist training class. The scholastic standard was raised for the two succeeding classes; in 1958 the first twelfth-grade class was graduated, and in 1966 the first college class graduated.

There have been continued improvements with the passing years—an injera (staple food) kitchen, boys' dormitory, a new science building, auto technology center, and improved farm. In 1970 the elementary section was moved across the road into an eight-room complex built with Swedish aid, providing further space for housing and classrooms on the main campus. Teacher training and junior college (two years of college) began in 1972, and in 1973 a course in mechanized farming was offered.

The college program was suspended in 1977 for political reasons, but reactivated in 1990. In 1993, 103 students were enrolled in the junior college program.

European Division

EUROPEAN DIVISION. A unit of church organization that functioned from 1913 to 1928.

Beginning in 1901, the European unions and their mission territories were treated as a unit, called the European General Conference (1901 to 1903), later in the Yearbook, the General European Conference (1904—1907). Since 1903 the General Conference had had a vice president for Europe. By 1909 this territory was referred to as the European Division, but the lack of definition led to the European request in 1912 for constitutional provision for a full-fledged organization of the European and other divisions. Consequently, at the 1913 General Conference session, action was taken to set up a pattern under which divisions were to operate as integral units of the General Conference organization, with full staffs and with presidents who were also vice presidents of the General Conference (see Organization). The European Division territory was defined as “Europe; the Russian and the Turkish possessions in Asia; Persia, Arabia, and Afghanistan; and that part of Africa not included in Rhodesia, British Central Africa, and the Union of South Africa.” After the disruption of World War I the division was reorganized (1920). In 1928 it operated the Arabic, East African, Ethiopian, and West African Union missions, and other missions in Persia, Turkey, Madagascar, Mauritius, Faroe Islands, and Iceland. In 1928 it was divided into four divisions—the Northern European Division, Central European Division, Southern European Division, and what was known as the Federation of Seventh-day Adventists in the USSR. (Part of the Central European Division’s mission territory became, many years later, in 1951, the Middle East Division.)

The president of the European Division until 1922 was L. R. Conradi. L. H. Christian was president from 1922 to 1928.

For Seventh-day Adventist history and institutions in these territories, see the successor divisions and their respective countries.

European Institute of World Mission (EIWM)

EUROPEAN INSTITUTE OF WORLD MISSION (EIWM). An institution founded in 1982 with the following objectives:

1. To review and reaffirm the mission of the church and to define the role of the interdivision worker in the fulfillment of that mission.

2. To acquaint newly appointed interdivision workers with the conditions and problems they will meet in their respective fields of service and prepare them to relate to these conditions and problems in a tactful and Christian manner.

3. To study current issues in world mission and how interdivision workers can relate to them successfully.

4. To inform interdivision workers of the general policies and procedures that will directly affect their term of overseas service. The EIWM serves and is governed by the two European-based divisions, namely, the Euro-Africa Division and the Trans-European Division, by operating annually four-week training courses for missionaries, called from Europe to serve in other parts of the Seventh-day Adventist world field, and also to acquaint personnel called from other divisions to work in Europe with the new cross-cultural situation in which they will find themselves. The four-week mission institute program covers such areas as mission theology, mission anthropology, area studies, church growth, mission structure and practice, the missionary family, missionary relationships, tropical health and hygiene, SDA Church policies and finances, ADRA, AWR, and other specialist subjects important for the missionary.

The European Institute of World Mission is accredited with Andrews University (through Newbold College) and grants both undergraduate and postgraduate credit to participants. The institutes are conducted alternately in the Euro-Africa Division and Trans-European Division territories on the campuses of Saleve Adventist Institute, Collonges, France, and Newbold College, England.

The EIWM is administered by a board consisting of the officers of the two European-based divisions, the principals of the host colleges, and the mission institute director, Borge Schantz. The European Institute of World Mission has produced two major readers for SDA evangelistic outreach programs, namely, “Adventist Missions Facing the 21st Century” (1990) and “Cast the Net on the Right Side” (1993), on crucial issues for witnessing to Western people.

Evangelism, Public

EVANGELISM, PUBLIC. Seventh-day Adventists believe that evangelism—the proclamation of the gospel—is the very heart of Christianity. From the early days of the Seventh-day Adventist Church, public evangelism has played a major role in the growth and development of the denomination. It began with a handful of devoted preachers holding meetings among little groups of those who had taken part in the Millerite movement. As concepts widened, it was not long until the church realized its mission to carry the three angels' messages (Rev. 14:6—12) to “every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people” (v. 6).

There were at first no settled pastors of churches. Congregations led by lay elders were expected to carry on lay evangelism with the occasional aid of the ministers. Today local pastors are still expected to hold evangelistic meetings from time to time.

Among the first generation of SDA evangelists may be listed Joseph Bates, James White, George W. Holt, and Samuel W. Rhodes.

As the membership of the church grew, public evangelism continued to be an important part of the soul-winning program of the church. Ellen White encouraged these efforts by her periodical articles, special testimonies, personal counsels, and addresses over the years, many of which have been collected and published as a book entitled Evangelism.

At the present time public evangelism is conducted by full-time itinerant evangelists, who move from place to place within a conference or union; by district pastors, who hold meetings within their districts; and by lay evangelists.

As times changed, methods also changed, and evangelism has come to include radio and television programs, correspondence lessons, and other methods, such as health evangelism programs, Revelation and Prophecy seminars, and Sequence Evangelism seminars.

International programs such as those produced by the Voice of Prophecy, Faith for Today, Breath of Life, and It Is Written are a focal point for evangelism. The Adventist Media Center sponsors the Adventist Evangelistic Association, directed by C. Lloyd Wyman, which coordinates the public evangelism emphasis of the various media programs, with evangelists conducting meetings throughout North America. It Is Written builds its program around the purchase of time on television stations, with local follow-up through personal visiting and public meetings.

Since 1972 a yearly coordinated evangelistic thrust has been adopted in many of the world divisions. These have been designated as MISSION '72, '73, '74, '75, Thousand Days of Reaping, Harvest 90, and Global Mission. MISSION '75 inaugurated an integrated health evangelism approach known as the Century 21 Better Living Institute. Later another health evangelism program known as Your Health and Your Future was developed by Life and Health magazine and the General Conference Ministerial Association. Every-member involvement in evangelism especially characterizes these approaches. See also Evangelistic Centers; Lay Evangelism; Minister; Communication, Department of; Remnant Church.

Evangelistic Centers

EVANGELISTIC CENTERS. Institutions designed for big-city evangelism through multiple methods. The program of a center includes youth meetings, welfare activities, cooking schools, and other health education programs, regular weekly public evangelistic services, Bible classes, and usually a reading room. Often a church organization is connected with an evangelistic center, and regular Sabbath services are conducted. The supreme object of evangelistic centers is soul winning. Goodwill and pleasing public relations are maintained while every possible method and program in approaching the minds of men with the gospel of Jesus Christ are being employed.

Limited availability and high rentals of halls in large metropolitan areas, as well as the need for multiphase programs reaching mind, body, and spirit, led to the evangelistic center concept. After visiting such an evangelistic center developed by another denomination—the People’s Church, in Toronto, Canada—H.M.S. Richards, of the Voice of Prophecy broadcast, suggested the incorporation of this idea in the Seventh-day Adventist program.

In 1952 the General Conference Spring Meeting allocated accumulated funds of the China Division for 1952, 1953, and 1954, which could no longer be used in China, for the establishment of evangelistic centers in London, New York, and Chicago. Centers also were established in other cities, such as Cairo, Egypt; Beirut, Lebanon; Osaka, Japan; Manila and Cebu, Philippines; and Djakarta, Indonesia. Most of the major centers had been sold by 1994, but a few continue to operate.

Evans, Adelaide Bee (Cooper)

EVANS, ADELAIDE BEE (COOPER) (1870—1958). Editor of the Youth's Instructor from 1899 to 1904. She was born in the state of New York, and at the age of 13 began working at the Review and Herald publishing house at Battle Creek, Michigan, serving as proofreader and copy editor under Uriah Smith, G. G. Tenny, and A. T. Jones. In 1899 she became editor of the Youth's Instructor. Five years later she resigned to marry Irwin H. Evans, at that time manager of the Review and Herald Publishing Association. Later she shared in his missionary service in eastern Asia. She wrote several books for children and youth, among them The Bible Year, Easy Steps in the Bible Story, The Children's Friend, Men of Might, Really Trulies, Stories of the Kings From David to Christ, Story of Esther, and Strange People and Customs.

Evans, Irwin Henry

EVANS, IRWIN HENRY (1862—1945). Administrator, General Conference vice president, author. A second-generation Seventh-day Adventist, he was educated at Battle Creek College. He was licensed as a minister in Michigan in 1882, transferred to Kentucky in 1885, and was ordained in 1886. Returning to Michigan, he served as conference president from 1891 until he became president of the General Conference Association in 1897. His next assignment was president of the Mission Board (1899).

In 1900 Evans was sent to Europe to settle the business problems of the Christiania Publishing House, which was facing bankruptcy. The following year he began a four-year term as president and manager of the Review and Herald. He was treasurer of the General Conference (1903—1909), president of the Asiatic Division (1909—1913), North American Division (1913—1918), and Far Eastern Division (1919—1930). Then he served as a general vice president of the General Conference until 1936, and a field secretary from 1936 until his retirement in 1941. From 1931 to 1941 he was also head of the Ministerial Association.

Known as a forceful preacher and writer, he was the author of several books, The Preacher and His Preaching, Ministry of Angels, The Way of Divine Love, and This Is the Way.

He took a keen interest in the development of the SDA Theological Seminary, and on several occasions taught homiletics there. He was to a considerable extent responsible for the development of the Church Hymnal, and wrote the hymn “Welcome, Day of Sweet Repose.”

Evans, L. C.

EVANS, L. C. (1901—1983). Pastor, evangelist, administrator. He was born in Ohio and in 1920 married Lela Goldsmith. Shortly after their marriage they became Seventh-day Adventists, and in 1926 entered the literature ministry in Zanesville, Ohio. Soon the conference gave him three churches to pastor while continuing his canvassing. Later he served in full-time pastoral work in the Ohio Conference.

The Florida Conference called him to pastoral and evangelistic work in 1936. In the 1940s he was president of the Florida Conference. Later he served in this capacity in the Greater New York and Southern New England conferences. In 1952 he was invited to be president of the Southwestern Union Conference, where he served until his retirement in 1966. During his administration he launched and directed a strong development program for Southwestern Junior College, looking toward its becoming a senior college.

Everson, Charles Theodore

EVERSON, CHARLES THEODORE (1874—1956). Evangelist, missionary. During the early part of his ministry he served as chaplain in Chicago and San Francisco missions. From 1902 to 1909 he conducted evangelistic meetings in Italy and helped to organize the work in that country. Returning to the United States, he held evangelistic meetings in Chicago, New York, and other principal cities. He published a collection of his lectures, entitled The Last Warning Message, and several pamphlets.

Evil, Origin of

EVIL, ORIGIN OF. Seventh-day Adventists believe that moral evil originated in heaven prior to the creation of our world, when Lucifer, most exalted of the angels, became jealous of the Son of God and rebelled against divine authority; that evil is thus defiance of God and a revolt against His righteous authority and goodness. They hold that although the Bible makes no propositional, definitive statement concerning the origin of evil, two OT passages allude to the event in highly figurative language. Under the figure of the king of Tyre, Eze. 28:12—19 portrays Lucifer, as Satan is known prior to his rebellion, as a covering cherub who, though “full of wisdom, and perfect in beauty,” became “corrupted” and was cast “out of the mountain of God.” Isa. 14:12—14 describes Lucifer under the figure of the king of Babylon. He was determined to establish his throne “above the stars of God,” but has instead “fallen from heaven.” Ultimately he is to “be brought down to hell, to the sides of the pit” (v. 15), or, in the words of Ezekiel, to be reduced to “ashes upon the earth.”

The NT makes occasional reference to Satan as being the originator of evil (see John 8:44; 1 John 3:8). It suggests also that in his rebellion against God, Satan won the sympathy of a large number of the angels who shared his fate in being cast out of heaven, and who will be destroyed with him at the day of judgment (2 Peter 2:4; Jude 6). In a passage usually considered as describing the original conflict in heaven as well as a secondary clash at the time of Christ’s crucifixion, John the revelator says that “there was war in heaven,” in which “Michael and his angels” were victorious. Satan “was cast out into the earth, and his angels were cast out with him.”

The writings of Ellen White provide additional details on the origin of evil that are in accord with the brief statements of Scripture. For instance, she declares that God was in no way responsible for evil, but that “sin began with Satan” (Review and Herald 63:145, Mar. 9, 1886). She enumerates three main causes of Lucifer’s rebellion: (1) pride in his own glory, (2) jealousy of Christ’s position and authority, and (3) resentment toward God’s authority. In her various works she traces the origin of evil thus: “Little by little, Lucifer came to indulge a desire for self-exaltation. . . . Instead of seeking to make God supreme in the affections and allegiance of His creatures, it was Lucifer’s endeavor to win their service and homage to himself. And coveting the honor which the infinite Father had bestowed upon His Son, this prince of angels aspired to power which it was the prerogative of Christ alone to wield. . . . Pride in his own glory nourished the desire for supremacy. . . . He gloried in his brightness and exaltation, and aspired to be equal with God” (GC 494, 495).

“When God said to His Son, ‘Let us make man in our image,’ Satan was jealous of Jesus. He wished to be consulted concerning the formation of man, and because he was not, he was filled with envy, jealousy, and hatred” (EW 145).

“Satan grew bold in his rebellion, and expressed his contempt of the Creator’s law. . . . He claimed that angels needed no law but should be left free to follow their own will, which would ever guide them right; that law was a restriction of their liberty; and that to abolish law was one great object of his standing as he did” (SR 18, 19).

“God, in His great mercy, bore long with Lucifer. He was not immediately degraded from his exalted station when he first indulged the spirit of discontent, nor even when he began to present his false claims before the loyal angels. Long was he retained in heaven” (GC 495, 496).

“The heavenly councils pleaded with Lucifer. The Son of God presented before him the greatness, the goodness, and the justice of the Creator, and the sacred, unchanging nature of His law” (ibid. 494).

“Again and again he [Lucifer] was offered pardon, on condition of repentance and submission. . . . But pride forbade him to submit. He persistently defended his own course, maintained that he had no need of repentance, and fully committed himself, in the great controversy, against his Maker” (ibid. 496).

When the spirit of discontent and disaffection had ripened into open revolt, “all the heavenly host were summoned to appear before the Father” (SR 18).

“Satan unblushingly made known his dissatisfaction that Christ should be preferred before him. He stood up proudly and urged that he should be equal with God and should be taken into conference with the Father and understand His purposes. God informed Satan that to His Son alone He would reveal His secret purposes, and He required all the family in heaven, even Satan, to yield Him implicit, unquestioned obedience; but that he (Satan) had proved himself unworthy of a place in heaven. Then Satan exultingly pointed to his sympathizers, comprising nearly one half of all the angels, and exclaimed, ‘These are with me! Will you expel these also, and make such a void in heaven?’ He then declared that he was prepared to resist the authority of Christ and to defend his place in heaven by force of might, strength against strength. . . . Then there was war in heaven. The Son of God, the Prince of heaven, and His loyal angels engaged in conflict with the archrebel and those who united with him. The Son of God and true, loyal angels prevailed; and Satan and his sympathizers were expelled from heaven. All the heavenly host acknowledged and adored the God of justice. Not a taint of rebellion was left in heaven. All was again peaceful and harmonious as before” (ibid. 18, 19).

SDA belief concerning the origin of evil is essentially the same as that traditionally held by most other Christian churches. See Fall, The; Satan and His Angels.

Evolution

EVOLUTION. Mechanistic Evolution. The theory of organic evolution holds that all living forms in the world, plant and animal, including humanity, are descendants of one or of a few simple organisms, which in turn arose by chance from nonliving matter. It is held that the present level of development has been accomplished by the cumulative effect of small changes from generation to generation over a vast period of time, possibly 4 billion years or more. Simple, primitive, archaic forms are supposed to have given rise to a variety of types, which by continued divergence would produce a branching treelike mosaic of life. The majority of present-day biologists hold that this process of descent with modification, whereby new species and basic types are supposed to have arisen, has occurred by a strictly random or chance process, with natural selection eliminating the less fit. This concept is called mechanistic evolution, or materialism.

Theistic Evolution. Because of the overwhelming complexity of even the simplest forms of life and the improbability of life arising spontaneously from inorganic matter, some allow that the original simple forms may have been specially created. Others hold that the entire evolutionary process has been under the guidance of a Supreme Being of infinite wisdom—that God has “created” all things by this method. A common view among both Catholic and Protestant scientists and theologians, including some evangelicals, is that when humanity had reached a certain evolutionary level—a few thousand years ago at the “creation week”—the Creator endowed humans with those characteristics by which they became moral beings capable of recognizing the difference between right and wrong, capable of sinning, and with the capacity for appreciation of esthetic, ethical, and spiritual values. These concepts are all forms of theistic evolution.

Seventh-day Adventist Position. SDA theologians and scientists reject both mechanistic and theistic evolution, on both scriptural and scientific grounds. In 1864 Ellen G. White pointed out that “when men leave the word of God in regard to the history of creation, and seek to account for God’s creative works upon natural principles, they are upon a boundless ocean of uncertainty. . . . His creative works are just as incomprehensible as His existence” (3SG 93).

“The genealogy of our race, as given by inspiration, traces back its origin, not to a line of developing germs, mollusks, and quadrupeds, but to the great Creator” (PP 45).

Some years later L. A. Smith pointed out that any attempt to explain Creation by evolution is beset with “insurmountable difficulties” (Review and Herald 81:4, Sept. 15, 1904).

Advocates of the theory of evolution generally assume that the Bible precludes the possibility of any change of species, and that evidences of such change therefore disprove the Bible and confirm evolution. The typical attitude is reflected in a sentence from a letter written by Darwin in 1844 to a close friend and eminent botanist Joseph Hooker: “I am almost convinced (quite contrary to the opinion I started with) that species are not (it is like confessing a murder) immutable” (E. Nordenskiöld, The History of Biology, pp. 463, 464). But while the Scriptures mention a great variety of different, complex animals and plants as being present at the end of Creation week, it does not indicate that changes would not take place, especially after sin entered the world. In fact, the curse of Gen. 3:17, 18 implies that unfavorable changes would occur. From the first, SDA writers have recognized change of species (G. W. Amadon, in Review and Herald 16:122, Sept. 4, 1860). But this, of course, is very different from the sort of change required for the origin of new higher categories—the orders, classes, and phyla of animals and plants.

Ellen White's reference in 1864 to the almost "endless variety of species of animals" indicates that new species have been formed (3SG 75). In 1902 G. M. Price noted that the real point of difference between the Genesis record and the Darwinian philosophy is not whether sufficient variation has occurred to "produce practically new and distinct species. The fossils show us that species have varied sufficiently to produce very distinct morphological and structural difference. . . . But the real question is whether the general run of these changes have not all been in the direction of degeneration" (Outlines of Modern Science and Modern Christianity, p. 199).

It might be noted that many of the most evident changes in nature—such as parasites with rudimentary digestive systems, flightless birds, and beetles with fused wing covers—represent reductions or loss of structures, or specializations.

Fundamental arguments against evolution used in recent years by SDA writers include: (1) the improbability of spontaneous generation of life from nonliving material, inasmuch as scientists still do not know what life is; (2) the inadequacy of known mechanisms of change to bridge the gulf between widely different structural and physiological characteristics by which the major groups of organisms differ from one another; (3) the unfitness for survival of hypothetical intermediates, incipient stages between many delicately balanced organ systems; (4) the tremendous preponderance of harmful or lethal effects in hereditary changes such as mutations and chromosomal aberrations; (5) the total absence of transitional series of forms connecting different major types in the fossil record of past life—higher categories such as classes, orders, and nearly all families as well (if the various phyla and orders arose by evolution, at least a few of the transitional sequences, or missing links, should have been preserved, but such series are not known to exist); (6) the presence in the lowest sedimentary rock layers in which an appreciable number of fossils occur in any abundance—the Cambrian—of a wide variety of highly complex animal forms wholly modern in structural detail; and (7) the existence of an evident design and purpose in nature, of features that exhibit a degree of complexity far beyond our ability to comprehend. Divine creation seems to be the only reasonable solution.

Analysis makes it abundantly clear that nearly all the valid scientific evidence for evolution is, in fact, evidence of change of the type that SDA creationists accept as having certainly occurred since the Creation as they conceive of its having occurred. Support for the more fundamental changes required by the theory of evolution is tenuous, uncertain, and completely inconclusive. No scientific discovery has yet given an informed creationist reason to doubt the Bible record of a fiat creation. It is the theories, not the observed facts, of the natural world that are in conflict with the Scripture record. See Creation; Science and Religion.

Fagal, William A.

FAGAL, WILLIAM A. (1919—1989). Television pioneer. Born in Albany, New York, to a young couple who were already immersed in lay work in the Seventh-day Adventist Church, William, along with his brother, Harold, were early dedicated to the gospel ministry. Harold claims that as a child he was “baptized” countless times by his older brother.

With his goal of presenting to the world the news of a soon-coming Saviour, William was a “young man in a hurry.” He rushed through public high school in three years and at 16 enrolled at Atlantic Union College, where he enthusiastically embraced his theology studies. He graduated in 1939 as president of his class and was hired by the New York Conference; he was then given full charge of six churches along a 150—mile (240—kilometer) stretch of the southern counties of that state. He was 20 years old.

In 1940 Fagal chose the little Corning church for his first effort, and within a year the membership had tripled to 90. In that same year he married his college sweetheart, Virginia Rittenhouse. She would later assist him on the nation’s television screens as cohost of Faith for Today.

In the summer of 1941 Fagal was privileged to study evangelism under J. L. Shuler. In 1942 the 23-year-old pastor was ordained to the gospel ministry, and three days later he was asked to conduct a full-scale evangelistic campaign in the 3,000-seat Kleinhans Music Hall in Buffalo, New York. Despite his limited experience, and with only two months to prepare, Fagal accepted the challenge. Within 18 months 150 converts were baptized. He was then called to the Washington Avenue church in downtown Brooklyn, where he arrived on his twenty-fifth birthday.

During the next six years Fagal baptized between 50 and 100 per year. He also broadcast “live” each Sunday morning over station WHN.

In April 1950 a committee from the General Conference called on Fagal to produce a weekly television program. He had only six weeks to prepare the first Faith for Today telecast. Fagal’s burden was for the unchurched, “to show them what God is really like.” The result was true-to-life dramatized stories-modern parables that followed the example of Jesus, who “without a parable spake . . . not unto them” (Matt. 13:34).

By December of that first year the program’s outreach had grown to an 11-station “live” network extending as far west as Nebraska and Texas, with Los Angeles and San Francisco being served by kinescope. By 1956 the filmed program was on scores of stations, and by 1967, 320 stations throughout the world were airing it, a large proportion of them free as a public service.

Fagal became a much-loved preacher to audiences throughout the country. He excelled in biographical preaching, bringing life to many Bible characters.

He wrote 21 books, and for a number of years wrote a weekly column for Signs of the Times. His full-message book By Faith I Live was designated the denomination’s Book of the Year for 1966, selling more than 300,000 copies in the first six months. His book Three Hours to Live (also printed under the title By God's Grace, Sam) has circulated even more widely and has been translated into several languages.

In recognition of Fagal's service to the Seventh-day Adventist Church, Andrews University awarded him the Doctor of Divinity degree in 1967, and in 1980 he was the recipient of the Charles Weniger Award for Excellence. He preached to uncounted millions in his lifetime, but if asked how he wished to be addressed—whether as Elder, doctor, or pastor—he would say pastor, for to him that simple term described how he felt about his mission in caring for the worldwide “flock” God had given him.

Faith and Works

FAITH AND WORKS. In the NT the believer's confidence in and acceptance of what Christ has done to make reconciliation with God possible is called faith. Conversely, what someone may attempt to do, through compliance with ritual requirements or by charitable deeds, to earn merit with God as a means of salvation is called works. In this sense, faith and works are seen as mutually exclusive, as are light and darkness. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians is the apostle's classic reply to the theory that Christians, who presumably have found salvation by faith in Christ, can better their standing with God and become more eligible for His grace by efforts of their own—specifically, by complying with the ritual requirements of the Jewish religious system. Paul's categorical censure of the Galatians' attempt to find salvation by adding the works of the Jewish ritual law to faith in Christ is applicable to all in every age who suppose that they can earn merit toward salvation by compliance with any legal requirements, even those of the moral law.

In later centuries, however, the idea that ritual performance, penance, and charitable deeds sufficed to expiate a person's sins, and entitled that individual to salvation, eclipsed the NT concept of righteousness by faith alone. This great truth—that men and women are wholly dependent upon faith in Christ and His righteousness—was restored by the Reformation of the sixteenth century, and constitutes the very essence of Seventh-day Adventist belief and practice today.

Walking on earth as a man, Jesus exemplified perfect righteousness. Dying on the cross, He satisfied the law's demand, so that through faith repentant sinners may come into a right relationship to Christ. Outside of Christ, trusting in their own works, they would be confronted with the full demand of the law as the standard by which character is to be judged, and would be wholly unable to satisfy its claims upon them. Even perfect compliance with God's moral requirements subsequent to conversion, if such were possible, would not atone for a past life of sin; hence the sinner's need of faith in and utter dependence upon the vicarious death of Christ and His enabling power to live in harmony with the will of God. Christ's saving righteousness is complete and sufficient; humans can add nothing to it.

If the Galatians would abandon the works—righteousness prescribed by the ritual law and find salvation by faith in Christ, says Paul, the good works of the Holy Spirit would be manifest in their lives (Gal. 5:22, 23; 6:2), not as a means to salvation but as the result of it. And, as James explains, faith unaccompanied by this kind of works is dead (James 2:20; 3:13). Such “good works” are the inevitable product of genuine salvation by faith (Eph. 2:10; Heb. 8:10). They are the works of faith, not of the law. Without them a person's faith is utterly vain. Faith works by love to produce a life of obedience and fruits unto holiness. Faith results not only in a right relationship to God but also in a cooperation with Him that makes possible a likeness to Christ in both spirit and conduct. Where living faith exists there will always be corresponding works. Good works of faith manifest in the life of the believer prepare him or her to enjoy the fellowship of heavenly beings. They demonstrate that he or she chooses to walk in loving obedience to God here and so can be trusted in a perfect world (Review and Herald 92:10, Sept. 23, 1915). Such a life proves that the believer's profession of faith in Christ is not in vain. The absence of good works in a professing Christian's life is evidence that he or she is still under the dominion of sin, despite profession of faith in Christ. The loving and obedient response of good works reveals a sincere and complete surrender to God and to His will (ibid. 67:612, Oct. 7, 1890). The Holy Spirit is said to write God's moral law upon the heart (Heb. 8:10).

The gospel saves from sin and unto righteousness. Those who would dwell with God and the angels will not love darkness, nor will they indulge in works that are evil. The good works of faith are an expression of loving gratitude to God (John 14:15, 23). No one can give evidence of a living faith if there is an absence of good works, of victory over sin (Matt. 7:16—20). A professed Christian destitute of good works gives no evidence of having been saved by Christ, or of union with Christ.

In no small measure the debate about the relationship between faith and works is a matter of semantics—of differing definitions read into the words “works” and “law,” of neglect to ascertain from the context of passages of Scripture cited the sense in which the terms are used, and of failure on the part of those in dialogue to recognize these differences. Often, for instance, there is failure to recognize that by “law” the Bible writers usually mean the revelation of God's will as recorded in Scripture, particularly the Pentateuch (Ps. 119; Luke 24:44), but also at times (as in Gal. 3:2, 4) the Jewish religious system of rites and ceremonies (which is an integral part of “the law” in the former sense). Similarly “works” and “works of law,” when used in the context of the Jewish religious system, always refer to the ritual requirements of this “law” (e.g., Gal. 2:16; 3:2). Often those on one side or the other of the law-grace, faith-works dialogue restrict the word “law” to the Decalogue. This is the sense in which SDAs usually speak of the “law.” A discussion involving the terms “faith,” “works,” and “law” should begin with a clear definition of these words and a recognition of the sense in which the various Bible writers use them. In each use of one of these words, those in dialogue should make clear the sense intended.

Finding many passages of Scripture in which “the law” is spoken of in a favorable sense as “holy,” “just,” “good,” and “perfect,” and as enduring forever (for example, Ps. 34:7; Matt. 5:17, 18; Rom. 7:12, 14), Seventh-day Adventists usually think of “works” as voluntary obedience to the moral law, or Decalogue, on the part of one who has already found salvation by faith in Christ. Sometimes the antinomian in dialogue also uses the word “law” in the sense of “Decalogue.” But reading the depreciative declarations of Paul in Galatians about “the law” (the apostle's term for the Jewish religious system), the antinomian mistakenly concludes that obedience to the commands of the Decalogue must be the “works of the law” against which Paul inveighs so vehemently (Gal. 2:16, 21; 5:1—4). At other times the antinomian in dialogue understands “law” in the same sense in which Paul uses it, but leaps to the erroneous conclusion that because the moral principles enunciated in the Decalogue were incorporated into the old covenant ritual system at Mount Sinai, the Decalogue itself must have lapsed with that system at the cross. This person forgets that these principles were also to be incorporated into the new covenant (Heb. 8:10, 11). Antinomians seem to be blind to the fact that the moral principles set forth in the Decalogue have always had an independent existence apart from the Jewish religious system, and were never dependent upon it nor subordinate to it. This independent existence, apart from the Jewish or any other religious system, is based on the fact that the commands of the Decalogue express God's infinite, righteous character and will in terms adapted to humanity's understanding in its fallen condition. These principles are not relative to anything else, but absolute in the same sense that God Himself is absolute. See Law.

In Galatians the idea of “law” as the Jewish religious system merges imperceptibly into that of law in an abstract sense to mean any law, and “works of law” to mean legalism as a way of salvation. When “law” is used to mean the Jewish religious system with its rites and ceremonies, which became obsolete at the cross, and “works” to mean compliance with these ritual requirements, SDAs agree that faith and works (in this sense, as Paul uses the words in Galatians) are mutually exclusive. The same would be true if the principle set forth in the Epistle to the Galatians is applied to the Ten Commandments, and “works of law” is construed to mean a legalistic compliance with the moral principles of the Decalogue as a means to salvation. But when, as Seventh-day Adventists usually use the words, “law” is a synonym for the Decalogue and “works” is understood to mean compliance with its moral precepts—not as a means of salvation but as willing obedience rendered by a grateful son to the expressed will of a beneficent Father—then the two words are complementary, not contradictory. This agrees with Paul’s teaching in Gal. 5:22, 23; 6:2. It was in this sense that C. M. Snow wrote: “Thus we see that there is no conflict between the law and the gospel [faith]. The one reveals sin, the other reveals the remedy. The one reveals the character of God, the other reveals the only arrangement whereby we can have bestowed upon us a likeness of that character. The one reveals heaven’s rule of government, the other reveals the only arrangement God has made to counteract the effect of Satan’s rebellion against that government. Thus do the two work together and thus will they continue to work together until sin and all the results of sin have been eradicated from the universe. Then will the gospel cease, for salvation will have been completed; but the law will never cease” (Review and Herald 83:6, Oct. 18, 1906). See also Justification; Law; Law and Grace; Legalism; Righteousness by Faith; Sanctification.

Faith for Today

FAITH FOR TODAY. A religious television ministry sponsored by the Seventh-day Adventist Church. As television rapidly developed, Seventh-day Adventist leaders began to see in this means of mass communication a powerful medium for reaching people's hearts and minds with the gospel. In the spring of 1950, at the urgent request of the Atlantic Union, a committee was appointed by the General Conference to investigate the possibility of telecasting on one of the New York City television stations. With the signing of a 13-week contract with WJZ-TV for release of an SDA telecast at 9:30 each Sunday evening, William A. Fagal, a pastor in New York City, who had conducted a successful six-year program of radio and public evangelism in the area, pioneered this project.

After wide counsel both within and without the denomination, the "parable approach" program format was adopted, which allowed for a wide latitude in subject matter to be presented in story form: the portrayal of everyday problems of life, followed by the Bible's solution; then a five-minute sermonet by the pastor to solidify the discussion in the story. Several gospel songs were included, the program ending with an invitation by Mrs. Fagal, along with her husband, to enroll in the Bible correspondence course. The new program, named Faith for Today, was launched on May 21, 1950, and it enjoys the distinction of being the longest-running nonnews program currently being aired on television. Only Meet the Press has had a longer run.

Sixty-six letters came in as the result of that first telecast, all of them requesting the Bible course and other material offered on the program, and the mail response continued to grow.

Upon action by the General Conference Committee in Autumn Council, Faith for Today expanded to network status in December 1950, reaching New York, Washington, D.C., Detroit, Chicago, Philadelphia, Birmingham, Minneapolis, Omaha, and Fort Worth. After the Voice of Prophecy radio group had presented a similar TV program beamed to Los Angeles and San Francisco for several months, these two stations were also added to the Faith for Today network.

In June of 1951 the first full-time Faith for Today quartet was formed, with Harold Lickey, first tenor; Walter Isensee, second tenor; Herbert Hohensee, baritone; and Lyle Jewel, bass.

At first local conference Bible schools cared for the Bible School enrollees, but Faith for Today began to operate its own Bible correspondence school in January 1952. That spring when funds for the expansion of the program seemed to be nonexistent, a providential opening occurred. The television station in Utica, New York, requested the privilege of showing Faith for Today kinescopes without cost, as a public service. Other stations rapidly followed, and the United States armed services asked for kinescopes to show in far-flung Army and Air Force bases throughout the world. Eventually more than 300 stations were showing Faith for Today each week, a large proportion as a public service.

It was not long before denominational leaders in other countries began forward strides in television planning. In January 1955 DZAQ-TV in Manila, the Philippines, began to use Faith for Today kinescopes, with a local address inserted. In the fall of 1956 in the very first week that television came to Australia, Faith for Today was televised in Sydney and three weeks later in Melbourne, thus becoming the first religious program to be seen in Australia. It was the same on Guam, where Faith for Today began to be aired during the first week of television operations.

During the fall of 1960 denominational leaders in Nigeria took advantage of a providential opening to have Faith for Today released regularly from Ibadan. Thus it was the first religious program to be shown on what was then Africa's first and only TV station. Another "first" occurred in November 1962, when the South American Division began its own version of Faith for Today in Portuguese in São Paulo, Brazil—the first non-government-sponsored religious telecast to be seen in all South America. Bermuda, Puerto Rico, and Korea were also showing the programs.

Until January 1956 all telecasting had been done "live." Changing to film made it possible to provide stations with better picture quality than the kinescopes afforded. To the parable approach were added interviews with missionaries and other Christians with meaningful stories to tell. By 1963 Faith for Today went to color, making the program more desirable in the big city areas.

The mail response grew from the original 66 letters to a high of 10,000 in a single week. In the first decade of the Bible school the lessons were requested by more than 1 million. To the Faith for Today Bible Course were soon added courses based on The Great Controversy and The Desire of Ages. Other courses followed—Daniel and Revelation, health and nutrition, and lessons for juniors and youth. In 1974 a new Daniel and Revelation course called "Today's Life" was released, and also a new full-message course under the title "Living Faith."

By the time Faith for Today celebrated its twenty-fifth anniversary, the Bible school had graduated more than 183,000 students, resulting in more than 24,000 known baptisms.

In 1972, after being based in New York City for 22 years, the telecast moved its headquarters to Thousand Oaks, California. Quality control was greatly enhanced in the new location with the development of a dedicated staff of SDA technicians, working hand in hand with the technical/professional assistance readily available in Hollywood. At the close of 1974 Faith for Today joined other denominational media components in the new Seventh-day Adventist radio, television, and film center complex in Thousand Oaks.

Soon after the move to California, the Faith for Today staff saw the potential for reaching secular viewers through a hospital-based drama program. The Westbrook Hospital series proved highly successful. In 1975 Faith for Today produced its first hour-long film—on the life and martyrdom of Reformer John Huss. Later several prime-time specials reached thousands of homes, and a thriving Christian film rental market resulted.

The year 1980 marked a major transition for the program. Pastor Fagal continued to be active, but turned the leadership of the organization over to Daniel G. Matthews. Pastor Matthews had broad experience as a pastor, public relations director, and conference administrator. He hosted an entirely new format in 1985 entitled Christian Lifestyle Magazine, featuring interviews and mini-documentaries of people who put their faith into action to make a difference for good in a needy world.

Out of Christian Lifestyle Magazine, Lifestyle Magazine was born in 1991. Using this approach, Faith for Today reaches a North American television audience of up to 1 million people each week. The program is also shown over the United States Armed Forces Television Network in 56 countries and over regular television outlets in Greece. In addition, the program's audio version airs on the 13 stations of the Adventist Radio Network and over Adventist World Radio-Europe.

To follow up, Faith for Today has established the Lifestyle Learning Center, offering material dealing with basic themes of the Bible: keys to wellness, nutrition, marriage, relationships, and parenting. Faith for Today likes to think of the program as the health voice of the Seventh-day Adventist Church. Through these means Faith for Today utilizes "the right arm of the message," continuing to guide the seeker to a deeper appreciation of and commitment to spiritual values. See Lifestyle Magazine.

Falkland Islands

FALKLAND ISLANDS (Islas Malvinas). A British crown colony (claimed by Argentina), formed by two large and more than 200 small islands situated in the southwest Atlantic, near the Strait of Magellan, about 300 miles (500 kilometers) east from the coast of Patagonia. The archipelago has an area of 4,618 square miles (11,960 square kilometers) and a population (1991) of approximately 2,100, mostly of British descent. The two main islands, whose coasts are deeply indented by numerous bays, are separated by Falkland Sound. The terrain varies from rugged to undulating. The climate is moist and the vegetation luxuriant. Exports consist mainly of wool, leather, fur, and whale oil.

Historical Background

Historical Background. Some claim that the archipelago was discovered in 1520 by Estevão Gomes, a deserter from Magellan's expedition; others, that it was discovered in 1594 by the British navigator John Davys. The first recorded settlement of the islands was made by the French in 1764. French mariners of Saint-Malo gave the islands the name of Malouines, which name was adopted by the Spaniards, who referred to them as the Maluinas, or Malvinas. They were under the control of the Spanish from 1775 until the independence of the countries that had formed the Viceroyalty of Rio de la Plata. Argentine sovereignty over the archipelago, through governors subject to Buenos Aires, ended in 1833, when the British occupied the islands by force. After the expulsion of the Argentineans, the use of Spanish was abandoned, and English became the language of the islands.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. The first Seventh-day Adventist to work in these islands was the colporteur C. A. Nowlen, in 1893. He reported "excellent success" in selling SDA books there, including Ellen White's Great Controversy. Apparently no other SDAs visited these islands until 1933—1934, when Roy Chamberlayne, an English SDA colporteur, worked there. He sold big and small books, and was informed in April 1934 from Port Stanley that an old widow had started to keep the Sabbath. The Austral Union had voted to send a missionary colporteur to the islands as soon as possible, and authorized W. F. Miller, president of the Magellan Mission, to visit the Falklands in 1930 and 1936, but there is no record that either of these visits was made.

In November 1974 Benoní Cayrús, director of the Public Relations and Stewardship departments in the Austral Union, became the first SDA pastor to visit the Falkland Islands. He stayed nine days, and on Sabbath, November 16, conducted the first baptism for Christopher R. Spall, the son of an SDA missionary nurse in Africa. With the merger of the Patagonia Mission and the Buenos Aires Conference in 1972, the Falkland Islands became part of what was then the South Argentine Conference, with headquarters in the city of Buenos Aires. At this time they again belong to the South Argentine Mission, part of the Austral Union of the South American Division.

Fall, The

FALL, THE. The event by which human beings, created in the image of God and ordained to reflect His sinless character, forfeited the state of innocence, incurred the penalty of death, and introduced into the world the disorders resulting from sin. By partaking of the forbidden fruit in the Garden of Eden, Adam and Eve, progenitors of the human race, rebelled against divine authority and fell into a state of spiritual depravity from which they were unable to extricate themselves.

The Biblical Account. According to Gen. 2 and 3, God “planted a garden eastward in Eden; and there he put the man whom he had formed.” Except for “the tree of knowledge of good and evil,” all the resources of this garden were for the use and enjoyment of Adam and Eve. Concerning this tree God said, “Thou shalt not eat of it: for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die.” The tree was reserved by God as a test of humanity’s loyalty and obedience.

But one day as Eve was alone in the vicinity of the tree she heard a serpent say, “Yea, hath God said, Ye shall not eat of every tree of the garden?” Attracted by the phenomenon of a serpent speaking, she engaged in conversation with the creature. At last, persuaded by the argument that she would attain to a higher state of knowledge and experience by partaking of the fruit, she yielded to temptation and ate. Next she offered the fruit to Adam, and he too ate.

As the immediate result of their disobedience Adam and Eve were afraid, and hid themselves from the presence of God. When God called them to account for their conduct, Adam confessed his guilt but blamed Eve for tempting him, and Eve in turn blamed the serpent. God placed a curse upon the serpent for its part in the temptation, then said: “I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel.” This statement has usually been understood as a message of hope to the disobedient pair, a promise that sin would eventually be destroyed by divine intervention. God told Adam and Eve that their lot in life would now be difficult, and that eventually they would die. He then sent the sinful pair out of Eden, lest they continue to eat of the tree of life, and sin be immortalized. Entrance to the garden was barred by angels with flaming swords.

By disobeying God, human beings suffered a moral fall, with consequent disorder and degeneration, not only to themselves and their posterity, but to the plant and animal kingdoms as well. See Rom. 5:12; 8:22.

Seventh-day Adventist View. SDAs understand the Bible story of the Fall to be a literal historical account. This view was held widely by the Christians who joined the Millerite movement in the mid-1800s and who later united to form the Seventh-day Adventist Church, and it has been held by the denomination since. Ellen White has expanded the account of the Fall given in broad outline in the Bible. She explains that Adam and Eve were told of Lucifer’s rebellion in heaven, and of his determination to lead them to follow him in transgression.

“If separated from each other they would be in greater danger than if both were together. . . . God would not permit Satan to follow the holy pair with continual temptations. He could have access to them only at the tree of knowledge of good and evil” (SR 31).

“In order to accomplish his work unperceived, Satan chose to employ as his medium the serpent—a disguise well adapted for his purpose of deception.

“Eve had wandered near the forbidden tree, and her curiosity was aroused to know how death could be concealed in the fruit of this fair tree. She was surprised to hear her queries taken up and repeated by a strange voice. ‘Yea, hath God said, Ye shall not eat of every tree of the garden.’ Eve was not aware that she had revealed her thoughts by conversing to herself aloud; therefore, she was greatly astonished to hear her queries repeated by a serpent” (Review and Herald 43:82, Feb. 24, 1874).

He told Eve that by eating the fruit they would become “as gods.” The act of eating of the forbidden fruit involved more than disobedience—it revealed “distrust of God’s goodness, disbelief of His word, and rejection of His authority” (Ed 25). Its effects are seen in nature as well as in man: “All nature is confused; for God forbade the earth to carry out the purpose He had originally designed for it. . . . The curse of God is upon all creation. Every year it makes itself more decidedly felt” (Ellen G. White, in SDACom 1:1085).

As to the consequences of Adam’s transgression on him and on his posterity, Ellen White wrote: “They [Adam and Eve] were told that their nature had become depraved by sin; they had lessened their strength to resist evil, and had opened the way for Satan to gain more ready access to them” (PP 61).

“Man had become so degraded by sin that it was impossible for him, in himself, to come into harmony with Him whose nature is purity and goodness” (ibid. 64).

Regarding the consequences of parental wrongdoing upon children, Ellen White declared: “It is inevitable that children should suffer from the consequences of parental wrongdoing, but they are not punished for the parents’ guilt, except as they participate in their sins. It is usually the case, however, that children walk in the steps of their parents. By inheritance and example the sons become partakers of the father’s sin. Wrong tendencies, perverted appetites, and debased morals, as well as physical disease and degeneracy, are transmitted as a legacy from father to son, to the third and fourth generation” (PP 306). See Evil, Origin of; Satan and His Angels.

Falling of the Stars

FALLING OF THE STARS. A phrase used of “falling stars,” or meteor showers, especially of the great shower of Leonid meteors seen in America Nov. 12—13, 1833, the most spectacular star shower on record. (The Leonids were visible in the Eastern Hemisphere in major showers of lesser magnitude in 1866 and again in the Western in 1867.) These meteors, because of their preeminence and their timing, were taken by many Millerites and by Seventh-day Adventists as fulfilling certain Bible prophecies of signs in the natural world heralding the last days (Matt. 24:29; Rev. 6:13). For eyewitness descriptions and astronomical explanations of the Leonids see SB, Nos. 730—746.

Far Eastern Academy

FAR EASTERN ACADEMY. A coeducational boarding school on the senior high school level, operated by the Far Eastern Division at Singapore. The 1974 secondary enrollment was 93, and faculty numbered 13.

The school was established in 1926 in temporary quarters in Shanghai, China, to provide a central, fully accredited secondary school for the children of missionaries throughout the Far East. In 1927 the school was moved to a campus provided for it on Ningkuo Road. To existing buildings were later added a chapel-industrial building and a boys' dormitory. Charles Larsen served as first principal.

Because of political unrest in 1937—1938, classes were carried on at Castle Peak, New Territories, Hong Kong. In 1939 the faculty and student body returned to Shanghai. In 1940 the school opened in September, only to close in November when the political situation made it advisable for most of the missionaries to return to their homeland.

As missionaries returned to China after World War II, the school again opened in Shanghai in the fall of 1946. However, in 1948, with the general evacuation of missionaries from China, Far Eastern Academy moved back to Hong Kong and finished the school year.

In 1949 the academy reopened its doors, this time at Singapore in the Far Eastern Division office, with R. A. Figuhr as teacher. Opening enrollment was only three pupils. A part of the school library and some of the equipment was shipped to Singapore from Hong Kong. The academy ceased operation for two years for lack of enough students to fill it. Though the attendance has never been large, the school has remained open from 1952 to the present.

In 1958 the school was moved to a three-story administration building, which provided offices, classrooms, laboratory, and library on the main floor, and on the lower level a kitchen and dining room. Classrooms were on the second floor. Two duplex buildings provided housing for four faculty families and guest rooms.

A former overseas home on the campus was turned into a classroom building to house the typing, biology, home economics, and industrial arts classrooms.

In 1970 the Southern Asia Division closed Vincent Hill School in India. Thus a larger number of secondary overseas students matriculated at the academy in Singapore. A new four-story dormitory building that also provided apartments for deans, an assembly hall, and additional classrooms was completed.

In 1992 the boarding portion of the Far Eastern Academy was closed, and Far Eastern Elementary School joined Far Eastern Academy to become a grades 1—10 day school. Beginning with the school year 1993—1994, the school accepted students in grades 1—8 only.

History

History. The division was organized in 1919, after the old Asiatic Division was split into the Far Eastern (at first called the Eastern Asia) Division and two separate unions—the India Union Mission and the Australasian Union Conference. It was reorganized in 1931 when China became a separate division, and on Jan. 1, 1938, it took over the Far Eastern territory of the Central European Division, the Netherlands East Indies (see Indonesia).

For the history of the Seventh-day Adventist work in the Far Eastern Division, see specific names of the countries and islands in the area.

Division Presidents: I. H. Evans, 1919—1930; Frederick Griggs, 1931—1936; V. T. Armstrong, 1937—1941, 1945—1954; W. P. Bradley (acting), 1942—1943; none, 1943—1945; F. A. Mote, 1954—1958; C. P. Far Eastern Division Outlook

FAR EASTERN DIVISION OUTLOOK (1912— ; 1912—1914 as Newsletter for the Asiatic Division, mimeographed; 1914—1917 as Asiatic Division Mission News; 1917—1924 as Asiatic Division Outlook; monthly; file in GC). Official organ of the Far Eastern Division, published at division headquarters, Singapore.

The paper continued to carry the name Asiatic Division Outlook until 1924 even though the name of the division was changed in 1919 to Far Eastern Division.

Because of the many languages spoken in the division, the Outlook has never served as a church paper. Circulation, beginning with 200 copies, has increased steadily through the years. It is sent out each month as a medium of communication among the mission fields to English-reading workers in the division, current and former missionaries, friends and relatives of the current workers, and to the various organizations in the world field for mission promotion.

Fargo, Salam

FARGO, SALAM (1895—1974). Home missionary. During the two world wars, Salam supported the needy and fatherless on her own meager income. Married to a non-Seventh-day Adventist, she brought up her eight children to love the Lord, and all were baptized. In support of the work in Iraq, Salam distributed thousands of tracts and never missed an opportunity to share Jesus with others.

Farnsworth, Cyrus K.

FARNSWORTH, CYRUS K. (c. 1822—1899). Younger brother of William Farnsworth; member and, it appears, a lay leader of the first group of Sabbathkeeping Adventists in Washington, New Hampshire (see Washington, New Hampshire, church), in whose home many of the early Adventist meetings took place. He married Delight Oakes, whose mother, Mrs. Rachel Oakes (later Preston), was instrumental in bringing the knowledge of the seventh-day Sabbath to Adventist believers of Washington.

Farnsworth, Eugene William

FARNSWORTH, EUGENE WILLIAM (1847—1935). Evangelist, administrator. His father, William, was one of the first Sabbathkeeping Adventists, and Eugene was among the first born into a Sabbathkeeping Adventist family. At 19 he came under the spiritual influence of J. N. Andrews, and a short time later, when James and Ellen G. White and J. N. Andrews conducted meetings in Washington, New Hampshire, Eugene Farnsworth was baptized in an opening cut through two feet of ice. Later, after moving to Iowa, he responded to the urging of G. I. Butler and others to enter the gospel ministry.

Licensed in 1874, he preached eloquently and vigorously to the settlers in the Midwest. In 1883 he was appointed president of the Iowa-Nebraska Conference, but continued in evangelistic work. Later he superintended the district comprising Nebraska, Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and South Dakota.

He was in demand as a speaker at camp meetings and general gatherings in most parts of the United States. Shortly after the establishment of Union College he became instructor in Bible, and during his first year baptized 100 of the 600 students. In 1896 he began eight years of pioneer evangelism in Australia and New Zealand, then went to London, England. Returning to the United States, he was for four years president of the Atlantic Union Conference, and then head of the Bible Department of what is now Columbia Union College for one year (1910). In 1911 he assumed the presidency of the California Conference, and several years later retired at Angwin, California. However, he was again brought into service, and spent several years visiting churches, schools, and camp meetings in the United States and Canada.

Following an illness and healing, he became active in responding to hundreds of requests to pray for the sick, and prepared a booklet entitled Divine Healing.

Farnsworth, Vesta Jane (Cady)

FARNSWORTH, VESTA JANE (CADY) (1855—1932). Teacher, Sabbath school administrator, editor. Between 1890, the year her first husband, A. D. Olsen, died, and 1893 she was corresponding secretary of the International Sabbath School Association. In 1893 she married E. W. Farnsworth, and a few years later they went to Australia, where they worked for nearly eight years. During part of that time she edited the Bible Echo. Upon returning to the United States, they worked in the Atlantic Union Conference and were associated with what is now Columbia Union College until 1911, when Farnsworth was called to the presidency of the California Conference. For a time Mrs. Farnsworth led in the Sabbath school work. She was the author of four books for children: Friends and Foes in Field and Forest; Stories Mother Told; The Real Home; The House We Live In.

Farnsworth, William

FARNSWORTH, WILLIAM (1807—1888). Reputed to be “the first Seventh-day Adventist,” that is, the first of the Adventists who kept the seventh-day Sabbath. He accepted the Adventist (Millerite) doctrine about 1840 and in 1844 declared himself a Sabbathkeeper, among the first of a small group from among the members of the Washington, New Hampshire, Christian Church who became the first Adventists to observe the seventh day as the Sabbath (see Washington, New Hampshire, church).

Faroe Islands

FAROE ISLANDS. A group of 18 islands situated in the Atlantic Ocean north of Scotland, lying approximately midway between Norway and Iceland. The combined area of the islands is 540 square miles (1,400 square kilometers), and the population (1994) is 47,500.

In the seventh century Celtic priests from Ireland discovered 18 lonely windswept islands in the North Atlantic Ocean between Iceland and Norway. These clerics stayed only for a short while. However, they left behind sheep that were able to find sustenance on the grass-covered rocks. Later, Vikings from Norway on their way to Iceland settled and named the newfound country Faroe Islands, meaning sheep islands.

The Faroe Islands were politically dependent upon Norway until 1380, when they became connected with Denmark. They have been self-governing in most matters since 1948, and have their own language and flag. Tórshavn is the capital.

Some scholars claim that the first settlers in the seventh century, the Celtic monks, were Sabbathkeepers. The national archives reveal that in the seventeenth century individual Lutherans were concerned with the Sabbath-Sunday issue.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. Except for some SDA publications sent to the Faroes, the SDA message did not reach these isolated islands until 1913, when two licensed ministers were sent to the islands from Denmark to sell SDA books and papers. At the Scandinavian Union Conference session that year the president had said: "We must not forget the Faroe Islands." Two years later Emanuel Christiansen (Westman), one of the two ministers, held a series of evangelistic meetings and won five converts. On Jan. 1, 1919, he reported 13 new members. The second canvasser, Valdemar Jacobsen, took charge of the work in 1920 and remained for six years. For a number of years, the islands were a part of the territory of the Iceland Conference, but in 1946 they were united with the East Denmark Conference.

Seventh-day Adventist fishermen from the Faroes first brought Advent literature to Greenland before this island was opened to the proclamation of the Advent message.

In 1959 a clinic for physiotherapeutical treatment (Skodsborgbadet) was opened in Tórshavn. In 1966 an SDA elementary school was opened. There are now 82 pupils, with five full-time and two part-time teachers. The school is a great asset in breaking down prejudice. It has a waiting list until the year 2000. The school is a feeder into Danish Junior College. Colporteur work has proved successful on the Faroes, and SDA literature is to be found in most homes. The Seventh-day Adventist Church is regularly on Faroese television, with divine services and evening worships.

Administratively, the Faroese Church is connected to the Danish Union of Churches.

Fasnacht, Oscar

FASNACHT, OSCAR (1888—1960). Business administrator in Switzerland. His education prepared him for a business career. He was employed in the civil service when in 1911 he joined the SDA Church. In 1912 he became manager of the Basel health food store and in 1917 assumed leadership also of the tract society in Basel. In the same year he married Ruth Guenin. From 1920 until 1932 he served as treasurer of the Romanian Union Conference; from 1932 to 1935 he was cashier of the Southern European Division. In 1935 he took charge of the Phag health food factory at Gland, Switzerland. His last position before retirement was that of treasurer of the German-Swiss Conference. He took an interest in the various affairs of the church and usually served as an elder of local congregations.

Fassett, O. R.

FASSETT, O. R. (fl. 1843—1880). A physician of Lockport, New York, who became a Millerite in 1843 and then a preacher, and later a minister of the group that became the Advent Christian Church. He was quoted in some of the early Seventh-day Adventist papers, for example, in the Advent Review 1 (no. 2): 2—4, August 1850.

Fasting

FASTING. Voluntary abstinence, whether total or partial, from food for religious purposes. The principle behind fasting is that, when conducted judiciously, it contributes to good health and can increase spiritual sensitivity. In addition, it is an act of worship, a special outward and wholistic expression of the person's dependence on God's grace, power, and presence when confronting real or potential challenges and/or problems.

While there seems to be no divine command to fast (see SDADic 344, 345), the Bible gives many examples of individuals and groups who fasted for various reasons: Moses (Ex. 34:28), David (2 Sam. 12:21—23), Elijah (1 Kings 19:8), Daniel (Dan. 9:3), Nehemiah (Neh. 1:4), Esther (Esther 4:16), God's people (Esther 4:3, 16), Jesus (Matt. 4:2), Peter (Acts 10:30), the leaders at Antioch (Acts 13:2), and Paul and Barnabas (Acts 14:23).

Fasting has been practiced in a limited way by Seventh-day Adventists. Special days of fasting and prayer have been observed in the SDA Church since early in its history. Following are examples of announcements of days of fasting in the church paper:

A general call for such a day was signed by James White and M. E. Cornell: "We have consulted with brethren with whom we have recently associated, in regard to a day of fasting and prayer, in view of the want of faithful laborers in the wide harvest field; and also the feeble state of health of several who are now engaged in the work; and the suggestion meets the approbation of all. . . . By advice of brethren we appoint the first Sabbath in June as a day of fasting and prayer. . . . We recommend that all the churches be united in fasting and prayer on the day named, for the above object" (Review and Herald 6:228, May 15, 1855).

A fast day was recommended by the Battle Creek, Michigan, church: "We have submitted the subject of a day of fasting, humiliation, self-examination, confession and prayer to the Battle Creek church, who are unanimous in recommending Sabbath, August 3, 1861. . . .

"The Bible, especially the New Testament, is not very definite on the subject of fasting, whether we should entirely abstain from food, and how long. Feeble persons are generally very dependent on the small quantity of plain food which they take. These may have no duty in point of abstinence. We would recommend to all to abstain from their noon meal if consistent, and let the other two meals, if eaten, be plain" (ibid. 18:60, July 23, 1861).

In 1877 a fast day was appointed by the New York and Pennsylvania Conference and another in the same year by the Vermont Conference (ibid. 49:101, Mar. 29, 1877; 50:67, Aug. 23, 1877), but in general such a day is set by the General Conference. In 1866 the General Conference announced a four-day fast, and in 1882 a three-day one. (For descriptions of these as observed in local churches, see Review and Herald 28:5, June 5, 1866; 59:784, Dec. 12, 1882). However, fasts of such duration were unusual.

A modern example of collective fasting is the day of fasting appointed for the delegates of the General Conference session in 1954 (ibid. 131:16, May 25, 1954) and in 1958 (GCC [1958], p. 1137). The General Conference has occasionally invited the world church to fast and pray for specific purposes, e.g. for the work in China (ibid. [1959], pp. 229, 234), and for world peace (ibid. [1991], p. 8).

Feather River Hospital

FEATHER RIVER HOSPITAL. A medical institution in Paradise, California, originally founded by a group of dedicated physicians and businesspersons as the Feather River Sanitarium and Hospital. It opened Dec. 3, 1950, with a total of 15 patient beds. By 1959 it had expanded to 38 beds, and surgical services had been added.

Since December 1960 the hospital has been owned and operated by the Seventh-day Adventist Church. A new physicians' office building was completed in 1964 adjacent to the hospital, providing six office suites.

With the rapid growth of the community, it soon became apparent that a larger facility was needed. Plans were laid, and in 1968 a new complex, consisting of 51 acute beds (including eight maternity) and 97 convalescent beds, was completed and occupied.

With continued growth of the area, more acute beds were needed, and in a short time the convalescent care facility was converted to an acute medical unit and a 12-bed coronary-care unit. Other services now offered include respiratory therapy, rehabilitation, speech therapy, diagnostic laboratory and X-ray services, many sophisticated surgical procedures usually available only in larger centers, nuclear medicine, pharmacy, and emergency services.

Additional services available include same-day surgeries, a cardiac catheterization lab, and cardiac rehabilitation. The Feather River Home Health Agency provides in-home support services to numerous local residents. The Center for Women's Health, opened in September 1990, offers a wide variety of services, including diagnostic mammography, psychological counseling, nutritional counseling, perinatal services and childbirth education, a GYN nurse practitioner, and a wellness counselor.

In September 1992 the hospital opened the Paradise Pediatric Center, guaranteeing the availability of quality pediatric care to all local children.

The hospital cooperates with the California State University at Chico, Butte College, and Yuba College in providing clinical experience for students in nursing, inhalation therapy, and radiology. In addition, a very active in-service program for hospital personnel is carried on continually. A well-planned patient health education program is in operation.

Community service programs include various diabetes education programs offered at the Center for Women's Health; community updates offered by local physicians; and an annual health fair that provides various health screenings and tests to hundreds of local residents. Vegetarian cooking classes help local people to adopt a healthy lifestyle.

Fehr, Johann

FEHR, JOHANN (1884—1959). Minister and conference administrator in Switzerland and France. He was the ninth child of a blacksmith in Guxhagen, Germany. As a youth in his native village he learned cabinetmaking, and while working at his trade at Kassel, Hesse, he began to study Seventh-day Adventist teachings and joined the church in 1902, at 17 years of age. He had determined, even before he was baptized, that he would become a minister, a goal that he later achieved.

He was called first to southern Germany in 1906, and in 1908 to Switzerland to work among the German-speaking people. In 1911 he married Clara Koch in Zurich, and in 1912 he was ordained to the ministry. From Switzerland he went to France, where he was president of the Alsace-Lorraine Conference from 1920 to 1922. Returning to Switzerland, he was president of the German-Swiss Conference from 1937 to 1947. He retired in 1952, but continued his ministry as he was able until his death in Zurich in 1959.

Fenner, Hans

FENNER, HANS (1872—1948). Minister and church leader in Germany. He was baptized into the Seventh-day Adventist Church in January 1900, shortly after entering the colporteur work. In 1901 he began to preach, and in January 1906 he was ordained to the ministry. In the spring of the same year he married Maria Janert. According to the Yearbook he worked in the East German Conference (1903), Prussian Conference (1904—1906), East German Conference (1906), and West German Conference (1907—1909). From 1909 to 1912 he was president of the West German Conference. Afterward he was president of the South German Conference (1912— ?; between 1917 and 1921 the Yearbook did not list changes in Central Europe), the Westphalian Conference (? -1921), the Hessian-Westphalian Conference (1921—1927), Thuringian Conference (1927—1930), and finally the West German Union (1930—1940). After 10 years as president of the union, he retired from active service.

Fenner, Harry E.

FENNER, HARRY E. (c. 1862—1940). One of the founders of Seventh-day Adventist Young People's societies. He was a youth of about 17 when in 1879 Luther Warren came to work on the Fenners' farm, and together they organized the young people of the Hazelton township church, Michigan, for missionary work. Until he died at the age of 78, Fenner remained an active lay member of the church.

Ferguson, Jackson

FERGUSON, JACKSON (1832—1900). Lay preacher, farmer, miner, real-estate broker, postmaster, state assemblyman. He was born in Ohio, and at the age of 6 moved with his family to Indiana and then to Iowa, where he grew up and married Elizabeth Peugh. They eventually settled in California, and Ferguson was a well-established farmer near Santa Rosa when J. N. Loughborough arrived in San Francisco in 1868. Opposition to Loughborough and his message from other churches only increased Ferguson's interest.

After his baptism he lost no time in sharing the message, and soon received a license to preach. He traveled in the state somewhat until Ellen White told him that his missionary work should be done at home so as to help his wife train their children. The family moved about California, then to Saint Clair, Nevada, where meetings were held, resulting in baptisms. By 1878 a church of 29 members was established in Saint Clair. Next Ferguson and a trained evangelist held meetings in Reno, and a church was organized there. During this time Ferguson was elected to the state assembly, where he was respected for his firm belief in the Bible. Influenced, perhaps, by his zeal, the SDAs in the area became known as persistent missionaries. Later a company was formed in the Nevada town of Wadsworth, where Ferguson lived during his last years.

Fernström, Karl Anton

FERNSTRÖM, KARL ANTON (1852—1944). Minister in Sweden. Converted in a strong religious revival in his village about 1870, he joined the Swedish Missionary Society. In 1882 he moved to Stockholm, where he was influenced by public meetings conducted by J. G. Matteson and O. Jonsson. He and his wife were baptized on Feb. 22, 1885, and joined the Seventh-day Adventist Church. He became a colporteur, attended Matteson's Bible school in Stockholm, and later was elected elder of the Stockholm church. In 1890 he settled in Grythytted and the next year was ordained to the ministry at the annual meeting held there. For 50 years he was pastor of the Seventh-day Adventist congregation that met in a church building erected on his property. He traveled the country from north to south and walked through many villages, towns, and cities of Sweden preaching the gospel.

Field, Frank William

FIELD, FRANK WILLIAM (1863—1944). An early church leader in Japan. He became a Seventh-day Adventist at the age of 19. During the 1890s he taught at Mount Vernon Academy. In 1901 he was ordained to the ministry and went to direct SDA work in Japan, where, under his leadership, a publishing house and a training school were established. In 1910 he returned to the United States and afterward taught at Pacific Union College, Meadow Glade Academy, and Southern Junior College.

Field (unit of church organization)

FIELD (unit of church organization). The name used in some parts of the world for the unit of church organization corresponding to a local conference, a mission, or a section, or a national church; that is, a unit comprising local churches, stations, or districts, and itself forming, normally, a part of a union (the exception being a “detached” field not part of any union but operated directly under the division). “Mission field” has been used at times to designate a territory assigned to or worked by a conference or some other unit, but not yet organized as a mission. See Organization, Development of, in Seventh-day Adventist Church.

General field secretaries of the General Conference are workers elected, in addition to the officers, to serve in carrying the field responsibilities of the General Conference, under the direction of the General Conference Executive Committee. They are assigned either to field service or to special projects and responsibilities as determined by the committee. Division field secretaries function similarly under the respective division committees.

Born in Superior, Wisconsin, he attended Laurelwood Academy in Oregon, Pacific Union College, and Walla Walla College. He entered denominational work in 1915, serving in the Western Oregon Conference as a literature evangelist, teacher, evangelist, and pastor. He was ordained to the gospel ministry in 1918. He was elected president of the General Conference in 1954 and served in that capacity until his retirement in 1966.

Figuhr's administrative skills were augmented by his linguistic ability, for he was fluent in German, Spanish, and Tagalog. He was noted as having a good balance between consecration and administration.

Fiji

FIJI. A fully independent nation consisting of an archipelago situated in the South Pacific, between latitude 15° and 22° and astride the 180th meridian, having a combined area of about 7,055 square miles (18,270 square kilometers), and a population (1994) of 764,000. The population is made up largely of Fijians and Indians, with minorities of Europeans and Chinese and other Pacific Islanders. The majority of Fijians are either Methodists or Roman Catholics. The Indians are mainly Hindus, Muslims, and Sikhs.

The islands, mainly of volcanic origin, are mountainous. They are well watered and surrounded by coral reefs with openings into good harbors. Principal exports are sugar, copra, gold, and fruit. The capital, Suva, is on the south coast of Viti Levu, the largest island. Fiji, formerly a member of the British Commonwealth, is now an independent republic. The prime minister is head of the executive branch and presides over a cabinet of ministers. Fiji has a bicameral parliament with a house of representatives consisting of 70 members and a senate of 34 members. The islands were sighted by Abel Tasman, a Dutch navigator, in 1643. Capt. James Cook visited the Fiji group in 1774. Capt. William Bligh, of the Bounty, sighted most of the islands when he went through the archipelago after the famous mutiny. In 1874 King Cacobau ceded the islands to Great Britain. Fiji was brought under Christian influence between the years 1830 and 1850.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. The first SDA missionary to arrive in Fiji was John I. Tay in 1891 on the mission vessel Pitcairn. After a few months he became ill and died. In 1895 J. M. Cole from the United States began work in Levuka, then the capital of the islands. The same year, the islands were organized as a mission. In 1896 J. E. Fulton arrived in Suva and opened SDA work first at Tamavua, near the previous Central Pacific Union Mission headquarters. He later transferred to Suva Vou (new Suva) when Ratu Ambrose Roko Tui Suva, king of Suva, accepted the Sabbath. In 1900 Fulton began a small paper, the Rarama ("Light"). He also translated Ellen White's The Great Controversy (abridged) and a book of Bible readings. About the turn of the century the Australasian Union Conference accepted the responsibility of the South Pacific island field from the General Conference.

Under Fulton's ministry, two prominent Fijian nationals became SDAs. One of them was Ratu Meli, a high chief; the other Pauliasi Bunoa, who was ordained an SDA minister in October 1906.

In 1908 Peni (or Beni) Tavodi, the first Fijian foreign missionary, was sent to New Guinea. Through the years at least a dozen other Fijian families have gone as missionaries to other places in the South Pacific.

In 1912 Mrs. E. Meyers arrived in Fiji and began work among the many North and South Indians who had been brought from India to work on the sugar plantations. For several years this work for the North and South Indians was carried on as a separate mission, but later it was combined under one administration. There was a school for Indians at Samabula, near Suva.

In 1916 the Central Polynesian Conference was organized, with headquarters in Fiji. The territory included Fiji, Samoa, Tonga, and Niue. This form of organization was found impracticable and was shortly abandoned.

Because of large accessions in membership in inland Viti Levu in 1918 and 1919, educational facilities were increased-Navuso Central School was opened on the Wainibuka River in 1921 and the Vatuvonu Central School at Buca Bay, Vanua Levu, in 1932. In 1940 the Buresala Training School was transferred to the mainland of Viti Levu and later became Fulton Missionary College. School buildings at Samabula, Navuso, and Buresala were dismantled and used at Fulton.

When the Australasian Division was reorganized in 1949, Suva, the capital of the Fiji Islands, became the headquarters of the Central Pacific Union Mission, with the Fiji archipelago as one of the local missions of that union. At the same time, Fulton Missionary College became the central training institution for the union mission. At the union session in 1951 the Fiji Mission was divided into the East and West Fiji missions.

As the years passed and the number of children at educational level grew, it became apparent that the Fiji Mission needed another school. Because of this need the Navesau School, in the Wainibuka district, was established in 1964 to cater for pupils in the primary level.

As in other developing countries, the standard of education in Fiji has gradually risen in the past few years. Both Vatuvonu, in Buca Bay, and Navesau became junior secondary schools. Vatuvonu is currently a vocational training school. This has enabled both schools to cope with the standard of education and also to have a higher enrollment.

Financial Policies

FINANCIAL POLICIES. The General Conference Executive Committee has from its beginning formulated financial policies to guide it and its subsidiary organizations in the conduct of their activities. Policies and methods are outlined in the General Conference Working Policy.

With regard to care and responsibility in financial operations, the General Conference Working Policy (1992—1993 ed., p. 439) states:

“Cash Basis—All activities of a recurring nature for which denominational financial support is involved shall be conducted on a cash basis. All funds necessary for such operations shall be in hand or provision shall be made before commencement of activities.

“Financial Responsibility—Neither the General Conference nor any of the individual divisions composing it shall be held financially responsible for any obligations it has not assumed by its own action. This is also the general policy of the union and local conferences/missions and other organizations and institutions of the denomination.

“Budget Plan—All denominational organizations shall follow the budget plan of financial operating. The annual operating budget shall be approved by the controlling committee. It shall be the responsibility of the officers of each level of organization to require subsidiary organizations in their territory to follow the budget plan.

“Monthly Financial Reports—Monthly financial reports showing the actual operating expenses and budgetary provision to date shall be prepared and studied by the organization’s administrative officers. Treasurers shall keep controlling boards and committees informed by providing monthly financial statements except in the case of relatively inactive organizations in which case statements may be submitted quarterly. Boards and committees should compare these statements with the budget adopted at the beginning of the year and be prepared to act with the officers in increasing income and/or decreasing expenditures as may be necessary.

“Authorization for Appropriations—In the use of General Conference, division, union, and local conference/mission funds, appropriations to subsidiary organizations shall be made only by specific action of the controlling committees.”

Finland

FINLAND. A republic in northern Europe with a total area of 130,120 square miles (337,000 square kilometers). Twelve percent of this area is occupied by lakes, for Finland is “the land of tens of thousands of lakes.” Finland has a population (1994) of 5 million, of whom 296,000 are of Swedish extraction. Consequently, both Finnish and Swedish are the official languages of the country.

Finland is bounded on the east by Russia, on the north by Norway, and on the west by Sweden. Finland was under the suzerainty of Sweden from the time the Christian faith was brought to the country in the twelfth century until the year 1809. Then it passed under the control of Russia and so remained until it gained its independence in 1917. The principal occupations are farming, forestry, and industry.

In Finland 92 percent of the people are Lutherans, but there is also another state church, the Greek Orthodox Church, with about 56,000 members. There is full religious liberty.

Development of SDA Work

Development of SDA Work. Beginnings. The first Seventh-day Adventist in Finland was a sea captain, A. F. Lundqvist. While at sea, he had been converted by the Plymouth Brethren and while in Liverpool in 1885 had purchased from an SDA colporteur, George Drew, Uriah Smith’s book Daniel and the Revelation. He also bought Ellen G. White’s book The Great Controversy. As a result of reading these books he immediately began to keep the Sabbath and became a Seventh-day Adventist, remaining faithful until his death in 1955, at the age of 97. After returning to his native country, he wrote on Nov. 10, 1885, to the Swedish magazine Sanningens Harold to call the attention of the Swedish SDAs to Finland. In 1891 the Swedish canvassing leader, Emil Lind, was sent to Finland to explore the possibilities of selling books there. He met many difficulties, and was even threatened with exile to Siberia, but he continued his work for a while. When in 1892 the General Conference promised financial help for the work in Finland, the Swedish Conference sent its president, Olof Johnson, and two Bible instructors, Augusta Larsson and Matilda Lindgren, to Finland. They went to Helsinki on July 21, 1892, where Johnson rented a suitable apartment. Because foreigners were not allowed to hold open public meetings, he began to hold worships in his own home, to which the people were invited. They also visited homes and distributed literature. More and more interested people came, and 30 children attended their Sunday school. The first convert was M. Lindqvist, a carpenter, who came to “convert” Olof Johnson, “the Jewish slave of the law,” but returned home convinced, saying, “From now on I shall not work on Saturdays.” His wife and his aged mother joined him in his newly found faith, and he became a canvasser. This beginning of SDA work in Finland was in the Swedish language.

Seventh-day Adventists began public preaching in Helsinki on Jan. 15, 1893, in the Temperance Hall. Six men and six women were baptized and celebrated the Communion service on May 27, 1893. The first Seventh-day Adventist church was organized in Helsinki on the Sabbath, Apr. 21, 1894, with 24 charter members. At that time there were about 50 to 60 adherents in Finland. Among the Finnish-speaking people the work began with the distribution of SDA publications.

The workers from Sweden discovered that no book could be brought into Finland and sold. However, since there was no law against giving publications away, the group distributed them by the hundreds. At the same time a number of pamphlets were translated into Finnish and printed by local publishers. By 1894, 14 colporteurs were selling them in many parts of Finland. In 1893 E. J. Waggoner’s book Christ and His Righteousness was published as the first SDA book in Finnish.

Preaching in Finnish began in Turku in the autumn of 1894, when Olof Johnson used K. L. Östring as his interpreter.

At the annual meeting of SDAs in Finland in 1897, it was decided to found a publishing house and to print the magazine Aikain Vartija (“Watchman of the Times”).

Early Organization and Growth. At the annual meeting in Helsinki, Oct. 5—10, 1909, it was voted to organize the Finland Conference as part of the Scandinavian Union. Fred Anderson, a Swedish American, was elected as the first president. When Anderson transferred to Sweden he was succeeded by Louis Muderspach from Denmark, who held large evangelistic campaigns in Helsinki and Tampere. As young Finnish-speaking workers such as Aarne Rintala, Vaino Kohtanen, and Kaarlo Soisalo entered the work, it made rapid progress, and new churches were organized all over the country. In 1917 the three-year “Missionary School” was founded in Hämeenlinna. In 1921 the conference headquarters were built in Helsinki and the “Hydro-Electric Institute” (physical therapy treatment rooms) was opened in the same building in 1926. In 1918 the Finnish Junior College was opened in Hämeenlinna, where it continued until 1929, when it ceased to operate for two years. In 1931 it reopened in Helsinki, where it continued for only one year before being transferred to its present site in Piikkio.

In 1943 the SDA denomination received official recognition, taking for its name Suomen Adventtikirkko (“Finnish Adventist Church”).

Developments Toward the Finland Union. In 1929 the Finland Conference was divided into the Finnish and Swedish conferences. The Finnish Conference contained 1,127 members and the Swedish 314. Then in 1946 the Finnish Conference was divided into the East and West Finland conferences. Helsinki remained the headquarters of the East Finland Conference, which had 16 churches and 1,439 members. Tampere became the headquarters of the West Finland Conference, with 13 churches and 1,491 members.

At the quadrennial meeting in Stockholm of the East Nordic Union (to which Finland and Sweden had belonged since 1931) on June 14—19, 1955, it was voted to divide the union into the Swedish Union and the Finland Union. The Swedish Conference in Finland was joined to the Swedish Union, leaving the Finland Union with a membership of 4,568.

The SDA message has been preached in all the towns, in hundreds of villages, and in nearly all the centers of population in Finland. The Bible correspondence school has operated with success, and the welfare and temperance work has attracted much attention. A beautiful campsite in central Finland is the summer center of the work for young people and church members.

In 1983 the Lapland Mission, formerly the northern part of the West Finland Conference, was established. The mission had 163 members in three churches. In the same year, the Finland Swedish Conference was incorporated into the Finland Union from the Swedish Union. It increased the union membership with 318 members and 12 churches. In 1991 the East Finland Conference and the West Finland Conference united to become one conference, the Finland Finnish Conference.

Special Phases and Features in the Work. Finland has passed through several difficult periods since the SDA message was first preached in the country. The first was the civil war, which brought independence in 1917. Then in 1939 Finland fought with Russia, and after a short time of peace fought again from 1941 to 1944. These wars, misfortunes, and distresses caused many to turn to God, thus presenting opportunities for evangelism. Meetings were held in spite of the air attacks. When the bombardment was over, the people would climb out of the cellars to continue the meeting.

One of the unique features characteristic of the work in Finland has been the prominent part played by women evangelists. Their service began when many ministers were called to serve their country. Among them was Elsa Luukkanen, who gathered large audiences. Hundreds of converts were baptized. Even though, since the war, the ministers have returned to their fields, several women evangelists are continuing their work with good success.

SDA temperance has risen to a recognized position in the country. The anti-smoking campaign has been well received. Smoking Sam has been demonstrated to approximately 750,000 schoolchildren throughout the country.

Community service work has been extended to the underprivileged areas of the country, and a systematic mass distribution of clothes and other needed materials has been organized. These activities, in cooperation with the local social officers, have been a means of bringing help to about 30,000 people annually.

The Bible correspondence school has since 1948 been an integral part of the SDA evangelistic work in Finland, and has had about 3,000 students every year, with approximately 45 baptisms annually. Because the radio and TV work is based under national control the church cannot combine the BCS work with broadcasting. The BCS is connected with the Church Ministries Department.

In central Finland, situated in the community of Laukaa, there is a permanent campsite, Kallioniemi, with permanent accommodations for 200. Since 1953 this camp has developed into an evangelistic center during the summer months. Camps for children and youth, adults, mothers, and workers are held, with attendances of about 2,000 annually.

Finland Junior College

FINLAND JUNIOR COLLEGE (Toivonlinnan Yhteiskoulu). A coeducational boarding school operated by the Finland Union Conference, including comprehensive school on the junior and senior levels (forms 1—6 and 7—9) and three years of high school level. At intervals of years a seminary is also operated on campus. The constituency supporting the institution numbers about 6,000. Toivonlinna (“fortress of hope”) is situated on the southwestern coast 14 miles (22 kilometers) from Turku, the oldest city in Finland, on the side of a hill overlooking a fjord connecting with the Gulf of Bothnia. The campus is part of a 120-acre (50-hectare) estate, of which 100 acres (40 hectares) are forest land. In 1993 there were 103 comprehensive school pupils and 85 upper secondary students, making a total enrollment of 187 instructed by 17 teachers.

History

History: The school has occupied three different sites. From 1918 to 1929 it was situated in HÄmeenlinna, in the interior. In 1931, after a break of two years, it was located in Helsinki, the capital of Finland. After a year it was moved to its present campus in Piikkiä, where it was operated under the name of Toivonlinnan LÄhertysopisto until the autumn of 1941, when the name was changed to Toivonlinnan Kristillinen Opisto. In 1963 the present name was introduced, and since 1960, a three-year gymnasium leading to the university was added to the program. Toivonlinna Seminary continued as a separate department on campus. Since 1960 Toivonlinna has issued state-accepted certificates. In 1958 the school began to get subsidies from the Finnish government, and since 1988 the law also obliges the municipalities the students come from to take part in operating costs.

Finland SDA Publishing House

FINLAND SDA PUBLISHING HOUSE (Kirjatoimi). A publishing firm with printing plant operated by the Finland Union Conference and situated on the outskirts of Tampere, Finland. Seventh-day Adventist publishing work in Finland began when in 1893 E. J. Waggoner's book Christ and His Righteousness was published and printed in Helsinki as the first SDA book in Finnish. A branch office, headed by Knut Sandberg from Stockholm, Sweden, was established in Helsinki in 1894. The first periodical published in Finland was the Swedish Tidens Tecken ("Signs of the Times") in 1896, and the following year the Finnish Aikain Vartija ("Watchman of the Times"), now entitled Nyky aika ("Our Times"), was begun. The publishing house was formally organized in Helsinki in 1897.

In 1961 the firm was moved from Helsinki to the present 50-acre (80-hectare) property, where buildings were erected for a complete publishing house with printing facilities. Essential machinery was donated by the Publishing Expansion Committee of the General Conference.

Publications are issued in Finnish and Swedish. Books, including several by Ellen White, have been widely sold by literature evangelists in Finland. The Bible Story, by Arthur S. Maxwell, 10 volumes in full color, is among the significant subscription books printed by the offset presses of the Finland Publishing House. In 1993 the following journals were published: Nuori Usko (a monthly youth paper), Nyky aika (a weekly missionary and general church paper; also a quarterly Braille edition), Terveys (a monthly health journal), and the Sabbath school lesson quarterlies for senior, junior, and primary ages.

Over recent years there has been a vigorous growth in production and distribution of literature. The Finland Publishing House has for several years had the second-highest sales among the denominational publishing houses in Europe.

Managers: Knut Sandberg, of Sweden, 1894—1901; Adolf Bättcher, of Germany, 1901—1906; Nils Hammar, of Sweden, 1906—1922; Yrjö Miettinen, 1922—1959; Aarne Unhola, 1959—1968; Joel Niininen, 1969—1986; Anna-Liisa Halonen, 1986—1989; Heimo H. Lempinen, 1989— .

“First-Day Adventist”

“FIRST-DAY ADVENTIST.” A phrase used loosely by early Seventh-day Adventists to designate any non-Sabbatarian Adventists, that is, any of the other denominations originating from the Millerite movement. It is not the name of any denomination. See Adventist Bodies.

First-Day Offering

FIRST-DAY OFFERING. A freewill offering (now discontinued) for “foreign mission work” “laid aside [on Sunday] each week at home,” and turned in quarterly through the tract society (Review and Herald 64:776, Dec. 13, 1887). The plan, inaugurated in 1887, continued for some years. For later methods of raising money for worldwide missions see Sabbath School Offerings; Second Sabbath.

Fisher, George Septimus

FISHER, GEORGE SEPTIMUS (1872—1947). Manager of denominational health food manufacture in Australia. He was born in England and is reported to have received only six years of schooling there. In 1893 he attended a Seventh-day Adventist camp meeting near Melbourne, Australia, where he heard Ellen White outline the future development of SDA institutions in that country. Three years later, in 1896, he joined the Seventh-day Adventist Church and became associated with the Echo Publishing Company as clerk. In 1904 he was transferred to the health food factory in Sydney and led out in its development and general management until 1933. He was then appointed manager of the Sydney Sanitarium and served there until his retirement in 1942. He was a founding member of the Australasian Conference Association, Limited, and until his death served on the committee of the Australasian Union Conference.

Fitch, Charles

FITCH, CHARLES (1805—1844). Congregational minister, later Presbyterian minister, Millerite leader, the designer of the “1843 chart.” Early in 1838 Fitch accepted Miller’s views, producing a sensation with his sermons. But his ministerial associates treated the new doctrine with such searing ridicule and contempt that for a time he lost confidence in it, and lapsed into his former views of the world’s conversion.

It was Josiah Litch, who had known of Fitch’s experience, who brought him again to the definite acceptance of the Adventist faith. From then on he was one of the most fearless, aggressive, and successful Millerite leaders. Fitch, assisted by Apollos Hale, designed the widely used “1843” prophetic chart, painted on cloth, which he presented to the Boston General Conference of May 1842.

In the latter part of 1842 Fitch was asked to go to Cleveland, Ohio, and vicinity. Despite opposition, a definite interest in the Advent message developed at Oberlin College, where Fitch was given opportunity to deliver a series of lectures on the Second Advent in September 1843.

By 1843 Fitch was one of the most prominent of the Millerite leaders. In January of that year he began to edit a weekly journal called the Second Advent of Christ. In this he printed (July 26, 1843) his sermon (from Rev. 14 and 18) on the mighty angel who cried, “Babylon the great is fallen,” and who was followed by the warning voice, “Come out of her, my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues.” In this Fitch contended that the term Babylon was no longer limited to the Roman Catholic Church, but now included also the great body of Protestant Christendom. He maintained that both branches of Christendom had, by their rejection of the light on the Advent, fallen from the high estate of pure Christianity. He contended that Protestantism was either cold to the doctrine of the Second Advent or had spiritualized it away. This address was put into pamphlet form and later reprinted in various Millerite papers.

Early in October 1844 Fitch accepted the “seventh month” concept, and looked to Oct. 22 as the time for the coming of Christ. He was ill in Buffalo at the time, and died on Oct. 14, shortly before the day of expectation, from pneumonia contracted after prolonged exposure while baptizing outdoors in cold weather.

Five-Day Plan to Stop Smoking

FIVE-DAY PLAN TO STOP SMOKING. The original Seventh-day Adventist stop-smoking plan, originated by J. Wayne McFarland, M.D., and Elman J. Folkenberg. It was formally introduced to the church at the 1962 General Conference session in San Francisco. It has more recently been revised and updated by the General Conference Health and Temperance Department. See Breathe Free: The Plan to Stop Smoking.

Flaiz Memorial Higher Secondary School of Seventh-day Adventists

FLAIZ MEMORIAL HIGHER SECONDARY SCHOOL OF SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTISTS (formerly Narsapur High School). A coeducational English language boarding school on the senior high school level, operated by the Central India Union section of the Southern Asia Division at the town of Narsapur (Narasapur) in the delta of the Godavari River, in northeast Andhra Pradesh state. The school is affiliated with the ICSE Council recognized by the Indian government. The enrollment in 1992 was 560 students, with a faculty of 57.

The school was opened in 1921 as the Telugu Intermediate School (later listed as Telugu Secondary School in 1928, and Telugu Mission High School, 1929—1930), in temporary thatch-roofed huts by T. R. Flaiz, then superintendent of the Telugu Mission. The early students themselves helped make and burn brick for the first permanent buildings. In 1925, when the enrollment reached 45, the school received its first full-time principal, C. A. Schutt. In succeeding years the plant was enlarged and modernized several times. Electricity was installed in the late 1950s.

A new boys' dormitory, built to accommodate 300 students, was formally opened in 1973. The money for this building, and for a new administration block, was received from a 1968 Thirteenth Sabbath Offering overflow. The administration building has 11 large classrooms, a library, science laboratory, and office rooms.

The school owns 44 acres (18 hectares) of land, half of which are arable, producing 70 percent of the rice eaten by the students.

In the 1930s the school was listed in the Yearbook as the Narsapur High School, but in 1947 the high school classes were discontinued and the students sent to the Lowry Memorial Higher Secondary School, which served the whole union. In the late 1940s and early 1950s the school was listed as the Narsapur Secondary Boarding School. In the early 1950s the school again offered full high school work and its students were prepared for the Andhra Pradesh State matriculation examination. From 1956 to 1978 it was again known as the Narsapur High School. In 1978 the present name was adopted.

Fleming, Lorenzo D.

FLEMING, LORENZO D. (1808—1867). Minister, reformer, editor, and Millerite leader. Before accepting Millerism he was an active supporter of educational, temperance, and antislavery efforts, and for a time was acting editor of the Emancipator. As a Millerite he became editor of Glad Tidings, Rochester, New York (which later became the Voice of Truth), then assistant editor of the Midnight Cry. He wrote New Testament Companion (1839), The Midnight Cry: A Synopsis of Evidences of the Second Coming (1842), and First Principles of the Second Advent Faith (1844). His Casco Street Christian church in Portland, Maine, to which in 1840 he invited William Miller, was the church in which the family of Ellen Harmon accepted Miller's teachings.

Fletcher, William Warde

FLETCHER, WILLIAM WARDE (1879—1947). Former evangelist and administrator in Australia and Southern Asia, born in Tasmania. He joined the Seventh-day Adventist Church in 1900, and the next year began to work as a colporteur. From 1902 to 1904 he was in charge of the Book Department of the Echo Publishing Company. In 1905 he began evangelistic work, and in 1906 went to Singapore. Leaving there, he later engaged in city mission work in Adelaide, South Australia, and in 1912 was ordained to the ministry. He was president of the South Australian Conference from 1912 to 1914; young people's, home missionary, and educational secretary of the Australasian Union Conference (1914); and vice president of the union in 1915. From there he went to India, where he served as president of the India Union Mission (1916—1919). Later he served as field secretary and then chair of the Southern Asia Division (1920—1922). Upon returning to Australia, he conducted evangelism, served as an administrative officer of the Australasian Union, and for a time taught Bible at Australasian Missionary College. About 1930, for doctrinal reasons, he severed his connection with the church and later was associated with the Sydney Bible Training Institute and the Free Evangelical Fellowship.

Flood

FLOOD. The universal deluge described in Gen. 6 to 9, in which, except for the occupants of the ark, all air-breathing animals of the “dry land” are said to have been destroyed. According to the biblical account, “the waters prevailed so mightily upon the earth that all the high mountains under the whole heaven were covered; the waters prevailed above the mountains, covering them fifteen cubits deep” (Gen. 7:19, 20, RSV). Seventh-day Adventists view the Bible account of the Flood literally (G. W. Amadon, in Review and Herald 16:122, Sept. 4, 1860; J. N. Andrews, in Review and Herald 60:472, July 24, 1883; G. M. Price, The New Geology [1923]; H. W. Clark, The New Diluvialism [1946]; etc.). The Scriptures declare that the purpose of the Flood was to destroy obdurate sinners and to permit a new beginning from the faithful remnant that survived. Bible writers confirm the record of Genesis (Isa. 54:9; 2 Peter 2:5; 3:6; Heb. 11:7), as does our Lord (Matt. 24:37; Luke 17:26).

From medieval times those who accept the Genesis account literally have commonly attributed fossils—the traces or remnants of animals and plants preserved in the rocks—to the Noachian deluge. At times a misguided faith led to hasty and premature conclusions by some not qualified to judge the nature of the fossil remains. For instance, notable theologians and preachers, such as Augustine and Cotton Mather, mistakenly identified teeth from fossil mammoths as those of a giant antediluvian race of human beings.

Of the many features from the fossil record that have been taken as suggestive of a flood that destroyed the earth, the following are typical: abundant fossil remains of marine animals in the rocks of many mountain chains and all continents have been taken as evidence for the widespread extent of the Flood; evidences in many instances of rapid, and at times catastrophic, circumstances of burial of plant and animal remains are taken as suggestive of flood burial; existence of tropical and warm temperate forms in rocks of high latitudes is felt by many to suggest a major climatic change in postdiluvian times.

The mute testimony of the rocks is often obscure and open to various views, and, as would be expected, there has not always been unanimity as to the interpretation of certain geologic features that may be related to the Flood. The degree to which a definite order or sequence exists in the fossil-bearing strata, the question whether certain topographic features are a result of the Flood or of other geologic events such as volcanism or glaciation, and the extent of pre- and post-Flood geologic activity are a few of the debated questions. (See A. T. Jones, Review and Herald 60:513, 514, Aug. 14, 1883; G. M. Price, The New Geology [1923]; H. W. Clark, The New Diluvialism [1946]; F. L. Marsh, Studies in Creationism [1950].)

From 1860 onward, articles defending the Genesis account of the Flood appeared in the Review and Herald at rather frequent intervals. A dozen or more times over the next 30 years the Babylonian cuneiform account of the Flood, then recently discovered, and the universal tradition of a great deluge were mentioned as confirming the Bible record of that event (18:173, Oct. 29, 1861; 18:180, Nov. 5, 1861; 41:61, Feb. 4, 1873; 44:139, Oct. 27, 1874; 68:602, Sept. 29, 1891; etc.). Other articles point to fossils, especially marine fossils high in the mountains, as evidence of a flood of great depth and extent (ibid. 16:122, Sept. 4, 1860; 18:173, Oct. 29, 1861; etc.). Foremost among SDA geologists in the twentieth century was George McCready Price, from whose pen came no less than 16 books on various aspects of creationism, evolution, and the Flood. (See especially Common Sense Geology and The New Geology.) From the biological viewpoint, biologists Harold W. Clark and Frank L. Marsh have considered fossil remains in relation to the Flood. The SDA-sponsored Geoscience Research Institute, in association with Andrews University in Berrien Springs, Michigan, is evidence of major denominational interest and effort in this area. This institute is devoted to a scientific study of the various branches of paleontology and to the correlation of scientific studies with the Bible. A recent readily available source for the SDA point of view with respect to the Flood from the viewpoint of geology is the article “Evidences of a Worldwide Flood,” in volume 1 of The SDA Bible Commentary (pp. 64—97). History

History. Beginnings of the Work in the Area. S. N. Haskell reported an 1873 convert (place unmentioned), a Black man “who . . . then went to his people in Florida,” where he found many of them eager for his books and tracts and some willing to adopt the Sabbath (True Missionary 1:56, July 1874). It is not known whether he won any permanent converts.

Beginning as early as 1876, news items from Florida appear in the Review and Herald. In that year a letter from Jacksonville refers to “a little company here, who have accepted the seventh day.” The next year there is mention of six Seventh-day Adventists in St. Augustine and about the same number in Jacksonville. About the beginning of 1883 J. O. Corliss visited the few families of adherents scattered throughout the state, but the only evangelism reported was conducted by laypersons. One of these was Charles P. Whitford, from Vermont, who lived in Moultrie, a new settlement south of St. Augustine. In 1883 and 1884 he wrote of a few SDA families there and of new converts in that county (St. Johns).

The first SDA series of meetings in Florida, held early in 1885, was reported by G. G. Rupert, a minister sent by the General Conference. Preaching near Terra Ceia Bay, on the Gulf coast 40 miles (65 kilometers) south of Tampa, where about 20 SDAs from Michigan had settled, he added 10 converts and organized a church of 22 members. This oldest Seventh-day Adventist church in the state—and still the largest as late as 1895—was the forerunner of the present Palmetto church. Soon after leaving the Terra Ceia church, Rupert baptized six and organized a church at Sorrento, in central Florida. Here lived L. H. Crisler, who had heard SDA preaching in Iowa but had not accepted the faith until moving to Florida, and who was to be, a few years later, the first Florida Conference president. Two churches organized by Rupert in 1886—at Orlando and Jacksonville—were later disbanded because of their members moving away, but were reorganized in 1890 and 1898, respectively.

These two disbanded churches exemplify one of several difficulties met in the early work in Florida—a fluctuating population. Evangelists preaching to winter residents might find their best hearers leaving for their northern homes in the spring. Or small new churches could melt away almost overnight if their members were among that class of settlers who had arrived in Florida with much enthusiasm but little adaptability to the new climate or the unfamiliar requirements of soil and season, and who soon moved away to seek a better location or other employment. Because of the instability of the population in those early days, S. H. Lane, who was sent to Georgia and Florida in 1888, recommended to the General Conference a delay in the intended organization of a conference in Florida.

Yet the migratory habits of the population had one advantage, as Samuel Fulton had reported to the General Conference session of 1887 on his return from Florida. Most of the people in the cities and towns, having come recently from elsewhere and having broken their ties with the past to some degree, were more ready to take up new ideas. He reported a liberal spirit, a lack of prejudice. Others after him found this true, though in the more conservative localities active opposition could develop. It was in a backwoods post office that evangelist L. H. Crisler encountered an irate citizen who assaulted him viciously until restrained by bystanders.

Other hindrances to progress were the periodic yellow fever scares, which inhibited public meetings, and a freeze that brought economic disaster. For example, the threat of yellow fever epidemics prevented tent meetings scheduled in 1887 for Tampa, where there were nine members; kept people away from the 1888 meetings in Lake City; and canceled a camp meeting in the 1890s, although the epidemic did not actually enter peninsular Florida. The 1895 camp meeting was eliminated because of the economic depression consequent upon what was still remembered for more than a half century as “the big freeze,” which not only wiped out the 1894—1895 citrus crop but killed many groves outright. For several years church budgets and colporteur sales suffered from the effects.

Organization in the Nineties. Despite setbacks, the 1890s were a decade of organization and progress. By 1890 organized or unorganized groups of adherents were reported at or near Apopka, Earlton, Fernandina, Gainesville, Jacksonville, Lake City, Moultrie, Orange Heights, Orlando, Palmetto, Pine Hill, St. Andrews Bay, St. Augustine, Sorrento, Tampa, and Waldo. Not all of these were permanent.

There were six churches represented in the meeting at Barberville in September 1893 that organized the Florida Conference and at the same time a tract society and a Sabbath school association. The new conference began life with three ordained ministers, two licentiates, and 139 members, with a territory comprising all of Florida. (There were two territorial changes later: in 1908 seven northwestern counties were given to the Alabama Conference, and two others in 1922; a tenth was transferred in 1932 to the new Alabama-Mississippi Conference.)

During the nineties several other firsts are reported: in 1892 the first “company of canvassers,” supervised by canvassing agent S. T. Page, and the first SDA church building, erected by the members of Barberville (organized in February) and De Leon Springs; and in November 1894 the first camp meeting and regular session of the new conference, held at Tampa—said to be the first camp meeting of any denomination in that area. The campers, including 100 who came up the bay in two schooners from Terra Ceia and elsewhere in Manatee County, were housed in 50 tents and apartments. A. T. Jones spoke twice daily, and other speakers were G. I. Butler, former General Conference president, who had retired to Florida in 1888, and R. M. Kilgore, superintendent of the Southern District, who stayed over after the end of the meeting to organize the Tampa church.

During that decade efforts were made to evangelize several ethnic groups. House-to-house work for Blacks as well as Whites was reported at Lawtey (1891) and at Milton (1897). In 1897 reference is made to M. T. Ivory, a Black licentiate (later ordained), working since April in Orlando. In September 1899 Ivory reports preaching to White people for three weeks in Punta Gorda and working among the Blacks in various places all during the year, with the result that a church was organized in Orlando. (For Black Seventh-day Adventists in Florida and neighboring states, see South Atlantic Conference.)

There were hopes of beginning mission work among the Seminole Indians in south Florida through contacts made at Chokoloskee, when in 1896 W. L. Bird visited the little SDA group there on the southern Gulf coast at Ten Thousand Islands. In 1897 the conference president felt that the way seemed to be opening, yet nothing permanent appears to have come of it. Fifty years later there were reports of one SDA half-Seminole trying to reach these Indians—a woman whose tribal membership gave her access to them.

Likewise little was realized from hopes for a Tampa-based Cuban mission work. Immediately preceding the Spanish-American War in 1898, relief contributions were solicited for the Cuban refugees in Tampa, and plans were made to distribute Spanish publications to the “readers” in the local cigar factories (functionaries who were hired to read to the employees as they rolled cigars). Many years later some evangelistic work was carried on for the Spanish-speaking people in Tampa, but the few converts were absorbed into the English-speaking church. Only in recent years was a Spanish church organized in Miami.

Development in the Twentieth Century. On May 1, 1901, when the former General Conference District no. 2 (the Southern District) became the Southern Union Conference, the Florida Conference became one of its component conferences. In November 1901 the Florida Conference elected as president G. I. Butler, who had twice been General Conference president. Because of his health he had retired to Bowling Green, Florida, in 1888, and then had remained long after his recovery to care for his invalid wife, who died just preceding this conference session. The following January, at the first session of the new Southern Union Conference, this former General Conference president was elected the union president, in addition to his Florida work. Thus until 1904 the Florida Conference had a president who lived in Nashville, Tennessee.

During the first 10-year period, the Florida Conference doubled its membership, growing to 12 churches and 286 members by 1903, and in the second decade, to 27 churches and 744 members in 1913. Among the churches organized by that time were those at St. Petersburg (1905), Daytona (1909), and Miami (1910). Meanwhile, the Florida Sanitarium had been opened in Orlando in 1908, and the conference headquarters moved there in 1910.

In a state with a steadily developing population, church membership continued to grow despite economic setbacks because of the collapse of the Florida “boom” and the great depression of the 1930s. Forest Lake Academy, near Orlando, was established in 1926, and its campus provided a permanent camp meeting site. In the forties and fifties several sanitariums and hospitals were opened (see list near the beginning of this article), also a youth campsite was acquired at High Springs (Camp Kulaqua), and a new conference headquarters building (opened January 1960) was erected.

Membership figures show one drop, which, however, was not an actual decrease. In 1945 the transfer of the Black membership to the newly organized South Atlantic Conference reduced the Florida Conference totals from 68 to 47 churches, and from 6,038 to 4,579 members. By the end of 1950 there were 51 churches, with 5,558 members, and at the end of 1974 the membership reached 16,154 with 89 churches. By the end of 1992 membership totaled 34,197 with 149 churches and 17 companies.

Florida Hospital

FLORIDA HOSPITAL. A 1,462-bed acute-care medical center with five campuses—Florida Hospital Orlando, Florida Hospital Altamonte, Florida Hospital Apopka, Florida Hospital East Orlando, and Florida Hospital Kissimmee. Florida Hospital serves Greater Orlando as a community hospital and is also a major tertiary referral hospital for central Florida and much of the Southeast, the Caribbean, and South America.

Florida Hospital opened in 1908, accommodating scarcely 20 patients. L. N. Sickler, M.D., served as medical director, Lydia E. Parmele, M.D., wife of the conference president, was house physician, and H. A. Shreve was the first business manager.

After three years of operation and gratifying growth under the shareholders' plan, the institution was placed under full conference control. A new hospital building was erected of concrete veneer, increasing the capacity to 60 beds. In 1913 the Nursing School graduated a class of five.

In 1940 a new building was erected, adding 18 hospital rooms, two operating rooms, a delivery room, and other facilities. By 1946 a court of patients' cottages was completed. In 1949 a north wing, a four-story concrete structure, was completed, doubling the capacity of the entire hospital. A nurses' training center built in the 1950s included a three-story education building with dormitory for 100 students, assembly hall, library, laboratories, classroom, administrative offices, and recreation rooms.

The hospital School of Nursing graduated a total of 480 from 1913 to 1958. In the mid-fifties Southern Missionary College, in Tennessee, began to offer a program in nursing leading to the B.S. degree, using this hospital for clinical practice. The first students graduated under this arrangement in 1960. A school of practical nursing, founded 1962, graduated its first 10 students in 1963.

A modern psychiatric wing was completed in 1958 to accommodate 31 patients. The Morgan Memorial Rehabilitation Center, a four-story concrete building housing 60 beds for pediatrics and a complete Physical Medicine and Rehabilitation Department, was constructed in 1962. Also during 1962 the original sanitarium and hospital buildings built between 1913 and 1918 were demolished to make way for a new 80,000-square-foot (7,500-square-meter) hospital building to house most of the ancillary departments and to add 100 beds. This building was completed in 1964.

In 1967 a new South wing was opened providing administrative offices as well as 132 additional beds. In 1970 a new West wing, adding 48 beds, was opened. During 1973 a 103-bed satellite hospital, eight miles (13 kilometers) north of the main plant, was completed.

Beginning early in 1974 an $11 million expansion added 168 beds to the main hospital as well as a new Trauma and Emergency Center, laboratory, Radiology Department, Engineering Service, and Food Service.

In the 1970s Florida Hospital and its medical staff led the effort to develop subspecialty services in Florida. During the decade the hospital saw the start of the region's first joint replacement surgery program and the beginning of the kidney transplant program. Florida Hospital continued to expand in the seventies with new programs, new equipment, and two new satellite hospitals in Altamonte and Apopka.

The 1980s brought more expansion to Florida Hospital. Florida Hospital Orlando gained 134 new patient beds, new office facilities and patient-care floors, as well as a helipad for emergency transports with the addition of an 11-story, 220,000-square-foot (20,500-square-meter) patient tower in 1985. In 1990 Florida Hospital added 197 new patient beds by bringing on another satellite—Florida Hospital East Orlando—and in 1993, 120 more patient beds were added with the acquisition of Florida Hospital Kissimmee. In 1992 Florida Hospital received national recognition for its commitment to quality health care.

Today unique specialty services in cardiology, orthopedics, rehabilitation, obstetrics, women's medicine, and microsurgery, as well as many special care nursing units, serve patients of all ages and all levels of care. With 43,000 inpatients, 130,000 outpatients, and 116,000 emergency cases each year, Florida Hospital treats more patients than any other hospital in central Florida—in fact, it has the second-highest volume in the state.

Florida Hospital College of Health Sciences

FLORIDA HOSPITAL COLLEGE OF HEALTH SCIENCES. A coeducational undergraduate institution located on the Florida Hospital Medical Center (FHMC) campus in Orlando, Florida. The college is accredited by the Seventh-day Adventist Board of Regents, is fully licensed by the Florida State Board of Independent Colleges and Universities, and has been awarded candidacy status by the Southern Association of Colleges and Schools. Hospitals used by the college for clinical experiences are accredited by the Joint Commission of Accreditation of Healthcare Organizations.

While the college itself is a new institution, some of its programs have been in place for a number of years. The Registered Nursing program was established in 1913 by what is now Florida Hospital Medical Center and was operated for 70 years as a three-year hospital-based nursing training program. In 1983 a two-year associate degree program was begun at FHMC under the sponsorship of Southern College of Seventh-day Adventists. In 1992 that program was transferred to Florida Hospital College of Health Sciences. At the same time, the college brought together three other educational programs (radiography, diagnostic medical sonography, and radiation therapy), two of which had been in existence at FHMC for some time.

The college offers two-year Associate of Science degrees in nursing, diagnostic medical sonography, radiation therapy, and radiography. Certificate programs are also available for practical nursing, radiation therapy, and diagnostic medical sonography.

Florida Hospital/Waterman

FLORIDA HOSPITAL/WATERMAN. A 182-bed acute-care hospital in Eustis, Florida, operated by Adventist Health System/Sunbelt Health Care Corporation.

In 1926, 10 doctors opened a small hospital in a wing of the Rowe Hotel in Umatilla, Florida. By 1933 it had become an 18-bed not-for-profit facility called Lake County Medical Center. The doctors moved the hospital into the Fountain Inn in nearby Eustis in 1938. The inn, built by Frank Waterman, president of the Waterman Fountain Pen Company, had suffered financial problems and was closed in 1936. Waterman turned over his famous resort to the doctors, and over the next 25 years the medical facility expanded. The name was changed to Waterman Memorial Hospital in memory of its benefactor.

In 1960 the Waterman Memorial Hospital Association was formed. This group of concerned citizens provided guidance and raised funds for hospital renovations. With aggressive planning, the hospital was soon expanded to include the following: additional patient rooms, new lobby, administrative offices, support services suites, a chapel, new laboratory, obstetrical unit, and business offices. Recent additions include a physical therapy rehabilitation center, outpatient services center, and expanded emergency room.

In 1992 the hospital became part of Adventist Health System/Sunbelt Health Care Corporation, and its name was changed to Florida Hospital/Waterman.

Presidents: Royce Thompson, 1992— .

Florida Living Nursing Center

FLORIDA LIVING NURSING CENTER. A 120-bed skilled nursing facility in Apopka, Florida, owned by the Florida Conference of Seventh-day Adventists and leased by Sunbelt Health Care Centers, a division of Adventist Health System/Sunbelt Health Care Corporation. The facility was officially opened July 15, 1970, with 15 patients. The facility grew over the years, with its most recent expansion added in 1989. The nursing center is conveniently located adjacent to the 90-unit Florida Living Retirement Center, also owned by the Florida Conference.

Florida Living Retirement Community

FLORIDA LIVING RETIREMENT COMMUNITY. A residential community operated by the Florida Conference primarily for Seventh-day Adventist members on a 20-acre (eight-hectare) property made available by K. A. Wright, a retired educator. The site is a spacious countryside setting adjacent to Forest Lake Academy and is within one mile (1.6 kilometers) of a small shopping area and post office. This facility was originally planned to provide for approximately 225 residents to be constructed in stages according to need and availability of funds. The first units were opened on Sept. 12, 1965. There are presently 10 apartment buildings with six to eight units in each, 34 single-room units and an administrative building.

Flowers, A. E.

FLOWERS, A. E. (1853—1894). Pioneer Seventh-day Adventist worker in Trinidad, West Indies. He was converted in his youth, and in 1873 joined the Seventh-day Adventist Church. During the autumn of 1891 he and his wife engaged in evangelism in St. Louis, Missouri. In 1894 he was sent to Trinidad, but after working only a few months there he died of yellow fever.

Follett, Orno

FOLLETT, ORNO (1882—1960). Missionary to the American Indians for 40 years. He studied nursing at the St. Helena Sanitarium. In 1909 he married Agnes Wammack, and for several years engaged in evangelistic work in Kansas.

Having had two bouts with tuberculosis, he took a five-month trip in a covered wagon to look for a location for an Indian mission, and in 1916 established a mission among the Navajos at Thoreau, New Mexico. A mission home, school, and dispensary were built, and later, a small hospital. He spent 15 years working among this tribe, and aided in translation of parts of the Bible into Navajo. He also established several missions among the Indians of Arizona.

Food Companies

FOOD COMPANIES. Church-owned companies manufacturing health foods of various kinds, especially vegetarian protein foods and whole-grain cereal products. Seventh-day Adventist food manufacture began as a department of the Battle Creek Sanitarium, which produced granola and other cereals and wafers for the patients. Sales were a by-product of diet therapy, as patients ordered foods for their own use after leaving the institution. Thus originated the Battle Creek Sanitarium Health Food Company. The Kellogg brothers, John Harvey and W. K., set up a private business also, that later became famous for its products, but this was not church owned. As the system of Seventh-day Adventist sanitariums spread elsewhere, so did the health foods. Various plants were set up in connection with these medical institutions, and others separately. Following is a list of the companies now operating under church institutional management:

Adventist Health Education Foundation (Egypt Food Factory) (Cairo, Egypt)

Division Health Food Company (Brasilia, Brazil); Buenos Aires Health Food Company (Buenos Aires, Argentina); Brazil Food Factory (São Paulo, Brazil); Uruguay Factory (Productos Frutigran) (Canelones, Uruguay)

Foot Washing

FOOT WASHING. By washing the disciples' feet when He instituted the ordinance of the Lord's Supper, Jesus made use of a common practice of the day and gave it spiritual significance (John 13:1—17). By this act of humility He subdued the spirit of pride and the desire for supremacy that pervaded the disciples' hearts.

The ritual of foot washing was generally observed in the early church (cf. 1 Tim. 5:10). Later foot washing was sometimes practiced in connection with the love feast, or agape, in the apostolic church. Inasmuch as the agape provided an opportunity for feeding the poor, it also became an occasion for washing their feet. Later on, as a result of excesses, various church councils forbade the celebration of the agape, and this may provide a clue to the disappearance of foot washing as a general practice. The Council of Toledo (A.D. 694) recommended foot washing on Maundy Thursday (the Thursday preceding Easter). Foot washing was later used, in some instances, in connection with baptism or as a substitute for it, and sometimes even at marriages.

The earliest extant nonbiblical reference to foot washing is in Canon 48 of the Council of Elvira (A.D. 306), which forbids priests and clerics to wash the feet of newly baptized persons when they leave the baptismal font, a practice that was followed in Ireland, northern Italy, certain parts of Spain, and Gaul, but, according to the testimony of Ambrose, not at Rome. This rule was later incorporated into canonical law. See SB 763—767.

Commenting on John 13:1—17, early Church Fathers, such as Origen, usually considered the practice of foot washing a spiritual experience and a symbol of humility. But there were other opinions. Ambrose, bishop of Milan, explained that newly baptized persons were anointed on the head and their feet were washed, so that, as in the case of Peter, “hereditary sins might be done away with, for our sins are remitted by baptism” (On the Mysteries, NPNF, 2nd series, vol. 10, p. 321). In Ambrose' opinion, foot washing was also “a help towards humility.” It also has a spiritual experience: “Wash the steps of my mind that I may not sin again. Wash the heel of my soul, . . . that I feel not the serpent's bite on the foot of my soul” (Of the Holy Spirit, NPNF, p. 95). For Augustine of Hippo, foot washing not only indicated humility among brethren but was to be practiced for mutual forgiveness. Especially on the occasion of foot washing, he said, “We know that of this also we were admonished . . . that we should confess our faults one to another, and pray for one another” (On the Gospel of John, NPNF, 1st series, vol. 7, p. 306). One reason that foot washing was not literally and mutually practiced was that many interpreted Christ's injunction spiritually; that is, they held that Jesus' example was to be considered merely a pattern of what the Christian should do and was not necessarily to be a mechanical, physical repetition of the washing of feet.

Early Adventists debated among themselves the question of foot washing. In 1845 advocates referred to this as “an example for showing our love to the brethren, by an act of humility on the part of the superior” (Day-Star 8:11, Oct. 25, 1845), and held that it was important to observe “all the commands of Jesus, even to washing one another's feet”

(ibid. 8:1, Oct. 18, 1845). The practice was sometimes referred to as our Lord's "least commandment" (ibid. 7:8, Aug. 18, 1845). Opposers of the practices of foot washing and the "holy kiss" (Rom. 16:16, etc.) linked these rites with fanaticism, doubtless because they were practiced by some of the fanatics in New England who demonstrated their humility by bizarre methods.

In 1854 Ellen White warned that members had "not always moved as judiciously as they should," and spoke of avoiding the appearance of evil (Supplement to the Christian Experience and Views of Ellen G. White [1854], pp. 37, 38).

Seventh-day Adventists observe the ceremony immediately preceding the Lord's Supper, and therefore it is sometimes called the preparatory service. It is also called the ordinance of humility. It is suggested that participants correct misunderstandings and confess their faults one to another at this service. Men and women take part in the service separately. The exchange of a kiss by the two serving each other is often included, especially among the older members, but it is not considered necessary.

As to the significance of the service, the following is quoted from The Desire of Ages (p. 650) in the Church Manual (p. 82): "This ordinance is Christ's appointed preparation for the sacramental service. While pride, variance, and strife for supremacy are cherished, the heart cannot enter into fellowship with Christ. We are not prepared to receive the communion of His body and His blood. Therefore it was that Jesus appointed the memorial of His humiliation to be first observed."

Commenting further on the significance of the service in the context of the institution of the ordinance by Jesus, Ellen G. White says: "The service which Peter refused was the type of a higher cleansing. Christ had come to wash the heart from the stain of sin. In refusing to allow Christ to wash his feet, Peter was refusing the higher cleansing included in the lower. . . . These words ["He that is washed needeth not save to wash his feet, but is clean every whit"] mean more than bodily cleanliness. Christ is still speaking of the higher cleansing as illustrated by the lower. He who came from the bath was clean, but the sandaled feet soon became dusty, and again needed to be washed. So Peter and his brethren had been washed in the great fountain opened for sin and uncleanness. Christ acknowledged them as His. But temptation had led them into evil, and they still needed His cleansing grace. When Jesus girded Himself with a towel to wash the dust from their feet, He desired by that very act to wash the alienation, jealousy, and pride from their hearts. This was of far more consequence than the washing of their dusty feet. With the spirit they then had, not one of them was prepared for communion with Christ. Until brought into a state of humility and love, they were not prepared to partake of the paschal supper, or to share in the memorial service which Christ was about to institute. Their hearts must be cleansed. Pride and self-seeking create dissension and hatred, but all this Jesus washed away in washing their feet. A change of feeling was brought about" (DA 646).

Ford, Harry Eugene

FORD, HARRY EUGENE (1889—1938). Administrator. He was born in Indiana and attended Beechwood Academy, studied nursing at the Wabash Valley Sanitarium, and graduated with a B.S. degree from Purdue University (1913). Afterward he worked as laboratory technician at Lafayette, Indiana. After service in the Medical Corps of the Army during World War I, in 1919 he installed and afterward operated X-ray equipment at Hinsdale Sanitarium. After 17 years there, during which for a time he acted as secretary of the board of management, he became business manager of Riverside Sanitarium and Hospital (1936), an all-Black-staffed medical institution.

Ford, Orley

FORD, ORLEY (1893—1972). Missionary to South and Central America. After his graduation from Walla Walla College in 1917, Orley and his bride, the former Lillian Shafer, sailed for Peru, where they served for four years. Soon after their arrival an Indian came to the mission and said that his son had a “sore foot.” Orley was horrified to see that gangrene had already set in and progressed to the young man’s knee. Amputation was the only solution, and the young missionary, who had completed a four-month course in medical techniques, performed the surgery with the only instruments available—a butcher knife and an ordinary saw. Later he successfully performed two additional surgeries and also made the man a satisfactory wooden leg.

The Fords moved next to Ecuador, where they dedicated nine years of their lives to the people of that country. Beginning in 1930, they served in several Central American countries, where Ford carried the responsibility as president in three different missions for 27 years. The Fords retired in 1961, but elected to stay in El Salvador, where he remained active until his death. At the time of his passing he had set a record in Seventh-day Adventist mission history, having devoted 55 years to mission service. At his request he was buried in El Salvador, among the people he loved.

Foreknowledge

FOREKNOWLEDGE. The doctrine that God, possessing perfect knowledge, foresees all future events. The Scriptures offer abundant testimony of God's ability to predict the future, and offer this ability as an evidence of His claim to deity (Isa. 41:4, 22, 23; 42:9; 46:9, 10; Dan. 2:28; Acts 3:18). No other so-called god can do so.

Seventh-day Adventists recognize three broad categories of predictive prophecy as attesting God's foreknowledge. First are predictions of divine purpose independent of humanity's will. For instance, God predicted the atonement of Christ and the final triumph of righteousness (Gen. 3:15; Dan. 2:44; Rev. 11:15; 20:12—15; 21:27). The second class consists of predictions of humanity's actions, as, for example, the many OT prophecies of the behavior of the Jewish people toward Christ (Isa. 53). The Scripture reports a great many such prophecies of contingent events (1 Sam. 23:10—13; 1 Kings 13:20—26; 2 Kings 13:19). The third class consists of predictions of divine reward or punishment. Some of these are pronouncements of inevitable retribution for sins committed; others are of a conditional nature, in which the fulfillment will be reward in case of obedience or destruction in case of rebellion. Had Israel continued in obedience, the threats of retribution would never have been fulfilled (see Deut. 4:27, 40; 6:3, 18, 19; 28:58—68; Lev. 26:27—33).

In Reformed theology, which follows Calvin's lead, the divine decrees precede God's foreknowledge.

God has decreed all things and has decreed them with their causes and conditions in the exact order in which they come to pass; and His foreknowledge of future things (and also of contingent events) rests on His decree (L. Berkhof, Systematic Theology, pp. 67, 68). Seventh-day Adventists, distinguishing between foreknowledge and predetermination, deny categorically that the evil deeds of men were fixed by divine decree. God foresees and foretells, but "the prophecies do not shape the characters of the men who fulfill them" (Ellen G. White, in Review and Herald 77:721, Nov. 13, 1900). God "did not work to bring about a certain condition of things, but He knew that such a condition would exist" (Ellen G. White, in SDACom 6:1082). The SDA view of divine foreknowledge approximates the Arminian position.

Forest Hills Academy

FOREST HILLS ACADEMY. A coeducational boarding senior high school formerly operated on a 365-acre (150-hectare) tract of land in Magkiangkang, Bayugan, Agusan del Sur, about 30 miles (50 kilometers) from Butuan City, the timber city of Mindanao Island, South Philippines.

The school was a successor to the former Butuan City Mission Academy, established in 1969, which was situated in the heart of Butuan City. Its buildings were mainly of secondhand materials, splitboards, and round timbers purchased cheaply.

Work on the establishment of Forest Hills Academy began in 1972. Under the direction of T. C. Cabaluna, R. L. Cabaluna, and a group of laypersons, buildings of temporary materials were erected.

Forest Hills Academy served as a training school for the entire Northeastern Mindanao Mission field.

The school was closed in the mid-1970s.

Forest Lake Academy

FOREST LAKE ACADEMY. A coeducational day and boarding school on the senior high school level, situated 11 miles (18 kilometers) northwest of Orlando, Florida, and four miles (6.5 kilometers) east of Apopka (post office, Maitland, Florida). On the 385-acre (155-hectare) campus overlooking Mirror Lake are the boys' and girls' dormitories, administration building, gymnasium-auditorium, bindery-press, cafeteria, maintenance building, laundry, and faculty homes. Approximately 80 acres (30 hectares) are planted in citrus trees. The academy is fully accredited by the Southern Association of Colleges and Schools, the state of Florida, and the SDA Board of Regents.

Forest Lake Academy had two forerunners. The first Seventh-day Adventist secondary school in Florida was at Fort Ogden (1909—1912), called the Fort Ogden School, then the South Florida Intermediate School. In 1918, on the campus of the Florida Sanitarium and Hospital in Orlando, a new intermediate school called Winyah Lake School (later Academy) was established, and began its first year with an enrollment of about 50. This was a 10-grade school, which later became Forest Lake Academy.

In August 1925 a 160-acre (65-hectare) tract was purchased for $16,000 from the heirs of J. W. Emerson, and in 1925—1926 F. H. Parrish and his wife and 12 young people moved to the new property. The nine-room farmhouse was used as the girls' dormitory, dining room, kitchen, and administration building. The boys camped in the barn. This school was known at first as the Florida Conference Academy, or simply Florida Academy. In 1926 it became known as Forest Lake Academy. One dormitory was built in 1926—1927, and the second the following year. A part of the administration building was erected in 1936—1937; the rest of the structure was added during J. M. Howell's administration. A camp meeting tabernacle was built about 1930, later enlarged, and finally used for youth sessions. A gymnasium-auditorium was built in 1954.

In 1932—1933 Forest Lake Academy's first twelfth-grade class, 13 in number, was graduated. The Reflector, the school paper, was first published in 1929—1930, and the first yearbook, the Mirror, in 1945.

Under K. A. Wright's administration the original acreage was more than doubled by the purchase of additional land. A part of this land, planted in grapefruit trees, is still a source of income.

Because of the age of most of the buildings, the Florida Conference voted in 1962 to raise a million-dollar rebuilding fund over a five-year period. Under this program, which was under the direction of H. H. Schmidt, conference president, and William Fuchs, principal, a boys' dormitory, a maintenance building, a cafeteria, and a bindery-press were constructed, and a new girls' dormitory and a new administration building were scheduled and soon completed.

Foss, Hazen

FOSS, HAZEN (fl. 1844; d. 1893). A young man who experienced visions in the autumn of 1844. He is described as a man of fine appearance, pleasing address, and education. He lived at Poland, Maine, about 30 miles (50 kilometers) north of Portland.

Of the Millerite persuasion, Foss firmly believed that the second advent of Christ would take place on Oct. 22, 1844. In September or early October of that year he had a vision in which he saw the travels of the Adventists to the City of God and was instructed to deliver to them certain messages of warning. He also saw the trials and persecution that would come to him as the result of his faithfulness in telling what he had seen. Subsequently, he declined to relate the vision.

The disappointment of Oct. 22 left Foss with the feeling that he had been deceived. In a second vision he was warned that if he refused to relate it to others the burden would be taken from him and placed on one of the weakest of the Lord's children. As he contemplated his responsibility he dreaded the reaction should he declare that he had experienced visions, for the Millerite leaders had taken a stand against such manifestations. At one time a group assembled to hear him tell of what he had been shown, but he refused to relate it. Then one day very strange feelings came to him, and he heard a voice saying, "You have grieved away the Spirit of the Lord."

According to Ellen White's account (letter 37, 1890), when he heard the voice he was horrified at his stubbornness and rebellion and told the Lord he would relate the vision. Calling a meeting, he attempted to communicate it, but his mind could not recall the vision. After several attempts he cried out in despair, "It is gone from me; I can say nothing, the Spirit of the Lord has left me." The meeting was described by those who were present as "the most terrible meeting they were ever in."

In December 1844, after this experience, Ellen G. Harmon (later White) had her first vision. At the time Ellen Harmon knew nothing of the experience of Hazen Foss, but while visiting in Poland, Maine, in February 1845 she related at Maguire's Hill the first vision she had seen. Foss was invited to the meeting but would not come in. From outside the closed door he heard her account. The next day he called on her at her sister's home in Poland, and recounted his experience. As she reported it, he declared, "Ellen, . . . the Lord gave me a message to bear to His people. And I refused after being told the consequences, I was proud; I was unreconciled to the disappointment. I murmured against God and wished myself dead. Then I felt a strange feeling come over me. I shall be henceforth as one dead to spiritual things. I heard you talk last night. I believe the visions are taken from me, and given to you. Do not refuse to obey God, for it will be at the peril of your soul. I am a lost man. You are chosen of God; be faithful in doing your work, and the crown I might have had, you will receive" (Ellen G. White letter 37, 1890).

Foss lived until 1893, but from the time he refused to relate his visions he had no interest in religious matters.

Foy, William Ellis

FOY, WILLIAM ELLIS (fl. 1840s). A Millerite preacher, of interest to Seventh-day Adventists because his name is occasionally mentioned as one who in 1842 and 1844 had visions relating to the Adventist (Millerite) movement. He was described as a tall, light-skinned Black man, an eloquent speaker. He lived in New England and as a young man in 1835 gave his heart to Christ. Sometime thereafter he became a member of the Freewill Baptist Church. However, in 1842 he was preparing to take holy orders as an Episcopal minister. It was at this time that he had two visions relating to the near advent of Christ and to last-day events. Prior to this, while deeply religious, he had been, by his own testimony, “opposed to the doctrine of Jesus’ near approach,” but after the visions he joined the Millerites in heralding the message of the expectation of Christ’s coming.

The account of two initial visions of William Foy, together with a brief sketch of his Christian experience, was published in 1845 in pamphlet form in Portland, Maine. The first occurred Jan. 18, 1842, while he was attending a prayer service in Boston on Southark Street. According to eyewitnesses he was in vision two and a half hours. The pamphlet includes the statement of a physician who examined him during a vision and testified that he could find no appearance of life “except around the heart.” As Foy declared: “My breath left me.”

In the first vision, Foy saw the reward of the faithful and the punishment of sinners. Although he felt it his duty to tell what he had seen, he made the excuse that he had not been instructed to relate it. Finding no peace of mind, he had a description of the vision printed, but it was a “very imperfect sketch.” In a second vision, on Feb. 4, 1842, in which he saw multitudes of those who had not died and those who had been raised from the dead being assembled to receive their reward, he heard the instruction that he was to reveal what he had seen and to warn his fellow creatures to flee from the wrath to come.

Foy’s unwillingness to relate to others what he had seen stemmed not only from the prejudice of the Millerites against any who claimed to have divine revelations but also, he said, from “the prejudice among the people against those of my color.” He questioned in his mind, “Why should these things be given to me, to bear to the world?”

On Feb. 6, 1842, the pastor of the Bloomfield Street church in Boston called upon Foy to relate the visions in his house of worship. He consented reluctantly, and the next afternoon he faced a large congregation. As he began to speak, his fear left him, and he related with great freedom the things he had seen.

After this he traveled for three months delivering his messages to crowded houses of many denominations. When speaking, he wore the robes of the Episcopal clergy. As he graphically described the heavenly world, the New Jerusalem, and the compassionate love of Christ, and exhorted the unconverted to seek God, many responded to his entreaties. However, because his family needed support, Foy, after three months, retired from public work to labor with his hands. Three months later, feeling impelled to deliver his message, he again took up his public ministry, expecting soon to see his Saviour.

Ellen Harmon heard Foy speak in Beethoven Hall in her home city, Portland, Maine, when she was but a girl. According to J. N. Loughborough, Foy had a third vision near the time of the expectation in 1844 in which he saw three platforms, which he could not understand in the light of his belief in the imminent coming of Christ. In perplexity he ceased public work.

Some have questioned the genuineness of William Foy's experience, but others have felt that the "visions bore clear evidence of being the genuine manifestations of the Spirit of God" (Loughborough, The Great Second Advent Movement, p. 146). Ellen White in a 1912 interview (EGW Document File 231) reported that she had talked with him once when he was present in a meeting in which she was relating her own early visions, and that he had said that her account was just what he had seen. She apparently regarded his experience as genuine.

France

FRANCE. A republic in Western Europe, with a land area of 220,668 square miles (571,500 square kilometers) (including the island of Corsica) and a population (1994) of 57.8 million. The majority of the people are of French nationality, but there are large groups of Italians, Spaniards, Poles, Portuguese, and North Africans. French is spoken universally, but the people also speak Breton in Brittany; a German dialect in Alsace and Lorraine; Spanish, Catalan, and Basque on the Spanish border; Flemish along the Belgian frontier in the northeast; and Italian in Corsica and in the southeast. The religion of the people is mainly Roman Catholic, but there are about 800,000 Protestants, chiefly Calvinist and Lutheran, about 700,000 Jews, and about 3 million Muslims from North Africa.

The peoples of what is now France (Romanized Gaul) had contacts with Christianity by the second century A.D. In the fifth century, after the Germanic invasions, the church served as the bond for the fusion of many tribes into the Frankish state, marking the beginning of many centuries during which the church played a powerful part in French society. The crowning of Charlemagne, the Frankish king, as the “Roman Emperor” by the pope in the year 800 symbolized this peculiar relation. But through the centuries there was opposition to the power of Rome, and southern France was the home of reform movements, such as those of the Albigenses and the Waldenses, protesting against the practices of the Roman Church. The extermination of the Albigenses was the object of one of the crusades (1208—1213).

When the Reformation came to France it gained adherents among the simple and the noble people alike, but the church used the power of the state to suppress the Protestants. Later this alliance of the reactionary church with the absolutist state led to the union of their opponents, the liberal political groups and the anticlerical and antireligious movements. Toleration was granted the Protestants by the Edict of Nantes in 1598, but as the power of the state grew, the edict was revoked in 1685, and from then until the French Revolution only the Roman Catholic religion was allowed to exist in France. The revocation of the edict resulted in severe persecution and caused the mass flight of Protestant Huguenots from France, leaving entire localities desolate. The emigration deeply hurt the economy, because the country lost a high percentage of its artisan and commercial classes. The action of the church in this period led to the absolute rejection of the Christian religion by the leaders of France in the course of the French Revolution (1789). But the complete eradication of religion was not accepted by the masses, nor were various substitutes, such as theism, theophilanthropism, and the worship of reason. Under Napoleon the church was again called to support the state, and an understanding with Rome made the clergy the servants of the state. The Restoration retained this arrangement and it was continued until 1905, when finally the church was separated from the state. Still, numerous laws imposing control on the exercise of religion were retained, and the complete freedom of religion did not come until later in the century. The effect of the centuries-long struggle between the church and the state and between the forces of reaction and liberalism thoroughly secularized the French people.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings in Southern France. The work J. N. Andrews carried on among the French-speaking people in Switzerland after his arrival from the United States in October 1874 was a prelude to Seventh-day Adventist work in France. D. T. Bourdeau, also from the United States, joined Andrews in Switzerland in January 1876. His first work in what is now France began in what until after World War I was German territory. In the spring of 1876, even before he and Andrews launched the monthly Les Signes des Temps in Switzerland, copies of which were sent into France, he spent three weeks in what was then Alsace, Germany. He reported in the Review and Herald (47:181, June 8, 1876) that “while Brn. Andrews and Aufranc were making preparations for the work in Bâle [Basel]I came to Le Ban de la Roche, Alsace, a distance of seventy-five miles, to spend a few weeks aiding Bro. Scheppler, who had come here from Illinois on a visit, and to follow up the work of French tracts sent from America.”

When he left, six had decided to keep the Sabbath. He merely visited interested families on this trip, but on his return for 10 days or more in August, he preached and baptized a few converts.

In October of the same year he settled with his family in southern France. There he preached in different places but especially in Valence, where 17 people were baptized. Because of many restrictions from the ecclesiastical authorities, Bourdeau and Andrews went to Paris in March 1877 to ask the government for permission to work with more liberty. Bourdeau left France in September 1877 and went to Switzerland.

In 1878 Bourdeau reported in the Review and Herald that political changes made it easier to preach and distribute tracts than formerly. A lay evangelist of Valence, named Gabert, circulated publications, took subscriptions for Les Signes, and preached in three departments, at Crest, Beaufort, Ouste, Lyon, Villefort, and other places. D. T. Bourdeau joined him at St. Didier when strong opposition arose. Public evangelism was hindered by the French law that required such meetings to be held in a church building.

In 1884 D. T. Bourdeau held a series of meetings in Branges, a small village, baptized a number of people, and organized a church of 17 members. Later he went to Bastia, on the island of Corsica, where Les Signes des Temps had created an interest, and, after only about a month's work, established a church of 11 members. In the mid-1880s Jean-Pierre Badaut, a recent convert, sold SDA publications in France.

About 1890 an interest was awakened in several other towns and villages in the south of France, particularly Nîmes, in towns in the Department of Gard, and in Lacaze, Tarn. In 1893 a Sabbath school was established in Pierre-Ségade, near Lacaze. In 1894 work was begun in Besançon and in Lyon. In 1897 there were four workers in France.

About 1888 Emery P. Auger, a colporteur from the United States, had attempted to sell SDA publications, but it was not until 1897, when two colporteurs were active in the region of Montbéliard and in Saône-et-Loire, that any success in this undertaking was reported.

At the end of the century there were three more ministers in France: J. Curdy, T. Nussbaum, and D. Lecoultre, all from Switzerland. In 1900 L. P. Tièche was placed at the head of the work in southern France.

Northern France Entered. The capital of France was not forgotten. The financial report of the Central European Conference, September 1899, mentions a fund for establishing a mission in Paris. At a meeting of the conference that same year a pledge was made to establish a mission in Paris.

In April 1900 Paul Roth and his wife went to Paris, hoping to establish themselves in giving treatments in private homes. Two colporteurs were also sent to sell Les Signes des Temps and the health journal Le Vulgarisateur, but because entrance to homes for the work they were doing was forbidden, they had little success.

A. L. Meyrat and Arnold Roth, from Switzerland, opened a health food enterprise at Clichy known as Pur-Aliment. Jean Vuilleumier, pastor and editor of periodicals, took an active part in these beginnings. On Apr. 6, 1901, at the end of the first SDA Communion service held in Paris, a church was organized.

In 1902 when the French-Latin Union Mission was organized, with B. G. Wilkinson as president, J. Curdy was made president of the French Mission. In the fall of 1902 Wilkinson settled in Paris and conducted a Bible course in 1902—1903, to train French evangelists. These students devoted part of their time to canvassing and personal evangelism.

By Sept. 10, 1902, there were about 10 churches and 130 members in France (which at that time did not include Alsace-Lorraine), and by Dec. 31, 1907, according to the Statistical Report, there were 16 churches and companies and 227 members.

The French Conference. In 1907 the French Mission was made a conference, with H. H. Dexter, of the United States, as president. But aside from the capital, the north of France had not been touched as yet. After the Latin Union session, held in Vergèze, Department of Gard, in 1909, an evangelist was sent to Rouen, and another to Lille. Paris had a separate organization as the Paris District. At the beginning of 1914, preceding World War I, there were 346 church members in France.

At a session in Nîmes in August 1918, the conference was reorganized, with Alfred Vaucher as president, and a few months later, at the end of the war, there were 439 members. Some 200 were added when Alsace-Lorraine was receded to France in 1919. The first church there had been organized in Mulhouse in 1901. Others were organized in Strassburg (1902), Metz (1907), Merlebach (1909), and Colmar (1910). The churches of this territory, formerly in the South German Conference, were organized in 1919 as the Alsace and Lorraine Conference and attached to the Latin Union Conference.

In 1923 the French Conference was divided into two, the North France and South France conferences, the dividing line being approximately the Loire River. Alsace-Lorraine was called the East France Conference.

Franco-Belgian Union. In 1928 the Latin Union Conference was dissolved and the Franco-Belgian Union Conference was formed, composed of the three French conferences and the Belgian Conference. Oscar Meyer was elected president, and headquarters were established in Paris. In 1949 a fourth conference, that of Southwest France, was organized with 200 members, with headquarters in Bordeaux. Altogether in France there were at that time 57 churches, with 2,500 members. In 1968 it was decided to combine the three French conferences into two: the North France Conference, under the direction of André Matton, with headquarters in Paris; and the South France Conference, under the direction of Elie Davy, with headquarters in Montpellier. In the same year, Luxembourg was attached to the Belgian Conference. The growth in membership proved the reorganization to have been a wise decision.

Churches and Institutions in the Paris Area. When the Franco-Belgian Union was organized in 1928, Paris had a church of about 120 members. Some 30 years were required to reach this number. In 1931 the church occupied new quarters on the Boulevard de l'Hôpital, in the union conference headquarters building. After World War II, when these quarters became too small for the members, a former Anglican church building was purchased in Neuilly, a residential suburb of Paris, and some of the members established a new congregation. Churches were also organized at Versailles and at the publishing house that operated since 1922 at Dammarie-les-Lys (see [Life and Health Publishing House \[France\]](#)). Since 1965 six more churches have been organized in the Paris area, four of them in their own buildings. The Paris area had about 1,500 members in 1974.

When Algeria became independent in 1962, many French SDAs returned to France, most of them settling in the southern part of the country.

Before World War II, most of the French SDA churches met in rented quarters, which were often inadequate for the work of the church. In 1960 extensive plans were laid for church construction, and by December 1969 nine new chapels had been built.

For years it had been felt that the SDA message should be proclaimed over the radio in the French language. Finally Charles Gerber began weekly broadcasts in May 1947 over Radio Luxembourg; in April 1948 talks were also introduced on Radio Monte Carlo. A radio recording studio was set up in Paris in the headquarters building in 1949. Maurice Tièche began educational talks over the French National network in 1950. In the studio in Paris, broadcasts in French and other languages were produced, transmitted mainly over Radio Luxembourg and Radio Monte Carlo until 1968, and in the 1970s, shortwave over Trans World Radio from Lisbon. In 1993 six radio stations in France were broadcasting the SDA message.

Bible correspondence courses in France began in 1948; several series are being offered at the present time by the Franco-Belgian Union. They are advertised over the radio and by leaflets distributed by the church members.

The circulation of publications is strongly promoted in France, as is also the work of the different departments in an atmosphere of religious liberty.

Fraser Valley Adventist Academy

FRASER VALLEY ADVENTIST ACADEMY. A senior academy owned and operated by the British Columbia Conference and situated at 26026 48th Avenue, Aldergrove, British Columbia.

Fraser Valley Adventist Academy, located in British Columbia's rural Lower Fraser Valley region near metropolitan Vancouver, began operating as a consolidated school in 1972. At that time several churches in the valley united their small one- and two-room schools into a four-room four-teacher academy with an enrollment of 79 students. Within three years the school grew to a full senior secondary school with more than 150 students and nine teachers.

A volunteer work project, organized to expand facilities in 1974, led to the constituency's ability to build a $150,000 classroom complex for less than $100,000. By 1993 the constituency had grown to include seven churches, 200 students, and six bus routes, serving church youth living over an area of 600 square miles (1,550 square kilometers).

The school is denominationally accredited and is approved by the government of British Columbia. An enriched curriculum prepares students for university entrance anywhere.

Frauchiger, Emil E.

FRAUCHIGER, EMIL E. (1865—1947). Minister and administrator in Europe and Turkey. Born in Lausanne, Switzerland, he was in the group of 22 who in 1886 accepted the Seventh-day Adventist faith in Lausanne as the result of the preaching of J. Erzberger and L. R. Conradi. He immediately entered the colporteur work, serving first in his homeland and two years later in Rhenish Prussia, where a group had begun to keep the Sabbath as a result of reading the Bible.

Proving himself to be successful in winning souls, he was called into evangelistic work in Germany. In 1907 he was elected president of the Rhenish-Prussian Conference. In 1909 he went to Constantinople as superintendent of the Turkish Mission. The following year he was appointed superintendent of the Levant Union Mission, with headquarters in Constantinople, where he remained through the dangers and horrors of World War I. From 1919 to 1923 he served as president of the Czechoslovakian Union Conference. From 1924 until his death he lived and worked, as his strength permitted, in Switzerland.

Free Will

FREE WILL. The capacity with which the Creator endowed human beings that enables them to make choices as to whether to obey or to disobey God, to be subject to moral law or not to be subject to it. This endowment precludes the use of force on God's part to effect a change in human beings. God seeks to draw people to Him, but leaves each person free to decide for himself or herself whether or not to respond. If people choose to ally themselves with God, His will becomes omnipotent in their lives and nothing can keep them from following God's plan.

Calvinism and Arminianism propose two greatly differing views regarding free will. These views reach far back into church history. Augustine spoke of what he called God's irresistible grace and absolute foreordination, which would preclude a truly free will. Pelagius, a British monk living in Rome, rejected Augustinianism, declaring that people could rise up and determine to work out their own salvation in fear and trembling. Thus began the unending controversy over divine grace and human free will.

Calvin asserted that God, by an irrevocable decree, had destined certain persons to salvation and others to reprobation, irrespective of their personal choice or attitude. Those thus appointed to salvation would inevitably be saved, and all others as certainly damned. According to Calvin, Jesus Christ did not die for all, but only for those who had thus been elected by God to salvation. Those destined to salvation would be unable to resist the Spirit of God working in their hearts, whereas no desire or effort on the part of those predestined to eternal damnation could possibly avert that fate. To the strict Calvinist, election rests solely on the sovereign good pleasure of God, not on faith or works.

Arminianism, on the other hand, defines predestination as an everlasting decree, in Christ, to make everlasting life available to all sinners who, by His power and grace, accept Jesus Christ and persevere in the good fight of faith (Eph. 1:3—8). God will reject only those who voluntarily refuse the offer of divine grace. According to Arminius, Jesus died for all, and by virtue of His death all are eligible to accept pardon from sin, to find acceptance with God, to remain steadfast to the end, and to enter God's eternal kingdom. Sin deprived humanity of the capacity to exercise free will; by His death on the cross Christ restored that capacity. Apart from God's grace human beings are helpless. All good works are a result of this grace, which, though absolutely necessary, is not irresistible. Through this divine grace men and women can be victorious over sin, the world, and the devil.

Numerous modifications of the theories of Calvin and Arminius have come in since their day. Seventh-day Adventists find elements of biblical truth in both Calvinism and Arminianism. Both the OT and the NT stress the freedom of the human will (Deut. 28:1, 2, 13—15; Joshua 24:14—25; Isa. 1:19, 20; Jer. 18:7—10; 29:13, 14; Matt. 7:24—27; 23:37; Rom. 6:12, 13; 14:10—12; 2 Cor. 5:10; Rev. 22:17).

God, in grace and mercy, desires that all shall be saved through faith in Jesus Christ, but He leaves with humanity the choice of accepting or rejecting His gracious gift. Everyone is therefore responsible for his or her own destiny. The person who chooses to place his or her free will on the side of God's will, and who wills to keep it there, is invincible "in Jesus Christ." However, by voluntarily surrendering his or her will to the will of God, a person does not thereby lose the freedom of his or her will. The individual can still choose to break the union with Christ, though no force, temptation, coercion, or deception is able to wrest salvation from the one who chooses to serve the Master by a definite, continual committal and action of the will.

French Guiana

FRENCH GUIANA. An overseas department of France with an area of 43,740 square miles (112,600 square kilometers), situated on the northeast coast of South America, bounded on the west by Suriname and on the south and east by Brazil. Between the ocean and the mountain ranges there is a coastal strip 10 to 30 miles (16 to 50 kilometers) wide. In 1946 French Guiana, which had until that time been a colony of France, terminated the penal settlement there and was reorganized as an overseas department. The majority of the 101,000 inhabitants (1991 estimate) are of African-American or mixed blood. In the interior there are several tribal groups of Indians. There are also several hundred freed convicts and political deportees from France.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. The territory of French Guiana constitutes the French Guiana Mission in the French Antilles-Guiana Union Mission, which in turn is part of the Inter-American Division. Statistics (1993) for French Guiana: churches, 4; companies, 8; members, 1,169; elementary schools, 2; ordained ministers, 4; teachers, 11. Headquarters: 39 Rue Schoelcher, Cayenne, French Guiana.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. The first Seventh-day Adventist worker in French Guiana was R. T. Colthurst, who after serving in Algeria and on the island of Mauritius for two terms conceived the idea of going into hitherto-unentered Guiana. Having received permission in 1938 from the Inter-American Division to go to the colony, he paid his own passage from his native Britain to the capital city of Cayenne, but because of the war in Europe he was refused entrance into French Guiana. He waited and worked for about two years in Suriname until the necessary permission was obtained.

Because it was impossible to find a place to carry on public evangelism in French Guiana, Colthurst went from door to door, visiting many of Cayenne's 14,000 inhabitants. He could not sell books, but he made friends. As a result, by the time he was called to British Guiana he had baptized one person and had interested a number of others.

In 1946 the Caribbean Union sent a licensed minister, A. H. Linzau, to continue the personal work begun by Colthurst. After two years in the area he won a group of converts that became the nucleus of the first SDA church. Eager to have their own church building, the members gathered large stones to build one. The president of the Caribbean Union, Robert Pierson, sold French Guiana stamp collections in the United States to raise cash. In 1964 that congregation had the only Protestant church building in Cayenne.

In 1952 Marcel Perau and Paul Joseph, who was a colporteur, opened work in St. Laurent du Maroni, the second-largest city of French Guiana. They also took the SDA message to the Carib Indian tribes that live in the area. The first SDA baptism among these Indians occurred in 1958, when S. B. Jean-Elie baptized nine candidates. The chief of one of the tribes that occupy the reservation of Paddock, to the north of St. Laurent, became a convert. In the late 1950s Jean-Elie gained the favor of the authorities and the people of Cayenne with his welfare work, by providing warm meals to the poor and the former prisoners of the penal colony.

In 1959, shortly after the organization of the French-speaking areas of the Inter-American Division into the Franco-Haitian Union, French Guiana was organized as a mission, with Ernest Veuthey as president. Five months later he was succeeded by Marcel Perau. In December 1962 Eugene Berle succeeded Marcel Perau, who began the work with some other tribes such as the Samamaca, the Bony, and the Bosh. At the same time, the work entered a remote area called St. George near the Brazilian border. Etienne Plumain and Luc Chandeler, successively, became president of the mission. Thomas Labetant is the current president. A secondary school is operated by the mission with the recognition of the government. On Jan. 10, 1974, the second church building of French Guiana was dedicated. At present there are five church buildings, the last having been dedicated on Mar. 28, 1993.

French Polynesia

FRENCH POLYNESIA. An overseas territory of France comprising the Gambier, Marquesas, Society, and Tubuai islands, the Tuamotu archipelago, and Clipperton Island, between about 132° and 157° west longitude and 7° and 28° south latitude, except Clipperton Island, which is situated at about 109° west longitude and 10° north latitude. The territory has a combined area of 1,575 square miles (4,100 square kilometers), with a population (1991) of 188,814. The Tuamotus and Clipperton are low coral atolls, the other groups are made up of high basaltic lavas, each surrounded by a fringe or barrier of coral reefs. The chief products are copra, mother-of-pearl shell, vanilla, and phosphate. The islands produce an abundance of tropical fruits.

The islands were discovered by Europeans in April 1769, when Capt. James Cook was sent by the Royal Society of London to observe a transit of Venus across the sun's disk and to pursue geographic researches. He anchored in Matavai Bay, east of Papeete, now the capital of the territory, where the scientists made their observations.

Early Christian Missions. On Mar. 5, 1797, the London Missionary Society's ship, Duff, landed at Tahiti four ordained ministers, a number of artisans, five women, and two children. At first they were favorably received, but tribal fighting endangered their lives. One was murdered; four were maltreated. Most of the missionaries escaped from the island on passing vessels and went to New South Wales. Later they returned, and after the reigning chief, King Pomare, was converted to Christianity in the second decade of the nineteenth century, the entire population was brought under Christian influence. By 1836 the Bible had been translated into Tahitian by Henry Nott, a missionary of the London Missionary Society.

The territory of French Polynesia comprises the French Polynesia Mission, which is a part of the Central Pacific Union Mission, which in turn is a part of the South Pacific Division. Statistics (1993): churches, 26; members, 3,607; ordained ministers, 6. Headquarters are at Papeete, Tahiti.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. The first Seventh-day Adventist to visit Tahiti was John I. Tay, a layperson, who in 1886 spent a few weeks on the island on his way to Pitcairn Island. A. J. Read and his wife, arriving on Tahiti on the first voyage of the Pitcairn in 1891, opened SDA work. They returned to the United States in 1895.

Arriving on the second voyage of the Pitcairn in 1893, B. J. Cady and his wife settled on Raiatea, which lies about 120 miles (200 kilometers) northwest of Tahiti. E. C. Chapman and his wife, who were on the same boat, assisted by printing literature in the Tahitian language. Cady opened a school in his home and later purchased a property for a school to train national workers. This school was conducted partly on industrial lines. Management and staff included the following missionary families: Close, George Beckner, and H. L. Fowler; also Anna Nelson.

In 1906 the Eastern Polynesian Mission was formed, composed of French Polynesia, Cook Islands, Easter Island, and Pitcairn Island, with headquarters at Raiatea, and with B. J. Cady as superintendent.

In 1908 George L. Sterling and his wife took charge of the school. In 1909 F. E. Lyndon became mission director. In 1914 the mission reported 43 converts, with four church buildings on the islands of Tahiti, Raiatea, Huahine, and Moorea.

In 1916 the South Pacific mission field was reorganized into three areas: the Central Polynesian Conference, with headquarters in Fiji and C. H. Parker in charge; the Melanesian Mission, with G. F. Jones as superintendent; and the Eastern Polynesian Mission, with headquarters in Tahiti and F. E. Lyndon as superintendent. Later this arrangement was discontinued, and the Cook and other islands became separate missions. Tahiti continued to be the headquarters of the French territory.

In 1948, at a special session of the Australasian Union Conference, French Polynesia became part of the Central Pacific Union Mission. From 1949 to 1965 a number of French nationals—F.J.H. MacDougall, M. P. Nouan, E. J. Landa, Ernest Veuthey, Marcel Bornert, S. P. Jerome, R. V. Esposito, and J. Surel—served consecutively in the field. In 1958 new headquarters were built. In 1960 a new Papeete church was erected, seating 500, and in 1962 a new school on the primary level was opened in the islands.

In 1972 a youth center was erected on the island of Moorea; in 1973 a new president's home was built and extensive additions were made to the mission headquarters office. Several new church edifices have been built in recent years, notably on Moorea and Bora Bora.

Fresno Adventist Academy

FRESNO ADVENTIST ACADEMY. A coeducational day school on the senior high school level, with an elementary school, serving the churches of the Fresno, California, area. It is owned by the Central California Conference and is administered by a joint board consisting of representatives from supporting churches and the conference. The staff consists of the principal, registrar, accountant, secondary teachers, 11 elementary teachers, and a custodian. Elementary and secondary schools are on the same property, at 5397 E. Olive Avenue in Fresno. The academy is accredited by the SDA Board of Regents, is approved by the University of California, and is a member of the Western Association of Secondary Schools and Colleges.

The school began as an elementary church school that opened in a single room in the autumn of 1897 in the Fresno English church at Mariposa and O streets in downtown Fresno. Several years later the school was moved to a one-room house on White Avenue, and in 1907 to a two-room school at North Fruit and Napa streets on the western edge of the city. Some 10 years later George Driver donated a five-acre (two-hectare) site. The original plant consisted of an elementary unit and a building housing the secondary school. To this were later added a shop and a music building. The 12-grade program began in the fall of 1921, with a graduating class (1922) of three.

In 1941 a small Quonset-type auditorium, formerly used for evangelistic purposes, was moved to the property and named Driver Hall. It served the recreational needs of the community and the school, and for a time, after an earthquake in 1952 forced abandonment of the original Mariposa and O streets church structure, the church needs of the Fresno English church. Later additions were administrative offices (1943), cafeteria and home arts building (1946), library and commercial room space (1947), two houses for teacher occupancy (1948), and a two-classroom unit for grades 7 and 8 (1949).

Construction on Parkside Auditorium was begun in 1953. This large building provided for the school and church recreational needs and was used as a meeting place for the Fresno English church until November 1960, when a new church building was erected. Driver Hall, no longer needed, was removed.

At the business meeting of Nov. 9, 1964, the Fresno Central church voted to purchase a 40-acre (16-hectare) site for relocating the school. At the time of the purchase the property was in the country. In 1974 property, which formerly was a farm, was incorporated into the city limits.

The elementary classrooms were completed on the new site on Olive Avenue, and classes began in 1967. The first two buildings of the academy section were completed in the spring of 1971, and the junior high grades moved to the new location. Grades 9—12 moved to the new campus in the fall of 1972. The library and home economics buildings were completed in 1973. Two barns on the Olive Avenue site have been remodeled—one to serve as an industrial arts building, the other to serve as a temporary assembly room. The beautiful mansion built at the turn of the century has been renovated and houses the Music and Art departments. Presently a $1 million campaign for the building of a new gymnasium to serve school and community needs is being launched.

FRIDLIN, MARIUS (1903—1972). Missionary, division secretary, administrator. After accepting the Seventh-day Adventist message in his native country, Alsace, in 1928 and spending three years preparing for the gospel ministry at the French Adventist Seminary, Fridlin began his service as dean of men at his alma mater and then as a young minister at Metz, France. He was ordained in 1935 and then spent 11 years guiding the mission program in Cameroon. In 1946 he was called to serve as secretary of the Southern European Division, and in 1958 he accepted the presidency of that field, where he served for 12 years. Although retired, he was active in the work until his death.

Friedensau Old People's Home

FRIEDENSAU OLD PEOPLE'S HOME. An institution operated by the North German Union on the campus of the theological high school at Friedensau, Germany, not far from Magdeburg.

It was established in 1907 by what was then the German Union. The money was raised through donations and through the sale of the book The Ministry of Healing, on which the author, Ellen G. White, had released all profits. At the opening, 60 aged people found their home in this new institution.

In 1949 the western wing of the former Friedensau Sanitarium was given to the old people's home. Thus the home has accommodations for about 90 residents. The main building was completely rebuilt in 1973/1974.

At present (1993) the manager is Roland Rudolph and the head nurse is Ute Schosnig.

Friedensau Retreat

FRIEDENSAU RETREAT (Erholungsheim Friedensau). A 100-bed rest center (formerly a sanitarium) operated by North German Union Conference. It was established in connection with the founding of Friedensau Seminary on a tract of 97 acres (40 hectares) near Burg, not far from Magdeburg, purchased in September 1899 by the then German Conference. The sanitarium was opened in July 1901 with a capacity of 30 patients. The first medical director was Dr. A. J. Hoenes, from the United States. The treatments given, employing natural remedies—air, sun, water, massage—became so popular that the sanitarium was enlarged in 1903 by the acquisition of a villa west of the original building, and again in 1907 by the addition of a wing, thus allowing the number of beds to be doubled.

In 1922 the Friedensau Sanitarium was changed into a convalescent home in the charge of a head nurse. In March 1924 the house was placed at the disposal of the Friedensau Missionary Seminary as the women's dormitory, and from 1924 to 1943 it was also occupied by a school of domestic science.

In 1949 the institution was reopened as a retreat center. The western wing was given to the Old People's Home. In 1956—1957 another wing with 36 rooms was built, and in 1968 a third floor was added above the main building. Thus the capacity was increased to accommodate 120.

The Erholungsheim Friedensau is a retreat for spiritual uplift and physical relaxation used in two-week periods for Seventh-day Adventists and friends. It serves also for ministerial retreats, layperson's meetings, and various committee meetings.

Directors: A. J. Hoenes, M.D., 1901—1907; E. Meyer, M.D., 1907—1922; J. Esser, 1922—1924; Else Dronsek, 1949—1968; Christa Schade, 1968—1979; Heinz Janus, 1979—1992; Anita Kabus, 1993— .

Friedensau Theological Graduate School

FRIEDENSAU THEOLOGICAL GRADUATE SCHOOL (Theologische Hochschule Friedensau). An educational institution offering study programs in theology and social work. It is situated seven miles (12 kilometers) east of Burg, near Magdeburg, Germany. Its buildings stand in a forest on a tract of field, pasture, and woodland. The school is operated by the Euro-African Division. In 1992 there were 48 students with a faculty of 10 and administration of five.

Action to establish a missionary school for the training of ministers and missionaries was taken by the then German Conference in July 1899. In September an estate of 93 acres (38 hectares), with an old water mill and farm buildings, was obtained, and on Nov. 19, 1899, school opened with one teacher and seven students, being the first Seventh-day Adventist ministerial training institution in Europe. The number increased to 29 students by the end of the year. For the maintenance of the school, and to provide earnings for the students, a bakery and a food factory were established in 1899, and in 1900 a joiner's workshop, a smithy, and a locksmith's workshop. Three temporary dormitories for the constantly growing number of German and foreign students were constructed. In 1902 the first larger building was erected, with three floors and housing 50 students. In 1904 the chapel and the north wing were added, doubling the student capacity and adding four classrooms. The continued growth of the student body necessitated the erection of what became known as the new school, which was built in 1909 and 1911, and provided four more classrooms, an assembly room, and apartments for teachers and students. In 1912—1913 about 250 students from the middle, northern, eastern, and southern parts of Europe attended. From 1900 to 1914 annual camp meetings were held on the college campus, with about 3,000 visitors attending toward the end of that period. When World War I broke out, the enrollment decreased considerably, and in September 1917, the college had to be closed down completely. From 1915 to 1917 some of the building space was used as a hospital for wounded soldiers. After a summer session in 1919 the school reopened in October with 60 students, and in spite of economic difficulties the number attending reached 200 in the school years of 1921—1922 and 1924—1925.

In the meantime a number of colleges were founded in other countries, and the other German unions had established their own schools. Hence Friedensau became the mission school of the East German Union only. The student body continued to be small, even though a series of new courses in teaching, home economics, commerce, and a preparatory course for nursing was introduced. The enrollment from 1928 to 1934 dropped from 150 to 100; from 1934 to 1938 it stood between 50 and 70; and from 1938 to 1943 it again rose to 100. Between the two world wars only a few camp meetings were conducted at Friedensau, which were with one exception MV Bible schools. In 1939 Friedensau became once more the ministerial training school of all three German unions and functioned as such until August 1943, when it had to be closed down again because of World War II. The buildings were again used as a military hospital (August 1943 to March 1947).

In July 1947 the school was opened for the third time, with four teachers and 18 young men attending. During this first school year after World War II the number of students increased to 67, and in 1950 to 100. Between 1956 and 1989 it has ranged from 60 to 90. The faculty has increased correspondingly.

In 1957 and in 1972 camp meetings were held at Friedensau for the youth, with more than 800 attending. The seventy-fifth anniversary was celebrated on July 6, 1974, when a new organ and the reconstructed chapel were dedicated.

With the drastic changes in Europe in 1989 and the eventual reunification of Germany, Friedensau obtained again its former historic position. In the 1980s foreign students came from various Socialist countries, and after the reunification Friedensau regained its greater international responsibilities. A new dining hall (Mensa) was completed in March 1992; the first renovated dormitory (Villa) was dedicated in November of that year.

The Division of Theology holds the Old and New Testament, Church History, Systematic and Pastoral Theology departments. In 1992 the Department of Church Development was added. The Division of Social Work is divided into five departments: Theology/Ethics, History/Political Sciences, Education/Behavioral Sciences, Administration/Law, and Social Work. Emphasis is given to social work in the developing countries.

Frisbie, Joseph Birchard

FRISBIE, JOSEPH BIRCHARD (1816—1882). Minister. He was licensed to preach for the Methodists in 1843 and was ordained in 1846. For years he was a bitter opponent of Adventist teachings, but in 1853, after he had been assigned by his bishop to debate the Sabbath question with Joseph Bates, he reversed his position and began to observe the Sabbath and to preach Adventist doctrines.

He built the first Seventh-day Adventist church in Battle Creek on his property, located at the corner of Cass and Van Buren streets, and served as pastor of that church during its early years.

Although for a period he became discouraged and left the ministry, he later returned to the work. He stopped preaching some time before his death because of ill health. He was a deep Bible student with an independent turn of mind. In several early articles he contributed to the development of the Seventh-day Adventist philosophy of church organization, systematic benevolence, and to the doctrine of the millennium.

Froom, Le Roy Edwin

FROOM, LE ROY EDWIN (1890—1974). Author, editor, teacher, departmental secretary. Froom was born in Illinois and received his training at Washington Training Center (now Columbia Union College), Pacific Union College, and Walla Walla College. He began his ministry in Cambridge, Maryland, in 1913. In 1915 he joined the Pacific Press Publishing Association as a trainee editor, and three years later went to China as editor of the Chinese Signs of the Times. When he returned to the United States he became editor of Watchman magazine. He was called to the General Conference headquarters, where he was first associate secretary and then secretary of the Ministerial Association from 1926 to 1950. During this time he founded The Ministry magazine and was its editor for 22 years. A specialist in historical research, Froom served also as professor of historical theology at Andrews University Seminary, where he taught during the summer quarter.

He was one of the most distinguished writers that the denomination has produced. Among the many books he left as a legacy to the church are the four-volume The Prophetic Faith of Our Fathers, the two-volume The Conditionalist Faith of Our Fathers, Movement of Destiny, The Coming of the Comforter, and The Holy Spirit-Executive of the Godhead, a manuscript nearly complete at the time of his death. He also contributed to various encyclopedias.

Fukuzawa, Aiko

FUKUZAWA, AIKO (1880—1979). Sabbath school director, teacher. Born in Kobe, Japan, she was adopted into the Fukuzawa family because of her mother's death. She mastered English and French at the prestigious Tsuda College in Tokyo. She came to know Seventh-day Adventists when she became ill and was treated at Kobe Sanitarium and Hospital.

She was baptized in 1906 and began teaching English. Several months later she met Magoji Suzuki, a minister. They were married in 1907. She set as her principle this statement: "I was privileged to be reared in a good environment. I have money that I can decide how to use. I always pray to God to show me the best way to use it." She generously helped many young believers and donated funds to Japan Missionary College.

After moving to Chiba she taught English at the college for a while, then became Sabbath school director. She translated English lessons into Japanese. Being fluent in English, she was able to explain the principles of Ellen White's writings to others in her country.

Her daughter Masu never attended state schools. Under her tutelage Masu became an accomplished musician and a highly educated worker in the church.

Fuller Memorial Hospital

FULLER MEMORIAL HOSPITAL. A 82-bed psychiatric/substance abuse hospital located in South Attleboro, Massachusetts, eight miles (13 kilometers) north of Providence, Rhode Island. The institution is on a beautifully landscaped estate on U.S. 1 with easy access to Interstate 95 and other highways.

In the mid-1930s Alice Fuller Davenport, sole heir of Charles H. and Nellie A. Fuller, made available the 60-acre (25-hectare) Fuller estate for use as a hospital or sanitarium. Under the leadership of Julian C. Gant, M.D., from Boston, the Seventh-day Adventist Layman's Benevolent Association of New England, Inc., was formed and incorporated in 1937 to operate such an institution. The estate, with its mansion and several other buildings, was bequeathed to the association the same year and was named Fuller Memorial Sanitarium, a memorial to Charles and Nellie Fuller.

The early days of the sanitarium saw a real struggle to maintain its operation. The names of E. Opdyke, Margaret Spaulding, and Walter Spady are prominent in the early development of the institution. In 1938 Laurence A. Senseman, M.D., joined the staff of the fledgling hospital and became its leading spirit through the years.

From the care of a few patients, each in a spacious room of the mansion, the operation at Fuller grew until the larger rooms had to be converted into semiprivate rooms and wards. Another building to the rear of the mansion was remodeled to furnish living quarters for some of the staff, and then later converted into a Geriatric Department.

Because of an increasing number of patients and World War II draining off the available supply of nurses, an attendant nurse's course was started in 1940. This course, with affiliation in surgery and pediatrics at a nearby hospital, trained a number of practical nurses for sanitarium service. The course was discontinued after the close of the war relieved the nurse shortage.

In 1945 the basement of the main building was remodeled and the kitchen, staff cafeteria, and treatment rooms were moved to the new quarters, thus releasing more rooms upstairs for patient accommodations. Further expansion of the building supplied space for administrative offices and additional patient rooms. A modern kitchen was soon added to supply facilities for the serving of healthful and often specialized diets for the patients. The 1950s saw construction of the much-needed recreation hall with funds raised by the sanitarium personnel.

In 1956 a fund-raising drive was begun to raise the monies needed to construct a sizable addition to the main building. In 1957 Mrs. Davenport died, and the trustees of the estate, having noted the successful operation of the sanitarium, made a gift of a substantial endowment to the institution and also a sizable donation to the building fund, making possible immediate construction of the new west wing. Dedication of the addition took place in 1959. This expansion increased patient capacity to 55 beds and provided space for doctors' offices, a medical library and staff room, medical records office, administrative offices, laboratory, X-ray room, treatment rooms, and a new occupational therapy section.

Operation of the sanitarium was turned over to the Atlantic Union Conference of Seventh-day Adventists in 1964, and the board of directors was enlarged to include several of the administrators of the Atlantic Union and Southern New England conferences, with the Atlantic Union president as board chair. Shortly thereafter, in 1965, Harold Knox was named administrator. The following year Gerald E. Shampo was called to be administrator, and Dr. Senseman was named medical director. Recruitment of specialty staff and the expansion of the program and the physical plant to include new therapeutic techniques was the priority concern. Most important was the goal of further developing a program consistent with the needs of the surrounding communities.

In late 1970 a new wing was opened, increasing patient capacity to 75 and furnishing new and improved quarters for patient services including medical and patient libraries, an auditorium seating 100, and much-needed office space. A further needed expansion was initiated in 1972, and the child psychiatry unit was opened in 1975 in the greatly enlarged Fuller Lodge, which formerly housed the Geriatric Department. The new facility furnishes psychiatric services for children age 10 through 18.

The hospital also conducts a strong outpatient service and has a good working relationship with community mental health and medical facilities. A strong in-service training program is carried on at Fuller. Nursing students from other area hospital schools of nursing are sent to Fuller for their psychiatric nursing affiliation.

In 1973 the name was officially changed to Fuller Memorial Hospital. The hospital is fully licensed as a specialty hospital by Massachusetts, and in 1969 received full accreditation from the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals with special commendation for the quality of care provided. Subsequent renewals of accreditation included commendation for cleanliness and neatness. The hospital is a member of the Massachusetts Association for Private Psychiatric Hospitals, the American Hospital Association, the American Psychiatric Association, and the American Medical Association.

Fulton College

FULTON COLLEGE. A coeducational boarding school situated at Korovou, Tailevu, Fiji. The following training courses are offered: agricultural, commercial, primary and secondary teaching, social work, and ministerial.

The need for a training school in the Fiji Islands was recognized as early as the turn of the century by J. E. Fulton, a pioneer Seventh-day Adventist missionary. To meet this need he secured an estate of several hundred acres (80-120 hectares) known as Buresala, on the island of Ovalau in the central island group, and on it began a training school in 1904—1905. The school was under the directorship of S. W. Carr, a graduate of Avondale College. The first year a few married students and several young men attended the school. In 1909 there were 10 or 12 young women who enrolled also.

From this school soon came a small corps of national workers, several of whom were sent as pioneer missionaries to New Guinea to assist in opening SDA work in that field. In the early twenties the young women's section was transferred to Navuso, on Viti Levu Island, where a primary boarding school was established. This school, under European leadership, trained national women as teachers. About the same time, a boarding school was established at Samabula, near Suva, also under European leadership, to train Indians as teachers and workers. In 1932 Vatuvonu Central School for training Fijian teachers was established in East Fiji.

With rising standards of education in the years immediately prior to World War II, and government pressure for better qualified teachers, Seventh-day Adventists, after careful survey in 1939, decided to consolidate their educational work in the islands and bring all Seventh-day Adventist training schools in the Fiji group into one unit at a centrally situated campus. G. Branster, mission superintendent, with the mission committee, instructed a subcommittee consisting of A. E. Watts, Walter Ferris, and A. P. Dyason to search for a suitable site.

An estate of 400 acres (160 hectares) 30 miles (50 kilometers) from Suva, the capital of the islands, was secured, and early in 1940 building operations began on the new site under the supervision of A. P. Dyason. Teachers' dwellings and school buildings from Samabula, Wainibuka (Navuso), and Buresala were dismantled, transported to the new site, and reconstructed. A large dairy industry has been established at Fulton College in recent years. The profits from this industry are intended to improve and provide new buildings and plant for the college.

Early in 1941 Fulton College opened and began training men and women of all races. In succeeding years numbers of students from Tonga, Samoa, and other fields who were eager to take advantage of the higher levels of Christian education have also attended.

When the Central Pacific Union Mission was established in 1949 with headquarters at Suva, Fulton College was made a union college to train workers for the entire Central Pacific Union Mission territory.

In 1959 a rebuilding program was begun with the erection of a dining hall, and in 1964 a new block consisting of a chapel, a library, 10 classrooms, and administrative offices was opened. A new primary school block was opened in 1971. Fulton College benefited from the third quarter Thirteenth Sabbath Offering overflow in 1973. The amount received was $229,000. With this money a new dormitory for young men was built and opened in 1975.

In 1990 Fulton upgraded its Ministerial Certificate to a three-year Diploma of Theology, and in 1991 the Certificate in Primary Teacher Education was also upgraded to a three-year diploma.

Fulton, John Edwin

FULTON, JOHN EDWIN (1869—1945). Missionary, administrator. Born in Nova Scotia, he moved at the age of 6 to the United States. He attended Healdsburg College, and in 1891 married Susie Virginia Newlon. After serving as a minister in Oregon, Washington, and California, he engaged in evangelism in New Zealand for a year (1895—1896). With the exception of the year 1903, when he was Bible teacher at Australasian Missionary College, from 1896 to 1906 he served as an evangelist in Fiji. He was president of the New South Wales Conference (1906—1909), the Australasian Union Conference (1909—1916), the Asiatic Division, which at that time included China, Japan, India, and the East Indies (1917—1918), the Southern Asia Division (1918—1921), the Pacific Union Conference (1921—1922), the North American Division (1922), and the Australasian Division (1922—1926). Returning to the United States, he served as president of the Pacific Union Conference (1926—1932), and then for a short time was president of the Northern California Conference (December 1933—1936) and of the Southern California Conference (1936).

Fundamentalism

FUNDAMENTALISM. The ultraconservative wing of Protestantism, especially as represented by denominations that rejected, or rose in opposition to, the movement known as Modernism. The name is derived from a series of books entitled The Fundamentals, which were published in the United States, beginning in 1909, with the aid of two wealthy laymen by the Testimony Publishing Company, and reprinted in 1917 by the Bible Institute of Los Angeles. Fundamentalism itself, however, actually antedates this series of books. It is characterized by belief in the verbal inspiration of the Bible, miracles, a supernatural creation, the virgin birth, a substitutionary atonement, the bodily resurrection, and the literal second advent of Christ. To Fundamentalists, the Bible is literally true, and historically and theologically inerrant in its original autographs. Men and women are sinners who can be “saved” by a transforming new birth, after which they must live lives of sobriety and righteousness characterized by modest dress, wholesome entertainment, abstinence from alcoholic beverages and (often) tobacco, and by regular prayer, Bible study, and militant missionary work. Mass evangelism, radio preaching, and missions among non-Christian peoples are strongly emphasized by groups advocating this school of thought.

Fundamentalists founded numerous Bible institutes, some of which became Bible colleges and theological seminaries. A method of biblical interpretation known as dispensationalism (see Premillennialism) has had considerable popularity. The Holiness churches are all to be found here. The National Association of Evangelicals and the International Council of Christian Churches both include in their ranks Fundamentalist groups of different hues. Fundamentalists also have had considerable influence in British university circles.

Since about 1940 a group of Fundamentalist scholars has arisen calling for a more enlightened attitude toward modern culture, particularly in the areas of science and sound biblical scholarship. Those sympathetic to this trend called themselves Evangelicals. This group has produced significant biblical and theological works and well-respected scholars. The Evangelical Theological Society represents the views of these scholars. Their theology is accessible to a general religious audience through the journal Christianity Today, published in Washington, D.C., U.S.A.

The Fundamentalists have distinguished themselves from Evangelicals by being, according to them, more loyal to the biblical doctrines. Fundamentalism grew significantly in power and influence in America during the 1970s and most of the 1980s. Its adherents became activists against the social, moral, and economic evils of America and against secular humanism. Since then its influence has been felt even in political circles. Many religious programs by radio and television and multiple ministries came into existence transcending denominational barriers. During this period religious publishing houses operated by laypersons flourished. The general public could no longer perceive any significant difference between Fundamentalism and Evangelicalism. In fact, Evangelicalism became a very strong transdenominational religious phenomenon.

By the end of the 1980s and the beginning of the 1990s, Evangelicalism continued to be quite influential. By then Evangelicals were quite concerned with the nature and authority of the Scriptures, and a strong debate was going on among themselves on these subjects. A group of them, called neo-Evangelicals, had accepted a limited definition of the doctrine of the inerrancy of the Bible. They considered the Scriptures to be inerrant and infallible on matters of faith and life but not on matters of science and history. This group rejected the historicity of the biblical Creation account (Gen. 1—3). Elements of the liberalism opposed by Fundamentalists after World War I seemed to have crept into some Evangelical circles.

Theologically, Seventh-day Adventists have a number of beliefs in common with Fundamentalists, but for various reasons have never been identified with the movement. More and more Evangelicals have come to recognize Seventh-day Adventists as orthodox, but the recognition is not universal. This is mainly because of the SDA teachings concerning the law and the Sabbath, the state of the dead and the fate of the wicked, the 2300 days of Dan. 8:14 and the investigative judgment, and the Spirit of Prophecy. On their part, Adventists reject as unbiblical a number of teachings held by many (though not all) Fundamentalists, such as antinomianism and dispensationalism, the natural immortality of the soul, the secret rapture, the restoration of the Jews as God's chosen people, and a temporal millennium on earth before the second coming of Christ. These theological differences have made cooperation between Seventh-day Adventists and Fundamentalists, in areas of mutual concern such as literal creation versus evolution, very difficult if not impossible.

GABON. An independent republic situated on the Atlantic coast of central Africa, bounded on the north by Equatorial Guinea and Cameroon, on the east and south by the Congo, and on the west by the Atlantic Ocean. Gabon has an area of 103,346 square miles (268,000 square kilometers) and a population (1994) of 1.1 million, mainly Bantus. About 60 percent are Christian, the rest animists. Languages are French (official) and Bantu dialects.

Libreville and Port Gentil were entered that year under the direction of Daniel Cordas. The work developed slowly. In the 1990s the creative evangelism fostered by Max Pierre brought a sudden spurt in membership growth.

Gaede, David Peter

GAEDE, DAVID PETER (1867—1962). Minister, missionary. He was born to a Mennonite family in the Wohldemfürst (later Alexanderfeld) colony on the Kuban River in Caucasus, Russia. In 1879 he moved with his parents to Peabody, Kansas. At 15 he was baptized into the Mennonite Brethren Church, and in 1885, as the first of the large Gaede family, he joined the Seventh-day Adventist Church. He attended SDA schools in Lehigh and in Hillsboro, and there, on Apr. 14, 1889, he married Elizabeth Duerksen. When in 1890 Union College was established, he attended college in winter and canvassed in summer with religious books. Later three of his brothers joined him in college. After the second year, he and his brother Peter received permission to work in Kansas without salary to prove their calling as ministers. They worked on a farm to support themselves, and the following winter held meetings in Durham with good success. A year later they were regularly employed, with David working in Iowa and Peter in Kansas.

In 1898 D. P. Gaede was persuaded to accompany his parents, who had joined the SDA Church, to visit relatives and friends in Russia, the father paying his salary and expenses. They spent some time in the old colonies on the river Molotchnaya north of the Crimea and then went to the Caucasus. Everywhere Gaede found opportunities to hold meetings and to baptize new members.

After returning to Iowa, he offered to join the meager working force in the vast domain of the czars. Arriving in Russia with his family in the spring of 1900, he headed the North Russian Mission until 1907, then the West Russian Mission until 1909. Later he served as president of the South German Conference in the West German Union (1909—1911), and back in Russia as president of the Black Sea Mission until 1914, at the beginning of World War I, when he returned to the United States.

Upon his return Gaede served as a minister in South Dakota, in Nebraska, and in Wisconsin. His wife having died in 1918, he married in 1921 a widow, Bertha (Quade) Huecker, of Milwaukee, Wisconsin.

Galusha, Elon

GALUSHA, ELON (1790—1856). Minister of the Lockport, New York, Baptist Church, who became a Millerite preacher. He was a son of the Vermont governor who had commissioned William Miller in the state militia during the War of 1812. He was known as a sound reasoner, an eloquent speaker, and a careful writer. In 1845 he presided at the Albany Conference, at which the main group of Millerites rallied to form a continuing Adventist body.

Gambia, The

GAMBIA, THE. One of smaller independent nations on the African continent, surrounded by Senegal except for its Atlantic coast. The Gambia River separates the country into two sections. Its narrow strip of land is only 15 to 30 miles (25 to 50 kilometers) wide and stretches eastward from the Atlantic Ocean for 300 miles (475 kilometers). The Gambia was the oldest and most northerly of the former British West African dependencies, and the last crown colony and protectorate on the west coast to gain independence, on February 18, 1965.

Portuguese navigators first reached the Gambia River in 1456. For 200 years the Portuguese enjoyed a quiet monopoly of trade with the neighboring countries, but were challenged by other European powers in the seventeenth century. Portugal sold trading rights to the British in 1618. The British acquired the capital, Banjul (formerly Bathurst), in 1618, and administered both The Gambia and Sierra Leone from there until 1888, when they were separated.

The Gambia is widely recognized for its abundance of birds—some 500 species have been listed. Approximately 960,000 people (1994) live in The Gambia. Although the official language is English, all ethnic groups have their own language. The major religion is Islam (90 percent). Most of the rest are Christian. The people of Gambia may be divided into five ethnic groups: Mandinka, Wolof, Fula, Jola, and Serahuli. The climate is subtropical.

The Gambian economy is heavily dependent on peanuts and peanut by-products, which provide nearly 90 percent of export earnings. Trade consists mainly of export of manufactured goods and commodities (e.g., rice, sugar, textiles) to neighboring countries. In recent years the production of food crops such as millet, maize, cassava, and rice have steadily increased. Cotton is also a principle export product. Attempts are being made to diversify the agricultural base through promoting horticulture, livestock, and fisheries development. Tourism has become the fastest-growing sector of the Gambian economy.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist work. The Gambia constitutes the Gambia Mission Station. It was officially registered with the Gambian government in 1987. The Gambia Mission Station is part of the West African Union which in turn is part of the Africa-Indian Ocean Division. Statistics (1992) for The Gambia: churches, 2; members, 248; elementary schools, 2.

Seventh-day Adventists entered Gambia officially in 1973 by sending Daniel Cudjoe from Ghana as a literature evangelist. Pastor Cartwright, an evangelist from the United States, despite much opposition, conducted an evangelistic campaign in Banjul in 1975. At the end of December 1979 there were 22 members.

In 1981 Louis C. Nielsen arrived as mission station director and was able to obtain a plot of land from the New Jeshwang/Ebou Town villages (1982) for the purpose of building a school in the urban area of Serekunda, thereby meeting an urgent need in the area of education.

In 1983 the Seventh-day Adventist Church opened the first SDA school in The Gambia, using temporary facilities in Kanifing. However, with development funds from Sweden, Canada, and the Netherlands, a complete new physical plant was built in New Jeshwang. One of the major achievements of this institution has been that prejudice has been broken down. As a result, the church has become widely recognized and respected for offering a quality education to more than 500 primary children. The Seventh-day Adventist Education Center is well-equipped and maintained, and has modern facilities. The Danish Children's Fund contributes significantly to the operation of the elementary school. In 1992 the Gambian government officially requested the church to consider the establishment of a middle and high school on the campus of the Seventh-day Adventist Education Center.

Through community-based development projects, ADRA has been able to penetrate the unentered regions.

GANDER, STANLEY HERBERT (1899—1969). Missionary to New Guinea. Born in Dorset, England, he migrated with his parents to Australia at the age of 13, and was baptized in 1916. He was a fitter and turner by trade, and also trained at the Sydney Sanitarium as a nurse. In 1922 he married Greta Tivey, and the next three years were spent as chef at the SDA Sanitarium Health Food cafés in Melbourne and Brisbane. This was followed by seven years in colporteur work. In 1932 he was called to mission service, first as principal of the Boliu School on Mussau, and then for two years at Kainantu in the Eastern Highlands of New Guinea. In 1936 he pioneered the work at Bena Bena, where he remained until the Japanese invasion in 1942. In that year he was ordained to the gospel ministry. He spent the war years back in Australia in the Lay Activities Department and then in evangelism in the North New South Wales Conference. On his return to New Guinea in 1947, he pioneered the work in the Western Islands, Madang, and the Sepik River area. In 1955 he became lay activities secretary for the Coral Sea Union Mission, with headquarters in Lae. His involvement in a plane crash in 1956 necessitated hospitalization for a year, after which he retired from active service.

GARCIA, DARIO (1912—1967). Teacher, educational administrator, departmental secretary. A native of Rio Grande do Sul, Brazil, he studied in state institutions in south Brazil. After accepting the Seventh-day Adventist message in 1933, he enrolled at Brazil College. While there he married Anna Ida Braun. From 1937 to 1941 he studied at Pacific Union College in California, where he received his degree in elementary education.

Returning to Brazil, he taught for two years and was then called as principal of Taquara Academy, where he served until 1945. He returned to Brazil College as chair of the Educational Department and was later elected president of the institution.

At the General Conference session of 1950 he was elected educational and Missionary Volunteer secretary of the South American Division, and shortly thereafter was ordained as a minister of the church.

In 1955 he and his family returned to Brazil, where he served at Paraná Academy in Curitiba and again as president of Brazil College until 1961, when he began work on a graduate degree at Andrews University. In 1962 he received his master's degree and began work on a doctoral program.

At the time of his death he was under appointment as educational secretary of the South Brazil Union.

Garcia, Jeronimo Granero

GARCIA, JERONIMO GRANERO (1903—1974). Evangelist, teacher, administrator, departmental secretary. He was born in Spain, and came to Brazil as a boy. He studied at Instituto Adventista de Ensino from 1920 to 1925, when he graduated. In 1926 he married Anna Klein de Araújo. From 1926 to 1936, he worked as a Bible worker, evangelist, and departmental secretary in São Paulo and Rio Grande do Sul. From 1936 to 1940 he was president and evangelist of the Northeast Brazil Mission. From 1940 to 1944 he served as a teacher and vice president in the Colégio Adventista (Brazil College).

He was the president of the Rio Grande do Sul Conference and evangelist in the São Paulo Conference from 1944 until 1949, when he returned to Brazil College as a teacher, and as president from 1951 to 1952. From 1954 to 1958 he was a departmental secretary in the South American Division and the South Brazil Union. In 1958 he returned to Brazil College as a teacher, where he served until the time of his retirement, in 1966.

Garden State Academy

GARDEN STATE ACADEMY. A coeducational boarding school on the senior high school level, serving the New Jersey Conference, situated in rural Sussex County of north-west New Jersey near Tranquility, 60 miles (100 kilometers) north of Trenton. About one third of the 365-acre (150-hectare) property is forested hillside; the remainder is rolling farmland and open meadows with shade trees. There are also two lakes.

History

History. Founding and Early Days. The academy for New Jersey grew gradually from a church school into an academy. The school was first opened in the Babcock office building in Plainfield in the school year 1926—1927. The next year one ninth-grade pupil was enrolled. Each succeeding year another secondary grade was added, until in 1930—1931 the first class of seven seniors was graduated.

After several moves, the school settled down at 31 Rockview Avenue in North Plainfield. At first called the Plainfield Academy, it was renamed the North Plainfield Academy in 1934. Through all these years the school was sponsored by the Plainfield church.

Mrs. Mable Baker Dickson served as the first principal in 1927, when the first secondary grade was offered. In 1933 she resigned as principal but remained as teacher of English and language for 17 years. She and her husband were parents, teachers, and deans to the young people. Their home was opened as dormitory, gymnasium, and infirmary. Ruth Wilcox, the conference superintendent of education when the school began, is regarded as the founder; she spent many years with the school both during and after her term of superintendency.

The school was unique in its early days in that it was operated largely for the benefit of students who could not afford to go to a boarding academy. Students were placed in wealthy homes in Plainfield and were able to earn all expenses working in these homes and in nearby businesses. Beginning in 1933, Miss Wilcox spent her full time for many years placing students in homes and supervising them. Her constant recruitment helped build up enrollment. Benjamin Blinn, business manager from 1933 to 1936, is credited with putting the school, which had no money and owed many bills, on a paying basis. Aided by income from the placement students, the school was soon growing and healthy.

The Move to Eighth Street. On June 1, 1941, the academy moved to the former Nash home on 622 West Eighth Street, Plainfield, a 25-room brick building on a large corner lot in one of Plainfield's best residential sections. It now became a conference school, and its name reverted to Plainfield Academy.

Reorganization and Relocation. For 22 years the new plant served well for classrooms, offices, chapel, dormitory, and teachers' housing, but by 1958 the school, crowded about by the city, needed to expand its facilities. The home-placement program, no longer satisfactory, was being abandoned in a gradual three-year changeover, with no new placement students being admitted. In the spring of 1958 Plainfield Academy was reorganized as a boarding school and was renamed Garden State Academy. All boarding students were gradually moved into new housing units. Plans were made to relocate in a rural area as soon as possible.

On May 5, 1963, a special constituency session voted to purchase the present property near Tranquility, and remodeling of the existing buildings began immediately. Garden State Academy opened its doors at the new rural site in September 1963. In that year there was a faculty of 12 and an enrollment of 82.

The girls' dormitory was added to the campus in 1968. It contains 48 double rooms, guest rooms, lounge, and a chapel with seating capacity for more than 200.

The all-purpose building, begun in the fall of 1972, was completed free of debt by the end of 1974. This building houses seven classrooms, a laboratory, the new library, the administration suite, shower and locker rooms, and an all-purpose room, which is used as the camp meeting auditorium. After a fire destroyed the cafeteria and the boys' dorm, two new structures were built to replace them in 1982. One wing of the cafeteria building serves as the Music Department. The 1992 enrollment was 86 students, with 15 on faculty and staff.

Garner, Owen T.

GARNER, OWEN T. (1901—1973). Administrator. A native of Illinois, he attended Emmanuel Missionary College and was ordained to the ministry in 1927. Many of his 43 years in the work were spent in administrative work. He served as president of the Kansas, Nebraska, New York, Montana, and South Dakota conferences.

Gates, Edward Harmon

GATES, EDWARD HARMON (1855—1940). Missionary, administrator. Having accepted the Seventh-day Adventist faith in 1874, he attended Battle Creek College and was ordained to the ministry in 1879. After engaging in evangelism and serving as president of the Colorado Conference (1888—1890), he went in October 1890 to the South Sea Islands on the mission ship Pitcairn. While the rest of the group went on to other islands, he and his wife remained on Pitcairn Island. Here he baptized 82 persons and organized a church, then spent 19 months visiting a number of South Sea islands, and on his return to Pitcairn established a school. At this time a typhus epidemic on the island caused great hardships and many deaths. He returned to the United States in 1894, but soon went to the East for 30 years of service. He opened work in Singapore, the East Indies, and the Philippines; was president of two conferences in Australia; and for a time was vice president of the Australasian Union Conference. He retired in California. He described his experiences in a book, In Coral Isles (1923).

Gausсен, Louis

GAUSSEN, LOUIS (1790—1863). Protestant minister and teacher of theology in Geneva; his full name was Francois Samuel Robert Louis Gausсен. He was one of the leaders of the evangelical movement in opposition to the prevalent rationalism of the day, and helped to form the Geneva Evangelical Society and its School of Theology. Gausсен became one of the leading representatives of conservative Protestantism on the Continent. He made a special study of prophecy, and in 1837 taught a course of lessons on Daniel to a group of children, which many adults attended. He held the standard Protestant historical view of prophecy as fulfilling through the ages, and expected the Second Advent soon, although he did not teach any date. His lessons, published as Daniel le Prophète (1839), were translated into English and published by the Presbyterian Board of Publication in Philadelphia. Millerite writers cited Gausсен and reprinted one of his works. Seventh-day Adventists have considered him as one of the forerunners on the Continent in drawing attention to the Second Advent (see GC 364—366).

Gem State Adventist Academy

GEM STATE ADVENTIST ACADEMY. A coeducational boarding school on the senior high school level, 3.5 miles (six kilometers) south of Caldwell, Idaho, operated by the Idaho Conference. The school fulfilled the need for a boarding academy for the young people of the Idaho Conference after the Ames Academy, near Eagle, Idaho, was destroyed by fire. For a time the church at Caldwell tried to carry on a day school, known as Mountain View Academy, but at the Baker, Oregon, camp meeting, June 1918 a committee was chosen to select a site for a new school. After careful consideration, Caldwell, being geographically near the center of the conference territory, was chosen.

The school was situated on the corner of Indiana Avenue and Linden Street, a semirural section with an apple orchard nearby, approximately two miles (three kilometers) southeast of the Union Pacific depot. Construction was begun in the summer of 1918 under trying conditions caused by World War I.

At the laying of the cornerstone a Bible was cemented into the left pillar of the chapel steps. Work on the building, under the supervision of H. A. Green, was sufficiently completed to begin school in January of 1919 with 30 students and with A. G. Meiklejohn as principal.

In the 1920s a large barn was built back of the academy to house a small dairy and a woodwork shop. Later the upper floor was converted into a gymnasium. In 1944, the dairy, which had greatly expanded, was moved to a recently purchased farm nearby, on Linden Street, east of the academy buildings. In 1933 a small cannery was begun in the basement of the church school. It too expanded and for about 12 years provided work for a number of students. A bakery began operations in a building erected in 1934—1935. This industry prospered also, and it was necessary to construct a new building. In 1944 the old building was remodeled and made into an annex to the girls' dormitory.

Extensive improvements were made during the years 1940—1943, when T. W. Walters was the administrator. New constructions at that time included a wing for the girls' dormitory, a boys' dormitory, and a large gymnasium. George S. Belleau, conference president, secured financial help from the neighboring conferences in the North Pacific Union.

On May 2, 1960, with realization that the original buildings were sorely in need of replacement, and that it would be desirable to have the school in more rural surroundings, it was voted at a special conference session to build a new school plant south of Caldwell, on an elevation overlooking Boise Valley, with the snowcapped Boise Mountains in the background. Work was begun on the buildings in the summer of 1960, with M. E. Smith as supervisor. The buildings were occupied in the 1962—1963 school year.

Plants for the Champion Bake-N-Serve Industries were constructed on the new campus in 1963 and 1965, an industrial arts building in 1967, 13 homes for staff members between 1963 and 1967, administration building expansion and Marcia Ann Meyers Memorial Chapel in 1973. In 1978 a new section was added to the gym, almost doubling its size. In 1982 the administration building auditorium was transformed into a church. Administration building expansion continued in 1989 with the construction of a Christian radio station and additional Music Department facilities.

General Conference

GENERAL CONFERENCE. The central governing organization of the Seventh-day Adventist Church, composed of such union conferences, union missions, and unions of churches (either in organized division sections or without divisional affiliation) as have been or shall be properly organized and accepted by vote of the General Conference in session; together with such local conferences and properly organized local missions as are not included in any division, union conference, or union mission, or such local organizations directly attached to divisions as have been or shall be properly organized and accepted by vote of the General Conference in session.

The General Conference was organized on May 21, 1863, in Battle Creek, Michigan, where the headquarters remained until 1903. The present headquarters address is 12501 Old Columbia Pike, Silver Spring, Maryland 20904—6600, U.S.A.; the telex number is 440186 SDAY UI or 440632 SDAY UI; the fax number is (301) 680—6090.

General Conference sessions normally are held every five years, but sessions may be postponed up to two years by action of the Executive Committee during unusual world conditions. The voters of the General Conference are delegates at large (all members of the General Conference Executive Committee and certain others chosen by the Executive Committee) and regular delegates (representatives of the union and local conferences and missions). See General Conference Session.

The General Conference conducts its worldwide work through sections called divisions, each operating within a specified territory assigned by General Conference action. The division sections are: the Africa-Indian Ocean, China, Eastern Africa, Euro-Africa, Euro-Asia, Far Eastern, Inter-American, North American, South American, South Pacific, Southern Asia, Trans-European, and Middle East Union and Southern Africa Union. The divisions being, in fact, sections, or divisions, of the General Conference, are operated under the provisions of the General Conference Constitution, Bylaws, and Working Policy. Thus the Seventh-day Adventist Church is organized, not as a series of separate national or regional churches but as one worldwide, unified, international church, using one Church Manual and operating by one general policy. This concept is carried out in general in providing leadership for each division, whose chief executive officer, the division president, is also a vice president of the General Conference. (In China, leadership is provided within the country.)

The officers of the General Conference are (in 1993): the president, six general vice presidents and one vice president from each division, the secretary, an undersecretary, five associate secretaries, the treasurer, an undertreasurer, and five associate treasurers. There are also four general field secretaries, an auditor, and seven associate auditors. The number of associates in the above lists is variable, according to conditions and needs. There are seven regularly organized departments, offices, and associations in the General Conference, which foster the various phases of the work of the church through the union and local conference departments. These are: Church Ministries, Communication, Education, Health and Temperance, Ministerial, Public Affairs and Religious Liberty, and Publishing. Each of these has a director with one or more associates, and some in addition have assistants (see separate articles on these). Recent additions to activities of the General Conference are Global Mission, Adventist World Radio, and the Biblical Research Institute.

A number of services are operated by the General Conference in behalf of the headquarters organization and of subsidiary organizations, including a transportation bureau, an insurance service for denominational institutions and interests, Risk Management Services, Adventist Chaplaincy Ministries, Adventist Development and Relief Agency (ADRA) (an agency operated by a board in Washington, D.C., that provides help for development and welfare service to points of special need arising from disaster or famine throughout the world), and Home Study International/Griggs University. Also in the General Conference headquarters are the office of the Ellen G. White Estate, Incorporated, and the office of the president of the Adventist-Laymen's Services and Industries (ASI).

The constitution authorizes the organization by the General Conference of such incorporations as the development of the work may require. Three such incorporations are in existence, though only one, the General Conference Corporation, organized in 1904, is active. The two inactive incorporations kept in existence for legal reasons are the North American Conference Corporation of SDAs and the General Conference Association of SDAs. The function of these bodies is to hold property and to attend to other fiscal responsibilities as may be required in conducting the work of the General Conference, since the General Conference itself is not a legally incorporated body.

In the Seventh-day Adventist Church, missionaries are selected, sent out, and supported by the General Conference itself, since the church has no separate mission board. A Foreign Mission Board, later called Mission Board, was organized in 1889 and operated as a church agency until the General Conference session of 1903 voted that its function, "the supervision of the missionary operations of the denomination," be assumed by the General Conference Executive Committee (General Conference Bulletin Apr. 14, 1903, p. 195), although it was continued for some time as a legal entity for business transactions. See Mission Board. Thus the church in its central organization, and not in an agency apart from its central life, accepts the responsibility and carries the concern of bearing its distinctive message to every nation and people of the world.

Important in the operation of the General Conference is the role of the Executive Committee, which is made up of a large proportion of ex-officio members, together with up to 40 elective members who are chosen at the General Conference sessions or by the Executive Committee between sessions. The committee's ex-officio members include all who are elected at the General Conference sessions, whether serving in the headquarters office or in the division offices; also the presidents of all union conferences and union missions throughout the world, ex-presidents of the General Conference holding credentials from that conference, and designated representatives of certain general institutions. The Executive Committee has full administrative power during the intervals between the sessions of the General Conference, with authority to grant credentials and licenses to its workers, to fill vacancies that may occur through death, resignation, or otherwise in its offices, boards, committees, and agencies; and also to withdraw credentials and licenses by a two-thirds vote of the members present at any regular meeting. Because the General Conference is one worldwide organization, the Executive Committee is international. It meets twice a year at Spring Meeting and at Annual Council and at any other time at the call of the chair. Everyday business is carried on by the GC Administrative Committee (ADCOM), which meets once a week. See General Conference Executive Committee.

The General Conference is accepted by the members and all subsidiary organizations as the highest authority in the church, this authority being at its fullest in the General Conference in session. “The General Conference is not something apart from the churches and conferences and union organizations, but is the sum of all these, the uniting of all the parts for unity and cooperation in doing the work which Christ instituted His church to accomplish” (General Conference Working Policy [1962], pp. 37, 38; see also Church Manual, ch. 4).

General Conference Bible Schools

GENERAL CONFERENCE BIBLE SCHOOLS. A series of training schools sponsored by the General Conference between 1889 and 1896, offering winter courses in Battle Creek, Michigan (later in other places), designed for “ministers, licentiates, Bible workers, and elderly persons,” but open to “any laborer, in any department of the cause, and those who desire to become laborers, who cannot take a regular course of study in any of our educational institutions” (General Conference Bible School announcement for 1893—1894).

The first session (called the Bible School for Ministers), held for 20 weeks in Battle Creek in 1889—1890, was an outgrowth of a 10-week institute held at Battle Creek College the preceding year. The announcement, outlining a two-year course, lists W. W. Prescott as principal, and the following serving on the faculty: Uriah Smith, A. T. Jones, E. J. Waggoner, E. W. Farnsworth, W. H. McKee, and W. A. Colcord. In 1893—1894 a 24-week term was offered in Battle Creek.

The 1895—1896 announcement outlines a three-year course; in that year, two 20-week schools were held, one in Battle Creek, with J. H. Durland as principal, and the other at Union College, Nebraska, with L. A. Hoopes as principal. Similar courses were given at Walla Walla and Healdsburg colleges and South Lancaster Academy.

The General Conference then discontinued these Bible schools because arrangements had been made for the regular schools to provide such training. Battle Creek College, for example, began in 1895—1896 to offer a two-year Bible course.

General Conference Bulletin

GENERAL CONFERENCE BULLETIN (1895—1922; vols. 1 to 4, 1895 to 1903, quarterly with extras during the General Conference sessions of 1895 and 1901; vols. 5 to 9, 1903, 1909, 1913, 1918, and 1922, daily during sessions; published by the General Conference of Seventh-day Adventists; file in RH). In its first period it was a medium of communication from the General Conference to the public and contained statistics, general information concerning the work of the church, reports of meetings, records of proceedings, Week of Prayer readings, and directories of workers, institutions, and organizations. From 1895 to 1903 the Bulletin filled the place of the Yearbook.

In the second period it contained only the published record of proceedings of the General Conference. The record of other sessions of the General Conference is contained in the General Conference Daily Bulletin and in the Review and Herald.

General Conference Constitution and Bylaws

GENERAL CONFERENCE CONSTITUTION AND BYLAWS. The basic documents of the organization called the General Conference of Seventh-day Adventists. The General Conference is an unincorporated body brought into existence to administer the general affairs of the church, and especially to pursue its evangelistic aim, “to teach all nations the everlasting gospel of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ and the commandments of God” (Constitution, Art. II).

The adoption of the first constitution in Battle Creek, Michigan, on May 21, 1863, climaxed a decade or more of lively discussion among the members regarding the advisability of church organization. Those who opposed organization, or “order,” argued that it would trespass upon the believers’ individual Christian liberty, and some even said that such a church organization would immediately become Babylon. Those who set forth the benefits of organization pointed out that it would prevent confusion, control fanaticism, and make provision for the accrediting of the ministry, the holding of property, and the support of the work. Ellen White as early as 1853 urged the establishing of the church upon “gospel order.” The Michigan Conference, the first of the state conferences, was organized Oct. 6, 1861. The General Conference was organized by delegates from six state conferences—Michigan, Wisconsin, Iowa, Minnesota, New York, and Ohio—meeting at Battle Creek in 1863. The 1863 constitution contains the following preamble: “For the purpose of securing unity and efficiency in labor, and promoting the general interest of the cause of present truth, and of perfecting the organization of the Seventh-day Adventists, we, the delegates from the several state conferences, hereby proceed to organize a General Conference, and adopt the following constitution for the government thereof” (Review and Herald 21:204, 205, May 26, 1863).

The constitution, which follows the above preamble, contains nine articles (for this constitution in full, see Organization), outlining the organization and touching on the following subjects: Article I, name; II, officers; III, duties of president and secretary; IV, duties of treasurer; V, duties of the Executive Committee, which include supervision of the work, distribution of laborers, and calling for funds for missionary work; VI, quota of delegates from state conferences; VII, term of office of the officers (one year); VIII, meetings of the conference; IX, amendments to the constitution.

In assigning financial responsibilities to the Executive Committee, the constitution (Art. V, Sec. 2) has made provision that “means for missionary operations may be received by donation from state conferences, churches, or individuals; and the committee are authorized to call for means when needed.” Thus the first constitution made provision for the essential elements in the infant church—a simple organization with officers, and the means of financing its operations.

The present constitution is not an amended form of the original one; it is a new constitution adopted in 1901 (see Organization).

The constitution may be amended at any session of the General Conference. Through the years it has undergone considerable change to fit the requirements of a developing work. The latest text appears in the current Yearbook, also in the biennial editions of the General Conference Working Policy. The constitution describes the object of and outlines the membership of the conference; lists the officers, their duties, manner of election, and term of office; makes provision for the election of the Executive Committee, for the holding of sessions, for the organization of incorporations and the employment of agents, for the adoption of bylaws, and for the amending of the constitution and bylaws.

In 1889 bylaws were added to the constitution to elaborate further the organization and operation of the conference. In the bylaws in their present form the operation of the conference in division sections is delineated; the election of the standing committees of the sessions is outlined; the listing of officers is extended and their duties developed in greater detail; powers, organization, and meetings of the Executive Committee are more fully defined; division committees are provided; financial operations, together with a listing of funds and appropriations, are set forth; also miscellaneous items are touched upon, such as corporation boards, departments, audits, wages, and expense.

More detailed regulations are incorporated from time to time into the Working Policy of the General Conference.

Following is the constitution of the General Conference of Seventh-day Adventists as revised at the fifty-fifth session held in Indianapolis, Indiana, July 5—14, 1990.

General Conference Daily Bulletin

GENERAL CONFERENCE DAILY BULLETIN (1887, 1888, 1889, 1891, 1893, 1897, 1899; 1889—1893 as Review and Herald Extras; daily except Saturday during session; published by the General Conference at place of session; file in RH). Published record of the proceedings of the General Conference in session. Proceedings of earlier and later sessions are reported in the Review and Herald and in the General Conference Bulletin for the years 1895, 1901, 1903, 1909, 1913, 1918, and 1922. The first five volumes are numbered consecutively 1 to 5; that of 1897 is numbered volume 1, and the last volume, for 1899, is numbered volume 8.

General Conference Departments

GENERAL CONFERENCE DEPARTMENTS. The name given to designate major areas of the church's outreach. They are arranged to promote and guide specific phases of denominational activity. The department does not administer directly, but through the departments recommendations are made to the General Conference Executive Committee. Each department has a director, and one or more associate directors, assistants, and office staff as may be considered advisable. The departments provide counsel, promotional material, and supplies to the field, working in cooperation with the division, union, and local administrators and their departmental directors.

Each General Conference department is guided by an advisory committee, which meets periodically to assess the program of its department and to provide orientation in its overall thrust. Membership on the General Conference advisories is by General Conference Executive Committee action. The departmental director serves as chair of the advisory committee. A similar organization is followed in each world division and on union conference levels.

For articles on the activities of departments, see Church Ministries Department; Communication Department; Education Department; Health and Temperance Department; Public Affairs and Religious Liberty Department; Publishing Department; Trust Services.

The Ministerial Association, although not organized as a department, serves the church on the General Conference level.

Beginnings of Departmental Concept of Organization. Before the turn of the century the work of the denomination had grown to the extent that the General Conference president and secretary were no longer able to encompass all the demands of the field for counsel and direction. There were in operation separate denomination-wide associations, such as the medical, temperance, Sabbath school, and tract and missionary societies, but these were not a part of the General Conference administration. To meet the demands, the General Conference in 1887 added to its officers an educational secretary and a home mission secretary to guide in the conducting of workers' institutes and city missions, and provided for an international publishing committee to promote the general interests of the publishing work.

Departments Organized. At the General Conference session of 1901 the departments were first organized, each with a chair (a member of the General Conference executive committee), a secretary, and an appropriate staff (see Organization). In 1909 the chairs became secretaries; the General Conference president was considered the chair. These departments were not administrative bodies, for they were not directly responsible for such institutions as schools, the publishing houses, or the medical institutions. Established as the medium of communication, they were to bring the needs of the field or of the institutions to the attention of the administration of the General Conference, and to represent the desires, the purposes, and the policies of the General Conference to the field and to the institution. They were intended also to bring the various fields or institutions into coordination one with the other in matters of operation, unifying as far as practical or desirable the operation of institutions.

At first these departments were lightly staffed, but the expansion of the work in the field and the growth in the number and size of the institutions, the increase in the complexity of the work itself, the demand for materials, supplies, literature, and the study of plans and techniques all required the addition of personnel and the formation of additional departments.

By action of the General Conference session of 1985, the departments of Lay Activities, Sabbath School, Adventist Youth, Stewardship, and the Home and Family Service were merged into one coordinated department-the Church Ministries Department.

General Conference Executive Committee

GENERAL CONFERENCE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE. The administrative body of the Seventh-day Adventist Church in the intervals between sessions of the General Conference. It consists of all who are elected at the General Conference sessions to serve in the General Conference organization and in the divisions; also the presidents of union conferences and union missions, the ex-presidents of the General Conference holding credentials from the General Conference, the presidents of the two SDA universities, the editor of the Adventist Review, the presidents of the publishing houses in the United States, the president of Home Study International/Griggs University, and the executive director of the General Conference Insurance Service; also up to 80 others, elected at the sessions or by the General Conference Executive Committee between sessions. There are (1993) about 370 members of the Executive Committee. The term of office of all except the ex-officio members is from one regular General Conference session to the next, usually five years.

In 1991 the Annual Council reduced the weekly scheduled Executive Committee meeting to four required annual meetings, one each quarter. It also authorized the establishment of an Administrative Committee (ADCOM) with limited authority to care for routine items generally associated with the General Conference headquarters. Should a need arise necessitating a meeting of the Executive Committee, the General Conference president or a General Conference officer may call a meeting of the Executive Committee at any time. The 1993 Annual Council further reduced the required frequency of meetings to semiannual meetings, one in the spring (Spring Meeting) and the other in the fall (Annual Council).

General Conference Missions Division

GENERAL CONFERENCE MISSIONS DIVISION. A provisional organization formed by the General Conference Committee on Dec. 16, 1943, to foster the work in the mission fields that, because of World War II, were detached from their division organizations. A provisional committee administered the work in these fields from headquarters at Washington, D.C. This division is listed in the Statistical Report through 1945.

General Conference Session

GENERAL CONFERENCE SESSION. The meeting (held quinquennially) of delegates representing the worldwide Seventh-day Adventist Church.

The first session, at which the General Conference of Seventh-day Adventists was organized, was held in Battle Creek, Michigan, May 20—23, 1863. Twenty delegates were in attendance—four from the state of New York, two from Ohio, 10 from Michigan (eight ministers and two laypersons), one from Wisconsin, two from Iowa, and one from Minnesota. Of the conferences then in existence, only the Vermont Conference was not represented. Committees on constitution, credentials, and nominations were duly appointed, and the constitution of the General Conference was adopted. It consisted of nine articles setting forth the usual features of organization and provided for representation from the constituent conferences to the yearly sessions. The conference's officers (president, secretary, and treasurer) were elected for the ensuing term of one year. In 1889 the constitution was amended to convene sessions biennially. From 1905 to 1970 the constitution provided for regular quadrennial sessions. Since 1970 sessions have been held every five years.

The importance of the quinquennial session in Seventh-day Adventist Church government is evident. This is the time when the highest organization in the administration of a worldwide work convenes to express the collective thinking and planning of the church. The final authority of this body is accepted by all subordinate organizations and interests in the various sections of the world. In a word, the General Conference quinquennial session synthesizes and implements church organization on a world scale.

This form of church government recognizes that authority rests in the church membership, which delegates executive responsibility to representative bodies and officers for the governing of the church and the promotion of church interests. These basic principles of authority and representation characterize the four steps in SDA organization leading from the individual believer to the world church. Within the framework of local responsibility and organization, members meet personally or through personal representation to ensure a united body and a united action. On the conference or local field level, the united body of churches in a state, province, or local territory organizes and directs the work. Local fields affiliate within a larger territory to form unions. The union organization likewise prosecutes the work within its territory. Then, finally, these union groupings unite in the General Conference as a body embracing the church in all parts of the world.

The quinquennial session operates, as did the first session in Battle Creek, on the basis of duly accredited delegates. These delegates and voters are designated: (a) delegates at large; and (b) regular delegates.

The delegates at large include all members of the General Conference Executive Committee (commonly called the General Conference Committee) and such other delegates as are recommended by it for seating at the session to represent general institutions and church interests (see General Conference Constitution, Art. IV, Section 7); the number of these others is not to exceed 20 percent of the total number of delegates in attendance otherwise provided for.

The regular delegates are appointed as outlined in Article IV, Section 6, of the General Conference Constitution.

The General Conference Committee issues credentials to the delegates appointed as provided for in Article IV, Section 8. Calculations for the delegate allotments are based upon the membership as of Dec. 31 of the second year preceding the General Conference session.

The delegates to the quinquennial session are able to bring to the officers in charge whatever matter they feel is worthy of attention. The assembly sets up a number of standing committees (Constitution and Bylaws, Credentials and Licenses, Finance, Nominations, and Plans) to prepare the regular business of the session and to process items or suggestions that are to come before the assembly. Special groups can be appointed to deal with specific items. During the quinquennium, technical committees prepare materials on certain aspects of the General Conference operation. The work of these committees comes likewise to the session through regular channels. Specific provision is made in the bylaws (Art. II, Sec. 2) for the number and choice of members that constitute the nominating committee.

Sessions of the General Conference are held quinquennially at the time and place determined by the General Conference Executive Committee, although they can be postponed for as long as two years during unusual world conditions. This committee may call special sessions at such a time and place as it deems proper by a notice like that for regular sessions, and the transactions of such special sessions have the same force as those of the regular sessions. The election of officers and the voting on all matters of business that come before the session are by viva-voce vote or as designated by the chair, unless otherwise requested by a majority of the delegates present. Currently the number of delegates at large and regular delegates in attendance at a quinquennial session approximates 1,900.

The foregoing outlines the essential role of the General Conference sessions in SDA Church administration. This role is further enhanced by the fact that the General Conference session symbolizes in SDA ranks the importance of organization in God's work. The church believes that organization is of God and is based on divine principles. The General Conference organization and session are intended to exemplify these principles and the order that should prevail in God's church.

General Meeting

GENERAL MEETING. In early Seventh-day Adventist practice a weekend meeting held usually by a local church for the local and neighboring members (also commonly called a conference), most often lasting from Friday afternoon to Sunday, combining a revival meeting and a business meeting for planning evangelism. An example is one announced under the heading Conference: “Providence permitting there will be a general meeting of Sabbath-keepers in Monterey, Allegan Co., Mich., Commencing Friday, Nov. 14th at 1 o’clock, P.M., and to hold over Sabbath and First-day.

“The wants of the cause in Allegan Co. will be considered at this meeting. Bro. Joseph Bates is especially requested to attend.

“In behalf of the church. M. E. Cornell” (Review and Herald 9:8, Nov. 6, 1856).

In this case members from five other places joined with the believers at Monterey. The meetings included “fervent prayers, pointed exhortations and cheerful songs of the brethren and sisters” and “the presentation of the sure word of prophecy” of Christ’s coming, which “aroused and quickened his dear children in the meeting.” There was also a baptismal service. Bates reported the meetings (ibid. 9:40, Dec. 4, 1856).

GEORGIA. A European country bordered by the Black Sea, Russia, Turkey, Armenia, and Azerbaijan. It occupies an area of 26,911 square miles (69,700 square kilometers) and has a population (1994) of 5.7 million. Georgia was annexed to Russia in 1801 and entered the former USSR in 1922, becoming a constituent republic in 1936.

In 1989 strong feelings of nationalism led the USSR to a campaign of repression. On Apr. 9, 1991, Georgia declared its independence and became an independent state when the Soviet Union disbanded on Dec. 25, 1991.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. Georgia is a part of the Trans-Caucasus Field, an attached field of the Euro-Asia Division. Statistics (1992) for Georgia: churches, 4; members, 209. In 1904 Dr. Vagan Pampanjan, an Armenian, started to work among Armenians in the city of Tiflis (now Tbilisi) and its suburbs in Georgia. In 1906, after graduating from the SDA school in Friedensau, Albert Ozel, a physician, began to work among the Germans and the Letts. Soon he was able to organize a small church. After eight years the Czarist government exiled him to the Narinsky in Tomsk province, where he died from typhus two years later at 38 years of age.

In 1925 the first official meetings of the Transcaucasian Seventh-day Adventist churches took place in the city of Tiflis. Because of the bad condition of the roads and lack of funds, only 20 delegates were able to attend; they included Georgians, Armenians, Russians, and Germans. The meeting adopted the constitution of the Transcaucasian field with a membership of 233. Elder Galodzhajev was elected field chair; Elder Klimenko, secretary; and Brethren Istjagin, Volov, and Bogdasarjants were members of the field committee.

I. M. Droiling and P. I. Lagutov were working in Georgia in 1993. The international conflicts and enmity between various groups and political parties are hampering the spread of the gospel in the area.

The law concerning freedom of conscience was not in effect in the country in 1993. The patriarch of the Georgian Orthodox Church, Ilja II, personally handles the religious problems in the state.

History

History. Beginnings of the Work in the Area. Seventh-day Adventist publications penetrated the territory of the present Georgia-Cumberland Conference in 1872, four years before the first SDA workers arrived, resulting in the conversion of J. A. Killingworth and his family, of Griffin, Georgia. Rufus Eugene Seagraves learned about the SDA health principles from a Dr. Irwin in 1875 and was baptized three years later by C. O. Taylor, the first denominational worker in Georgia. Taylor came to the south Georgia town of Quitman in the autumn of 1876. Knowing of no other SDAs in the state, he engaged in personal evangelism. The next spring he learned of the Killingworths through the Review and Herald. On his way north to visit them in 1877, he passed through Houston County, where he won J. S. Killen, a planter and lawyer, along with some of his friends and some employees who formerly had been his slaves (see South Atlantic Conference). (Later four of Killen's sons and three daughters entered the colporteur work, one of them receiving local ministerial credentials in the 1880s.)

In 1876, the same year that Taylor arrived in Georgia, a church was organized in the present Georgia-Cumberland Conference territory in Tennessee as a result of the work of Orlando Soule, who came to visit an SDA friend named Wetherby, who had moved from Michigan to Sparta, Tennessee, on the edge of the Cumberland Plateau. Asked to lecture there, Soule remained to preach in several places, was ordained by D. M. Canright in May, and built up the first church in the conference area, the Mount Gilead church, not many miles from Sparta. He organized the church in the autumn, with Patrick D. Moyers, his first convert, as elder. Moyers, one of the earliest Southern-born SDA preachers, was a strong pillar at Mount Gilead and later at Graysville, Tennessee.

Early in the history of the Quitman, Georgia, group of converts, one of the members, Samuel Mitchell, was arrested in July 1878 for plowing in his field on Sunday. In poor health, he could not endure the damp cell, and became ill after serving 15 days of his 30-day sentence. Refusing on the one hand to take money that a member of Congress offered for his release, and on the other to promise that he would not work on Sunday if he were released, he died a martyr to Sunday law enforcement on Feb. 4, 1879.

Two colporteurs, George A. King and Charles F. Curtis, came to Georgia in 1885 to sell the books Daniel and the Revelation, by Uriah Smith, and Sunshine at Home, and returned North with enthusiastic reports of future prospects for the South. At the 1886 General Conference session Curtis, a student at Battle Creek College, and his betrothed, whom he married shortly thereafter, were asked to work in Atlanta with George W. Anglebarger, who was to head a city mission. Curtis was to look after the canvassing work, Mrs. Anglebarger was to be the "mission mother," and Mrs. Curtis the Bible instructor. The two couples reached Atlanta Mar. 3, 1887, a few months after the arrival of Charles Bliss, the minister in charge of the Georgia mission field, who had already won one convert in meetings conducted at Jonesboro.

After five weeks of a damp spring in Atlanta, Anglebarger, whose health had failed, moved with his wife to Colorado. A few days later they were replaced by three Michigan Bible instructors, Clara Conklin, Anna Thomas, and Mrs. Charles Swartout, and Charles Swartout, a colporteur. Curtis took charge of the city mission.

The group conducted meetings in Atlanta and Fort Valley. On the advice of S. H. Lane, who replaced Bliss in Georgia and Florida in 1887, the Atlanta mission was closed because of a depression, and the workers moved to a less expensive home and in it conducted Sabbath and weeknight meetings. Later the headquarters were moved to the southeast section of the city, where a church was organized in the fall of 1888. Curtis, then Georgia Tract Society director, was also assigned Florida and South Carolina.

A Review and Herald office was established in Atlanta in 1889 and remained active until the Southern Publishing Association in Tennessee was formed in 1901.

Lane and his half brother, Dr. O. C. Godsmark, held a tent series in Athens, Georgia, in 1889. That same year Georgia's first SDA camp meeting, with about 60 in attendance, was held at Reynolds, where a few people were already observing the Sabbath. Also in that year, two ministers, M. G. Huffman, of Indiana, and L. T. Crisler, of Florida, conducted tent meetings at Alpharetta, Georgia, and organized a company, which later became a church.

With the help of P. D. Moyers and J. W. Scoles, E. R. Gillett built a church in Graysville, Tennessee, a small town 30 miles (50 kilometers) north of Chattanooga, to which he had moved in 1885. J. M. Rees organized a group of 10 members there on Sept. 8, 1888. The following year the General Conference Committee appointed R. M. Kilgore president of District no. 2 (Southern District), and in 1890 he came to the South with his secretary, Arthur W. Spalding, and made Graysville his headquarters. The town remained headquarters for the Southern District for the next 12 years.

Eastern Kentucky and eastern Tennessee were organized in 1889 as the Cumberland Mission. Georgia was part of the Southern Mission. G. T. Wilson, conducting tent meetings, was responsible for establishing a church in 1890 at Barwick, Georgia, not far from Quitman. The 1892 General Conference session authorized A. P. Heacock to conduct tent meetings in the Cumberland Mission and Wilson in Georgia.

The Southern Training School, founded at Graysville, Tennessee, in 1892 and later moved to Collegedale, Tennessee, was the parent of the present Southern College.

In 1893 churches were organized by J. W. Scoles at Webster, Roane County, Tennessee, by W. A. McCutchen at Gainesville, Georgia, and by Grant Adkins in Knoxville, Tennessee. Also at Knoxville, following quiet house-to-house Bible studies, a company of Black converts was organized. On Nov. 19 W. A. McCutchen and E. C. Keck, who had recently arrived from Battle Creek, were arrested for building benches for a new church school in Gainesville, Georgia, on Sunday. The case was tried twice and finally dismissed on the grounds that the labor performed by the men was not of their ordinary calling. The school was opened in 1893 and accepted children in elementary (and, for a time, in secondary) grades. By June 30, tithe for the previous 12 months in the Cumberland Mission had risen to $844 and in Georgia to $898.

Late in 1894, 20 Graysville and Dayton, Tennessee, members were jailed for Sunday labor and sentenced to the chain gang.

The controversy temporarily closed the Graysville school.

Cumberland Conference and Georgia Conference Organized. At a camp meeting in Harriman, Tennessee, Sept. 14, 1900, the Cumberland Mission was organized into the Cumberland Conference, with Smith Sharp as president. There were 450 members, one ordained minister, and two licensed ministers. Tithe amounted to about $3,800 that year. Between Aug. 9 and 19, 1901, at a camp meeting at Austell, Georgia, the Georgia Conference, embracing the state of Georgia, was organized, with C. A. Hall as president.

A church was organized at Macon, Georgia, in 1898. Later, churches were organized in Tennessee at Brayton (1901), Cleveland (1903), Daylight (1904), and Chattanooga (1907). The Southern Sanitarium at Graysville was completed in 1904. Another denominational sanitarium was established in Atlanta in 1903 near the conference headquarters. During the next 10 years privately operated treatment rooms and sanitariums were opened in Knoxville, in Chattanooga, and at East Lake in Atlanta, the last named operated by Dr. C. F. Curtis. The Cumberland Industrial School was established by Clifford G. Howell at McMinnville, Tennessee, in 1902, and in 1907 it had an enrollment of 23. In 1905 another intermediate school was developed from a church school at Alpharetta, Georgia, which in 1915 reverted to the local church.

When the Southeastern Union Conference was organized, Jan. 12, 1908, the Cumberland Conference was reduced to include only eastern Tennessee (with the western boundary on the west side of the counties of Clay, Jackson, Putnam, White, Warren, Grundy, and Marion), and was left with a membership of 530, with 12 churches and five elementary schools. By 1909 Dade, Walker, Catoosa, Whitfield, Murray, Fannin, and Gilmer counties, in northwest Georgia, and Dekalb, Smith, and Macon counties, in Tennessee, were also listed as belonging to the Cumberland Conference.

Churches were organized at Athens, Tennessee (1910), Savannah, Georgia (1911), Lenoir City, Tennessee (1912), Greeneville, Tennessee (1913), and Stonewall, Georgia (1914). Also in 1914 a self-supporting school was established at Reeves, Georgia, near Calhoun, with a church of 31 members, most of whom had moved there from California. In 1915 churches were organized at Fitzgerald, Georgia, and Johnson City and Bristol, Tennessee. Work in Johnson City dates back to the work of J. M. Rees in 1887.

As a result of large-scale evangelism in Atlanta by C. B. Haynes in 1912, 1914, 1917, and 1918, more than 150 were baptized and a new church was built. In 1915 there were 491 members in 15 Georgia Conference churches, and 604 members in 15 Cumberland Conference churches.

Territorial Changes. In 1918 the counties of Echols, Clinch, Charlton, Ware, Pierce, Wayne, Camden, Glynn, and McIntosh, in the southeast corner of Georgia, were transferred to the Florida Conference, and the northwest Georgia counties of Whitfield, Murray, Fannin, and Gilmer were returned from the Cumberland Conference. A year later 18 western counties of North Carolina were added to the Cumberland Conference (none of which were retained after 1932 except Cherokee). In 1922 the conference headquarters was established adjacent to the Atlanta First church on Cherokee Avenue. Then in 1924 seven more northwest Georgia counties went back to the Cumberland Conference.

Self-supporting medical institutions were prominent in several localities: a sanitarium at Reeves, Georgia, from 1915 to 1920, reorganized later as the Scott Sanitarium; the East Lake Rest Home, operated by Dr. C. F. Curtis, taken over by Dr. J. F. Schneider from 1923 to 1927, replaced by the Georgia Sanitarium, on the west side of Atlanta, until 1958; a sanitarium at Douglasville, Georgia, opened in 1918 by Charles Jones and his wife in connection with the Flat Rock School (1916—1923; from 1920 to 1923 a conference-owned school).

The General Conference, through Dr. J. R. Mitchell, arranged for SDA students to attend the Atlanta Southern Dental School in 1934 and operated a student home until 1948. Additional self-supporting hospitals, now active, include, in Tennessee, Little Creek Sanitarium, Hospital, and School (organized in 1940), at Concord; Laurelbrook Hospital and School, Dayton. Takoma Hospital at Greeneville, Tennessee, built by Dr. L. E. Coolidge in 1927, was given to the Southern Union in 1954. Wildwood Sanitarium was organized in 1942 at Wildwood, Georgia. In 1958 the conference assumed the operation of two county hospitals in Georgia—Watkins Memorial Hospital at Ellijay and Louis Smith Memorial Hospital at Lakeland. In 1993 most of the hospitals were part of the Adventist Health System/Sunbelt (see list above).

Georgia-Cumberland Conference Organized. The Cumberland Conference was combined with the Georgia Conference in March 1932, forming the Georgia-Cumberland Conference, with H. E. Lysinger as president, and with headquarters at 547 Cherokee Ave., SE., Atlanta, Georgia. The 24 churches in the Cumberland Conference and the 23 in Georgia made 47 churches, with a total membership of 2,490. In 1938 there were 49 White churches with 2,781 members and nine Black churches with 772 members. When on Jan. 1, 1946, the Black churches of Tennessee were taken into the South Central Conference, and the Black churches of Georgia and the Carolinas and all of Florida, except that portion lying west of the Apalachicola River, were taken into the South Atlantic Conference, there were 61 churches left to the Georgia-Cumberland Conference, with 3,000 members and 18 ordained ministers.

Conference properties acquired in the 1950s included a youth camp in the Blue Ridge Mountains of north Georgia (Atoka Springs Camp, 1955) and the Hurlbutt Farms (1959), with nearly 600 acres (250 hectares), where the Scott Sanitarium had been situated. These were near Calhoun, Georgia, and were purchased for a site for the Georgia-Cumberland Academy, which was opened in 1965. In 1994 Cohutta Springs Center was dedicated debt-free.

Presidents—Georgia Conference: C. A. Hall, 1901—1903; R. M. Kilgore, 1903—1906; George W. Wells, 1906—1910; C. B. Stephenson, 1910—1912; L. T. Crisler, 1912—1913; N. V. Willess, 1913—1916; W. H. Geoscience Research Institute

GEOSCIENCE RESEARCH INSTITUTE. A research institute established in 1957 by action of the Annual Council for the purpose of making available to the Seventh-day Adventist Church competent advice concerning the relation of scientific evidence to inspired testimony. The institute focuses mainly on the biological, geological, and paleontological questions regarding the origin of life and the past history of our planet in the context of the Creation account given in the book of Genesis.

The institute conducts its work through laboratory, field, and literature investigation. It also devotes significant effort in communicating with the church and other entities through teaching, lecturing, geological field conferences, videos, and periodical publications. In 1974 the institute began publishing Origins, a semiannual technical publication. Geoscience Reports, which is designed for elementary and secondary educational levels, began publication in 1981. The Spanish periodical Ciencia de los Origenes has been in production since 1982.

The institute was first located on the campus of Andrews University. In 1980 it was moved to Loma Linda University in order to take advantage of the close proximity of significant geological features as well as the scientific environment of that institution. At Loma Linda the institute has laboratories and a 20,000-volume library. In 1991 the institute established two branch offices: one in Europe at the Saleve Adventist Institute in France, and one in South America at the River Plate Adventist University in Argentina.

Gerber, Robert

GERBER, ROBERT (1893—1971). Administrator, treasurer, departmental secretary. He was born in Lajoux, Switzerland, and began denominational service in 1915 as a Bible worker. The following year he served at the publishing house in Gland, and for the next four years he was accountant at the Spanish Publishing House.

From 1920 to 1928 he was treasurer of the then Latin Union, and for the following six years served as president of the Iberian Union. After a term as hospital administrator at Gland, he served as president of the Swiss Union for eight years, followed by a two-year term as Sabbath school and MV secretary of the Southern European Division. He was then appointed treasurer of that division, which office he held until 1958. From that time until his retirement in 1962, he served as a division departmental secretary.

German Health Food Factory

GERMAN HEALTH FOOD FACTORY (De-Vau-Ge Gesundkostwerk GmbH). A firm in Lüneburg, Germany, owned by the Euro-Africa Division, which makes a wide variety of products ranging from bread and cereal flakes to nut creams, vegetable spreads, meat analogs from soybeans, and diabetic food. The products are distributed through several channels, but mainly through health food stores. The factory was founded in 1899 at Friedensau, near Magdeburg, and began operation in an old mill under the management of Augusto Pages. But since the factory was too small and too far from markets and sources of imported raw materials, such as fruits and nuts, to operate economically, a new plant was built at Hamburg shortly before World War I.

In 1940 the political conditions in Germany forced the denomination to transfer the factory to four Seventh-day Adventist trustees—Willy Lühr, the former manager, A. Vollmer, O. Schildhauer, and H. Niemann—who continued to operate it as a private company until the building was almost completely destroyed in an air raid on July 28, 1943. Some 12 months later the factory resumed production, but on a diminished scale.

After World War II, in 1947, a new organization, formed by the former Central European Division, took over operation of the food factory from the remaining trustees. In 1966 a new building was constructed in north Hamburg, at Brödermannsweg 17. New soy products were developed, and a new sales force was organized. The rapid growth of sales, both in and outside Germany, made it necessary to lay plans for more space and greatly expanded facilities. Early in 1974 a new property was purchased in Lüneburg, an attractive industrial area of Germany. Shortly afterward the company moved to that location.

By 1993 the company employed more than 400 people and had a yearly turnover of $75 million. For decades, health food shops have been the main market. The German Health Food Factory holds about 8 percent of the market and is considered the most important health food producer in Germany, also supplying the health food market in many other European countries.

Besides the health food shop business, the company produces breakfast cereals, nut-nougat cream, dried fruit and nuts, and baby food under private label.

Managers: August Pages, 1899—1903; Wilhelm Krumm, 1903—1920; Hermann Hoth, 1920—1935; Willy Lühr, 1935—1947; Henry Niemann, 1947—1964; Erich Amelung, 1964—1970; Michael Makowski, 1970— .

Germany

GERMANY. A republic with an area of 137,838 square miles (357,000 square kilometers) and a population (1994) of 81 million. It is bordered by Denmark on the north; the Netherlands, Belgium, Luxembourg, and France on the west; Switzerland and Austria on the south; and the Czech Republic and Poland on the east. Approximately 45 percent of the population is Protestant and 37 percent is Catholic.

Historical Background

Historical Background. Germans are successors of the ancient Teutonic tribes that inhabited Northern Europe at the time Caesar marched north of the Alps in the middle of the first century B.C. As early as the first century A.D. the Roman historian Tacitus wrote a book entitled Germania, in which he described the territory north of the Alps.

The origin of Germany can be traced to Charlemagne, who united much of Western and Central Europe under his rule and whom the pope crowned king of the Holy Roman Empire in A.D. 800. His successors divided the territory into several parts. The part that later became Germany and Austria retained the title of the Holy Roman Empire until the Napoleonic Wars. Until the beginning of the nineteenth century Germany consisted of a large number of small kingdoms, principalities, and free cities loosely associated within the Holy Roman Empire and governed by an elective emperor. After the beginning of the nineteenth century they were united in a German federation. The disunity of Germany for such a long period can be attributed in part to the outcome of the Thirty Years War, which assigned religious authority to the ruler of each domain, thus splitting the nation and preventing joint political development of areas representing differing religions. In the late 1800s Prussia assumed the leading role in the formation of a united Germany.

Following World War I, a republic replaced the empire. After World War II the Federal Republic of Germany was established in the west and the German Democratic Republic in the east.

Forerunners

Forerunners. Interest in the Second Advent was evident in Germany in the early nineteenth century. Scattered Sabbathkeepers and small groups of people who anticipated Christ's soon return appeared as early as 1844. There were Christians in the Tauber area of Bavaria who accepted the biblical Sabbath, inspired by the writings of Tennhardt, an eighteenth-century Nürnberg Bible student. In 1902 two Württemberg men who had been keeping the seventh-day Sabbath for more than 50 years were baptized into the Seventh-day Adventist Church.

In the second half of the nineteenth century a Baptist by the name of Stangnowsky in East Prussia led a group of people to keep the seventh-day Sabbath after he had become convinced that Sunday was introduced by the post-apostolic church. Most of this group later joined the SDA Church.

More direct predecessors of SDAs in Germany were groups formed by J. H. Lindermann, a weaver by trade, in Elberfeld, in the vicinity of Wuppertal in North-Rhineland, Westphalia. In the midnineteenth century he concluded from his study of the Bible that Christ was coming soon. He preached the news to his neighbors, and soon a group joined him. In 1867 he also discovered through Bible study that the seventh day is the true Sabbath. He printed tracts on the Sabbath, the millennium (which he expected the saints to spend on the earth), and adult baptism, as well as a hymnbook reflecting the Advent hope and the Sabbath truth. He raised up groups in Vohwinkel, Solingen, Gladbach, and Rheydt.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. Word of these groups was brought to SDAs in Switzerland in the early 1870s by a wandering beggar. He gave the Swiss members the address of German Sabbathkeepers in the Rhineland who held similar beliefs. James Erzberger, the first ordained SDA minister in Europe, wrote to Lindermann and received an invitation to come and preach to the believers there. In 1875, the year after he arrived in Switzerland, J. N. Andrews went with Erzberger to visit the German Sabbathkeeping Adventists in their homes near Elberfeld. They found a company of about 50 believers. Lindermann, who could not accept the SDA interpretation of the millennium, did not join the SDA Church, but several of his followers at Vohwinkel formed the nucleus of one of the first SDA churches in Germany. Later some members of the Lindermann family became SDAs.

After spending five weeks visiting scattered companies and preaching in public and in private, Andrews returned to Switzerland, leaving Erzberger in Germany to carry on public evangelism. Soon Erzberger met Christians from East Prussia who held views similar to those of SDAs on baptism, the Second Advent, the seventh-day Sabbath, and temperance.

The first SDA baptism in Germany took place on Jan. 8, 1876, when Erzberger baptized eight persons at Solingen. There he soon organized the first SDA church in Germany, with 25 members. The church at Vohwinkel was organized at about the same time. Erzberger left in the late 1870s. In 1884 the churches at Solingen and Vohwinkel joined the newly organized Swiss Conference.

In 1886 the General Conference sent L. R. Conradi to Europe to carry on work among the Germans. When Ellen White came to Europe the following year, she visited the Vohwinkel and Gladbach churches in the Rhineland. Conradi prepared tracts, and in 1888 organized colporteur work in Germany. That same year Gerhard Perk, one of the first SDA converts in Russia who had to leave because of persecution, and Emil Frauchiger, a Swiss convert, came to Germany to sell Das Leben Jesu, a book by Ellen White on the life of Christ.

In 1889 Hamburg was chosen as the headquarters for SDA work in Germany. The first training institute to prepare workers for Germany was held there that summer. As a result of the work of the early colporteurs in Hamburg, 12 persons were baptized in 1889, the first SDA baptism in that city, followed by the organization of a church of 25 members. A branch of the Imprimerie Polyglotte (Switzerland) was opened in Hamburg under the name of International Tract Society, which issued publications not only in German but also in several of the languages of Eastern Europe. These publications were used to begin missionary work on ships in the Hamburg harbor.

With a total membership of about 100, the German church held its first general meeting in a suburb of Hamburg in 1891. At this time Germany and Russia were organized as one mission, with Conradi as president and Boettcher as secretary-treasurer. That same year G. Perk and Elise Plass (later Mrs. H. F. Schubert) were sent to Berlin to do Bible and colporteur work. Soon converts were won for Christ.

In 1894, at a general meeting held in a tent behind the recently acquired headquarters property, it was decided to erect a building on the property to serve as chapel, school, and printing plant. In 1894 H. F. Schubert arrived from the United States to take charge of the instruction of the 15 students in the newly organized school. This school trained ministers for Russia as well as Germany.

Expansion of the Work in Germany and Overseas

Expansion of the Work in Germany and Overseas. In 1894 the 11 members in Berlin were organized into a church. The International Tract Society in Hamburg took over the German work of the publishing house in Basel. Soon it was issuing four periodicals and printing literature in 14 languages. Churches were organized in eastern Germany, Magdeburg, and Königsberg in 1895. That same year evangelistic work was started among the Polish people, and the first German missionaries, H. Graf and B. Hedrich, were sent to Brazil.

In 1896 Emil Frauchiger conducted evangelistic meetings in Stuttgart, winning a number of converts. Others were won in Lüdenscheid by E. Enseleit. That year J. N. Loughborough, representing the American mission board, met with 200 members for Sabbath services at the seventh general meeting, held in Hamburg. Records show that by 1897, the German field had more than 1,000 members.

The mission was organized as a conference in 1898 with territory including Austria, Hungary, the Netherlands, Romania, Bulgaria, and Serbia. Conradi was elected president; H. F. Schubert, secretary; and Bertha Severin, treasurer.

Captain Christiansen, formerly skipper of the Pitcairn, and Klaus von Fintel, a helmsman with long experience in the Hamburg harbor, used a motorboat to conduct missionary work for sailors. F. Stuhlmann, his wife, and a colporteur were the next ones sent as missionaries to Brazil in 1898.

During the autumn of 1899 a small estate was secured near the city of Magdeburg, where a training school named Friedensau (peaceful meadow) was opened. A sanitarium and a small health food factory were added.

Organization of the German Union Conference

Organization of the German Union Conference. By 1901 the SDA work in this field had grown to the place that it was organized into a union comprised of 149 churches and 3,843 members. In addition to Germany, the territory included Austria, Hungary, German Switzerland, Russia, the Balkan States, and the Netherlands.

To finance additional buildings at Friedensau, laypersons sold Ellen White's book Christ's Object Lessons. In 1902 G. W. Schubert conducted evangelistic work in Cologne, and soon a church was organized, which five years later had its own church building. By the end of 1905 this new union reported a membership of about 5,000. The publishing house in Hamburg reported sales of 50 million pages of tracts and books and more than 2.5 million copies of magazines in 12 different languages. The order for a half million copies of a single special edition of Herold der Wahrheit, the missionary periodical, was an encouraging indication of growth.

Educational Work

Educational Work. Until 1900 the educational work was concentrated at the Friedensau seminary and nursing school. Student nurses came from all the countries of the newly formed union, including Russia, until World War I.

Medical Work

Medical Work. The first SDA medical institution in Germany was opened in Friedensau in 1901. Three years later a nurses' home was opened in Berlin for missionary nurses doing private duty in Greater Berlin. Several years later, a similar home was opened in Breslau, in eastern Germany. Finally there were 18 such medical units scattered throughout Germany, employing 52 nurses—both men and women. Berlin and Friedensau in the east, and Wiesbaden, a prominent health resort in western Germany, were important SDA medical centers.

Foreign Missions

Foreign Missions. SDA missionaries went from Germany to South America in the 1890s, and later Germany became a home base for extensive mission work in Africa. To assist in spreading the gospel, some German missionaries reduced local native African languages to writing.

Post-World War I Reorganization

Post-World War I Reorganization. Departmental secretaries were chosen to promote the various departments of the church. In 1920 six mission fields were assigned to Germany, and missionaries were again sent to the Netherlands East Indies and Ethiopia. In Berlin, where there were nearly 2,000 SDAs, Waldfriede Sanitarium and Hospital was acquired in 1920, and a School of Nursing was added in 1922 (see Berlin Hospital). The first issue of Jugendleitstern, the youth magazine, appeared in 1920. A year later two training schools were opened in western Germany: the Central European Missionary Seminary at Kirchheim/Teck, in Württemberg, and the Neandertal Missionary Seminary near Düsseldorf, Rhineland (see Marienhöhe Seminary). A sanitarium was established at Bad Aibling, in upper Bavaria, which has since been converted into an old people's home (see Haus Wittelsbach Old People's Home).

In the autumn of 1925 the first SDA medical mission was opened in Russia, staffed by Kurt Klepzig, a German physician.

During the 1920s the church membership grew rapidly. Between 1920 and 1925, 9,645 new members were added. By 1927 the total membership numbered 36,000.

The first Seventh-day Adventist youth congress was held in 1928 in Chemnitz in Saxony, with an attendance of more than 3,000 delegates from the European Division. The congress idea, which has become a highlight of AY work, is one of the significant contributions made by the German field to the worldwide AY work.

Central European Division Formed

Central European Division Formed. Berlin was chosen as headquarters of the newly formed Central European Division in 1928, one of the four divisions formed from the European Division. This new division included Germany, Austria, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Greece, Albania, Bulgaria, Turkey, Palestine, Syria, Iran, Iraq, Egypt, Liberia, Sudan, Arabia, Cyprus, Transjordan, the Spanish and Portuguese colonies in West Africa, and the Netherlands East Indies. Missionaries were sent out from Germany to many of these countries.

By 1929 Germany had eight nurses' homes with 70 missionary nurses serving the public. A welfare center in Berlin, called "Friedensheim," offered refuge to 100 people in need of food and lodging. An organization called "Hilfswerk Mutter und Kind" cared for young mothers and children. SDAs became known for their cooperation with national and other organizations in the care of the needy.

In spite of the economic and political problems of the 1930s, which led to the prohibition of canvassing work, 2,000 converts joined the church.

Because of currency regulations in 1935, the Central European Division was divided into two sections: the first comprised the three German unions, and the second made up the rest of the division territory. The headquarters of the second section was moved first to Basel, Switzerland, then to Washington, D.C., U.S.A., in 1937 and placed under General Conference administration in 1938. Because of government restrictions, the church paper, Der Adventbote, was stopped in 1941, and publication was not resumed until 1949.

Reorganization and Development After 1945

Reorganization and Development After 1945. After World War II it was necessary to reorganize the Central European Division. Some of the territory previously administered from Germany was assigned to the Southern European Division and some to Northern Europe. The Central European Division then consisted of the South German Union, the West German Union, and the East German Union (from 1967 to 1971 the Union of Seventh-day Adventists in the German Democratic Republic). Berlin was divided into two conferences: Berlin East Conference and Berlin West.

Three thousand members were added to the church in 1946, largely as the result of lay evangelism. The statistical report for that year lists Germany with 707 churches and only 27 church buildings, 31,000 members, and 224 ministers. By 1974 more than 250 new churches had been built. A Bible correspondence school was begun by Max Busch in 1946.

The radiobroadcast called Die Stimme der Hoffnung ("Voice of Hope") was broadcast in German over Radio Luxembourg. Between 1947 and 1949 the three seminaries were reopened and the church paper resumed publication. A. Wicklein led 200 colporteurs to sell periodicals. SDA welfare groups were very active, helping more than 100,000 people annually.

Growing prosperity and an increasing tendency to formalism in the state church have made it more difficult to gain decisions involving changes in the pattern of life, but the church members have been active in distributing tracts and lending books, thus helping the ministers to find interested people. The Central European Division continued to function until Jan. 1, 1972, when it joined with the Trans-Mediterranean Division in forming the Euro-Africa Division.

Federal Republic of Germany After 1949. The Federal Republic of Germany was organized into the West German Union and the South German Union conferences. These unions formed a part of the Central European Division until January 1972, when the Trans-Mediterranean Division and the Central European Division merged, forming the Euro-Africa Division.

In 1949 the former East German Union was reorganized into the Union of Seventh-day Adventists in the German Democratic Republic, and comprised the area of this newly founded socialist state. Seven local conferences belonged to this union. The political situation made it necessary in 1954 to divide the former Berlin Conference (organized in 1909) into the West Berlin Conference and the East Berlin Conference, and in 1964 the West Berlin Conference was separated from the administration of the Union of Seventh-day Adventists in the German Democratic Republic. In July 1971 the seven conferences were reorganized into six local fields, following the state district areas, and the same union was changed to the German Democratic Republic Union Conference.

The denomination was a recognized religious body in the German Democratic Republic. The seminary property, four retreat centers, an old people's home, and the church properties were owned and administered by a legal association.

The publishing work, established in 1962, in cooperation with a state printing plant, developed from year to year. In addition to the Sabbath school quarterlies and other periodicals, three or four books and four to six tracts were printed annually. The union operated a Bible correspondence school called "Friedensau Bibellehrbriefe," begun in 1965, the first in a socialist state.

Audiovisual institutes were conducted to provide material for evangelistic work and lay activities. The facilities of the Friedensau campus were used for youth camps, with more than 800 in attendance.

The reunited Germany after 1990

The reunited Germany after 1990. On Oct. 3, 1990, East and West Germany united to form the new Federal Republic of Germany. This led the Seventh-day Adventist Church in Germany to reorganize. While the South German Union remained unchanged, the East German Union (new name since October 1990) and the West German Union have joined the North German Union, with headquarters in Hannover. The theological education at Marienhöhe Seminary ceased in 1994, leaving the Friedensau Theological Graduate School (Theologische Hochschule Friedensau) the sole institution for theological training in Germany. The reunion of Germany has demanded financial sacrifices. In 1992, apart from the extension of the Friedensau Theological Graduate School, the Adventist Church in Germany donated DM 3.1 million for modernizing churches in the former East Germany.

The official church paper of the North German Union Conference is Adventecho, a 32-page monthly periodical published in Hamburg.

Since the end of World War II, 163 churches have been built or reconstructed in Germany, mostly by volunteers among the church membership. In 1987 the Adventist Development and Relief Agency (ADRA/Germany) was established in Darmstadt (now in Weiterstadt, near Darmstadt). In 1991 ADRA/Germany spent DM 7.8 million for humanitarian relief in 19 countries of the world. More than 2,000 tons (1,800 metric tons) of food, medicine, and essential hospital supplies were brought to the former Soviet Union.

Geymet, Jean David

GEYMET, JEAN DAVID (1842—1923). Colporteur, one of the earliest Seventh-day Adventist converts in Europe. He was working in a silk mill at Torre Pellice, the Waldensian stronghold in the Piedmont region of northern Italy, when M. B. Czechowski brought the SDA teachings to Italy in 1864. Geymet readily accepted the new teaching, was baptized, and accompanied Czechowski to Switzerland, doing some preaching and helping him establish churches, which later became the first Seventh-day Adventist churches in Europe. Toward the end of the decade Geymet, while working as a baker, in his spare hours translated Uriah Smith's books Thoughts on Daniel and Thoughts on the Revelation into French. In 1870 he married Theresa Trombotto and lived in Piedmont until 1886, in which year he reentered church work as a colporteur and continued for many years in this service. Of his colporteur experience he wrote: "Twice I went over the Piedmont valleys, and there is no settlement where I did not leave some books or publications." When he was 80 he wrote to the Revue Adventiste: "I still can make 20 kilometers [13 miles] on foot selling books. . . . I cannot conceive of how a true Adventist can remain inactive and silent about the second coming of Jesus Christ, and not impart this happy hope to the hearts of his fellow men by work and the printed page" (28:12, Feb. 1, 1924).

Ghana

GHANA. A West African republic composed of the former British colony of the Gold Coast and the British trusteeship territory of Togoland. It gained independence on Mar. 6, 1957 (the first of the African nations south of the Sahara to attain independence after World War II), and adopted a republican constitution on July 1, 1960. It is bounded on the south by the Gulf of Guinea, on the east by Togo, on the west by the Côte d' Ivoire, on the north by Burkina Faso, and has an area of about 92,100 square miles (240,000 square kilometers) and a population (1994) of 17.2 million. Most of the people are supported by agriculture. Ghana used to be the world's largest producer of cacao, which is its most valuable export, followed by timber and gold. The country also contains valuable deposits of bauxite, diamonds, and manganese. The name was derived from that of a West African empire that flourished more than 1,000 years ago. A large portion of the African diaspora in the Americas traces its origins or ancestry to Ghana.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. SDA work in West Africa began in 1888 when Francis I. U. Dolphijn, an African, began to keep the Sabbath after reading literature sent by the International Tract Society, which had been supplied to him by the captain of a ship anchored in Apam, in what is now Ghana. Raising up a group of believers, he continued to write to the General Conference requesting that missionaries be sent. In 1892 Lawrence C. Chadwick, president of the International Tract Society, spent several months with the group at Apam, and at the January 1893 General Conference session made an earnest plea for missionaries to be sent to West Africa.

The first SDA missionaries, Edward L. Sanford and Karl G. Rudolph, arrived at Apam on Feb. 22, 1894. Within five months frequent attacks of malaria forced Sanford's departure, but Rudolph continued another 18 months. On Oct. 3, 1895 Dudley U. Hale (the new mission superintendent), George and Eva Kerr (both nurses), and G. P. Riggs (a colporteur) arrived at Cape Coast, where they met Rudolph, who had previously moved there from Apam. During the following year a successful medical missionary program was conducted in Cape Coast. In August 1896 the Kerrs moved to the new mission site near Esiam, 23 miles (37 kilometers) inland from Salt Pond, where a building program that was planned to include the mission headquarters, a school and hospital, was started.

Unfortunately, their work was cut short by sickness. The two Kerr children died in 1896. After canvassing for eight months, illness forced Riggs's departure for Liverpool, where he died Jan. 8, 1897. Because of failing health, the Kerrs left for Cape Town, South Africa, on Apr. 16, 1897, and Hale departed on June 3. On Mar. 27, 1897, in the first Seventh-day Adventist baptism in West Africa, Hale baptized Francis I. U. Dolphijn, Fred and Isaac Dolphijn, and G. P. Grant.

In March 1903 Hale returned to Ghana with his family and Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Hyatt. The Hyatts worked in Cape Coast, while the Hales moved to a new mission site near Manso, on the railroad line between Sekondi and Tarkwa. About six months later Hale and his family had to leave a second time to save his life. The Hyatts continued in Cape Coast until they moved to Freetown, Sierra Leone, in 1905. In July 1905 David C. Babcock, with his family, was sent to take charge of the work in West Africa, which he supervised from Sierra Leone.

During the following years Babcock and C.E.F. Thompson, a Jamaican who joined the SDA Church in Sierra Leone, with the cooperation of C. A. Ackah, J. A. Bonney, D. N. Daharty, J. K. Garbrah, and J. A. Sackey, developed SDA work among the Nzima people of the Axim area. In 1910 Babcock baptized about 50 believers, organizing churches at Axim and Kikam. Early in January 1911 Prof. and Mrs. Thomas M. French went to the Gold Coast. In Axim, on Jan. 18, two weeks after their arrival, Mrs. French died of blackwater fever, and French, suffering from repeated attacks of malaria, returned to the United States. Thereafter, Thompson took charge of the Gold Coast work until he, broken in health, died on Mar. 25, 1912.

Early Organization and Growth. At a general meeting in Sierra Leone in 1913, W. H. Lewis was appointed to the Gold Coast. He and his family were ordered to go first to the Canary Island health base to get rid of fever. He came to the Gold Coast alone in September 1914, landing in Sekondi, while his family remained in the Canaries. With J.A.B. Davies, of Sierra Leone, he visited SDAs in Axim and Kikam. Davies was placed in charge while Lewis pushed on to Kumasi in Ashanti in search of a site for permanent headquarters. On Nov. 6, 1914, he reported that he had found favorable sites for two mission stations. In Agona, capital of a chiefdom 22 miles (35 kilometers) northeast of Kumasi, Lewis found an old European resthouse, which the chief offered until a headquarters station could be erected. The paramount chief of Agona, Nana Kwame Boakye, gave a larger plot of land, where Lewis erected a house and a school building with the assistance of the chief and his people. In the school there, which became the center of a group of schools, J. K. Garbrah, H. E. Boyce, J. J. Hyde, H. K. Munson, F. L. Stokes, and F. Edwards taught at various times. In 1914 Lewis listed 45 adherents who had been won in Agona, Assamang, and Ntonso. Shortly after this he was forced to return home because of serious injuries received in a motorcycle accident. Later T. Baker, L. F. Langford, and J. Clifford came to the Gold Coast, and with three African workers, J. K. Garbrah, J.A.B. Davies, and J. A. Bonney, spread the work to Kofiase, Bipoa, and other nearby towns. After World War I Langford was appointed general superintendent for the West African Combined Mission (organized 1918), which included Sierra Leone, Liberia, and the Gold Coast, with headquarters first at Waterloo, Sierra Leone, then at Agona, in the Gold Coast.

In January 1924 H. K. Munson joined the mission personnel. At the suggestion of the chief commissioner of Ashanti, the headquarters were moved from Agona into Kumasi. In 1927 they were returned to Agona. In 1930 the Yearbook lists the Agona Training School, with H. K. Munson as the first principal.

In 1931 J. Clifford, who had gone from the Gold Coast to Nigeria, returned to Agona to lead the Gold Coast Mission. In 1933 the field was reorganized into the Gold Coast Union Mission, with the Gold Coast, the Ivory Coast, Dahomey, Togoland, and Upper Volta as its territory. New headquarters were opened at Bekwai, South Ashanti, with its good rail, road, and postal communications. Under the leadership of F. L. Stokes, a center was opened in new territory at Koforidua, and a church established in the capital city, Accra, the center of the Ga-speaking people. Under T. Fielding and others the work at Agona stretched north to Kwame Danso, and a church and a school were established in Kumasi, the capital of Ashanti. J. B. Tekyi opened the work in the Tekyiman area and C. B. Mensah in the Mampong district. Members from the Gold Coast developed interests in the Ivory Coast in three different centers, and these were visited by J. K. Garbrah, S. B. Essien, and J. Clifford, conducting baptisms and organizing the work. In 1943 the Gold Coast Mission became part of the African West Coast (now West African) Union Mission.

Educational Work. New education laws made it necessary either to train teachers or to close the mission's schools. In 1939 C. A. Bartlett began training teachers to pass their External Teacher's Certificate. In 1945 permission was granted by the Education Department to open a recognized two-year teacher training college at Bekwai, with C. A. Bartlett as principal, which later became a four-year training college. Thus was realized the goal of training SDA young people to develop into missionary teachers and open church schools. From the beginning the students were trained in soul winning, often rising at 4:00 a.m. to conduct evangelistic campaigns in nearby villages. Bekwai Training College was phased out in July 1974 by order of the government.

In 1953 the Bekwai Secondary School was opened, with N. C. Maberly as headmaster. The school, under the leadership of C. Y. Kyereme as headmaster, has expanded and is now offering preuniversity courses in arts and sciences at the sixth-form (junior college) level.

The Asokore-Koforidua Teacher Training College was opened in 1962, with C. Y. Kyereme as the principal. Asokore is now the only SDA teacher training college in Ghana. Another teacher training college was opened in 1963 at Agona, Ashanti, the place where the work in central Ghana began, with L. H. Berlin as principal. In accordance with government policy the school completely converted into the SDA Secondary School, Agona, in September 1974 with I. K. Ansong as headmaster.

The Adventist Girls' Vocational Institute was opened in Techiman, Brong Ahafo region, as a day school by action of the Ghana Conference and the West African Union on Oct. 8, 1974, with Mrs. Emelia Kusi as headmistress. She was followed by Agnes Osei and Victoria Daaku. In the mid-1980s the school's name was changed to Adventist Vocational Institute; directors have included Nabi Donkor, A. P. Mensah, and C. A. Mensah. In October what is now Valley View College opened in Accra with Walton Whaley as principal.

Literature Ministry. After G. P. Riggs had spent a short time selling books in 1895, little was done in colporteur evangelism until A. Cook canvassed in 1933. He conducted a field school in sales expertise for local recruits with whom he worked most of the large towns. Again there was little activity until 1949, when two Jamaicans, L. Davidson and E. L. Brown, were recruited to revive and reestablish the work.

Medical Work. To meet the medical needs of the people, the Kwahu Hospital was established in 1955 by Dr. J. A. Hyde and officially opened on July 28, 1957; later a School of Nursing was begun and a midwifery course was offered. This was nationalized by the government in 1973. During the 1980s and 1990s the Central Ghana Conference established new hospitals and clinics.

Recent History. In 1957 the Gold Coast Mission became the Ghana Mission, and on February 1959 C. B. Mensah (the first national Ghanaian worker to serve thus) was appointed president of the Ghana Mission.

On Dec. 25, 1970, the first Black conference in all Africa was organized at the eleventh constituency meeting, held at Asokore, Koforidua, with J. K. Amoah elected as president. Since that time it has financed its own operations, and its national workers are carrying forward an aggressive program of evangelism.

In 1985 Jacob J. Nortey of Ghana became the president of the Africa-Indian Ocean Division. At the 1990 General Conference session Matthew Bediako, a Ghanaian, became the first full-blooded African to serve the General Conference. He later became a General Conference vice president.

As a result of the Global Mission strategy adopted by the world church in 1990, baptized membership in Ghana in mid-1993 was 155,465.

Gibraltar

GIBRALTAR. A British colony 2.3 square miles (six square kilometers) in area on a peninsula on the southwest coast of Spain at the western entrance to the Mediterranean. The population (1992) of 29,650 is mainly of Italian origin. The majority are Roman Catholics. The languages are English and Spanish.

No regular Seventh-day Adventist work was carried on in Gibraltar until very recently. In 1934 G. F. Jones and his wife, pioneer missionaries in the South Pacific, lived there for a while. In 1993 some organized work had been started and there were seven church members living in that area. Gibraltar is assigned to the Spanish Union of Churches in the Euro-Africa Division.

Giddings, Homer Eli

GIDDINGS, HOMER ELI (1859—1939). Educator. A graduate of Battle Creek College in 1889, he entered educational work in Texas and participated in the development of Oak Hill church school, the nucleus for what later became Southwestern Union College. From 1892 to 1897 he was active in educational and evangelistic work in Missouri, and from 1897 to 1902 headed the Bible Department of Keene Academy. He then served as president of Fernando College, California (1902—1905), and as principal of Gravel Ford Academy, Oregon (1905—1906). He conducted evangelistic and religious liberty work in the Southwestern Union (1906—1908), preached in New Mexico (1908—1909), taught at Amarillo Academy (1909—1911) and at Hamby Academy (1911—1913), served as head of Manson Academy, British Columbia (1913—1915), took a rest for the next two years, and then came back into educational work, teaching in elementary schools in central California (1917—1920). Next he went to Hawaii, where he was principal of the Hawaiian Mission Academy from 1920 to 1924, after which he directed evangelistic work. He retired in 1927.

Giddings, Philip

GIDDINGS, PHILIP (1865—1946). One of the early Seventh-day Adventists in the Caribbean, evangelist, pastor, and missionary. He was a native of British Guiana, and a teacher for many years. He learned about SDAs in 1885 through certain SDA publications that passed through the office of which he was the postal service manager. Having borrowed and studied them, he became convinced of their truthfulness and resigned his position in order to keep the seventh-day Sabbath. In 1891 he went to Battle Creek, where he studied nursing and Bible, graduating from the college in 1895. After that he returned to the Caribbean and served as evangelist and pastor in British Guiana, Dominica, and the French-speaking islands of Martinique, Guadeloupe, and Haiti, where he was associated with the SDA training college. In 1902 he married Louisa Peters, a graduate nurse from the Battle Creek Sanitarium and sister of George Peters, who later became secretary of the General Conference Negro Department.

Giebel, Otto

GIEBEL, OTTO (1886—1936). Evangelist, pastor, and conference leader in Germany. He joined the Seventh-day Adventist Church at the age of 23, attended the Friedensau Missionary Seminary (1910—1911), and in 1911 began preaching in Berlin. After ordination he worked in the Hesse-Westphalian Conference and in 1923 was elected president of the Hansa Conference. In 1927—1928 he devoted a year to SDA work in Holland. From 1928 to 1934, he was president of the Hanover Conference, after which he assumed the presidency of the South Bavarian Conference, where an automobile accident ended his life and service early in 1936.

Giffard Memorial Hospital

GIFFARD MEMORIAL HOSPITAL. A 110-bed general hospital at Nuzvid, Andhra Pradesh, India, about 32 miles (50 kilometers) northeast of Vijayavada with specialized eye and dental services. It is operated by the Central India Union of the Southern Asia Division. The hospital operates a government-accredited School of Nursing and offers a course in medical laboratory technology. It is administered by staff physicians and a medical director. It is situated on 23 acres (nine hectares) of land and has 17 hospital buildings and 35 staff residencies. In 1992 there were 2,000 inpatients and 40,000 outpatients. During that year there were 350 major surgeries, 750 minor surgeries, 400 deliveries, and 1,400 eye surgeries.

The hospital was established in 1925 by a trust agreement concluded between Sree Rajah Sobhanadri Apparao, zamindar of Telaprole, and the India Financial Association of Seventh-day Adventists. Under the terms of the agreement, largely negotiated by T. R. Flaiz, the zamindar turned over to the association control of approximately five acres (two hectares) of land, three uncompleted hospital buildings, and Rs. 10,000 in cash. It was the wish of the donor that the hospital be named after his friend Giffard, an officer of the British India Army.

The hospital was opened on Sept. 15, 1925. A. E. Coyne, M.D., was superintendent; a staff of 12 included a midwife, a compounder (a medical assistant with some training in pharmacy), two dressers, three attendants, two gardeners, a caretaker, a laundryman, and a sweeper. The bed capacity was 21. In 1929 the number of beds was increased by 12, and by 1942 the hospital had 45 beds.

From May 1942 to August 1944 the hospital was inactive because of the evacuation of its overseas personnel, but a dispensary was successfully operated by B. S. Solomon, Y. Daniel, S. Joseph, and A. Grace. The hospital was reopened in August 1944 by Dr. Elizabeth J. Hiscox, and in 1945 a program was launched that resulted in the acquisition of more land, the expansion of the bed capacity to 108, and the establishment of a government-recognized nurse's training school. In 1955 a 20-bed maternity ward, financed largely by a gift from the zamindar of Elamaru, was opened.

From the beginning of the hospital's operation, informal nurse's training had been given, at first by Mrs. Coyne and later by Dr. Emma Hughes. In 1928 the managing committee authorized the setting up of a three-year nurse's training program and a two-year compounding training course, each with prerequisite of eighth-standard education (about second year of high school). Training was begun the next year and continued until 1942. After the reopening of the hospital in 1945, the first recognized higher-grade certificate course in nursing began in 1946. Government recognition by the Madras Nurses and Midwives Council was granted in 1947, but was made retroactive to 1946.

The one-year matriculate-level course in laboratory technology and a midwifery course for nurses was begun in 1952. The laboratory school was upgraded in 1974 and became a two-year course in 1990. The Nursing Council of India integrated the separate six-month midwifery course into a three-year A-grade nursing course in 1988.

The hospital's Community Health Department was started in 1956. Supported by government and voluntary health organizations, it provides five programs to selected villages: home deliveries, nutrition supplementary feeding program, immunization, health education, and family welfare. The Dental Department was added to the hospital in 1974.

In 1980, in partnership with Christffel-Blenden Mission of Germany, the hospital opened an Eye Department, which includes, besides eye treatments and cataract surgeries, comprehensive eye care for target villages and school children.

The hospital has a strong chaplain's program and has worked closely with the Global Mission program that has established more than 40 churches in the Nuzvid area.

He was instrumental in establishing the first academy in Saskatchewan and Rest Haven Sanitarium in British Columbia.

Because of a visual problem he transferred to west Michigan, where it was hoped he could bear a lighter load of responsibility. But his eyesight continued to fail, causing him to give up denominational work.

Gimbie Hospital

GIMBIE HOSPITAL. A 70-bed hospital operated by the Ethiopian Union Mission and situated on the headquarters compound of the West Ethiopia Field in Gimbie, Wollega province, about 300 miles (500 kilometers) west of Addis Ababa, capital of Ethiopia. The hospital usually is staffed by two overseas physicians and four nurses. There are 98 national employees, some of whom are trained as nurses and health assistants.

Although Gimbie is only about 8 degrees north of the equator, its 6,000-foot (1,850-meter) elevation gives it a favorable climate. The town is the largest in that region, and is in the heart of the coffee-growing area of Ethiopia. Although the people are poor, they have a cash income for a few months each year. Most of the peoples of Ethiopia are of Semitic origin; however, there are a few Black tribes in the lower areas near Gimbie. The predominant religions in the country are Islam and Ethiopian Orthodox.

Before the Italian occupation Seventh-day Adventists operated a small clinic in Gimbie under the direction of an Ethiopian national, but the Italians took over the property, and while controlling it built several new buildings on it. After the war the Ethiopian government returned the property, which now had the additional buildings, to the mission. A hospital was opened by Dr. Claude Steen, Jr., in 1947. Shortly thereafter a new clinic was built to meet the increasing need.

The hospital staff supervises several clinics operated by nurses and health assistants. Many of these workers are active in evangelistic work.

Medical Directors: Claude Steen, Jr., 1947—1952; Roland K. Nielsen, 1952—1955; H. F. Sturges, 1955—1958; M. G. Anderson, 1960—1961; K. W. Saunders, 1961—1966; L. R. Zachary, 1967—1969; J. H. Gingoog Sanitarium and Hospital

GINGOOG SANITARIUM AND HOSPITAL (formerly Gingoog Community Hospital). A 30-bed secondary general hospital operated by South Philippine Union Mission in the city of Gingoog in northern Mindanao Island, Philippines. A member of Adventist Health Services-Asia (AHSA), it has a workforce of two staff physicians, three visiting physicians, five nurses, and 15 other regular workers.

On June 7, 1962, the Mindanao Sanitarium and Hospital contracted to take over the operation of the 12-bed medical clinic of Dr. Paterno Primero for seven years. In May 1969 the South Philippine Union Mission committee took an action making it a separate entity from the Mindanao Sanitarium and Hospital. It continued to operate in rented quarters until the end of May 1970, when it transferred to a 12-bed hospital unit on a lot purchased for about $9,600. On Dec. 11, 1972, it moved to its present site.

The hospital changed its name from Gingoog Community Hospital to Gingoog Sanitarium and Hospital on Nov. 5, 1992.

Presidents: A. P. Roda, 1962—1967; W. M. Torres, 1968; G. D. Poblador, 1969—1985; J. J. Postrero, 1985— .

Ginter (Hinter), Johann F.

GINTER (HINTER), JOHANN F. (d. 1919). Minister, administrator. He was born to a German Protestant family in southern Russia at Velikoknyasheskoye, east of the Don River and north of the Caucasus. After becoming a Seventh-day Adventist, he worked as a colporteur, selling publications imported from Switzerland and America in the German colonies in Russia. At the German Union session at Friedensau, in July 1904, he was asked to transfer to the Balkan States. At Bucharest, Romania, he found a group of 16 members. He also worked in Rustchuk, Romania.

In 1907 his wife, who had been baptized in Russia 15 years earlier, died (age 34). Early in 1909, when he was compelled by the authorities to leave the country because the growth of the church was considered a threat to the prosperity of the Greek Orthodox Church, he settled in Bulgaria near the Romanian border.

In the same year, he was sent back to Russia to head the East Russian Mission. In 1910 he headed the Volga Mission. Between 1911 and 1916 he was part-time director of the Ural and Volga missions. At the end of World War I he went to southern Russia as president of the East Russian Union Conference. On Feb. 25, 1919, in Rostov-on-Don, he died of typhus in the postwar famine and epidemic.

Gitwe Adventist Secondary School

GITWE ADVENTIST SECONDARY SCHOOL (Collège Adventiste de Gitwe). A coeducational boarding school in Rwanda, offering six years of secondary training. The school is situated about 10 miles (16 kilometers) north of the town of Nyanza in the central part of Rwanda. The school is operated by a board of managers chosen from the Rwanda Union. The school is situated on a 125-acre (50-hectare) tract of land. Student enrollment has greatly increased over the years, especially from 1991. In 1993 there were approximately 650 students and 26 teachers.

The plant consists of an administration block with five offices and seven classrooms completed in 1971, a unit of nine other classrooms built in 1973, two dormitories accommodating 450 students, a dining hall seating 500, a church with a seating capacity of 800, and several homes for the administrative personnel and teachers.

The school offers scientific training, a teacher-training course, and general high school subjects that are taught according to the curriculum outlined by the Government Education Department, except for Bible. Most of the students are Rwandan, but there are also a number from neighboring Burundi. The language of instruction is French.

The present school was originally formed by the merging of two earlier schools. The Gitwe mission station was established with a primary school in 1921 by D. E. Delhove, formerly a worker in Kenya. In 1931 the school began to train teachers for the Ruanda-Urundi field, with F. M. Robinson as the first principal, who was followed by A. Matter.

Meanwhile, in 1923, in the Katanga province of the Belgian Congo, the Katanga Mission had been established near Elisabethville by A. C. LeButt, with African helpers sent from Nyasaland and Northern Rhodesia (James Malinki and Jonah Kapalasha), who already had begun to erect temporary buildings. In August 1923 W. H. Branson reported a number of African converts of some education in Elisabethville who were waiting to enter a training school at Katanga (African Division Outlook 21, Aug. 15, 1923, p. 1). By Dec. 28, 1924, when B. E. Schaffner arrived to take charge of the school, there were 40 students in school preparing to go out as teachers and evangelists. W. R. Vail was in charge of this school from 1931 to 1935. Beginning in 1931, it appeared in the Statistical Report as the Séminaire Adventiste du Congo.

Realizing that there were more students in Rwanda than in Zaire, the leaders transferred the seminary from Katanga to Gitwe in 1934. The school, however, served the three countries under Belgian colonial rule under the name Adventist Seminary of the Belgian Congo and Ruanda-Urundi. An American missionary named R. L. Jones acted as director of both the school and the mission field from 1934 until 1940. During this time two years of teacher training were established. The first graduation was held in 1936.

From this time on, those who finished their schooling were used in the countries bordering Rwanda as teacher-evangelists. The missionary work was greatly extended throughout Rwanda under the direction of Jones. During the 1940s many students were able to finish the three years of post-primary teacher training. To achieve this goal, the school had to function in the summer.

Much of the time principals of the college served also as directors of the Gitwe Mission, which had a large district and many schools to administer. As a result the actual operation of the training school fell to a large extent upon the headmasters, among whom were W. R. Vail, P. Howe, and E. L. Tarr.

The separation of the school and the mission took place in 1947. This action permitted principals to devote themselves solely to school affairs.

In 1963 A. L. Hands initiated a two-year vernacular ministerial course that A. M. Long took over in 1968, teaching in French. This was discontinued in 1981.

In 1966, under the leadership of M. Graham, a full secondary level consisting of a three-year general course and a scientific section was initiated and completed by the first graduates in 1972. During this six-year period the seminary status was changed into that of an academy, the program outlined by the government was followed, and most of the above-mentioned facilities were finished. However, the diplomas offered to Gitwe graduates were not officially recognized. State recognition occurred in 1976, with retroactive effect from the year before.

In 1981, with the implementation of government education reform, the scientific section and the teacher training course were extended to six years.

Gjording, John Godfred

GJORDING, JOHN GODFRED (1890—1954). Missionary to China, minister, and administrator. He was born in a family of Danish Mormons who soon after his birth migrated to Utah in the United States, where they all joined the Seventh-day Adventist Church. After training at Union College and at Hutchinson Theological Seminary, he went to China in 1915. There he helped to organize SDA work in Manchuria, serving as home missionary secretary, field missionary secretary, and secretary-treasurer (1915—1918). Later he was in charge of the financial and then of the overall management of the Signs of the Times Publishing House in Shanghai (1918—1921). Still later he was director of the East China Union Mission (1922—1928). From China he went to superintend the Malayan Union Mission (1929—1937), and concluded his service by pastoring churches in the Northern California, Florida, Tennessee, Washington, and Oregon conferences.

Glendale Adventist Academy

GLENDALE ADVENTIST ACADEMY. A coeducational day school on the senior high school level (with associated K-9 school) at 700 Kimlin Drive, Glendale, California, serving a constituency of 18 churches under the direction of the Southern California Conference and the Pacific Union Conference. It is accredited by the SDA Board of Regents (1936), the University of California (1947), and the Western Association of Schools and Colleges (1992). During 1992—1993 the enrollment in grades 9—12 was 282.

The forerunner of Glendale Adventist Academy was the one-room Glendale church school with 15 pupils, opened in 1907 in the basement of the gymnasium of the old Glendale Sanitarium on Isabel Street, Glendale. Mrs. B. B. Davis was its first teacher.

In 1908—1909 a one-room building was erected across the street at a cost of $500, and painted green. The next year the green building was moved across the street onto the sanitarium grounds, and enlarged to two rooms. In 1911—1912 grade 9 was added.

In 1916 a new three-room building was erected one block north on the east side of Isabel Street at 234 North Isabel Street, and grade 10 was added; then in 1920 grade 11.

In 1921—1922 the school became a regular 12-grade school, and was named Glendale Academy. Max Hill was its first principal. In that year the school published its first school bulletin, entitled Glendale Annual Announcement, and the first annual, The Stepping Stone; it also graduated its first class, of five members. By 1922—1923 it became urgent to find a new site for the Glendale Academy, with ample room for growth. Yet the church had no funds, and the conference was trying to solve the problem of replacing San Fernando Academy.

When about 40 acres (15 hectares) of land in Sycamore Canyon became available for $37,000, with a required down payment of $10,000, 10 lay members who were interested in the future of the academy, and were willing to take a risk, negotiated a loan by each signing a personal note for $1,000 and thus made the down payment. Then they had the property surveyed for subdividing. The sale of part of the property paid for the development and left 18 acres (seven hectares) higher up, which provided a school site free of debt, although no profit was made on the venture. W. Byron Dart and his workers erected the present building.

In the fall of 1923 Glendale Academy opened on the new site, with Dan Ochs serving as principal. The old green building was moved to the new campus, to serve as the woodwork shop (until 1941), and the grade school building from Isabel Street served as the grade school (until 1945). In 1924 the name was changed to the Glendale Union Academy. In that year the printshop was built, and in 1928—1929 a new two-room building for the seventh and eighth grades. A building to provide the gymnasium, the vocational arts rooms, and the band room was erected in 1941, and a new 10-room grade school in 1945. Then the building that had housed the seventh and eighth grades was moved and enlarged to provide a cafeteria for all grades. The library building, which serves also as the study hall, was built in 1955. During the summer of 1962 a four-classroom building was added to the elementary section.

The year 1967 saw the completion of a shower and locker room facility to meet the needs of grades 7—12. In 1962 the academy began the development of a new campus master plan, which called for the replacement of the original academy building built in 1922. Two new secondary buildings completed in 1971 provide classroom facilities for most of the academic content areas. The remodeling of the library facility into a media center was completed in 1974. In addition, the academy owns seven faculty and staff cottages acquired from 1950 to 1988.

In the period from 1907 to 1992, the one-teacher church school with 15 pupils grew to an enrollment of 489 in grades K-8, and 282 in grades 9—12; and from one teacher to a teaching staff of 21 in grades K-8, and 20 in grades 9—12.

In 1965 “Union” was dropped from the school name.

GLENDALE ADVENTIST MEDICAL CENTER. A 464-bed general hospital and medical center with a medical staff of 500 physicians and more than 2,000 employees, situated on a 32-acre (13-hectare) tract in Glendale, California. It is the largest hospital in Adventist Health System/West. The medical center provides care for 15,000 admissions, 27,000 emergency room visits, and 30,000 home health visits each year. The medical center provides medical education through residency programs in family practice and obstetrics/gynecology and through clinical facilities for several college and university schools of nursing. It is accredited by the Joint Commission for the Accreditation of Health Care Organizations and the Commission on the Accreditation of Rehabilitation Facilities, and is a member of the Hospital Council of Southern California and the California Association of Hospitals and Health Systems.

Specialized centers of excellence include Behavioral Medicine, Cancer Services, Cardiac Services, Outpatient Services, Rehabilitative Medicine, and Women's Services. Through an affiliation with Loma Linda University Medical Center, Glendale Adventist's Center for Cancer Services provides patients access to the areas most powerful linear accelerator, the world's first proton beam accelerator, and other advanced technologies.

Glendale Adventist provides ongoing community outreach programs, including the Health Match physician referral and health education phone line; PhoneFriend, which provides support for latchkey children; ASSIST, which provides transportation, meal and grocery delivery, and other support services on a short-term urgent basis; the GAMC Thrift Shop; Top Dog, a pet therapy program for patients; KidPrint, which provides fingerprint and photo identification for children; and many free and low-cost community education classes.

Glendale Adventist Medical Center was established in August 1905 as Glendale Sanitarium. Early in 1904, under the direction of Ellen White, John Burden and a group of Adventist leaders began to search for a suitable location for a medical institution in southern California. One of two properties under consideration was the Glendale Hotel. This building of 75 rooms, situated eight miles (13 kilometers) north of Los Angeles in the country settlement of Glendale (population 500), had been built for about $60,000 during the California boom of 1880, but had been closed by the subsequent depression before hotel operation was begun. For a time the building was used by an Episcopal girls' school, and later by the Glendale High School. When the Seventh-day Adventist group explained to the owner, L. C. Brand, the purpose of their proposed institution, he reduced the price from $20,000 to $12,500. Accepting this as a sign of divine direction, they made the purchase.

Under the direction of the sanitarium's first medical superintendent, Dr. Abbie Winegar Simpson; the head nurse, Lenora Lacey; and the business manager, J. A. Burden, the hotel was converted into a health center. The sanitarium facilities were meager and equipment and methods primitive, but patients came from far and near. Following treatment, many patients who planned to settle in the area stayed on, making the sanitarium their temporary abode as they looked for a home. Civic organizations convened for meetings and banquets in the sanitarium's dining room, making it a hub of early community life.

A School of Nursing was established in 1905 under the direction of Lenora Lacey. It graduated two students in 1906 and five in 1907. Instrumental in the accreditation of the school in 1911 was the business manager, Harmon W. Lindsay.

Bed capacity was increased to 100 in 1917, and in 1920 a new one-story hospital on an adjacent piece of land provided facilities for medical, maternity, and surgical patients. By 1922, having become more than a treatment center, the institution was named the Glendale Sanitarium and Hospital. In order to serve more patients and to accommodate more complex functions, additional personnel, facilities, and equipment were required, and it became apparent to the conference committee that new quarters would be essential for expansion in a community already grown to 30,000.

Under the direction of Dr. H. G. Westphal, medical superintendent, and C. E. Kimlin, business manager, the second major step was taken in the development of this institution. The downtown sanitarium was sold, and a 30-acre (12-hectare) hill was purchased far out of town, situated between the San Rafael foothills and the Sierra Madres, and surrounded by unimproved land and apricot groves. On the crest a modern five-story building of fireproof construction was erected.

Advertised as offering the famous "Battle Creek treatment," the sanitarium was filled to capacity with advance reservations. Emphasis was placed upon the use of physical therapy, proper diet, and a balance of rest and exercise to restore the body to normal functioning. Available also were modern clinical and metabolic laboratories, operating rooms, X-ray, dental, and eye, ear, nose, and throat facilities, and two large hydrotherapy departments.

The third phase in the development of this institution into a major medical center came in 1955, on the fiftieth anniversary of its founding. An adjoining five-story 125-bed addition was completed. This provided 10 operating room suites, plus maternity, pediatric, and emergency facilities.

In 1961 the hospital entered its fourth phase of development—the construction of a 60-bed mental health center at the east end of the main hospital (opened in July 1963) and a physical medicine and rehabilitation center, with accommodations for 24 bed patients, on the north side. Funds were provided by the community and the institution.

Jan. 1, 1966, Glendale Sanitarium and Hospital officially became Glendale Adventist Hospital. It was the first Seventh-day Adventist institution to use the name "Adventist" in the title to indicate religious affiliation. "Sanitarium" was dropped because the hospital no longer had sanitarium-type beds.

The last nursing class graduated in 1967, and the hospital became the extended campus of Pacific Union College School of Nursing. The Glendale school graduated a total of 1,282 nurses.

The fifth phase of development began with the opening of the diagnostic and treatment center in December 1969. The $3.5 million center housed the clinic, radiology, pathology, pharmacy, and other treatment services. In January 1972 a new critical care center accepted its first patients. Located atop a multilevel parking structure, this addition brought the bed capacity to 452. The next development was a surgery expansion unit, with intensive care and data processing center, opening in October 1972.

The name was changed for the fourth time to Glendale Adventist Medical Center in May 1974. Civic advisory board chair Walter Stolrow explained the change. “The addition of services and educational programs has turned the former ‘sanitarium’ into a comprehensive medical center.”

Construction began in November 1974 on the $24 million replacement for the 52-year-old main building housing 163 medical beds, dietary services, library, administration offices, and other departments. In 1993 the hospital opened the newly constructed Physician’s Medical Terrace, a 70,000-square-foot (6,500-square-meter) medical office building, and a 400-space parking garage that provides medical offices with a direct link to the hospital.

Glenn, William Newton

GLENN, WILLIAM NEWTON (1837—1906). Publishing administrator and editor. He was born and educated in Pennsylvania, but while quite young went to the frontier territories of Kansas and Nebraska, where he kept a general store and learned the printing trade. During the Civil War he joined the Union Army and was stationed in California. After his release he joined the Baptist Church and went into newspaper work in Stockton, working on the Independent and the Herald. Poor health required a period of rest, during which he learned about Seventh-day Adventist beliefs, and he and his wife became members of the church in 1875. In 1876 he joined the staff of the Pacific Press at Oakland, California, and remained there for 30 years until his death, acting successively as proofreader, head of the typeroom, manager, and editor. His name was listed among those on the first editorial committee of Our Little Friend from 1890 to 1893 and as its editor from 1893 to 1901. For some years he was assistant editor of the Signs of the Times (1900—1906). He was chair of the editorial committees of the Apples of Gold Library and the Bible Students' Library (two series of pocket-sized monthly leaflets on gospel themes) and the Sentinel Library (a series of pamphlets on religious liberty issues). His articles on religious liberty appeared also in nondenominational magazines. He authored several tracts and a book, Things Foretold.

Global Mission

GLOBAL MISSION. An initiative to place, before the year 2000, a Seventh-day Adventist presence in every one of 5,234 population segments of 1 million constituting the world's population at the time of the General Conference session in 1990; also to foster growth in areas with established work, reaching unentered municipalities and ethnic and language groups. The idea was launched by N. C. Wilson at the Annual Council held in 1986 at Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, and developed by a committee with world representation for adoption at the 1989 Annual Council and the 1990 session. R. J. Kloosterhuis and C. R. Taylor assisted in the planning stages. M. L. Ryan was called to lead in the implementation, and H. L. Butler to assist in the development of funds through donations.

Because the major challenges lie in the Islamic, Hindu, and Buddhist populations of Asia and North Africa, study is needed to define approach and content, to unlock doors long closed to the gospel. For this purpose B. Schantz, J. Skariah, and C. Maberly were asked to direct study institutes to develop and test strategies for these three main bodies of religiously inclined people. The Center for International Relations was set up to facilitate placement of SDA lay professional people in government or business positions in countries in which the traditional type of missionary cannot obtain entry. The Global Mission Data Book, with input from all levels of organization, provided the point of departure, identifying location and numbers of Seventh-day Adventists in the world, and the 2,300 population segments of 1 million with no SDA members. More than 500 of these segments were involved in some kind of Global Mission activity by mid-1993.

As a secondary objective, the growth of the church in the four divisions with no unentered segments of 1 million is exemplified in the South American Division's targeting the 4,176 unentered municipalities in its territory. Unentered ethnolinguistic and socioeconomic "people groups" are also vivid examples of outreach encompassed under the name of Global Mission. More than 12,000 such targets had been selected and more than 4,000 of them had been entered as part of the program by mid-1993.

God

GOD. The statement concerning the Deity in the Seventh-day Adventist summary of fundamental beliefs (see Doctrinal Statements, SDA) reads as follows: “There is one God: Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, a unity of three co-eternal Persons. God is immortal, all-powerful, all-knowing, above all, and ever present. He is infinite and beyond human comprehension, yet known through His self-revelation. He is forever worthy of worship, adoration, and service by the whole creation. (Deut. 6:4; Matt. 28:19; 2 Cor. 13:14; Eph. 4:4—6; 1 Peter 1:2; 1 Tim. 1:17; Rev. 14:7.)”

“God is a spirit; yet He is a personal being, for man was made in His image. As a personal being, God has revealed Himself in His Son” (Ed 132). He is not an abstract idea or ideal that has existence only in the human mind. He is the reality to whom the idea and the ideal point.

Long ago the question was asked of Job, “Canst thou by searching find out God? canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection?” (Job 11:7). Finite wisdom and ingenuity are inadequate to comprehend an infinite God. Only to the extent that He reveals and self-authenticates Himself can we know Him. But we can properly say that we “know” Him in the incarnate Christ, for “God was in Christ” (2 Cor. 5:19), the Eternal Word made flesh.

One of the basic character traits of God is love, in the ultimate NT sense of the Greek word agapē, or infinite care and concern for the happiness and well-being of created beings. The supreme demonstration of this love is seen in the mission of God the Son to this world (John 3:16). God’s love is not static, nor is it in any way influenced adversely by the reaction of created beings to it. When God loves He is being Himself, for “God is love” (1 John 4:8).

God is self-existent. All other life is from Him, as a gift. No creature has life apart from Him. It is in Him that “we live, and move, and have our being” (Acts 17:28). He gives all, and can receive nothing that He has not first given.

God is immutable. He never changes, or differs from Himself. He is perfect. He is not subject to changing moods or attitudes. His affection is constant, His love is sure. He is not coaxed into action. “I am the Lord, I change not” (Mal. 3:6).

God is omniscient. His knowledge is complete and perfect. It is impossible for Him to add to His knowledge, inasmuch as all knowledge originated with Him. He knows what was, what is, and what will be.

God is omnipresent. “The eyes of the Lord are in every place, beholding the evil and the good” (Prov. 15:3). There is no place to which a person can flee to escape from God’s presence. God is ever near. See Ps. 139.

God is omnipotent. “Power belongeth unto God” (Ps. 62:11). He is sovereign ruler over all. His power is absolute and infinite. Nevertheless, God has bestowed upon created beings the power of choice with respect to their own destiny. God’s infinite power, ever controlled by His infinite love and wisdom, is never used for selfish ends. His power is fully revealed in the change that takes place in the hearts and lives of individuals, transforming them from sinners into saints.

God is faithful. God cannot be unfaithful, because He is immutable. “Know therefore that the Lord thy God, he is God, the faithful God, which keepeth covenant and mercy with them that love him” (Deut. 7:9). He cannot cease to be what He is, and He is always consistent with Himself. Human beings become unfaithful as a result of selfish desire, fear, weakness, or loss of concern. But these traits are alien to the divine character.

God is holy. In being holy, God does not conform to a standard, for He is that standard. “Be ye holy; for I am holy” (1 Peter 1:16). The holiness that God demands of created beings is not the absolute holiness of Deity, which God Himself alone possesses. It is a relative holiness that He waits to impart to His creatures in their preparation for heaven. God alone can be absolutely holy, for He alone has an infinite comprehension of absolute perfection of character. “I am God, and not man; the Holy One” (Hosea 11:9).

The holiness that God expects of created beings is commensurate with what He has revealed to them and with their capacity to comprehend what has been revealed. Furthermore, divine grace provides that in Christ the sincere, repentant sinner may have access to the perfect holiness of Christ and to divine power that will enable him or her to overcome imperfections of character. See Christology; Holy Spirit.

Golden Gate Academy

GOLDEN GATE ACADEMY. A coeducational day school instructing in grades 1—12 and serving the eastern Bay Area, operated by the Northern California Conference on a wooded 15-acre (six-hectare) site in the East Oakland hills (3800 Mountain Boulevard, Oakland, California). The school is accredited by the SDA Board of Regents, the University of California, and the Western Association of Schools.

The school opened in 1923 under the direction of A. C. Nelson and a staff of nine teachers, in a former public school unit in Berkeley, purchased by the Northern California Conference. The main building contained classrooms, offices, a cafeteria, and a library. In addition, there was a chapel and a two-story industrial building. Principal Nelson's administration (1923—1929) saw the growth of graduating classes from six to 16, the establishment of a printing press, and the adoption of girls' uniforms of blue skirts and white middie blouses with blue collars (the girls' uniform was abolished in 1944).

By 1929 all debts were paid, and despite increased financial problems during the Depression, by 1932 Golden Gate Academy had been accredited by the University of California. By 1937 the library contained 5,000 volumes, an increase of 2,000 since 1929. The year 1938 set a new record, with 23 students in the graduating class. During the next few years students led in campaigns for a new gymnasium, the paving of the schoolyard, and the addition of a new stove to the cafeteria (which, in 1940, advertised a "very simple yet nourishing meal for 11 cents"). In 1941 the yearbook, Anchor, was launched. The present Golden Cable was begun in 1948, after several short-lived school newspapers. Because of the exigencies brought on by World War II, beginning in 1942 every student was expected to take medical cadet training. The 1946 Anchor listed 87 former students who had served in the armed forces, including three who had given their lives.

To meet the needs of the growing school, the present site in Oakland was purchased in 1946. The new academy buildings were under construction in the fall of 1948 and opened in 1949. Students showed their enthusiasm by fund-raising activities. The academy section consisted of six classrooms (enlarged to eight in the 1950s), library, and administrative offices; a separate elementary section contained six classrooms (enlarged to eight in the 1950s). Another two-story building provided a gymnasium, cafeteria, shop, and temporary chapel for both academy and elementary use.

From 1950 to 1952 finishing work was continued on several buildings. Landscaping was undertaken, and a home was built for the principal. In 1963 two additional faculty homes were purchased and moved onto the campus, and the printshop was expanded. In 1965 a new chapel was completed. The Goldenaires, a choral group, and the present academy band were organized in 1954. Plans to improve the plant began in 1973, with each constituent church and the Northern California Conference joining their resources to repave the parking lot, reroof the gymnasium, replace gutters and downspouts, plan and install effective drainage, replace ceilings in 16 classrooms and the library, and make general improvements. The 1992—1993 enrollment was 34 in the academy and 130 in the elementary school. The faculty numbered seven for the academy and six for the elementary school; the staff numbered four.

Gontar, A. E.

GONTAR, A. E. (c. 1857—1933). One of the early Russian Seventh-day Adventists and a pioneer of the Advent message among his people, first as a colporteur, later as a minister. Beginning in 1893 he served as church elder in various churches in the Ukraine. In 1907 he worked in Kiev, the capital of the Ukraine. On a number of occasions he was arrested for his activities and sentenced to prison. From 1907 to 1911 he worked in the East Russian Mission and afterward, until World War I, in the Little Russian Mission. He spent the war years in exile in Siberia, as did a number of other SDA preachers. After the revolution he worked in the East Ukrainian Conference. About 1924 he retired and settled in the city of Melitopol in southern Russia, where he served the local church. On May 13, 1933, four days before his death, he preached his last sermon to the church. Returning home on May 17, he called the brethren and his family to his bedside and admonished them to remain true to the Bible truth and to continue to show sinners the way to Christ.

Gonzalez, Gonzalo

GONZALEZ, GONZALO (1909—1957). Blind minister in Costa Rica; one of the first Costa Ricans ordained to the Seventh-day Adventist ministry. He was a carpenter before he lost his sight in an accident. While in deep discouragement over his affliction, even to the point of attempting suicide, he was invited by an SDA friend to attend meetings at the friend's church, which he joined in 1933. In order to support his family he began to sell El Centinela (an evangelistic journal in Spanish). Later, moved by a zeal to spread SDA teachings, he worked as a Bible instructor, memorizing the texts of his studies. In 1952 he was ordained, and until his death he pastored churches in Costa Rica.

Good Health

GOOD HEALTH (1866—1953; 1866—1878, as Health Reformer; 1912—1914, as Good Health Magazine; monthly; Good Health Publishing Co., Battle Creek, Michigan). The first Seventh-day Adventist-sponsored popular journal devoted to health education. It was lost to the denomination with the separation of Dr. J. H. Kellogg from the church. It was last listed in the Yearbook in 1906.

Good Hope High School

GOOD HOPE HIGH SCHOOL. A coeducational day and boarding school on the high school level, operated by the Good Hope Conference to meet the educational needs of the Good Hope Conference constituency. It is situated on a 139-acre (55-hectare) tract of land at Kuils River, about 15 miles (25 kilometers) from Cape Town. In 1974, when it was a junior college, there was an enrollment of 192 in the primary school, 235 in the high school, and 20 in the college, with a teaching staff of 25.

Good Hope College developed from a church school opened in 1929 at the Salt River church, with Adeline V. Sutherland as principal. The school was moved in 1930 to a newly purchased six-acre (2.5-hectare) farm at Athlone, Cape, and became a training school. During the following 30 years it developed into a full high school, which also offered theological and normal training. By 1932 secondary work was being offered, and college work in 1956. During the years the school has provided many workers for the Good Hope Conference. When the campus lost its rural character, a new tract of 169 acres (70 hectares) was bought at Kuils River. In 1963 the high school and college departments moved to the new site, leaving on the campus a seven-grade elementary school. In that year there was an enrollment of 86 in the high school and two in the college, with a teaching staff of 11.

In 1963 the physical plant consisted of a two-story dormitory for 40 students, a dining room and kitchen unit, a small laundry, and the first section of the administration building. Students worked at raising vegetables, flowers, fruit, and chickens, and cared for a herd of Jersey cows. In 1965 the second section of the administration building was completed, providing accommodation for the high school teaching program, and in 1969 the Cyril Bender Hall was opened to provide a library and classrooms for the college teaching. Other developments have included the erection of a school hall seating 1,800 in 1970, a science block in 1972, and a men's industrial unit in 1974. In 1969 the young women transferred from the old dormitory, in which both sexes had been accommodated, to a new two-story building of their own, thus increasing the overall dormitory accommodation by a further 40 students.

Most students commute by train or bus from all parts of the Cape Peninsula. High school students sit for public examinations on completing grade 12. In 1992 a new swimming pool was opened. In 1993 the enrollment was 197 in the high school, with 67 living in the dormitory. There were 16 teachers, four administrative assistants, and six on the support staff.

GOODRICH, HIRAM CARLETON (1849—1933). Missionary to Central America. He was the son of a Baptist minister, and was instructed in Seventh-day Adventist beliefs in the home of his future wife. He was baptized in 1870. He attended Battle Creek College in 1873, married Anna Elizabeth Hafer in 1874, and in 1887 began his service for the church as tract and missionary director in Michigan. In 1892 he was licensed to preach, and in 1894 was ordained to the ministry. In 1900 he went to Central America as superintendent of the Central American Mission, with headquarters in the Bay Islands. From 1902 to 1907 he was in charge of work in Spanish and British Honduras, and from 1907 until 1914 he was president of West Caribbean Conference. When he became too old to carry the responsibilities of executive work, he settled on the Isle of Pines and carried on missionary work until 1929, when he retired to Nashville, Tennessee.

Gopalganj Hospital

GOPALGANJ HOSPITAL. A former medical institution of the Bangladesh Union Section at Gopalganj, in the Delta of the Ganges River. Dispensary work operated by evangelists and national nurses began in 1905 or 1906 and continued to 1929 when a physician, C. F. Schilling, took charge of the work. Two years later he moved the medical work to Jalirpar, 19 miles (30 kilometers) away. He was succeeded by H. G. Hebard, followed by J. Johannes, who moved the work back to Gopalganj in 1939 and built a 20-bed hospital there. Because of the war, in 1942 the hospital was closed and the dispensary was cared for by a national staff (among them S. N. Arinda, C. R. Bol, and A. C. Bol).

A woman physician, M. R. Young, repaired and reequipped the hospital during 1961 and 1962. The dispensary work was continued into 1963 by Harold Googe. Then L. N. Powrie continued until the arrival of another woman physician, F. P. Noecker, in December 1967. This period saw improvements in buildings and equipment and a limited medical launch work started with the 39-foot (12-meter) M.L. Adventist, which was ready for service in 1965. After 10 months Noecker's work was cut short by illness. Powrie continued the dispensary with the assistance of a national staff until another physician, J. Van Blaricum, arrived in 1970. He served one year, improving the hospital facility and rebuilding its reputation. Because of unsettled conditions during the independence movement of 1971, the hospital was again closed, but the dispensary was continued by Powrie and then maintained by the national staff until the arrival of a Filipino physician, F. D. Solivio, who revitalized the hospital early in 1973. He was soon joined by another physician, A. Osario. The nursing staff was augmented by Bengali nurses from Karachi early in 1974.

Because of rapid development, it was decided to expand the facility to 50 beds. As a first stage in this plan a 30-bed wing was completed in 1974. Because the medical launch work could not be maintained, the M.L. Adventist was sold in 1973, and in its place three village dispensaries were in operation.

The hospital averaged an almost 100 percent bed occupancy. Up to 150 patients were seen in the outpatient clinic daily. The hospital provided the best medical and surgical facilities for more than 3 million people living within a 50-mile (80-kilometer) radius. It was closed in the mid-1980s.

Gordon Hospital

GORDON HOSPITAL. A 65-bed health-care facility in Calhoun, Georgia, operated by Adventist Health System/Sunbelt Health Care Corporation, Orlando, Florida.

After World War I, Gordon County had one physician, Zebulon V. Johnston. Wilbur D. Hall joined him in 1935, and within months they opened a small hospital, which they shared with a drugstore and the Atlanta Gas Company. Patients were transported by a hand-operated elevator between the operating room on the second floor and patient rooms on the third floor. Office visits were $1, home visits $3, a bed in the ward—including everything from meals to medicines—was $3, and a private room $5.

A new county hospital was built in 1953. It was replaced in 1979 by the present 65-bed facility on Red Bud Road. In 1981 Adventist Health System/Sunbelt Health Care Corporation entered into a lease/purchase contract with Gordon County to operate the hospital. It exercised its purchase option in 1993.

The medical staff of 45 represents a wide range of specialties. The hospital provides such sophisticated services as computerized tomography (CT) scanning, lithotripsy, cardiac catheterization, and magnetic resonance imaging (MRI).

The Gordon Hospital Foundation Board established a $125,000 scholarship fund in 1990 for students pursuing nursing and allied health careers. By 1993 it had awarded 17 scholarships.

Gorle, Ruth Thomas

GORLE, RUTH THOMAS (1899—1971). Educator. Born in Rhodesia of pioneer stock, she learned the Ndebele language while young and became well acquainted with the customs of the local people. This was to stand her in good stead in later years.

In 1924 she was married to Robert Vaughan Gorle, and the young couple moved to Salisbury. Through the efforts of a student colporteur, Ernest Marter, and an evangelist, Arthur Ingle, Ruth and her husband accepted the Seventh-day Adventist truth and became charter members of the Salisbury church. Immediately they began to press for a church school, and for a while the Gorles paid the teacher's salary themselves.

Widowed in 1937, Ruth took her family of three young children to Helderberg College, where she worked her way through school and thus obtained the professional training needed to support the family. After receiving a master's degree she taught in the English Department of the college and served as librarian for eight years. In 1957 she accepted a call to Solusi College, where she was responsible for laying the foundation for the college program.

For more than 30 years Ruth was closely connected with the college training program in the Trans-Africa Division, and the majority of the national workers of the division passed either through her classroom or under her sphere of influence.

Goshen Adventist Secondary School

GOSHEN ADVENTIST SECONDARY SCHOOL (Sekolah Menengah Advent Goshen). A coeducation boarding school operated by the Sabah Mission. It is located about 100 miles (160 kilometers) north of Kota Kinabalu, the capital of Sabah, Malaysia. As a result of the pioneering work of J. T. Pohan and the northward “migration” of Adventists led by Salag Gaban from mid-Sabah to the Marudu Bay area, the number of church members mushroomed at the newly named village of Goshen (after the biblical Israelite province in Egypt) in the early 1950s. The need arose for the opening of the one-teacher Goshen Church School in 1952, with Mandatang Gaban as its first teacher.

In 1969 the name Goshen Adventist Secondary School was adopted when it began offering lower secondary classes. It produced its first form 3 (Lower Certificate of Education) graduates in 1971. In 1980 it was upgraded to offer form 4 classes and by the following year produced its first form 5 graduates. In 1992 the school was upgraded again to offer form 6 classes, thus becoming a full-fledged high school, preparing matriculation students for university candidacy, while at the same time operating kindergarten and elementary sections under the same administration. The total enrollment in 1993 was 350.

Goshen started with the English medium of instruction but had to switch to the Bahasa Malaysia medium in 1976. It remains a church school today by virtue of the fact that its students are comprised predominantly of Seventh-day Adventist members and children of church members. About one fourth of the present workers and teachers of the Sabah Mission are graduates or former students of the school.

Principals: Mandatang Gaban, 1952—1955; Leopold Peter, 1956—1958; G. Y. Dizon, 1959—1965; Mary Mun, 1966—1967; Joseph Thia, 1969—1971; Miun Lundoh, 1972—1975; Nelton Bingku, 1976—1981; James Lai, 1982—1984; Nelton Bingku, 1985—1991; Daniel Bagah, 1992— .

Gospel Herald [1]

GOSPEL HERALD [1] (1898—1903; monthly, at first irregular, afterward weekly; Gospel Herald Publishing Company, later SPA; absorbed by These Times, 1903; files in White Publications). At first the organ of the Southern Missionary Society, promoting and reporting missionary work among the Black people in the South. It began as a private project, edited and printed by J. E. White (the first nine issues on board his mission boat Morning Star) at Yazoo City, Mississippi, then at Battle Creek, Michigan. Beginning with the first number of volume 4, January 1901, the paper was issued in Nashville, Tennessee, where White had moved his Gospel Herald Publishing Company. Under a new policy it became an evangelistic journal for the Southern states, carrying general religious articles. The reports of the Black mission work were continued for a time in a separate supplement, optional to subscribers. In the spring of that year its publication was taken over by the Southern Publishing Association (SPA), newly formed in Nashville by the merger of J. E. White's Herald Publishing Company and the Atlanta branch of the Review and Herald Publishing Association. Then in 1903 the Gospel Herald was suspended after five numbers and absorbed by the SPA's Southern Watchman (later These Times); it should not be confused with a second journal called the Gospel Herald (see Gospel Herald [2]).

Gospel Herald [2]

GOSPEL HERALD [2] (1904—1923; monthly; five preliminary undated issues in 1903, and volume 1, 1904, as Southern Missionary; published by Southern Missionary Society, later North American Negro Department; irregularities in numbering of volumes; files in White Publications).

The second organ of the Southern Missionary Society, launched in Nashville, Tennessee, by J. E. White for the purpose of reporting and promoting the Black mission work in the South—after the original Gospel Herald (see [Gospel Herald \[1\]](#)) had been changed to a church paper for the Southern Union Conference. This second journal, called the Southern Missionary in volume 1, resumed with volume 2 the old title left unused after the merger of the original Gospel Herald with the Southern Watchman (later These Times). In 1910 this second Gospel Herald became the organ of the newly formed Negro Department (later the North American Regional Department) of the General Conference, and the printing was taken over by the press of Oakwood College, Huntsville, Alabama. From then on it became primarily a news journal for the Black churches in North America—the function later performed by the North American Informant.

Editors: James E. White, 1904—1910; A. J. Haysmer, 1910—1913; T. A. Jeys, 1913—1917; W. L. Bird, 1917—1923; J. A. Tucker, 1923 (August-October).

Gospel Sickle, The

GOSPEL SICKLE, THE (1886—1888; semimonthly; RH on behalf of the International Missionary Society; files in GC). A missionary paper “to be used in ship and city missions, in distributors, and wherever a small paper will best serve the wants of the cause” (minutes of the International Tract Society, Dec. 6, 1885). In its first issue, Feb. 1, 1886, the president of the General Conference, George I. Butler, wrote: “The Gospel Sickle is designed for sharp work. We intend it shall bristle all over with the pointed truths of the last message. . . . We want this journal to be blazing hot with truth.”

The Gospel Sickle appeared in a setting of vigorous debate in the church over the interpretation of “law” in Galatians. On Feb. 18, 1887, Ellen White wrote [to A. T. Jones and E. J. Waggoner]: “A pain comes to my heart every time I see the Sickle. . . . If there is a difference upon any parts of the understanding of some particular passage of Scripture, then do not be with pen or voice making your differences apparent and making a breach when there is no need of this” (Letter 37, 1887; quoted in Counsels to Writers and Editors, pp. 78, 79).

The Sickle ceased publication with volume 3, no. 24, dated Dec. 15, 1888, because of a considerable decline in circulation.

Editorial Committee: Uriah Smith, George I. Butler, W. H. Littlejohn, D. M. Canright, R. F. Cottrell, 1886—1888.

Grace

GRACE. God's free favor exercised toward undeserving sinners. It is entirely spontaneous on His part and not conditioned on human merit (John 3:16; Eph. 1:3—11). It is an expression of the redeeming, loving attitude of God. In exercising grace, God gives before He requires. The exercise of saving grace results in forgiveness, pardon, justification, and sanctification. From a human point of view the most remarkable quality of God is His infinite patience and unchangeable love for sinners in spite of their unfaithfulness and rebellion (Eph. 2:8).

Human beings are saved wholly by grace, which comes to them as a free gift from God. Salvation is by grace alone, to the entire exclusion of human merit, power, or wisdom. Grace is largely a NT word. The OT has no precise equivalent for the NT word, yet everywhere the OT reflects the grace of God in His dealings with sinners. People in the OT times were saved by grace as surely as they were in NT times.

Redeeming grace is possible only in and through the work of Christ (Rom. 3:24; 5:20, 21). God could not forgive sinners apart from the saving work of Christ. The supreme expression of grace is what God did in and through Christ. Grace is unlimited; it embraces all humanity; it is for all persons (1 Tim. 2:4; Titus 2:11; 2 Peter 3:9). Nevertheless, people can resist God's grace as they do the influence of the Holy Spirit. To be saved by grace is to be saved wholly from within the heart of God.

“Grace is God's hand extended to miserable sinners. Faith is the sinner's hand stretched up to clasp the offered hand of God” (H. W. Lowe, in Review and Herald 130:6, Sept. 3, 1953).

“God's grace extends mercy to those who do not deserve mercy, and He adopts into His family those who do not belong there by natural birth” (W.G.C. Murdoch, in Review and Herald 137:7, Apr. 21, 1960).

Graf, Huldreich F.

GRAF, HULDREICH F. (1855—1946). Evangelist, missionary. He was born in Germany and died in Brazil. In 1869 he came with his parents to the United States and settled on a farm near Good Thunder, Minnesota. There with other members of the family he became a member of the Seventh-day Adventist Church. In 1889 he entered the ministry in the Minnesota Conference, and in 1891 he was ordained. He taught Bible in the German language in Union College from 1893 to 1895.

In 1895 he was sent by the General Conference to Brazil, where he engaged in evangelistic work (1895—1903) and served as president of the Brazilian Mission (1902—1905). Upon the organization of the South American Union in 1906 he became president of the Rio Grande do Sul Conference. During his 12 years in Brazil he baptized more than 1,400 converts and organized more than a score of churches. With extremely limited means he started several schools that finally developed into the SDA college near São Paulo. He was also instrumental in establishing the first SDA publishing house in Brazil.

In 1907 he returned to the United States and worked in Minnesota (1907—1908), Ohio, central California, and Wisconsin. He retired about 1915 and returned to Brazil to be near some of his children.

Graf, Julius J.

GRAF, JULIUS J. (1851—1927). Minister. He was born in Posen, Germany, and came to the United States at the age of 19 and settled in Good Thunder, Minnesota. He became a Seventh-day Adventist in 1884 as a result of the work of W. B. Hill. When a church was organized in Good Thunder, he was chosen to be its first elder. He spent most of his time working among the German-speaking people in the Northern and Central Union conferences and established a number of churches. He was the father of Otto J. Graf and Alma Graf, both of whom made significant contributions in SDA educational institutions.

Graf, Otto Julius

He served for one year as educational secretary of the Northern Union Conference, and one year as history teacher at Union College. From 1908 to 1917 he was president of Emmanuel Missionary College and exerted upon the college a molding influence. Because of illhealth he retired permanently in 1918.

Graham, Edith M.

GRAHAM, EDITH M. (d. 1918). Treasurer, administrator. She accepted the Seventh-day Adventist faith during a voyage from England to New Zealand. In 1895 she became treasurer of the Australian Conference and its tract society, later of the Australasian Union Conference. In 1913 she attended the General Conference in the United States and remained to take charge of the home missionary branch of the Publishing Department of the General Conference (later organized as the Home Missionary Department).

Graham, Sylvester

GRAHAM, SYLVESTER (1794—1851). Presbyterian minister, health reformer, and lecturer on temperance and dietetics who advocated vegetarian diet and introduced into general use graham bread, made of coarse wheat flour. He studied at Amherst College and was ordained to the ministry in the Presbyterian Church. Ellen White made references to his bread and whole-wheat flour in her works. See Health Principles.

Grainger, W. C.

GRAINGER, W. C. (1844—1899). First American Seventh-day Adventist missionary to Japan, minister, teacher, and college president. A convert of Abram La Rue in California in the 1870s, soon after conversion he conducted evangelistic meetings in that state. He later taught in, and was president of, Healdsburg College. In 1896 he was asked by the Foreign Mission Board to open SDA mission work in Japan. Accompanied by a former student of his of Japanese descent, T. H. Okohira, he went to Tokyo and began work among the young people, mainly university students, by giving them English lessons, using the Bible as a text. In 1899 he started the monthly Owari no Fukuin (“The Gospel for the Last Days”), the first SDA Japanese language periodical.

Grand Ledge Academy

GRAND LEDGE ACADEMY. A coeducational day school that was located on the large Michigan Conference campground 10 miles (16 kilometers) west of Lansing near the intersection of State Highways 43 and 100.

The school opened in September 1958, with 88 students, to fill the need for a boarding academy for 10 counties in southwestern Michigan, which were being served by two day academies, Emmanuel Missionary College Academy and Battle Creek Academy. G. E. Hutches, then president of the Michigan Conference, led in its establishment. No new buildings were erected for the operation of the school, although camp meeting buildings were remodeled extensively to provide proper facilities. A craft shop was also opened to provide labor for the students. By 1973 it was producing nearly $1 million in sales yearly. On Sunday morning, Oct. 1, 1967, the wooden girls' dormitory was completely gutted by fire while the students were away on a weekend camping trip. At a full constituency meeting in Battle Creek, Feb. 25, 1968, it was voted to close the school as a conference-sponsored boarding academy. However, the 13 churches of the Lansing district accepted the responsibility to continue to operate it as a day school. In May 1970 a conference-built gymnasium-auditorium was completed to meet educational and camp meeting needs. It was the first new building constructed for the school.

A full program for grades 9—12 was offered from the opening of the school in September 1958. Course offerings were divided in 1963—1964 into two curricula: a college preparatory course and a general course, with separate diplomas.

It ceased operating as a boarding academy in the spring of 1968. The local churches ran it as a day academy until 1982. In 1982 it was consolidated with the Lansing school. The last secondary graduation was held in 1985, with two students graduating. From 1985 to 1989 it was operated as a 10-grade school. The buildings were sold along with the sale of the Grand Ledge campgrounds in 1989.

Granose Foods Limited

GRANOSE FOODS LIMITED (British Health Food Factory). A health food factory situated in Stanborough Park, Watford, Hertfordshire, England, manufacturing several varieties of vegetarian protein foods and breakfast cereal biscuits, one of the latter being called Sunny Bisk. The Seventh-day Adventist health food work in Great Britain was begun by a group of laypersons who, under the name London Health Food Company, purchased health foods from Dr. J. H. Kellogg, of Battle Creek, Michigan, and distributed them to the public. After a few years SDA leaders in Great Britain sent J. Heide, a master baker, to Battle Creek to learn how to make the foods. In 1899 a manufacturing company was formed under the name International Health Association Limited; it was changed in 1926 to Granose Foods Limited. The company purchased a flour mill in Salford, near Redhill, Surrey, to serve as the factory. Disused plant equipment obtained from Battle Creek, together with machinery purchased in Great Britain, formed the nucleus from which the present business has grown. W. T. Bartlett was the first manager and secretary, and A. Rodd was the first factory superintendent.

Before electricity was available, candles were often used, a practice that led to a fire that burned the factory to the ground in 1900. Health foods were again temporarily imported from the United States, but gifts and loans from SDAs reestablished the company, in Birmingham.

In 1907 all Seventh-day Adventist institutions in England, including the food factory, were centralized at Stanborough Park, Watford. In July 1986 a decision was taken to erect a purpose-built factory at Newport Pagnell on a site some 30 miles (50 kilometers) north of Watford. Trading began from the new site in January 1989. The business was sold in January 1991.

Grant, Miles

GRANT, MILES (1819—1911). An Advent Christian minister and evangelist, editor of the World's Crisis, 1856—1876. In 1871, when he was in California, Seventh-day Adventists helped to sponsor his meetings since he preached conditional immortality and views on the prophecies somewhat similar to theirs, but the cooperative venture proved unsuccessful. Later Grant became an active opponent of Seventh-day Adventists. Ellen White encountered his opposition when she was in the Waldensian country of northern Italy, about the end of 1885.

Grão Pará Adventist Academy

GRÃO PARÁ ADVENTIST ACADEMY (Instituto Grão Pará). A coeducational day school, which originally was conducted on the junior high school level except for the curso comercial (“commercial course”), which was on the senior high school level. It is situated in Marco, a suburb of Belém, capital of the state of Pará, Brazil. It is owned by the North Brazil Union Mission and operated by a board of 11 members, which includes representatives from each of the conferences and missions that comprise the union. The school year runs from February to December, with a month’s vacation in July.

In 1954 H. E. Walker, educational secretary for the union, seeing the need for a secondary school in the Amazon region, with the support of W. J. Streithorst, union president, laid plans for a day school, which was to serve as a pilot project for a boarding academy to be built later. Construction began in 1960, and the inauguration ceremony was held Feb. 21, 1961, attended by government officials. The representative of the federal Ministry of Education, who was present, commended Pará Academy for being the first educational institution opened in Belém that conformed from its beginning to the government building code for such schools. The school facilities consist of eight large classrooms, a library, a science laboratory, an applied arts room, a teachers’ room, and three administrative offices. These are situated on a plot of land near the starting point of the Belém-Brasília Highway.

Classes began Feb. 23, 1961, with 411 enrolled in the academy. Two years later a gymnasium with a seating capacity of 3,000 was constructed. The school was upgraded to full secondary in 1974 and was served by a staff of 13. In 1993 there were 68 teachers serving 1,844 students.

Great Britain and Northern Ireland

GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND. The United Kingdom, including England, Scotland, Wales, and Northern Ireland, also the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man, covering an area of about 94,000 square miles (243,500 square kilometers), with a population (1994) of 58 million.

Historical Background

Historical Background. Britain was invaded by Julius Caesar in 55 B.C. In A.D. 43 it was made a Roman province under Claudius. Julius Agricola, the general who pushed the Roman frontier as far north as Scotland, erected a series of fortresses across the country from the Firth of Forth to the Firth of Clyde. The emperor Hadrian (A.D. 117—138) built a wall from the Tyne to the Solway Firth, much of which remains today. Constantine was saluted by his troops as emperor in York in A.D. 306. After the Roman occupation ended, a century later, the country was successively raided and peopled from the Continent by Angles, Jutes, Saxons, Danes, and Normans.

Christianity was well established in Britain by the middle of the fifth century, but almost disappeared with the arrival of the pagan peoples from the coast of Europe. Roman Catholic Christianity, brought by Augustine and other monks, became dominant in Britain in the seventh century. In the middle of the sixteenth century, England and Scotland rejected the authority of the pope, and thereafter became strongholds of Protestantism. However, Ireland remained solidly Catholic except for the northern counties, which became predominantly Protestant in population after the British government in the seventeenth century sent in large numbers of Scottish and English settlers.

The Established Church of England is Episcopal, that of Scotland, Presbyterian, but various other denominations flourish, independently of state support. The majority in Northern Ireland are Presbyterian and Anglican.

In two respects Seventh-day Adventists may find forerunners in earlier British religious movements. From the Seventh Day Baptists of England went emigrants to New England in the sixteenth century. It was a New England Seventh Day Baptist who in 1844 introduced the observance of the Sabbath to a group of Adventists who later became part of the nucleus of the developing Seventh-day Adventist Church. The other forerunners were expositors of prophecy who anticipated certain points of prophetic interpretation taught by Seventh-day Adventists, although they differed from the American SDAs and had no direct connection with them. These were early nineteenth-century premillennialists, among various denominations in various parts of the United Kingdom, who proclaimed the Second Advent as near. For example, writers in England, Scotland, and Ireland had set forth 1843 or 1844 as the end of the 2300 days (of Dan. 8:14) before William Miller published his views in 1836. They and the Millerites participated in a widespread international awakening of interest in the Second Advent. See Premillennialism.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings in England. The first SDA worker in England was William Ings, a native of Hampshire, who had lived in the United States and had worked for the Review and Herald. Returning to England by way of Basel, Switzerland, and arriving on May 23, 1878, at Southampton, he began distributing tracts from door to door and selling magazines. After a brief stay he went to Switzerland but returned a short time later and within four months reported 10 persons keeping the seventh-day Sabbath. In response to his appeal for help, J. N. Loughborough and his wife were sent from the United States in December 1878. Loughborough held meetings in Shirley Hall and later preached to groups of interested persons in a house called Ravenswood, which was procured to provide a meeting room and living quarters.

Seeing the importance of building a strong base in Britain, the General Conference made an appeal in the Review and Herald for $100,000, with which to support and advance the work in that and other British countries. In April 1879 Maud Sisley, who had been in Switzerland, came to assist Loughborough in his evangelistic work as Bible instructor and colporteur. By this time a Sabbath school of 17 members was organized in Southampton. That summer Loughborough preached in a tent that he had pitched on a convenient lot in the city. Impelled by curiosity, many came to listen, but were slow to accept the message preached by the American evangelist. Briefly that same summer J. N. Andrews assisted Loughborough. A national Tract and Missionary Society was organized on Feb. 5, 1880, and 1,000 copies of the Signs of the Times were distributed during the year. On Feb. 8, 1880, Loughborough baptized six converts in the first Seventh-day Adventist baptismal service in England.

In 1882 Adelbert A. John began to work in Great Grimsby, a seaport town in Lincolnshire. In 1884 a small printing plant was set up in this town, which became the headquarters in the north. In Ulceby (a country village about 10 miles [16 kilometers] northwest of Grimsby) and in Southampton church buildings were provided in 1888.

When Loughborough returned to England from the General Conference session of 1881, he was accompanied by a group of workers, including George R. Drew, who subsequently spent 22 years as a colporteur in England. Drew worked in Liverpool on the west coast in 1883, and one of his first converts was a ship's captain, A. F. Lundqvist, a Finn who introduced SDA teachings into Finland.

J. N. Loughborough reported in the Review and Herald (60:632, Oct. 9, 1883) that on Sept. 2 and 3, 1883, a church of about 20 members was organized in Southampton. This was apparently the first Seventh-day Adventist church in Great Britain. On Oct. 1, 1883, there were 100 SDAs in England. In 1884 George I. Butler, General Conference president, visited the country, and M. C. Wilcox arrived to edit the Present Truth, first published at Grimsby in May 1884. A thousand copies were distributed in the first year of publication. Also in 1884 a second church, one in Grimsby, was organized.

In May 1885 S. H. Lane and Robert F. Andrews joined the workers in England. In August of the same year Ellen White, on her way to Switzerland, spent two weeks in Britain visiting the churches in Grimsby, Ulceby, Riseley, and Southampton.

In the early summer of 1887 S. N. Haskell arrived to conduct evangelistic work. The Chaloners, a double-fronted house in northern London, was purchased to serve as general headquarters. Three Bible instructors assisted Haskell, and the first baptism in London took place on June 9, 1888. The small plant that had been printing Present Truth in Grimsby was transferred to London in 1887. It was here that W. A. Spicer served his apprenticeship as an editor, with E. J. Waggoner, before Spicer went to India in 1898 to edit the Oriental Watchman.

Beginnings in Northern Ireland. In 1885 a group of SDA colporteurs entered Ireland. In 1891 the first church was organized in Banbridge, Northern Ireland. Joseph Watson, the church clerk, thus reported: "A meeting of the Seventh-day Adventists of Ireland was called by Elder D. A. Robinson on Sunday, July 5, 1891. The meeting was held in Parkmount House, Banbridge, there being representatives from Banbridge, Tanderagee, Clones [in what is now Ireland, or Eire], Coleraine, and Belfast. Prayer was offered by Brother Hutchinson, which was followed by an address on organization from Elder Robinson."

Twenty-six names were appended to the church covenant. R. W. Whiteside and R. Mussoen, working in the north area, organized a company in Kilmoyle.

SDA progress has been slow in Ireland. In 1993 there were 11 churches in Ireland, with a membership of 323. These four churches in Northern Ireland and the one in Ireland form the Irish Mission (organized 1902; reorganized 1952), coordinating the two separate political entities. (See Ireland.)

Scotland. The first attempt to open SDA work in Scotland appears to have been made early in 1886 by S. H. Lane and R. F. Andrews. After visiting three places, they held meetings in a hall at Lochmaben, a town of 2,000 in southern Scotland. Although they advertised extensively and called on nearly every family, the attendance was low, varying from 15 to 70 (Review and Herald 63:252, Apr. 20, 1886).

In the summer of 1888 S. N. Haskell visited Scotland. From his report (ibid. 65:520, Aug. 14, 1888) it is evident that thousands of SDA publications had been sent to Scotland before his visit, as a result of which some “were on the point of keeping the Sabbath.”

In 1891 N. Z. Town took a group of canvassers to Scotland to sell SDA publications (ibid. 68:374, June 16, 1891). The results of their work are not known.

Then in 1893 a member from Northern Ireland named Hollingsworth went with his daughter to Glasgow, Scotland, selling Ellen White’s book Patriarchs and Prophets. A Bleasby family—the mother, two sons, and two daughters—accepted the SDA doctrines, and the first company of adherents in Scotland was formed. John McAvoy, continuing the work, won a family named Barr. In 1901 H. E. Armstrong baptized 20 converts and organized the first Seventh-day Adventist church in Scotland.

Scotland and all the adjacent islands make up the Scottish Mission, which was organized in 1902 and reorganized in 1928 and 1991. In 1993 there were churches in 10 Scottish towns and a membership of 278.

Wales. SDAs entered Wales in 1888, when A. A. John preached in a tent near Aberystwyth. In 1895 in the village of Troedrhwgwair, W. H. Meredith (who later became the first British president of the British Union) was won by the witness of a colporteur. He was baptized the next year in the city of Bath, in England. The Welsh Mission was organized in 1902, and with the other fields within the British Union was reorganized in 1928.

In 1896 J. S. Washburn baptized 47 converts after evangelistic meetings in Cardiff, but no church was organized at the time. In April 1903 in Pontypridd the first Welsh church was organized, composed of 20 converts won by W. H. Meredith. A few months later a church was organized in Cardiff. In 1993 there were 15 churches in the Welsh Mission and a membership of 483.

British Union Conference. In 1902 the British Union Conference was organized, with O. A. Olsen as the first president. It included the South England and North England conferences (both organized in that same year, with E. J. Waggoner and E. E. Andross, respectively, serving as the first presidents) and three missions—Ireland, Scotland, and Wales (with William Hutchinson, H. E. Armstrong, and A. F. Ballenger, respectively, as directors). Several territorial changes have been made since 1902. According to the present territorial alignment (1993), the South England Conference comprises all the counties south of the Wash and includes the Channel Islands, the Isles of Scilly, and the Isle of Wight. The North England Conference includes the Isle of Man and all the counties north of the Wash, east of Wales, but excluding the border counties of Hereford, Worcester, and Shropshire, which are included in the Welsh Mission.

In 1906 the British Union Conference purchased a 55-acre (25-hectare) estate at Watford known as Stanborough Park, some 17 miles (30 kilometers) from the center of London. On this estate, which included a manor house, institutions were erected that have served the British Union—the Stanborough Press, a factory for the manufacture of health foods (see Granose Foods), and the first headquarters building for the union conference (opened in 1923). The manor house was first used as a junior college, then was converted into a medical institution, which continued until its close in 1968 (see Stanboroughs Nursing and Maternity Home).

As the work expanded, the headquarters building proved too small. A new and spacious block of offices, erected in 1962 and extended in 1990, cares adequately for the officers of the union, the missions, and the Voice of Prophecy Bible School. The building occupied by the former union junior college (see Newbold College) housed the Stanborough School until its demolition in 1991, when a new building was erected (a six-classroom primary school was built on Stanborough Park, separate from the secondary school, during 1974).

The publishing house burned in 1964, and new quarters were built at Grantham, Lincolnshire, and opened in 1967.

Through the years many SDA evangelists have preached in Britain, some with marked success. After G. E. Vandeman's 1952 evangelistic campaign in London in the Coliseum and Stoll theaters, the General Conference provided funds that made possible the leasing in 1953 of the Crown property known as the New Gallery Cinema, on Regent Street, near Picadilly Circus. This was remodeled as an evangelistic center, with an auditorium seating about 1,400 and adjacent rooms for chapel, reading room, and offices (see Evangelistic Centers). In 1991 the Crown Commissioners bought back the lease, and a new center has been purchased near Marble Arch.

Among those who have gone from the British field to serve overseas are: G. F. Jones, George Keough, S. G. Maxwell, W. T. Bartlett, Dr. G.A.S. Madgwick, W. McClements, H. W. Lowe, W. G. Till, J. Clifford, F. G. Clifford, E. G. Essery, S. Bull, A. S. Maxwell, and many others. For the SDA educational program, the British Union has contributed such individuals as E. E. White (Euro-Africa Division), W.G.C. Murdoch (Andrews University), E. E. Heppenstall (Loma Linda University), S. Bull (La Sierra College), W. T. Hyde (Pacific Union College), and W.R.A. Madgwick (Atlantic Union College).

Great Lakes Adventist Academy

GREAT LAKES ADVENTIST ACADEMY. A coeducational boarding school on the senior high school level. On Nov. 2, 1986, a special constituency meeting of the Michigan Conference of Seventh-day Adventists voted to merge Adelpian Academy and Cedar Lake Academy. This vote set into motion the process that culminated in the establishment of Great Lakes Adventist Academy on the grounds of what was formerly Cedar Lake Academy. It officially started on Aug. 31, 1987.

This school is centrally located on M-46, three miles (five kilometers) east of the village of Edmore, 17 miles (27 kilometers) west of Alma. This rural setting encourages the development of an appreciation and love for nature. The spacious grounds and modern buildings provide the students with a comfortable atmosphere in which to live and learn.

When Great Lakes Adventist Academy opened its doors for the 1987—1988 school year, it did so with a commitment to continue the more than 170 combined years of service that characterized Adelpian and Cedar Lake.

Even though Great Lakes Adventist Academy is Michigan's newest boarding academy, in a very real sense it is also the oldest. The school is dedicated to the purpose of carrying on the traditions begun by Cedar Lake in 1898 and Adelpian in 1904. See Adelpian Academy; Cedar Lake Academy; Grand Ledge Academy.

Greater Boston Academy

GREATER BOSTON ACADEMY. A coeducational day school on the senior high school level at 20 Woodland Road, Stoneham, Massachusetts. It is owned by the Southern New England Conference and is operated by a board with representation from six churches in the Greater Boston area with a constituency of about 1,000 members. There is an average student enrollment of 90. In 1958 Greater Boston Academy was accredited by the New England Association of Colleges and Secondary Schools. Its curriculum is essentially college preparatory, although courses in applied arts are also available. The chief school publication is the yearbook, The Mayflower.

Greater Boston Academy is an outgrowth of earlier beginnings on the elementary level. As early as 1916 a church school was conducted in Everett, Massachusetts, by Ruth Meleen, and for the next three years a small school was maintained in the Everett-Malden district. The fall of 1920 marked the beginning of the Boston Intermediate School, which employed three teachers. By 1924 classes were held in the newly acquired Boston Temple, at Warren Avenue and West Canton Street, Boston. In 1940 the school was transferred to a dwelling at 325 Harvard Street, Cambridge, Massachusetts, and renamed the Boston Temple Junior Academy. Robert W. Hall and his wife taught together from 1929 until Hall's death in 1942.

Under the pastoral leadership of Norval F. Pease, the twelfth grade was added in 1944, and the high school, now separate from the elementary grades, took the name of Greater Boston Academy. In 1946, with the purchase of school property from the Middlesex University, the academy was relocated at the Newbury Street address. In the spring of 1963 this building was sold; a new school plant was erected at the Woodland Road address in Stoneham, on the grounds of the New England Sanitarium and Hospital, and was first used in the autumn of 1965.

Greater Miami Academy

GREATER MIAMI ACADEMY. A coeducational day school on the senior high school level, operated with its grade school on a five-acre (two-hectare) campus in Miami, Florida, and supported by several Miami churches. In 1962 the academy reported an enrollment (including the grade school) of 248 and a teaching staff of 20. The buildings provide 13 classrooms and an auditorium, and there are outdoor recreational and parking areas.

The year 1962 was the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the parent church school. In 1912 Miami's Seventh-day Adventist congregation (formed in 1910) opened a school in a tent at the rear of the church building, which was then under construction. The first teacher, Miss Grady Lea (Mrs. David L. Wiltse), had between 20 and 25 pupils. Classes were later moved to the church building, which was sold in 1925.

The school was later operated as the Miami Junior Academy in church-owned property on NW. 30th Street and 3rd Avenue. From two classrooms, two teachers, and 86 pupils, the school grew to five classrooms and 115 pupils in 10 grades by 1950. A year later the school board, which represented the constituent churches, bought an undeveloped city block, and in 1952 Miami Junior Academy moved into two new buildings of three classrooms each at 18th Avenue.

In 1960, after the addition of six new classrooms, a music studio, and a large auditorium, the school became the 12-grade Greater Miami Academy. Plans for 1962—1965 included new elementary classrooms separated from the present buildings, also full teacher certification and academy accreditation. In 1970 a library and vocational building were added to the school plant.

In 1992 Greater Miami Academy celebrated its eightieth anniversary on its new 10-acre (four-hectare) campus, built in 1989. The 1992 enrollment was 437.

Greater New York Academy

GREATER NEW YORK ACADEMY. A coeducational day school on the senior high school level, operated by the Greater New York Conference, and situated in Woodside, Queens, New York. The school is accredited by the Seventh-day Adventist Board of Regents and by the University of the State of New York. In 1992 the enrollment was 190; the faculty numbered 14.

By 1920 an SDA grade school in the Bronx had grown to the point where the services of three teachers were required. In that year, because of overcrowded conditions, and because of the need for classes on the high school level, the former Temple Israel, at Lenox Avenue and 120th Street, New York City, was purchased. Besides serving as a school, this new property became the home of the uniting congregations of the New York First church and the Bronx company, which now assumed the name of City Temple church. The new school, called Temple Academy and offering grades 9 and 10, was opened with 36 enrolled, and with H. H. Morse as principal. The name was changed to Greater New York Academy in 1922. The first school paper, The Student, began in 1923.

After the City Temple was sold early in 1926, the academy was operated for two years in a rented church building at 122 West 76th Street, and later in the former Second Presbyterian Church on West 96th Street. In 1929 the Brooklyn SDA Church acquired new and commodious property at 484 Washington Avenue, Brooklyn, and this became the home of the academy.

In 1935 the school was able to meet the exacting requirements for a charter from the New York Board of Regents. In 1945 the academy moved into the former Labor Temple at 41-32 58th Street in Woodside, Queens, New York, which with a minimum of remodeling became an up-to-date home for the wandering school. In 1966 the General Conference Welfare Center located next door to the academy moved to new quarters. That building was purchased and remodeled into an academy gymnasium. A 4,300-square-foot (400-square-meter) new wing housing five additional classrooms was completed in August 1988.

History

History. Forerunners. The Adventist message came to the New York area when William Miller gave a course of lectures in New York City in the spring of 1840. On Oct. 25, 1841, the third general conference of the Millerites convened in Broadway Tabernacle. Intense interest led to the publication of the Adventist views through the Midnight Cry, which was printed in the city, first as a daily and then as a weekly, and was distributed across the country.

On Feb. 6, 1844, J. V. Himes, a Millerite leader, attended an Adventist conference held at Franklin Hall. This was followed by Miller's lectures at Broadway Chapel to an overflow audience described as "solemn and attentive."

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. In 1848 James and Ellen White visited New York City and held meetings in a certain Brother Moody's house in Brooklyn. J. K. Bellows reported to James White in 1851 a group of converts numbering 13. Early evangelistic work was reported by M. B. Czechowski, a converted Catholic priest, who organized a church and who rented a chapel in Brooklyn in 1860. He held several services on Sabbath, and meetings in French, Polish, and English on Sunday. He also reported work among the Italians, Swedes, and Germans.

Because the New York City area is the main gateway to the nation, the early growth of Seventh-day Adventist churches there suffered from the constant outflow of the westward movement. Furthermore, the members were scattered and engulfed by a vast populace composed of many divergent nationalities. Reports of meetings held in New York City appeared only sporadically in the church journals from 1850 to 1880.

The year 1883 marked the beginning of the New York city mission, which employed a staff of two in 1885. The Brooklyn city mission was established in January 1886 under the direction of the General Conference.

H. E. Robinson reported tent meetings conducted in 1888 in the city of Newburg with the assistance of M. C. Wilcox. Also in that year the Pacific Press Publishing Association established its eastern plant in New York City. Here the religious liberty periodical American Sentinel was published from 1890 to April 1900, and from December 1901 to October 1903 (as the Sentinel of Christian Liberty). This publishing branch continued until 1903. Missionary work was also conducted by a harbor boat called the Sentinel, which plied among the incoming and outgoing ships (see Missionary Vessels).

Early Organization. Because SDAs in the New York City area felt more attached to the New England SDAs than to those belonging to the upstate New York churches, they and groups situated in Pleasantville and Williamsburg (Brooklyn) requested in August 1873 to unite with the New England Conference. A portion of the present conference area, New York City, Long Island, Staten Island (plus New Jersey), was organized into a tract society district of the New England Tract and Missionary Society, with W. J. Boynton as superintendent.

On Sept. 26, 1889, the areas of New York City, Long Island, Staten Island, and the counties of Westchester and Rockland, which formerly had been part of the New England Conference, were made part of the newly formed Atlantic Conference. When the Eastern Union Conference was formed early in 1901, the Atlantic Conference was included under its jurisdiction.

Churches. In 1894 H. G. Thurston reported that 14 were keeping the Sabbath in the upstate city of Middletown. In 1898 J. N. Loughborough reported that there was one English church in New York City, one English church and one Scandinavian church in Brooklyn, and two English churches in Jersey City, with a combined membership of nearly 500. The New York City church was situated on 125th Street and had been organized with 18 members by E. E. Franke. S. N. Haskell spent two years strengthening this church and working in the city area. Subsequently this church became known as the New York no. 1 church. Oldest of the midcity English churches, it became known in 1920 as the City Temple after absorbing the Bronx English congregation. After the absorption the new church had a membership of more than 500. In 1948 the church was relocated in lower Manhattan, and its name changed to Manhattan Seventh-day Adventist Church. The Jamaica church (Queens) was organized in December 1927.

When the Washington Avenue (Brooklyn) church was relocated in Jackson Heights (Queens), the Woodside (Queens) church was absorbed and the new group became known as the Jackson Heights church on June 30, 1959. A portion of the Washington Avenue membership also formed the New York Center church, organized Jan. 9, 1960. Another merger occurred in March 1964 when the Bay Ridge (Brooklyn) and the Italian American (Brooklyn) churches merged to form the Brooklyn church.

Foreign Language Work. The city area's vast and diversified foreign language population has posed many problems in communicating the SDA message. Work among the Scandinavians began in earnest when John F. Hansen held meetings in 1887. As a result of his work among the Swedes a Swedish church was formed in Brooklyn in 1894. In 1898 Carl Swenson began work among the Swedes in the city, which resulted in the organization of a church of 22 in 1903. In 1911 two churches, one Danish-Norwegian and the other Swedish, were formed from the Brooklyn group.

What appears to have been the first SDA German church in the area was formed in 1899, with a membership of 16.

After conference organization SDA work among the foreign language populace increased sharply. Growth in membership among the German, Danish-Norwegian, and Swedish members was rapid. Shortly after 1900 Rosario Calderone, a converted priest, began house-to-house work among the Italians of the city. Under the sponsorship of the General Conference, L. Zecchetto also worked in the city. Extensive distribution of Czechoslovakian literature in 1906 led to the baptism of nine Czechoslovaks in June 1907, and to the formation of a church in that same year. Joseph Spicer worked among the Yugoslavians. A devout Catholic, he had picked up a wet copy of The Watchman along the railroad tracks near the waterfront, and the magazine ultimately led him to accept the SDA message and to enter its ministry. Hungarians in the city were first evangelized by John Sivak and others, and then organized into the first Hungarian SDA church in America in July, 1910.

Further advances in the foreign language work began in 1920 when the Italian church was organized with a membership of 17. Significant progress among the Spanish-speaking people in New York City began with the efforts of Lewis Sebastian, a layperson from Puerto Rico. His work was largely among those who had left the SDA Church after their arrival in this city. In June 1929 these reclaimed members formed the nucleus of the first Spanish church in the city and the parent church for several other Spanish congregations. Since then the Spanish work has progressed to more than 5,000 in more than 30 churches. Russian-speaking persons were organized into a church in March 1930.

Greater New York Conference Organized. In a special session of the Atlantic Conference held in December 1901, Greater New York, Long Island, and the counties of Putnam, Rockland, and Westchester were formed into the Greater New York Conference, to become effective Jan. 1, 1902. The organization of the Greater New York area into a separate conference was endorsed by specific counsel from Ellen White. The new conference was made a part of the new Atlantic Union Conference. The headquarters of the new conference were situated at 400 West 57th Street in Manhattan. In the transition the members of the New York church accepted the responsibility for reestablishing a children's home that had formerly been situated in Paterson, New Jersey, and had been operated by the SDAs there.

The president of the newly created Greater New York Conference was H. W. Cottrell, who also served as president of the Atlantic Union Conference. At this time the Greater New York Conference area had a population of 4,515,810 in an area of 308 square miles (800 square kilometers). The conference had ten congregations (four in Brooklyn, four in New York City, and two in Jersey City), with a combined membership of 527. However, only one congregation owned a church building; seven of the congregations held their services in rented quarters. At the time another church, in the Bronx, was in process of organization. The conference employed five ordained ministers, two licensed ministers, three canvassers, and nine other workers. One church school with an enrollment of 20 was in operation.

By 1903 the conference had been enlarged to include the counties of Dutchess, Orange, and Ulster. In 1911 a certificate of incorporation was registered with the state. In 1912 Sullivan County (formerly part of New York Conference) became part of the Greater New York Conference. In 1922 Delaware County (also formerly part of the New York Conference) became part of the Greater New York Conference. In 1950 it was returned to the New York Conference. In 1922 the counties of Greene and Columbia were transferred from the New York Conference to the Greater New York Conference.

Later History. In 1911 the conference membership stood at 1,051. By 1920 this number had risen to 2,721, a gain of about 160 percent. By the end of 1928 there were 3,113 members in 26 churches under the leadership of 15 ordained ministers. At the time the Northeastern Conference organized in 1945, 1,817 of the total membership of 4,386 were transferred to the new conference. (For the development of Black churches, see Northeastern Conference.) By late 1964 the Greater New York Conference had more than regained this membership loss, reporting 4,654 members organized in 45 churches under 32 ordained ministers.

In January 1965 the conference headquarters were moved to North Hills, adjacent to the Long Island Expressway at New Hyde Park Road, North Hills, Manhasset, New York. The property included more than ten acres and a residence, which was converted into offices. A guest room and two apartments were included in the three-story structure.

Increasing commercialization and the risk of being taxed for the undeveloped land led the administration to look elsewhere for office property. An estate was purchased in Manhasset, New York, not far from the other office. A large addition, which included room for an Adventist Book Center and an attractive chapel in which workers' meetings could be held, was built. There is adequate office space for present and future needs. The move to this office was completed during 1975.

Evangelism. The great evangelistic challenge of the metropolitan area has been the continuing concern of church leadership on the General, union, and local conference levels. Ellen White gave frequent counsel regarding the direction of the work among the masses of the city. Early conference leaders, such as S. N. Haskell, H. W. Cottrell, and their successors, wrestled with problems unique to this large city. Frequent letters and visits by A. G. Daniells, General Conference president (1901—1922), characterized the continuing involvement on the part of the General Conference through counsel and specific aid in many forms.

Greater New York evangelists have used diversified methods and new techniques to reach the populace. The tent meeting was the popular summer rallying point in the early days. Later the city's many halls, auditoriums, and theaters, including Carnegie Hall, were focal points for evangelism. Major evangelistic campaigns were held by Charles Everson (1914), Jesse C. Stevens (1917), C. B. Haynes (1919), and Louis K. Dickson (1922).

Powerful media of communication, first radio and then television, were used to broadcast the SDA message to the city. Through the years many SDA workers presented series of programs on radio. In May 1950 Faith for Today, directed by W. A. Fagal, then pastor of the Washington Avenue church, began on TV. The influence of this program spread rapidly and is now felt throughout North America and overseas.

After outgrowing several headquarters locations, the telecast moved to Carle Place, Long Island, in 1963. In the early seventies broadcasting and production studios began concentrating their activities in California more than in New York. In May 1972 Faith for Today moved its operation to the Seventh-day Adventist Radio, Television, and Film Center in Newbury Park, California. This gave much better access to the studios and production centers.

The ever-present need for an evangelistic center in the heart of New York City resulted in a grant in 1954 by the General Conference toward the establishment of a center at 227 West 46th Street, off Times Square. This all-purpose facility had auditoriums, chapels, offices, and accommodations for transient missionaries and other church-employed workers. The center was sold in 1979 and replaced by the Adventist Information Center at 12 West 40th Street, off Fifth Avenue. The new facility has an Adventist Book Center and two chapels that host the Ukrainian and Hungarian Congregations, as well as an information center.

From 1933 to 1945 S. A. Kaplan pioneered the work among the Jewish people of the city. After a gap of about four years, during which he worked at the General Conference and was in charge of work for the Jews, he resumed his work in the New York City area, and in 1949 established the Bronx Community Chapel, replaced in 1958 by the Times Square Center at 410 West 45th Street, near Times Square, in a building purchased and renovated within a year. In 1948 J. N. Hoffman was appointed director of the Jewish work. In 1950 a Ukrainian church was established as a result of the work carried on by Miroslav Roshak.

Institutions. Secondary church school education was fostered in the city with the establishment in 1920 of Temple Academy, forerunner of Greater New York Academy. Harlem Academy was also begun in 1920 with eight (later 12) grades (now Northeastern Academy, serving the constituency of the Northeastern Conference).

In 1955 the Adventist Home for the aged was established in Livingston, New York. It was a member of the SDA Association of Self-Supporting Institutions. In 1966 the Greater New York Conference was asked to assume full operation of the institution. In 1973 the Adventist Nursing Home was constructed and occupied. It was a 120-bed nursing care facility on the same grounds with the Adventist Home. Although not fully owned by the church, it was managed and operated by the Greater New York Conference. By the mid-1980s both the Adventist Home and the Adventist Nursing Home were no longer under the conference management.

Facilities. In 1962 the Eagle Lake campground near Sloatsburg, New York, was sold and the Berkshire Country Club at Wingdale was purchased. There are 282 acres (115 hectares) and full facilities for camp meetings and youth camping programs. The facilities are frequently used by the Atlantic Union and other groups outside Greater New York. A meeting hall seating 2,500 was completed in 1964, replacing the auditorium, which had been destroyed by fire. Since becoming conference property, additions to the operating facilities represent a total expenditure of more than $2 million.

In 1975 the conference committee voted to enlarge the medical missionary work being carried on by its health screening van by expanding to five vans.

The New York Korean church was established in Queens and a Romanian company was organized in 1977 in Ridgewood. A company of Chinese believers also was established that year. A Pakistani congregation, speaking Urdu, was established in Manhattan in 1979. The year 1981 marked the start of SDA work among Haitians and other French-speaking people in the Greater New York Conference.

In 1980 the conference was forced to repossess their former property in North Hills, Long Island. This additional space allowed for expansion of the community health services and van ministry.

During the 1990s a satellite dish was constructed in North Hills that makes it possible to cover all of North America and part of South America with television. On Nov. 1, 1992, the SDA Good News Television Network officially came on the air. Later the FCC gave permission to operate the channel 29 station in the Greater New York area.

Greece

GREECE. A small republic situated on a peninsula jutting into the Mediterranean Sea, bounded on the north by Albania, Macedonia, and Bulgaria, on the extreme northeast by Turkey, on the east by the Aegean Sea, and on the west by the Ionian Sea. Its total area is 50,547 square miles (131,000 square kilometers), and its population (1994), 10.6 million. The country is mountainous. The main sources of employment are farming, shipping, trade, and industries. The official national religion is Greek Orthodox. Only a small percentage of the people are non-Orthodox (Catholics, Protestants, Jews, and a few Muslims in the northern provinces and islands).

Of the various states of Europe, Greece has the longest history and has been considered the cradle of European civilization. Its culture reached its highest point in the fifth century B.C., but it was in the fourth century B.C., under Alexander the Great, that Greek culture and political institutions influenced wide areas and became dominant in the eastern Mediterranean world, and subsequently infiltrated the Roman West. After a period of decline, it was revitalized when, in A.D. 330, the capital of the Roman Empire was transferred to Constantinople, the site of the ancient Greek colony of Byzantium, where the Greeks gradually gained control of the court and of the government so that the Byzantine Empire became essentially an empire of the Greeks. There ensued a cleavage between the forms of Christianity in the West and in the Greek East, which led to the schism in the church between Rome and Constantinople in 1054. When Constantinople fell to the Turks in 1453, Greece became a Turkish province and regained its independence only in the beginning of the nineteenth century. Since then its territory has expanded northward and also includes some islands in the Aegean Sea. These expansions have brought a varied non-Greek population into the state.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. As early as 1878 there is reference in the Review and Herald to “fruit” from publications that had been sent to Greece. An Italian SDA, a commercial traveler named Bertola, went to Greece in 1879 and shared his faith as the opportunity was afforded him, but there is no record of any permanent results of his work. In 1899 the Mission Board sent over H. A. Henderson, a licensed minister, probably chosen because he had taught Greek (in South Lancaster Academy). He reported from Nauplia in the Review and Herald in 1899 and 1900 that he had made contacts and had found interests, but he made no reference to converts.

In 1907, after the General Conference biennial session at Gland, Switzerland, another professor of ancient Greek, W. E. Howell, was sent to Greece. He settled with his family in a suburb of Athens and began to study the modern language, but in 1909 he was recalled to America to resume educational work. While in Greece he had supervised the translation of some tracts into modern Greek.

The first known Seventh-day Adventist convert in Greece was George Brakas, of Vostina (a town then belonging to Albania), who had learned of the Sabbath and observed it several years before hearing in 1908 of a small Sabbathkeeping church in Constantinople. Every 15 days he sent a letter addressed to "the church which keeps the Sabbath." In 1909 he was visited by R. S. Greaves from the SDA Turkish Mission. Brakas, his wife, and his eldest daughter were baptized. In 1912 the remaining three members of his family were baptized.

On another trip to this area, early in 1910, Greaves stopped at Athens to baptize S. Famieliari, the first SDA in Athens, who had accepted the faith through reading publications sent to him from the United States.

Late in the same year, Greaves was sent to head the new Grecian Mission. He went first to Ioánnina, later to Patras and Thessaloníki. Times were hard because of tension between Greece and Turkey. When World War I began, the Greaves family left Greece. Remaining were F. Scior, a ministerial licentiate, and Alexandra Keanides, a Greek nurse from Turkey. The Greaves family returned to Thessaloníki from 1921 to 1926.

However, in 1921 events combined to strengthen the work. Because of political unrest, about 2 million Greeks fled from Turkey to Greece as refugees. Among these were 10 or 12 SDA families, some Greek, others Armenian. Some of these families settled in Thessaloníki, others in Piraeus and Athens. In 1923 a church was organized, and an orphanage for the refugee children was opened in Thessaloníki. Greaves was mission director, and A. H. Larson was in charge of the orphanage, which unfortunately had to be closed in 1926.

During 1923 a group was organized in Piraeus and met in the home of Mable Kalfa. The first missionary to do evangelistic work in the Athens area was M. C. Grin, who came from Switzerland and worked in Greece from 1925 to 1932. The first church in Athens was organized in 1927 with 15 members, most of whom belonged to the family of A. Christoforides. In 1926 E. Hennecke became director. He organized a church in Berea and remained in Greece until 1932, when he and M. C. Grin were compelled to leave the country, and A. N. Stabellos became acting president of the Greek Mission.

When C. A. Christoforides became the director of the mission (1939) the headquarters were moved from Thessaloníki to Athens. At the end of World War II a church and headquarters building was erected in Athens and dedicated in 1950. Three years later a church was built in Níkaia, a suburb of Piraeus. After a brief period of leadership by Nick Poulos, Nick Germanis became president of the Greek Mission in 1958.

From 1928 to 1938 the Greek Mission belonged to the Central European Division and from 1938 to 1940 to Section II of that division. From 1940 to 1945 it was part of the mission territory administered by the General Conference, and in 1946 it became a mission of the Southern European Division. In 1972 the Greek Mission was attached to the Southern European Union Mission, within the newly formed Euro-Africa Division.

In the fall of 1972 a secondary day school was begun in Athens, with Nick Germanis as principal. It was the first school SDAs organized in Greece, and it constituted a major step forward in the training of the youth for the service of God. The students lived in the Athens area. The school was closed in 1982.

During the month of October 1971, 15-minute radiobroadcasts were introduced six nights a week in the Greek language. These programs were transmitted from the Trans-Europe station in Lisbon, Portugal. The best reception of these broadcasts were in the large industrial centers of Europe, where hundreds of thousands of Greeks live and work. Three of these broadcasts were on religious topics, two were educational, and one presented health subjects. The production of shortwave broadcasts was halted in the 1980s because of lack of response. In 1993 a new production studio opened in order to produce local radio programs.

The Five-day Plan to Stop Smoking and other health seminars, initiated by Nick Germanis, became a significant outreach method in the Athens area. A Better Living center in Athens and Lifestyle Magazine TV programs in Attica, Corinth, Epirus, and Macedonia continue this form of outreach and present SDAs as a caring church.

Green, William Hawkins

GREEN, WILLIAM HAWKINS (1871—1928). Minister, department secretary. A graduate in law and theology from Shaw University, he practiced law in Charlotte and Elizabeth City, North Carolina, and in Washington, D.C. He became a Seventh-day Adventist in 1901. After further study he preached in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, from 1905 to 1909, and then for a few months in Atlanta, Georgia. After a period as pastor of the Ephesus church, Washington, D.C. (1909—1912), he built up the Hartford Avenue SDA church in Detroit, Michigan (1912—1918). From 1918 to 1928 he was secretary of the North American Negro Department of the General Conference, the first Black to hold that office.

Green River Ordinances

GREEN RIVER ORDINANCES. Local laws in a number of cities in the United States prohibiting all door-to-door solicitation without prior invitation of the occupant. They are named after Green River, Wyoming, where in 1931 one of the first such laws was enacted.

In Martin v. Struthers, 319 U.S. 141 (1943), the Supreme Court of the United States held that a municipality could not forbid the free distribution of brochures “advertising a religious meeting.” In Breard v. Alexandria, 341 U.S. 622 (1951), the Court upheld a Green River ordinance in a case involving solicitors for subscriptions to secular magazines such as Saturday Evening Post and Newsweek. The Court said the ordinance was a valid exercise of the city’s police power to regulate commerce.

Some commentators suggest the Breard case allows Green River ordinances to be used to bar the work of literature evangelists. But in Louisiana, where the Breard case arose, it had already been held that literature evangelists do not fall within the ordinance because they are neither “solicitors, peddlers, hawkers, itinerant merchants or transient vendors” (Shreveport v. Teague, 200 La. 679, 8 So.2d 640 [1941]). In Green River v. Martin, 61 Wyo. 81, 254 P.2d 198 (1953), the language of the ordinance was held to be directed only to commercial activities. In City of Anchorage v. Berry, 145 F.Supp. 868 (1956), the court pointed out that the Breard case involved a “transaction of a commercial nature” and that the literature evangelist makes door-to-door calls “for the primary purpose of preaching his religion in an attempt to proselyte followers for his religious beliefs and congregation; thus, the sale, if it can be considered such, was incidental to this method of preaching.”

As the Supreme Court of Wyoming said in the Martin case: “There is an extraordinary diversity of opinion among the courts as to the validity” of Green River ordinances as applied to religious solicitors.

Green River ordinances have been used at times to try to prevent door-to-door selling of religious literature. But most city governments have recognized the right of the church to propagate the gospel by this method. The church is opposed to such ordinances when they are applied to the selling of religious literature, holding that it violates the First Amendment guarantee of the free exercise of religion, a part of which is the preaching of the gospel through means of selling the printed page.

The Breard case noted that First Amendment protection does not extend “to colporteurs offending . . . state trespass laws by distributing, after notice to desist, like publications to the tenants in a private apartment house.”

Greenland

GREENLAND. A large island lying mainly within the Arctic Circle; a Danish colony until 1953, but since then an integral part of Denmark. Since 1979 Greenland has been ruled by its own magistrate and has two representatives in the Danish Folketing. It has an area of about 840,000 square miles (2.2 million square kilometers), but only the coastline is inhabited. Its population (1994) is 57,000. Greenland's technically correct name is Kalaallit Nunaat; Nuuk is the capital. The principal sources of income are fish, seals, sheep, minerals, reindeer, and furs.

Greenland was sighted by Gunnbjörn Ulfssøn of Iceland in A.D. 975. European settlement began with Eric the Red, who was banished from Iceland about 982. His son Leif Ericsson introduced Christianity into Greenland from Norway in 1000. In 1410 all connections between Scandinavia and Greenland ceased, and the colonists disappeared. A new Danish-Norwegian settlement was made early in the eighteenth century, primarily through the initiative of the Lutheran priest Hans Egede, who, from 1721 to 1736, was known as the apostle to Greenland. A majority of the inhabitants profess Lutheranism, although the Moravians, who had a mission on the island as early as 1733, are also represented there.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. The first SDA contacts were made through publications brought by fishermen from the Faeroe Islands. In 1953 Andreas Nielsen of Denmark was appointed to begin evangelism in Greenland, and went there the following year. Later that year he baptized Amon Berthelsen, the first SDA convert in Greenland. Nielsen was joined in 1957 by a nurse, Ella Praestiin. In 1959 Anna Hogganvik, a physiotherapist, opened the Skodsborg Clinic in Godthaab. It was operated by the mission until 1992, when a new health system in Greenland forced the clinic to close.

The Greenland Mission is part of the Danish Union of Churches, which is a part of the Trans-European Division. In 1992 there were 13 members and one church building in Godthaab. In recent years the field has been served by self-supporting missionaries.

Guadeloupe and Dependencies

GADELOUPE AND DEPENDENCIES. An overseas department of France consisting of a number of islands in the Lesser Antilles archipelago in the Caribbean Sea: Guadeloupe, Marie-Galante, Les Saintes, and Désirade (all situated between Montserrat and Dominica); and St. Barthélemy and St.-Martin (French section), situated some 140 miles (225 kilometers) to the north.

Guadeloupe consists of two islands: Basse-Terre (otherwise known as Guadeloupe proper), a volcanic island whose highest elevation is 4,869 feet (1,500 meters), and low-lying Grande-Terre, separated from Basse-Terre by a narrow channel called Rivière Salée (Salt River). The total area of the two islands is 660 square miles (1,700 square kilometers), and the population (1994) is about 395,000. The town of Basse-Terre is the capital, but Pointe-à-Pitre, on Grande-Terre, is the principal port and commercial center. The population, composed of Blacks and the descendants of Norman and Breton settlers who came there in the seventeenth century, is largely Roman Catholic in religion. There are several Protestant bodies in the country, including Seventh-day Adventists, “La Mission Evangelique,” Jehovah’s Witnesses, Baptists, and Pentecostals.

Seventh-day Adventist Work on Guadeloupe

Seventh-day Adventist Work on Guadeloupe. The first SDA missionary to Guadeloupe was Philip Giddings, who visited the island in 1908, while he was working in the Leeward Islands Mission. In 1914 he went with his family to Pointe-à-Pitre and opened the first Protestant mission on the island. He held worship services at his house and organized a Sabbath school. Visiting villages and towns, and sleeping in the homes of the people who received him, he sold books, gave Bible studies, held cottage meetings, and distributed tracts. The first persons he baptized were four members of the Flipp family in Pointe-à-Pitre and four members of the James family of Capesterre. When he left Guadeloupe in 1924, there were about 12 baptized members (mostly of British descent), but almost all of them left the country after the hurricane of 1928. The first SDA church building was erected at Grippon in 1930 by Maxine Herisson, who sold her property to pay its cost. After Giddings left, no workers were stationed on the island until 1932, when two Martiniquan colporteurs, E. Berle and S. B. Jean-Elie, went to Guadeloupe. The first church was organized at Pointe-à-Pitre in 1935 with 25 members instructed by those colporteurs. In September 1938, when the first general meeting of the members was held, there were three churches and three companies. At that time Eugene Berle was ordained, and became the first SDA minister to be ordained in the French West Indies.

The first church school was opened at Pointe-à-Pitre in 1947, with Joseph Bigord as director. By 1993 it had become an important 12-grade primary and secondary school, called "La Perseverance," with an enrollment of more than 536 pupils (270 in the secondary grades) in a four-story building.

Dependencies

Dependencies. On Marie-Galante, 16 miles (25 kilometers) southeast of Guadeloupe (area, 58 square miles [150 square kilometers]; population [1993], 15,000), most of the people are Roman Catholic, but there are 170 SDA adherents.

On St.-Martin (French section), 142 miles (225 kilometers) northwest of Guadeloupe (area, 20 square miles [50 square kilometers]; population [1982], 8,000), the first SDAs were baptized in 1934. In 1993 there were 272 adherents on the island.

On Désirade, six miles (10 kilometers) southwest of Grande-Terre (area 10 square miles [25 square kilometers]; population [1993], more than 1,600), the first SDAs were baptized in 1973. There were 19 adherents on the island. The other dependencies, predominantly Catholic in population were still barely touched by SDA work in 1993. They are Les Saintes, a group of islands seven miles (11 kilometers) south of Basse-Terre, with 10 SDA adherents, and St. Barthélemy, 130 miles (200 kilometers) northwest of Guadeloupe.

Guam and Micronesia

GUAM AND MICRONESIA. Territory in the western Pacific covering 3 million square miles (7.8 million square kilometers) of water and land immediately north of the equator, extending 2,400 miles (3,850 kilometers) from east to west and 1,700 miles (2,700 kilometers) from north to south. In this vast area there are 2,141 islands with a total land area of only about 1,000 square miles (2,600 square kilometers) and a population of approximately 275,000. Micronesia means “tiny islands” and includes the Federated States of Micronesia (Yap, Chuuk, Pohnpei, and Kosrae), Guam (an unincorporated United States territory), the commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands (Saipan is the district center), republic of Palau (or Belau), and the emerging nation of the Marshall Islands.

The predominant religion in Guam and the Marianas is Roman Catholic; in the Eastern Carolines and Western Carolines (both part of Micronesia) and the Marshall Islands the Protestant denominations are prominent. English is the official language and is also the language used in all schools.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Western Caroline Islands. The first SDA in the area was James G. Gibbon, an English sailor who adopted Koror (Palau district), in the Western Carolines, as his home. He accepted SDA beliefs after reading tracts sent on a merchant vessel in the 1890s from Hong Kong by the pioneer self-supporting missionary Abram La Rue.

In the late 1920s, according to an account by V. T. Armstrong (Review and Herald 124:18, Dec. 18, 1947), William Gibbon, a son of James G. Gibbon, living on the island of Palau, sought to establish contact with SDAs and wrote a letter addressed to “Armstrong, Tokyo.” In response to this appeal, SDA workers visited the island in 1930 and 1932—V.

T. Armstrong, S. Ogura, and S. Miyake. William Gibbon was baptized, later 20 persons, after a series of evangelistic meetings, and at a later time seven more. On July 7, 1934, J. O. Bautista and his wife, sponsored by the Missionary Volunteer societies of the Philippine Islands, arrived on this island. In 1939 W. S. Ogura joined them for a month, and 10 more persons were baptized.

During World War II two SDA Japanese missionaries in the Western Carolines were interned by the Japanese administrators for refusal to bear arms, and one of these, Seiichi Yamamoto, succeeded in interesting Toribiong Uchel, one of his jailers, in SDA beliefs. After the war Toribiong Uchel was baptized and in 1956 became the first ordained Palauan Seventh-day Adventist minister; he met a tragic death by drowning in 1965 while on a mission trip among the islands.

In 1949 P. L. Williams, division treasurer, and Robert E. Dunton conducted baptisms on Koror and Babelthap. In the autumn of 1949 J. L. Bowers and his wife came from the China Division to head the work on Koror.

Guam. The first known Sabbathkeeper on the island was Guillermo Flores, a Baptist minister on Guam, who had believed and kept the seventh-day Sabbath since 1926 without ever having seen any other Sabbathkeeper. He was later dismissed for his sabbatarian views. In 1948 he united with the Seventh-day Adventist Church and later entered its ministry. Seventh-day Adventist influence on Guam was strengthened on Sept. 9, 1944, when Henry Metzker, of Sutherlin, Oregon, a pharmacist's mate, first class, U.S.N.R., inquired at the home of Guam congressman Manuel Ulloa of Dededo as to where the Seventh-day Adventist church was situated. At that time there was no church on the island, but the Ulloa family became interested, and a year later, in the autumn of 1945, while A. N. Nelson and F. R. Millard, on their way to Japan as interpreters for a special mission, were delayed on Guam by typhoon weather ahead, the Ulloas with five of their children and a nephew were baptized. The Ulloa home became a place of worship every Sabbath. In the second baptism, on Dec. 25, 1947, six more were baptized.

In May 1948 the first SDA missionary to Guam, Robert E. Dunton, arrived. A church was organized May 30. A month later he learned that his permit to live on Guam was valid for 10 more days only, and that he would have to return to the United States unless the mission had property and a home for the missionary on the island. With the help of mission officials who visited Guam, he was able to arrange for the purchase of property and for the erection of a dwelling on it. The house was completed in time for his family to join him in September of the same year. Mrs. Dunton became the first SDA colporteur there.

As the work progressed, Ray Turner and C. G. Oliver joined the Guam staff. The first church building was erected in Dededo in 1949, and at the first mission session, held in Agana, Guam, in March 1950, the mission was formally organized, with R. E. Dunton as president and C. G. Oliver as secretary-treasurer.

Since August 1954 the Voice of Prophecy radio program has been on the air regularly. The weekly Faith for Today television program is also being sponsored.

Northern Mariana Islands. In 1950 interested people on Saipan sent a request to the mission for a teacher. Guillermo Flores worked with R. E. Dunton in early evangelism in the Marianas, becoming the first regular SDA worker on Saipan. Two Quonsets were purchased for the first meeting hall and workers' home. Flores lived on Saipan during 1950—1951 and 1955—1956. For the next 20 years pastors from Guam churches visited the members on Saipan periodically, but there was little progress until a layperson, Robert Larsen, arrived to work for the U. S. Trust Territory government. A company was formed and a regular Sabbath school conducted. In 1970 the Guam SDA Clinic leased land and made plans to open a dental-medical clinic. The first dentist to work in the Trust Territories, Dr. Steven Fisher, arrived in January 1973. The dental clinic was successful from the first week. Sabbath services were then moved to the clinic building. In August 1974 the second resident pastor, George Wright, a ministerial intern, began working on Saipan.

Eastern Caroline Islands. On the island of Pohnpei lived a doctor and dentist who accepted SDA beliefs and were baptized while attending school in Fiji. Land large enough for a house and church was found on Pohnpei in 1966. A house was constructed by Frank Taitague, who was appointed district pastor for the Eastern Carolines. For a cement block church to be built, sand had to be obtained from the bottom of the lagoon, the workers diving, filling baskets with sand, and loading it into boats. A church building seating 200 was finished and dedicated Oct. 12, 1968.

Guam Adventist Academy

GUAM ADVENTIST ACADEMY. A K-12 day school operated by the Guam Micronesia Mission of Seventh-day Adventists. The academy is located 12 miles (20 kilometers) south of the capital city of Agana. GAA has a school population (1993) of 245 students: 190 in the elementary and 55 in the secondary level. The student body is a homogeneous mix of peoples from the Pacific islands, the Philippines, and the United States. GAA basically follows the Pacific Union curriculum, and all instruction is in English.

The forerunner of Guam Adventist Academy, and the first SDA school on Guam, was founded in the village of Dededo in 1949 by Robert E. Dunton, first president of the mission, and Ray Turner, who gathered materials from an Army dump and erected a two-room Quonset hut. Mrs. Maria Ulloa and Mrs. Magdalena Flores taught the 26 students that year.

In 1951 a second school was opened in the southern village of Talofoyo in a purchased Quonset hut. In August 1953 the Dededo school moved to Agana Heights near the present site of the mission headquarters. In 1957 the Talofoyo school merged with the Agana Heights school, which by then had added grades 11 and 12 to its curriculum.

In 1964 the school transferred to its current location in beautiful Windward Hills and the school name was changed from Far Eastern Island Mission Academy to Guam Mission Academy. In 1972 a new gymnasium was built. A new two-story classroom and chapel building was added in 1974, tripling the classroom space of the academy. In 1987 the students moved into four new classrooms added to the east side of the main facility. In 1980 the school's name became Guam Adventist Academy.

Guam Seventh-day Adventist Clinic

GUAM SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CLINIC. A modern medical-dental clinic located near the business and tourist center of Guam on a 10-acre (four-hectare) site. The clinic has 10 physicians, four dentists, and three optometrists on its staff. It offers a full range of services, including family practice, obstetrics, gynecology, pediatrics, internal medicine, ophthalmology, surgery, preventive medicine, lab, x-ray, pharmacy, dentistry, and optometry, and sees about 90,000 patients annually. The clinic is owned and operated by the Guam-Micronesia Mission of Seventh-day Adventists.

History

History. In 1953 Dr. R. H. Barker was called to open the Guam Clinic. Because facilities were difficult to obtain, Dr. Barker worked full time for the government hospital while he supervised construction of the first clinic building and getting it furnished and supplied. In 1956 Dr. L. A. Smart arrived and opened the clinic, which met considerable religious opposition, but after a few months was successful. A Dental Department was added in 1966. Dr. W. N. Young was the first dentist. The clinic grew and expanded until it took over the mission office next door. When there was no possibility of further expansion in the Agana Heights area, the clinic purchased a 10-acre (four-hectare) piece of land in Tamuning for future building.

In 1962 Typhoon Karen, with winds of 220 mph (350 kph), devastated the island of Guam, destroying 90 percent of all buildings. During the typhoon Dr. Walter Thompson, a clinic doctor, rushed to Guam Memorial Hospital to help patients and was the only physician to stay with them for the duration of the storm, even though the hospital employed staff physicians. At the height of the storm Dr. Thompson delivered a baby and led 30 mothers with babies from the hospital's fourth floor, which was being destroyed by the typhoon, to safety on the first floor. As a result of his efforts, no lives were lost and no one was injured. On Jan. 25, 1963, Dr. Thompson received a citation from the Seventh Guam Legislature commending him for his "courage, calmness, and fortitude" during the typhoon. Included in the resolution was an expression of gratitude to the Guam SDA Clinic for "providing low cost medical assistance to all in the territory needing the same, without regard for race, color, or creed, all of which is in the highest traditions of the American Missionary Movement."

In 1969 Merritt Crawford was called to build a new clinic. The dental section was completed and opened in 1971, and the medical section was completed the next year. The clinic was built in such a way that a small hospital could be added. Seeking to expand its medical missionary work to other islands of Micronesia, the Guam clinic opened a branch dental clinic in Saipan in January 1973 with Steve Fisher, D.D.S., as the director. Dr. Fisher served more than 16 years at the Saipan clinic developing it into a highly successful, fully equipped, modern dental facility.

On Mar. 29, 1978, the Guam clinic opened a second branch clinic by transferring Dr. and Mrs. Robert Baker to Palau. Dr. Baker, an optometrist, oversaw the construction of the clinic, which was initially to provide eye services only. In 1990 the Palau clinic was moved to a larger building donated by Mr. Roman Tmetuchl, a prominent SDA Palauan businessperson. The expanded clinic offered medical, dental, and eye services. Dr. David Allen, an internist, was called to oversee its construction and serve as its first director.

In 1991 and 1992 the Guam clinic received requests from the governor and legislators of Chuuk to start a branch medical clinic in Moen, the most populous island of Chuuk state. Plans were laid to start a branch clinic in Chuuk in 1994.

Guatemala

GUATEMALA. The most westerly of the Central American republics, bounded on the west and north by Mexico and on the east by Belize, Honduras, and El Salvador. The country is mountainous, the interior being crossed by elevated mountain ranges, with many active and inactive volcanoes. It contains some of the most fertile soil in America, and is primarily an agricultural country, with coffee being the principal export. Guatemala, situated in the tropics, presents a great diversity of climate, with three well-marked climatic zones: cold, temperate, and hot. Its area is 42,042 square miles (110,000 square kilometers). The population (1994) of 10.7 million is composed mainly of mestizos and Indians. Most of the inhabitants live in the highland regions, with small concentrations in the coastal lowlands.

Spanish is the official language, but it is unknown to thousands who speak one or another of the various Indian dialects. Roman Catholicism is the predominant religion, but freedom of worship is accorded to all.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. E. L. Cardey and C. A. Nowlen began work in the city of Guatemala in 1908. They acquired an English language school and converted it into a missionary enterprise under the name Guatemala English School. The school had seven teachers, with whom they organized the first Sabbath school.

In 1913 J. B. Stuyvesant and his family arrived in Guatemala to direct the English school, which was disconnected from the mission the following year. When the Guatemala Mission was organized in 1913, he became its first president, serving until 1917. Under his leadership the work was begun in several towns adjacent to the capital.

E. W. Thurber arrived in Guatemala in October 1917 and assumed the presidency of the mission in January 1918. Under his administration the property where the former Guatemala Mission offices and the main church in the city of Guatemala are situated was acquired.

According to the mission records, some of the first church members were: Abrahan Espinosa, José Angel López, María Anita de López, X. Molina, Julio Molina, and Adrian Alcantara.

Fred Owen established the work in the city of Quezaltenango with a major evangelistic campaign, which resulted in another Sabbath school. From 1925 to 1927 the El Salvador Mission and the Guatemala Mission were both administered by one president, with headquarters in Guatemala. These fields were both part of the Aztec Union until 1926, at which time the Central American Union was organized. Orley Ford (who became director in 1931) extended the work to other departments of the country.

Evangelism among the Maya Quiche Indians was begun under the leadership of Moisés Tahay. A school was organized in 1948, known as the Centro Cultural Indigenista (“Indian Cultural Center”). As a result there are several Indian workers, with 12 churches, 14 organized groups, and many branch Sabbath schools among this large section of the Indian population.

The Asociación Cultural de Guatemala (“Cultural Association of Guatemala”), established in 1948, is a legal association authorized by the government to hold denominational properties. The Seventh-day Adventist Church was first registered in Guatemala as an organization in 1956.

Medical work was begun in 1962 at a rural clinic known as Vista Hermosa, near San Cristobal, Totonicapán, established by Drs. Antonio Solares and Felícito Fernando especially for the treatment of rural communities. Later another rural clinic opened in Santa Ana, Momostenango.

The first colporteurs came in 1911. The first church and MV Society were organized in 1913, and the first Dorcas Welfare Society in 1931. In 1965 there were five elementary schools. Other phases of the work include radiobroadcasting, AY camps, Pathfinder Clubs, and active temperance programs.

Guenin, Jules Cesar

GUENIN, JULES CESAR (1883—1965). Evangelist, teacher, author, and administrator. He was born in Switzerland and was baptized into the Seventh-day Adventist Church in 1898. Four years later he began work as a colporteur and also attended a Bible School conducted in Geneva. From 1904 to 1905 he attended the Latin Union School at Gland. Later he served as evangelist in France, director of the North Africa Mission, Algeria (1914—1919), principal of the Latin Union School at Îmes, France (1919—1920), director of the Portuguese Mission (1924—1925), teacher at the Séminaire Adventiste du Salève (1928—1931), president of the South France Conference (1938—1945), president of the Franco-Belgian Union (1945—1950), and president of the French-Swiss Conference (1950—1953). After retirement he looked after the interests of the Bible correspondence school and also taught at Séminaire Adventiste. He was married to Marguerite Jauvert in 1907. Throughout his life he was a regular contributor to the French language denominational periodicals. He also wrote textbooks on the Bible for use in seminary classes.

Gugel, Emil

GUGEL, EMIL (1879—1958). Pioneer minister and leader in Germany. He began his missionary career as a literature evangelist in 1904 in the Rhineland, then from 1905 to 1911 served as traveling preacher in western Germany. In 1911 he was ordained to the ministry and soon afterward was elected president of the Württemberg Conference. Subsequently he was president of the German-Swiss Conference (1919—1925), and from 1925 to 1934, successively, of the South Bavarian Conference, Central European Union, and South German Union. In 1934 he became president of the German Inter-Union Association and from 1937 until his retirement in 1948 served as field secretary and secretary of the ministerial association of the Central European Division (Section I).

Guide

GUIDE (1953— ; Oct. 7, 1953—Dec. 25, 1963, as Junior Guide; weekly; RH; 1994 circulation, 34,000; file in RH; indexed in the SDA Periodical Index, 1971—). A paper for readers aged 10 through 14. The first official action that led to the publishing of Guide was probably a meeting of the officers of the General Conference during the Autumn Council in 1951, from which came a recommendation to “give study to the adjusting of the content of our existing children’s and youth’s papers so as to provide a journal especially adapted to the junior age group.”

On Apr. 9, 1952, during the spring meeting of the General Conference Committee, it was voted “that a journal be provided for junior youth” from 10 years to 15. On Oct. 20 it was voted that the Review and Herald should be the publisher, and on Nov. 20 it was voted to call Lawrence Maxwell from the Northern California Conference to be the editor.

Through a contest announced in the pages of the Youth’s Instructor, the title Junior Guide (submitted by 225 out of 1,600 entries) was adopted.

The first issue, dated Oct. 7, 1953, contained 16 pages. There were three stories, an editorial, an article on the MV Honor in stars, instructions on making a crystal radio set and a tight-line telephone, news of Pathfinder activities, and the junior Sabbath school lesson.

Beginning with volume 2 in January 1954, the number of pages was increased to 24, and the size was reduced. Further reductions were made Jan. 4, 1967, and July 4, 1973. The printing was in one color until January 1967, when a second color was added to each issue.

Beginning with the first issue of 1964, the name was changed to Guide and the earliten Sabbath school lessons were added. A switch to offset printing and an increase to 32 pages were accomplished with the Mar. 18 issue.

Each issue uses several communication methods and styles of writing. These include true stories, parables and allegories, Christian humor, and truth-conveying fiction. Along with life-changing stories, young readers enjoy special columns that provide honest answers to tough questions today’s juniors are asking, encourage readers to react from a biblical perspective to current events, give problem-solving advice from Christian counselors, and help readers find their way through the Bible. The first issue of each month is specially crafted for sharing with a friend who may not know Jesus. Twice a year the entire issue is a cover-to-cover story that invites the reader to choose Jesus as Saviour and Friend.

Guild, Cecil Bennett

GUILD, CECIL BENNETT (1908—1974). Missionary, treasurer, administrator. The son of a Seventh-day Adventist minister, he was born in Michigan and studied at Cedar Lake Academy and Emmanuel Missionary College. After graduating in 1931, he married Nora Dunn, and the following year they sailed for China. After three years of language study, Guild was appointed manager of the West China Training Institute. The following year he became director of the West Szechwan Mission. During this period of leadership, 1938, he was ordained to the ministry.

When China was invaded during World War II, Guild was director of the Honan Mission. The family evacuated to Chungking, where he carried on evangelistic work. Later he was made superintendent of West China Union Mission. In 1949, while he was serving the Voice of Prophecy work in China, the Communists encircled Shanghai. The Guilds then joined the Southern Asia Division, where he took up the presidency of the Western India Union until 1952, when he became president of the Burma Union. In 1962 he was appointed treasurer of the Southern Asia Division, and in 1966 he became secretary of the division.

Guimaraes, Ruth Oberg

GUIMARAES, RUTH OBERG (1912—1975). Educator. She attended Brazil College in São Paulo, Brazil, graduating in 1933 with a degree in teaching and in theology. In 1938 she married Jose Guimaraes, who also taught at the college. Mrs. Guimaraes taught at all levels at Brazil College in a variety of disciplines. She composed the college hymn and translated hymns for the school's Carlos Gomes choir.

Guinea

GUINEA. A republic on the west coast of Africa, independent since 1958, bounded by Guinea-Bissau, Senegal, and Mali on the north, by Côte d' Ivoire on the east, and by Liberia and Sierra Leone on the south. The capital is Conakry. It has an area about 95,000 square miles (250,000 square kilometers), and a population (1994) of 6.4 million, mainly Blacks. Eighty-five percent are Muslims; 8 percent are Christians.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. In 1987 and 1988 a lay SDA couple from Europe quietly witnessed to their faith. In April 1992 the first war refugees from Liberia arrived in Guinea, including a number of Seventh-day Adventists and a licensed pastor, W. Oloysius. They soon began witnessing for their faith. ADRA/Guinea is the most important nongovernment organization in the country. The work is being strengthened further by workers from Adventist Frontier Missions, who are learning the Mandingo language.

Guinea-Bissau

GUINEA-BISSAU. A former Portuguese colony that became independent in September 1974. Lying on the extreme west coast of Africa, it has an area of 13,948 square miles (36,300 square kilometers), with a population (1994) of 1.1 million. The capital is Bissau. The principal occupation of the people is agriculture, with rice, palm oil, peanuts, coconuts, and timber the chief exports.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. In 1963 there were only two adherents to the SDA faith in the country—a woman and her niece. Without knowing of the existence of the Seventh-day Adventist Church, the aunt had begun to keep the Sabbath in 1955, after reading a borrowed book, A Nossa Epoca e o Destino do Mundo, a translation of Our Day in the Light of Prophecy, by W. A. Spicer. Without doubt one of the colporteurs from Portugal, who have periodically worked in Guinea-Bissau, placed that book. Later the director of the Cape Verde Mission made plans to send a missionary. In November 1955 G. S. Rosa brought his family to Bissau, the capital, hoping to work as a traveling salesperson and to begin missionary work. His request for residence was refused on the grounds that there were not a sufficient number of adherents to his religion to warrant admission. In 1973 a missionary, Francisco Cordas, was sent from Portugal with his family. At the beginning of 1974 a church of 15 members was organized in Bissau. Guinea-Bissau was organized as a mission in 1985.

History

History. Beginnings in Alabama. Seventh-day Adventist evangelism in Alabama was begun by Jesse Morgan Elliott (sometimes spelled Ellett), a Southern Unionist who had fought in the Federal army and had been discharged when he lost his eyesight. Having embraced the SDA faith while in the North, and having returned to his home in Alabama after the war, he went about teaching his new beliefs. He awakened a great interest among the people and gathered groups of converts. A call for an SDA minister sent in May 1873 to E. B. Lane, an evangelist in Edgefield Junction, near Nashville, Tennessee, remained unanswered for several years for lack of someone to send. In 1876 D. M. Canright briefly visited Alabama. By 1878, when A. O. Burrill and his wife came to Bladon (Bladen) Springs, there were already 50 or 60 converts in the state of Alabama, nearly all the fruit of Elliott's work. Burrill organized a church at Bladon Springs and held evangelistic meetings. Then early in 1880 C. O. Taylor spent three weeks there. In December 1880, J. O. Corliss, who had been sent to visit the churches in the South, ordained J. M. Elliott to the ministry and licensed J. R. Waite to preach. Interest was further developed in this area through personal work, Bible studies, the colporteur work, and through copies of the Review sent from the North and West.

As early as 1885 Peter H. Clark established himself in the Gulf City Hotel in Mobile, Alabama, opened a reading room, and carried on personal evangelism through distributing publications. In 1894 the second SDA church in Alabama was organized in Montgomery. In Birmingham a mission established in February 1887 by S. S. Smith and C. W. Olds was succeeded by a church organized in 1898. Early evangelists used schools, halls, and private homes for meeting places. In 1896 a school was opened in Huntsville for Black young people; it later became Oakwood College.

Alabama Conference Organized. The Alabama Conference was organized in 1901, covering that state; by 1908 the territory included also seven counties in western Florida: Calhoun, Escambia, Holmes, Jackson, Santa Rosa, Walton, Washington; in the 1920s two more were added (Bay and Okaloosa). The first officers of the conference were: president, W. L. McNeely; secretary, A. C. Bird; treasurer, C. E. Giles; secretary of education, W. L. Bird; state (canvassing) agent, C. J. Dart. There were four ministers and two licentiates. The Alabama Conference continued until 1932, when the Alabama-Mississippi Conference was formed. Alabama headquarters were variously in Selma, Birmingham, Fort Payne, and Clanton.

Beginnings in Mississippi. SDAs were found in Mississippi as early as the beginning of 1880. One was Peter H. Clark, in Jackson County, who had heard the SDA message in Texas at least two years earlier and whom C. O. Taylor urged to preach. J. M. Elliott, of Alabama, preached at Otho, Jasper County, in 1880, where C. O. Taylor baptized seven in 1881. Taylor preached also at Ellisville, in Jones County. In 1885 R. B. Hewitt held a series of meetings at Beauregard, gathering a company of 16 believers, and organizing a Sabbath school. There was a church in Hatley in 1898, and groups of adherents met also at Amory, Tupelo, and Burnsville.

Around the turn of the century J. E. White and a group of workers, including W. O. Palmer and Fred Rogers, operated the river steamer Morning Star (built in 1894 by White in Allegan, Michigan) on the Mississippi from its base at Vicksburg, Mississippi, and later on the Cumberland, from its new base at Nashville, Tennessee, as a private mission enterprise and worked for the Black people. (For the beginnings of the Black work in Mississippi see South Central Conference; Southern Missionary Society.)

Work among the White people of Vicksburg was begun in November 1902 by F. R. Rogers, who had come to Mississippi to superintend the Black schools conducted by J. E. White's Southern Missionary Society. There was much prejudice, but Rogers and his wife showed themselves friendly to their White neighbors, especially to the children, and opened a small school. At first their son Chester was the only pupil, but interest increased and the school began to grow. A Sunday school was also begun, which drew 40 to 50 adults and children. In a short time Rogers had gained 11 adult converts, with five children. Later 10 miles (16 kilometers) in the country he held meetings under the trees and aroused much interest. To aid him in his evangelism he sold or gave away, besides books, many copies of Signs of the Times, Our Little Friend, Life Boat, and Good Health. His work resulted in the organization of several home Sabbath schools.

Mississippi Conference Organized. The Mississippi Conference was organized at the camp meeting held at Hatley, July 26 to Aug. 4, 1901, with R. M. Kilgore presiding. In that year there were three churches, five companies, and 182 members. A constitution was adopted, and Rodney S. Owen was elected conference president; W. J. Blake, secretary-treasurer; F. R. Rogers, Sabbath school secretary and superintendent of schools; and H. W. Pierce, state (canvassing) agent. Owen and Pierce were the only ordained ministers. An Ellisville-Laurel church was organized in 1904. A charter member reports that the Hattiesburg church stems from a company formed in 1905 with 21 members, which was organized as a church in 1914.

The first SDA church in Jackson, the state capital, was organized in 1912 with 13 charter members. More members were added the same year as the result of evangelistic meetings conducted in the conference office building by C. S. Wiest, the incoming conference president. (Until 1917 the conference president served also as pastor of the Jackson church.) At the end of 1912 the Mississippi Conference had six churches and 159 members.

Louisiana-Mississippi Conference. From 1920 to 1932 the Mississippi and Louisiana conferences were united as the Louisiana-Mississippi Conference, with the headquarters for the new conference remaining at Jackson, Mississippi. The first president of this combined conference was William Randolph Elliott, son of Jesse M. Elliott, the pioneer evangelist of Alabama and Mississippi. (For Louisiana, see Arkansas-Louisiana Conference.)

Alabama-Mississippi Conference Organized. In 1932, when the Louisiana section was transferred to the Southwestern Union Conference, the states of Alabama and Mississippi were united into one conference, retaining the nine counties of northwest Florida, which had previously made up a part of the Alabama Conference, and adding Gulf County. R. I. Keate became the first president of the newly organized Alabama-Mississippi Conference. Shortly after the organization the headquarters were moved from Jackson to Meridian, Mississippi. In 1946 the Black constituency of Alabama-Mississippi Conference separated to become part of the South Central Conference.

Many of the churches organized in the Alabama-Mississippi Conference in recent years were the result of evangelistic campaigns conducted by district pastors. From 1955 through 1962 the conference membership increased about 40 percent; 21 new church organizations were added, and about as many new church buildings. During this same period a

$2 million school, Bass Memorial Academy (opened in September 1961), was built in southern Mississippi as a result of a gift from I. H. Bass of Lumberton.

The years 1963 to 1975 were years of both consolidation and continued growth. During this period 22 congregations acquired new church plants. Eight new churches were organized. The million-dollar mark in tithe was first reached in 1972, and in 1973 total conference membership passed the 5,000 mark.

In 1968 the conference acquired a 60-acre (25-hectare) peninsula on Lake Martin, near Dadeville, Alabama, and proceeded to develop Camp Alamisco. Buildings constructed included: lodge with family rooms, dining hall, and chapel; five camper and staff cabins; a headquarters-gymnasium complex; and various storage buildings. There are housing accommodations for the camp ranger.

The conference headquarters was moved from Meridian, Mississippi, to Montgomery, Alabama, in 1973, after careful study indicated the entire territory could best be served from the new location. Building of a new office, prominently located on a suburban five-acre (two-hectare) lot seven miles (11 kilometers) east of downtown Montgomery, was begun in the fall of 1974. The $300,000 plant was completed in the spring of 1975.

Gulf States Conference. In 1984 the constituency voted to rename the conference in order that Florida constituents would also be included in the name.

Gutzeit, Elza

GUTZEIT, ELZA (1900—1982). Educator, pioneer missionary. After graduating from Brazil College with a degree in education, she left with her husband for Barnunai Island, where they opened a mission compound for the Indians of the Carajá tribe. She also served as dean of women and the first teacher at Esp'rito Santo Academy.

In 1950, after her husband's death, she moved to the Trans-Amazon area, where she helped to establish the Agro-Industrial Adventist Trans-Amazon Academy. When nearly 80 years old, she continued to teach Bible and English. After her retirement in 1980, she led 23 neighbors to baptism during an evangelistic effort.

Guyana

GUYANA. The only English-speaking cooperative republic in the world; formerly British Guiana. Having gained its independence from Great Britain on May 26, 1966, Guyana became a cooperative republic on Feb. 23, 1969. Guyana is situated on the northeast coast of South America on the Atlantic Ocean, between Suriname on the east, and Venezuela on the west. Brazil is on the south and west. It covers an area of 83,000 square miles (215,000 square kilometers), and has a population (1994) of 730,000, composed of Indians (of India heritage), Blacks, and those of mixed race. Most of the people live along the coast. The chief products of the country are sugar, rice, bauxite, timber, gold, and diamonds. The area was occupied by the Dutch in the seventeenth century, but in 1814 three colonies, Berbice, Essequibo, and Demerara, came under British administration. In 1831 they were joined into a single colony and called British Guiana, which is the only English-speaking country on the mainland of South America.

Christianity was brought to the country in the early days of settlement, but the slaves learned little of it until the eighteenth century, when Moravian missionaries became active in the area. During the nineteenth century thousands were brought from India to work on the sugar plantations, and thus Hinduism and Islam both have a large number of adherents.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. Seventh-day Adventist teachings reached British Guiana in 1883, making it the first country on the continent of South America to receive the SDA message. According to early accounts, W. J. Boynton, a worker at the International Tract Society office in New York, in that year gave a bundle of SDA papers to the captain of a ship bound for Georgetown, requesting him to distribute them when he arrived there. On reaching the port, the captain scattered them on the wharf, saying, "I have fulfilled my promise." A man standing by gathered some of the papers, read them, and lent them to his neighbors. Soon there was a group keeping the seventh-day Sabbath.

The new converts corresponded with the International Tract Society and a colporteur was found who proceeded to British Guiana and distributed SDA publications sent to him. Presumably this colporteur was T. E. Amsterdam, a recent convert, who in 1886 reported having held Sabbath services and weekday public meetings for Bible study in several places, and having organized the South American Tract Society, with branches in several communities.

In 1887 the General Conference responded to requests from British Guiana by sending a minister, G. G. Rupert. During his stay of three or four months he baptized 30 persons and organized the first Seventh-day Adventist church and Sabbath school in Georgetown. George King, an early SDA colporteur, accompanied Rupert and sold about $800 worth of books. In 1891 another of the pioneer SDA colporteurs, William Arnold, canvassed the territory. In 1892 L. C. Chadwick visited the country for 22 days, during which he encouraged the members and baptized 24 persons. When he left, the members in British Guiana numbered 41. The first resident minister, W. G. Kneeland, arrived at Georgetown late in December 1893. Two years later, in 1895, he organized another church at Bootooba, situated about 90 miles (145 kilometers) from Georgetown.

In 1895 Philip Giddings, who had been among the first converts in British Guiana, returned from training at Battle Creek College and became the first national evangelist. At the same time, an attempt was made to open medical work, but it was unsuccessful because of the lack of a physician with British certification.

Responding to a plea for a missionary, O. E. Davis, superintendent of the mission, who had been in British Guiana since 1906, in 1910 pioneered the work among the Indians in the interior. In 1911 he reached Mount Roraima on the British Guiana-Venezuela-Brazil border and attempted to establish a mission there, but weakened by repeated attacks of malaria, he died after having made some converts. About 1925 C. B. Sutton and W. E. Baxter were sent to search out these Indians. They found them still singing "Jesus knows all about our struggles" and other hymns that Davis had taught them. In 1927 A. W. Cott established work there. Because of Davis's work among them, these Indians, belonging chiefly to the Akawaio (or Accawai) and Arecuna tribes, are known among SDAs as the "Davis" Indians. In 1929 or 1930 Joseph Gonsalves and A. W. Cott and his wife reported meeting with Indians in the same area who had known about the seventh-day Sabbath, clean foods, and temperate living as a result of a vision seen by their chief some years before Davis's trip. Many of the Mount Roraima Indians were baptized after 1930 and a mission school was later established in the area.

Educational Work. In 1907, the year following the organization of the British Guiana Conference, the Statistical Report listed two small schools. The next year it listed three. According to the account given by Wesley Amundsen in his book The Advent Message in Inter-America, about 1909 two schools were operated in the suburbs of Georgetown especially for the children of India heritage and a third, situated up the Essequibo River, was taught by Johannah H. Daw, later Mrs. E. E. Parchment. He related that there were no regular budgets for the educational work, and that it was supported by contributions from people concerned with Christian education. For example, for more than seven years the school on the Essequibo River was supported by an SDA layperson in North America. A school established at Bootooba on the Demerara River some years later was in 1963 the oldest continuously operating school in the mission. The government no longer allows private schools.

Medical Work. In 1908 R. N. Graves, a national of British Guiana, returned home with a British medical diploma and practiced for some time. After an interval the work was reestablished in 1952. E. C. Duerksen, a physician, arrived in 1954 to take charge of the medical work, and was joined in 1955 by Oliver J. Pogue, also a physician. In July 1955 the Davis Memorial Clinic and Hospital in Georgetown began taking in patients.

Development of Organization. The British Guiana Mission began in 1894 with the arrival of the resident minister. The first step in formal organization was taken late in 1897, when the mission work in the Caribbean area was coordinated as the West Indian Mission Field, with A. J. Haysmer as superintendent. In 1903 the East Caribbean Conference, including British Guiana, was organized. A further step was taken in 1906 when the West Indian Union Conference was formed and British Guiana became one of its five organized conferences. Sometime later the territory was linked with the South Caribbean Conference. In 1924 the three Guianas-British, Dutch, and French-became one mission, with D. C. Babcock as superintendent. They were organized into the Guiana Conference in 1926. In January 1945 the Guianas were divided into three separate fields, the territory of British Guiana becoming the British Guiana Mission, under the Caribbean Union Mission.

Haad Yai Mission Hospital

HAAD YAI MISSION HOSPITAL. A general hospital with a capacity of 30 beds and eight bassinets, formerly operated by the Southeast Asia Union at Haad Yai, a town on the Bangkok-Singapore railway line, about 20 miles (30 kilometers) southwest of Songkhla, in the southern part of Thailand, near the Malaysian border.

Seventh-day Adventist work in Haad Yai was begun by Ronald C. Gregory, M.D., who on Oct. 5, 1949, opened a medical clinic in a small rented hotel, where he and his family lived. Beginning as a branch of the Bangkok Sanitarium and Hospital, the clinic grew rapidly, and plans were soon drawn to build a hospital. In 1953 the foundation for a 20-bed brick hospital building was laid on a two-acre (.8-hectare) plot of land donated by Chee Kim Joong, and on July 1, 1954, Haad Yai Mission Hospital opened its doors.

In 1959 a wing was added to the building, making a 30-bed hospital, including outpatient facilities. In 1971 a clinic was opened in downtown Haad Yai, where all outpatients were treated.

In addition to the workers' living quarters built on the donated land, a modest chapel with a seating capacity of 100 was built in 1956. When the hospital was established, it was the only such institution in town. By the early 1980s it faced keen competition from seven other hospitals, including a large teaching facility in Haad Yai. As a result, it incurred heavy operating losses for several years.

In October 1985 it was decided that Haad Yai should operate as a satellite of Bangkok Adventist Hospital for a trial period of two years. In February 1986 the Bangkok facility took over control of the smaller hospital. A three-story building was purchased and renovated for use as a city clinic, which opened for business on Apr. 22, 1986. Because of a lack of administration staff and physicians, Bangkok Adventist Hospital turned the operation of Haad Yai back to the Southeast Asia Union Mission on Aug. 1, 1987. Because of a lack of funds and personnel, the hospital closed its doors on Feb. 15, 1988.

Habenicht, Herald Ambrose

HABENICHT, HERALD AMBROSE (1906—1974). Teacher and administrator. A native of Argentina, he graduated from Emmanuel Missionary College and the University of Michigan. After serving on the faculties of Indiana and Shenandoah Valley academies, he became director of Montemorelos College in Mexico. Later he served in the same capacity at the Central American Vocational College in Costa Rica.

Returning to the United States, he joined the faculty of Adelpian Academy and later was called to a position on the La Sierra College faculty.

Habenicht, Robert H.

HABENICHT, ROBERT H. (1866—1925). Physician, missionary. Educated at Battle Creek College, he entered the ministry in Iowa in 1888. From 1893 to 1898 he spent the summers in ministerial work and the winters in taking the medical course at Iowa State University. After his graduation he was appointed director of the Iowa Sanitarium (1899). From 1901 to 1922 he engaged in ministerial and medical work in Argentina and founded the River Plate Sanitarium in 1908. After a period in the United States, although feeble in health, he later returned to Brazil with the hope of continuing his work, but died shortly after arriving in São Paulo.

Hackett, Willis J.

HACKETT, WILLIS J. (1915—1993). Pastor, evangelist, missionary, administrator. Born in Mullen, Nebraska, he attended Union College, graduating in 1939 with a degree in theology. He met his wife Margaret at Boulder Sanitarium, and they were married in 1937. Two sons were born of this union. The first 19 years of his ministry were spent in pastoral, evangelistic, and departmental work in the United States. In 1952 he was called to the Far East, where he served in the division and as president of the North Philippine Union.

In 1958 the family returned to the United States, where Willis served as president of Atlantic and Pacific union conferences. He became a vice president of the General Conference in 1968, in which position he served until retirement in 1980. Part of his duties consisted of serving on and chairing many boards, including the Loma Linda University and Andrews University boards.

After his wife's death in 1987, he married Thelma Trude. They lived and served in the Northwest until Willis' sudden death in 1993.

Hackettstown Community Hospital

HACKETTSTOWN COMMUNITY HOSPITAL. A fully accredited, 106-bed acute health-care facility set amid the rolling hills of northwestern New Jersey, about one hour west of New York City.

Hackettstown Community Hospital came about as the result of a dream that started in the 1940s. As the years passed, an entire community purposed to work together to make that dream a reality.

The going was not easy. Financial roadblocks seemed almost insurmountable following a long period of frustration during which changing hospital regulations caused plans to be drawn and redrawn, and costs to go higher and still higher. Providence intervened in 1967 during an Ingathering visit between two Seventh-day Adventist ministers and a Hackettstown banker. The discussion turned to the worldwide chain of SDA-operated hospitals. The arrival on the scene of one of the proposed hospital's board members prompted the banker to suggest that the SDA Church build a hospital in Hackettstown. Subsequent discussions and events led the hospital board, unable to see their way around funding difficulties, to invite the Columbia Union Conference to assume ownership, control, and management of the hospital-to-be.

The Seventh-day Adventists and the community then took on the task of financing and building the hospital together as a team—individuals, families, small businesses, large corporations, foundations, service clubs, and government and SDA Church representatives. Through pledges, grants, fund drives, the “Bucket Brigade,” and other sources, amounts large and small poured in. Ultimately, thanks to God's providence and the vision and dedication of many people, the hospital opened its doors in February 1973.

Small yet innovative, Hackettstown Community Hospital offers services and technology available at much larger hospitals, while offering a dimension of caring and personal attention these might find difficult to offer.

The range of services includes traditional and laser surgery, 24-hour emergency care, approved cancer care, new operating/recovery area, new intensive care/coronary care and intermediate telemetry units, same-day surgery program, family-centered maternity care, laboratory/pathology area, Radiology Department featuring CT scanner, nuclear medicine and approved mammography program, physical therapy and other rehabilitative services, substance abuse services, sleep disorder program, pain management center, and more.

True to its SDA heritage, Hackettstown Community Hospital goes to great lengths to instill in people an attitude of illness prevention so they'll never have to come to the hospital to get well. This they accomplish through educational programs offered through the year to residents, local corporations, schools, and community groups. Strong efforts are also put forth through a variety of screenings to help identify health problems before they become life-threatening. While it is true that every department at Hackettstown Community Hospital has as its ultimate mission the salvation of patients, its Pastoral Care Department officially carries forward the spiritual component of the healing process. Among the ongoing activities and projects are an active literature distribution program, the ministry of a staff singing group that cheers patients daily, grief recovery programs, 24-hour SDA television programming, and daily staff worships.

Hackettstown Community Hospital is committed to joining other SDA health-care institutions in assisting Christ as He continues His ministry of healing sick bodies, minds, and souls.

Hackettstown Community Hospital is part of Adventist Healthcare Mid-Atlantic Corporation.

Upon graduation from the Mount Vernon Academy in 1918, he entered home missionary work, first as an assistant secretary and later as secretary of the department in the Ohio Conference (1919—1920). Still later he served as home missionary secretary of the Southeastern Union (1920—1924) and as assistant and associate home missionary secretary of the General Conference (1924—1934). After that he served as president of the Southeastern California Conference (1934—1940), the Northern California Conference (1940—1943), the Southern Union (1943—1947), and the Inter-American Division (1947—1950).

Hadley Memorial Hospital

HADLEY MEMORIAL HOSPITAL. A former nonprofit 80-bed general hospital incorporated, owned, and operated by the Columbia Union Conference of Seventh-day Adventists, situated on a hill overlooking the Potomac River at 4601 Martin Luther King, Jr., Avenue SW., Washington, D.C. It was accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals and was a member of the American Hospital Association. It received patients from far and near, regardless of race, creed, color, national origin, or sex, ranging from the diplomatic to the indigent.

The hospital grew out of the work of the Washington Sanitarium Mission Hospital (commonly called “the clinic”), which opened in 1914 under the direction of Dr. L. E. Elliott in the historic Thomas Law house at 1252 Sixth Street SW. The clinic was operated by the Washington Sanitarium (now Washington Adventist Hospital), and in the beginning, also, the Foreign Missionary Seminary (now Columbia Union College). Its purpose was to minister to the indigent and to serve as a training center for postgraduate nurses and foreign mission appointees.

Dr. Henry G. Hadley and his wife were placed in charge of the work in 1919. In 1923 the Hadleys purchased the building, built up a self-supporting work, and in the spring of 1930, gave the property to the General Conference. Again from 1933 until it closed in 1961, Dr. Hadley carried on the clinic and in connection with it an active research program in the immunization field.

In 1945 Dr. Hadley purchased six acres (2.5 hectares) on Nichols Avenue SW. in the name of the General Conference. On it he erected Hadley Memorial Hospital, a three-story brick structure, completely air-conditioned, with all the modern facilities of a general hospital. It was opened on July 29, 1952, with the transfer of seven patients from the old clinic (which continued separately until 1961), and was dedicated free of debt in 1955. All the money needed for this new institution, except about 1 percent given by friends, was raised from the earnings of the Sixth Street clinic, which had a large paying clientele in addition to the indigent patients. In 1952 the ownership of the property was transferred to the Potomac Conference and in 1957 to the Columbia Union Conference.

In 1992 the hospital was sold to a nondenominational group.

Administrators: H. G. Hadley, 1952—1962; Harvey A. Rudisaile, 1962—1967; C. O. Eldridge, 1967—1969; James Suzuki, 1969—1985; Albert L. Dudley, 1986—1992.

Haffner, Gottfried F.

HAFFNER, GOTTFRIED F. (1867—1920). Minister. He was born in Tscherbakowski, Russia, and at the age of 9 came with his parents to the United States and settled in Lehigh, Kansas, where he accepted the Seventh-day Adventist faith. After spending three years in Battle Creek College and one year in the Bible Institute in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, he began preaching in the Missouri Conference in 1889. Shortly thereafter he went to the Oregon Conference and worked among the German-speaking people. After about two years he was transferred to the Washington Conference, where he worked for eight years, establishing a number of German churches. About 1899 he was transferred to the Oklahoma Conference, where after one year in pastoral and evangelistic work he was elected president of the conference, which position he held from 1902 to 1905. Until 1917, when failing health led to his resignation, he was leader of the German work in North America.

Hahn, Franklin B.

Hahn, Franklin B. (1809—1866). Physician of Canandaigua, New York, president of the village corporation, and secretary of the Ontario County Medical Society, and a Millerite. As a good Bible student he joined Crosier and Edson in intensive study of the sanctuary doctrine in the winter of 1844—1845. It was at his house that Crosier wrote out their joint findings on the subject.

Hahn published the Day-Dawn (which Crosier edited) in 1845, and in 1846, with Edson, financed the Day-Star Extra containing Crosier's article. He accepted the Sabbath with Edson, but by 1851 he had apparently reverted to the Sundaykeeping majority.

Hahnkook Academy

HAHNKOOK ACADEMY (Hahnkook Sahmyook Joongkodeung Hakkyo) (Korean College Academy). A coeducational boarding and day school on the junior and senior high school levels, located on the Korean Sahmyook University campus, Seoul, Korea. Owing to disruptions of World War II, the secondary school in Seoul, which had opened in 1938, was closed. It was reopened in the fall of 1947, with 113 students. In 1949 the school secured 210 acres (85 hectares) of land from the Yee Dynasty Estates and moved to its present location.

During the Korean War four students were killed and four others were captured by the North Koreans, and the school was transferred to Cheju Island. At the end of 1952 the school was reopened in Seoul.

The school received the title of “Outstanding Academy” from the provincial government for its ideal environment and high quality of education. In 1980 the main school building was constructed, an auditorium followed in 1986, a new school building in 1991, and a language lab in 1992. There are 60 faculty members and 1,350 students.

Haile Selassie I Hospital

HAILE SELASSIE I HOSPITAL. A 46-bed hospital operated for 41 years by the Ethiopian Union Mission in Debre Tabor, Ethiopia. Debre Tabor is situated 9,000 feet (2,750 meters) above sea level in Begemder Province, about 50 miles (80 kilometers) east of Lake Tana, the source of the Blue Nile. Many of its 7,000 inhabitants are very poor.

The task of establishing a mission station and hospital at Debre Tabor was assigned to G. Gudmundsen, a veteran missionary from Norway. His assignment was difficult: the terrain was mountainous, and there were no roads. All iron sheets for the roof and some other materials had to be transported on mules from Addis Ababa, a six-week round trip. The hospital was finished in 1934. The main building was a stone structure having seven rooms on each side of a center corridor. Emperor Haile Selassie I gave the project his name and 30,000 silver dollars (about US$20,000).

Upon completion of the hospital building, Erik Palm, a pioneer Seventh-day Adventist missionary in Ethiopia, began clinic work, which was interrupted, however, by the Italian war. After the war much work had to be done to restore the building, such as installing new doors and windows. At the same time the floors were set with cement and tile.

Regular hospital work began in 1947, when Roland Nielsen, M.D., from Denmark, became the first physician to direct the institution. The local people showed increasing confidence in the hospital. In 1973 the number of outpatients treated was 4,664, of whom 1,036 were admitted to the hospital. Although the collection of fees was difficult and much charity work was done, the hospital was on its way to becoming self-supporting.

A new clinic building of stone was completed in 1964, providing three more rooms for inpatients in addition to facilities for the care of outpatients—a waiting room, a reception room with connection to an examining room, a treatment room, a laboratory, and a room for minor surgery.

Nurses included Shake Nalkranian, an Armenian; Margit Halvorsen, a Norwegian; Else Schantz Christensen, a Dane; Margot Sponghagen, a Swede; and Carolyn Stuyvesant, an American. In 1973 a clinic was established in Addis Ager, an SDA community located 22 miles (35 kilometers) from Debre Tabor.

Haile Selassie I Hospital was nationalized in 1975.

Medical Directors: Roland Nielsen, 1947—1949; Kristian Hogganvik, 1949—1970; F. J. Myers, 1971—1973; Kristian Hogganvik, 1974—1975.

Haiti

HAITI. A Caribbean republic occupying the western third of the large island of Hispaniola, the rest of the island being the Dominican Republic. The island became a Spanish colony after it was discovered by Columbus in 1492, but late in the seventeenth century it was ceded to France and became her most prosperous possession, exporting considerable amounts of sugar and other tropical products. After the original Indian population had been decimated, the Spaniards and the French brought over large numbers of African slaves, whose descendants now populate the country. The French Revolution brought freedom to the slaves, and a later attempt to return them to slavery led to an armed resistance and the proclamation of independence in 1804. In 1820 the island became the world's first Black republic. Twenty-four years later, in 1844, the eastern part of the island declared its independence as the Dominican Republic, and since then Haiti has maintained its present boundaries.

The area of Haiti is 10,579 square miles (27,400 square kilometers), three fourths of which is mountainous. The population (1994) is 6.5 million. Haiti is the most densely populated country in Central America, with 600 persons per square mile (230 per square kilometer). Ninety-five percent of the people are of Black. White residents, mostly foreigners, number about 2,000. The official languages of Haiti are French and Creole, a mixture of early French and African tongues with an addition of English, Spanish, and Indian words. The official religion is Roman Catholicism, but Haiti practices religious freedom, and there are several Protestant bodies in the country, including Baptists, Anglicans, Pentecostals, Seventh-day Adventists, and others. Voodoo, a mixture of ceremony and African superstition, is still practiced.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. SDA doctrines first penetrated Haiti in 1879. In that year John N. Loughborough, then living in Southampton, England, and William Ings sent a box of books and tracts to Cap Haitien. Since they did not address it to anyone specifically, the steamship company delivered the box to the Episcopal missionary stationed in the city, who in turn distributed its contents among other Protestant missions nearby. On the following Sunday the Baptist missionary gave these publications to his congregation. Two young Jamaicans, Henry Williams and his wife, studied the tracts and began to keep the Sabbath. They procured other reading material from the publishers and circulated it among neighbors. More than 10 years later—in 1892—they met an SDA for the first time, L. C. Chadwick, who visited Haiti and in course of time baptized them. For many years, until several others joined them at the turn of the century, they apparently were the only SDAs in Haiti.

About 1904 or 1905 Michel Nord Isaac, a Methodist preacher and teacher who was longing for more spiritual light, knelt one day in a corner of his office and asked the Lord to help him find the truth. While he was still in prayer, someone knocked on the door. It was one of his pupils, who said: “Teacher, I have found among my father’s books at home one entitled The History of the Sabbath. Would you like to read it?” Isaac regarded this incident as a direct answer to prayer and was soon convinced that all he learned from the book was the truth.

Determined to live up to his knowledge, he began at once to preach his new beliefs, and published and circulated a tract in their defense. One of his friends helped him make contact with Henry Williams. Because of Isaac’s work, when the first SDA evangelist, W. Jay Tanner, went to Haiti in the fall of 1905, he found several groups of Sabbathkeepers waiting for him, including an entire congregation from one of the Protestant churches.

In December 1905 Tanner held the first baptisms. By the end of the year, about 40 to 50 persons, most of them well-educated and influential, had joined the church. During 1906 some 30 persons were added to the church, and Isaac entered the new areas of Limbé and Port Margo, preaching and organizing companies of converts.

Early in 1907 E. Fawer, a French-speaking worker, arrived from Europe to aid in the work. In November the first Seventh-day Adventist church in Haiti was organized at Grande Rivière, with 25 members; by the end of the year its membership had increased to 40, while the total membership stood at more than 80.

After Tanner left the field in 1911, Isaac, who had become a fervent and zealous preacher, served as leader during that time. By the end of the year there were four churches and five companies, with a total membership of about 190. The first church school was reported in that year also. In 1912 Albert F. Prieger took charge of the mission. In 1914 he was joined by E. A. Curdy, a French-speaking evangelist from Europe, and the church extended to new areas, among them Port-au-Prince, Saint-Marc, Trou du Nord, Gonaïves, and Saint-Michel-de-l’Atalaye.

Organization and Growth. Until 1914 the Haitian Mission was under the direction of the West Indian Union Conference, but in that year the mission was placed under General Conference direction as part of the Northern Latin American Missions group. The statistical report for that year listed eight churches, 273 baptized members, one ordained minister, two licensed ministers, two licensed missionaries, four colporteurs, and 14 Sabbath schools. Two years later, in 1916, the Haitian Mission counted 11 churches, 322 members, with 98 persons baptized during that year. The number of workers had increased to 11. By 1920 there were three ordained ministers, four licensed ministers, and six licensed missionaries, and the membership had increased to 617 baptized members meeting in 15 organized churches and several companies.

With the opening of Séminaire Adventiste d'Haiti (Haitian Seminary) with eight students and two teachers, under the leadership of Herminie Roth in 1921, the educational work on the secondary level began in Haiti. About that time the MV work also began, with the organization of a society of 28 members.

From 1918 to 1922 the work was headed by Pastor Andre G. Roth, who came from Switzerland. When he left, W. P. Elliott was appointed president and M. D. Howard, secretary-treasurer. In 1922 the Haitian Mission was assigned to the Inter-American Division. The work entered new areas, such as Jacmel and Plaisance, and the canvassing work grew under the direction of C. G. Parkins and D. Apollon. In 1924 the work was well spread across the land of Haiti, with churches or groups in Port-de-Paix, Gonaïves, Limonade, Jacmel, Ranquitte, Cerca-la-Source, Pignon, Bahon, Thomassique, and Cerca-Carvajal. From 1924 the Haitian Mission was under the direction of the Antillian Union Mission. By the end of that year the statistical report showed 23 churches, 750 baptized members, 16 workers, and 24 Sabbath schools, with a membership of 944.

In 1925 the Lay Activities Department was organized under the leadership of J. A. Decaenel. In the same year there were six church schools operating with nine teachers and an enrollment of 240. In this year the work entered Ouanaminthe. In 1928 Elliott was replaced by J. A. Decaenel. In 1930 the mission had 25 churches with a total membership of 1,561, and 45 Sabbath schools with 2,221 members. In 1932 the headquarters of the mission were transferred from Cap Haitien to Port-au-Prince. About that time two ministers, Dorce Dorsainvil and F. D. Apollon, entered the Cayes and held a series of meetings.

The statistical report of Dec. 31, 1947, listed 36 churches, 6,937 members, 126 Sabbath schools with 10,260 members, and 17 church schools. The welfare work was begun in 1947 under the direction of E. Veuthey, then president of the Haitian Mission. In April 1948 the first Voice of Hope Bible correspondence course was offered. As of Dec. 31, 1962, there were 7,846 students taking the three available courses offered in the French language.

In 1959 the Haitian field was divided into two missions: the North Haiti Mission, with headquarters at Cap Haitien, and the South Haiti Mission, with headquarters at Port-au-Prince.

As early as 1935 action was taken regarding the establishing of medical work in Haiti but the action became a reality only in April 1960, when the South Haiti Mission opened a small clinic near the Franco-Haitian Seminary. At present one polyclinic and one hospital, Adventist Hospital of Haiti, are being operated in Port-au-Prince and one health and welfare center in Cap-Haitien.

Franco-Haitian Union. In 1958 Haiti became part of the Franco-Haitian Union, formed of the French-speaking areas in the Caribbean: Haiti, which had been part of the Antillian Union, and French Guiana, Guadeloupe and dependencies, and Martinique, which had been part of the Caribbean Union. A. O. Dunn was chosen to be the first president of the Franco-Haitian Union, serving until July 1960.

In 1989 the Haitian Union Mission was formed, with Asser A. Jean-Pierre as its first president.

Haitian Adventist College

HAITIAN ADVENTIST COLLEGE (Université Adventiste d’Haiti). A coeducational boarding school on the senior college level, situated about five miles (eight kilometers) from Port-au-Prince, Haiti, and operated by the Haitian Union to serve a constituency of 164,053 (June 1993). At that time the secondary enrollment was 936 and the university enrollment was 571. These were served by 30 faculty members. In 1959 the Haitian government authorized the school to offer classwork leading toward the baccalaureate (U.S. high school) level. In the same year the General Conference Department of Education authorized work on the junior college level. In 1992 the university received official recognition from the government.

Two of the main industries are a printshop and a technical service. In July 1993 the school offered a master’s degree in religion as an extension program of Andrews University.

The school opened as the Séminaire Adventiste d’Haiti (Adventist Seminary of Haiti, also called Haitien Seminary) in October 1921, with Herminie L. Roth as director. There were eight students and two teachers. The school plant consisted of four buildings on the Vaudreuil estate of 15 acres (six hectares), five miles (eight kilometers) southwest of Cap Haitien. Only grades 9 through 12 were offered at that time. In 1926 the addition of the elementary grades resulted in total student enrollment of 50. Because of financial reverses the enrollment dwindled to 28 in 1927, and to 22 in 1930. However, during these years several faculty homes and industrial buildings were constructed. After reorganization, the 1932 school year began with 13 faculty members and 110 students. Because of the Depression, the institution did not operate during 1933—1934.

In 1934 the school was moved to Port-au-Prince, a more central site, nearer to markets for school industries as well as to the mission headquarters. Consequently, for the next two years the school was operated as a day school in a rented house in the northeast section of Port-au-Prince. The school’s printshop was installed in this building, and the woodwork shop in rented quarters on Rue du Centre. In 1935 the school was moved to a stone-and-wooden-frame building at the eastern end of the mission property on Avenue Joseph Nicolas and Magloire Ambroise. This structure housed the printshop and the woodwork shop. In the latter part of that year the Haitian government authorized the school to offer full secondary work, thus permitting students to sit for the official state examinations leading to the baccalaureate certificate. As a result of this recognition the enrollment in 1936 increased as follows: elementary, 103; secondary, 19; junior college, six. The name was changed from Séminaire Adventiste d’Haiti to Collège Vertières. The school remained on this site for 10 years, but during the latter part of this period the enrollment again declined and heavy indebtedness was incurred.

In 1945, under M. D. Howard as board chair, the college was transferred to a 78-acre (32-hectare) tract at Diquini, about four miles (six kilometers) southwest of Port-au-Prince. The funds were obtained by the sale of the Vaudreuil property. When the Franco-Haitian Union was organized in 1959, the school became the union college with the name of Franco-

Haitian Seminary. In 1961 R. E. Perrin was called to be the president. Under his leadership the enrollment increased and has maintained a steady growth. In 1974, 500 students were distributed among the elementary, secondary, and college levels. To meet the need of the French fields, authorization was granted in June 1973 by the General Conference Education Department to the Franco-Haitian Seminary to offer 16 grades in theology. The staff has been greatly improved by sending the teachers to Andrews University and France to get further training.

Hale, Apollos

HALE, APOLLOS (fl. 1844). Methodist minister, Millerite preacher and writer, associate editor of Signs of the Times and its successor, the Advent Herald. A deep thinker and a careful and critical writer, he was noted for his clarity and logic. He assisted Fitch in preparing the “1843 chart” used by Millerite preachers and wrote articles, pamphlets, and a Second Advent Manual.

Along with others, Hale concluded that Miller’s “Jewish year 1843” should end, not at the 1844 spring equinox, but at the new moon of April, according to the old Karaite Jewish calendar. He also concluded that the end of the 2300 years would fall within the following Jewish year and looked for their ending on the tenth day of the Jewish seventh month in the autumn.

For a time after the Oct. 22 disappointment he held to the validity of the “true midnight cry” and joined with Joseph Turner (coeditor of the Hope of Israel in Portland, Maine) in issuing the Advent Mirror (vol. 1, no. 1, January 1845), which presented their joint personal interpretation of the parable of the ten virgins, namely, that the coming of the bridegroom to the wedding did not, as they had thought, signify the coming of Christ as king, but rather His coming to the Ancient of Days to receive His kingdom before coming to the earth for His saints, and that this was what had taken place at the end of the 2300 days.

“The coming of the bridegroom would point out some change of work or office, on the part of our Lord, in the invisible world; and the [virgins’] going in with him a corresponding change on the part of his true people. With him it is within the veil—where he had gone to prepare a place for us, with them it is outside the veil, where they are to wait and keep themselves ready till they pass in to the marriage supper” (p. 3).

The Adventists, they explained, having gone forth to meet their Lord in 1843, slumbered as the Bridegroom delayed, and then trimmed their lamps in response to the “true midnight cry” of the “seventh month” message. Since Oct. 22 they had been waiting for the Bridegroom to return from the wedding or had gone to buy oil; the Bridegroom could be expected any moment.

Soon after, Hale wrote an article in the Advent Herald explaining this view and adding that the parable does not end with the events that are to take place at the actual coming of Christ, for when He appears it is to execute judgment. “It would seem to coincide much more naturally with the judiciary trial which precedes the execution (the judgment which begins at the house of God)” (reprinted in Review and Herald 2:25—27, Sept. 16, 1851).

After the spring of 1845 Hale was identified with the majority group of Adventists and apparently ceased to teach these distinctive views.

Hale, Dudley Upton

HALE, DUDLEY UPTON (1865—1949). One of the pioneer Seventh-day Adventist workers on the west coast of Africa and in British Guiana, South America. He became an SDA at the age of 23 and shortly afterward entered the ministry in Texas. He was ordained in 1895. On Oct. 4, 1895, he led a party of SDA missionaries ashore at Cape Coast Castle, Gold Coast (Cape Coast in what is now Ghana), and established the first Seventh-day Adventist mission in West Africa. In 1897 repeated attacks of malaria drove him out of the country, and after a brief stay in Texas he went to superintend the work in British Guiana (1897—1900). From 1900 to the end of 1902 he was an evangelist in Texas. In 1903 he returned to West Africa, but was again forced by malaria to leave almost immediately. Afterward he served as a minister and evangelist in the Texas Conference (1903—1907), and as president in the Missouri (1907—1908), Southern Missouri (1908—1911), Wyoming (1911—1914), Nebraska (1914—1916), and Northern New England (1920—1926) conferences.

Hall, D. P.

HALL, D. P. See Messenger Party.

Hall, Harry Harvey

HALL, HARRY HARVEY (1871—1934). Publishing house administrator. After a term of service in the Kansas Conference and tract society, he went in 1894 to the Pacific Press publishing house and worked there for 26 years. He began in the Sales Department, later managed the Book Department, and for years was vice president of the association. Assigned to the development of branch houses, he was largely responsible for the establishing of a branch printing office in the Canal Zone, Panama.

In 1920 Hall was released temporarily to the General Conference to give special attention to the operation of publishing houses overseas and to methods of promoting the publishing work. This assignment took him to Europe, Asia, Africa, Australia, South America, and Central America. Appointed as secretary of the General Conference Publishing Department in 1930, he continued to promote all lines of the publishing work in various parts of the world field.

Hall, Orrin A.

HALL, ORRIN A. (1878—1959). Missionary, educator. A graduate of Union College (1899), he taught a church school in Missouri, then engaged in ministerial work (1900—1904). From 1904 to 1907 he was principal of the Northwestern Training School, Manitoba, Canada, and from 1907 to 1909 MV secretary of the Nebraska Conference. He went to China in 1909 as mission director and principal of the training school in Honan province. After the removal of the school to Shanghai, he taught there for several years.

He was superintendent of the East China Union Mission for nine years, and then of the Central China Union Mission. Because of his wife's health, he returned to the United States, where he did pastoral work for five years in California. Returning again to the mission field, he served in the South China Union. After five years in Hong Kong he worked for the division's Ministerial Association and as an editor, then again became superintendent of the East China Union. He was one of the last Seventh-day Adventist missionaries to be evacuated from Shanghai. After returning to the United States, he engaged in pastoral work in the Northern California Conference for five years.

Hallang, Ludvig Nikkar

HALLANG, LUDVIG NIKKAR (1886—1965). Pastor, administrator, editor. Born in Tallinn, Estonia, Hallang became a Seventh-day Adventist in 1896. He attended the missionary seminary at Friedensau, Germany, for three years. In 1910, he became a pastor in Estonia and led out in the building of the first church in that country. Before his ordination in 1914 he had organized the first Seventh-day Adventist church on the island of Ösel. He was the first editor of the Estonian Message of the Truth. After serving as president of the Far-East Siberian Conference, he returned to Estonia, where he was assistant editor of Our Times and served as a pastor. From 1928 to 1930 he was president of the Estonian Conference. At the time of his death he had completed 62 years of service to the church.

Halliwell, Leo Blair

HALLIWELL, LEO BLAIR (1891—1967). Medical missionary to Brazil. A native of Odessa, Nebraska, Halliwell accepted the truth under the efforts of O. O. Bernstein and became a Bible instructor in Iowa. During this time he organized a Sabbath school that developed into the Charles City church.

In 1921 he and his wife, the former Jessie Rowley, were called to serve in Brazil, the site of their labor for the next 38 years.

After seven years in the state of Bahia, the Halliwells were called to east Brazil and then to north Brazil, where there were only three other church members in the immense area around Belém. On a get-acquainted trip by riverboat and canoe up the Amazon, the young missionary was dismayed to discover the poverty, superstition, and disease of the people of his district.

Deeply impressed that a launch would be most effective in reaching the 2 million people living along the 40,000 miles (65,000 kilometers) of navigable rivers forming the Amazon River basin, Halliwell made appeals for such a launch, and the funds were donated by the MV Societies of North and South America.

After spending part of his furlough in 1930 taking a course in tropical diseases, Halliwell returned to Brazil. He sketched the design for a shallow draft 30-foot (nine-meter) boat with a 10-foot (three-meter) beam and hacked out the hull himself from Amazonian hardwoods. He also installed the engine and wiring and then began a 30-year stint of steering his aquatic clinic, the Luzeiro, up and down the 1,000-mile (1,600-kilometer) stretch of river between Belém and Manaus, covering some 12,000 miles (19,000 kilometers) a year. Together Leo and Jessie treated more than a quarter million Brazilians and Indians for a host of tropical and other diseases, as well as spreading the message among the grateful people.

At first the nationals living along the river were frightened by the huge “canoe,” but the sound of phonograph music soon had them creeping from their hiding places in amazement. They were just as amazed at the effects of quinine on the malaria raging in their villages.

At first Halliwell bought medicine from slender mission resources. Later he was kept supplied by doctors and pharmaceutical houses in the United States and the public health departments of the states of Pará and Amazonas. One of his greatest services was the awakening of the Brazilian government to the fact that its people are the most important of its rich natural resources and the understanding that the state of health of these people could well decide the future prosperity of the country. In recognition of the Halliwells’ service, the Brazilian government awarded them the distinguished National Order of the Southern Cross.

In 1942, with no funds available, Halliwell realized a dream of long standing when he opened a tiny clinic in Belém, staffed by a Brazilian doctor. In 15 years it was a fully equipped 40-bed hospital.

At age 65 Halliwell accepted a call to Rio de Janeiro, to supervise the now well-developed work of the SDA medical launches in South America.

Ham, Allen L.

HAM, ALLEN L. (1889—1974). Missionary, vice president of the General Conference. In 1909 he completed a course in engineering at Walla Walla College and with his wife attended the Foreign Mission Seminary in Washington, D.C., as a mission appointee. In 1913 they began work in Hong Kong. A year later he became director of the Cantonese Mission, serving in that capacity for 20 years. He was ordained to the ministry in 1917. In 1935 he became superintendent of the South China Union Mission, serving until taken prisoner by the Imperial Japanese Army on Christmas Day 1941.

After repatriation in 1942 he became vice president of the General Conference for the Southern Asia Division until 1950. He then served as general field secretary for the General Conference for four years, after which he became a vice president until his retirement in 1958. During his terms in the General Conference he was chair of the boards of Madison College and Hospital, Oakwood College, Riverside Sanitarium, and Southern Publishing Association.

After retirement he served for a term on the board of Loma Linda University and was active in the Elmshaven church (Deer Park, California) as first elder and chair of the church school board.

Hamburg Publishing House

HAMBURG PUBLISHING HOUSE (Saatkorn-Verlag GmbH). A publishing institution composed of five legal companies: Advent-Verlag GmbH, ES-TE-A, Saatkorn-Verlag GmbH, Grindeldruck GmbH, and Dr. med. Schneider GmbH. All are under one manager. The plant is situated in Hamburg, Germany.

The house publishes Seventh-day Adventist books and the following periodicals in German: Adventecho (“Advent Echo”; prior to 1973, Der Adventbote [“Advent Messenger”]; prior to 1920, Zions-Wächter [“Watchman of Zion”]); Besser Leben (“Better Living”); Sabbath school lesson quarterlies for children, juniors, and seniors; and Zeichen der Zeit (“Signs of the Times”; prior to 1973, Ruf in die Zeit [“Message for Our Time”]; prior to 1959, Herold der Wahrheit [“Messenger of Truth”]).

The publishing house at Hamburg grew out of a branch of the Imprimerie Polyglotte (established in Basel, Switzerland, by J. N. Andrews), which was opened in Hamburg in 1889 under the name Internationale Traktatgesellschaft (“International Tract Society”) in two rented rooms at the SDA mission headquarters at 41 Sophienstrasse.

In 1893 the Hamburger Verein der STA (Hamburg SDA Association) was organized and acquired a building at Grindelberg 15a, where the publishing branch was moved, and where the SDA headquarters in Germany were established. Because of certain difficulties in supplying German publications from outside the country, the whole German Department of the Imprimerie Polyglotte was transferred to Hamburg on Aug. 27, 1895. From this date the Hamburg Publishing House began its independent existence, though at first it retained the name Internationale Traktatgesellschaft in Hamburg. From 1895 until it was made a separate company in 1900 it was legally and financially a part of the Hamburger Verein. The buildings and land of the publishing house are still owned by the Hamburger Verein, which erected a separate building to house the press in 1912.

Foreign Language Work

Foreign Language Work. The Hamburg branch of the Imprimerie Polyglotte quickly became a center for the SDA publishing work in central and east European languages. By the time it acquired separate status in 1895, it was issuing publications in 14 languages, and some years later the number of languages used increased to 20: German, Dutch, Lithuanian, Latvian, Estonian, Russian, Polish, Wendish, Bohemian, Slovakian, Hungarian, Serbian, Croatian, Bulgarian, Romanian, Spanish, Portuguese, Yiddish, Swahili, and Chasu.

Beginning in 1903 the Hamburg Publishing House established several branches throughout central and eastern Europe: in Basel, Switzerland (1903); in Riga, Russia (Latvia, 1908); in Constantinople (Istanbul), Turkey (1909); at The Hague, Netherlands (1924); in Vienna, Austria (1924); in Budapest, Hungary; and in Bucharest, Romania. Most branches were only distributing agencies, but some also printed magazines, books, tracts, and other denominational publications. The Hamburg house provided the branches in Budapest, Bucharest, and Riga with printing equipment, technicians, and supplies. When because of World War I separate publishing houses were established in Yugoslavia, Romania, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Estonia, Latvia, Hungary, Bulgaria, and the Netherlands, the Hamburg house left the stock of publications on hand to them without charge.

In 1922 the publishing work was organized in Hamburg as Advent-Verlag E. V. (“Advent Publishing House Registered Association”). After the Nazi government made it impossible for the denomination to operate the press, the house was turned over to private hands. In 1938 the firm was renamed Advent-Verlag Vollmer and Bentlin KG (“Adventist Publishing House, Vollmer and Bentlin, Limited Partnership”), and in 1939 it was again renamed as Vollmer and Bentlin KG (“Vollmer and Bentlin, Limited Partnership”). A. Vollmer and W. Bentlin acted as trustees of the denomination and were personally responsible for the affairs of the publishing house for eight years. During part of this time, in consequence of Nazi laws and of war conditions, it was impossible to produce publications for the church; only job printing was permitted. In July 1943 all the buildings dating from the 1890s, which included the business and editorial offices, the archives of the European work of the SDA denomination, and the adjoining church building, were burned to the ground in an air raid.

In 1947 the publishing house was returned to the denomination, and in September of that year it received a license to print denominational publications. Since past experience had shown that it would be convenient to separate the management of the publishing house from that of the press, the printing plant became a separate legal entity, first bearing the name Vollmer and Bentlin GmbH (“Vollmer and Bentlin, Ltd.”), and then, since 1954, Grindel-druck GmbH (“Grindel Printing Co., Ltd.”); the Publishing Department was reorganized as the Advent-Verlag GmbH (“Adventist Publishing House, Ltd.”). In 1948 this firm organized the production of publications for the general public into a new department under the name of Saatkorn-Verlag (“Saatkorn Publishing House”). The new department grew so fast that it could be organized as a separate firm in 1963.

The work was carried on in the remaining buildings until 1960, when a new wing with six floors was erected for the Press Department, and the building that it had occupied for 48 years (since 1912) was repaired and renovated.

In 1952 on the same grounds the foundation was laid for a church building and guest room accommodations for the publishing house. The basement of this building was completed to provide space for paper stock.

Progress of the Publishing House

Progress of the Publishing House. Prior to 1895 there were two employees engaged in publishing work in Hamburg. When the German Department of the Imprimerie Polyglotte was transferred to Hamburg in 1895, the number of workers increased to 10, and the sales for that year amounted to 64,000 marks (about $16,000). In 1900 there were 22 workers and the sales were 160,000 marks. In 1910 there were 58 workers and the sales amounted to 480,000 marks. In 1928, the best year before World War II, the sales totaled more than 1 million marks. After World War II the employment rose to more than 150 in 1950, and in 1952 the volume of sales was greater than ever before, even though the population served by the house decreased considerably, being limited only to West Germany. In 1957 the volume of sales passed 2 million marks, and in 1962 it reached almost 4 million marks. In 1963 the house employed about 200 people. Since then more modern equipment has been installed to avoid the high labor costs.

Publishing House Equipment

Publishing House Equipment. Before 1900 only the composing was done at the publishing house; the printing was done elsewhere. In 1900 the first printing presses and a folding machine were installed, thus enabling the house to print and bind magazines, tracts, booklets, and brochures. The quality of the work of the publishing house earned a gold medal at the International Exhibition of the Printing and Publishing Trade and of the Graphic Arts in Leipzig in 1914. Since the 1920s the Hamburg house has been equipped to manufacture all its books and magazines.

In 1928 the publishing house was given honorable mention at the International Exhibition in Cologne because of its efficiency. In 1933 it acquired music type, which enabled it to manufacture hymnbooks. At that time the equipment in the printshop and book bindery was completely up-to-date, but during the next 25 years it was impossible to replace any machinery. Since World War II the obsolete equipment has been replaced. An innovation was the installation of offset equipment in 1962. As the result of a special process invented at the plant, the publishing house became known throughout Germany.

In 1963 several one- and two-color presses of different sizes enabled the plant to produce multi-color prints at a reasonable price. Modern linotypes and one monotype with keyboard and caster were used in the Composing Department. Following the trend of the time, two perforators and one pacesetter (Photon) for composing were installed in 1974. In addition, the press has two typing machines with RCO-types, which supply the manuscript for automatic reading machines.

In 1992, after the reunification of Germany, the Publishing Association of the German Democratic Republic was integrated into the Hamburg Publishing House.

Hanke Adventist Secondary School

HANKE ADVENTIST SECONDARY SCHOOL. A boarding school operated on the senior high level, located at Shurugwi, Zimbabwe, Africa.

In 1911 Chief Mudzengi, brother of retired worker Paul Pimbono, gave the Hanke property to the Seventh-day Adventist mission. The following year a church was constructed and a stone house, which is still in use. A small outdoor school was begun by Pastor Ngono. This has developed into the largest primary school in the Zambesi Union. The January 1993 enrollment was 283 secondary school students with 17 teachers, and 670 primary school pupils with 19 teachers.

The present primary school dates from 1941. In the 1950s the school was upgraded, and in 1969 the institution advanced to junior secondary level. In 1974 it was upgraded to full secondary status, with emphasis on industrial arts.

Water has been a problem and was first brought from the river about a half mile (.3 kilometers) away. A well was dug in 1925, but this and subsequent wells proved inadequate. Recently a new source has been discovered.

Hankins, Ira John

HANKINS, IRA JOHN (1854—1937). Missionary. After attending Battle Creek College from 1876 to 1878, he entered the ministry in Iowa in 1879. In 1888 he became the third Seventh-day Adventist minister to enter South Africa, C. L. Boyd and D. A. Robinson having preceded him by a few months. After a brief period as president of the Indiana Conference (1901—1903), he returned to South Africa to take the presidency of the Cape Conference. His first wife, née Clara Tracy, having died, he was married in 1903 to Eva Perkins Miller, the widow of Eli B. Miller. In addition to his other duties, he was editor of the Sentinel (later the Signs of the Times), with his wife as assistant. He retired from active service in 1921, and in 1923 returned to the United States.

Hansen, Louis A.

HANSEN, LOUIS A. (1872—1969). Pioneer medical missionary. He was a native of Denmark and moved to the United States at an early age. In 1889 he served as colporteur and licensed minister in the Indiana Conference. After completing the nurse's course at Battle Creek in 1896, he and his wife began treatment rooms in Nashville, Tennessee. Later he became one of the founders of the Florida Sanitarium and was manager of three sanitariums—Nashville, Tennessee; Graysville, Tennessee; and Washington, D.C. He is considered the first Seventh-day Adventist self-supporting medical missionary.

For 24 years, he served with Life and Health magazine as assistant, associate, and chief editor. He was also an associate secretary of the General Conference Medical Department for several years. While in this position, he developed a central purchasing bureau that later became ESDA. He retired in Florida in 1946.

Hanson, Della F.

HANSON, DELLA F. (1897—1981). Missionary. She and her husband, Herbert Hanson, served in Norway, then were invited to go to Ethiopia. Emperor Haile Selassie I, after five years of exile in Great Britain, was looking for a person to restore order in his palace, which the Italian invaders had used as their army headquarters. In his search he called on the Seventh-day Adventist mission. Della Hanson was selected for the job. Of the 40 years the Hansons spent in Ethiopia, Della spent 30 of them in service in the royal palace. This was the most unusual foreign mission service in the history of the Seventh-day Adventist Church. Because of this relationship, the emperor donated the land and much of the operating expense for the secondary school that was started and operated under the Hansons' supervision. Della stayed on in service to the emperor for eight years after her husband's death, leaving only when the government was overthrown.

Hanson, Herbert Martin

HANSON, HERBERT MARTIN (1894—1966). Pioneer and missionary. He was born in Minnesota of parents who had recently emigrated from Norway. He attended Maplewood Academy and Hutchinson Theological Seminary, graduating in 1921. In June of that year he was married to Della Thompson, and the young couple sailed for Norway, where they helped to establish the first Seventh-day Adventist academy in that country.

Hanson served as principal of the school for 11 years and then answered a call to Ethiopia. The family first located in Addis Alem, where he took over the principalship of the mission school. Because of the Italian invasion the school soon closed, but was reopened several months later. Since he was not allowed to teach English, Hanson studied ahead of his pupils and taught Italian.

When Haile Selassie I returned to Ethiopia from exile, Hanson was urged to start a school in Addis Ababa, which he did. In 1943 the emperor gave a site for the Akaki school, where Hanson served periodically as principal, teacher, and builder.

Twice the Hansons left Ethiopia expecting never to return, but each time the longing for the people brought them back. After a period of ill health Herbert passed to his rest at the Empress Zauditu Memorial Hospital. The emperor provided the royal hearse for the service, which was attended by many members of the royal family and several ministers of state.

After Herbert's passing, Della Hanson remained at her post as housekeeper to His Imperial Majesty, Haile Selassie I, a position she held for 17 years.

Hapur Elementary Boarding School

HAPUR ELEMENTARY BOARDING SCHOOL. A coeducational English language elementary boarding school, operated near Hapur, Uttar Pradesh, about 35 miles (55 kilometers) east-northeast from Delhi, by the Northwestern Indian Union under the Southern Asia Division.

Forerunner of the school was the North India Girls' School, opened by M. M. Mattison on Jan. 12, 1919, with eight students. The next year the girls were moved to Lucknow and a boys' school was operated (listed in the Yearbook first in 1921 as the North India Boys' School established in 1917). The Yearbook lists it in 1922 as the Northwest Union Mission Training School, in 1923 as the North India Anglo-Vernacular Boys' Middle School, and between 1924 and 1929 as the United Provinces School for Boys. Urdu and Hindi were the languages of instruction. In December 1929 the Hapur school was amalgamated with the Northwest India Union Training School at Roorkee and the former North India Girls' School (then known as the United Provinces Girls' School) was brought back to Hapur. During the thirties the girls' school at Hapur was listed in the Yearbook as North Agra Mission Girls' School. The Hapur Elementary School first appeared in the Yearbook in 1939 in place of North Agra Mission School, and at the same time the name Roorkee High School appears for the Northwest India Union Training School.

In 1956 the Roorkee school and the Hapur school were put under one management. Later the school at Hapur became a coeducational institutional institution under the name Union Elementary School. The present school dates from 1961, when an English language boarding school was established.

In 1964 the boarding section of the school was joined with the school at Roorkee, and Hapur became an English Medium Day School. In 1974, the boarding section was reopened with assistance from the Christian Children Fund. The enrollment in 1974 was 460, including 130 boarders.

Harmon High School

HARMON HIGH SCHOOL. A coeducational day school on the senior high school level, situated at Scarborough, Tobago, West Indies, and operated by the South Caribbean Conference. It is under the direction of a general policymaking board of management, which meets once a year, and an executive board, which meets monthly. The school offers five years of secondary instruction in preparation for the Caribbean Examination Council (CXC) and is approved by the Trinidad and Tobago government. The school occupied a building on Bacolet Street connected with the Scarborough Seventh-day Adventist Church. The school first opened under local church control in January 1952. The 14 secondary students were taught by Merrille McKenzie, with the assistance of Lloyd Gittens, an elementary teacher. At the end of four years the first five students who sat for the Cambridge School Certificate Examination were all successful. This success led to a growth in the enrollment. The Harmon School (called Scarborough Seventh-day Adventist High School until 1957) came under direct conference control in April 1960. In September 1969 the school was moved to new premises on six acres (2.5 hectares) of land at Rockly Vale, Scarborough, Tobago. During the 1992—1993 academic year the school had a staff of 22 and a total enrollment of 423. In 1992 it was accredited for three years by the Inter-American Division Commission on Accreditation and the General Conference Board of Regents.

Harper, Walter

HARPER, WALTER (1854—1937). Pioneer colporteur. He became a Seventh-day Adventist in 1879 and began selling SDA publications in 1881 in California. At that time he sold Home Hand-Book of Domestic Hygiene and Rational Medicine, by J. H. Kellogg, reportedly the first subscription book handled by SDA colporteurs. Later he handled Thoughts on Daniel and the Revelation and other large subscription books as they were prepared. Through the 1880s he worked on the Pacific Coast, delivering in his banner year 3,000 large books. Later he worked in all states west of the Mississippi River. It has been estimated that during the more than 50 years of his work as a colporteur he sold and delivered more than $100,000 worth of SDA books. Ellen White addressed personal communications to him encouraging him in his work.

Harris, Clyde Heath

HARRIS, CLYDE HEATH (1890—1968). Businessperson. He was born in Oregon and enjoyed a Christian home, although he did not join the church until 1914. In 1913 he opened a small box factory in Milton, Oregon. By 1916 he had added a sawmill and in 1924 branched out further. In the years of operation, only 1932 saw no profit for the Harris enterprises. The Harris furniture factory became one of the largest producers of unfinished furniture in the nation. In all his business dealings, Harris relied heavily upon the Lord and did his utmost to conduct his affairs in a manner pleasing to God.

After prayerful consideration, he and his wife, Mary, were convinced that they should donate their multimillion-dollar holdings to the church, which they did in 1951.

Harris Pine Mills

HARRIS PINE MILLS. A taxable wood products manufacturing corporation with its main offices and plant on a 70-acre (30-hectare) site at Pendleton, Oregon, and with branch plants throughout the United States. It was owned and operated by the General Conference for the benefit of Seventh-day Adventist work and was a gift from its original owners to the church.

The company operated four main divisions: lumber, furniture, cutstock, and redwood products. The furniture and redwood divisions had branch operations in 14 states other than the Oregon home base. The company was a fully integrated industry, handling all parts of the process from the growing of trees to the delivery of finished products to the customer. Besides its offices and plants, the corporation held a large quantity of timber and timberlands, and equipment for building and maintaining logging roads. A number of branches and subsidiaries were situated on or near SDA school campuses for the purpose of providing work for students.

The company originated in 1913 when Clyde Harris and his brother invested about $2,000 in the establishment of a box factory at Milton, Oregon, which they named the Milton Box Company. Soon afterward Clyde and his wife became SDAs. As business prospered, a sawmill was added in 1916.

In 1939 the company was moved to Pendleton, Oregon, and named the Harris Pine Mills. In 1942 Clyde Harris and his wife bought out the brother's interest and became sole owners. By 1951 the company was considered to be among the nation's largest producers of unfinished furniture. That year the Harrises decided to donate the business to the church. Harris related his decision in the Review and Herald (130:4, Jan. 8, 1953) in these words: "As I began to approach the age which many regard as the retirement age, I pondered as to what disposition I should make of my property. I thought of the wealthy men whom I had noticed when I was young. What had they accomplished? I bore in mind that all must soon pass. Why should I wait until I was old and no longer had the zest of life before I made my decision? My wife and I considered the matter seriously. We decided we wanted the Lord to have the business."

The company was turned over to the General Conference of Seventh-day Adventists in 1951 and continued to grow and prosper: In 1953 Harris Pine Mills was valued at $8.5 million; grossed $5.5 million; processed nearly 4 million board feet of lumber; employed 450 people, of whom 50 were students from Walla Walla College; and had two branch offices. Six years later (1959) Harris Pine Mills was valued at $10.5 million; grossed $8.6 million; processed nearly 51 million board feet of lumber; employed 648 people, of whom 205 were students; and had four branch offices. By the end of 1964 Harris Pine Mills was valued at $17.5 million; grossed $13.7 million; processed 90 million board feet of lumber; employed 1,202 people, of whom 575 were students; and had 12 branch plants. In 1973 there were 23 plants, with a gross volume of $40 million. Labor on a part-time basis was extended to 2,700 students.

The positive financial operations of Harris Pine Mills declined from 1980 until 1986. On Dec. 6 of that year the General Conference placed the company in bankruptcy to stop continued losses. There were sufficient assets to pay all creditors and retirement benefits, with the exception of a debt owed to the General Conference. Closure of Harris Pine Mills was a great loss to the church and its educational institutions, as it had provided considerable student labor and had been a blessing and benefit to many young people.

Prior to closing, the sales during the five-year period 1980—1985 were $321,442,985 and trending downward. Students earned approximately $50 million during the years of operation. Full time employees also enjoyed the benefits of work provided by the mills. The company was completely liquidated and did not operate as a church entity after the closure on Dec. 6, 1986. Four and a half years after its closure by the church, in May 1991, the last owner sold all the assets and permanently closed the doors of this enterprise.

Harrison, Charles

For more than 30 years he was medical director of the Sydney Sanitarium and Hospital (now Sydney Adventist Hospital). Not only was he a highly skilled surgeon and physician; he was also loved and respected by staff and patients. He was greatly appreciated as a teacher and lecturer.

When he returned to the United States, he became professor of anatomy at Loma Linda University. The Charles Harrison Memorial Home at Cooranbong, Australia, is a tribute to his contribution to Adventism in the South Pacific.

Harrison, Margaret

HARRISON, MARGARET (fl. 1890s). A Scotswoman living in Jamaica, she read literature distributed by James Palmer, a pioneer worker. She later opened her home to Palmer for Sabbath meetings. In 1893 Mrs. Harrison went to Battle Creek Sanitarium for treatments. While there, she attended the 1893 General Conference session and made an appeal for missionaries to Jamaica. Soon after, the first Jamaican believers were baptized and a church was organized. The second church was located in Mrs. Harrison's home.

Harrison Memorial High School

HARRISON MEMORIAL HIGH SCHOOL. A coeducational day school on the senior high school level, operated at 3 Cottage Road, Montego Bay, Jamaica, West Indies, by a local school board. The 1992 secondary school enrollment was 261, with a teaching staff of 25. An eight-grade elementary school is conducted in connection with the high school.

The school was named in memory of Mrs. Margaret Harrison, one of the first Jamaican Seventh-day Adventists. In 1894 Mrs. Harrison paid her own way to attend the General Conference session at Battle Creek and pleaded that workers be sent to Jamaica. As a result, James Patterson, a colporteur, was sent, followed later by J. A. Haysmer.

Harrison Memorial High School was opened on Jan. 12, 1953, with 23 students in three grades and five teachers. The first principal was I. B. Benson, who served until September 1955. The first school board served under the chairmanship of H. S. Walters, then president of the West Jamaica Conference.

This school provides courses on the spiral system, preparing students for the General Certificate of Education examinations held by Cambridge University and the Caribbean Examination Council examination. Courses are adapted to the requirements of the denominational school system. The curriculum includes courses in Bible, social sciences, modern languages, literature, natural sciences, mathematics, health education, and applied arts.

Hasel, Gerhard Franz

HASEL, GERHARD FRANZ (1935—1994). Educator, scholar, author, administrator. Born in Vienna, Austria, he was the third child in a devout Seventh-day Adventist family. His father, Franz Joseph, a colporteur and minister, was early drafted into the Wehrmacht and assigned to the Russian front, His mother, Helene, took a firm stand that none of her four children would attend school on Sabbath, no matter what the cost to herself.

After completing his secondary education, Gerhard entered trade school in Frankfurt and in 1953, at the age of 18, was declared the best engineering apprentice in the state and received a full college scholarship.

Feeling a direct call to work for the Lord, he relinquished the scholarship and enrolled at the Marienhöhe Seminary, where he completed the four-year licentiate program in 1958. During those summers, and during many that followed, he did colporteur work to meet expenses.

In 1958 he attended Atlantic Union College, and the following year found him at Andrews University, where he earned a master's degree in one year.

He married Hilde Schafer in 1961. Three children were born to them.

Gerhard completed his B.D. in 1962 and began a 27-year teaching career at Andrews University in 1967. He received his Ph.D. from Vanderbilt University, specializing in Old Testament.

In 1976 he became chair of the seminary's Old Testament Department and director of the Ph.D. and Th.D. programs. In 1981 he became dean of the seminary, a position he held for seven years.

He authored 14 books, four of which were reviewed 39 times in various scholarly journals, and wrote more than 300 articles, including one written by invitation for the Anchor Bible Dictionary.

At the time of his death, in an automobile accident while traveling to a camp meeting, he was working on two volumes, Amos and Hosea, for Eerdmans' New International Commentary on the Old Testament. He was also serving as the first John Nevins Andrews professor of Old Testament and biblical theology at the seminary, and was an active member in seven learned societies.

Haskell, Hetty (Hurd)

HASKELL, HETTY (HURD) (1857—1919). Teacher of Bible instructors. She was converted at the age of 8, but five years later, when her father died, she lost interest in religious things. In 1884, while teaching a school at Lemoore, California, she reluctantly agreed to attend a Seventh-day Adventist camp meeting at Oakland. While there she was converted again and joined the church. The next year she attended one of the first SDA schools for Bible instructors, which was opened in San Francisco. Afterward she worked as Bible instructor and teacher of other instructors in California, England (1887—1892), South Africa (1892—1897), and Australia (1897—1899). While in Australia she married S. N. Haskell, and afterward helped him in his widespread evangelistic and Bible educational work.

Haskell, Stephen Nelson

HASKELL, STEPHEN NELSON (1833—1922). Evangelist, administrator. He began preaching for the non-Sabbatarian Adventists in New England in 1853, and later the same year began to observe the Sabbath. In 1850 he married Mary How, who in 1869 assisted in organizing the first Vigilant Missionary Society. After doing self-supporting work in New England, in 1870 he was ordained and became president of the New England Conference (1870—1876, 1877—1887). In 1870 he organized the first conference Tract and Missionary Society and subsequently organized similar societies in various parts of the eastern United States. He was president of the California Conference (1879—1887) and also of the Maine Conference (1884—1886) during that period, and part of that time was out of the country.

In 1885 he was in charge of a group that was sent to open denominational work in Australia. His preaching in New Zealand was climaxed by the forming of the first group of Seventh-day Adventists in that country. In 1887 with three Bible instructors he began SDA work in London, England, and organized a church there. He made a world tour on behalf of missionary work in 1889—1890, visiting western Europe, Southern Africa, India, China, Japan, and Australia. In 1918, some 28 years later, in a report to the General Conference, he related that on that world tour he baptized one individual in China and another in Japan, the first in these countries (see Review and Herald 99:17, Dec. 14, 1922). No other reports of these baptisms are extant, nor do later historians on SDA denominational history mention them. He was again president of the California Conference from 1891 to 1894. His first wife died in January of that year. Again in Australia (1896—1899), he engaged in evangelistic work and taught Bible at the Avondale school. While there he married Hetty Hurd in February 1897. Another of Haskell's "firsts" was the organization of the first African-American SDA church in New York City (1902). After this, he conducted a series of Bible training schools and evangelistic series in Tennessee and California, and once again served as president of the California Conference (1908—1911).

He led in temperance work in Maine (1911), began printing books for the blind (1912), and assisted in the development of the White Memorial Hospital (1916). Until near the time of his death he attended institutes and camp meetings, and promoted the general work of the denomination. His written works include The Story of Daniel the Prophet, The Story of the Seer of Patmos, and The Cross and Its Shadow.

Hastings, Leonard W.

HASTINGS, LEONARD W. (d. c. 1882). Prominent layperson of New Ipswich, New Hampshire. He and his wife, Elvira (1808—1850), were close friends of James and Ellen White. J. N. Loughborough (Great Second Advent Movement, pp. 166, 167) relates how Hastings' potatoes, left in the ground in October 1844 because he was expecting his Lord, escaped the rot that ruined the early-dug potatoes in that area. Ellen White tells of the healing of Mrs. Hastings and her infant by prayer (LS 122, 123). Hastings served on nominating and auditing committees at the organization of the New England Conference (Review and Herald 36:78, Aug. 23, 1870) and was vice president of the New England Tract and Missionary Society, New Ipswich, New Hampshire (ibid. 45:110, Apr. 1, 1875).

Hatzfeldhaven Rural Health Centre

HATZFELDHAVEN RURAL HEALTH CENTRE. A former colony that accommodated 300 Hansenide (leprosy) patients (TB patients were also treated). It was situated 75 miles (120 kilometers) northwest of Madang on the coast of Papua New Guinea.

An advance party, including the president of the Madang Mission, T. F. Judd, H. W. Nolan, medical secretary of the Coral Sea Union Mission, and A. S. Page-Dhu, superintendent elect, landed with equipment to lay out the site and begin building operations. K. C. Mitchell superintended the work.

In 1974 this institution became the Hatzfeldhaven Rural Health Centre, with Hansenide, tuberculosis, and general hospital patients. It was also responsible for general administration of a number of village aid posts and domiciliary treatment of both Hansenide and tuberculosis patients.

Hatzfeldhaven was nationalized by the government in 1980.

It operated in the summers between 1920 and 1943 as the Bad Aibling Sanitarium, offering a variety of water treatments, especially mud baths, under the direction of Rosa Staerr. The institution had 40 rooms for patients, with a total capacity of 60 beds. The profits of the sanitarium were distributed in free treatments to needy patients. Between 1922 and 1925 the sanitarium buildings were used during the winter months by the Aibling Seminary (see Marienhoehe Seminary). After World War II, until 1953, the property was used as a refugee camp. In 1954, after thorough renovation, the building was reopened as the Bad Aibling Sanitarium and Old People's Home.

History

History. Beginnings of the Work in Hawaii. Seventh-day Adventist influence first reached the Hawaiian Islands in 1883 or 1884, when Abram La Rue and L. A. Scott went from California to sell SDA literature on Oahu. On Dec. 27, 1885, W. M. Healey, sent by the General Conference, arrived in Honolulu with his wife and 10-year-old daughter, having traveled steerage class for $25 each to conserve funds. The two colporteurs had stirred up considerable interest in the capital city by the time Healey began evangelistic meetings on Jan. 15, 1886, in a 50-foot (15-meter) tent pitched on the corner of Vineyard and Fort streets. When he left Honolulu four months later, there was a company of nine baptized believers. A. J. Cudney followed Healey to Oahu, and on July 22, 1888, he organized the nine charter members in Honolulu as the first SDA church in Hawaii. A few days later, on July 31, 1888, Cudney left Honolulu on a sailboat to go to Pitcairn Island, but his ship and all on board were lost at sea. Since his tragic death occurred before he had had opportunity to report the organization of the church, the church was not officially recognized by the General Conference until its reorganization in 1896.

On Nov. 19, 1891, while en route to Australia on the ship Alameda, Ellen White and a party of five stopped briefly in Honolulu. During the 19 hours the ship was in port Mrs. White spoke to a large audience in the YMCA chapel. The sizable attendance was largely the fruit of the efforts of G. B. Starr and his wife, who had arrived about six weeks earlier and had stirred up considerable interest there by holding meetings. The Starrs continued on with Mrs. White to Australia.

E. H. Gates arrived in 1895, and in February 1896 he reorganized the church in Honolulu. Mrs. Gates taught a small church school in their home. About this time Dr. Preston Kellogg (brother of W. K. Kellogg of cornflakes fame and of J. H. Kellogg of the Battle Creek Sanitarium) opened a sanitarium in downtown Honolulu, but it was short-lived.

Also in 1895 H. H. Brand and his wife opened a school for Chinese boys, and later (1897) a boarding school known as the Palama Chinese School, which later became the Anglo-Chinese Academy (discontinued 1903), a forerunner of the present Hawaiian Mission Academy. In June 1897, the Brands went to Hilo on the island of Hawaii, where they opened the Hilo Chinese Mission School (discontinued 1903).

During the administration of C.D.M. Williams (1905—1913), the first SDA church building in Honolulu was erected, a frame building constructed by the members at a cost of about $1,450, including the lot. On Sept. 26, 1908, Williams baptized the first two converts on the island of Hawaii at Hilo. In 1913 the first MV Society and Tract Society were organized in Honolulu.

In October 1915 L. T. Heaton and his family arrived in answer to a call in the Review and Herald for someone to go to the Hawaiian Islands to foster the colporteur work there. Heaton had been in charge of the colporteur work in Canada before going to Hawaii. After four years he returned to Canada for health reasons, but worked in the islands again from January 1930 until April 1946.

The first permanent elementary school in the islands, known as the Bethel Grammar School, was begun in 1914. With the addition of secondary grades, this school developed into the present Hawaiian Mission Academy, with a special English Department, which has continued through the years as a strong and important part of the educational work in Hawaii.

On Feb. 26, 1921, the Hilo church of 22 charter members was organized, with S. T. Hare as pastor. Hawaii thus became the second island to have an organized church. The island of Maui became the third island with an organized church, as a congregation of 15 members was organized on Mar. 16, 1929, by Robert McKeague, the son of one of the charter members of the first church to be organized in Hawaii.

In 1929 Hawaii became part of the Pacific Union Conference. Prior to that it had been a detached mission administered by the Foreign Mission Board of the General Conference.

Because its population comprises people of many races and different backgrounds, Hawaii has often been called “the melting pot of the Pacific.” Several nationalities are represented in the membership of each of our churches. However, since most islanders speak English, this has become the principal language in the SDA churches in Hawaii.

The Hawaiian Conference carries on the work of the church in all five of the principal islands in the group.

The radio has been a factor of prime importance in evangelism. In 1931 C. R. Webster began the first radiobroadcast. The last 15 minutes of each broadcast was given to brief messages in either the Hawaiian language, by Robert McKeague, or the Japanese language, by Shohei Miyake, after he arrived from Japan in 1934. Broadcasts were expanded to include those of the Voice of Prophecy (first heard in Hawaii in 1942), the Voice of Hope (in the Ilocano language), and the Japanese Voice of Prophecy. Faith for Today also telecasts.

Land was purchased in 1966 for a youth camp to be located in the Waianae Valley. By 1974 seven cabins, restroom facilities, and a cafetorium had been erected and in use. The new mission office building was completed and occupied in early 1972.

Superintendents/Presidents: E. H. Gates, 1895—1897; H. H. Brand (acting), 1897—1898; B. L. Howe, 1898—1901; J. H. Behrens, 1901—1904; C.D.M. Williams, 1904—1913; F. H. Conway, 1913—1918; R. W. Hawaiian Mission Academy

HAWAIIAN MISSION ACADEMY. A coeducational boarding school on the senior high school level in Honolulu, operated by the Hawaiian Conference of Seventh-day Adventists.

Several schools were operated in Hawaii before the founding of the Hawaiian Mission Academy. In 1895 H. H. Brand and his wife, sent by the General Conference, established a school in Honolulu for Chinese boys. After two years, at the request of leading Chinese residents, a boarding school was established to teach English, the higher studies, and “the Bible, just as it reads.” It was housed in the former residence of a Hawaiian chief by the name of Nawahi. The property, being a part of the royal lands and unpurchasable, was leased to a Chinese, who subleased it to the school, which became known as the Palama Chinese School. In the spring of 1897 the W. E. Howells and Mrs. Sophia B. Kinner, of Healdsburg College in California, arrived to replace the Brands, who proceeded to the island of Hawaii, where they opened the Hilo Chinese Mission School.

In the fall of 1898 a public program performed in English by the students awakened such an interest that the resulting increase in applications necessitated larger school facilities. So enthusiastic were the Chinese patrons that in June 1899 a group of Chinese merchants agreed to purchase a lot (on North Kukui Street), erect the necessary buildings, and maintain the school so long as the church would supply an adequate teaching staff.

The building program was interrupted by an outbreak of bubonic plague in the Chinese section of Honolulu, and almost one school year was lost before the enlarged school, which became known as the Anglo-Chinese Academy, could occupy its new facilities. Then major differences among the sponsoring Chinese merchants brought on a crisis in the fall of 1903 that resulted in a mortgage foreclosure sale, thus ending the SDA mission operation of this school and dooming the Hilo Chinese Mission School as well. All the teachers returned to the mainland except the principal, I. C. Colcord, and his wife, who continued teaching the school under Chinese management until 1905.

In 1913, after a period without an SDA school in Hawaii, F. H. Conway, who was in charge of the church work in Hawaii, promoted plans for a church school in the basement of the mission home. As a result, Matilda Tampka launched the Bethel Grammar School in the fall of 1914 with more than 30 pupils. Much of the classroom furniture during the first year was composed of gasoline cases.

In September 1916 the Bethel Grammar School was operated in Kaimuki on the site of the present Aliiolani School. Two years later the arrival of a new teacher, Juliette Kaiuaola, who was part Hawaiian, held the school together, and in a second emergency, in 1919, other temporary teachers stepped into the breach. Despite interruptions, the Bethel Grammar School grew and attracted increasing interest among non-SDAs. New property was purchased in 1919 at 1426 Young Street, and a ninth grade was added in 1920. Further growth made the Young Street quarters inadequate.

In the autumn of 1921 the school, then situated on the White property at 1417 Makiki Street, offered a full four-year high school course. Because it served all the islands, it was named the Hawaiian Mission Academy. Despite additional construction on the adjoining property at 1409 Makiki Street (both tracts totaling 46,152 square feet [4,300 square meters]), the school was hard pressed to house its student body, which had grown from 59 in 1921 to 153 in 1922. The extraordinary increase in the number of students of Japanese ancestry (from five to 95, of whom 69 were foreign-born) was attributed to the academy's strong English program.

Because of the large number of students deficient in English, a noncredit special language department for English drill was added in 1924. It operated continuously until 1943 and reappeared as the Special English Department in the fall of 1948. Between 40 and 80 students, mainly foreign-visa students coming from various parts of Asia and the islands of the Pacific, come yearly to learn to read, write, and speak English well enough to continue further studies in American high schools and colleges. The work of the Special English Department has created much local goodwill, especially in the business community, and it is recognized for its contribution by American consulates throughout the Orient.

The fortunes of Hawaiian Mission Academy were varied in the 1920s. The year 1923 saw an enlargement of faculty, an expansion of classroom space, and the peak enrollment (187) of the decade. Then the enrollment dwindled, until in 1928, after the mission board, for financial reasons, had reduced the academy to a 10-grade school, it reached a low of less than 120. However, the eleventh grade was resumed in 1929 and the twelfth in 1930.

From 1930 to 1939 the attendance grew from 131 to 280. There were also important changes in the physical plant, notably a new administration building, with an auditorium seating 250, fronting on Makiki Street. In 1937 advanced courses in teacher training and in ministerial and Bible instructor training were added, comparable with the first two college years as given at La Sierra and Pacific Union colleges. Because of an insufficient demand, the second year of the Advanced Training School was abandoned in 1941, and by 1952 all advanced training was discontinued.

Additional land on the corner of Keeaumoku and Matlock streets was purchased in 1941, giving room for the expanding elementary program, for World War II more than doubled the attendance. In 1946 the mission board purchased a royal estate, situated at 1438 Pensacola Street, from the heirs of Princess Kawananakoa. In December 1949 the administrative offices and the secondary and special English classes were transferred to the new property, making room for the entire elementary division at the Makiki site. The Keeaumoku-Matlock property, no longer needed, was disposed of.

A completely new plant of concrete and tile now stands on the old royal estate.

Two classroom units, comprising seven classrooms, teachers' offices, and complete laboratory facilities for chemistry, physics, and biology, were completed in 1949. The administration and library buildings were completed in 1953. A two-story home economics and classroom unit was occupied during the 1954 school year. The cafeteria, laundry, and bakery are housed in the George H. Miranda building, completed in 1957.

A second-story addition completed in 1966 added new classrooms, a language laboratory, teachers' conference room, and additional restroom facilities.

The completion of McKeague Hall in 1968 added gymnasium facilities for physical education, along with additional rooms to provide a place for music and industrial education.

The school cafeteria occupies the site of Princess Kawanakoa's home, which was long a landmark in Honolulu and the social center of many picturesque royal celebrations, where world diplomats and visiting royalty were entertained. Only the old garden, with tropical verdure in its natural state, is kept intact for student programs. As a memento of an international past, this garden is also a fitting symbol of Hawaiian Mission Academy's international student body, whose large non-SDA composition has been a fruitful field for evangelization through the years.

The doors of a new two-story dormitory complex were opened to welcome the residents for the school year 1986—1987. This facility provides a home away from home for students from the neighboring islands, mainland, and foreign countries.

Hay, Marian Margaret

HAY, MARIAN MARGARET (1908—1983). Educator, editor. Born in New Zealand, she received her early education from the New Zealand Government Correspondence School. She studied at New Zealand Missionary College from 1924 to 1926 and at Avondale College from 1928 to 1931, graduating from the ministerial course. She entered denominational service in 1931 as a Bible instructor in the North New South Wales Conference and served as Sabbath school and youth director of that conference from 1933 to 1935, when she joined the Signs Publishing Company as editor of Our Little Friend, a position she held until her retirement in 1968.

Hay, Roy Edgar

HAY, ROY EDGAR (1887—1935). Minister, missionary. Educated at Union College, he went in 1913 to the Philippine Islands and did pioneer work among the Ilocano people. In 1917 he was placed in charge of the newly organized Northern Luzon Mission. Returning to the United States after eight years, he engaged in home missionary and Sabbath school work in the Nebraska Conference, and later worked in Colorado, Kansas, Oregon, and California.

Haynes, Carlyle Boynton

HAYNES, CARLYLE BOYNTON (1882—1958). Evangelist, administrator, author. He was converted at the age of 18 and was ordained in 1908. In his Baltimore evangelism in 1911, he consistently made use of the public press, under the guidance of one of his converts, a newspaperman, Walter L. Burgan. One result of this was the setting up of the General Conference Press Bureau, with Burgan in charge. From 1912 to 1918 he was evangelist for the Southeastern Union, and from 1919 to 1923 for the Greater New York Conference. In his many years as an evangelist (from 1908 to 1923) he conducted vigorous campaigns in such cities as Atlantic City, Chattanooga, Wilmington, Baltimore, Washington, D.C., and New York. From 1918 to 1919 he was secretary of the War Service Commission. He was president of the Greater New York Conference (1922—1926), the South American Division (1926—1930), and the Michigan Conference (1934—1940). From 1940 until his retirement (1955), he was director of the SDA War Service Commission. He was one of the better-known Seventh-day Adventist writers on Bible doctrines for lay readers. He wrote 45 religious books, some of which have been translated into various languages. They include The Other Side of Death, The Divine Art of Preaching, Living Evangelism, Our Times and Their Meaning, The Return of Jesus, and Christianity at the Crossroads.

Haysmer, Albert James

HAYSMER, ALBERT JAMES (1861—1950). Pioneer Seventh-day Adventist worker in the Caribbean. In 1878 he began to work at Battle Creek Sanitarium and there joined the School of Hygiene, the first class in medical training sponsored by the denomination. For the next nine years he worked as a nurse at the sanitarium. In 1883 he married Sadie Crandall, who died a few years later. In 1888 he married Mrs. Dora Wellman.

In the autumn of 1887 he entered the ministry in Michigan, and in 1893 went to Jamaica as the first SDA minister on the island. Later he served as superintendent of the West Indian Mission (1897—1905). After 12 years in the Caribbean he returned to the United States, where he served as president of the Alabama Conference until 1909 and as secretary of the North American Negro Department of the General Conference (1909—1913).

Later he was president of the West Indian Union Conference for five years (1913—1918). In 1918 he returned to North America and served as president of the Alberta Conference (1918—1920), and then worked in the Minnesota Conference as president (1920—1923), home missionary secretary (1926—1929), and pastor. He retired about 1937. For a time afterward he pastored the Stoneham church in Massachusetts.

Healey, William Mayhew

HEALEY, WILLIAM MAYHEW (1847—1932). Evangelist, administrator. In 1874 he began preaching in California and for many years was an able and successful evangelist. Sent in 1885 to Honolulu, he followed up the interest created by the literature distribution of his friend Abram La Rue, and baptized the first Adventist believers in the islands. From 1894 to 1897 he was president of the North Pacific Union Conference. The rest of his working life he preached in the Western states and for a number of years was religious liberty secretary of the Southern California Conference.

Healing, Faith

HEALING, FAITH. The cure of disease by supernatural means, through faith in divine power. The role of faith healing in the Christian church is based on numerous examples in the OT—Naaman and Hezekiah, for example (2 Kings 5:14; 20:5—7)—and in the NT, especially acts of healing performed by our Lord (Mark 1:30—34, 40—42; 2:1—12; etc.; John 9:1—7) and the apostles (Acts 3:1—11; 9:32—41; 14:8—10). The power to heal was one of the special gifts of the Spirit entrusted to the church (1 Cor. 12:28—30; cf. Mark 16:17, 18), and the sick were invited to ask for special prayer by the elders for healing (James 5:14, 15). It is evident, however, that God did not see fit in all instances to grant the request for healing, even when the petitioner was worthy and had, presumably, met all the conditions (2 Cor. 12:7—10).

From the first, Seventh-day Adventists have recognized faith healing as “a doctrine that the Lord taught” (Review and Herald 4:100, Oct. 4, 1853; cf. 74:10, Jan. 5, 1897), and occasionally specific instances of such healing have been reported in the Review and Herald (17:204, May 14, 1861; 26:166, Oct. 24, 1865; 27:198, May 22, 1866; etc.). From time to time there have been articles on the Bible principles of faith healing and warnings against counterfeits (ibid. 24:67, July 26, 1864; 62:331, May 26, 1885; 64:35, Jan. 18, 1887; 68:642, Oct. 20, 1891).

On the importance of discriminating between the true and the false, G. C. Tenney wrote in an editorial: “While we believe fully in the ability and willingness of God to hear the prayer of faith, and that He can and often does restore the sick in answer to prayer, still we are bound to say that we have no confidence that a very great deal that passes for faith healing is what it pretends to be” (ibid. 72:230, Apr. 9, 1895).

He cautions that Satan is able, under certain circumstances, to perform miracles of healing, and that in many cases of reputed faith healing the basic cause of the malady is a state of mind. It is “misleading,” he said, to credit these “mind cures” to divine power. He warned against the danger that the sick may be led “to ignore rational measures for recovery” (ibid.).

Various writers have discussed the principles on which faith healing can occur. In 1901, L. A. Smith stressed the importance of cooperating with the laws of health: when a sick person “is violating these laws, and from such violation suffers in health, he cannot reasonably expect the Lord to remove the consequences until he himself removes that which brought on the consequences.” The man who “refuses to do what he can do for himself, and tries to have it performed by prayer” is expecting the impossible. “This is not faith. . . . God does for man what man cannot do for himself” (ibid. 78:474, 475, July 23, 1901).

Of the prerequisite experience of those who pray for the healing of others, E. Hilliard wrote: “Divine healing is not done through those who are living in open transgression of the moral law. Restoration to health, through the agency of those who knowingly disregard the requirements of heaven, is not from God” (ibid. 97:8, Aug. 5, 1920).

Other writers point out the importance of seeking competent medical counsel and help, and the fact that the answer to prayer for healing may come as a gradual process or by the application of principles of healthful living and the use of natural remedies, and often through the skill of competent doctors.

Probably the most extensive coverage of the subject was a series of five articles by Roy F. Cottrell in the Review and Herald from May 12 to June 9, 1949. This series discusses the example of Christ, human beings as the temple of the Holy Ghost, health principles and the dedication of one's physical faculties to God, the prayer of faith, conditions for answered prayer, faith versus presumption, the ministry of pain, and the marks of "Healing, Counterfeit and Genuine." Cottrell also dealt with the psychosomatic relationship between the physical and the spiritual.

Seventh-day Adventists believe that the invitation and promise of James 5:14, 15 are valid today, and that authentic instances of healing still take place. However, SDAs also believe in the principle known as "the economy of miracle"—that, at least under ordinary circumstances, God does not employ supernatural means to accomplish that which humans themselves may achieve by natural means at their command. These natural means include intelligent cooperation with the principles of healthful living and the use of natural remedies and medical knowledge now available. Therefore, special prayer should be accompanied by an intelligent use of the aforementioned means. This does not in any way demonstrate a lack of faith, and it may be that God ordains healing to take place as human effort cooperates with divine power. Furthermore, in general only those who purpose to order their lives in all respects in harmony with God's revealed will may expect God to hear their prayers.

The extensive medical and health work of SDAs around the world—sanitariums, hospitals, and clinics; schools of medicine, dentistry, nursing, and various fields of medical technology; health education and publications—testify to the church's belief in the importance of health as one aspect of the gospel message and of Christian living, and of their practical concern for health and healing.

Seventh-day Adventists believe that special prayer for healing should be accompanied by heart searching and renewed dedication of the life. There should be not only full and firm faith in God's willingness and power to heal but also complete resignation to God's will, and willingness to accept what His infinite goodness and wisdom shall deem to be best. The ultimate miracle—restoration of the sinner—ought always to be expected even when restoration of the body may not come to pass.

Seventh-day Adventists do not believe that the claims of the popular "faith healers" are valid, or that their methods are worthy of the name Christian or in harmony with the principles of faith healing set forth in Scripture. In view of the scriptural warning against false miracles, especially in the last days (2 Thess. 2:9, 10; Rev. 13:13, 14), it is always well to test presumed cases of healing closely by the principles concerning faith healing set forth in Scripture.

Health and Temperance Department

HEALTH AND TEMPERANCE DEPARTMENT. The department of the General Conference that, with its director, associate directors, and staff, fosters, counsels, evaluates, maintains close contact with, and aids Seventh-day Adventist medical work and institutions throughout the world, promoting temperance and health education in churches, schools, and to the public, and encouraging higher levels of health and well-being.

History of Health Department

History of Health Department—The Forerunner of the Department. The earliest organization sponsored by Seventh-day Adventists for the overall guidance of the denomination's medical work was the Seventh-day Adventist Medical Missionary and Benevolent Association (later the International Medical Missionary and Benevolent Association). This organization was incorporated in 1893, with J. H. Kellogg, M.D., as president, A. J. Read as secretary, and H. J. Rand as treasurer. Unlike the present department, this association was both a property-holding organization and an administrative organization, intended originally for the control and oversight of all SDA medical institutions. Under the leadership of Kellogg, the Benevolent Association was active in the establishment of medical institutions in North America and, to a lesser extent, overseas.

Later an attempt of the General Conference to bring this more or less independent body into closer denominational control resulted in the withdrawal of the association from its denominational connection. Of the major medical institutions affected by this withdrawal, only the Battle Creek Sanitarium was permanently removed from denominational control.

Medical Department Organized. Profiting by its experience with the strong International Medical Missionary and Benevolent Association, the General Conference proceeded, in its 1905 session, to organize a medical department within the General Conference.

In the eighteenth meeting of the 1905 General Conference session, held May 22, W. A. George, M.D., was elected chair and J. E. Froom, M.D., secretary and executive officer, and the department was named the Medical Missionary Department (or Council) of the General Conference. The department name was later changed to the Medical Department of the General Conference, and in the late sixties the name was changed to Health Department. In 1980 it was voted to combine the departments of Health and Temperance.

Administrative Changes: Administrative function is shown by changes that occurred in the department through the years. In 1920 Franke Cobban was added to the staff for the direction of nursing education and service. In 1934 a secretary on medical placement was established and largely functioned at Loma Linda to more effectively encourage distribution of its graduates. In 1946 J. Wayne McFarland, M.D., was added as secretary of health and medical evangelism. Joyce Wilson (now Hopp) was added to the staff in 1956 to serve the department in the areas of health education and school health. To strengthen overseas recruitment and placement, E. E. Randolph was called as a new associate secretary in 1958.

Also in 1958 Harley Rice was added to provide hospital administration expertise to the staff, and Eldon E. Carman, D.D.S., added dental expertise in 1971.

The 1950s and 1960s were years of major transition from closed-staff denominational sanitariums to open-staff community hospitals. By the mid-1970s the church in North America had formed five regional organizations to manage its health-care work. In 1982 a national organization, the Adventist Health Systems/U.S.A. was formed, separate from the Health Department, but in 1991 this was reversed, and the coordinating function for all health-care work was moved back to the Health and Temperance Department. In 1993 the church's health-care work in North America was operated by nine regional health-care corporations.

Other concurrent trends have also been seen in the health work of the church. The 1970s saw a much stronger emphasis placed on public health and health education/health evangelism. In the 1980s, however, a strong trend toward consolidation of departments and decreasing the size of the Health Department became evident. Since 1985 the total staff of Health and Temperance decreased from 37 to 10. Despite this downsizing, however, the department continues to serve an important function in such areas as AIDS awareness, drug treatment and prevention, and helping to develop for the church consensus papers on such ethical issues as abortion. The Christian View of Human Life Committee, chaired by the Health and Temperance Department director, has been particularly active and has published consensus statements in the Adventist Review and Ministry magazines.

Recognizing the importance of looking at alternatives to traditional medical care and the need to adapt to changing times, the department convened on June 19—23, 1993, in Silver Spring, Maryland, a major conference of representatives from around the world. Entitled Health 2000 and Beyond: A Study Conference on Adventist Theology, Philosophy, and Practice of Health and Healing, the proceedings have been published by the department, and recommendations for strengthening the impact on the SDA health program have been formulated.

Areas of Concern and Responsibility

Areas of Concern and Responsibility. The Department of Health and Temperance, at all levels of church organization, currently:

1. Serves as a resource for information and counsel on health and temperance affairs.
2. Advises the church and its departments and related agencies, in the development and administration of health- and/or temperance-related policies and programs.
3. Promotes a healthful lifestyle among church members through literature, programs, and Sabbath services.
4. Provides, through publications, services, and programs, an ongoing witness to the world concerning the detrimental physical, mental, and spiritual effects of tobacco, alcohol, and other harmful substances.
5. Sponsors and/or organizes societies to effectively involve church and nonchurch organizations in united endeavors to promote the nonuse of tobacco, alcohol, and other harmful substances.

6. Encourages involvement in the evangelistic thrust of the church by developing and using health and temperance programs and media that will gain the trust and confidence of people.

7. Provides support of Seventh-day Adventist health-care institutions, clinics, and health/temperance programs at each level of church organization. This is done through memberships on boards, inspections, assistance in recruiting personnel, cooperation with community programs, and support for spiritual ministries, including the work of chaplains.

Health and Temperance Missionary School

HEALTH AND TEMPERANCE MISSIONARY SCHOOL. A school formed by the Battle Creek Sanitarium in 1889 to prepare leaders and instructors in the health and temperance work of the church. It was a major part of the health education campaign that the sanitarium was created to carry on. Later its objectives were taken over by the American Medical Missionary College.

Background of the Educational Work of the Sanitarium. The work of educating the church membership and the public in the principles of health and hygiene stemmed from Ellen G. White's counsels in 1863 and 1865 (see Health Principles), on her insistence on the need for this work, and on her suggestion that an institution would become necessary to accomplish this task. In 1866 delegates to the General Conference pledged themselves to use their best influence to impress the importance of health principles upon others. In that year a journal for the promotion of health principles, Health Reformer, was begun.

Two years later, at the General Conference held in May 1868, the delegates noted that "the cause of health reform among our people demands that labor and attention which our preachers cannot bestow in connection with their other arduous labors" (Review and Herald 31:356, May 26, 1868). Consequently, a graduate physician, M. G. Kellogg, was appointed to present lectures on healthful living among the churches. However, after appointments at three churches where the lectures were highly appreciated, the doctor received no further invitations. A few months later he left for California.

During the next eight years the promotion of health education was carried with more or less success through the pages of the Health Reformer, lectures at the Health Reform Institute, and the efforts of ministers. The possibilities of a united educational campaign on the part of ministers and physicians was not well understood, and the matter was again brought to the attention of the leaders through the counsels of Ellen G. White in the latter part of 1876. Attention was called to the fact that Jesus combined the work of healing the sick with that of preaching the gospel. It was recognized that if His method was to be carried out in the Seventh-day Adventist Church, laypersons and ministers must have the opportunity of receiving a broader education in health principles. Attention was turned to the physicians at the sanitarium for leadership in such training.

The School of Hygiene. In 1877 a "School of Hygiene" was announced. S. N. Haskell wrote: "We speak in behalf of this hygienic school. We believe it is needed. There should be connected with every church individuals who understand what to do in the sickroom. They should know how to give packs, baths, etc." (Review and Herald 50:197, Dec. 20, 1877).

The school was intended to supply the need for lecturers in the field who would educate the people on the subject of health. The school was unique in America, if not in the world. Dr. Kellogg said about its objectives: "It is not intended in any sense to take the place of a regular medical course, but simply to give to individuals wishing to commence the study of medicine a basis for a broad, liberal, thorough, and practical medical education, and to supply to those desiring only a limited amount of medical knowledge an opportunity to become familiar with a large share of the practical knowledge in the hands of the profession divested of its technical dress, simplified, and put in shape to be readily utilized” (Health Reformer 12:380, 381, December 1877).

The school was opened Jan. 14, 1878, with an initial enrollment of 75 students, which soon grew to 150. The course continued for 20 weeks, with daily classes. Studies collateral to hygiene, such as anatomy, physiology, chemistry, physics, and mental philosophy (what today would be called psychology), were included in the course. The course of study given in the school of hygiene was accepted by medical colleges in the United States as a part of the regular medical course. The cost of tuition was $25. Room and meals were offered at the Sanitarium Students’ Club for $1.60 a week, and some could earn their school expenses by working at the sanitarium.

Hundreds of students attended this course of health instruction during the several years that it was offered at the sanitarium. According to D. E. Robinson, many of these afterward gave substantial assistance to the organization and work of the health and temperance associations that were by this time flourishing all over the country, and a number of them devoted their lives to medical missionary work (The Story of Our Health Message, p. 244).

The First Seventh-day Adventist School of Nursing. In the spring of 1883 the sanitarium announced that it could give a three-month course of training to a few young women in “nursing, massage, the use of electricity, and other branches of the practical medical department,” to be followed by a period of service at the sanitarium from two to five years. But apparently the opportunities of service in the nursing profession had not yet been appreciated by SDA young people, for only two applied for this course, the first attempt of the sanitarium to offer a course for the training of its own nurses.

In the autumn of that year another provision for a course to train nurses was made, and at that time applicants swamped the facilities. This time the course was to run for six months, giving the students knowledge in “all the branches of practical and theoretical study necessary to qualify competent persons to become first-class professional nurses.” At the end of the first term the course was extended to two years, and that became the standard term of training at Battle Creek Sanitarium.

The Nurses Adopt a Missionary Objective. In 1888 a group of eight nurses dedicated their lives to missionary work. Their example influenced others of their class to combine the service of health with the promotion of religion. The idea of public health education as a part of the church’s mission again came into prominence. Moreover, the network of medical institutions staffed by the graduates of the sanitarium grew and began to spread abroad.

The Health and Temperance Missionary School Established. By 1889 the need for efficient and consecrated workers in the various phases of the health and temperance program of the church outran the supply. Dr. Kellogg suggested that in addition to the need for competent medical personnel for service in medical institutions, there was a need for instruction in the principles of hygiene and healthful cooking at large camp meetings and other places where the people gathered.

To meet these needs, the sanitarium, with the approval of the General Conference Committee, opened in the autumn of 1889 the Health and Temperance Missionary School. It is indicative of the scope of the new school that at that time the committee recommended that the managers of schools, city missions, camp meetings, and other denominational institutions should select their matrons, cooks, and nurses from those who had received special training for the work at the sanitarium. At the same time it also recommended that the conferences should select suitable young men and women to take this special training.

Dan T. Jones, the secretary of the General Conference at that time, commented: "One reason why the health and temperance work has not been received more favorably by our people and others is because it is not understood, and its principles have been abused by those who have had the will to carry them out in their daily living, but have not been taught how to do so properly. If competent cooks could be selected in each conference, and educated, and then allowed to visit different churches and teach the sisters to prepare their food healthfully and in a palatable manner, it would do much toward advancing the interests of health reform" (quoted in Robinson, p. 247).

The new undertaking was highly successful. At the end of the four-month period of training it was reported that the average daily attendance was about 100 and that 20 were ready to enter the work immediately.

According to Robinson, among those enrolled in that first class were several persons who later became prominent in the denominational service: W. H. Wakeham, for many years secretary of the American Health and Temperance Association, A. A. John, J. B. Beckner, G. H. Baber, W. L. Bird, M. A. Altman, and Mrs. D. H. Kress (ibid.).

In succeeding years the school was known as the Health Missionary School and Medical Missionary School. The latter was operated in Chicago in conjunction with the American Medical Missionary College and apparently ceased to exist as a separate entity when its training program became a part of the curriculum of the college about 1901.

Health Connection, The HEALTH CONNECTION, THE. The official resource center for the General Conference and North American Division Health and Temperance departments; previously known as Narcotics Education, Inc. Materials produced by the Health and Temperance Department are distributed through the Health Connection via a direct-mail catalog and through Adventist Book Centers. Since 1990 the Health Connection has been operated by the Review and Herald Publishing Association in Hagerstown, Maryland.

The Health Connection has dual missions and markets. It is also commissioned to operate on a nondenominational basis for the purpose of placing in public school systems educational material on the subjects of alcohol, tobacco, and other drugs. This is accomplished by producing materials and by screening products available from other organizations ensuring that the best drug-prevention videos, software, displays, posters, pamphlets, puppet programs, and other educational material are offered through the Health Connection's catalog. Winner and Listen magazines, printed by the Review and Herald Publishing Association, are also marketed to public schools through the Health Connection. All materials offered promote a drug-free rather than a responsible-use message.

Health Evangelism

HEALTH EVANGELISM. The aspect of gospel work that presents basic health principles and offers practical instruction in health and sensible health habits as an avenue to a more abundant life and a sound Christian faith. Health evangelism may be defined as Christian health education. From the 1860s the Seventh-day Adventist Church has promoted health evangelism through its ministry, its medical institutions, and its professional personnel.

Concerning the evangelistic role of physicians, Ellen White wrote: “Let the medical workers present the important [SDA] truths . . . from the physician’s viewpoint. Physicians of consecration and talent can secure a hearing in large cities at times when other men would fail. As physicians unite with ministers in proclaiming the gospel in the great cities of the land, their combined labors will result in influencing many minds in favor of the truth for this time” (MM 248).

Many Seventh-day Adventist evangelists make health and nutrition a part of their public program. But beyond this, Ellen White was given the message that every minister should become involved in medical missionary work: Medical missionary work “is to be connected with the gospel ministry. It is the gospel in practice. . . . I wish to tell you that soon there will be no work done in ministerial lines but medical missionary work. The work of a minister is to minister. Our ministers are to work on the gospel plan of ministering. . . . You will never be ministers after the gospel order till you show a decided interest in medical missionary work, the gospel of healing and blessing and strengthening. . . . The Lord wants every one of His ministers to come into line. Take hold of the medical missionary work, and it will give you access to the people. Their hearts will be touched as you minister to their necessities” (CH 532, 533).

In 1868 Dr. M. G. Kellogg was sent to visit the churches to promote an interest in health, and in 1878 Dr. John Harvey Kellogg opened a school of hygiene for the training of health lecturers (see Health and Temperance Missionary School). Leaders of the denomination gave health lectures at sanitariums, and SDA medical institutions have carried on a continuous program of health education. Health courses are taught in SDA schools and colleges.

In 1866 the first Seventh-day Adventist health paper, the Health Reformer (later called Good Health), was published. The Pacific Health Journal and Temperance Advocate, published first in 1885, continued to 1904, when it became Life and Health, a monthly magazine. Health, begun in 1934, merged with Life and Health in 1948. Life and Health has since become Vibrant Life.

Nutrition Schools. Through all its medical institutions, the SDA Church has endeavored to offer a continuing education program in diet, cookery, and nutrition. To implement a specific program in union and local conferences, Dr. J. W. McFarland, of the Medical Department, in 1954 arranged for Dr. and Mrs. H. W. Vollmer to conduct nutrition and cooking schools in major institutions, with the objective of preparing competent instructors in conferences and local churches to teach the basic principles of good nutrition and to avoid the extremes of faddists. Since that time, other Health and Temperance Department associate directors have fostered this program. Currently many different forms of vegetarian cooking classes are being conducted for the public.

Other Programs. Other programs of health outreach that are evangelistic include home nursing classes, stressing simple home treatments, first-aid classes, weight control, physical fitness, dietary control of heart disease, stress management, and other classes and seminars designed to meet people's felt needs. Materials for use in such programs are available through the North American Distribution Center, the General Conference Health and Temperance Department, or the School of Public Health of Loma Linda University.

Health correspondence lessons and special health features are a part of the Voice of Prophecy, Faith for Today, and It Is Written radio and television programs.

Since early 1970 more and more SDA medical institutions have carried on strong health evangelistic programs, employing full-time graduates of the School of Health, Loma Linda University, as health educators to coordinate evangelistic programs with chaplains, doctors, and nurses both in North America and overseas.

Education Against Alcohol, Tobacco, and Narcotics. Since abstinence from the use of tobacco and alcohol, as well as narcotics, is a requirement for church membership among Seventh-day Adventists, there is a continuing program of education against their use. The General Conference Health and Temperance and Ministerial departments cooperate to help victims of the tobacco habit to stop smoking through the Breathe Free stop-smoking plan, conducted by minister-doctor teams.

Health Journals

HEALTH JOURNALS. In the year of the founding of the first Seventh-day Adventist health institution (which became Battle Creek Sanitarium), the first SDA health journal was launched. It was called the Health Reformer, later Good Health; however, it was lost to the denomination when Dr. J. H. Kellogg and the Battle Creek Sanitarium were separated from the church. It was last listed in the 1906 Yearbook. However, by that time there were seven other health journals. Three of these—Life and Health, Washington, D.C.; Australasian Good Health, Wahroonga, Australia; and Good Health, London—were in English; the following were in other languages: Gute Gesundheit (“Good Health”), Hamburg; La Salud (“Health”), Guadalajara, Mexico; Sundhedsbladet (“Health Journal”), Copenhagen; and Le Vulgarisateur et Messager de l’Hygiène (“The Popularizer and Messenger of Hygiene”), Geneva.

Through the years the doctrine of health has been an important part of the SDA message, and these publications serve to inculcate the principles of healthful living and wholesome diet and the basic methods of home care of the sick.

Health Principles

HEALTH PRINCIPLES. Seventh-day Adventists believe that Christians should have a concern for health, not because of any ceremonial or legalistic significance, but for the practical reason that only in a sound body can they render the most effective service to God and to others. The reason for emphasis on health principles is health. Health is related to religion in that it enables people to have a clear mind with which to understand the will of God and a strong body with which to do the will of God.

Seventh-day Adventists believe that at the Fall all three aspects of humanity's nature—the physical, the intellectual, and the spiritual—were affected; and that Jesus, who said He had come to restore that which was lost (Luke 19:10), seeks to save the whole person. In His ministry Christ touched these three aspects: He preached the gospel of the kingdom (spiritual), He healed those who were mentally deranged (intellectual), and He restored those afflicted with disease (physical).

Apart from this divine example of our Lord, SDAs find elsewhere in the New Testament a recognition of the importance of a healthy, sound body. For example, Paul declares: “I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service” (Rom. 12:1). “What? know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost which is in you, which ye have of God, and ye are not your own? For ye are bought with a price: therefore glorify God in your body, and in your spirit, which are God's” (1 Cor. 6:19, 20). He further taught that belief in the soon coming of Christ calls for a dedication of the complete man to God: “The very God of peace sanctify you wholly; and I pray God your whole spirit and soul and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ” (1 Thess. 5:23).

Accountability for Health. On these biblical bases rests the belief that there is an accountability to God for the preservation of health, and that the person who knowingly violates simple health principles, thereby bringing on ill health, disease, or disability, is living in violation of the laws of God. The smoker who brings upon himself or herself cancer of the lungs; the drinker who develops cirrhosis of the liver; the irregular eater, or the overeater, or the one who indulges in excessive quantities of heavy or rich food and develops serious digestive disease; the corpulent, intense, nonexercising business or professional person who is overtaken with a heart attack—all these are in greater or less measure responsible for the ills they suffer and bear some guilt for neglect of the bodies entrusted to them. This fact makes our relationship to the entire question of health a highly practical one, not an emotional or a legalistic one. If, as SDAs believe, Christians have the same responsibility to preserve the health as they have to preserve their character, then promotion of a wider understanding of basic health principles assumes an important role in religion and theology.

It is in the light of these facts that SDAs concern themselves with the care of the sick, helping to bring relief to those who suffer. They further endeavor to promote through education desirable habits and practices of health whereby disease is lessened or prevented and the body preserved in health.

Health Reform and Seventh-day Adventist Leaders. The emphasis on healthful living and the sense of responsibility for the individual's body as a Christian duty arose in the SDA movement in the same year in which the General Conference was organized. It was natural that a people who endeavored to apply biblical precepts to their daily lives should consider seriously the physical aspect of life.

However, many years before, at least one of the pioneer leaders, Captain Joseph Bates, practiced what was known as health reform. Emphasizing health principles as part of his message, he preached abstinence from stimulants and narcotics, though he did not urge on others his dietary habits.

James and Ellen White brought the subject of healthful living as an issue before the Adventists. As early as 1848 Ellen G. White spoke of the harmful effects of tobacco, tea, and coffee. In 1853 and 1855 James White reprinted in the Review and Herald, of which he was editor, articles against tobacco (4:178, Dec. 13, 1853; 7:9, July 24, 1855). J. N. Andrews in 1856 wrote that the use of tobacco was "a sin against God." In 1854 Ellen White admonished SDAs to adopt a simple, wholesome diet without grease and rich foods. In January 1863, during a diphtheria epidemic, James and Ellen White applied successfully to their two sick children the home treatments recommended in a newspaper article by Dr. James C. Jackson, of Dansville, New York, who emphasized the importance of healthful diet, fresh air, and water treatments.

Health principles as part of the Seventh-day Adventist emphasis may be dated from June 1863, when Mrs. White set forth in greater detail the cultivation of health as a part of the Christian's duty: "It is not safe nor pleasing to God to violate the laws of health, and then ask Him to take care of our health, and keep us from disease, when we are living directly contrary to our prayers" (MS 1, 1863).

"I saw that it was a sacred duty to attend to our health, and arouse others to their duty. . . . We have a duty to speak, to come out against intemperance of every kind-intemperance in working, in eating, in drinking, in drugging, and then point them to God's great medicine, water, pure soft water, for diseases, for health, for cleanliness, for luxury. . . . We should not be silent upon the subject of health, but should wake up minds to the subject" (ibid.).

At the same time, she spoke against drugs and flesh meats, and urged the importance of pure air and a proper diet. She published these principles in the summer of 1864 in Spiritual Gifts, volume 4 (pp. 120—151), and prepared six articles entitled "Disease and Its Causes" that were to form parts of a tract series, How to Live (1865). It was not until she had sketched out these articles that she read some of the writings of J. C. Jackson, R. T. Trall, Sylvester Graham, and others who were protesting against the popular customs in diet and dress, and the prevalent medical practices that now seem rather barbarous. Some of these "health reformers" held a number of extreme views from which she strongly dissented, but she was surprised to find agreement on many points. Mrs. White incorporated extracts from some of these health reformers, along with her own articles, in the six tracts How to Live, selecting and rejecting on the basis of the principles she had set forth (Review and Herald 30:260, Oct. 8, 1867).

When her husband suffered a stroke in 1865, she placed him in Dr. Jackson's Dansville health institution, but took him away because she disapproved of some of the treatments prescribed for him.

Regarding the health principles outlined during this early period by Ellen White, which were far in advance of medical practices prevalent in that day, J. H. Waggoner wrote: “We do not profess to be pioneers in the general principles of the health reform. The facts on which this movement is based have been elaborated, in a great measure, by reformers, physicians, and writers on physiology and hygiene, and so may be found scattered through the land. But we do claim that by the method of God’s choice it has been more clearly and powerfully unfolded, and is thereby producing an effect which we could not have looked for from any other means.

“As mere physiological and hygienic truths, they might be studied by some at their leisure, and by others laid aside as of little consequence; but . . . it comes to us as an essential part of present truth, to be received with the blessing of God, or rejected at our peril” (ibid. 28:77, Aug. 7, 1866).

Again in 1865 Ellen White stressed the essential nature of health principles and their relation to other truths of the Bible. She wrote: “We as a people must make an advance move in this great work. Ministers and people must act in concert. . . . There are but few as yet who are aroused sufficiently to understand how much their habits of diet have to do with their health, their characters, their usefulness in this world, and their eternal destiny. . . . Sabbathkeepers who are looking for the soon appearing of their Saviour should be the last to manifest a lack of interest in this great work of reform. Men and women must be instructed, and ministers and people should feel that the burden of the work rests upon them to agitate the subject” (1T 486—489).

Furthermore, she urged the 4,000 members of the SDA Church that the progress of health principles was not to depend wholly upon teaching the principles from the desk and by means of publications. An institution was to be founded for the treatment of the sick on rational principles, and for teaching the patients how to preserve their health: “We should provide a home for the afflicted and those who wish to learn how to take care of their bodies that they may prevent sickness. We should not remain indifferent and compel those who are sick and desirous of living out the truth to go to popular water cure institutions for the recovery of health, where there is no sympathy for our faith” (ibid. 489).

The result was the founding of the forerunner of the Battle Creek Sanitarium. Ellen White pointed out that such an institution, if rightly conducted, would be a means of helping the patients spiritually as well as physically; that while their bodies were being treated their minds might be opened to spiritual truths and their lives brought into a closer relation with the will of the heavenly Father. In addition, she proposed a plan whereby such an institution might assist the poor: “Those to whom God has intrusted means should provide a fund to be used for the benefit of the worthy poor who are sick and not able to defray the expenses of receiving treatment at the institution” (ibid. 494, 495).

Thus the gospel of health became a part of the Seventh-day Adventist message, “just as closely connected with it as are the arm and hand with the human body” (ibid. 486).

Health Secretary

HEALTH SECRETARY. A physician, nurse, qualified layperson, or a church elder whose duty it is to promote the health program of the Seventh-day Adventist Church in his or her respective area, on either the conference or the local church level. The health secretary sponsors general health education classes, cooking and nutrition schools, home nursing classes, school health education, and temperance activities. In close cooperation with the lay activities leader, he or she participates in the operation of local Community Services centers.

Health Work

HEALTH WORK. A phrase common in Seventh-day Adventist usage, meaning not only the profession of medicine, but other phases of the healing arts such as nursing, dentistry, dietetics, the various paramedical techniques, and health education. The following categories may be enumerated:

- a. Education of health professions and allied health professionals.
- b. Preventive medicine and health education, Better Living centers.
- c. Clinical medicine and dentistry.
- d. Health evangelism.
- e. Health care institutions and other facilities.

For reasons Seventh-day Adventists pay significant attention to questions of health, see Health Principles.

Seventh-day Adventists hold that it is in the very nature of Christian life and faith to exercise compassion toward those who need help, to aid both soul and body. This concept is tersely stated in the motto of the Loma Linda University School of Medicine: "To make man whole." It is this high motivation that leads Christian people to give emphasis to various forms of medical ministry.

The many kinds of SDA medical work as listed above are employed under varying circumstances to conform to the requirements of each country, as resources are available. In larger metropolitan centers of more advanced countries, modern, well equipped hospitals are developed in keeping with local standards and needs. Except where the larger facilities are developed to be used as teaching centers, small towns or rural areas of newly developed countries are well served by smaller hospitals or by well-equipped clinics or dispensaries. In certain areas, medical units in some instances take the form of medical launches (see Missionary Vessels).

In the non-Christian countries of the world, medical work of some form may be the only Christian activity permitted. Hospitals, clinics, maternity centers, well-baby clinics, or simple dispensaries are cordially accepted where the minister is not allowed to go.

Any ministry to the sick in the spirit of Christ is a communication understood by all. It is for this reason that in many instances medical ministry of some form is the medium of choice for entry into new or difficult lands. More and more, effort in health education and public health, which emphasizes healthful living, is receiving governmental favor where curative medicine alone may be regarded as competitive with local practitioners.

On the lay level, church members are encouraged to learn simple health principals and to engage in local health and welfare work.

Education for Medical Work

Education for Medical Work. Professional education to train physicians, nurses, dentists, dietitians, administrators, and many types of technical workers is needed to sustain the widespread medical work to which Seventh-day Adventists are committed.

Professional education in most of these categories is available in the universities of most countries. Graduates from these secular universities are now staffing most SDA medical institutions.

The SDA Church currently operates three universities that provide medical education. Loma Linda University in Loma Linda, California, is a General Conference health science university that operates Schools of Nursing, Medicine, Dentistry, Allied Health Professions, and Public Health, as well as a Faculty of Religion.

The Inter-American Division operates Montemorelos University in Montemorelos, Mexico, which provides training in the biomedical sciences in such areas as medicine, dental technology, nursing, and public health.

River Plate University in Argentina is currently opening the denomination's third medical school in addition to the Nursing School operating there.

In India there has been a special relationship for many years between the Seventh-day Adventist Church and the Christian Medical College at Vellore. In return for the provision by the church of faculty and financial assistance, the interdenominational medical college has accepted a quota of qualified SDA applicants to the College of Medicine. Also, in recent years the church has provided support through Loma Linda University to Kasturba Medical College in Manipal, where a quota of SDA medical, dental, and other health-related professional students are also accepted.

Nurse training is provided in many SDA colleges and hospitals. Midwifery training is offered in connection with several of the overseas nurse training programs. Especially well known is the program in Bangkok, Thailand, now being operated through the new Mission College. Different types of medical technology are offered at several Adventist colleges and universities. Physical therapy training is offered at Loma Linda, Kettering, and Andrews University, and until recently, at Skodsberg, near Copenhagen in Denmark.

Hearers' Class

HEARERS' CLASS. A class of those contemplating joining the Seventh-day Adventist Church, which is conducted among primitive peoples in certain parts of Africa. Indoc-trination continues for one year, after which the "hearers" join the baptismal class for an additional year of instruction before baptism is administered and church membership is granted. A similar system is employed in some other parts of the world: for example, in the Pacific islands, where a preparatory class precedes the baptismal class. In pidgin English it is sometimes called "class make-ready."

HELDERBERG COLLEGE. A senior college operated by the Southern Africa Union, an attached union of the General Conference, Helderberg College is situated three miles (five kilometers) from Somerset West and 30 miles (50 kilometers) from Cape Town in the Republic of South Africa. Located on the same campus but no longer under college administration are the Helderberg High School and Helderberg Primary School. The college has a staff of 52 full-time and part-time lecturers and administrative and auxiliary personnel with a wide background of training and education. The student body (1993 enrollment: 295) reflects the rich diversity of the Republic of South Africa and includes students from 25 other countries. The academic year runs from February to November. The college is situated on 370 acres (150 hectares) of land on the slopes of Helderberg Mountain. Helderberg College is the successor of Claremont Union College and Spion Kop College.

History

History. Claremont Union College. The Claremont school, situated on a 23-acre (nine-hectare) farm at Claremont, eight miles (13 kilometers) from Cape Town, began its first school year in February 1893 as the first SDA college in Africa, as well as the first college operated by the Seventh-day Adventist denomination outside North America. With funds provided by the South African members, Pieter Wessels in particular, a very representative three-story building was erected, which provided the kind of accommodation required for a coeducational institution with an enrollment of 65. It had classroom space for about 120. Primary and secondary education, and later a one-year missionary course, were offered. The church decided to run a nonracial, nonsectarian school in an attempt to recognize liberty of conscience, and about half the students were non-SDAs.

The college provided training in practical skills and industries such as shoemaking and repairing, laundry work, carpentry, and gardening.

Financial problems plagued the school during the early years of the twentieth century. The deep depression that gripped South Africa after the close of the Boer War cut deeply into the enrollment. Although fees were set extremely low in order to attract students, the enrollment ran at half the capacity of the college; at one time there were only 30 boarding students in attendance.

Some of the problems that the college experienced arose from the need to harmonize the principles of education brought in from the United States with the practical necessity in South Africa of preparing students to meet public examination requirements. Many parents felt that they had to safeguard their children's future by having them meet the national academic standards, and therefore did not send them to the college, whose administrators were unable to solve the dilemma. Nevertheless, the 31 graduates of those years have served the church in many varied and responsible capacities.

Spion Kop College. Because the expansion of the suburbs of Cape Town brought the city atmosphere ever nearer the school, and because there was insufficient land to allow the raising of the necessary food for the school by the students, it was voted in 1916 to move the school to Spion Kop Mission Farm (on a former SDA Zulu mission) in Natal, where the influences of the city would be eliminated and there would be a better opportunity for the institution to become self-sufficient.

School was closed in 1918 while the necessary buildings were being erected at Spion Kop. Early in 1919 the new institution, first known as the South African Training School, later (1922, when a more advanced course of study was offered) Spion Kop College, opened with J. I. Robinson as principal. Industries consisted of the farm on which maize and beans were grown, a small dairy that supplied the school and its staff with milk, and a factory in which clothing was manufactured by student labor.

The medium of instruction was English; however, Dutch, superseded in 1924 by Afrikaans (modified Dutch), and Zulu (a main African language) were taught. Thirty-two graduates were sent out from Spion Kop College. The enrollment never exceeded 100.

If Claremont had been too near the city, Spion Kop was too isolated from its constituency. It was decided to move the school to a more favorable location. The buildings at Spion Kop were placed at the disposal of the South African Union, which transferred to this site the Bantu Normal School from Bethel and reopened it as the Spion Kop Training Institution for the training of African workers.

Helderberg College. In 1928 the college was moved to Somerset West, its present site. There followed immediate and steady enrollment growth, and the number of graduates rose to an average of about 20 a year.

When the college opened, the total plant consisted of two three-story student residences and two staff cottages erected the preceding year by O. R. Shreve. The women's residence, later given the name of Meade House, served also as kitchen, dining hall, and laundry. The men's residence, named Salisbury House, included at that time the administrative offices, classrooms, and assembly hall. The administration building, Branson Hall, was erected by the students during 1929, and other buildings were built by the same means from year to year as the enrollment grew. Anderson Hall, built in 1951, contained an auditorium, several classrooms and offices, and the library. Glanz Hall provides a dining room and kitchen on the ground floor and a gymnasium above.

The church, with seating capacity for 1,000, was completed in 1976. A new women's residence, Anne Visser House, was occupied in 1977 and has accommodation for 134 ladies, with 12 of the rooms currently in use as guest rooms. Meade House was remodeled in 1979 and now serves as the Pieter Wessels Library (1993 holdings: 53 000 volumes). It also houses the E. G. White Research Centre, opened in 1983, and the Heritage Room.

At present the Business and Secretarial departments use lecturing facilities in the administration building, which also provides classrooms for the high school until it is relocated to its own campus on the Helderberg property. The Arts and Education Department and the Theology Department use facilities in the College Block, which originally provided boarding facilities and classroom space for the primary school. Additional recreational facilities were added during the eighties: tennis courts, swimming pool funded through student initiative, and extended gymnasium facilities. The student center, completed in 1988, has two squash courts, and provides room for social activities, student representative council facilities, and a snack shop. An imposing new entrance arch was erected by the Alumni Association in 1993, the centenary year of the college.

Through affiliation with Andrews University, Helderberg College offers a Bachelor of Arts in theology for the training of ministers and a Bachelor of Arts with communication, English, history, psychology, and religion as possible majors. The Business Department offers a Bachelor of Business Administration degree with accounting and management as majors, and also a number of diploma courses in business studies and public relations. These diploma courses vary in length from one to four years and are accepted by a number of national bodies. The Secretarial Department offers choices of emphasis in its diploma courses as well. Computer science is taken in conjunction with the other programs. The prerequisite for degree programs is matriculation or its equivalent, which is the standard university entrance requirement.

Helderberg College also serves as an extension campus for Andrews University for the offering of the M.A. in religion, where students can complete the work in four years by taking one quarter at the end of each year. To date, 49 have graduated from this program.

The college industries consist of the farm, dairy, and a maintenance and motor body shop. Through the provision of work/study bursaries, the college makes available opportunities for 80 students to earn part of their fees and gain valuable experience in the various departments. The college makes available 20 housing units for married students, and half of the single students are in boarding.

The total number of graduates from Helderberg College over the past 100 years is 1,371.

Helderberg High School

HELDERBERG HIGH SCHOOL. A coeducational multiracial school operated by the Cape Conference of Seventh-day Adventists.

The school was established not merely to teach the sciences, but for the purpose of giving instruction in the great principles of God's Word and in the practical duties of everyday life. To this end, the opportunities are here given whereby students can be fitted for a useful life and at the same time receive the proper education of the mind and heart.

The high school was part of Claremont Union College, established in 1893, as well as Spion Kop College in Natal from 1919 to 1927.

In 1928 the college and the high school were moved to its present premises on the Helderberg College campus on the slopes of Helderberg Mountain, just outside Somerset West.

In 1935 a system was started whereby pupils were prepared for the government matriculation examinations. The years 1935—1939 saw great advancement and consolidation become possible because of strong and dedicated commitment to the work of Christian education.

As of 1953 all standard 10 pupils were entered for the Joint Matriculation Board or National Senior Certificate examinations.

In 1974 Helderberg High School administratively separated from the college with the appointment of J.J.W. Muller as principal. This gave the high school and the college separate identities, with their own staff and a minimum of shared facilities. The high school also changed over to writing the Cape Senior Certificate examination under the auspices of the Cape Education Department.

At present Helderberg High School has no facilities of its own, the facilities being occupied by the high school being rented from the college. A fund-raising project is presently under way for the construction of a new high school on the Helderberg campus.

Principals: J.J.W. Muller, 1975—1979; O. J. Campbell, 1980— .

Hell

HELL. The place and state of punishment and destruction, by eternal fire in the second death, of those who reject God and the offer of salvation in Jesus Christ. The Heb. she'ôl and the Gr. hadēs, both translated “hell,” refer to the unseen world, or world of the dead. The Gr. geenna denotes the “hell” of fiery punishment. The Gr. verb tartarōō, “to cast [down] to hell,” occurs but once (2 Peter 2:4). Inasmuch as in the Bible the English word “hell” is used to connote a place of punishment for the impenitent, as well as the realm of the dead (geenna as well as she'ôl and hadēs), confusion often results. Recognizing the difference in meaning, the RSV and other modern translations prefer to transliterate the Heb. she'ôl into English as Sheol and the Gr. hadēs as Hades. Of the 11 times hadēs occurs in the NT, in nine instances the RSV retains the Gr. transliteration. In one of the other instances (Matt. 16:18), the RSV translates the words of Christ rendered in the KJV as “the gates of hell,” as “the powers of death,” and in the other (1 Cor. 15:55) it renders hadēs, “death.” In the four occurrences of hadēs in Revelation, the term is in each instance connected with the word for death in the twin expression “death and Hades” (RSV). The word hadēs appears on many ancient tombstones in Asia Minor with reference to the grave of the person there buried.

The Gr. term denoting a place of punishment, geenna, is used 12 times in the NT. It is derived from the Heb. Gê Hinnom, or “Valley of Hinnom,” the deep valley immediately to the south of Jerusalem. From OT references (Joshua 15:8; 2 Kings 23:10; Jer. 7:31) and from the description of its position in 1 Enoch 26:1—5, it has been identified with the present Wâdi er-Rabâbeh. Jeremiah (2:23; 7:31, 32) indicates that the valley was the site where the barbaric heathen rite of burning children to Molech was conducted. Wicked King Ahaz seems to have instituted this devilish practice (2 Chron. 28:3; cf. PK 57). Manasseh, a grandson of Ahaz, restored this rite (2 Chron. 33:1, 6; cf. Jer. 32:35). Years later good King Josiah formally desecrated the high places in the Valley of Hinnom (2 Kings 23:10), thus bringing the practice to a halt. Jeremiah announced that because of this wicked practice the valley was to be called “valley of slaughter,” because there the enemies of the Jews would kill the fleeing inhabitants of Jerusalem and leave their bodies unburied (Jer. 7:32; 19:6, 7).

In the postexilic period, with the development of a definite doctrine of eschatology, the idea of a fiery hell as the place of punishment for sinners became a part of popular Jewish belief. Gê Hinnom was regarded first as the entrance to hell, and then as a term for hell itself. See also 1 Enoch 67:6; 90:26; 98:3. The tradition that makes the Valley of Gehenna a place of burning rubbish, and thus a type of the fires of the last day, appears to have originated with Rabbi Kimchi, a Jewish scholar of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. Ancient Jewish literature knows nothing of the idea. The earlier rabbis cite Isa. 31:9 for the concept of Gehenna's being a type of the fires of the last day.

Three times in the Sermon on the Mount, Jesus referred to geena (Matt. 5:22, 29, 30). He also spoke of Him who is “able to destroy both soul and body in hell [geena]” (Matt. 10:28), and warned the Pharisees of “the damnation of hell [geena]” (Matt. 23:33). He said that it is better to be maimed and gain eternal life than to be cast whole into geena (Mark 9:43, 45, 47). Luke 12:5 clearly indicates that the geenna experience lies beyond death.

As to the nature and effect of hellfire, Bible teaching is clear. In Matt. 3:12 sinners are compared to chaff that is burned with “unquenchable fire” (cf. Mark 9:43—48; Luke 3:9). In Matt. 25:41 the wicked are represented as being consigned to “everlasting [aiōnios] fire.” And in Matt. 5:22 Jesus referred to the final judgment on the wicked as “hellfire.” All three passages refer to the fires of the last day that will devour the wicked and all their works. This fire will purge the earth (2 Peter 3:10—12; Luke 3:17). It will be ignited after all the finally impenitent who come up in the second resurrection (Rev. 20:5) are marshaled under Satan around the New Jerusalem (v. 9). (In other words, it is not burning now.) The devil, his evil confederates, and all who have been deceived by them are cast into this lake of fire (vs. 10, 14, 15).

Seventh-day Adventists have generally avoided the use of the word “annihilation” because of the connotation some have given it, such as that the wicked forever cease to exist at the first death. The SDA view is that “the unrighteous dead will . . . be resurrected, and with Satan and his angels will . . . [be consumed by] fire from God” (Church Manual [1990], p. 31). This is the second death, from which there will be no resurrection. The word aiōnios, usually translated “everlasting” or “eternal,” and once “forever,” means literally, “lasting for an age,” in the sense of being continuous and not subject to capricious change. The English words “everlasting” and “eternal,” on the other hand, imply duration unlimited. The duration signified by aiōnios must be determined by the nature of the person or thing it describes. In the NT aiōnios is used to describe both the fate of the wicked and the reward of the righteous. Following the above principle, we find that the reward of the righteous is life to which there is no end, whereas the reward or judgment of the wicked is death to which there is no end (cf. Rom. 6:23). In John 3:16 “everlasting life” stands in contrast to “perish.”

The word “unquenchable” may be similarly understood. Jeremiah predicted that God would kindle a fire in Jerusalem that would “not be quenched” (Jer. 17:27). This prediction was fulfilled when the city was destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar (2 Chron. 36:19—21). Obviously that fire is not burning today. It was unquenchable in the sense that the Jews were unable to put it out; it burned until it destroyed their city and went out.

This has been the Seventh-day Adventist position from the first. James White, one of the founders, wrote in 1850: “To those on his left hand the King will say, ‘Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels.’ This ‘everlasting fire’ is that which ‘comes down from God out of heaven,’ and DEVOURS them. It will ‘BURN THEM UP, saith the Lord of hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch.’ This everlasting fire, which will not be quenched until the whole host of Gog and Magog are devoured, which was prepared for the devil and his angels, will burn up, not only the ‘root,’ the devil, but the branch, or branches, his children, not a scrap left, thank heaven! Then God will have a clean universe and there will be no more tempting devil to annoy the saints, or holy beings of other worlds” (Advent Review 1:50, September 1850).

Uriah Smith, for many years editor of the official church organ, the Review and Herald, wrote a series of articles in 1859 under the title “Mortal or Immortal, Which?” He made a thorough investigation of texts bearing on the subject, and in his concluding article stated that the doctrine of eternal punishment in hell, unless proof is found in Scripture, should be rejected “as most dangerous and destructive error.”

Seventh-day Adventists have also pointed to the inconsistency of the doctrine of eternal torment with the character of God as revealed in the Bible.

“How repugnant to every emotion of love and mercy, and even to our sense of justice, is the doctrine that the wicked dead are tormented with fire and brimstone in an eternally burning hell; that for the sins of a brief earthly life they are to suffer torture as long as God shall live. . . .

“Where, in the pages of God’s Word, is such teaching to be found? Will the redeemed in heaven be lost to all emotions of pity and compassion, and even to feelings of common humanity? Are these to be exchanged for the indifference of the stoic, or the cruelty of the savage? . . .

“What would be gained to God should we admit that He delights in witnessing unceasing tortures; that He is regaled with the groans and shrieks and imprecations of the suffering creatures whom He holds in the flames of hell? Can these horrid sounds be music in the ear of infinite Love? . . .

“It is beyond the power of the human mind to estimate the evil which has been wrought by the heresy of eternal torment. The religion of the Bible, full of love and goodness, and abounding in compassion, is darkened by superstition and clothed with terror. When we consider in what false colors Satan has painted the character of God, can we wonder that our merciful Creator is feared, dreaded, and even hated? The appalling views of God which have spread over the world from the teachings of the pulpit have made thousands, yes, millions of skeptics and infidels” (GC 535, 536).

As to Jesus’ story of the rich man and Lazarus, which is often presented as proof that the soul goes to its reward at death, SDAs believe that it was a parable and that Jesus was using an argument ad hominem based on the Pharisees’ erroneous concept of the condition of men and women in death.

This concept is reflected in Josephus’ discourse concerning Hades, in which he sets forth Hades as a place wherein the souls of all—both righteous and unrighteous—are confined until a proper season, which God has determined, when all will be resurrected from the dead. He pictures it as a subterranean region shrouded in darkness. In this region, he says, a place has been set apart as a lake of unquenchable fire, where the wicked will eventually be cast. At the gate of this region, presumably, stands an archangel, with a group of guards. Passing through the gate, the just are conducted to the right by their respective angels, to a place of light. Here in bliss and rejoicing, basking in the smiles of their forebears, they rest, awaiting the resurrection and eternal new life in heaven. This imaginary place is called “the bosom of Abraham.”

Josephus goes on to explain that as the unjust reach the gate, the angels drag them to the left into the neighborhood of hell itself. There they hear the noise of hell and feel its hot vapor, while awaiting in fearful expectation the horrors of the lake of fire. They may also look in the opposite direction and see the righteous enjoying the bliss of Abraham’s bosom. Between the two groups, however, there is a deep chasm which cannot be crossed by either the just or the unjust (“An Extract out of Josephus’s Discourse to the Greeks Concerning Hades,” in his Works, Whiston translation, Philadelphia [1853], pp. 524—526).

Henriksen, Hans Ludvig

HENRIKSEN, HANS LUDVIG (1896—1973). Treasurer and publishing house manager. A native of Denmark, he served the church for 45 years in his homeland, in Switzerland, France, and Madagascar. His work was primarily as a treasurer and a manager of publishing houses. He served on the conference, union, and division levels.

Henry, Archibald R.

HENRY, ARCHIBALD R. (1839—1909). Treasurer of the General Conference (1883—1888) and a financial officer and adviser of many early Seventh-day Adventist institutions, such as the Central SDA Publishing Association, Health Reform Institute (later known as the Battle Creek Sanitarium), Battle Creek College, Colorado Sanitarium, Union College, Nebraska Sanitarium, International Medical Missionary and Benevolent Association, and American Medical Missionary College. Born in Iowa, son of a Methodist minister, he was educated at Simpson College at Indianola, Iowa, and became president of a bank at Indianola.

In 1882, shortly after he joined the SDA Church, he was called to assist in the financial management of the SDA Publishing Association at Battle Creek, Michigan. He held this position of treasurer continuously until 1897, except between 1885 and 1887, when he was vice president of the association. Between 1893 and 1895 he was both treasurer and manager of the institution.

In 1883 he was elected to serve also as a treasurer of the General Conference. In 1889 he was president of the General Conference Association of SDAs, in 1890—1891 its vice president, in 1892 its auditor, and in 1893 its treasurer. Simultaneously he was a member of governing boards of nearly all early SDA medical and educational institutions in the Western states.

Henry, Sarepta Myrenda (Irish)

HENRY, SAREPTA MYRENDA (IRISH) (1839—1900). Writer, temperance worker, one of the early leaders of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, Seventh-day Adventist leader in women's work. She was born into the family of a Methodist minister who did much pioneering work in Illinois. Being too frail, in her father's opinion, to work at the household chores, Sarepta spent her childhood and youth accompanying him on his itineraries. In her youth she attended Rock River Seminary. In 1861 she married James W. Henry, a teacher, who died 10 years later, leaving her with three small children. She supported her family by teaching and by writing stories and poetry for publication.

Appalled one day in the spring of 1874 that her child had been enticed to enter a saloon, she set out to organize the Christian women of Rockford, Illinois, to active promotion of temperance. Gradually her sphere of action enlarged, and she became a national evangelist for the newly organized Woman's Christian Temperance Union. In the second half of the 1880s she became ill, and by 1895 sank into complete invalidism with a heart ailment. During the late summer of 1896, while a patient in the Battle Creek Sanitarium, she accepted the SDA teachings. Shortly afterward she was healed while in prayer, and resumed her WCTU work.

In 1898 she conceived a plan for what she called "woman ministry." Lecturing on the role of the mother in the moral education of society, she stressed this from coast to coast in the United States and Canada. She also presented her plan to SDA congregations. A. W. Spalding remarked later that in the work instituted in the Seventh-day Adventist Church by Mrs. Henry came "the first semblance of an organized effort to train parents and to give help in their problems" (Origin and History of Seventh-day Adventists, vol. 3, p. 200).

She wrote numerous articles for the Review and Herald, and among her published books and pamphlets are: The Abiding Spirit; Good Form and Christian Etiquette; How the Sabbath Came to Me; The Marble Cross and Other Poems; The Spirit of Burning; Studies in Christian Principles; Studies in Home and Child Life; The Unanswered Prayer; The Way, the Truth, the Life; and What and How to Answer. Her biography has been written by several authors, among them her daughter, Mary Rossiter, My Mother's Life; and her granddaughter, Margaret R. White, Whirlwind of the Lord; and by Ava Covington Wall, in They Also Served.

Heppenstall, Edward

HEPPENSTALL, EDWARD (1901—1994). Pastor, author, teacher. Born in Great Britain, he served his church both in his homeland and in the United States. After attending college in Yorkshire, Heppenstall began his service for the denomination in 1928 as a teacher in the British Union.

In the thirties he transferred to Michigan, where he graduated from Emmanuel Missionary College in 1933. He then served as a teacher and MV secretary for the Michigan Conference. From 1941 to 1955 he was head of the Bible Department at La Sierra College.

He furthered his formal education by earning an M.A. in history from the University of Michigan and later a Ph.D. in theology and philosophy from the University of Southern California.

In 1955 he joined the faculty of the SDA Theological Seminary, where he taught and later chaired the Department of Theology and Christian Philosophy. From 1967 to 1970 he was on the instruction faculty of the Division of Religion at Loma Linda University,

Dr. Heppenstall was known for his warmhearted personality and vigorous teaching in which he frequently used the Socratic method. He encouraged careful thought, progressive attitudes, and loyalty to the church.

Heppenstall authored numerous articles and papers for the SDA Church, as well as the following books: In Touch With God, Is Perfection Possible? The Man Who Is God, Our High Priest, and Salvation Unlimited.

He was 93 years old at the time of his death, leaving behind his wife, Margit Strom Heppenstall, an author of note in the SDA Church.

Heri Adventist Hospital

HERI ADVENTIST HOSPITAL. A 70-bed general hospital, which also conducted some leper work until 1976. It is situated near Lake Tanganyika in western Tanzania, a few miles from the Burundi border and about 45 miles (70 kilometers) from Kigoma. It is operated by the Tanzania Union and serves the Ha tribe primarily, but draws patients from other tribes as well.

W. Sparrow began construction in 1947. Before the buildings were completed, a clinic was opened in June 1949, with Dr. W. H. Taylor, F.R.C.S., in charge and Alice Jensen as nurse. Petro Morwa was the first ministerial worker in the area. In the same year work was begun for 20 lepers, the government supplying the necessary drugs. The number of lepers later increased to 500, most of them outpatients.

The hospital opened officially in June 1953. The plant consists of an administration block, a men's ward, a women's ward, a surgical unit with X-ray equipment, an Outpatient Department, utility buildings, and staff housing.

The present nursing staff is made up of nationals. It consists of a nursing director, two registered male nurses, two registered nurse midwives, and one psychiatric nurse. The beds are usually filled, and the average daily outpatient load is 40. In addition to the work at the hospital, five outclinics are operated, at Heru Juu, Kasulu, Rusaha, Kagunga, and Mpanda.

The Division of Public Health and Tropical Medicine of Loma Linda University graduated a number of African workers through the years. Evangelism has been fostered at Heri, and a church building was dedicated in 1961. In 1993 there are 10 organized churches, with 2,236 members. As a result, a field has been organized to carry the work forward in the western zone of Tanzania.

Heritage Green Senior Centre

HERITAGE GREEN SENIOR CENTRE. A senior retirement community comprised of a 110-apartment complex, a 20-bed retirement lodge, and an 87-bed nursing home. The complex is located in southern Ontario, Canada, in a quiet country setting in the city of Stoney Creek. It is designed and operated to help seniors live a more comfortable, fulfilling life in a Christian, homelike atmosphere. It is a nonprofit institution owned and operated by the Ontario Conference of the Seventh-day Adventist Church. An Adventist church is located on site to serve residents and the community.

Hetze, Gottlieb

HETZE, GOTTLIEB (1848—1927). A pioneer Seventh-day Adventist worker in Russia. He was born in the German settlement of Dreispitz, on the Volga River in Russia, and in 1883 emigrated to the United States, where he lived in Kansas and later in Oklahoma. After becoming an SDA he went to Russia in 1902 at his own expense and worked as a self-supporting evangelist. Later he was ordained to the ministry and served in the Volga River area, the Caucasus, the Urals, and the Crimea. For a time he carried departmental responsibilities in the conferences. In 1922 he returned to America. His death was brought about as a result of a fall that he sustained while helping to erect a church building at Okeene, Kansas (he had been a carpenter by trade).

Hetzell, Margaret Carol

HETZELL, MARGARET CAROL (1917—1978). Departmental director, writer. Born in New Jersey, she accepted the Seventh-day Adventist message as a teenager. She was encouraged by Pastor Horace Shaw to attend Washington Missionary College, where she worked her way through in the proofroom of the College Press.

Her first work with the church was in the proofroom at the Review and Herald Publishing Association. Her hobby of photography came to the attention of the General Conference Bureau of Public Relations, predecessor of the Communication Department, and in 1951 she became a staff member of the bureau. In 1954 she became assistant director and in 1962 associate director. At the General Conference session in 1975 she assumed the responsibilities of director of the department.

Hetzell wrote scores of articles for SDA publications and non-SDA magazines. She produced workbooks in communication, and numerous film and program scripts and articles appearing in many countries. She was editor of Tell for more than 20 years. Her book, The Undaunted, published in 1967, told of the miraculous things that happened to people spreading the good news of the gospel.

She was listed in Who's Who of American Women, Who's Who in Public Relations, Foremost Women in Communications, and several other biographical publications.

Hewitt, David

HEWITT, DAVID (1805—1878). First Seventh-day Adventist convert in Battle Creek, Michigan. He is prominent in SDA history mainly because of the interesting story of his first meeting with SDAs. A traveling peddler by occupation and a Presbyterian by profession, he was pointed out to Joseph Bates in 1852 as the most honest man in the town of Battle Creek. He accepted the Seventh-day Adventist doctrines, being one of the earliest non-Millerites to join the movement. He was baptized in the same year together with J. P. Kellogg. He preached occasionally, it seems, although Bates called him one of the “professed public teachers” in Michigan. He wrote several letters to, and contributed short doctrinal articles for, the Review and Herald. At the time the denominational name was formally discussed, he was the first to move that “we take the name Seventh-day Adventists,” though the motion was later withdrawn and rephrased.

Highland Academy

HIGHLAND ACADEMY. A coeducational boarding school on the senior high school level located in the north central part of the state of Tennessee. Situated 40 miles (65 kilometers) north of Nashville, on State Highway 109 between Gallatin and Portland, the school is owned and operated by the Kentucky-Tennessee Conference of Seventh-day Adventists. It received accreditation with the Seventh-day Adventist Board of Regents on July 1, 1949, and with the State of Tennessee on Aug. 11, 1961. The current curriculum is accredited and includes courses that offer the students a choice of general or college preparatory programs.

The school operates on a 387-acre (160-hectare) property on which can be found an administration-classroom building, two dormitories, a large gymnasium, a music-fine arts building, a lighted athletic field, and several faculty homes, all attractive and set in the midst of a tree-shaded campus. Highland Manor, a nursing home facility; Wilks Publications; and a newly established packing industry are also on campus, providing work opportunities for the students.

Highland Academy is the successor of the privately owned Fountain Head Rural School and Sanitarium. This school was established when Forrest F. West and his family, accompanied by his mother and his sisters, Edna and Bessie West, moved from Springfield, Missouri, in January 1907. They were joined by Braden Mulford, brother of Mrs. F. West, who had assisted in the founding of Madison College. The group felt strongly that a school should be established at Fountain Head, near Portland, and a hospital be built that would not only benefit the community but also provide employment for boys and girls to work their way through school.

Some of the first industries included a farm, dairy, orchard, woodworking shop, cannery, and also a sawmill, which furnished lumber for the first school building, which was erected in 1908.

B. N. Mulford headed the school from 1907 to 1942. It offered only grades 1—8 during the first five years, added two secondary years in 1912, and became a complete secondary school in 1940.

F. F. West was in charge of agriculture in the early years. The Mulfords, both registered nurses, were also instrumental in founding the first sanitarium, in 1907.

Transfer to Conference. In 1945 the academy and sanitarium, administered as one institution, were taken over by the Kentucky-Tennessee Conference and the Alabama-Mississippi Conference and operated jointly until 1948, when the institution became the property of the Kentucky-Tennessee Conference. In October 1945 the school's name was changed from Fountain Head Rural School to Highland Academy.

The Student Association sponsors the publication of the school newspaper, the Highlander, and the yearbook, the Chimes, both published since 1949.

Highland View Academy

HIGHLAND VIEW ACADEMY. A coeducational school on the senior high school level operated by the Chesapeake Conference. It is situated on the western slope of South Mountain, six miles (10 kilometers) east of Hagerstown, Maryland, on Mount Aetna Road.

Prior to 1947 the Seventh-day Adventist congregations in the area maintained independent church schools, but the need was felt for a strong consolidated school. In September of that year the Black Rock Junior Academy, offering the ninth and tenth grades, was begun in the Smithsburg church. The next year the eleventh grade was added. In 1948 a 292-acre (120-hectare) tract at South Mountain was purchased, half to be sold as homesites to help finance the new school building, and plans were drawn for a one-story, four-room school of modern design. The Chesapeake Conference purchased about 20 acres (eight hectares) for an MV summer camp. In the fall of 1949 Mount Aetna Academy was opened as a full 12-grade school.

In 1950 a gymnasium and two more classrooms were added. SDAs began to move in, forming a rural community adjacent to the school. In 1958 a new water system, from springs, was installed, supplying 37 homes, Mount Aetna Academy, and the campsite.

In 1965 the Chesapeake Conference committee voted to establish a conference boarding academy at Mount Aetna. The name Highland View Academy was announced in October 1965.

As of 1992 the academy has two dormitories, a large cafeteria, and an administration building with a new library. A new church has just been built on the campus. Two commercial bakeries, run by Hadley Farms and Davita Foods, provide work opportunities for the students. Enrollment is generally between 150 and 200 students.

HILLIARD, WILLIAM IRA (1888—1971). Missionary and treasurer. He was born in South Dakota and graduated as a nurse from the Glendale Sanitarium in California. In 1916 he married a classmate, Jessie Allen, and that summer they sailed for China, where he assisted in establishing our first medical institution in Shanghai. He spent a total of 46 years in overseas service to the church. This included various capacities of service, but was predominantly in the field of finance. Included also were three and a half years in Japanese concentration camps.

Himes, Joshua Vaughan

HIMES, JOSHUA VAUGHAN (1805—1895). The great publicist, promoter, and organizer of the Millerite movement, and in many ways its leading figure. He was born in Rhode Island and went to New Bedford, Massachusetts, to learn a trade. In 1825 he entered the ministry in the Massachusetts Christian Conference. He fought the liquor traffic energetically and was an assistant to William Lloyd Garrison in a battle against slavery. His Chardon Street Chapel in Boston became the headquarters for all kinds of reform meetings.

In November 1839 Himes invited William Miller to hold a series of meetings in his church. Himes became convinced of the general points of Miller's teaching and felt a burden to get the new doctrine before the people. He asked Miller why he had not gone to the large cities. Miller responded that he went only where he was invited. Himes then told him to prepare for a great campaign—that the doors would be opened in every state in the Union east of the Mississippi.

Himes launched The Signs of the Times in 1840, without patrons or a single subscriber, and with only a dollar of capital. He brought out a second and a third edition of Miller's Lectures, and was thenceforth in charge of the publication and the distribution of Adventist literature. He published charts, pamphlets, books, tracts, songbooks, broadsides, and handbills.

In New York City Himes established a daily paper, the Midnight Cry (1842), in connection with a great evangelistic series. Ten thousand copies were printed daily for a number of weeks and hawked by newsboys. When the meetings closed, the paper continued publication as a weekly.

Himes was back of the call issued by an authorizing committee, headed by William Miller, for the first "General Conference on the Second Coming of Christ" (1840). He led in inaugurating the series of Millerite camp meetings, and he undertook the task of securing a giant tent, large enough to accommodate several thousand people, to be used in cities where no churches or halls were open for Millerite lectures.

He took no part in the "seventh-month" movement that looked to Oct. 22, 1844, as the date for the Advent, but like Miller, he acknowledged its validity shortly before that date.

After the October disappointment Himes held to the Advent hope, but repudiated the seventh-month movement, or "true Midnight Cry," which he had been slow to accept.

Himes played a leading part in the Albany Conference of 1845, in which the main body of Adventists attempted to form a permanent organization. For some years after Miller's death, he was the leader of the mainline group called the American Millennial Association (later known as the Evangelical Adventists, but now long defunct). In 1863, having embraced the doctrine of conditional immortality, he joined the other main group, the Advent Christian Church, and edited the paper later called the Advent Christian Times. However, in the 1870s he separated from that body and entered the Episcopal ministry, in which he remained until his death. In these later years he maintained generally friendly relations with the Seventh-day Adventists.

Hindson, Anna L. (Ingels)

HINDSON, ANNA L. (INGELS) (1862—1933). Editor, conference secretary. In 1883, shortly after accepting the Seventh-day Adventist faith, she joined the Pacific Press staff, beginning a term of service for the church that continued uninterrupted for 50 years. For nine years she was secretary of the California Tract Society, and in 1893 was appointed to a similar position in Australia. Several years later she became secretary of the Australasian Union Conference and held that office until she married James Hindson in 1898. Together they then organized the tract society in western Australia. At the same time he began the health food work and she acted as secretary-treasurer of the West Australian Mission. For 34 years she was editor of the Australasian Record, and for 18 years she edited the Missionary Leader. She served for eight years as secretary of the union conference's Young People's Department. Her 30 years as secretary of the Australasian Union Sabbath School Department have been regarded as her outstanding contribution to the church.

Hinsdale Hospital

HINSDALE HOSPITAL. A 459-bed general acute-care hospital located in the village of Hinsdale, some 17 miles (30 kilometers) west of Chicago's major business district. It is the largest and oldest hospital in DuPage County, Illinois, where it has served the community for 90 years.

The hospital offers a wide range of services. In addition to medical and surgical patient units, the hospital contains a mental health unit, a three-phase newborn nursery, intensive-care and coronary-care units, a children's unit, and units for orthopedic, maternity, and minimal-care patients.

Among facilities and services available at the hospital are a level II trauma center; a regional poison control center; the Opler Cancer Center for advanced and leading-edge treatment of cancer patients; the Rooney Heart Institute for coronary care; New Day Center, DuPage County's oldest chemical dependency program of its kind; and the Paulson Rehab Network, the largest physical rehabilitation network in the area. In addition, the hospital facilitates a medical residency program on campus.

Community outreach efforts each year draw more than 5,000 people from northern Illinois to such programs as screenings for diabetes, glaucoma, heart disease, and cancer; classes in weight control, nutrition, and stress management.

The medical staff of nearly 640 physicians represents all major specialties, with emphasis on primary care. Approximately 2,400 full- and part-time employees staff the hospital. A corps of more than 500 volunteers, which includes some 150 junior volunteers from the community, supplement the paid staff by providing patient-related services within the hospital.

The hospital also operates a School of Medical Technology, a School of Radiologic Technology, and a full family practice residency program, training medical professionals from local colleges and universities, and from around the world, in the latest medical techniques and knowledge, while giving them practical experience in a Seventh-day Adventist Christian hospital environment.

History

History. In 1899 Dr. David Paulson, a graduate of Bellevue Medical College, left the Battle Creek Sanitarium to pioneer the medical work among the indigent of Chicago. Later he began to consider the need for a sanitarium outside the city limits. C. B. Kimball, a prominent Chicago businessman and friend, made available an abandoned country estate in the village of Hinsdale at a low figure without interest and with long-term payments. Lacking in funds but not in faith, Dr. Paulson and his wife, Mary, also a physician, moved onto the property and began to gather a staff. In October of that year the Hinsdale Sanitarium and Benevolent Association was organized and a board of trustees named. On June 6, 1905, before the rooms were finished, the first patient, a young woman who had been an invalid for years, arrived. She went home cured and later became a physical culture teacher. Shortly after the dedication on Sept. 20, 1905, all rooms were filled.

The year 1907 brought hard times to the country, and much of the director's time was spent in the making and repaying of loans. When the board voted a salary of $75 a month for Dr. Mary Paulson, she refused to accept it, stating that her former salary of $65 a month was entirely adequate. Dr. David Paulson was receiving $40 a week, and nurses were paid 15 and 17 cents an hour.

In 1908 the first nursing class was graduated. In 1910 Dr. W. H. Wolfson was employed as assistant to Dr. Paulson, bringing to four the medical staff, referred to as the "medical faculty" because they functioned as teachers as well as physicians.

By the close of the first decade (1914), the sanitarium conducted, in addition to the regular program, the School of Nursing, the Good Samaritan Inn for indigent patients, the rescue home for girls, the gospel program for prisoners, the health education work, medical evangelistic tours, and the continuing of the medical mission in Chicago. To encourage young people to work at the sanitarium without sacrificing their education, Hinsdale Academy was established in the area.

Subsequent History. By 1917 the institution was placed under the jurisdiction of the Lake Union Conference, but without financial control or obligation. A year later a deed of trust furnished funds for a large, three-story fire-resistant addition, completed in 1920.

During the great depression of the early 1930s, many businesses closed, but by reducing the working force, curtailing inventory supplies, and cutting wages, the sanitarium weathered the storm.

By 1945 it appeared desirable to replace the antiquated original buildings, and the constituency asked the Lake Union Conference to assume ownership and supervision, and to give financial assistance in the rebuilding program.

While plans for building were in the embryonic stage, a severe polio epidemic struck the area, with 53 active cases in the county. In the crisis, Eugene Kettering and his wife, local residents, helped provide the hospital with the latest equipment for combating the disease, and workers labored around the clock, until the emergency passed. This prompt and efficient response to a need heightened community interest in the hospital. A group of leading citizens met in the Kettering home to lay plans for organizing the community to help finance the new $3 million, 195-bed hospital building. On Sept. 27, 1953, 8-year-old "Chucky" Richards, one of the 1949 polio victims, cut a ribbon to open the new institution.

Community interest in the hospital continued to grow; a civic advisory board was formed in 1950 as a link between hospital and community leaders. As demands for hospital services increased, the hospital began experiencing crowded conditions. In 1960 a capital funds campaign was launched toward construction of a seven-level addition. The north wing was dedicated May 12, 1963, nearly doubling the size of the hospital and eventually bringing its capacity to 360 beds.

During the 1960s the hospital opened its first intensive-care unit, purchased a cobalt therapy unit with community gifts, acquired a computer, upgraded X-ray and laboratory instruments, and conducted its first Five-Day Plan to Stop Smoking.

As the suburbs near Hinsdale swelled in size, crowded conditions, especially in the ancillary departments, began to put pressure on the hospital to expand facilities once more.

In 1972 the brick veneer structure that had served as the main hospital building from 1920 until 1953 was demolished to make way for a new five-level south wing. Again the community responded, this time giving $1.5 million in cash and pledges.

In 1974 the hospital established the office of medical education to coordinate continuing education for staff physicians and to organize and direct a family practice residency.

In the 1980s the hospital continued to grow, eventually reaching its current 459-bed capacity. The hospital built upon its strong primary care base, adding advanced tertiary services. In addition, the hospital revamped its operating rooms, opening 10 new suites. The hospital began operating two magnetic resonance imaging machines, one in the hospital itself and one off-campus, aiding doctors in diagnosis and working with surgeons on advanced surgical techniques, such as stereotactic neurosurgery. The hospital also revamped its computer system with the addition of an HBO CareNet system that allows precise tracking of patient data and needs.

An open heart center was established, the Rooney Heart Institute. The institute has opened a cardiac surgical suite with advanced multimedia ability to help doctors review cases and teach procedures. The Rooney Heart Institute also became one of the first facilities in the area to perform the latest in balloon angioplasty procedures, the procedure that uses a cagelike device to help keep clogged arteries open.

A center for advanced cancer treatment and study, the Opler Cancer Center, was opened. This center is one of the few in the nation certified to use cutting-edge and experimental treatments for cancer. There are some 92 experimental treatment protocols in use at the hospital, and the hospital has recently opened a molecular pathology lab to help in diagnosis and treatment of patients.

The hospital's birth-care center is one of the busiest in the state, with some 3,000 babies born each year. The unit offers full neonatology and neonatal intensive-care services. For children, the pediatrics unit recently opened a Pediatric Special Care Unit designed to care for children in need of intensive hospital monitoring.

During the early 1990s the hospital implemented the Patient Centered Care (PCC) model of operations. In the PCC model, hospital services are brought to the patient rather than the patient to the services, as in traditional hospital models. All patient supplies and some diagnostic functions are performed without the patient leaving the room. In addition, caregivers are cross-trained in disciplines, allowing greater flexibility in giving care. Doctors and nurses will also have access to patient records and the hospital computer system from within a patient's room, allowing doctors and nurses to spend more time with the patient.

Hiroshima Saniku Gakuin

HIROSHIMA SANIKU GAKUIN (Hiroshima Saniku Senior High School). A secondary school located in Hiroshima-ken, Daiwa-cho, Japan. It is nestled on a hillside of 84 acres (34 hectares) surrounded by evergreen hills, abundant in trees and seasonal flowers. It is ideal for study, self-reflection, and prayer. From Hiroshima city this ideal location is about a 45-mile (70-kilometer) drive along a scenic country road.

There are three separate programs carried out on the school campus, namely, the senior high school, junior high school, and elementary school. Each is headed by a principal under the directorship of the president, who coordinates the functions of these three independent schools. About 99 percent of the total academy, senior and junior enrollment, live in the dormitories. The school is far from the concentration of church members.

This institution maintains high standards and quality in comprehensive living, learning, and working programs. Especially strong are the traditions of Bible study and work education while maintaining a high quality of academic programs. As of 1993 there were 173 students in the junior high school, 304 students in the senior high school, and 73 teachers and staff members. The majority of the students are from Seventh-day Adventist homes. After transferring the school site to the present Hiroshima Saniku Gakuin campus, the number of graduates has grown to more than 1,500.

Religious activities consist of worship and other meetings on Sabbath, chapel hours and Weeks of Prayer in spring and fall, Bible study groups, musical services for surrounding churches, branch Sabbath schools, distribution of literature, and visitation.

To provide work education, the school has more than 27 areas, including agriculture, grounds work, woodwork, maintenance, ironwork, bakery, custodial, cafeteria, store, home economies, library, horticulture, office work, and dormitory work. Hiroshima Saniku Gakuin exists to provide a balanced education in harmony with the standards and ideals of the Seventh-day Adventist Church, the development of Christian character, and a Christian philosophy of life.

Historical (Historicist) View of Prophecy

HISTORICAL (HISTORICIST) VIEW OF PROPHECY. See Historicism.

Historical Research Committee

HISTORICAL RESEARCH COMMITTEE. A committee authorized by the General Conference Committee in 1938 that functioned from time to time until 1953 investigating certain historical, archaeological, and chronological topics connected with the Seventh-day Adventist application of the 70 weeks and the 2300 days of Daniel 8 and 9. The group was generally called merely the Research Committee, but later, after the formation of the Committee on Biblical Study and Research, the older committee was given the adjective “Historical.” It sponsored the publication of The Chronology of Ezra 7, by Siegfried H. Horn and Lynn H. Wood (1953).

Historicism

HISTORICISM. This term is used to describe a school of prophetic interpretation that conceives the fulfillment of the prophecies of Daniel and Revelation as covering the historical period from the time of the prophet to the establishment of the kingdom of God on earth. These prophecies were given in visionary circles that recapitulate the content of the previous vision, adding new information or providing a slightly different perspective of the same historical period. Thus, for instance, Dan. 2, 7, 8—9, and 10—12 are parallel prophecies covering basically the same historical period. In Revelation the same type of recapitulation is employed in the interpretation of the messages to the seven churches, the seven seals, the seven trumpets, and Rev. 12—14.

The validity of historicism as a method for the interpretation of Daniel and Revelation is provided by the fact that the angel interpreter in Daniel used this method in explaining the meaning of the visions to the prophet. In a dream he is informed that the dream of the king in Dan. 2 represents four kingdoms that will arise in human history before the kingdom of God is established (verses 36—45). The four beasts of Dan. 7 represent those same kingdoms, after which God will give the kingdom to the saints (verses 18, 19). The first kingdom was identified as Babylon (verses 36—38). In Dan. 8 two animals are used as symbols to represent the Medo-Persian and Greek empires (verses 19—21). The fourth kingdom is not identified in Daniel, but Jesus takes it to be Rome (Matt. 24:15). According to Daniel, this kingdom was to be divided, and a little horn would exercise political and religious control over the people. In the time of the end the horn is to be destroyed and God's kingdom established forever.

Jesus used this method when He interpreted Dan. 9:26, 27 as referring to the future destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 (Luke 21:20—22). Paul also speaks about a series of successive prophetic events to be fulfilled within history before the second coming of Christ (2 Thess. 2:1—12). Historicism as a method of interpretation is found in the Bible itself, and it provides the key for the interpretation of the apocalyptic books of Daniel and Revelation.

The historicist approach to prophetic interpretation was used by the early Church Fathers up to the fifth century A.D. LeRoy E. Froom has shown that a significant shift in prophetic interpretation occurred when Augustine defined the kingdom of God as the Christian church and spiritualized the millennium, making it a symbol of the Christian Era (The Prophetic Faith of Our Fathers, vol. 1, pp. 473—491). His views prevailed during the Middle Ages, until the period of the Protestant reform. The Reformers restored historicism as the method to be used in the interpretation of Daniel and Revelation, and identified the papacy as a manifestation of the antichrist predicted in those books.

The Counter-Reformation developed a new system of prophetic interpretation that came to be known as preterism. This method was developed by a Spanish Jesuit named Luis de Alcazar (died 1613). According to him, the prophecies of Revelation were fulfilled during the first six centuries of the Christian Era. He identified Nero with the antichrist (ibid., vol. 2, pp. 506—508). Preterism was later adopted by many Protestants and has become today the prevailing method of prophetic interpretation among religious scholars in general. According to them, Daniel deals with events that took place during the time of the Maccabbeans, and Revelation deals with the situation of the church during the time of John.

Among more conservative Protestants, historicism has been replaced by futurism. Futurism applies the prophecies of Revelation mainly to events that will take place within a seven-year period just before the second coming of Christ. This is the position taken by most dispensationalists.

Seventh-day Adventists believe that historicism is the right method of prophetic interpretation to be used in the interpretation of the books of Daniel and Revelation. The method is supported by the Scriptures itself and was in use during the early church period. Moreover, they feel that in using this method they are also preserving an important aspect of the Reformers' work of restoration.

Hobart Adventist School

HOBART ADVENTIST SCHOOL (formerly Moonah Seventh-day Adventist School). A coeducational day school on the primary and secondary level, situated on Cheviot Road, West Moonah, a suburb of Hobart, Tasmania, Australia. It is owned and operated by the Tasmanian Conference and is administered by a school board composed of members of supporting metropolitan churches and conference administration. In 1959 the state's Education Department granted the school full secondary registration for courses of study leading to the Tasmanian Certificate of Education in academic and practical subjects. The enrollment in 1993 was 115; there were six full-time teachers and two part-time instructors.

The school was relocated to its present site in 1983, replacing one that had operated on Fleet Street, Moonah, since 1933, and prior to that by the City Seventh-day Adventist Church on Warwick Street, Hobart. Twenty-four pupils were enrolled by the first teacher, P. N. Sheppard. Accommodation was gradually increased, until on Feb. 20, 1955, a new high school unit was dedicated. In February 1957 a third primary schoolroom was added to the original unit, and a science classroom/laboratory was built in 1971.

A completely new school, erected on the present site, was officially opened and dedicated on May 22, 1983. Two more classrooms and a canteen were added in 1993.

Hoffman, Benjamin Philip

HOFFMAN, BENJAMIN PHILIP (1889—1967). Missionary, pastor, administrator, teacher. Hoffman studied at Pacific Union College, the University of Southern California, and the Foreign Mission Seminary in Washington, D.C. After his ordination in 1912, he and his wife sailed for Japan, where he served as pastor and district director in Kobe. In 1917 he became president of the Japan Conference and later served as president of the Japan Union Mission. A gifted scholar, Hoffman mastered the Japanese language to such a degree that the national people, when hearing him speak on the radio, presumed that they were listening to someone who had known Japanese from birth.

Upon his return to the United States in 1921, he served as secretary of miscellaneous languages in the Bureau of Home Missions of the General Conference and later as head of the Bible Department at Pacific Union College and as a professor in the Theological Seminary in Washington, D.C.

During 1951 and 1952 he did literary work for the Japan Publishing House and also served with the Central California Conference.

His final service to the church was as pastor to churches in the Central California Conference. Among these were the churches of the people so dear to his heart—the Japanese congregations in Mountain View and San Francisco.

Hohenau Adventist Sanitarium

HOHENAU ADVENTIST SANITARIUM (Sanatorio Adventista Hohenau). A medical institution situated in south Paraguay, near the border with Argentina, and 22 miles (35 kilometers) from Encarnación, the second-largest city in Paraguay. The work was started by Benoní Cayrús, when he was president of the Paraguay Mission, and Dr. Carlos Drachenberg.

In 1962 they obtained 7.5 acres (three hectares) of land from the Hohenau German Community, and with donations received from the residents were able to construct the first building, the foundation stone of which was laid in 1963.

Even though Dr. Carlos E. Drachenberg had been appointed as director of the sanitarium in 1963, medical work did not begin until 1965. In 1966 a committee was named to study plans for the sanitarium; the second stage of construction was begun, adding 30 beds and other facilities.

The inauguration of the new building and an airstrip took place in 1971, when an acute economical crisis affected the whole area and the sanitarium. Physicians from River Plate Sanitarium and Hospital, from Chaco Sanitarium and Hospital, and from Paraguay Adventist Sanitarium traveled to Hohenau, taking turns in attending the medical necessities of the institution. This situation ended in 1973.

In 1993 there were six doctors and 11 nurses. The 22 beds of the sanitarium render good service, and the present facilities will suffice to cope with the necessities of the area and the work in that place for the next decade.

Medical Directors: Carlos Drachenberg, 1965—1967; G. Wensell, 1968; Arnold Treiyer, 1969—1971; there was no medical director during 1971—1973; Rubén Rostán Rhiner, 1974—1978; Miguel Ibanez, 1979—1980; Eduardo Hellvig, 1980—1987; Enrique Stoletniy, 1987—1994; Omar Loose, 1995— .

Holbrook Seventh-day Adventist Indian Mission School

HOLBROOK SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST INDIAN MISSION SCHOOL. A 12-grade coeducational boarding school for Native Americans situated 2.5 miles (four kilometers) southwest of Holbrook, Arizona. The school officially opened in September 1946 with an opening enrollment of 26. It was born of the vision of Marvin and Gwen Walter, who helped establish the school on 300 acres (120 hectares) just off the Navajo reservation.

Throughout the years many changes have taken place on the campus. In 1955 work was completed for a new girls' dormitory. The church was built in 1963, and in 1965 a new boys' dormitory was completed. A new cafeteria was built in 1972 by the building trades class from Pacific Union College. In 1973 Maranatha Flights International constructed the vocational trades building, housing facilities for a home economics lab, a computer lab, and classroom space for auto mechanics, welding, drafting, and electrical training. The gymnasium was built in 1984, and in 1985 Maranatha returned to build a new administration building.

In addition to changes in the physical plant, curriculum has changed as well. In the late 1950s several grades were added, first the ninth, the next year the tenth, and then the eleventh. In 1971 the twelfth grade was added.

Holbrook Seventh-day Adventist Indian Mission School is the only 12-grade SDA "mission" boarding school serving North American Native Americans, starting with first through third graders who reside in their own "little boys" and "little girls" dormitories. The school is accredited by the Board of Regents of the General Conference and offers a basic curriculum.

Marvin Walter was the first principal and Josephine Holmes the first teacher. Sponsored jointly by the Arizona Conference and the Pacific Union Conference, with the Arizona Conference supervising, this school is intended to train Native American students to bring the gospel to their own people.

Holden, William Burroughs

HOLDEN, WILLIAM BURROUGHS (1873—1955). Physician, administrator. Educated at Battle Creek College, the University of Michigan, and Rush Medical College, he received his M.D. degree in 1897. In 1903 he joined the medical staff at the Portland Sanitarium and Hospital, and was medical superintendent of that institution for the greater part of his 52 years' association with it.

Holden, William Henry

HOLDEN, WILLIAM HENRY (1874—1968). Administrator. He was born in New York State and entered the colporteur work following his graduation from Potsdam State Normal College. He began ministerial work in Montana and served as principal of Bozeman Intermediate School for two years. Soon after his marriage to Sadie Marie Rittenhouse in 1906, he was called to be dean of men at Walla Walla College. In 1909 he was elected president of the Vermont Conference and in the succeeding years served as president of the following conferences: Eastern New York, Southern Illinois, Eastern and Western Michigan, Wisconsin, and Lake Union. He served the denomination actively for 45 years.

Holley, Roger

HOLLEY, ROGER (1914—1985). Missionary, evangelist. Born in Michigan, he graduated from Washington Missionary College in 1939. He went immediately to the Far East, where he served briefly in Japan before the outbreak of World War II, then went on to the Netherlands East Indies (Indonesia). He escaped from there on the last ship out in 1941, narrowly missing being sunk by a German U-boat.

Returning to the United States, he served as pastor-evangelist in the Iowa and Carolina conferences from 1942 to 1954. He was married to Joan Bollman in 1944.

In 1954 he joined the Fordyce Detamore evangelistic team in the Texas Conference as campaign manager. In 1958 he entered full-time evangelism, serving in several conferences.

In 1974 he went to the Afro-Mideast Division as evangelist. One eight-week campaign in Kenya resulted in the baptism of 3,000 persons. Returning to the United States in 1977, Holley served as pastor of the Burleson, Texas, church until his retirement in 1979.

Holser, Henry P.

HOLSER, HENRY P. (1856—1901). One of the early church administrators in Europe. He was born in Michigan, and at the age of 18 joined the Seventh-day Adventist Church. In 1882 he entered evangelistic work, serving apprenticeship in Iowa under A. G. Daniells. After three years he was ordained to the ministry and the next year served as secretary-treasurer of the Minnesota Conference. In 1887 he went to Europe (Switzerland), where a year later he became president of the Central European Conference (1888—1899) and was head of the European Mission from 1895 to 1899. During the late 1890s he became ill and spent the winter of 1899 in Egypt, both to improve his health and to establish SDA work in that country. When his health failed to improve, he returned to the United States and died shortly after.

Holt, George W.

HOLT, GEORGE W. (1812—1877). A Millerite minister of Connecticut, then one of the first to embrace the new sanctuary and Sabbath positions. In 1850 he was associated with James White in publishing the Advent Review and traveled considerably in northeastern Canada, New York, and Ohio, and later in Michigan, Illinois, and Wisconsin.

Holy Flesh Heresy

HOLY FLESH HERESY. A teaching that arose in Indiana in 1900 involving the conference president and certain other workers, according to which Christ attained “holy flesh” in Gethsemane like that of Adam before the Fall; likewise, believers, when revived by the Holy Spirit, would never sin again and would never die. Their preaching was accompanied by shouting and falling prostrate (2SM 34). Ellen White spoke vigorously against this movement, which she said was similar to an early fanaticism in one segment of the Adventists at the end of 1844 (ibid. 31—35; General Conference Bulletin [1901], p. 421). The movement soon died down.

Holy Spirit

HOLY SPIRIT. Seventh-day Adventists believe that the Holy Spirit is a personal being, the third member of the Godhead, or Trinity (“Fundamental Beliefs of Seventh-day Adventists,” Church Manual [1990], p. 179). The Holy Spirit was present to seal Christ’s baptism (Matt. 3:16, 17). He is named with the Father and the Son in the Great Commission and baptismal formula (Matt. 28:19; cf. 2 Cor. 13:14), and likewise at Pentecost (Acts 2:33). The relationship between the three persons of the Godhead is clearest in the teachings of Christ (John 14:16, 26; 15:26; 16:13—15). Among the Holy Spirit’s personal characteristics are knowledge (1 Cor. 2:11), will (1 Cor. 12:11), mind (Rom. 8:27), love (Rom. 15:30), communion (2 Cor. 13:14), grief (Eph. 4:30). He can be insulted (Heb. 10:29) and lied to (Acts 5:3, 4).

The Holy Spirit convicts hearts of the heinousness of sin, of the desirability of righteousness, and of the certainty of judgment (John 16:8—11). He convicts, woos, and wins people to Christ. His mission is to guide into all truth, for He is the “Spirit of truth” (John 16:13; 14:26). The Bible was written under His guidance and inspiration (2 Peter 1:20, 21). While on earth, Christ’s personal presence was localized. But by virtue of His very nature, the Holy Spirit can be, and is, everywhere present. The Holy Spirit is Christ’s true vicar, or representative, on earth. He applies to individuals the benefits of the atoning sacrifice of Calvary, making effectual in us that which Jesus did for us. He applies Christ’s mediatorial work to responsive human hearts, regenerating, justifying, sanctifying, and communicating to us the very life of our risen Lord as we await Christ’s second, personal return. He enables Christians to bear “the fruit of the Spirit” in their lives (Gal. 5:22, 23). He selects and fits individuals for service, and qualifies them with power for witnessing (Acts 1:8; 13:2—4; 15:28). He imparts to men and women the various spiritual gifts (1 Cor. 12:7—11).

The Apostles’ and Nicene creeds make a simple affirmation of faith in the Holy Spirit as a member of the Trinity, the latter stating that He “proceedeth from the Father” (Henry Bettenson, Documents of the Christian Church, p. 37). The Arian heresy, on the other hand, denied deity to the Spirit. Athanasius and others affirmed belief that the Spirit was of the same substance as the Father and the Son (E. H. Klotsche, The History of Christian Doctrine [1945], p. 70). The mainstream of Christianity has always accepted the unqualified deity and personality of the Holy Spirit.

More than a century ago, during the formative period of Seventh-day Adventist doctrine, there were differences of opinion on the Holy Spirit and on certain other matters. The pioneer SDAs of those early years were dedicated Christians who had come from many different denominations, and some diversity of opinion was to be expected. It seems that many believed that the Holy Spirit was only a “power” or “influence” and not a person. J. H. Waggoner, for instance, refers to the Holy Spirit as “that awful and mysterious power which proceeds from the throne of the universe” (The Spirit of God: Its Offices and Manifestations, p. 9). Uriah Smith similarly spoke of the Spirit as “a mysterious influence emanating from the Father and the Son, their representative and the medium of their power” (The Biblical Institute [1878], p. 184). During these formative years, emphasis in preaching and in church publications was on the distinctive features of the Advent message, and there was some tendency to take the great fundamental tenets of Christianity for granted. Furthermore, there was no official creed, and on some matters difference of opinion persisted for a number of years. Unity of belief was eventually achieved, not by ecclesiastical fiat, but by cooperative study and the conviction of the Holy Spirit, with the confirmatory witness of the Spirit of Prophecy. By the end of the nineteenth century there was general unanimity of opinion in favor of the view that the Holy Spirit is a personal being, the third member of the Trinity. Ellen White repeatedly refers to the Holy Spirit as “the Third Person of the Godhead” (DA 671) and as “a divine person” (Ev 617).

SDAs believe that the Holy Spirit is a person as verily as the Father and Son are persons of the Godhead (L. E. Froom, The Coming of the Comforter [1928], pp. 41, 42). He is Christ’s true successor on earth (ibid., p. 25). He is “another Comforter” (that is, in addition to Christ; John 14:16, 26; 15:26; 16:7), whom Christ promised to send in His stead, and who came at Pentecost to make redemption through Christ personally efficacious to those who accepted the proffered salvation.

The Holy Spirit is the divine presence, the divine instructor, the divine convictor, the divine comforter, of Christians, individually and as a church, imparting the life of Christ and imbuing the receiver with Christ’s attributes. The Holy Spirit influences; He is not a mere influence, power, or energy. He is not only comforter but also advocate, representative, intercessor, pleader, and consoler. He is not simply a mysterious “divine afflatus” (Uriah Smith, Looking Unto Jesus, p. 10) emanating from the Father, an invisible principle of life, but a divine person—the third person of the Godhead.

Furthermore, SDAs believe that the Holy Spirit is, next to Christ Himself, God’s greatest gift to humanity. His coming as Christ’s successor made provision for the believer’s every need. He convicts, converts, guides, reproves, teaches, watches, witnesses, enables, comforts, helps, illuminates, transforms, sanctifies, intercedes, unifies, and strengthens. He implants grace and reveals and impresses truth. He imparts the very life of Christ and restores the image of God to the soul. He illuminates the mind, fosters spiritual growth, molds the character, energizes the life, activates the conscience, and impels to service.

Some classical Seventh-day Adventist works on the Holy Spirit are: L. E. Froom, The Coming of the Comforter (1928); W. H. Branson, The Holy Spirit (1933); G. B. Thompson, The Ministry of the Spirit (1914); Francis M. Wilcox, The Early and the Latter Rain (1938).

Home and Family Service

HOME AND FAMILY SERVICE. A family service organized in 1975 and functioning as a service organization of the world church, with headquarters in the General Conference. In 1985 its activities were merged with those of several other departments in the new Department of Church Ministries.

Home and Family Service came into existence as a direct result of the increasingly urgent need to build stronger, more stable Seventh-day Adventist homes. Although Seventh-day Adventists have always promoted strong marriages and successful Christian families, the influences of the rapidly deteriorating social conditions in the 1960s and 1970s caused increasing concern among SDAs. It became apparent that new tools, approaches, and methods were needed.

HFS traces its roots back to 1913. Ellen White convinced Arthur Spalding to commit his life to work for families. The Home Commission began its work in 1922 under Spalding's leadership. Books, courses, and study materials were developed, and by 1942 Spalding's efforts had successfully established recognition and acceptance of family life education within the church both in North America and overseas.

During the next three decades, marriage and family life programs were promoted through the Education Department by such leaders as Archa Dart and John Cannon.

In late 1974 a committee was set up under the leadership of W. Duncan Eva to study the current problems of the SDA home and to search for solutions and develop recommendations. Betty Holbrook, a member of the committee, designed a plan called Home and Family Service, which was accepted by the General Conference session in Vienna in 1975.

A few months later Delmer and Betty Holbrook were asked to organize and lead the new effort for SDA marriages and families. The original team of the Holbrooks and their administrative secretary, Wanda Tate, was joined in 1980 by Ronald and Karen Flowers. Delmer Holbrook served as HFS director from 1975 until 1982 and was succeeded by Betty Holbrook as director until 1985, when HFS was merged with Church Ministries.

During its 10-year existence before becoming a part of Church Ministries, HFS produced a variety of instructional manuals and materials that covered a broad spectrum of family life issues. Topics included parenting, marriage preparation, marriage enrichment, singleness, single-parent families, family finance, family worship, sexuality, self-worth, communication, conflict resolution, and temperaments.

A Bible and Spirit of Prophecy base for family life education was developed. Both an understanding of family needs and an awareness of the principles and methods of Adventist Family Life training were widely accepted throughout the world church. The development of several specialized approaches to marriage and family ministry were also fostered by HFS—including Marriage and Family Commitment, developed by John and Millie Youngberg; Seventh-day Adventist Marriage Encounter, founded by Albert and Betty Brendel; and Adventist Marriage Enrichment, established by Edward and Letah Banks.

The Holbrook and Flowers team organized and conducted training seminars for administrators, pastors, and laity in every world division.

Throughout its history the Home and Family Service cosponsored annual training seminars with Andrews University (Family Life Workshop began in 1975) and Loma Linda University (Family Life Workshop West began in 1978). An infrastructure of family life educators and conference, union, and division directors began to develop throughout the world field.

During the short period of 10 years Home and Family Service achieved a remarkable measure of success in reaching the varied cultures of earth with the SDA answers to the worldwide breakdown of family life. The goal of raising the consciousness of the church toward the needs of its families was achieved, and an ongoing program of SDA family life education was set in place.

Home and Health

HOME AND HEALTH (Ka Jung Koa Kun Kang, 1990— ; published bimonthly by Korean Publishing House in Seoul, Korea). The health and culture magazine for believers and nonbelievers in Korea. This 40-page magazine deals with various topics such as eating habits, drugs, drinking, smoking, mental health, geriatric diseases, marriage, and education. It presents God's special messages about health, home life, and education, as given to us through Ellen White.

Eighteen thousand copies of Home and Health were published quarterly from January 1990, changing to bimonthly January 1992. The magazine is in color, and 50,000 copies will be published beginning December 1993. The Home and Health consecutive numbers are no. 1 through no. 20 up to December 1993.

Home and School

HOME AND SCHOOL (1909—1938; 1909—1915 as Christian Education, 1915—1922 as Christian Educator; earlier bimonthly, later monthly, during the school year; RH, for Department of Education complete files: AU, UC). A magazine for teachers and parents, used in connection with the Home and School Association. Its place was filled from 1942 to 1951 by a section in the Church Officer's Gazette, then from 1951 on by the Adventist Home and School. This journal, now discontinued, was superseded by the Home and School Leader.

Editors: Frederick Griggs, 1909; H. R. Salisbury, 1910—1913; J. L. Shaw, 1913—1914; W. E. Howell, 1914—1916; Frederick Griggs, 1916—1918; W. E. Howell, 1918—1930; Flora Williams, 1930—1938.

Home and School Fellowship

HOME AND SCHOOL FELLOWSHIP (formerly Home and School Association). A society formed in the local church and coordinated through the North American Division Department of Education, with the purpose of fostering good home and school relationships. It was first called the Parent-Teacher Association. In 1922 the work was divided: the section that gave special attention to parent education was called the Home Commission, and the section that fostered good home and school relationships was given the name Home and School Association.

The Home Commission was sponsored originally by the Education, Young People's Missionary Volunteer, Home Missionary, Sabbath School, and Medical departments. In 1941 the work of the Home Commission was integrated with the Department of Education, and the term Home and School Association was used for societies with schools and Christian Home Council for societies without schools. In 1956 the name Home and School was chosen to cover both types of organizations.

The society was concerned with the infant, the preschooler and schoolchild, the teenager, the young adult, and the husband and wife.

This association was charged with the promoting and fostering of home and parent education as a regular part of the work of the education departments at the General, union, and local conference levels.

The Home and School Association served elementary and intermediate church schools and day academies, and promoted the enrollment of every Seventh-day Adventist child in one of these schools. It was concerned with pupil motivation, teachers' welfare, parents' interests, financial aid, and with establishing good working relations between the home and the school, between the parent and the teacher.

The founder and mainspring of organized parent education among Seventh-day Adventists was A. W. Spalding, who served the General Conference as full-time secretary of the Home Commission for 19 years (1922—1941). Mrs. Florence Rebok served as Parent and Home Education secretary from 1941 to 1947 (during which time The Adventist Home and Child Guidance were compiled), and Mrs. Arabella Moore Williams from 1947 to 1954; Archa O. Dart served from 1954 to 1970, and W. J. Cannon from 1970 to 1975, when the work was taken over by Home and Family Service.

Home Education

HOME EDUCATION. The need for sound Christian instruction for children and parents has been recognized by this movement since the early days of its history. To supply this need and to coordinate all the church's efforts in this regard, the General Conference requires its Department of Education to sponsor, foster, and encourage the interests of both home and school.

In 1919 (reorganized 1922) the Home Commission of the General Conference was born and continued as constituted until 1941. During this period it was cosponsored by most departments of the General Conference. In 1941 the responsibility fell to the Department of Education. For a time it was represented in the field by two organizations—the Home and School Association and the Christian Home Council. The journal Adventist Home and School was the official organ of communication and covered the needs of both of the aforementioned organizations.

As the needs developed, Adventist Home and School became two journals: the Adventist Home magazine and the Home and School Leader. The former became a subscription magazine filling the needs of the general membership, and the Home and School Leader supplied materials for the monthly meetings of the Home and School Fellowship.

The Home and School Fellowship was originally called the Home and School Association. The Home and School Association was a society formed in the local church, and coordinated through the General Conference Department of Education, with the purpose of fostering good home and school relationships. It was first called the Parent-Teacher Association. In 1922 the work was divided: the section that gave special attention to parent education was called the Home Commission (which became part of the Department of Education in 1941), and the section that fostered good home and school relationships was given the name Home and School Association. In later years the name Home and School Association was changed by action of the Department of Education staff to Home and School Fellowship (see Home and School Fellowship).

At the 1975 General Conference session Home Education became a part of Home and Family Service, with D. W. Holbrook and his wife, Betty, sharing the responsibility.

Currently all available materials for Home Education or the Home and School Association are in the charge of the various divisions' education departments.

Home Help

HOME HELP. A former church member temperance activity for the meeting of alcohol, tobacco, drug, and weight-control problems. Initiated and designed in 1971 by Ernest H. J. Steed, General Conference temperance director, the Home Help visitation plan consisted of using specially prepared films and literature and cassettes in personalized contact within the confines of the home.

Home Help visitors, in representing Seventh-day Adventists and providing a public service, were encouraged to go two by two, then to continue until practical benefits were seen. If desired, a spiritual program could be further provided. Entitled Christ Speaks to Modern Man, it consisted of a Bible study plan, the showing of six films, and the loan of literature.

Home Help was requested via media announcements or from friends. Many made choices through this program to live rewarding lives without alcohol, tobacco, or drugs.

Home of the Redeemed

HOME OF THE REDEEMED. Seventh-day Adventists believe that the redeemed will be transported to heaven—the “Father’s house”—at the Second Advent (John 14:1—3; 1 Thess. 4:13—18; cf. Heb. 11:16), where they will live for a thousand years. At the close of the thousand years the redeemed will return to this earth, which will be renovated after the destruction of sin and sinners (see Hell; Millennium) and become the eternal abode of the redeemed.

SDAs believe that, in a large part, conditions in the new earth will be as they would have been on earth had sin never entered. They therefore look forward to living on this planet with resurrected glorified bodies resembling the ones that Adam and Eve possessed before they sinned, and to carrying on pursuits such as humanity would have engaged in had sin not entered. They apply to this future restoration the passage “And thou, O tower of the flock, the strong hold of the daughter of Zion, unto thee shall it come, even the first dominion” (Micah 4:8). They also apply literally the passage “Behold, I create new heavens and a new earth. . . . And they shall build houses, and inhabit them; and they shall plant vineyards, and eat the fruit of them” (Isa. 65:17—21). To them the future life is not some spirit existence in an ethereal heaven.

Furthermore, because SDAs do not believe in a conscious existence between death and the resurrection, they do not believe that the redeemed go to heaven at death. They maintain that the “spirit” that goes back to God at death (Eccl. 12:7) is not conscious, but represents the personal identity, which is preserved until the resurrection so that in the resurrection every individual will have his or her own character (see SDACom 5:1093). They believe also that resurrected bodies will bear resemblances to the former bodies, so that friend will recognize friend.

The capital of that new earth will be the New Jerusalem, which, after the millennium, descends from heaven and is established upon this earth (Rev. 21:1, 2, 10; Heb. 11:10, 14—16). This city is described in detail in Rev. 21 and 22. The presence of the city signifies the presence of God, for after John saw the Holy City descending he “heard a great voice out of heaven saying, Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them, and be their God” (Rev. 21:3).

Among conditions that will not exist, John mentions the following: “There shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain: for the former things are passed away” (v. 4).

As a warning against spiritualizing the scriptural statements regarding the future life, Ellen G. White has remarked: “A fear of making the future inheritance seem too material has led many to spiritualize away the very truths which lead us to look upon it as our home” (GC 674, 675).

Far from being a state of idleness, the future life will be one of creative activity. “Every faculty will be developed, every capacity increased. The acquirement of knowledge will not weary the mind or exhaust the energies. There the grandest enterprises may be carried forward, the loftiest aspirations reached, the highest ambitions realized and still there will arise new heights to surmount, new wonders to admire, new truths to comprehend, fresh objects to call forth powers of mind and soul and body” (ibid. 677).

Despite what has been recorded in the Scriptures of the glories of that future abode, Seventh-day Adventists believe that not all has been revealed. “Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him” (1 Cor. 2:9).

They anticipate that the glories of that world will far exceed their fondest expectations, and they find in a contemplation of future glories a strong motivation for Christian dedication.

Home Study International/Griggs University

HOME STUDY INTERNATIONAL/GRIGGS UNIVERSITY. A correspondence school organized in 1909 that offers preschool, elementary, secondary, college, and adult education. Home Study International (HSI) has the following objectives: 1. Complete and improved elementary courses for the child who cannot study in a regular schoolroom situation. Preschool courses are guided by parents. 2. Constantly revised and updated secondary courses to aid the student who is temporarily out of school, needs extra credit, or for some other legitimate reason needs to study by correspondence; to aid the secondary school administration in resolving scheduling conflicts; to use in extension classes when no certified teacher is available; and to provide new courses, which some schools may be unable to provide because of lack of finances or instructors. 3. New courses as well as constantly revised college-level courses to aid the college student with scheduling or other difficulties; to provide acceptable credits for college students temporarily out of school; to aid adults and others who wish to work toward graduation but cannot do full-time resident study; to provide courses for the specialized needs of small groups of college students when classes do not fill or no qualified teacher is available. 4. A variety of professional educational courses for classroom teachers who need to meet certification requirements. 5. Correspondence courses for foreign mission appointees. 6. Adult education-type noncredit courses for the lay members of the church. These courses include classes in biblical studies and courses for general cultural improvement and recreational pursuits. 7. Extension classes to be conducted in the churches, supervised by pastors or qualified laity. 8. Specialized courses designed for in-service training or as self-improvement studies for all church employees. 9. Development of foreign branches of HSI to provide all the above services to the church overseas. 10. Through the Collegiate Division, Griggs University offers college degree programs in religion that provide training opportunities to church workers unable to attend a college campus. 11. Reliable, high-quality coursework for all educational levels. Courses are open to anyone who can reasonably profit from correspondence study, regardless of church affiliation or nationality.

In 1962 HSI became a member of the National University Continuing Education Association. Among the 193 members of this organization, HSI occupies a unique position. It is the only accredited correspondence school offering courses on the elementary level as well as secondary, college, and adult education.

The National Home Study Council, the only government-recognized organization for correspondence schools, accredited HSI on Dec. 1, 1967. HSI is also a member of the International University Consortium and the Association of College Registrars and Admissions Officers.

Organized in 1909, Home Study International was first known simply as the Correspondence School and was founded by Prof. Frederick Griggs, one of the early educational leaders of the Seventh-day Adventist Church. He attended a convention in Atlanta, Georgia, early in 1909, where he heard President Charles Van Hise, of the University of Wisconsin, describe the fast-developing correspondence school concept in that state. Launched on July 18, 1909, the school had as its first president W. E. Howell, who served in that capacity until C. C. Lewis succeeded him; the latter was principal for 10 years. During this time the name was changed to Fireside Correspondence School. In 1931 the school was incorporated by the District of Columbia under the name Home Study Institute. It became Home Study International in the mid-1980s.

In the early days of the school, the central office occupied one room in the General Conference building. In 1920 the office was transferred to Columbia Hall at Washington Missionary College (now Columbia Union College); it was later returned to the General Conference building and in 1942 given space in the Seventh-day Adventist Theological Seminary building. Three years later the school was assigned a two-story residence on Carroll Avenue, across the street from the Review and Herald Publishing Association. When this space proved inadequate, a new three-story air-conditioned building was erected on the same lot; an addition to this building, which doubled its work space, was completed in 1972. It now occupies space in the new General Conference headquarters.

By Oct. 4, 1909, 62 students had registered. Today Home Study International is teaching thousands of students worldwide.

In 1990 Home Study International expanded its contribution to the global mission of the Seventh-day Adventist Church by founding a new degree-granting division—Griggs University. Named in honor of Frederick Griggs, the university offers religion degree programs at both the Associate of Arts and Bachelor of Arts levels.

Until 1924, financial matters had been handled under the general control of the treasurer of the General Conference. Schoolwork was under the guidance of the Department of Education through a board appointed by the General Conference Committee. Beginning Jan. 1, 1924, this division of responsibility was discontinued, and a new board took control. The principal, now known as the president, was given full authority, both as literary head and business manager, with a separate bank account for the school.

As early as 1918 the principal reported students in nearly every state and province of the United States and Canada, besides a few students in India, China, Japan, Korea, Java, the Philippines, Fiji, Australia, Brazil, and Chile. In 1919 the General Conference Committee empowered the board of the Fireside Correspondence School to establish a branch upon request in any division or union conference outside North America.

There are presently five active branches, located in Africa, Australia, England, Singapore, and South Africa.

Confidence in the work and credits of the school have been strengthened by a resolute program of improving instruction and maintaining satisfactory relationships with Seventh-day Adventist resident schools and colleges. HSI does not attempt to compete, but only to act as the extension arm of these schools in the ways stated at the beginning of this article.

One of the most popular programs of the school is its kindergarten course, which is designed to be taught by mothers, with supervision from the resident teachers at HSI.

Home Study International is currently assisting Columbia Union College's external degree program by providing student services. The program allows persons who cannot become residents at a college to enroll for individually prepared curriculums leading to a bachelor's degree. No residence is required.

In its determination to offer the most effective instruction, Home Study International is constantly revising syllabuses and updating its textbooks.

Hommel, Frank Lewis

HOMMEL, FRANK LEWIS (1875—1964). Founder of Seventh-day Adventist medical work in western Canada. He was born at Rochester, New York. In 1896, when about 21 years old, he became a Seventh-day Adventist. Afterward he attended South Lancaster Academy, studied nursing at Battle Creek Sanitarium (1898—1899), and engaged in medical missionary work in Chicago part of the time. In 1900 he was a member of a city mission in New York City, and from 1902 to 1903 was in charge of men's treatment rooms at Battle Creek Sanitarium. In 1903 a classmate invited him to visit Alberta. There he saw an opportunity for providing hydrotherapy treatments, and engaged in self-supporting medical missionary work for the next six years. While in Alberta he married Larena Belle Carpenter, the second church school teacher in the province. In 1909 the Alberta Conference made plans to establish a sanitarium at Lacombe. As secretary-treasurer of the conference, Hommel solicited funds with which to buy land and erect the building.

But difficulties developed, and the project at Lacombe was abandoned in favor of treatment rooms in Calgary. He then went to Calgary to open the establishment there (1911). From there he went to Washington, D.C., where he served as house manager at the Washington Sanitarium for about a year (1912—1913), then returned to Alberta as treasurer, teacher, and dean of boys at Alberta Industrial Academy and auditor of Western Canadian Union Conference. From 1918 to 1921 he was manager of the Alberta (later, Bethel) Sanitarium and in 1921 became the first manager of the Rest Haven Sanitarium in British Columbia. Ill health forced his retirement in November 1924.

Hon, Eric

HON, ERIC (1908—1980). Health educator. Of Australian-Chinese origin, he left his family business at 31 years of age to work for the Chinese community in Sydney. Thereafter, he began the first Community Services center, the first Seventh-day Adventist adoption agency, and the first cooking and nutrition schools and clinics attached to local churches. He ultimately became the first health director of the Trans-Tasman Union Conference, in 1963. In the late 1970s he led the Metro Ministry program in Greater New York. This was followed by several years of service at Weimar College, where he prepared students for medical missionary work.

Honam Academy

HONAM ACADEMY (Honam Sahmyook Joongkodeung Hakkyo). A coeducational boarding school on the junior and senior high school levels, operated by the Southwest Korean Conference at a campus outside the city of Kwangju. In 1993 it had an enrollment of 464 and a teaching staff of 26. Five percent of the students are non-Seventh-day Adventists.

The academy takes its name from the Honam Mission, which was formed in 1952 when the territory of the former South Korean Mission was divided into the Southeast Korean and Southwest Korean missions (in Korea, the Yungnam and Honam missions). After the Korean War, a church in Kwangju was established and became the headquarters of the Honam Mission. The members of that area opened church schools and in 1952 requested an academy.

Plans for building the institutions of the Korean Union Mission after the Korean War included the addition of three new academies, one to be in Honam Mission territory. Classes began in 1953. A tract of about seven acres (three hectares) of land was acquired outside the city in 1955, United States Army tents were purchased, and the school was moved to the new site in Sansoo-dong. A variety of fruit trees were planted. Industrial training included fruit farming, gardening, poultry raising, and dairying. The high quality of work done has been recognized by the government educational department. In 1958 the school received senior high school accreditation from the government and the Far Eastern Division. In 1969 new land was purchased, and in 1970 the school was moved to Chuwoel-dong. A new school building was completed, and in 1988 a new dormitory building was erected on the campus as a memorial of the eightieth anniversary of the gospel proclamation in Korea.

Honduras

HONDURAS. A Latin American republic situated in the heart of Central America, bounded on the west by Guatemala, El Salvador, and the Pacific Ocean, on the north by the Caribbean Sea, and on the east and the south by Nicaragua. It has an area of 43,277 square miles (112,000 square kilometers) and a population (1994) of 5.3 million. Honduras gained its independence from Spain in 1821 and from 1838 has maintained a republican form of government. Roman Catholicism is the predominant religion, but the constitution guarantees freedom of worship. The climate ranges from moderate in the highlands to wet tropical in the jungles in the lowlands. The official language is Spanish; however, there are a few tribes that speak their own dialects, and the people of the Bay Islands, ceded to Honduras by Great Britain in 1861, speak English.

In July 1988 the Honduras Mission territory was divided in two, giving birth to the Bay Islands Mission. The mainland mission is now known as the Seventh-day Adventist Mission of Continental Honduras.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. Seventh-day Adventist teachings first penetrated Honduras when Mrs. E. Gauterau, who had joined the Seventh-day Adventist Church while in California, returned to her home in the Bay Islands of Honduras, bringing with her many SDA publications, which she shared with her neighbors. In 1887 T. H. Gibbs, a minister from New Orleans, made an exploratory visit to the Bay Islands and distributed more tracts and books. Some of the people who became interested carried on correspondence with the International Tract Society for a number of years. By the time L. C. Chadwick, president of the International Tract Society, visited Bay Islands in 1891, about 20 persons were ready for baptism.

In that same year the first resident minister, Frank J. Hutchins, arrived and established his headquarters on the island of Roatan. In 1892 baptisms were held and a Sabbath school was organized on the island of Bonacca (Guanaja). In that same year a baptism and a “general meeting” of all the believers was held on Roatan. In 1893 one of the first church buildings owned by SDAs in Central America was acquired on Guanaja through buying out the minority shareholders of what was first intended to be a union church. The membership of the church at that time was 25, and about 60 people attended the Sabbath school. The building still stands, and with the additions that the growth in membership has required, it is the largest Seventh-day Adventist church building in the Honduras Mission.

Toward the close of the same year, C. L. Emmerson joined Hutchins in the work on the islands. With the arrival of W. A. Miller a mission school was opened on July 4 on Bonacca. By the end of the year, there were three companies of SDAs in the Bay Islands, with total membership of more than 100. Plans were made to build a 50-foot (15-meter) mission schooner, and funds were contributed by the Sabbath schools for this purpose. In 1897 the boat was commissioned and named Herald. It was used for conducting missionary work not only in the Bay Islands but also in Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Panama, and even Colombia.

Organization and Growth. In the beginning of the mission work in this Caribbean area the republic of Honduras, with its Bay Islands, and British Honduras were considered a single mission field, which was referred to as the Central American Mission, and their statistics were reported together. In 1905 the combined membership, most of it in the Bay Islands, was 160, organized in five churches and five companies. In 1906 the field was included in the West Indian Union Conference. In 1908 its area was extended to include Guatemala and El Salvador, and the whole was organized as the Central American Conference, with a membership of 333. In 1913 the Central American Conference was reduced to the size of the original mission, and the next year it, along with some other areas in the Caribbean, was transferred to the General Conference as a detached mission, the whole group being named the Northern Spanish American Missions. In 1918 Honduras and British Honduras were organized as the Honduras Mission, with a membership of 267. In 1922 the Honduras Mission, with a membership of 300 in 13 churches, was included in the newly formed Inter-American Division as a part of the Central American Mission. Then in 1923 it was attached to the Aztec Union Mission, but in 1926 was joined with the Central American Union Mission. This structure of organization was maintained until January 1930, when the work on the mainland of Honduras was placed in a separate mission. In 1937 the mission assumed its present territorial boundaries. By the end of that year there were 15 churches, with 624 members.

Recent Developments. In recent years the church has undertaken religious radiobroadcasts and has established a Bible correspondence school. For the Cariban tribe, 50,000 of whom live along the seacoast, Steps to Christ has been translated.

Primary schools have been established in Santa Barbara, Choluteca, and on Roatan. The Santa Barbara school has been used as a means of evangelistic outreach. The modern, well-equipped school on Roatan was donated by Kern Hyde and his father, Captain Merl Hyde. These laypersons dedicated the profits from one of their fishing boats to the $17,000 project. A hospital was begun in Valley of the Angels, 17 miles (30 kilometers) from the capital city, during the administration of Robert Folkenberg.

In 1992 George Grieve, with his Yesterday, Today, and Tomorrow team, held a nationwide crusade in which 1,150 souls were baptized. The local workers continued their efforts after the team departed and launched other crusades, baptizing approximately 1,350 souls.

Eight additional churches were organized in formerly unreached territories of mainland Honduras.

Hong Kong

HONG KONG. A crown colony of the United Kingdom, situated on the southern coast of China, and consisting of the island of Hong Kong and the tip of the Kowloon Peninsula, which were ceded to the United Kingdom in 1841 and 1860, respectively, and the rest of the peninsula, leased from China in 1899. With the joint declaration between the Sino-British governments, the colony will be returned to China on July 1, 1997, but will be allowed to keep its capitalist system for another 50 years. The total area of the colony is 413 square miles (1,100 square kilometers), most of which is uninhabitable rock, but its population (1992) was estimated at 5.8 million people, overwhelmingly Chinese. Both the Chinese and English languages are used in the colony. Hong Kong is an important commercial and industrial center in the Far East. Many mission societies have churches, schools, and charitable organizations in Hong Kong.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. Seventh-day Adventist work in eastern Asia began at Hong Kong with the arrival in 1888 of Abram La Rue from the United States. He opened a mission for the sailors of the many ships that came to Hong Kong. His home also served as a distribution center for SDA publications in several languages. La Rue never learned the Chinese language, but he became acquainted with, and developed the friendship of, a Chinese translator at the colonial court, who translated for La Rue into Chinese a tract called The Judgment and the chapter from Ellen G. White's Steps to Christ entitled "The Sinner's Need of Christ"—the first Seventh-day Adventist publications in Chinese. La Rue worked alone until the arrival in Hong Kong in 1902 of the first SDA mission appointees to China, J. N. Anderson and his family and Ida Thompson. La Rue died in 1903, leaving most of his life savings to benefit the China Mission. The first baptism in Hong Kong occurred on Mar. 1, 1902, when Anderson baptized seven of La Rue's English converts.

In 1916 Hong Kong became the site for the Seventh-day Adventist headquarters in South China, but in 1920 there were in the colony, in addition to the three families of union mission workers (F. H. De Vinney, B. R. Owen, and R. M. Milne), only two members—a Chinese woman and a colporteur. In 1927 property was purchased on Stubbs Road, and a two-story headquarters building, consisting of four apartments, was erected and named La Rue Villa in honor of Abram La Rue, Hong Kong's first Seventh-day Adventist missionary.

Later Developments. In 1937 a church school was opened by the Mongkok church, and land was bought at Clearwater Bay on the mainland for the South China Training Institute, which at the time operated at Canton, China. The campus was ready in 1939, and in the same year the Pioneer Memorial church was built and became the headquarters church for work in the area. In connection with it a church school was opened, largely for the benefit of refugees. For several years World War II interrupted the development of the SDA work, but after the war it was resumed with new vigor. Evangelism spread throughout the territory, the Voice of Prophecy Bible Correspondence School was begun, and work was started at Yuen Long in 1948. In 1949 the China Division office and many of its staff were transferred to Hong Kong as well as the collegiate classes of the China Training Institute. By 1954 there were 10 churches in the Hong Kong-Macao area. By the end of 1958 there were about 1,600 members in Hong Kong. By September 1959 the combined enrollment of five schools reached 1,700 pupils. Fifteen years later, in 1974, the combined enrollment reached 2,900. By December of 1992 there were 3,724 members, and the combined enrollment of students was 3,126 from the college. In addition there were four secondary schools, four church schools, and two kindergartens. Most of the students come from non-SDA homes.

Funds were solicited to build a hospital at Tsuen Wan, and the building was opened May 22, 1964. Seven years later another hospital at Stubbs Road was opened. In 1992 there were 16 church buildings in Hong Kong.

Hong Kong Adventist College

HONG KONG ADVENTIST COLLEGE. A coeducational boarding school on the senior college level operated by the South China Island Union Mission on a 40-acre (16-hectare) site not far from Kowloon City, Hong Kong. In 1993 it had an enrollment of 197 (secondary and college students) and a staff of 40.

Hong Kong Adventist College developed from the first Seventh-day Adventist school taught in the Chinese language. In 1903, near the close of the Ching dynasty, Ida Thompson, one of the first SDA missionaries in China, opened in Canton what came to be known as the Bethel School for Girls, and a few months later E. H. Wilbur established a school for boys. Both were taught in Chinese on the elementary level, and both were situated immediately outside the South Gate of old Canton. The boys' school was closed for a time, but in 1915 A. L. Ham reopened it under the name of Sam Yuk School (Threefold Education School), with 12 students. By 1914 the Bethel Girls' School had been relocated in Tungshan, a suburb of Canton; in 1917 the boys' school also moved.

In 1920 Ida Thompson, who had been absent for a time, returned and resumed her position as principal of the Bethel School. By 1922, when coeducation had become accepted in China, the two schools merged as an intermediate school called the Sam Yuk Middle School (listed in Yearbooks as Cantonese Intermediate School; later as Canton Middle School). It served the Kwangtung, Hakka, and Kwangsi missions.

Instead of dividing the six-year secondary course into three years of junior and three of senior high school, the Sam Yuk Middle School divided the course into four years and two years, to give students who stopped at the junior high school level a more adequate education. The last two secondary grades offered training in various fields to meet the student's individual interest or talent as well as the denomination's need. Graduates were thus prepared for either higher education or employment. Later, farms, factories, and science laboratories were added, preparatory schools were established, and ministerial, business, and home economics courses were set up. In 1935 the institution, then called the Canton Training Institute, came under the direct supervision of the South China Union Mission, which aimed to raise the school to a higher educational level and enlarge its services.

When the Canton Sanitarium and Hospital was built on the school grounds, overcrowding resulted, and it was decided to find a more suitable place for the school that would allow for development. In 1937 about 40 acres (15 hectares) were purchased, and construction began on a completely new campus in the Clear Water Bay area, about seven miles (10 kilometers) from the central business districts of Hong Kong.

The new campus had not been completed when the Sino-Japanese War reached Canton, making an immediate move necessary. This move marked the beginning of a decade of uncertainty and constant moving. For two years the school occupied a large rented mansion in Sha Tin, Kowloon. Then in September 1939 the school, renamed the South China Training Institute, was able to operate at its new home at Clearwater Bay. But two years later, when war came to Hong Kong, the school was again moved, this time to a place called Lao Lung, in the interior of Kwangtung province. After World War II lack of transportation kept the school in the interior until the summer of 1946; then, because of the damage done to the campus at Clearwater Bay, the institution returned for a year to its former crowded site in Tungshan, in Canton. Finally, in 1947 the school returned to its home in Clearwater Bay, where it has since remained.

The school continued to grow, and a new curriculum was set up at the beginning of the 1958—1959 school year, the faculty was enlarged, and facilities added. In 1962, when a complete collegiate curriculum was introduced, the name of the school was changed to South China Union College.

In 1970 the constituents of South China Island Union Mission decided to combine South China Union College and Taiwan Missionary College in Taiwan to form one college under one administration, with the name South China Adventist College for both campuses. For legal and other reasons, even though these two campuses continued to be under one administration, in 1973 the name of the college was changed back to South China Union College for the Hong Kong campus, while the Taiwan campus was renamed Taiwan Adventist College.

In 1981 the constituency of the South China Island Union Mission separated the secondary and college sections and adopted the name of Hong Kong Adventist College. The college was subsequently registered and approved by the Education Department of Hong Kong as a postsecondary institution.

In 1982 the college established an affiliation with Loma Linda University, which enables students on the Hong Kong campus to receive B.A. degrees in religion or theology granted by Loma Linda University. In the same year, the college received full accreditation from the Board of Regents of the General Conference of Seventh-day Adventists.

In 1991 the affiliation agreement was transferred from Loma Linda University to La Sierra University.

During the 90 years of the school's existence thousands of young people have enrolled in its classes. Through the years students from this school have held key positions in denominational work.

Hong Kong Sam Yuk Secondary School

HONG KONG SAM YUK SECONDARY SCHOOL. A coeducational day school in Hong Kong operated on the senior high school level in English (with an elementary school conducted in Chinese), under the direction of the Hong Kong-Macao Conference. The students, most of them Chinese, are 15 percent Seventh-day Adventist. The school is registered with the Education Department of Hong Kong, and its graduates, before leaving school, take the Certificate of Education Examination conducted by the local government.

The secondary school originated in 1948, three years after the close of World War II, when SDAs in Hong Kong were less numerous than now. It began as a church school conducted in the Chinese language, with only nine pupils, under the direction of Warren Hilliard and T. M. Chu, pastors of the Pioneer Memorial church. The school was first known as the Pioneer Memorial Church School, in memory of Abram La Rue, a self-supporting colporteur-Bible worker, who landed on the island of Hong Kong in 1888.

In September 1949, when the mission committee authorized the organization of a mission school, the name was changed to Sam Yuk Primary School. (In Chinese, Sam Yuk refers to the threefold education of head, heart, and hand.) Harry H. Morse, then union mission treasurer, was appointed supervisor and Alice Morse principal. In September 1950 Samuel Young was appointed head teacher. Before long the enrollment increased to 300, with a faculty of 11. In 1953 D. W. Curry was appointed supervisor.

In 1955, when a new classroom building was completed, classwork was extended to the ninth grade. The enrollment increased to 450. In 1957 the school system was changed to Anglo-Chinese. In 1960 a second classroom building, Morse Hall, was completed. The 1961 Yearbook lists it as the Sam Yuk Middle School, Happy Valley Branch.

In 1963 the name of the school was changed to Hong Kong Sam Yuk Secondary School. The school is tuition-supported.

Principals: Alice Morse, 1949—1953; D. W. Curry, 1953—1959; Mrs. R. M. Milne, 1959—1961; Handel Luke, 1961—1966; C. H. Tang, 1966—1980; Handel Luke, 1980—1989; Anna Lee, 1989—1992; Joseph Heun Bing Kuen, 1992— .

Hongkong Adventist Hospital

HONGKONG ADVENTIST HOSPITAL. A 150-bed hospital located on Stubbs Road in Hong Kong. In 1959 the Far Eastern Division asked Dr. Harry W. Miller to come to Hong Kong to establish medical work.

Dr. Miller was accompanied by veteran China missionaries Ezra L. Longway and Robert M. Milne, who raised funds through public solicitation.

The health-care work in Hong Kong comprises two general hospitals located 14 miles apart, originally under one administration. The first hospital, now renamed Tsuen Wan Adventist Hospital, opened May 22, 1964, in Tsuen Wan, a satellite town in Kowloon, Hong Kong.

In 1970 fund-raising was begun to build a second hospital at 40 Stubbs Road in the midlevels of Hong Kong island. The property was acquired in 1927 and was used first as church headquarters, then later as staff housing. Dr. Chan Shun, former chair and managing director of Crocodile Garments Limited, gave the first $1 million to the project. Many companies and individuals have contributed and are still contributing to the growth and development of the hospital.

On May 4, 1971, the Hongkong Adventist Hospital was declared open by Dr. Gerald Choa, director of health services, and Mrs. Chan Shun. In 1984 the two hospitals became separate organizations.

The Hongkong Adventist Hospital, referred to locally as “The Adventist,” is a modern circular-shaped eight-story steel and concrete building with central air-conditioning. Its unique design helps provide quick and efficient service to all of its patients, and fits in with the hospital’s standard of high quality health care.

In March of 1985 the Heart Center was opened, and the open-heart surgery and catheterization lab services began operation. In addition to a broad range of general services in the outpatient and specialty clinics, this 110-bed hospital also offers neurosurgery, a full rehab program (including sports medicine), as well as dental and dental laboratory facilities. The Diagnostic Imaging Department has been progressively upgraded to include CT scanning, nuclear medicine, and magnetic resonance imaging. The Heart Center and the health promotion/wellness programs are what the hospital is best known for in Hong Kong. There is also a clinic at the Baguio Villa Estates in Pokfulam, on the western side of the island.

A 12-story staff apartment building adjacent to the hospital also houses an eight-grade elementary school for children of the hospital staff, as well as the local offices of the South China Island Union Mission.

Administrators: R. W. Burchard, 1970—1979; D. L. Dunfield, 1979—1983; Mervyn Leicester, 1983—1984; James McAlvin, 1984—1985; Virgil P. Morris, 1985—1988; Henry P. Friesen, 1988— .

He was educated at the University of Nebraska and taught there and at other schools for several years before accepting the Seventh-day Adventist faith in 1882. He began work for the church as an evangelist, was ordained in 1885, and was elected president of the Nebraska Conference in 1889. Shortly afterward he taught Bible at Union College, and later served as secretary of the General Conference for four years (1897—1901). He was president of Union College from 1901 to 1904, and for some time served as coeditor of the Christian Record (a braille magazine) before going to Australia, where he served in educational work for nearly nine years. Returning to the United States, he was Bible teacher at Graysville Academy and then principal of Oak Park Academy from 1916 to 1919. From 1920 until his death he was chaplain at the Hinsdale Sanitarium.

Hope of Israel [1]

HOPE OF ISRAEL [1] (1844—1845[?]; weekly; Portland, Maine). An Adventist paper published by John Pearson, Jr., at first with Joseph Turner, later alone. It was not a Sabbatarian journal, but in it was published T. M. Preble's discussion of the Sabbath in February 1845 (later reprinted as a tract), the first printed advocacy of the seventh day among Adventists. It was this article that convinced Joseph Bates that he ought to observe the seventh day. In June 1845 Pearson, then the sole editor, announced that he could not bring it out weekly, but would issue it irregularly, whenever possible. At least one more number was issued two or three months later, printed this time at Boston, announcing Pearson's abandonment of the view that the parable of the Bridegroom had been fulfilled in the Millerite movement, and his return to the Advent Herald party, the majority group of Adventists.

Hope of Israel [2]

HOPE OF ISRAEL [2] (1863—1865, 1866—19?). A paper first published in Michigan by a disaffected group of Seventh-day Adventists led by Samuel Davidson and Gilbert Cranmer (Enos Easton, editor). It was revived at Marion, Iowa, in 1866 by another dissident movement led by B. F. Snook and W. H. Brinkerhoff (see Marion Party) that was later organized as the Church of God (Adventist). After several changes of name the journal was still published in 1936 as the Bible Advocate and Herald of the Coming Kingdom.

Hope Within the Veil

HOPE WITHIN THE VEIL (1845; weekly; Portland, Maine). An Adventist (not Sabbatarian) journal begun about June 1, 1845 (the second number was issued June 23), by C. H. Pearson (brother of John Pearson, Jr., editor of the Hope of Israel) and Emily C. Clemons. Late in August the first issue of the second volume was stopped in midprinting because the editor and publisher (and also the chief printer, W. H. Hyde) abandoned their belief that the parable of the Bridegroom had any application to the 1844 experience; they reverted to the majority view of the Advent Herald party. In that unfinished issue was O.R.L. Crosier's second article on the sanctuary doctrine (Day-Star 7:50, Oct. 11, 1845)-either the article that was printed in the Day-Star as an Extra in February 1846, or a shorter draft of this article preceding its final form.

Hopeaniemi Sanitarium

HOPEANIEMI SANITARIUM. A 105-bed medical institution operated by the Finland Union Conference 30 miles (50 kilometers) from Helsinki, Finland.

The Hopeaniemi Sanitarium was opened for the first time in 1943 as the first year-round Seventh-day Adventist-owned sanitarium in Finland. The beautiful property was purchased by the Finland Swedish Conference, and work commenced with extremely limited resources under the direction of Dr. V. Sucksdorff, Jr. Through additions and rebuilding, the sanitarium capacity increased from 15 to 40 patients by 1957.

Facilities and property continued to expand. Innovative methods of treatment, particularly in the fields of hydrotherapy and dietetics, were presented. In 1973 plans were made for a grand-scale updating of the whole institution. In 1975 the Finland Union Conference purchased the sanitarium from the Finland Swedish Conference, and since that time it has been operated by the Finland Union Conference. After much effort and financial sacrifice on the part of church members, a new and modern complex began operation in 1979 under the management of Reijo Olin, business manager. It was called by the present name. The 105-bed capacity was achieved with the completion of a new wing extension in 1984.

This new institution now offers one of the most versatile hydrotherapy and rehabilitation programs in Finland. Apart from the fully equipped Physiotherapy Department, facilities include a swimming pool, exercise pool, gymnasium, training therapy center, hobbies and crafts room, cooking instruction kitchen, medical laboratory, and auditorium.

The natural forest setting on the edge of a lake creates an ideal relaxing environment with opportunities for a variety of outdoor activities, including hiking, swimming, rowing, tennis, and cross-country skiing in winter.

For a number of years Hopeaniemi has trained rehabilitation assistants in its independent government-approved school. Of the more than 455 graduates at Hopeaniemi, many have continued serving the institution, and some have opened private clinics in different parts of the country.

Medical Directors: V. Sucksdorff, Jr., M.D., 1943—1963; M. Miettinen, 1964—1971; P. O. Pylkkanen, M.D., 1972—.

Horn, Siegfried H.

HORN, SIEGFRIED H. (1908—1993). Archaeologist. A native of Germany, Horn received his college training in Germany, England (where he studied under Lynn H. Wood), and Walla Walla College. He then served as a minister in Holland (1930—1932), and as a missionary in Java and Sumatra (1932—1940). During World War II he was interned in Sumatra and India for six and a half years, during which he studied ancient languages, as well as biblical, historical, and archaeological subjects in which he was especially interested. After the war he took up graduate studies at the SDA Theological Seminary under Wood, and at Johns Hopkins University under W. F. Albright. Transferring to the University of Chicago, he was granted a Ph.D. degree in Egyptology in March 1951, with a dissertation entitled “Relations Between Egypt and Asia During the Egyptian Middle Kingdom.” In that year he became chair of the Department of Archaeology and History of Antiquity in the SDA Theological Seminary, and continued to serve as professor of archaeology until retirement. Horn also taught courses in archaeology in seminary extension schools in Mexico, France, the Philippines, Germany, Japan, Australia, and Austria, repeatedly spending periods of study in the Near East; conducted three guided tours for ministers and Bible teachers through the Bible lands (1957, 1959, and 1966); and in 1960 became a staff member of the Drew-McCormick archaeological expedition, which, under the direction of G. Ernest Wright, of Harvard University, excavated biblical Shechem in Jordan. Horn served as a supervisor on the expedition during the three seasons (1960, 1962, 1964), and prepared some of the Shechem material for publication. One fruit of this work was the publication, in the Journal of Near Eastern Studies, January 1962, January 1966, and July 1973, of all scarabs found at the Shechem up to 1968.

After he became a teacher at the seminary, Horn wrote numerous articles on the popular level for various SDA periodicals, authored three books on the same level—Light From the Dustheaps (1955), which also appeared in German, Italian, and Korean translations; The Spade Confirms the Book (1957), which was also published in separate German editions in West and East Germany; and Records of the Past Illuminate the Bible (1963). He also wrote numerous archaeological and historical articles for The SDA Bible Commentary, and was the principal author (furnishing nearly three fourths of all articles) of the SDA Bible Dictionary (1960). With Wood he coauthored The Chronology of Ezra 7, and an article on the fifth century B.C. calendar of the Jews at Elephantine, which appeared in the Journal of Near Eastern Studies (January 1954). He also wrote papers for various other journals. From 1962 to 1974 he served as editor of the Andrews University Seminary Studies, the first volume of which appeared in 1963. Beginning with the summer of 1968, Andrews University has sponsored an archaeological expedition to biblical Heshbon in Jordan. The first three seasons of excavations (1968, 1971, 1973), which were supported also by the American Center for Oriental Research in Amman and by Calvin Theological Seminary in Grand Rapids, Michigan, were directed by Horn. These, along with a season in 1974, provided opportunities for practical training in field archaeology to Bible teachers, ministers, and ministerial students interested in biblical archaeology. He also made a tremendous contribution to a large number of students and colleagues at the SDA Theological Seminary and a number of extension schools, as well as at the archaeological digs. More than a few of these have been quite active in professional archaeology through their publications and fieldwork. In 1978 Andrews University's archaeological museum was renamed the Horn Archaeology Museum in his honor.

In 1891 he entered its ministry, preaching throughout the Eastern states before becoming the first president of the Louisiana Conference in 1901. He was religious liberty secretary for the Southern Union (1908—1910), Atlantic Union (1911), Columbia Union (1914—1915), Lake Union (1920—1924), and West Michigan Conference (1913, 1916—1919). Howell, Warren Eugene

HOWELL, WARREN EUGENE (1869—1943). Educator, missionary. He was baptized in 1884 and received his B.A. from Battle Creek College in 1894 and an honorary M.A. from Emmanuel Missionary College in 1919. He was a student of history, Greek, and biblical interpretation, and author of Gospel Key Words and a Grammar Manual. He taught at Healdsburg College (1894—1897) and for four years was principal of Palama Chinese School in Honolulu. Then he taught at Emmanuel Missionary College until 1903, and one year at Healdsburg College, where he was president for two years.

He became the first president of the Loma Linda College of Evangelists, but after one year he was sent, in 1907, as a Seventh-day Adventist missionary to Greece. Returning in 1909, he served as principal of the Fireside Correspondence School (now Home Study International) for four years, then for four years was assistant secretary and then secretary for 12 years in the General Conference Department of Education, during which time he traveled widely in America and abroad. He was an associate editor (1909—1914) and editor (1914—1916 and 1918—1930) of Christian Education, whose name was changed to Christian Educator in 1915 and Home and School in 1922, in which he emphasized the SDA principles of education as advocated by Ellen White.

Howell was chair of the committee appointed to revise the book Daniel and the Revelation, and secretary of the Spirit of Missions Committee, which promoted and directed college and seminary mission language study. From 1930 until his death he was secretary to the president of the General Conference.

Howland, Stockbridge

HOWLAND, STOCKBRIDGE (1801—1883). Pioneer Adventist layperson in Topsham, Maine, whose home, which was often referred to as “Fort Howland” or “Advent Fort,” offered hospitality to many early Adventist workers. In his house James and Ellen White set up their first housekeeping in 1847. Later they left their infant son, Henry, with the Howlands for five years. Howland’s daughter, Frances, healed in answer to a prayer of faith, was an early example of divine healing among Adventists.

Howland had been a deacon of the Congregational Church when he accepted Millerite views in 1841 and was actively engaged in the propagation of these views around Topsham. As a result, he was ridiculed by some of his associates, who, declaring him mentally incompetent, succeeded in gaining the appointment of a legal guardian over his affairs. Soon after, however, when the community needed a good bridge and could not find a better builder and designer than Howland, the guardianship was terminated. He spent the last 11 years of his life in Battle Creek, Michigan.

Hpo Hla, David

HPO HLA, DAVID (d. 1929). First ordained Burmese Seventh-day Adventist minister; also a teacher, translator, and editor. He was one of the first to accept Seventh-day Adventist teachings in Burma, where H. H. Votaw had gone in 1905. From then until his death he served as a preacher, language teacher at the Meiktila School for the missionaries, language instructor, and translator and editor of an SDA Burmese magazine.

Huenergardt, John F.

HUENERGARDT, JOHN F. (1875—1955). Pioneer Seventh-day Adventist worker in Hungary, conference administrator, minister, teacher, and editor. Born in a German colony in Russia, he came to Kansas in childhood and graduated from the German Bible course at Union College in 1897. He entered church work as a licentiate at Hamburg, Germany, in 1898 and was sent to Hungary to begin the work there. In 1900 he was ordained at Friedensau, Germany, and became superintendent of the Hungarian and Balkan States Mission Field in 1902, and president of the Hungarian Conference in 1907 and of the Danube Union Conference in 1912. He came to New York in 1919 to work for the Hungarians there. In 1921 he joined the faculty of the Broadview College and Theological Seminary and began editorial work on German language papers. Between 1925 and 1929 he was associate secretary of the Bureau of Home Missions of the General Conference and then was president of the Yugoslavian Union Conference. He returned to the United States in 1935 and retired in 1936. After retirement he pastored German churches in Lodi and Los Angeles, California, until 1949 and was associate editor of an SDA German language paper until shortly before his death.

Hughes, Cassius Boone

HUGHES, CASSIUS BOONE (1859—1921). Educator. He became a Seventh-day Adventist at the age of 16, was educated at Battle Creek College, and entered the ministry about 1885 in Kansas. When Walla Walla College was opened, he became its Bible teacher and dean of men. He was ordained in 1893 and in 1894 became the first principal of Keene Academy. About 1897 he went to Australia as the first principal of the Avondale School (now Avondale College) and remained there until about 1902, when he joined the staff of Oakwood Industrial School (now Oakwood College) at Huntsville, Alabama, but was soon recalled to Keene Academy. After three and a half years he went to Jamaica to establish a school there (West Indian Training School). Returning to the United States two or three years later, he served as principal of Keene Academy for another six years (1909—1915). He served as dean of men at Pacific Union College for a year and a half, then headed a new academy at Battleford, Saskatchewan, for nearly two years (1916—1918), after which he went to the West Indies for two years (1918—1920) to reestablish the school there. Ill health forced his return to the United States, where he was briefly associated with an intermediate school at Loma Linda, California.

Huguley Memorial Medical Center

HUGULEY MEMORIAL MEDICAL CENTER. A 213-bed hospital involving the total health concept, located in south Fort Worth, Texas. Owned by the Southwestern Union, the new institution, incorporated in August 1972, is part of Adventist Health System/Sunbelt. It was named after Herbert Taylor Huguley, a dentist and real estate investor of Dallas, Texas, who left his $6 million estate to the Seventh-day Adventist Church to build a hospital in honor of his parents.

In 1984 a 40,000-square-foot (3,720-square-meter) fitness center and education building was built on the campus, adjoining Huguley. More recently a two-year, $16 million expansion plan included the construction of a new cardiac catheterization laboratory, outpatient surgery center, physicians' office building and underground parking garage, renal dialysis clinic, lobby and patient registration area, along with the enlargement of the Radiology Department and remodeling of other service areas, including emergency.

Huguley Hospice Care was established in 1987. Along with Huguley Home Health Agency, it provides in-home care for terminally ill or homebound patients.

Future planned expansion includes a water fitness complex, a hospice house, and a new, relocated chapel offering greater capacity.

Huguley is accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Healthcare Organizations.

Hull, Moses

HULL, MOSES (1836—1907; fl. 1860). A onetime Seventh-day Adventist minister who defected. In the early 1850s he became a member first of the United Brethren Church and later of the first-day Adventists. There is some evidence that he accepted the Seventh-day Adventist faith in a series of tent meetings conducted in Greenvale, Illinois, in July 1857, although he may have been led to the truth by a layman, Solomon Myers. He preached his first sermon in connection with the Greenvale meetings. Shortly thereafter he preached in tents and halls in Iowa, and was ordained in August 1858.

Hull was an eloquent and convincing preacher who attracted multitudes to his meetings, and consequently was in great demand. He was an interesting writer as well. Among his tracts were: Mark of the Beast, Infidelity and Spiritualism, and The Transgressor's Fate. The latter was one of the earliest Seventh-day Adventist expositions of the unconscious state of the dead (see Death). He also produced a work of 182 pages entitled The Bible From Heaven. Preaching in many states from the Midwest to the Atlantic coast, he was often challenged to debates, which he usually won, even against spiritualists. With ever-increasing success he began to depend more and more on self and less and less on God. On Nov. 5, 1862, and again in June 1863, Ellen White wrote appeals to him to look away from self to the Lord. She also warned him against friendship with spiritualists, and added, "Never should one man be sent forth alone to combat with a spiritualist" (1T 428). Notwithstanding this warning, he accepted a challenge to another debate with some spiritualists. During the debates he became confused, made certain concessions, and lost the battle. It was reported that he said, "From now on I am a spiritualist." A few days afterward he made a confession to the church and was granted another chance, but on condition that he work with Loughborough. This he did for some months, but he was never the same. In September 1863 he preached his last SDA sermon, then joined the spiritualists and became a lecturer and writer for them.

Hultafors Health Centre and Hospital

HULTAFORS HEALTH CENTRE AND HOSPITAL (Hultafors Halsocenter). A 165-bed medical institution situated 33 miles (53 kilometers) east of Gothenburg, Sweden, operated by the Swedish Union Conference. There are two physicians and 98 other employees. The health center receives patient referrals from Boras city; the Greater Gothenburg Metropolitan Health Planning Commission; Forsakringskassan, the state-operated insurance system; and the Alvsborgs Provincial Council. Combined, the referrals account for approximately 70 percent of occupancy. The remaining 30 percent are self-paying private patients.

The 365-acre (150-hectare) sanitarium property is situated 800 feet (245 meters) above sea level on a wooded mountain ridge overlooking beautiful Lake Viared some 300 feet (90 meters) below. The institution serves as a rehabilitation center for patients with medical and psychiatric problems of many kinds. It has a well-functioning clinical laboratory, an occupational therapy facility, a gym and exercise center, and an eight-floor addition completed in 1972 that houses a modern Physical Therapy and Hydrotherapy Department. This building features a large indoor swimming pool on the top floor, which commands a breathtaking view of the lake and forests below.

The sanitarium property was acquired by the church in March 1926, mainly through the efforts of G. E. Nord, then president of the Scandinavian Union Conference, and C. V. Anderson, then president of the Swedish Conference. In the same year the Hultafors Seventh-day Adventist Church was established and a Sabbath school organized.

After extensive renovation of the existing buildings, the main one having been built in 1907, the sanitarium opened its doors in early June 1926. From the beginning the number of patients was so large that a 16-room annex was added in the spring of 1927, and a three-story building containing offices and some 20 rooms was added in 1932—1933. The church congregation, which previously had met in temporary quarters, in 1937 occupied a new church seating 250. Between 1936 and 1938 further large improvements were put into effect. The kitchen was modernized, the large dining room enlarged, and the lounge remodeled.

A step forward was taken in 1943 when a new wing containing 33 guest rooms and two large sun porches was added. A special section for 20 bed patients was provided (later enlarged to 40 beds). This expansion required enlarged facilities for the doctors and nurses, which were provided in 1951.

In 1962 another building was completed, containing facilities for physical exercise and rehabilitation, three offices, and four patient rooms. In addition, the sanitarium had over the years acquired six houses for the staff. Two large buildings containing 18 apartments have been constructed, the second in 1960. A new apartment building for single employees was constructed in 1974.

A totally new kitchen was added in 1986 together with a total renovation and expansion of the cafeteria. At the same time, a new reception area was added, giving visitors a much better first impression when they arrive at Hultafors.

In 1991 market pressures became so strong that Hultafors faced the risk of having to close. The biggest challenge facing Hultafors is how to best reflect Christ's concern for wellness in today's dynamic health-care market. Sweden represents one of the world's most completely socialized medical systems. What Hultafors provides is a complement to social medicine. Here the individual has the right to choose qualified rehabilitation with a distinctive Christian perspective.

Human Relations, Office of HUMAN RELATIONS, OFFICE OF. The North American Office of Human Relations, with its director and its advisory committee, is concerned chiefly with the strengthening of the bonds of unity among the diverse people groups within the churches and institutions of the North American Division. It is a service that works with Division and union administration in the work of reaching people within its assigned territory and helping to transform the diverse racial and ethnic people groups of the church in North America into a new people, a new community, and a new society based on love and peace.

The office sees four major objectives as essential to its work: (1) promoting fundamental belief 13 as the church's official statement of oneness and encouraging the membership to take aggressive steps to achieve unity; (2) promoting Policy C-50 as the church's official position on the harmonious blending of its diverse membership in the total life of the church, and affirming the seven principles of this policy as (a) those by which the North American Division will conduct the activities of the church, (b) those to which its employees will ascribe, and (c) those that the NAD will encourage among its membership; (3) developing a multicultural relationship model and working for its acceptance as a new paradigm for achieving oneness in the fellowship; and (4) promoting the Conciliation and Dispute Resolution Procedures model as a tool for settling differences that occur among the body.

Organizationally, the office works with the division and union leaders in the promotion of human relations goals, objectives, and activities, but its work is not limited to these areas. The office does share information and provide counsel and guidance to persons on the local level as well as in the churches when such is sought.

Statistics

Statistics. The following statistics were compiled by the Office of Human Relations, Archives and Statistics, and other departments in the General Conference and North American Division in 1991. The membership statistics for multicultural groups and other data relative to administrative and support employees of the division are customarily compiled by the Office of Human Relations.

In 1991 the membership of the division was reported as 776,848, with statistics for the multicultural groups as follows: members of African descent, 223,599, or 28.78 percent; members of Asian descent, 19,898, or 2.56 percent; members of Caucasian descent, 462,552, or 59.54 percent; members of Hispanic descent, 66,418, or 8.54 percent; Native Americans, 1,757, or .22 percent; others, 2,635, or .34 percent.

In the North American Division area (total population about 285 million), the African-American population is more than 30 million. Churches and companies that are of African-American descent and located within the nine regional conferences of the NAD were 773. The membership for the regional conferences (along with the African-American work in the Pacific and North Pacific unions and Bermuda) in 1991 was 200,836. Other data include church schools, 177; ordained ministers, 435; licensed ministers, 85; Bible instructors, 40; teachers, 515.

Tithe income in 1991 was $75,777,066; world mission offerings, $2,270,209. Baptisms were 10,850 for that year.

Institutions. Northeastern Academy; Oakwood College; Pine Forge Academy. There are junior academies in the following cities: Birmingham, Huntsville, Mobile, Montgomery, Selma, Alabama; Little Rock, Pine Bluff, Arkansas; Hartford, Connecticut; Wilmington, Delaware; Fort Lauderdale, Hialeah, Jacksonville, Ocala, St. Petersburg, West Palm Beach, Florida; Albany, Atlanta, Augusta, Columbus, Lithonia, Macon, Savannah, Georgia; Chicago, Waukegan, Illinois; Gary, Indianapolis, Indiana; Kansas City, Kansas; Louisville, Kentucky; Alexandria, Baton Rouge, Hammond, Pineville, Shreveport, Louisiana; Baltimore, Hyattsville, Maryland; Cassopolis, Detroit, Flint, Inkster, Michigan; Jackson, Mississippi; Kansas City, St. Louis, Missouri; Omaha, Nebraska; Hillside, Trenton, New Jersey; Bronx, Brooklyn, Buffalo, Laurelton, New Rochelle, Newburgh, Rochester, New York; Charlotte, High Point, La Grange, Raleigh, Wilmington, Winston-Salem, North Carolina; Cleveland, Cincinnati, Ohio; Anderson, Florence, Greenville, Greenwood, Orangeburg, Sumter, South Carolina; Chattanooga, Memphis, Nashville, Tennessee; Dallas, Houston, Round Rock, Texarkana, Texas; Newport News, Richmond, Virginia; Milwaukee, Wisconsin.

Regional Conferences

Regional Conferences. There are nine North American regional conferences, most of them organized in 1945 or 1946, that have a leadership and constituency largely African-American. These are called regional because of their distinctive geographical arrangement. Each regional conference is organized with the existing administrative structure of a union conference, and covers not merely one portion of the union area, but all the African-American churches in the entire region of the union, except in the Southern and Columbia unions, which contain two regional conferences.

The nine regional conferences in North America are: the Allegheny East Conference, embracing the Black congregations in the territory of Delaware, the District of Columbia, and New Jersey, and eastern portions of Maryland, Pennsylvania, Virginia, and West Virginia (office: Pine Forge, Pennsylvania); the Allegheny West Conference, embracing the Black congregations in the territory of Ohio and western portions of Maryland, Pennsylvania, Virginia, and West Virginia (office: Columbus, Ohio); the Central States Conference, embracing the Black congregations in the territory of Colorado, Iowa, Kansas, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, North Dakota, and South Dakota, and western New Mexico (office: Kansas City, Kansas); the Lake Region Conference, embracing the Black congregations in the territory of Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Minnesota, and Wisconsin (office: Chicago, Illinois); the Northeastern Conference, embracing the Black congregations in the territory of Connecticut, Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New York, Rhode Island, and Vermont (office: St. Albans, New York); the South Atlantic Conference, embracing the Black congregations in North Carolina and South Carolina and Northern Georgia (office: Atlanta, Georgia); the South Central Conference, embracing the Black congregations in the territory of Alabama, Kentucky, Mississippi, and Tennessee, and western Florida (office: Nashville, Tennessee); the Southeastern Conference, embracing the Black congregations in the territory of eastern Florida and northern Georgia (office: Altamonte Springs, Florida); the Southwest Region Conference, embracing the Black congregations in the territory of Arkansas, Louisiana, Oklahoma, and Texas, and eastern New Mexico (office: Dallas, Texas).

The North Pacific and Pacific unions and the Seventh-day Adventist Church in Canada have no regional conferences, but the Pacific Union Conference has a Regional Affairs Department serving in an advisory capacity to all the conferences in which there is a considerable African-American membership, and the North Pacific Union Conference has a Health and Temperance and Regional Affairs Department, as well as Multi-cultural Ministries and Native Ministries Northwest departments, serving in a similar advisory capacity. In Canada there are separate Black congregations as well as churches with Black constituents in their memberships; in Bermuda most of the churches have a majority of Blacks. Missionaries called from responsibilities in the regional conferences have gone to India, South America, Africa, Asia, and the West Indies.

The regional conferences were formed in the hope that the new organizations might, with concentration on work within a specific ethnic group, achieve greater results in a shorter space of time than would be achieved under the previously existing organizations (in some cases under a departmental or mission arrangement). The plan has been responsible for an evangelistic penetration into the African-American community that had not been possible under the organizations that formerly administered the work among the nation's African-American membership. The regional conferences also have created more opportunities for leadership and participation by gifted and trained African-American young people of the church, whose selection in the same or similar capacities had not worked out in the years prior to the formation of the regional conferences. Another practical result has been that African-American members of the SDA Church have been more readily and more naturally represented in elected offices and on boards and committees outside the regional conferences than appears to have been true formerly.

History

History. Origin of Work Among Black Americans. Before SDAs existed as a group, there were African-American adherents of the Adventist (Millerite) movement.

Adventist leaders in the beginning were identified as antislavery in sentiment. Some of them had actively aided Blacks in their struggle against the severe system of slavery: both John P. Kellogg (father of Dr. John Harvey Kellogg) and John Byington, who was later the first president of the General Conference, had operated stations of the Underground Railroad on their farms in Michigan and New York, respectively, and thus aided fleeing slaves to reach freedom in Canada. Byington was well acquainted with Sojourner Truth.

The first Black Seventh-day Adventists were probably in the North, where the church originated, but they are not noted separately in the early accounts, since they would naturally be members of the same churches with the White people, according to the social pattern in that region. Not until SDAs began to move into the South did they encounter Blacks in any number and in a social pattern of segregation. In trying to fulfill the primary objective of the church—to preach the message “to every creature”—these newcomers made converts from both Whites and Blacks and carried on work in some places especially for the latter.

For the work for African-Americans in the South, begun in Tennessee as early as 1871, see South Central Conference; in Texas and Georgia as early as 1876, see Southwest Region Conference and South Atlantic Conference. In North Carolina the work was begun in 1877 by papers sent through the mail.

In the West, C. M. Kinney, reputed to be the first African-American ordained as an SDA minister, was won in 1878 by J. N. Loughborough in Nevada, and became a charter member of the Reno church. Later he preached in the South.

No Black Churches at First. In entering the South, the White evangelists encountered a social system based on the separation of the races, though at that early time (the 1870s) the separation was less complete than later. C. O. Taylor, the first SDA minister to go into Georgia, preached in a rural Baptist church in which he found Blacks attending along with the Whites, though seated separately (Review and Herald 49:8 [i.e., 7], Jan. 4, 1877). D. M. Canright, preaching in Kentucky, reported three Black Sabbathkeepers, “members of the church with the others” (ibid. 47:174, June 1, 1876).

James Edson White, apostle to the African-American communities along the lower Mississippi River, remarked that for Blacks to be members of White churches had been the custom in pre-Civil War days, when slave church members had belonged to their masters’ congregations (ibid. 78:265, Apr. 23, 1901), and it was after the war that Blacks formed their own churches and employed their own ministers (Gospel Herald, February 1906, p. 6).

But by the time White reached the South, in the 1890s, he noted that a separation in terms of race was on the increase and that because of opposition—both by local Whites who opposed the education of Blacks, and by Blacks who did not trust Whites and feared exploitation—the work of the Southern Missionary Society became increasingly difficult (ibid.). In one place in 1899 his work was practically closed, and the society had to staff its Mississippi schools with African-American teachers because of local opposition to Whites teaching Blacks (ibid., October 1899, p. 87; July 1900, p. 63).

In Texas in 1876 D. M. Canright reported that there was no objection to his working for the African-American people so long as he worked among them only (Review and Herald 47:166, May 25, 1876). In 1887 J. M. Rees in Tennessee reported that there was no trouble regarding White and Black members in the SDA Church, but that if ministers tried to preach to both races in their meetings for the general public, they would have no White people to speak to (General Conference Bulletin, Nov. 14, 1887, p. 2). When O. C. Godsmark and his brother attempted to preach to both in Georgia, their evangelistic meetings were deserted by both White and Black listeners. On the other hand, even many years later, Black evangelists sometimes preached successfully to White and Black congregations. J. G. Thomas reported such meetings in Jackson, Mississippi; Gainesville, Florida; Chattanooga, Tennessee; and Columbus, Georgia, where 90 Blacks and 37 Whites were baptized from his meetings. F. S. Keitts, in Nashville; W. W. Fordham, in Jacksonville; and L. B. Baker, in El Paso, reported similar experiences.

Increasing Opposition in the Nineties. The early attempts at interracial churches in the South were abandoned in the face of opposition from outside. J. E. White, in explaining why the Southern Missionary Society conducted work for Whites and Blacks separately, declared that they had been forced by necessity to adopt that policy. “We preferred to live and work in such lines as we could than to force the issue and be cut off from the work” (Gospel Herald, January 1901, supplement, p. 4). He added that Seventh-day Adventists, who teach an unpopular doctrine, “cannot do work in many lines that would be tolerated in others,” and remarked that racial feeling was deepening (ibid.). It may be assumed that much of the problem encountered by White and others stemmed from the fact that they were Northerners coming South to work for Blacks, but it is also a matter of record in American history that in the 1890s, in a period of economic and political unrest, segregation increased sharply, and many legal restrictions date from that time.

Increased opposition to the work in the South was noted by Ellen White, who for many years had urged the evangelism and education of the African-American people. In 1891 she read a manuscript, “Our Duty to the Colored People” (released Mar. 20, 1891, and later printed as a pamphlet by J. E. White), to the General Conference Committee at Battle Creek. In this she said that Black members should be received into the White churches (p. 11). Speaking of the White members, she said that “if a Colored brother sits by their side they will not be offended or despise him,” for they are journeying to the same heaven (p. 9). “If Jesus is abiding in our hearts we cannot despise the Colored man who has the same Saviour abiding in his heart” (p. 9).

But by 1895 she urged caution in the South, saying that in the future the missionary work among Black people “would have to be carried on along lines different from those followed in some sections of the country in former years” (9T 206).

The reason given repeatedly by Mrs. White for the change of method was the strengthening opposition (ibid. 205) from outside the church. She used phrases such as “danger of closing the door” to the work (ibid. 214); “we shall find our way blocked completely” (ibid.); “Do nothing that will unnecessarily arouse opposition” (ibid. 208).

Separate Churches a Concession to Necessity. On the one hand, she laid down the principle of unity in Christ, who “laid the foundation for a religion by which Jew and Gentile, black and white, free and bond, are linked together in one common brotherhood, recognized as equal in the sight of God” (7T 225).

“The religion of the Bible recognizes no caste or color. It ignores rank, wealth, worldly honor. God estimates men as men with Him, character decides their worth. And we are to recognize the Spirit of Christ in whomsoever it is revealed. . . . He who is living in the atmosphere in which Christ lives will be taught of God and will learn to put His estimate on men” (9T 223).

She looked forward to a time “when the Holy Spirit is poured out,” when “human hearts will love as Christ loved. And the color line will be regarded by many very differently from the way in which it is now regarded. To love as Christ loves lifts the mind into a pure, heavenly, unselfish atmosphere. He who is closely connected with Christ is lifted above the prejudice of color or caste” (ibid. 209).

On the other hand, in the face of an increasing racial feeling, she also warned that discretion is the better part of valor. She cautioned against contention or inviting opposition unnecessarily, for Adventist workers would have enough opposition from other sources (ibid. 211).

“The time has not come for us to work as if there were no prejudice. . . . If you see that by doing certain things which you have a perfect right to do, you hinder the advancement of God’s work, refrain from doing these things” (ibid. 215).

She counseled that, on account of the changed situation, the Black believers should have their own houses of worship, “not to exclude them from worshiping with white people,” but “that the progress of the truth may be advanced” (ibid. 206, 207). She advised providing separate churches as “the course of wisdom,” “where demanded by custom or where greater efficiency is to be gained” (ibid. 208), and “until the Lord shows us a better way” (ibid. 207).

A. W. Spalding reported that the method of dealing with the evangelism of African-Americans had been debated in General Conference sessions from time to time, “most speakers maintaining that as God is no respecter of persons, Christians should not allow social questions to affect their church polity” (Origin and History of Seventh-day Adventists, vol. 2, p. 188), although no action was taken. In fact, the 1877 session voted not to take action on the subject. Spalding records that when R. M. Kilgore (an Iowan who had preached some years in Texas) was made head of the SDA work in the South about 1890, “though brought up with the Northern conception of the problem,” he “advocated the separation of white and colored churches. In the end this view prevailed” (ibid.).

Spalding wrote, around 1924 (in an unpublished manuscript, “Lights and Shades in the Black Belt” p. 142), that the church had taken the position that it should “recognize and conform to existing conditions which do not involve transgression of God’s law.” This attitude, he explained, though apparently “shaped by policy instead of principle,” was “built upon the principle of policy” that the church in its social relations should defer to public opinion so “that the gospel may not be hindered.”

The policy of separation, at first adopted for the sake of advancing the gospel, eventually came to be so taken for granted that probably a majority of SDA members in areas where segregation was the custom believed it to be a fundamental teaching of the church. The carrying out of this “principle of policy” over a period of years was not always understood by African-American members. As a consequence, some individuals and groups (see United Sabbath Day Adventists) became disaffiliated with the church, although many of those who went out returned to the original body.

Because, as Mrs. White pointed out, “in different places and under varying circumstances, the subject will need to be handled differently” (9T 213), the practice of separate African-American congregations has not been uniformly followed. In many parts of the country there are no separate churches, and even in areas in which the regional conferences operate, not all African-American members are in the regional churches. In some places the Black congregations were established by members who chose to withdraw from White congregations in order to have their own groups and work better for African-American evangelism; in other places, “where demanded by custom,” the separation was the result of local necessity.

Development of Black Churches. The first African-American churches originated in the 1880s, and the next few in the 1890s, in the period of increased separation that resulted in the change of SDA method.

The first congregation of African-American Seventh-day Adventist believers was organized as a company in November 1883 and as a church in 1886 at Edgefield Junction, Tennessee. Its pastor was Harry Lowe, formerly a Baptist preacher. The second church of African-American believers, with 10 charter members, was established in Louisville, Kentucky, Feb. 16, 1890, where the work had been begun by A. Barry, who had accepted SDA teachings through reading the Review and Herald. The third was organized at Bowling Green, Kentucky, in June 1891. These first three, and also the fifth congregation, which was organized at Nashville, Tennessee, in September 1894, were in what is now the South Central Conference. The fourth, established by C. M. Kinney in New Orleans (organized June 1892), was the first in the present Southwest Region Conference.

Southern Missionary Society. The work of the Southern Missionary Society (incorporated in 1898) began in 1895 in Mississippi. It was founded by James Edson White, who went south in his Mississippi steamer Morning Star with a group of dedicated colporteurs, teachers, physicians, and Bible instructors from churches in the North, to bring the SDA message to African-American people along the Mississippi River. They were successful in establishing small churches and schools in Mississippi and other states. For the story, see Gospel Herald; Morning Star; Southern Missionary Society. White's printing firm was a forerunner of the Southern Publishing Association.

Other developments in the South included the establishing in 1895 of a school (see Oakwood College) and for a time (1906—1923) a sanitarium at Huntsville, Alabama, and two attempts at the establishment of a sanitarium in Nashville, Tennessee, between 1901 and 1909 (see Riverside Hospital).

Meantime work was beginning in earnest in cities of the East, beginning in New York City in 1902 (see Allegheny East Conference; Northeastern Conference).

Work in the West began in Los Angeles in 1906, when Jennie Ireland, a member of the White congregation in the city, began missionary work among the Black population and gave Bible studies to interested people, with the result that in 1908 the first Black church west of Ohio was formed (see Southern California Conference). Among those interested by Miss Ireland's work was the Temple family, whose daughter Ruth later attended medical school at Loma Linda and became noted as the original promoter of the idea of Health Week in the Los Angeles municipality's Health Department. Another was the Troy family, whose son Dr. Owen A. Troy became a pastor and evangelist in the West and Midwest, then associate secretary of the General Conference Sabbath School Department.

Departmental Organization

Departmental Organization. In 1894 there were about 50 Black SDAs in the United States. When the membership reached 900 in 1909, it was felt that to make a more noticeable impact on the growing African-American population some form of organization should be effected. Hence, at the General Conference held that year the North American Negro Department was organized. J. W. Christian, A. J. Haysmer, and C. B. Stephenson, in that order, were the first departmental secretaries. In 1918 the secretary reported that there were a total of 3,500 African-American members in the United States.

When the General Conference department was set up, union and local departments or missions were organized also. In the Southern Conference, the Southern Missionary Society formed the nucleus for the organization of a Southern Union Mission. The Southeastern Union set up a union Negro Mission Department, and for a time the Southwestern Union had a Southwestern Union Mission for Blacks. Most local conferences in these unions had a African-American department or a committee.

The first Black minister to head the General Conference department was W. H. Green, formerly a lawyer in the District of Columbia who had argued cases before the United States Supreme Court. He held the position from 1918 until his sudden death in October of 1928. To fill the vacancy, the Autumn Council of 1929 appointed George E. Peters as departmental secretary. After serving briefly, Peters went to New York City to stabilize the work there because of the grave situation after the United Sabbath Day Adventist crisis. Peters was succeeded by Frank L. Peterson, a pastor in Boston, Massachusetts. Peters was again elected to the position in 1941, and in 1951 was made a field secretary of the General Conference, the first Black to serve thus.

The name of the department was changed at the Autumn Council of 1942 from Negro Department to Colored Department, as the nation grew more concerned over integrating its African-American minority into the main current of American life. The term Colored somehow appeared less harsh, less divisive. To help with the medical needs of the various schools served by the department, Geneva Bryan, R.N., was made an assistant secretary of the department in 1942 and served until 1947.

Regional Conferences Organized. In 1944 the recommendation was made to organize full-fledged conferences of the African-American churches, a plan that had been requested some years earlier by Black leaders but had not then been considered feasible. The General Conference Committee in its Spring Meeting voted: “We recommend, 1. That in unions where the colored constituency is considered by the union conference committee to be sufficiently large, and where the financial income and territory warrant, colored conferences be organized.

“2. That these colored conferences be administered by colored officers and committees.

“3. That in the organization of these conferences the present conference boundaries within each union need not be recognized.

“4. That colored conferences sustain the same relation to their respective union conferences as do the white conferences” (Actions of the Spring Meeting of the General Conference Committee, Apr. 10—16, 1944, pp. 15, 16).

The first to act was the Lake Union Conference, which called a meeting of the African-American constituency in September to organize the Lake Region Conference (begun Jan. 1, 1945). Others followed, until in 1946 there were five such conferences. Two missions (Central States and Southwestern), which soon became conferences also, each with a full staff of officers and departmental secretaries, started in 1947.

In 1951 the North American Colored Department was enlarged by the addition of an associate secretary, Calvin E. Moseley, Jr., who succeeded G. E. Peters in 1953, both as secretary of the department and as a field secretary of the General Conference.

In 1954 Frank L. Peterson became secretary of the department and also associate secretary of the General Conference. Moseley was named associate secretary. The same year the name was changed from Colored Department to Regional Department as a further attempt to soften terms that seemed primarily to designate members on the basis of color.

In 1962 Frank L. Peterson was made a general vice president of the General Conference, and Harold D. Singleton, former president of the Northeastern Conference, became the Regional Department secretary, with Frank L. Bland, former president of the South Central Conference, as associate secretary.

In 1966, when Frank L. Bland succeeded the retiring Frank L. Peterson as vice president, Walter W. Fordham, president of the Central States Conference, was elected associate secretary of the Regional Department.

Recent Events. In many places in which the social pressures have lessened, previously all-White congregations have opened their membership in recent years. In the 1961 Autumn Council, the General Conference Committee voted a statement on human relations, quoting three of the extracts previously cited in this entry (7T 225; 9T 223, 209); and in the Spring Meeting of 1965 voted recommendations as follows: “We recommend, That the following principles and practices be adopted and carried out in our churches and institutions:

“1. Membership and office in all churches and on all levels must be available to anyone who qualifies, without regard to race.

“2. In our educational institutions there should be no racial bias in the employment of teachers or other personnel, nor in the admission of students.

“3. Hospitals and rest homes should make no racial distinction in admitting patients or in making their facilities available to physicians, interns, residents, nurses, and administrators who meet the professional standards of the institution.

“It is further recommended that these recommendations be given very serious consideration and that every effort be put forth to implement them as rapidly as is consistently possible” (Actions of the Spring Meeting of the General Conference Committee, Apr. 13, 14, 1965, in Review and Herald 142:8, Apr. 29, 1965).

In 1970 the General Conference Committee, at its spring session, in response to the desire among Black Seventh-day Adventists for a fuller involvement in leadership, passed what is generally referred to as the “16 points.” Among these is an action stating:

“8. On the union conference level positive steps should be taken to open doors in the area of administrative and departmental leadership for those who have demonstrated their ability and qualifications to serve all segments of the church. In unions where there are Regional conferences or where there is an organized Regional department, the administrative officer level should include black leadership.”

As a result, the seven unions with large Black memberships have elected officers and departmental secretaries from among their Black constituencies.

Another of the “16 points” provided for a Regional Presidents’ Council, which meets twice a year under North American leadership and deals with problems distinctive to the regional work.

In 1975 the General Conference staff in Washington, D.C., included 17 persons elected to their positions from the Black constituency of North America, including two vice presidents and an associate secretary. There were also two persons in appointed positions.

Humanity, Doctrine of HUMANITY, DOCTRINE OF. Humanity is the crowning work of Creation, made in God's image "both in outward resemblance and in character" (Gen. 1:26, 27; PP 45; GC 645). Believing in Creation, Seventh-day Adventists reject the theory that human beings evolved by slow degrees from the lower forms of life. They hold that the evolutionary philosophy "lowers the great work of the Creator" to the level of humanity's "narrow earthly conceptions" and that evolutionists degrade humans, and defraud them of the dignity of their origin (PP 45).

In their original state, man and woman possessed the possibility of unending life and continuous advancement. Their natural tendency was to live in harmony with the Creator's will and purpose for them. But human beings fell from their high estate and became mortal and sinful. Thenceforth, their natural tendency was contrary to God's will and purpose. Jesus Christ came to restore what had been lost as a result of sin (Luke 19:10). At His first advent Christ provided for the restoration of humanity's character; and at His second advent He will bestow upon those whose characters have been thus transformed the gift of immortality and the privilege of once more living in the divine presence.

George Storrs, a well-known Millerite preacher, advocated the doctrine of the mortality of humanity among his fellow Millerites, though it did not become a majority view among them until after 1844. Early in their history Seventh-day Adventists adopted the view that humans, when created, were given the opportunity of living forever, but that sin made them mortal (for the development of this view, see Death).

The Sept. 26, 1854, issue of the Review and Herald (7:53) printed a letter from John Byington of Buck's Bridge (near Potsdam), New York, who was later to become the first president of the General Conference. In it he described a conversation with a man concerning the question of spiritism, whether it was from the devil. This letter contains a fair summary of what was to become the Seventh-day Adventist view on humanity's nature and destiny: "God was infinitely holy and happy and it would be benevolent and good in Him to make a being capable of enjoying this blessedness. This goodness was manifest in creating [humanity] in His own image, capable of knowing and holding communion with . . . God." But, Byington maintained, since humans were "created, dependent" beings, they were therefore under their Maker's government; thus, God gave them His law, which "embraced all His will" concerning them. "Law given to a being possessing liberty and intelligence implies power to obey or disobey. To [humanity's] existence, therefore, is attached probation; and this implies a day of settling accounts, or a day of judgment."

Here Byington links the image of God with being "capable of knowing and holding communion with God," and affirms that humanity was endowed with free will "to obey or disobey." The letter closes with a typical description of the final, blessed state that human beings are to enjoy: "The devil and all his works [will] have an entire destruction. The curse is now removed from the earth, and God has a clean universe and a race of intelligent beings for ever to praise and glorify Him; which He would not have had, had He not have made [humans]” (ibid.).

Seventh-day Adventists believe that humanity inherited a sinful nature with a propensity to sin, and their writings either reject or fail to stress the idea that human beings inherit the guilt of Adam’s transgression.

SDAs point out that the concept that holds men and women to be a combination of mortal body and immortal soul arose from the speculations of pagan philosophers, and is contrary to the teachings of the Bible. A letter from R. F. Cottrell to the Sabbath Recorder (Seventh Day Baptist), quoted in the Review and Herald for Nov. 22, 1853, declares: “The Romans had the doctrines of purgatory and immortality of the soul before they ever heard of the Christian religion. Those who doubt this have only to consult Virgil and other ancient writers to be satisfied of it. . . . We know that heathen philosophers taught, very anciently, the immortality of the soul. I cannot say positively, but it was probably taught as long ago as the days of Solomon” (p. 157).

Seventh-day Adventists reject the view that men and women are merely or only or simply animals. This is shown by SDAs vigorous opposition to Darwin’s views on the descent of humanity, which, as stated earlier, degrades humans, who were made in the image of God. They do not believe that men and women differ from animals only in having more highly organized bodies. On the question whether human beings are material or spiritual, SDAs would say that, in ordinary language, they are both. Their intelligence and conscience are not usually understood as material functions, and the SDA Church has never taught that they should be so labeled. These functions are sometimes called “spiritual,” and SDAs understand and accept this adjective in this sense. Seventh-day Adventists do not equate the biblical terms soul and spirit with the metaphysical concept of spirit, insisting that this technical term is foreign to both OT and NT and belongs in the realm of speculative philosophy rather than biblical theology.

The desire to impose the Aristotelian (matter—form) metaphysics on scriptural statements concerning humanity is not shared by SDAs. They prefer to retain biblical usage.

The terms spirit and soul are used in the Bible with different meanings and in many different scriptural contexts. In their use of the biblical terms, Seventh-day Adventists prefer to confine themselves to the meanings clearly intended in these passages, none of which ever speaks of “immortality” as being humanity’s innate possession.

The mind-body or matter—spirit philosophical controversy, which teaches that body or matter is evil, and mind or spirit is good, is foreign to the thought world of the Bible. According to the Bible, God is the Creator of all things, and He called everything He made “good.” These good things can all be used for evil purposes, however, because human beings, who were given dominion over creation, were also given the power of choice. Thus, because humans chose evil, both their material bodies and their spiritual intellects or consciences have come under the dominion of sin.

Hungarian Seminary

HUNGARIAN SEMINARY. A training school for ministers operated by the Hungarian Union Conference at Budapest, Hungary, since 1957. It is directed by the church president and has a staff of three teachers. The seminary offers a course by correspondence.

The need for the training of Hungarian Seventh-day Adventist ministers in Hungary was felt as early as 1903, but at that time it was not possible to establish a school in that country. Therefore, a number of young people were sent to the Friedensau Missionary Seminary in Germany (in 1910 seven Hungarian young people studied there), and after World War I some went to England. An action to establish a school in Hungary was taken at the conference session in September 1920, but it was not possible to execute it.

The Hungarian school project finally materialized in 1948 in a temporary program that lasted from Oct. 25, 1948, to Apr. 30, 1950. Twenty students attended the classes. After 1957, when the Seventh-day Adventist denomination was given official recognition, the training of ministers in Hungary finally became possible. Regular courses began in the autumn of 1957. In 1962 the school was replaced by a correspondence school.

In September 1967 systematic ministerial training came under the coordination of the Council of the Free Churches. A correspondence-type teaching program proceeded in six subjects: Old Testament, New Testament, systematic theology, practical theology, church history, church and society. The special SDA subjects—dogmatics, church order, and interpretation of prophecy—taught by the three participating SDA teachers. According to an agreement in 1972 concluded between the Council of the Free Churches, the Lutheran Theological Academy at Debrecen, and the Lutheran Theological Academy at Budapest, the seminary granted an academic degree to its students.

In 1989 the Hungarian Union withdrew from the Council of the Free Churches and reorganized the ministerial training. The Hungarian government recognized the seminary as a college in 1993. The Trans-European Division regards the seminary as a union college.

Hungary

HUNGARY. A people's republic in Central Europe, bounded by Slovakia and the Ukraine on the north, Romania on the east, Slovenia, Yugoslavia, and Croatia on the south, and Austria on the west. It has an area of 35,919 square miles (93,000 square kilometers), and its population (1994) is 10.3 million. About 90 percent of the people are of Hungarian origin. Two thirds of the people adhere to the Roman Catholic Church; other religious bodies include the Reformed Church, Lutheran, Orthodox, Unitarian, Baptist, Seventh-day Adventist, Methodist, and Jewish. All religious bodies have equal standing before the law.

The Hungarians are the descendants of the Ugro-Finnish people who migrated from Asia in the ninth century and established an independent kingdom by the year 1000. Soon thereafter they accepted Western Christianity, and for the next several centuries were in constant conflict with their neighbors and with the Turks, who finally occupied almost all of Hungary in the sixteenth century. The Reformation spread rapidly in Hungary, and soon its eastern and central part (Transylvania, now a part of Romania) became a bulwark of Protestantism in Eastern Europe. But the Counter-Reformation regained the lost position for the Catholic Church and nearly exterminated Protestantism in the western regions; only the Turkish occupation prevented its complete success. After the Turks were expelled near the end of the seventeenth century, Austria dominated Hungary; then in the 1800s the dual monarchy of Austria-Hungary was set up, and continued until the end of World War I, when Hungary became an independent state.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. M. B. Czechowski, a Polish ex-Catholic priest, became a Protestant in Switzerland and was baptized an SDA when he went to the United States in 1857. After raising up a Sabbathkeeping group in Tramelan, Switzerland, in 1867, he traveled through Europe, including Hungary, spreading the Sabbath truth. Seventh-day Adventists began their work in Hungary in Transylvania, a section later transferred to Romania. L. R. Conradi visited this area in 1890, and in a short time a woman convert went from there to the Hamburg Publishing House, where, according to contemporary accounts, she translated several Bible studies into Hungarian and took charge of their distribution by mail throughout Hungary (Review and Herald 69:773, Dec. 13, 1892). By 1893 there were 30 small tracts published in Hungarian.

In 1898 J. F. Huenergardt arrived from America to pioneer in Hungary and in the Danube basin. On his way to Klausenburg (now Cluj), in Transylvania, where he was to establish his headquarters, he visited in Budapest on Aug. 21, 1898, the first-known SDA in Hungary proper, a woman by the name of Anna Nagy, who had moved there from Transylvania. In the autumn of 1901 a recent convert of Huenergardt's, Michael B. Osz, went to Budapest and began to work there.

In March 1902 the first general meeting of Hungarian SDAs was held at Klausenburg, and at that time the foundations for the Seventh-day Adventist organization in Hungary were laid. The next year the first church in Hungary was organized in Békéscsaba. During the autumn of 1903 Huenergardt moved to Budapest, held meetings, and baptized several converts. In addition, interest in SDA beliefs spread through the work of colporteurs.

Reporting on a visit to Hungary in 1904, Jean Vuilleumier, of Switzerland, wrote: "During a recent trip to Hungary I met four or five of our workers in that country. In Budapest, the headquarters, meetings that started ten months ago have already resulted in about 15 baptisms, several candidates being Hungarian and others German. . . . There are companies of believers in several cities along the railway line crossing the country from North to South. . . . The work in Hungary began only six or seven years ago, and there are nearly 200 members" (Le Messenger 8:88, November 1904).

Huenergardt trained workers and book evangelists, and began to issue some publications in the Hungarian language. In 1910 German ministers and evangelists came to his help; in 1911 a small Hungarian publishing house was established in Budapest as a branch of the Hamburg Publishing House. Later this house grew into an independent institution, with a printing plant under the management of Bela Gyarmati. It operated until the end of 1949, when it was nationalized by the government. In 1989 the Advent Publishing House was established in Budapest, and has continued in operation to the present.

Organization and Later Developments. In 1907 the work in Hungary was organized as the Hungarian Conference. In 1912 the Danube Union Conference, with headquarters in Budapest, was organized, with J. F. Huenergardt as president. It embraced Bulgaria, Hungary, Romania, and the area of the former Yugoslavia. The Hungarian Seventh-day Adventist Church at that time comprised the Middle Hungarian Conference, the North Hungarian Mission, and the West Hungarian Mission. After the territorial changes that followed World War I, the Hungarian Conference was reorganized within the European Division, with about 450 members and with Adolf Minck as president. By 1925 the membership had risen to about 1,000, and the church in Hungary was organized into a union conference with two local conferences. A building was constructed in Budapest with a chapel seating 500, offices for the union, and also living quarters. In 1928 Hungary was included in the Central European Division.

At that time ministerial students went for training to the Friedensau and Marienhöhe schools in Germany, and later to Watford, England. SDA papers published in Budapest were: Az Arato (“The Reaper”), Az Idök Jelei (“Signs of the Times”), and a health paper, Boldog Elet (“Happy Life”); of Ellen White’s books, the Conflict of the Ages series and other writings were translated and printed. In 1936 the Hungarian Union Conference was reorganized with three local missions (referred to as conferences after World War II).

In 1938 the union acquired an old estate and a castle, transforming the property into a senior citizens’ home for 80 to 100 people. Unfortunately, under government pressure, it had to be sold in 1941.

Through the years new headquarters were established successively in Miskolc, Szekesfehervar, and Szeged. Chapels were built or bought in Debrecen, Békéscsaba, Pécs, and other places.

In 1940 the Hungarian SDA churches were dissolved by order of the Ministry of War, and their activities prohibited, but in 1941 they were reopened by government permission under the name of Church of the Bible Followers. At about the same time the SDA work in Hungary came under the direction of the Southern European Division.

In 1940 parts of Transylvania, Slovakia, and Yugoslavia were again incorporated into Hungary and belonged to it until 1945. This change gave opportunities for building up the Hungarian-speaking churches in those areas. In 1958 the local conference organizations were disbanded and the union became a single organization.

In 1984 the Hungarian Union was reorganized with two conferences, and in that year Mark Finley conducted a public campaign that brought about a new beginning in the post-Communist life of Hungarian Seventh-day Adventists.

Hunt, William

HUNT, WILLIAM (fl. c. 1880). A miner who, having heard J. N. Loughborough preach in California in the 1870s, carried Seventh-day Adventist literature with him to the diamond fields at Kimberley, South Africa, and thus introduced Seventh-day Adventist teachings into South Africa.

Huntley, Maria L.

HUNTLEY, MARIA L. (1847—1890). Leader and instructor in lay missionary work. Born in a pioneer Seventh-day Adventist family at Washington, New Hampshire, she became secretary of the South Lancaster, Massachusetts, Vigilant Missionary Society. In 1874, when the General (later International) Tract and Missionary Society was first organized, she became its secretary and held that post through the rest of her life. She also taught at various times at South Lancaster Academy, Battle Creek College, and Healdsburg College, and at the time of her death was assistant principal and instructor in missionary correspondence at the Central Bible School for home and foreign missionaries at Chicago.

Hurlow, William Henry

HURLLOW, WILLIAM HENRY (1889—1972). Missionary nurse, singing evangelist, departmental secretary, administrator. He was born into a Seventh-day Adventist family in Wales and at an early age received a call to connect with the Cape Sanitorium in Plumstead, where he graduated from the nurses' course in 1914. He went immediately to the Malamulo Mission in Malawi to take charge of the school and dispensary there. Later he continued his mission service at Emmanuel Mission in Basutoland.

In 1919 he was called into European work, connecting with an evangelistic effort in Kimberley. While there he was married to Emma Irene Staples. Later he was called as a departmental secretary in the Cape Conference.

Working with the union evangelistic team, he served as singing evangelist in some of the major towns in South Africa.

In 1936 he was called to the presidency of the Cape Conference and four years later became secretary of the Missionary Volunteer, Home Missionary, and Medical departments of the South African Union. In 1950 he became president of the Rhodesia Conference, where he served for three years. At his retirement in 1962, he had given a total of 50 years of service to the cause in southern Africa.

Hutchins, Alfred S.

HUTCHINS, ALFRED S. (fl. 1885). Pioneer minister and conference administrator. For some five years prior to joining the Adventists in 1852, he had been a Freewill Baptist minister. He was ordained together with J. N. Andrews in 1853 and was one of the leaders of Seventh-day Adventist work in Vermont throughout most of the rest of his life. Some have called him the “father of the Vermont Conference.” For a time he was chaplain at Battle Creek Sanitarium. He also preached in Michigan, Illinois, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and throughout New England and eastern Canada. His name appears for the last time in the directory of 1894.

Hutchins, Frank J.

HUTCHINS, FRANK J. (1869—1902). Pioneer Seventh-day Adventist evangelistic and medical missionary in Central America. He was brought into the Seventh-day Adventist Church at an early age as the result of tent meetings in California and studied for the ministry at Healdsburg and Battle Creek colleges. Soon after graduation he was offered ministerial work in Oregon, but he chose to take a medical course at the University of Michigan instead. However, a few weeks after matriculation he accepted an appointment to the Bay Islands in Central America, where he and his wife pioneered SDA work in 1891. On his advice, the General Conference built a small schooner, the Herald, with which mission work could be carried on more expeditiously among the islands of that area, and this served as the mission home for several years. He soon found that there was a serious need for dentists in that area, and there being none, he secured books and some instruments, and after a while became a proficient dentist. Not only was his dental work helpful in reaching the people, but, along with the sale of publications, it contributed toward meeting the expenses of the mission. After 11 years of service, he died of a tropical disease at Bocas del Toro, Panama.

Hutchinson Theological Seminary

HUTCHINSON THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY. An educational institution that was operated (originally under the name Danish-Norwegian Seminary) at Hutchinson, Minnesota, from 1911 to 1928 for the education of church workers in the Danish and Norwegian languages. The original plan was to train workers in foreign languages at Union College, but by 1909 that institution had become so crowded that it was voted to establish separate schools. L. H. Christian found at Hutchinson the buildings of a defunct Danish Lutheran institution, which were owned by the city of Hutchinson. After arranging for the purchase for $11,000, he visited 11 Danish and Norwegian members, who each gave $1,000 for the new undertaking. M. L. Andreasen, the first president, chose a faculty and opened the school in 1910, with an enrollment of 93 academy and upper-grade school students the first year. Although intended to operate on the college level, it had no college students until 1914. The number of college students rose from four to a maximum of 68 in 1919, then declined to 25 the last year of operation. While this enrollment was insufficient for the operation of a college, the academy averaged 112 per year.

As a result of the antiforeign feeling during World War I, the name of the school was changed in 1919 to Hutchinson Theological Seminary. By that time immigration had almost stopped, Scandinavian-American young people wished to be educated in the English language, and the need for foreign language schools was decreasing. Then, too, the competition between foreign and English schools for students from the same territory was keen. When the school closed in May 1928, the Minnesota Conference took over the plant and moved Maplewood Academy to the site.

Hyatt, William S.

HYATT, WILLIAM S. (1857—1936). Administrator and missionary. He was born at Williamstown, New York, and attended Battle Creek College, where he met Sadie Armitage, whom he married in 1882. That same year he took up ministerial work in New York, and was ordained to the ministry in 1885.

For a number of years Hyatt worked in Wisconsin, then for 10 years he served as conference president: four years in Texas (1888—1892), four in Missouri (1892—1896), and two in Kansas (1896—1897). In 1898 Hyatt and his family went to South Africa, where he took over the presidency of the conference (raised to union status after 1901) from A. T. Robinson. During the years of economic depression following the Anglo-Boer War, his considerable financial ability was taxed to the utmost to maintain the large institutions that had been launched in more prosperous times.

In expanding the mission fields to the north, Hyatt traveled extensively by oxcart and donkey wagon. Frequently when a missionary family went on furlough, he, even though president of the South African Union, took over the station.

Hyatt served as president of the Natal-Transvaal Conference from 1913 to 1921. On their first and only furlough to the homeland (1924—1929), the Hyatts spent four years going from church to church telling the story of African missions.

Returning to South Africa where his children were living and working, Hyatt served as pastor at Pretoria. When failing health forced him to seek a lower elevation, he went to Durban for pastoral work and spent the remaining years of his life in missionary work, writing hundreds of letters, attending camp meetings, and conducting Weeks of Prayer in the schools.

Hyde, Conrad Thomas James

HYDE, CONRAD THOMAS JAMES (1907—1965). Missionary, teacher, administrator, departmental secretary. He was born in London to a family that produced five ordained Seventh-day Adventist ministers. In 1927 he completed the nurses' course at Stanborough Park Sanitarium, then took a two-year ministerial course at Stanborough College.

He began his work for the church at Kendu Hospital in Africa in 1930. In 1932 the family moved to the Kamagambo Training School, where the boys' boarding school was started. In 1940 he moved to Kandoto Mission, where he served as mission director until 1943. In this year he was ordained. From 1943 to 1947 he served at Kisii Mission Station, and then was called to head the Theological Department at Bugema College and later served as principal of the school. In 1958 he became president of the Tanzania Union, and in 1963 the family moved to Salisbury, where he became a departmental secretary and later field secretary for the division.

He was the first Master Guide in East Africa and mastered the Luo and Swahili languages to the point that he was issued a diploma for proficiency in these vernaculars by London University.

Hyde, John Ashford

HYDE, JOHN ASHFORD (1923—1969). Missionary, physician, administrator. John was born in Plymouth, England, and at 9 years of age went with his parents to north Nigeria. At 16 he matriculated and was accepted for medical training at University College Hospital. In 1946 he married Myrtle Richter and went to the same area that his parents had pioneered in his youth.

His early surgeries were performed on a scrubbed kitchen table, utilizing kettles as sterilizers. During his years as a medical missionary, he never neglected spiritual care for the souls of his patients, and in 1951 he was ordained to the gospel ministry. He then served as president of the North Nigeria Mission until called to the Gold Coast (now Ghana) to help organize and open Kwahu Hospital. Jengre Hospital also stands as a memorial to his labors.

After completing advanced studies, he was called as medical secretary of the Northern European Division.

On one of his trips he was stricken with a sudden illness and passed to his rest in Vienna, Austria.

Hyde, John Jacob

HYDE, JOHN JACOB (1893—1968). Missionary to Africa. A native of England, he was the oldest of 13 children. At the age of 15 he began his service to the church at the International Tract Society, which later became the Stanborough Press. After attending college, he entered evangelism in the South England Conference. Soon after his ordination in 1924, he received a call to mission service in Sierra Leone, known in those days as the “White man’s grave.” After a period of service, he and his wife, the former Louise Ashford, were transferred to the Gold Coast (now Ghana), where John headed the work. Winning the confidence of the warlike Ashanti people, the Hydys healed the sick, taught the young, and acted as arbitrators in tribal conflicts. For this service he was recognized by an official letter of thanks from the chief commissioner of the Ashanti region of the Gold Coast.

In 1930 Hyde was called to pioneer new work in north Nigeria. During his years in Africa he served as president of the Sierra Leone, Ghana, north Nigeria, and West Nigeria fields.

At his retirement in 1957, he had actively served the church for 45 years. In retirement he continued to work as a pastor until 1966, then as a church elder and a counselor to all who sought his guidance.

Hyde, William H.

HYDE, WILLIAM H. (fl. 1845). An Adventist in Maine. In the spring of 1845 he was healed by prayer and a short time later was present when Ellen Harmon had a vision of the new earth. After hearing her description he wrote the hymn “We Have Heard From the Bright, the Holy Land” (1T 67—71; cf. EW 17—20), which was soon published in several “Second Advent papers” and in Himes’s songbook Advent Harp (1849 edition).

This vision of the new earth, at which Hyde was present, was not Ellen Harmon’s first vision (at which only five women were present; see 2SG 30; 1T 58), but occurred in the spring of 1845 (Present Truth 1:88, November 1850), more than two weeks, according to her own account, after her return from three months of travel (2SG 52; cf. 38, 50—52; see also 1T 58—67). It was published in 1846, together with the first vision without separation, in a broadside, “To the Little Remnant”; it is still printed without separation in Early Writings, where it begins with the last paragraph on page 17 (see W. C. White, in Review and Herald 112:7, Mar. 7, 1935).

If this Hyde was the W. H. Hyde who was the “chief printer” of Hope Within the Veil, published by C. H. Pearson at Portland, he did not remain with the little group that was forming one of the nuclei of the future Seventh-day Adventist Church, but about the end of August 1845 reverted to the views of the majority group of Adventists, known as the Advent Herald party.

Hymnody

HYMNODY. The early hymnody of Sabbathkeeping Adventists laid heavy stress on the distinctive doctrines of the church—the Sabbath and the Second Advent. Beginning in 1849 with Hymns for God’s Peculiar People That Keep the Commandments of God and the Faith of Jesus, James White edited five hymnals and four supplements for his fellow believers prior to the organization of the church in 1863. In addition, his sister, Anna White, compiled Hymns for Youth and Children in 1854.

While these early hymnals drew heavily on existing Protestant worship music, Adventists themselves wrote about 5 percent of the hymns they published during this era. Annie R. Smith and Roswell F. Cottrell were the most prolific Adventist hymnwriters of the period.

The first Sabbathkeeping Adventist hymnal to contain music was Hymns for Those Who Keep the Commandments of God and the Faith of Jesus (1855). The music in the earliest hymnals was derived from three sources: psalm tunes, Lowell Mason and his school, and folk hymns or White spirituals. Closely akin to the latter category were popular tunes for which Adventists supplied religious words. Uriah Smith’s “Land of Light,” written to fit Stephen Foster’s tune “Swanee River,” appeared in an 1858 supplement.

The second generation of pioneers, notably J. Edson White and his cousin Frank Belden, added variety if not quality to Seventh-day Adventist hymnody. Edson White was the first SDA printer to learn to set the musical type for hymnals. He published a number of temperance and Sabbath school songbooks, sometimes collaborating with Belden. Both men were composers, and a number of Belden’s hymns still survive in SDA hymnody.

Since 1886 three volumes have dominated SDA hymnody. The first was Hymns and Tunes. Officially titled The Seventh-day Adventist Hymn and Tune Book for Use in Divine Worship, the collection was compiled between 1884 and 1886 by a special committee of the General Conference.

At the turn of the century F. E. Belden published Christ in Song. This hymnal supplanted Hymns and Tunes and remained the most popular collection among SDAs until 1941, when the Church Hymnal was published.

In 1981 the General Conference set up a 19-member Church Hymnal Committee to compile a new hymnal. The committee was chaired by C. L. Brooks, an associate director of the Sabbath School Department of the General Conference and an accomplished soloist. Wayne Hooper, formerly with the King’s Heralds Quartet and the Voice of Prophecy, served as executive secretary. The committee included music teachers, choir leaders, organists, composers, writers, editors, soloists, evangelists, pastors, and church administrators.

Issued in 1985, the new hymnal retained 300 of the 1941 hymnal’s selections, but two thirds of them were pitched lower to make them easier for congregations to sing. About 160 “new” hymns were introduced, drawn from Protestant hymnody as well as from new compositions and other SDA hymnals. In the Composers and Arrangers index of the new hymnal, several members of the compiling committee were acknowledged for their contributions. Wayne Hooper provided six original hymn tunes and arranged 19 others, while Melvin West wrote three new tunes and arranged 31. Other members contributing tunes were Allen Foster, James Bingham, and John Read. A pair of Sabbath hymn texts were contributed by Gem Fitch and Otilie Stafford.

A number of hymn texts were altered slightly to avoid obsolete language, make theological corrections, or eliminate gender-exclusive language. A much-improved section of Scripture readings and worship aids was provided by Merle Whitney and his associates on a worship aids committee.

Hypnotism

HYPNOTISM. The practice of inducing a state of hypersuggestibility in which susceptible persons may be led to accept and act uncritically upon suggestions given by others who thus in a measure control them. A trance state is characteristic of some levels of hypnosis but may or may not be obvious. The kinds of procedures that are now generally classified under the name hypnotism were known in the nineteenth century by a number of nebulous terms such as mesmerism, Braidism, mind cure, and animal magnetism.

The leaders of the Seventh-day Adventist Church have from the first rejected the use of hypnotism, considering it unethical and vulnerable to influence by unseen sinister forces. Ellen White recognized hypnotism as a science that “may appear . . . very valuable,” through which “temporary relief may be felt”; but she spoke of it as leaving the subject of hypnosis more or less permanently weakened (MM 112, 116), and she referred to it as “the science by which satanic agencies work.” She also spoke out against the practice on the ethical grounds that “no individual should be permitted to take control of another person’s mind” (ibid. 115). Hypnotism deprives the subject of the free use of the will and takes the individual from the world of reality into a realm of fantasy in which he or she may experience enhanced visual and auditory imagery, automatic writing, depersonalization, various types of disorientation, and acceleration or inhibition of physiological functions (Encyclopaedia Britannica [1971], vol. 11, p. 996). Satan teaches the science of taking captive the minds of others and thus deprives them of the privilege of choosing to accept Jesus Christ (MM 110).

The General Conference Committee, in the 1955 Autumn Council, while recognizing the indispensable place of psychosomatic medicine and the appropriate application of psychology and psychiatry, took action on hypnotism, recommending that “we as a denomination recognize hypnotism as a dangerous procedure, and warn Seventh-day Adventists against employing or seeking its use,” and that “we take a decided stand against the teaching or practicing of hypnotism in the Seventh-day Adventist institution.”

Seventh-day Adventists, by and large, have followed Mrs. White’s counsel and the direction of the church in this regard, and have felt that some of the more recent pronouncements by ethically sensitive investigators as well as the caution advised by many psychiatrists have tended to confirm the wisdom of this position.

Iceland

ICELAND. A large island in the North Atlantic with an area of about 37,000 square miles (96,000 square kilometers) and a population (1994) of about 265,000. Fishing and farming are the main industries. The interior, which consists of mountains and high plateaus, is uninhabited. There are many volcanoes and hot springs, the latter being used for heating homes and greenhouses. Because of the influence of the Gulf Stream, the climate is oceanic, with cool summers and comparatively mild winters. Iceland was settled by Norwegian Vikings and by some Irish and Scottish people in the ninth and tenth centuries. In the thirteenth century Iceland came under Norwegian and later Danish rule. Early in the sixteenth century, when Denmark became Protestant, Lutheranism also spread to Iceland. The first complete Icelandic Bible translation was published in 1584. Iceland has been an independent republic since 1944. The Lutheran Church is the state church, but there is complete freedom of religion. The inhabitants are completely literate and enjoy a high standard of living.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. The first-known Seventh-day Adventist in Iceland was the Norwegian minister O. J. Röst. According to a report by

J. C. Raft in the Review and Herald of Feb. 11, 1915, Röst went to Iceland in the summer of 1893. Arriving there, he sailed around the island, stopped at various ports, and at Eskifjörður convinced a Lutheran minister of the Sabbath. Although this minister never became a member of the SDA Church, he kept the Sabbath to the end of his days and in spite of opposition from his own church retained his ministerial position.

In November 1897 David Östlund of Sweden was sent by the Denmark Conference to be the first Seventh-day Adventist missionary to Iceland. On the ship taking him to his field, Östlund was surprised to meet a Sabbathkeeping Icelander who was returning from Denmark to his homeland. This Icelander had been led to keep the Sabbath by reading a copy of The Great Controversy, but he and his wife had not yet been baptized. Having read in the Evangelists Sendebud that a missionary was being sent to begin SDA work in Iceland, he and his wife decided to return home, hoping to be of assistance to the new missionary when he began his work. Östlund regarded this meeting on the ship as a hopeful augury for a successful mission in Iceland. He began his work by publishing and circulating books, the first of which were The Second Coming of Christ, by James White, and Steps to Christ, by Ellen White, both printed in 1898. Östlund, who was a printer himself, established his own press and in the year 1900 began to publish a semimonthly magazine called Fraekorn (“The Seed”), which for a time had the widest circulation of any paper in the country.

In 1903 Nils Anderson, a colporteur from Sweden, was sent to Iceland, where he worked as a pioneer canvasser until 1916.

The first church was organized May 19, 1906, in Reykjavik. A church building erected in 1905 was destroyed by fire in 1910, but rebuilt and dedicated early in 1912.

In the summer of 1911 the Scandinavian Union sent to Iceland a new missionary family, O. J. Olsen and his wife.

Organization and Growth. The mission in Iceland was supported by the General Conference until 1901, when it came under the General European Conference, later called the European Division (Review and Herald 92:14, Feb. 11, 1915). Three years later it was placed under the Scandinavian Union Conference. From 1923 to 1928 it was again a detached mission of the European Division, then of the Northern European Division. In 1930 the work in Iceland and the Faroe Islands was united and formed into the Iceland Faroes Conference, becoming in 1931 a part of the West Nordic Union. O. J. Olsen served as the conference president from 1931 to 1947, except for three years (1933—1936), when he stayed in Norway, and O. Frenning served as a vice president of the field. During World War II Iceland had scarcely any connection with Scandinavia. After the war the Faroe Islands were assigned to the East Denmark Conference, and Iceland was again linked directly to the Northern European Division as the Iceland Conference. In 1947

O. J. Olsen was called to serve as a field secretary of the Northern European Division.

Educational Work. A church school was opened by D. Östlund in 1905 but was discontinued after only a few years of operation. Two church schools were opened in 1928, one in Reykjavik and the other in the Westman Islands. Because of volcanic eruption in the Westman Islands in 1972, the school was forced to close in the middle of the school year. It reopened in 1974. In 1967 the school in Reykjavik was closed because of lack of facilities. In 1976 it was reopened in temporary accommodations. In 1990 it moved to a fine new building that also serves as an evangelistic center for the Greater Reykjavik area. The building was erected partly from a share of the Thirteenth Sabbath Offering for the third quarter of 1989 and accommodates also the conference office and the Iceland Publishing House. Iceland Secondary School was opened in 1950.

Private treatment rooms were opened in Reykjavik in 1911 (operated for more than 30 years) and in the Westman Islands in 1923. Treatment rooms have been operated in other places for longer or shorter periods of time. At the academy a guest home, Hressingarheimili Hlidardalsskoli, accommodating 50 patients for two and a half months during the summer vacation, offered hydrotherapy and electrotherapy administered by a qualified physiotherapist. It was discontinued in 1964.

Welfare societies, started in 1923, operate in five churches. These welfare societies donate to the poor annually in cash and supplies close to $50,000.

Bible Correspondence School and Radio. The Bible correspondence school, which was begun in 1948, has reached thousands of people and has won several converts. The government exercised control over radiobroadcasting on the island for many years. However, in 1963 the church was given written permission to broadcast nationally one service a year. In 1986 broadcasting was decontrolled.

The publishing work has been a prominent feature of Seventh-day Adventist work in Iceland. Of the 60 books that have been published, including seven by Ellen White, many deal directly with biblical doctrines, while others foster the Christian home and provide stories for children and young people.

Iceland Publishing House

ICELAND PUBLISHING HOUSE (Frækornid-Bókaforlag Adventista). A publishing firm without printing plant operated at Reykjavik, Iceland, by the Iceland Conference. This institution was established in 1932, but even before that the sale of publications was a prominent feature of Seventh-day Adventist work in Iceland. In 1898, a year after the arrival of the first missionary (David Östlund, who had been a printer), two books had begun to be circulated—The Second Coming of Christ, by James White, and Steps to Christ, by Ellen White. From 1900 until he left the country in 1914, Östlund edited a semimonthly magazine called Fraekorn (“The Seed”), which achieved marked popularity and had for a time a wider circulation than any other magazine in the country. Setting up his own press, he printed, besides his paper, books and tracts. Two books were published at the beginning of the century: The Prophecies of Our Lord and The Revelation, both by J. G. Matteson. Nils Anderson, from Sweden, pioneer colporteur in Iceland, worked untiringly from 1903 to 1916, riding his pony to the remotest corners of the land. Through the years about 40 books have been circulated among Iceland’s scattered population. Its people, proud of their old Icelandic literature, the Sagas, have always had a great interest in reading.

The present publishing house, established in 1932, operated a small printing press and a small offset press for many years until all printing at its own facility was discontinued and the presses sold in 1989. The presses of our publishing houses in the neighboring Scandinavian countries and the Stanborough Press in England have carried out much of the printing work, such as the four volumes of the Footprints of Jesus in Icelandic, as well as the 10 volumes of the Bible Stories, by Arthur S. Maxwell. Thousands of them have been sold in the country. Counsels for the Church, by Ellen White, was published in 1974, along with a study guide. In that same year the missionary paper Signs of the Times (Takn timanna) was published for the first time. The Great Controversy was retranslated and published in 1976, Counsels on Stewardship in 1984, and two Morning Watch books by Ellen White: My Life Today in 1979 and Maranatha, the Lord Is Coming in 1984. Many other titles have been published through the years for the church and the general public. Presently plans are under way to publish a retranslation (the fourth) of Steps to Christ and to publish the Conflict of the Ages series in its entirety.

Iceland Secondary School

ICELAND SECONDARY SCHOOL (Hlidardalsskoli). A coeducational boarding school on the senior high school level, situated 30 miles (50 kilometers) east of Reykjavik, owned and operated by the Iceland Conference. The property, which covers an extensive area of mountain and lava fields, totals 30,000 acres (12,000 hectares), of which about 100 acres (40 hectares) are tillable land. Widespread sections are suitable as pasturage for sheep.

The work of constructing the school building began on June 8, 1949. In the autumn of 1950 the school opened with 19 students, one teacher, and the principal, who was also the conference president. The building was dedicated on Sept. 24, 1951, by A. F. Tarr, then president of the Northern European Division.

Since the enrollment soon exceeded 40, the number for which the building was planned, work was begun early in 1956 on a new dormitory, which was occupied by 40 boys in the fall of 1959. It was officially dedicated in 1960, on the tenth anniversary of the school's opening.

The school employs four teachers; the student capacity is 80.

The farm had about 20 head of cattle and about 350 sheep and 600 chickens, but in 1989 farming was discontinued and the farm rented out to a church member.

During the summer months, while school is in recess, the buildings at the school were used for a sanitarium until 1964. Since then they have been used for various summer activities for children. For four summers the buildings were rented to the city of Reykjavik as a camp for children with mental disabilities, and twice the church has conducted camps and Vacation Bible Schools during the recess.

In 1967 a share of the Thirteenth Sabbath Offering overflow made possible an experimental drilling for hot water, of which there is plenty in the vicinity. The drilling proved successful—a miracle, according to the geologists; an answer to prayer, according to the church. This underground thermal steam about 250F (120C) was harnessed, and since then it has provided all the heat necessary for heating and leaves much water and steam unused. Part of this surplus heat is used for an outdoor swimming pool and for a greenhouse.

Most of the students at the school do not come from Seventh-day Adventist homes. For several years applications to enter the school have exceeded the accommodations available, which resulted in many being turned away.

The school operated grades 8 to 10, which led the pupils to the Grunnskólapróf (General Certificate of Education), which gives right to college entrance.

ICELAND SUMMER SANITARIUM (Hressingarheimili Hlidardalsskola). A medical institution operated at Ölfus, Iceland, in the Hlidardalsskoli (Iceland Mission School), during the summer vacation. It was operated from 1954 to 1964.

A physiotherapist gave massage, electric treatments, and Finnish and several other kinds of baths according to prescriptions from a physician in Reykjavik, who visited the patients regularly.

History

History. Beginnings of Work in the Area. Seventh-day Adventist teachings were introduced into Idaho about 1884. J. G. Smith was assigned the unworked territory of southern Idaho. During the first year he raised up several small Sabbath schools: one in Boise, one in High Valley, 12 miles (20 kilometers) north of Boise, and one in Franklin, 20 miles (32 kilometers) south of Boise. In November of 1885 Smith died of peritonitis, at the age of 42. In 1885 the General Conference sent D. T. Fero to carry on the work in Idaho. He reported to the Review and Herald that on his arrival there in December he found two Sabbath schools and an inactive tract society, and that in 1886 he combined the Sabbath schools and organized a church. This was the first official Seventh-day Adventist church in Idaho. It had 13 charter members. Although they could not all drive the necessary distance to meet together every Sabbath, they felt the need of a common church home. A building at Seventh and Front streets was located and rented for Sabbath services. In 1891 the membership had grown to 32, and the need for a larger meeting place was apparent. A building at Thirteenth and State streets was purchased and remodeled into an attractive church home. A room in the building was converted into the first SDA church school in Idaho. In 1917 a beautiful building at Sixth and Main streets was purchased and remodeled. It provided space for a spacious church plus rooms for the rapidly growing school. The rooms facing Main Street were used by the Idaho Conference for its offices. In 1951 A. E. Hempel, pastor of the Boise church, took on the task of building a new church on the corner of Wilson and Irving streets.

Jan. 16, 1993, was the date of the grand opening of the new church building at 1115 N. Cloverdale Road, constructed under the leadership of Don Driver.

Other areas where the Seventh-day Adventist message was preached early include Franklin, Idaho, where in 1886 Fero reported organizing a church of 19, and Moscow, Idaho, where a church was organized in 1887. In 1890 O. A. Johnson held meetings in the Methodist church in Salmon, Idaho, which were followed 12 years later by a series of meetings held there by John and Will Holbrook. However, it was not until 1908 that a company with about 20 members was organized at Salmon. After S. H. Kime preached at Long Creek, Oregon, in 1895, a church of seven was organized the next year (moved in 1908 to Fox Valley, but in 1916 returned to the original site). Other churches were founded at Baker, Oregon (organized in 1897 with 13 charter members), where Enid Sparks, lifetime teacher and author of juvenile books, was a member; at La Grande, Oregon (1898, with 18 members); at Cambridge, Idaho (1902, with 10 members); at Parma, Idaho (1905, with 19 members).

The work in Caldwell, Idaho (organized in 1905, with eight members), was begun by O. K. Butler. This congregation, first meeting in the home of A. C. Bird, erected its first church building in 1909; its third is a modern structure serving a congregation of more than 400 members.

Organization of Conference. At a session of the Upper Columbia Conference held at College Place, Washington, on June 6, 1907, resolution 11 was voted as follows: "Whereas, experience has taught that more thorough and effective work can be done in a conference whose territorial area is small, and that much time and expense can be saved thereby in travel; and whereas, the territory of the Upper Columbia Conference is so large that it is difficult to secure proper representation at the regular conference sessions by churches remote from the place of meeting; and whereas, southern Idaho and eastern Oregon form part of the territory of the Upper Columbia Conference with a constituency sufficiently large to maintain a conference; therefore we recommend: (1) that a new conference be organized within the present territorial limits of the Upper Columbia Conference; (2) that the territory of this new conference be composed of the state of Idaho south of the parallel of 45 north latitude, and the counties Wallowa, Union, Baker, and Malheur in eastern Oregon. Your committee appointed to agree upon boundary lines for the proposed division of the conference would respectfully report that we think best to divide the conference on the lines proposed in resolution 11."

This committee was also authorized to name the time and place of a camp meeting, where this organization was perfected.

At this camp meeting, held at Weiser, Idaho, July 11—21, 1907, and presided over by G. E. Langdon, the Southern Idaho Conference was organized, a constitution was adopted, and officers were elected: W. W. Steward, president;

J. M. Willoughby, vice president; T. L. Copeland, secretary-treasurer and missionary secretary; A. C. Bird, educational superintendent; and A. D. Guthrie, field secretary. (Later, at the fifth annual session of the conference, an amendment to the constitution eliminated the office of vice president.) At a subsequent session of the North Pacific Union Conference the counties of Grant and Harney in Oregon were added to the territory of the new Southern Idaho Conference. The 15 churches voted into the new organization-eight of them in Oregon, and seven in Idaho-with their respective memberships were as follows-in Oregon: Baker (45), Cove (14), Elgin (8), Halfway (18), La Grande (26), Ontario (25), Union (55), Wallowa (14); in Idaho: Blackfoot (16), Boise (110), Caldwell (43), Cambridge (60), Meridian (13), Parma (23), Twin Falls (16). There were also eight companies with a combined membership of 68, making a total of 554 members at the time of conference organization.

A list of denominational workers who have been members of the Boise church includes Drs. W. F. and G. E. Norwood, both on the medical faculty of Loma Linda University;

L. A. Reed, former editor of the Signs of the Times; L. E. Froom, editor, preacher, and writer; the Christian family, including Hervey, John, Rolland, and Marie; Homer and George Casebeer and families; T. Lloyd Copeland; and many others. The Caldwell church has also produced an impressive list of former and present workers, among whom are Lela Simpson Perkins (Japan); Marie Simpson McNeil (South and Central America); Zoral and Elga Coberly (China); Raleigh and Edna Garner (India); Oral Garner (South America); and more recently M. Wesley and Joan Shultz (Pakistan). A member of the Caldwell church until her death was Mrs. Frank Steunenber, whose husband, the governor of Idaho, was murdered by Harry Orchard (who experienced a miracle of conversion, and whose subsequent influence, while he lived and after his death, led to the baptism of several other inmates of the state prison).

Among other churches that produced denominational workers are the following: Twin Falls, Idaho, missionaries Wilma Leazer (Indonesia) and Harold Drake (Africa); Union, Oregon (now disbanded), G. F. Wolfkill, later a college president; and John E. Weaver, well known in the field of education; Mountain Home, Idaho, W. R. Beach, who retired (1975) as General Conference vice president; Filer, Idaho (organized 1924, originally composed chiefly of persons of German extraction from North Dakota), two ministers and a teacher, from the Kurtz family; Aberdeen, Idaho, two ordained ministers and a teacher from the Cornforth family; Buhl, Idaho, an ordained minister and a sanitarium business manager from the Johnson family; Cove, Oregon, the Bell sisters, one a conference Sabbath school secretary and the other a church school teacher who once taught Reuben R. Figuhr, who later became General Conference president.

The work in the conference through the years has moved rather slowly, especially in the eastern section of Idaho, and the membership has fluctuated. The conference was reorganized in 1930 and is now known as the Idaho Conference.

Through the years there have been many expansions of the facilities of the conference. About 1951 the building housing the conference office, the Boise school, and the church was sold, and another building that was bought and remodeled now serves as the conference office. A new church was built in one area of the city and a new church school in another (since replaced by one containing four modern classrooms, a large gymnasium, a Pathfinder room, a kitchen, and a manual training room). In this same period, the conference has built seven new churches and seven new schools, and built or acquired five parsonages and three Dorcas Society centers. In 1964 the entire Gem State Adventist Academy was rebuilt on a new 300-acre (120-hectare) campus. The conference also owns a summer camp known as Idahaven, consisting of 11.3 acres (4.5 hectares), situated at Payette Lakes, McCall, Idaho.

In 1969 the conference headquarters and Adventist Book Center moved into a newly constructed office building in a prominent location on the western edge of Boise.

Ignacio Manuel Altamirano Educational Center

IGNACIO MANUEL ALTAMIRANO EDUCATIONAL CENTER (Centro Educativo Ignacio Manuel Altamirano). A secondary educational institution located on 91 Prosperidad Street, Colonia Escandón, in the Delegación Miguel Hidalgo of Mexico City. It serves the Mexican Union, and received authorization to function as an elementary school in 1963. By 1980 secondary levels had been added. The school now operates on the junior college level also.

The center has 14 classrooms in a three-level building. It is equipped with a laboratory and library, administrative offices, and assembly hall that serves as a board room and music classroom.

In 1993 classes were offered at the preelementary and kindergarten levels. The school employs a staff of 25 teachers and two secretaries. The present enrollment is 458.

Ikizu Secondary School

IKIZU SECONDARY SCHOOL. A coeducational boarding school on the high school level, operated by the Tanzania Union among the Wa-Ikizu tribe, 40 miles (62 kilometers) east of Musoma, a port on Lake Victoria. For a number of years the school conducted a teacher training program, and more recently a two-year evangelists' course. However, with the phasing out of the teacher training course, and with the ministerial course being moved to the Tanzania Adventist Seminary and College in Arusha, Ikizu became a secondary school only. In 1993 the school had a staff of 16 national teachers and an enrollment of 492.

About 1912 a mission station and primary school were established among the Ikizu tribe. At the outbreak of World War I the station was left in the hands of national teachers. Later the houses were looted by roving bands of Africans. In 1922 the station and primary school were reopened by missionaries sent out by the British Union. In 1928 Millie Morgan, a trained teacher from England, who was on the staff from 1926 to 1934, opened a teacher training course. Thus the school became known as the Ikizu Training School. Through the years many faithful African teachers have worked at the school, such as S. Magembe, and Yolam Kamwendo, who came from Nyasaland; S. Dea and R. Megera. The school has made steady progress, with periodic additions to its physical plant. Carpentry and agriculture are taught to the boys and home economics to the girls in modestly equipped laboratories. By 1965 Ikizu was a full secondary school registered with the government as a center for Cambridge (and later National) certificate examinations.

The teacher training course supplied the Seventh-day Adventist primary schools in Tanzania with a steady stream of certificated teachers, many of whom have taken further ministerial courses and are now holding responsible positions in the union. Particular attention was given to Bible teaching and practical evangelism, and every qualifying teacher received at his or her graduation teacher-evangelist credentials. Because of the government's decision to nationalize all teacher training colleges, this course was closed at the end of 1967.

History

History. The Sabbath doctrine was first proclaimed inside Illinois' borders in 1850 by Samuel W. Rhodes, 32 years after Illinois was accepted into the Union as a state. The state's population had reached approximately 55,000 by that time. Two years later Joseph Bates preached in the northwestern corner of Illinois, near the town of Galena, an area formerly the home of the Sac and Fox Indians, now settled mostly by farmers. As Bates visited this area at various times between 1852 and 1854, he met with much opposition from the "age to come" and "no law" people of the area. Bates toured northern Illinois again from Jan. 17 to Mar. 29, 1854, preaching in schoolhouses and halls, distributing books, and acting as subscription agent for the Review and Herald and Youth's Instructor. The Review carried this note: "The interest of the last message of mercy is deepening and widening all around.

Souls are embracing the Sabbath of the Lord our God, saying it is truth" (5:4, Feb. 14, 1854).

During this time Bates spent some time at Round Grove in Whiteside County, where the westward surge of the Advent movement began to focus in this northwest corner. It was fertile farmland, but also the "iron horse" (the Galena and Chicago Union Railroad) stopped there on its way to Morrison. Most of the well-known pioneers helped open the work here. Two lay farmers must be singled out, for they spent minimum time planting and maximum time sowing the seeds of truth. Elon Everts was from New Hampshire and came west to Round Grove in 1855 with his wife and daughter after witnessing the ordination of J. N. Andrews and others in his home in 1853. This family was the focus of several of Ellen White's visions while she was in Round Grove. He tried hard to pull free from worldly wealth and drew strength from his friend, Josiah Hart, who came from Northfield, Vermont, in the early spring of 1856. These two formed a tireless evangelistic duo.

Josiah Hart witnessed to Ivory Colcord, the teacher of the first school in the Genesee Grove area, in the home of William Wick. Ivory's son, G. W. Colcord, and his wife were baptized by James White there in 1858. G. W. Colcord became an educator, founding Milton Academy in Oregon, the forerunner of Walla Walla College and later opened the first school in the south at Graysville, Tennessee, the parent of Southern College. In January of 1858 Hart held meetings in Freeport, convincing two German families of the Sabbath truth. These conversions laid the groundwork for John Matheson in 1871 to open the foreign work in Illinois and Wisconsin.

Both Hart and Everts worked themselves into early graves. Hart passed away Aug. 17, 1858. Joseph Bates conducted the funeral and wrote in the Review, "We have just returned from the silent grave, leaving him beside Brother Everts" (12:16, Sept. 2, 1858).

J. N. Loughborough first came to Illinois in June 1853 after getting on a steamer at Grand Haven, Michigan, thinking it was headed for Wisconsin. By 1856 he had dropped out of the work and moved to Waukon, Iowa, where he was later revived by James and Ellen White's trip from Round Grove in the snow and across the frozen Mississippi. The horses and sleigh were driven by Josiah Hart and Elon Everts. Loughborough returned with them and began a series of meetings the next night in the Hittleston schoolhouse three miles (five kilometers) north of Round Grove.

In March 1857 at a meeting in Round Grove it was voted to purchase a tent for evangelism. Hart and Everts were on the committee, and Loughborough was the first to preach in it. On Aug. 14 it was pitched in Lyndon for 30 lectures. Earlier in the year Loughborough began the first Sabbath school and Bible class for new believers in Round Grove. Other evangelists, such as Isaac Sanborn and W. S. Ingraham, braved opposition and persecution. Both later became president of the conference, then Illinois-Wisconsin Conference.

Between 1856 and 1861 Round Grove was often the home of the Whites, who made at least six trips there to foster the work. Their Western tour brought them to Round Grove on Nov. 21, 1856. James had just published his wife's testimony to the church, no. 5, "Testimony to the Laodicean Church." On the twenty-fourth he preached on the "Seven Churches." The cry was "Be zealous and repent." It was just the needed boost to revive the work in Illinois. Several weeks later, in the midst of snowstorms, a conference was held at the Hittleston School with the Whites leading out. It was attended by John Byington, a former Methodist minister from Buck's Bridge, New York. Later he became the first General Conference president. By 1862 the railroad had moved on, as did the pioneers. (Today there are but a few buildings and gently rolling farmland silently witnessing the history-making efforts of many people.) Late in September 1868 the second camp meeting ever held by Seventh-day Adventists was convened at Clyde, Illinois.

At the request of the General Conference, Daniel Thompson went to Chicago in February 1883 and began the work of distributing literature in the rapidly growing metropolis. In that same year, as recommended by the General Conference, a mission was opened on Madison Street. It provided food and shelter for the needy and served as a training school in city mission work for young people from the college in Battle Creek, Michigan, and for others who desired experience in this type of work. Ten years later the Life Boat Mission was launched.

In 1895 Dr. J. H. Kellogg established the American Medical Missionary College on South Wabash Avenue. Fifteen years later the college was merged with the University of Illinois, but while it was under SDA auspices, about 200 physicians received their medical training. This college was a forerunner of the College of Medical Evangelists (see Loma Linda University). In 1904 Drs. David and Mary Paulson organized the Hinsdale Sanitarium and Benevolent Association, and opened a sanitarium at Hinsdale, near Chicago, the next year. The Hinsdale church was accepted into the Northern Illinois Conference on Feb. 6, 1908.

Conference Organization. On Sept. 27, 1862, at a meeting held at Avon, Wisconsin, the Illinois and Wisconsin State Conference was formed. In a division of territory in 1870 the Illinois Conference was formed (Review and Herald 36:31, July 12, 1870), which became a part of the Lake Union Conference in 1901, when the union was organized. In 1902 the state was divided between the Northern Illinois Conference, with offices in Chicago, and the Southern Illinois Conference, with offices first in Stewardson and later in Springfield. Late in 1918 there was another reorganization, and the Illinois Conference was reestablished, including the whole state except the counties of Cook, DuPage, Will, Lake, McHenry, Kane, Kendall, Grundy, and Kankakee; these were assigned to a new Chicago Conference (which included also Lake County, Indiana). However, in 1931 the entire state was reunited into one conference (in November, Lake County, Indiana, was returned to the Indiana Conference). Offices for the reorganized Illinois Conference were first on Wacker Drive in Chicago, then after May 1932 in a building in Brookfield owned by the Pacific Press, and since March 1954 in a new office building in Brookfield.

Expansion of the Work. One of the earliest Seventh-day Adventist churches in Illinois was at Aledo, in the western part of the state. Robert F. Andrews, at that time president of the Illinois Conference, held meetings there in the early part of 1871, and in the same year organized a church of 30 members. A church building was erected at a cost of $1,365 and was dedicated on Oct. 12, 1884. The first church school teacher, Elizabeth Longacre, had an enrollment of five pupils in 1896.

In the southern part of the state, in the summer of 1878, G. H. Colcord and C. H. Bliss held tent meetings in Du Quoin, and 20 persons began keeping the Sabbath. On June 14, 1879, the Du Quoin church was organized.

Several institutions operated in the area of the conference for a time. The Tri-City Sanitarium in Moline, which opened in March of 1902, won fame for pioneering the treatment of such illnesses as poliomyelitis and rheumatism. It served the area until about 1924, when it was felt that the health program could be carried on adequately at the Hinsdale Sanitarium. The Moline church was organized on Feb. 27, 1904.

In 1900 the Sheridan Industrial Academy, later known as the Fox River Academy, was established, and in 1926 the Chicago Conference Academy. For a time academies were also operated at Hinsdale and at Du Quoin. The Fox River and Chicago academies were closed in 1933 and consolidated with the school at Broadview, which at that time was an academy and junior college. In 1934 the Broadview school became an academy only, and has been the academy for Illinois since that time. The school was moved in 1958 to Lafox. Broadview College and Theological Seminary, originally the Broadview Swedish Seminary, was the forerunner of Broadview Academy. A branch of the Pacific Press Publishing Association operated at Brookfield for many years.

A work for foreign-speaking peoples in Chicago was begun early. Beginning in 1863, a young Danish Baptist preacher, John G. Matteson, who had accepted the SDA doctrines, spent some time in Illinois, preaching to Scandinavian Americans. In 1871 he organized a church among a group of Norwegian people, who built, on Erie Street, the first Seventh-day Adventist church building in Chicago. In 1890 J. M. Erickson, A. J. Stone, and Carl Norlin conducted meetings for Swedish-speaking people, and in 1892 a Swedish SDA church was organized. Work was also conducted among the Chinese. J. N. Loughborough reported at the Plano camp meeting on Aug. 23, 1894: "The Chinese work in Chicago, although conducted under difficulties, is not without interesting results. Though we are not able to point to souls who have fully identified themselves with the truth, yet there are scores who are interested in the study of the Bible and are being drawn toward the Lord and His people" (Illinois Recorder, Oct. 22, 1894).

A Chinese school was conducted each Sunday evening, with some 26 students who learned to read and write English; the more advanced studied the Bible. Having 17 teachers, the pupils received a high degree of individual attention. The German work was established in 1909 as a result of meetings held by Henry Schulz. Rosario Calderone opened the work among the Italians of Chicago in 1912. One of the first two converts was Anthony Catalano, who later became the pastor of the Italian church and worked with his people for 50 years. At present the Chicago area has numerous foreign-language churches.

In 1983 the Hinsdale Filipino-American church was formed, and their new sanctuary was dedicated in 1991. For the past 10 years the Hispanic work has grown to where the Hispanic population is now 17 percent of the total Illinois Conference membership.

The first Hungarian congregation in the Greater Chicago area was organized in the fall of 1918 to proclaim the everlasting gospel and the three angels' messages to the Hungarian population. The Korean church now includes six congregations. Work continues among the Polish people, and the Romanian church, as well, is growing significantly. The work among Yugoslavians has grown, and they dedicated their new facility in 1991.

The first Black SDA church in the Chicago area was opened in 1910 with the help of a special offering given by the churches of the Lake Union Conference. In 1944 the Black constituency of the Lake Union organized its own conference, the Lake Region Conference, which began to function Jan. 1, 1945.

Recent Developments. The Illinois Conference has recently reported progress in several areas. Whereas in 1910 the largest total of Ingathering solicited by one person was $47, for years the Illinois Conference has averaged $25 or more per capita for the entire conference membership. This increase has been attributed in part to the extensive welfare program carried on by the conference.

The now worldwide group organizations of local Dorcas societies began in Illinois, with the Dorcas Federation idea being initiated and developed by Mrs. Herman Kleist, with the cooperation of E. R. Potter and C. S. Joyce, conference and union home missionary secretaries. The first Dorcas Federation was organized officially at a meeting in the Chicago South Side church, and the first regular meeting was held in April 1934 in the Hinsdale church. In June 1935 the federation was accepted as part of the conference program.

From 1958 to 1986 Little Grassy Lake Camp, in southern Illinois, near Carbondale, has provided a delightful and rugged atmosphere for junior camps, teenage camps, senior camps, and family camps. Prior to that, from 1931 junior camps were held at various rented areas, then at Camp Reynoldswood, at Dixon, for several years.

Immortality

IMMORTALITY. The state or quality of not being subject to death; from the Gr. athanasia, “deathlessness,” and aphtharsia, “incorruptibility.” Seventh-day Adventists believe that human beings are mortal, that is, that they are subject to death, and that death is a state of complete unconsciousness (see Death). “Immortality” occurs five times in the KJV and the RSV. “Immortal” (Gr. aphthartos) occurs once in the KJV and twice in the RSV. The Scriptures ascribe immortality to God alone (1 Tim. 6:16). He alone is declared to be immortal (Rom. 1:23, RSV; 1 Tim. 1:17). The Christian seeks immortality (Rom. 2:7), which Christ brought to light “through the gospel” (2 Tim. 1:10), and which the believer is to “put on” at the “last trump” (1 Cor. 15:52–54). The Scriptures nowhere describe immortality as a quality or state that a man or woman—or his or her “soul” or “spirit”—possesses inherently. The terms usually rendered “soul” and “spirit” (Heb. nephesh and rûach; Gr. psuchē and pneuma) in the Bible occur more than 1,600 times, but never in association with the words “immortal” or “immortality.”

The doctrine that immortality is dependent upon acceptance of salvation by faith in Christ is called conditional immortality, and the belief in that doctrine is sometimes called “conditionalism.” Many Christians throughout the centuries have held this view (see SB, Nos. 850—856).

The idea that a person has an immortal soul, or spirit, was introduced into the Christian church by pagan philosophy, especially Platonic philosophy. As Greek philosophy infiltrated the early church, belief in the immortality of the soul became the prevailing view in Christendom and continues to be the predominant view today.

The vast majority of the followers of William Miller held the common belief that man by nature has an immortal soul. However, through the influence of George Storrs, a prominent Millerite preacher, a significant minority accepted conditionalism along with the belief that a person is unconscious between death and the resurrection, and these beliefs became a prominent feature of the SDA bodies after 1844. Many of them reasoned that if human beings went to their reward at death, there would be no need for a second coming, a resurrection, or a final judgment. See Death; Eternal Life.

India

INDIA. A federal republic in southeastern Asia situated on the Indian peninsula. It is bordered by Pakistan on the west, China, Nepal, and Bhutan on the north, and Myanmar on the east. Its eastern part surrounds Bangladesh on three sides. India is the world's second most populous country, with a population (1994) of about 920 million. In area, 1.2 million square miles (3.2 million square kilometers), it is the seventh-largest country in the world and is about one third of the area of the 50 states of the United States.

India is divided topographically into three regions. Along its northern border are the Himalayan Mountains, the highest in the world; immediately south of them lies the great plain formed by the valleys of the Indus, the Ganges, and the Brahmaputra rivers; and to the south of this plain lies the great Indian peninsula, a low plateau surrounded by coastal mountain ranges. The climate of India is characterized by extremes. For the greater part of India there are only three seasons: a cool winter, from October to February; an intensely hot season, from March to June; a rainy season, from June to September. There are also dry and wet parts of the country: while the arid desert of Rajasthan in the west may have only a trace of precipitation, totaling less than five inches (13 centimeters) in a year, at Cherrapunji, in Assam (the easternmost state), the average rainfall is more than 35 feet (11 meters) a year. The northern areas have frost in the winter, but the temperature there may reach 120F (48C) of heat in the summer, when high humidity is also prevalent throughout most of the country.

The ethnic composition of the people is extremely complex and is reflected in the many languages of the country. There are many national scripts in India, and some languages can be written in two or three different scripts. At the present time English is widely used for official and business purposes.

Historical Background

Historical Background. India, one of the world's oldest inhabited countries, had a well-advanced civilization at the time the better-known Sumerian and Egyptian societies flourished. It is uncertain who were the earliest inhabitants of India or whence they came. Dravidians occupied the peninsula of India before the earliest recorded invasions of the Aryan people.

It seems fairly certain that when the Indo-Aryans penetrated the valleys along the Indus and Ganges, the Deccan Plateau was not affected by their movements. The Dravidians there developed their distinct form of civilization.

The time of the Aryan invasion is not known but is thought to have been about the middle of the second millennium B.C. The first accurate historical date in the history of India is the invasion of Alexander the Great in 327—326 B.C. There followed other invasions by fair-skinned people. From the eighth century A.D. and continuing to the sixteenth century, Muslims invaded the land. Afghans, Persians, Turks, and Mongols also penetrated into the plains of Hindustan. The Mongol invaders of the sixteenth century established a powerful Mogul empire under their ruler Akbar, a contemporary of Queen Elizabeth I. Akbar tried to create a united India, even attempting to unite the two great religions of Hinduism and Islam.

In 1498 Vasco de Gama, a Portuguese navigator, reached the southwestern coast of India. During the next 200 years all great European powers struggled for the trade of India, until in the mid-nineteenth century Britain had assumed control of most of the area. After World War II the independence movement reached its peak and the British withdrew in 1947, leaving behind them two new states: India (largely Hindu) and Pakistan (largely Muslim). In 1962 India incorporated Goa, Daman, and Diu, former Portuguese possessions on the western side of the Indian peninsula.

Religions of India. Religion has played an important role in the formation of Indian culture and today still controls every activity of the people. About 740 million of the population are Hindus. Hinduism, a religious philosophy resulting from the amalgamation of concepts held by the Indo-Aryan invaders and the Dravidians, dates from the sixth or seventh century B.C. The sacred books of the Hindus, the Vedas, were produced more than 1,000 years before Christ. The most prominent characteristics of this philosophy are (1) the doctrine of transmigration of souls, (2) division of people into castes (Brahmans-scholars and priests; Kshatriyas-warriors and rulers; Vaisyas-traders and artisans; and Sudras-farmers and laborers; and below these the outcastes, "the untouchables," who performed the most menial tasks), and (3) the obligation of all to do their duty in the state in which they were born. These doctrines account largely for the inherent religious conservatism in India and the reluctance to accept new teachings.

Other religious groups represented in India are Muslims, of whom there are about 100 million; Sikhs, a group holding a reformed Hinduistic philosophy, numbering about 20 million adherents; Jains, with about 3.5 million followers; Buddhists, whose religion began in India six centuries B.C., now numbering 5 million; Zoroastrians, about 120,000; and Christians, about 20 million adherents, three quarters of whom are Roman Catholic.

Early Christian Missions. There is a tradition that the apostle Thomas preached the gospel to the peoples of India and established the Nestorian Christian church in the south. There is historical evidence that national Christians existed in India since the fourth century. Upon the arrival of the Portuguese in the sixteenth century, the Roman Catholic missionaries began work in southern India. In the seventeenth century the Danes acquired Tranquebar as a trading post in southern India, and there the first Protestant missionaries went soon after. Some years later, in 1706, two missionaries from Germany, named Ziegenbalg and Plutschau, landed at Tranquebar, and having mastered the Tamil language in spite of many difficulties, they established schools and preached in the villages. Before Ziegenbalg died in 1719 he translated into Tamil the whole of the New Testament and the Old Testament up to the book of Ruth. It seems that this was the first translation of any Scriptures into an Indian language.

During the eighteenth century the great figure in missionary history of South India was Christian Frederick Schwartz. He lived among the people, going from village to village, preaching to all classes. He went to the Hindu temple cities of Trichinopoly, Madurai, and Tinnevely with the gospel, and as a result of his work they became strongholds of Christianity.

William Carey, born in England in 1761, did for the north of India what Schwartz had done for the south in the cause of missionary endeavor.

In 1793 Carey and a physician named Thomas were appointed to India as missionaries of the "Baptist Society for Propagating the Gospel Among the Heathen." Since at that time the East India Company, which controlled India, did not favor missionary activities, Carey eventually settled in Serampore, a Danish possession, and began work.

During the next 34 years Carey and his colleagues translated or published the Scriptures in 40 languages and dialects. They also established a printing house so that the printed page could reach the many parts of India that were not accessible to direct missionary activity. After an 1833 act of Parliament opened all British India to missionaries of any nationality, the Protestant missionary endeavors in India began on a large scale. By 1900 there were at work in various parts of India 73 denominations or missionary societies, with a combined Protestant membership of nearly 1 million. In the twentieth century several Protestant denominations (Anglican, Methodist, Presbyterian, Dutch Reformed, and Congregationalist) joined together to form the Church of South India.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. First Contacts, 1890—1895. It is not known precisely when SDA teachings were first introduced into India, or when evangelism began. It is known that in 1890 S. N. Haskell and P. T. Magan crossed India from Calcutta to Bombay on their mission survey journey around the world. Traditionally the beginning of Seventh-day Adventist work in India has been dated from 1893, when William Lenker and A. T. Stroup (or Strop, as Lenker refers to him in his accounts), two colporteurs from America, landed in Madras and began canvassing for SDA subscription books among the English-speaking inhabitants of the major cities of India, traveling the length and breadth of the country in the course of two succeeding years. However, in his first report, written on his way to India, Lenker stated that “while in London, my heart was made to rejoice to learn that the truth has gone before to India, and that good work has begun with encouraging omens” (Review and Herald 70:686, Oct. 31, 1893). A year later he reported in the Review and Herald that “shortly before our arrival at Madras [November 1893], sister Anna P. Gordon, who had been in Bombay for nearly a year,” died. He identified her in his communication as a “faithful worker” and a teacher of Seventh-day Adventist doctrines in India (72:5, Jan. 1, 1895).

If she was the “Miss G” to whom D. A. Robinson referred, writing from London (ibid. 70:5, Jan. 3, 1893), she had begun to observe the Sabbath in London in 1892 through contact with SDAs while she was en route from the United States to India to work in that country as a self-supporting missionary.

In the same report Lenker mentioned that in the autumn of 1894 there were five workers in India, presumably colporteurs (one each at Madras, Mysore, and Hyderabad, and two at Calcutta), three of whom came from Australia. In his Origin and Progress of Seventh-day Adventists (p. 517) M. E. Olsen mentions only two from Australia, a retired British India Army captain by the name of Masters, who returned with his wife to India after they had become SDAs. However, in her recollections, Georgia Burrus Burgess identified them as coming from New Zealand (Eastern Tidings 36:2, May 8, 1941).

The early colporteur work met with outstanding success, the people welcoming SDA publications and at times buying duplicate copies and also volunteering to sell to their friends. Lenker reported that his first year’s sales amounted to $4,000, and that other colporteurs had met with similar success. Very early the people asked that the books be translated into the local languages, one man volunteering to translate them into Tamil (Review and Herald 71:84, Feb. 6, 1894). A pamphlet containing Bible readings on the life of Christ, prepared by S. N. Haskell, was translated and published by an independent Protestant mission at Poona in 1894 (ibid. 72:5, Jan. 1, 1895).

In an article entitled “A Comprehensive Survey of the Early Work [in India],” L. G. Mookerjee, writing in 1941, mentions another early development: “We are told that before any Seventh-day Adventist work was opened in India, Dr. J. H. Kellogg of Battle Creek, Michigan, U.S.A., was supporting a Bengali Christian, B. N. Mitter by name, who was connected with the American Baptist Mission. When D. A. Robinson came to India, arrangements were made, and the Seventh-day Adventist Mission took over B. N. Mitter and family in their work at the orphanage in Calcutta” (Eastern Tidings 36:7, May 8, 1941).

Opening the Mission. The first regular SDA worker to reach India under appointment by the Mission Board was Georgia Burrus (later Georgia Burgess), a young Bible instructor from California, who arrived in Calcutta on Jan. 23, 1895.

It had been planned that she would accompany D. A. Robinson, the leader of the projected mission to India, but when he was delayed in England, Georgia Burrus proceeded alone, aiming to work as a self-supporting worker until the regular mission could be established, the Mission Board paying only her fare. Captain Masters and his wife met her at the dock and helped her establish herself in a strange land.

Georgia Burrus found lodgings during her first year in Calcutta at the YWCA home, where her vegetarian diet called forth much favorable comment and brought her a reduction in the charge made for meals. Engrossed in the study of the Bengali language, she found little time to work for her support, and consequently was soon short of funds. On learning this, her teacher volunteered to continue instructing her without a fee, but at that time she received a letter from someone in Africa whom she did not even know, promising her financial support for one year.

On Nov. 8, 1895, Dores A. Robinson and another Bible instructor, Martha May Taylor, arrived in Calcutta, and opened a regular Seventh-day Adventist mission in a house on Bow Bazar Street, rented and prepared for them by Georgia Burrus.

In March 1896 a school for Hindu girls was opened on the first floor of the mission house under the supervision of Georgia Burrus and May Taylor, with a well-educated Bengali woman as a teacher. The schoolwork helped the young women to master the language and provided the opportunity to visit the homes of the students, where they could teach Christianity to the women secluded in the zenanas (women's quarters) of large families. It was while visiting the zenanas in the neighborhood of the school that Georgia Burrus met Nanibala Biswas, who later became the first Seventh-day Adventist convert from Hinduism and adopted Burrus as her last name, after the one who acquainted her with Christianity.

Then about the beginning of December 1896 Robinson began conducting regular Sunday night meetings in the mission hall on the topic "The Christianity of Jesus Christ: What It Is and What It Is Not," and held several temperance meetings as well. From the beginning the meetings were intended for the English-speaking Indians rather than for the Europeans, though both groups were present. As the meetings progressed the attendance increased. When the mission house was closed for repairs after an earthquake, a theater was secured, and from July through the next winter the meetings were held there, the audience contributing enough to cover the expenses.

Also in 1896 SDA publishing work began in India in Calcutta. In that year the International Tract Society, which gave its address as 154 Bow Bazar Street, issued the first brochure of the International Series, a four-page tract entitled "Can All Be Saved?" Later in that year, an article by Ellen White, "The Coming of Christ," was published as a tract in the Bengali language. The printing on these first publishing ventures was done by the commercial presses in Calcutta. The publishing work was aided by the local converts. One of them, A. C. Mookerjee, translated and printed SDA tracts into Bengali at his own expense.

In 1896 three nurses-Samantha Whiteis, Margaret Green, and G. P. Edwards-with Edwards' wife arrived. A month later O. G. Place, M.D., came and opened treatment rooms for the middle-class Hindus on the first floor of the mission house. Soon he also had a number of Indian young men and women in training as assistants and nurses. Meanwhile, as the schoolwork expanded, a second school was opened (Mar. 3) at the request of parents in the neighborhood, taught by Kheroda Bose, a young Christian widow recommended by Baptist missionaries. Shortly afterward she became the first Indian convert. In the spring the schools had about 70 students, but in the autumn, about 200 girl pupils, ranging in age from almost babyhood to about 10 years, the age when girls customarily left the school to be married.

In July of that year an orphanage called the Home for Destitute Indian Children was opened with about 30 youngsters, most of them boys, in a house adjoining the mission compound on Bow Bazar Street.

Soon several European and Indian families joined the Seventh-day Adventists, among them the Belchambers, the Meyers, and the Mookerjees, according to an account given by L. G. Mookerjee (Eastern Tidings 36:7, May 8, 1941). These various accessions occurred in 1896, although the first mention of these converts in the Review and Herald appeared only some two years later, in May 1898 (75:334, May 24, 1898), by which time Robinson could report four European families and four or five Bengali families among the new members.

In mid-March of 1898 William A. Spicer, who had been connected with the publishing work in England for a few years, arrived at Calcutta. Almost immediately he set out to establish and edit the Oriental Watchman, an evangelistic magazine of the Indian Mission. The first issue of 1,500 copies, published in May, was distributed free. Soon colporteurs from overseas arrived to sell it, notably Ellery Robinson from England (Eastern Tidings 36:4, May 8, 1941), who worked in Bengal and Bombay; R. W. Yeoman, who worked in southern India and on Ceylon; I. D. Richardson, who went into the northwest and into Kashmir; W. W. Quantock, who traveled through East Bengal and the Central Provinces; and Herbert B. Meyers, a recent convert, who took the magazine to Burma and the Malay States. Their work swelled its paid circulation to 4,000 copies monthly (at an annual subscription rate of Rs. 1-8-0).

About the time that Spicer arrived (he recalled later), the mission published tracts in English, Bengali, and Hindi, which they distributed with the help of coolies who went to different sections of the town, leaving at every home the tracts in appropriate languages with a small handwritten note, "I think these will interest you." Among the large books sold by the colporteurs in the early days were The Great Controversy, The Desire of Ages, and Patriarchs and Prophets, by Ellen White; Daniel and the Revelation, by Uriah Smith; From Eden to Eden, by J. H. Waggoner; Prophetic Lights, by E. J. Waggoner; and Home Handbook of Domestic Hygiene, Man the Masterpiece, and Ladies' Guide, by Dr. J. H. Kellogg.

Entering New Areas. During late 1898 or early 1899 the first SDA mission station in the Indian countryside was opened at Karmatar, about 170 miles (270 kilometers) northwest of Calcutta. The work began as a medical dispensary, but in the winter of 1899—1900 the orphanage was moved to a farm at Karmatar and was renamed the Orphanage Industrial School. In charge of the school were D. A. Robinson and F. W. Brown, the latter a former missionary of another denomination, who arrived in 1899.

During the summer of 1899 Robinson held a series of evangelistic meetings in a town hall at Darjeeling, then the site of the government offices during summer months, situated in the foothills of the Himalayas north of Calcutta. In the autumn of that year reports came from northwest India that Sabbathkeepers had sprung up there as the result of the work of colporteurs.

When an epidemic of smallpox broke out among the children soon after the transfer of the orphanage, SDA work in India suffered its first casualties in the deaths of Robinson and Brown. Thereafter the medical work at Karmatar was discontinued, and instead the workers were concentrated at Calcutta, where a sanitarium was developing.

In 1899 the first church school for the English-speaking children was opened in the mission building at Calcutta under the supervision of May Taylor and Mrs. Brown; however, it appears that the school functioned only one year and then was discontinued for a while.

Expansion of the Work. Between 1900 and 1910 the Seventh-day Adventist work spread throughout India, developing in the east, reaching the west, becoming established in the south, and extending to the northwest, where the headquarters were established to bring them nearer to new fields. After the death of Robinson, the leadership of the work fell to Spicer, the only ordained Seventh-day Adventist minister in India. In 1901 Spicer was recalled to the General Conference and was succeeded by J. L. Shaw, former president of the Claremont Union College, in South Africa. Soon after his arrival he reported the organization of the first Seventh-day Adventist church in India, at Calcutta.

Throughout the decade the number of workers increased. New mission stations were opened, new medical enterprises were begun, the educational structure was strengthened, the foundations for many of the present institutions were laid, and the number of SDA publications was enlarged. In 1902 the workers in India, who had come from different backgrounds and had had little opportunity for association with one another since their arrival, gathered for their first training and refresher institute at Calcutta in order to exchange experiences and to strengthen the evangelistic work. The proportion of women medical and colporteur workers during that early decade in India was perhaps greater than that in any other Seventh-day Adventist mission field. The names of Georgia Burrus (later Mrs. Burgess), Anna Orr, Anna Knight (a Black American teacher, colporteur, and nurse), Thekla Black, Grace Kellogg, and some others recur again and again in the missionary accounts from India. Interest in the work in India was demonstrated also by the women of the Southwestern Union Conference in America, who endeavored to create a fund for the support of zenana workers.

In 1904 the first general meeting of workers in Southern Asia was held at Calcutta. At that time there were 130 SDAs in the area. At first the work was conducted in English and Bengali, but by 1907 the Hindi, Santali, Urdu, and Tamil languages had been added. In 1909 there were 230 SDAs in the territory of the Indian Mission (including Ceylon).

The young people's work also received attention, and in 1909 the MV Standard of Attainment course in Bible doctrines and denominational history was introduced to the Young People's Societies.

New Missions: East. In 1900 the second SDA station in India was opened at Simultala, some 30 or 40 miles (48 or 64 kilometers) west of Karmatar, where W. A. Barlow, a former missionary for another Protestant body who became an SDA in 1900, opened an industrial school for the Santali people. At first Barlow assumed financial responsibility for the work there, but in 1903 the station became a part of the regular mission program of the church. In 1904 the first three Santali converts were baptized. In 1905 Barlow sent one of his students to teach in a school at Babumohal, a village some distance away where Barlow built a chapel and a school building.

In 1902 an attempt was made to establish a station at Chandernagore, some 30 miles (50 kilometers) north of Calcutta. A clinic was opened; however, after a short time the supervising nurse was moved elsewhere. In 1909 the first meeting of the Bengali church members was held at Gopalganj, now in Bangladesh, which had been opened in 1906 by L. G. Mookerjee.

New Missions: West. According to L. G. Mookerjee (Eastern Tidings 36:8, Sept. 1, 1941), among the early resident SDA workers in western India were a physician, Lucinda Marsh, who practiced at Bombay in 1906 (the available records do not relate what was the result of her work), and C. A. Hansen, who began preaching in Bombay in 1905, but who was forced to leave India the next year because of ill health. About two years later, in 1908, George F. Enoch came to the area. Mookerjee related that after learning the Marathi language Enoch selected Panvel, near Kalyan, to the northeast of Bombay, as the site of his station. There in 1911 he operated a girls' school with 43 students, half of them from Jewish homes. At the same time he translated tracts into the local language, and in 1910 translated Steps to Christ, by Ellen White, into Marathi. In 1913 he published a “fairly large” book of Bible readings.

In 1911, when other workers joined Enoch in West India, a Sabbath school was conducted at Lonavla (Lonauli), some 35 miles (60 kilometers) northwest of Poona.

New Missions: South. Seventh-day Adventist work in the south of India began after certain Sabbathkeeping Tamil merchants, who had met an SDA evangelist in Colombo, Ceylon, in 1904, invited SDA ministers to visit them. In 1906 J. S. James was assigned to that field and in 1907 went to Bangalore to study the language. In December 1907 Shaw, Enoch, and James went to the Tinnevely (Tirunelveli) district, near the southern tip of India on their first visit to the Tamil Sabbathkeepers. While the missionaries were there, the leaders of this Sabbathkeeping community asked the church to open a school and a mission among them. James settled there in March 1908, living for a while in a schoolhouse in the middle of the village.

In order to help the many sick in that area James and his wife opened a dispensary on the veranda of their house. During their first year an epidemic of cholera broke out, and the missionaries spent most of their time working for the sick. In 1908 Belle Shryock, a nurse, joined the workers. On two acres (.8 hectare) of land outside the village, given by the people, a brick-and-mortar residence was erected in 1909, the first mission bungalow built in India with SDA mission funds.

From the beginning of the work in the south, a number of national young people were trained to help the missionaries in medical, educational, and evangelistic work. One of these, E. D. Thomas, a well-educated youth whose father was connected with the Church of England training school at the nearby village of Nazareth, became James’s helper and interpreter. On Apr. 2, 1910, James baptized the first converts from this area, 14 men and 6 women, Thomas among them. From then on the work continued to grow rapidly.

New Missions: Northwest. In the second half of the first decade of the twentieth century, SDA work extended into the northwestern areas of the country. In 1906 L. J. Burgess and his wife (the former Georgia Burrus) pioneered evangelistic work in the Hindi language in Almora, a town northeast of Delhi, not far from the Nepal border, and near Naini Tal, the summer center of many Protestant missions, where evangelistic work in English had been conducted by Brown some years previously. There they translated Seventh-day Adventist tracts into Hindi and Urdu. The next year they moved to Dehra Dun, farther to the northwest, and three years later, in 1910, opened an industrial school for Garwahli youth in that vicinity. S. N. Haskell told the readers of the Review and Herald that the Burgesses chose to conduct their pioneering work without charge to the Indian mission budget, and financed their expenditures by the sale of subscriptions to the Bible Training School magazine while on furlough in America.

In 1907 a property was purchased in Mussoorie, in the foothills of the Himalayas above Dehra Dun, about 120 miles (192 kilometers) north of Delhi, for a school (see Vincent Hill School), a sanitarium, and a place where the workers could go for a rest from the hot and humid climate of coastal cities and the torrid heat of the interior. Late in 1907 the work of the Calcutta Sanitarium was transferred there.

In 1909 Lucknow became the site of the printing house and of the mission headquarters, and early in 1909 the first organized Hindustani SDA church in the mission was established there.

Medical Work, 1900—1910. Medical work continued to develop throughout the decade. In 1900 the treatment rooms in Calcutta, operated for some time on Wellesley Street by Drs. R. S. and Olive Ingersoll, were moved to a larger place at 51 Park Street, and there came to be called the Medical and Surgical Sanitarium. In the next year the institution was moved to still larger quarters at 50 Park Street, and there became known as the Calcutta Sanitarium. The vacated quarters were occupied by the newly established Sanitarium Health Food Company, which continued the preparation of health foods begun in a small way by D. A. Robinson early in the history of the medical work in India. In 1901 the Karmatar dispensary, which had suspended operations after Brown's death, was reopened with May Quantock (the former May Taylor) in charge. She was succeeded by Thekla Black. Dr. R. S. Ingersoll came twice a month to take care of the more complicated cases. In 1902 a medical station was opened at Chandernagore, some 30 miles (50 kilometers) north of Calcutta, where Samantha Whiteis and Grace Kellogg, a newly arrived worker, administered simple treatments.

In January 1903 the Calcutta Sanitarium became self-supporting. At that time it was reported that a nursing class was being taught. In 1907 the Calcutta Sanitarium was reduced to treatment rooms, and the main medical work in India shifted to the more healthful climate of Mussoorie, where Dr. H. C. Menkel opened the Mussoorie Sanitarium in 1908 and operated it until 1910. In 1906 Dr. Lucinda Marsh conducted medical work in the city of Bombay, but she became ill after a few months and left the area. In 1908 treatment rooms were opened in Lucknow.

As a rule medical work was conducted at all Seventh-day Adventist missions and even where the missionaries were not medically trained. The demand for medical assistance was so great that simple treatments were given everywhere.

Educational Work, 1900—1910. Seventh-day Adventist education in India during the first decade of the twentieth century expanded from one school at Karmatar, the Orphanage Industrial School, to at least five in various areas of the country. In 1900 Barlow opened a school at Simultala, where about a score of Santali young men were trained in various trades and in better methods of farming as well as in evangelistic and teaching methods. In 1902 a boarding school was opened for the English-speaking students at Karmatar, under the supervision of Thekla Black. Anna Orr was the teacher of the first group of 12 students. It appears from the records that it was an elementary school and that after two or three years it was moved to Calcutta, where it met for a time in the home of one of the workers. There does not seem to be any mention of this school between 1905 and 1910. The 1905 Statistical Report lists one elementary and one intermediate school in the India Mission, with a total enrollment of 25. In 1904 one of the first Santali converts, a young man trained in Barlow's school, went to teach at the newly established Babumohal mission school some distance from the Simultala mission.

The beginning of schoolwork in southern India dates from 1909, when according to the Outline of Mission Fields (page 119), a school, staffed at first with non-Adventist teachers, was opened under the supervision of James at Nazareth near the community of Sabbathkeeping Tamil Christians.

In 1910 an industrial school was opened by L. J. Burgess and his wife in the vicinity of Dehra Dun, in northern India. This was listed in the Yearbook until 1926, first under the name of Garhwal Industrial School, and later as “Open View” Mission School.

Publishing Work, 1900—1910. SDAs began their publishing work almost as soon as the mission was established. For a number of years they conducted it under the name International Tract Society. The first printing press owned by the church in India was set up in 1903, when the Watchman Press was established at 38 Free School Street in Calcutta. Its largest project was to print the Oriental Watchman, the circulation of which reached 5,000 copies a month in 1902. At the first general meeting of workers held at Calcutta in December 1904 it was decided to move the printshop to Karmatar, where it remained until 1909, when it was moved to Lucknow in northern India.

After the press was established, the quantity of literature available for the Indian readers steadily increased. In 1901 the Mission Board reported nine tracts available in the national languages of India. Many of these were translated by the converts and printed at their own expense. In 1903 Barlow reported that the new mission press had printed 2,000 copies each of the three tracts that he had translated into Santali, and that three more were ready for the press. Sometime in 1904 an Indian in the southern part of the country translated SDA tracts and articles from the Oriental Watchman into Kanarese and had them printed at his own expense, without having met an SDA. In 1902 the English language health magazine printed in England (whether there was a special Indian edition is not quite certain) was introduced and its circulation grew rapidly among the vegetarian Hindus, who welcomed it and were intrigued by the health principles that it advocated. In 1904 the Review and Herald reported that Steps to Christ, by Ellen White, was available in Bengali. In 1910 Dr. Menkel founded the Herald of Health.

The church organ Eastern Tidings (now Southern Asia Tidings) was founded in 1902. At first it was mimeographed, but after 1903 it was printed. In 1909 the first SDA evangelistic magazine in an Indian language, Yuga Lakshan, in Bengali, was founded at Calcutta, with L. G. Mookerjee as editor.

Organization of the India Union Mission and Subsequent Growth. Until 1909 the work in India, Pakistan, Burma, and Ceylon was administered directly as a detached mission by the General Conference. Then for a brief period, it was administered by the Asiatic Division, but by 1910, when the work had spread throughout these countries, it was thought best to decentralize the administration. In a reorganization the Indian work was divided into four missions: the Bengali Mission, comprising the Bengali, Oriya, Santali, and Assamese language areas; the North India Mission, comprising the Hindi (Hindustani, Bihari, Rajasthani, Punjabi, and Sindhi) language areas; the South India Mission, comprising the Tamil, Telegu, Kanarese, Malayalam, and Singhalese language areas and the Western India Mission, comprising the Marathi and Gujarati language areas. These, together with the Burma Mission and Ceylon (then a part of the South India Mission), were formed into the India Union Mission. J. L. Shaw, superintendent of the work in India since 1901, became the first union superintendent.

After the reorganization the work advanced in ever-increasing tempo. In 1914 the total number of SDAs in the India Union Mission was about 450. Five years later, in 1919, when the India Union Mission (which between 1915 and 1918 had been a part of the Asiatic Division) was reorganized into the Southern Asia Division, there were 978 members.

Progress in South India. Progress was especially rapid in the south, where Christianity had made its greatest impact, and where consequently, the people were better prepared to accept the SDA doctrine. A number of strong national workers developed there. For example, after a Tamil language magazine, whose title is translated “Present Truth,” began publication in 1912, a group of nine Tamil colporteurs was trained and sent out to present SDA publications to their fellow citizens. One of them, Suvisasha Muthu, pioneered in what is now the state of Kerala. An entire village where he had worked was later converted and a church was established there; thereupon the village changed its name to Adventpuram, “the place of Adventists,” and later became the center for the work in that area. In the spring of 1917 the first national Seventh-day Adventist minister in India, E. D. Thomas, who had worked with James and Lowry from the beginning in southern India, was ordained.

To help train men several schools were established in the course of years. In 1915 Gentry G. Lowry established a high school at Coimbatore for the Tamil young people, which, after several changes in location, developed into Spicer Memorial College and Lowry Memorial High School. A school at Narsapur, on the east coast of southern India on the Godavari River delta, was opened in 1921 by

T. R. Flaiz. Five or six years later H. G. Woodward (a former worker for another denomination who had joined the SDAs in India) opened the Malayalam mission in south-western India, a school was opened at Kottarakara in 1925. In the same year the Tamil school at Prakasapuram offered high school courses for the first time. Besides, there were many village elementary schools staffed by national teachers.

Also in 1925 two hospitals were established in South India: one at Nuzvid, Andhra Pradesh, near Vijayawada, in the delta of the Krishna River (see Giffard Memorial Hospital), and another at Narsapur. In the early 1930s a third hospital was opened at Bobbili, southwestern Orissa, about 60 miles (96 kilometers) north of Vishakhapatnam in Andhra Pradesh, near the eastern coast. After World War II only the Giffard Memorial Hospital was still in operation, but later, about 1950, a clinic was conducted for several years at the city of Tiruchirappalli (Trichinopoli) on the Coleroon River (called Nalwazhi Clinic).

In 1940 the church members in southern India received their own church organ, the Southern India Observer. In 1948 Marga Darsi (“Pathfinder”), a health journal in the Telegu language, was founded, and in 1950 another health journal, Kerala Deepam (“Light of Kerala”), was begun in the Malayalam language.

In 1941 the predecessor of the Bangalore Seventh-day Adventist High School was founded, and in 1953 the E. D. Thomas Memorial High School was formed out of the high school division of the James Boarding School and established on its own campus at Kudikadu, near Thanjavur. The growth of the educational work was shown in the enrollment figures of the schools appearing in the Statistical Report. The 1925 Report listed a total of 30 schools in the South India Union Mission, with an enrollment of 819. Five years later, in 1930, there were 25 schools, with 1,033 students. Ten years later, in 1935, there were 24 schools, with 900 students. In 1940 there were 24 schools, with 1,063 students; in 1950 there were 29 elementary schools, with an enrollment of 1,111, and four secondary schools, with a total of 370 students; in 1963 there were 33 elementary schools, with 998 pupils, and seven secondary schools, with 1,199 students. In 1970 there were 22 elementary schools, with 4,331 students, and five secondary schools, with 729 students; in 1981 there were 88 elementary schools, with 30,318 students, and five secondary schools, with 1,367 students; and in 1992 there were 129 elementary schools, with 59,158 students, and six secondary schools, with 3,474 students.

Church membership in South India also grew. In 1911 the total for the South India Union was 124. At the end of 1931 the membership was 1,408. Another 20 years later it was 5,207; in 1974 it was 31,578; and in 1992 it was 80,484.

Progress in Western India. After the organization of the India Union more workers arrived to develop the work in western India. Among them were M. D. Wood, a former missionary for another denomination, who opened a school at Kalyan, near Bombay, while his wife, a medical missionary, operated a dispensary there, beginning about 1912. She also taught nursing at the Marathi Training School for Nurses (which was established about 1915 at Kalyan but apparently closed shortly afterward). In the same year G. W. Pettit came to conduct evangelism among the English-speaking people in Bombay, assisted the next year by F. H. Loasby. In 1914 a church was organized in Bombay. In 1915 Roland E. Loasby began village evangelism in the vicinity of Lasalgaon, a town 150 miles (240 kilometers) northeast of Bombay. In 1921 the Kalyan school, relocated at Lasalgaon, became a training institution for the Western India Union.

Also in 1921 the headquarters of the Southern Asia Division were moved to the Salisbury Park compound (named in memory of H. R. Salisbury, second superintendent of the India Union, who lost his life while returning to India during World War I) in Poona, Maharashtra, a city in the hills about 75 miles (120 kilometers) southeast of Bombay. Three years later, in 1924, the Oriental Watchman Publishing House was moved there also.

In 1936 medical work was begun in Surat, a city near the western coast, 160 miles (260 kilometers) north of Bombay, by George A. Nelson. He opened a small clinic which later, in 1942, by popular request and with financial assistance from local sources, became the Surat Hospital.

In the course of World War II the college section of the Spicer Junior College was moved from Bangalore to its present campus at Kirkee, near Poona (see Spicer Memorial College). The progress of educational work in western India is shown by the figures that appeared in the Statistical Report. In 1911, a year after the organization of the India Union, western India had two church schools with 68 pupils; by 1936 there were seven church schools, with an enrollment of 134; in 1963 there were 16 elementary schools, with 486 students, two secondary schools, with 177 students, and one senior college, with 291 students; and in 1970 there were 13 elementary schools, with 1,095 students, one secondary school, with 300 students, and one senior college, with 769 students.

Church membership in the area, which in 1911 was 20, was 517 in 1936, 1,843 in 1963, and 3,074 in 1970. In 1955 the union paper, Gateway Messenger, the organ of the Western India Union, was begun. This union is distinctive in that it was the first in India to elect a national as its president (M. D. Moses, 1962).

Progress in Northern India. Evangelistic work in northern India began in the upper valley of the Ganges about the time the India Union headquarters were transferred to Lucknow in north-central India in 1909. After 1910 S. A. Wellman, M. M. Mattison, I. F. Blue, and others promoted the development of Seventh-day Adventist work. About 1911 Vera Chilton began work among the Hindu women at Lucknow, and soon thereafter a residence for Christian women was constructed so that those who were driven out by their relatives for accepting Christianity could have a place to live. About the same time an Urdu language school was conducted at Dehra Dun by Alice O'Connor, a resident of India, a convert who had an excellent knowledge of Urdu. Later she joined with two nurses, Misses Kurtz and Shryock, in the operation of a school and dispensary at Najibabad, near Dehra Dun. In 1914 treatment rooms were opened at Simla, a summer resort in the foothills of the Himalayas, by H. C. Menkel, a physician, who operated treatment rooms at Simla, in the mountains, during the summers and at Delhi, on the plains, during the winters.

In 1915 one of the earliest training schools for Indian workers was established at Lucknow under the name of Indian Christian Training School (see [Seventh-day Adventist High School \[Roorkee\]](#) for its successors). In 1919 M. M. Mattison opened a girls' school at Lucknow (see Hapur Elementary School). At first the work centered on the headquarters at Lucknow, but later a secondary center developed at Hapur, about 30 miles (48 kilometers) east of Delhi, where a North India Boys' School was established in 1917, which later became a training school for the Northwest India Union (see [Seventh-day Adventist High School \[Roorkee\]](#)). In 1911 an English language school was opened at Mussoorie; many of the children of the overseas workers in Southern Asia received their secondary education and for a time some college education there. See Vincent Hill School.

The work was not carried on without opposition or persecution. In 1911 a national, John Last, an earnest evangelist, was beaten to death by a mob in a city of Patiala in Punjab.

Progress in Northeast. The work in the province of Bihar was begun with the orphanage at Karmatar in 1899 and was later carried to Ranchi, where the North East India Union Training School was situated from about 1920 until the 1930s. In 1917 the first Bengali worker, L. G. Mookerjee, was ordained to the ministry. The work continued to develop in the 1920s when R. J. Borrowdale and W. B. Votaw conducted village evangelism throughout the area. About 1930 a hospital was opened at the Karmatar station under the supervision of H. G. Hebard, which, however, was soon closed. An elementary school opened in 1936 at Khunti, about 20 miles (32 kilometers) south of Ranchi, had initial difficulties, but became a strong factor in the work in the northeastern part of India. After medical work in the area had been carried on largely in several dispensaries, R. V. Shearer in 1949 opened a small hospital at Ranchi, which since then has grown to 85-bed capacity.

In 1927 E. R. Osmunson went to Cuttack, in the delta of the Mahanadi River, and began the study of the Oryia language preparatory to opening a mission station at Khurda. Because of primitive conditions, the missionaries lived in a tent for almost a year before their home was ready.

The work east of the Brahmaputra River was pioneered by Burgess and his wife. Planning to retire in India, they settled near Shillong, in Assam (now in Meghalaya), and there aroused an interest. Later, in 1941, a training school was established in that part of India. In 1949 W. G. Lowry, a second-generation worker in India, entered the area of the Lushai Hills in Assam, on the southeastern border with Burma, and in 1950 established an industrial boarding school at Aijal.

The official organ of the church in northeast India was the Northeast Broadcast. In 1951 the name was changed to Northeast Union Visitor.

Publishing Work. As noted earlier, the publishing work in India began soon after a mission was established there, with tracts and a monthly magazine in English, the Oriental Watchman. Later were issued a number of tracts on religious themes, developed gradually after the formation of the India Union Mission, by which time there was also a monthly health journal, Herald of Health, and a Bengali evangelistic quarterly Juga Lakshan (“Signs of the Times”). In 1912 an evangelistic quarterly magazine called the Present Truth was begun for the Tamil readers. The 1915 Yearbook listed also Hindi and Urdu Signs of the Times. During World War I the publication of English-language magazines was suspended. By 1920 there were eight periodicals in the national languages of India issued by the SDA publishing house at Lucknow: Juga Lakshan, a Bengali bimonthly; Pralai Kalana Chinha, a Gujarati quarterly; Kalyug ke Chinha, a Hindi bimonthly; Pralai Kalachi Chinha, a Marathi quarterly; Nikalkala Sattium, a Tamil quarterly; Nishinati-i-Quiyamat, an Urdu bimonthly; and quarterly issues of Present Truth in Malayalam, Telegu, and Kanarese (the latter not listed as published by the house).

The largest SDA book in the national languages at that time was Bible Readings. In the early 1920s, experienced colporteurs were brought from overseas to sell large English-language subscription books, such as The Great Controversy, by Ellen White, Daniel and the Revelation, by Uriah Smith, and Heralds of the Morning, by Asa O. Tait, and in 1924 the first subscription book designed for sale by Indian colporteurs, Health and Longevity, by Dr. A. C. Selmon. Colporteurs soon thereafter were selling health books in all the principal dialects, but the sales of religious books were small. Our Day in the Light of Prophecy, by W. A. Spicer, was among the first religious books published (the late 1920s or in the early 1930s). Before 1945 one Hindi and four English printings of a book by R. B. Thurber, Toward a Better Day, were sold, and also two printings of an abridgment of The Ministry of Healing, by Ellen White, which was published under the title Health and Healing. Since then sales of religious publications have been increasing, as colporteurs have gained experience. In 1962 Counsels for the Church (an abridgment of Testimonies for the Church, by Ellen White) was published in Hindi. According to a report in the Review and Herald (142:14, Oct. 21, 1965), in 1964 SDAs were printing in 24 of the languages of India, Pakistan, Ceylon, and Burma.

Later Progress. In 1950 the church began to use another avenue of communication-radio evangelism, which was begun with several weekly broadcasts over Radio Ceylon. Even though at the beginning the Bible correspondence school could not be announced, the public was made aware of it through the newspapers. Within a decade and a half the Voice of Prophecy School enrolled 2.4 million who were studying their lessons in 15 languages. Although Radio Ceylon later was closed to purely religious broadcasts, The Radio Doctor, a program of health evangelism, was continued.

After Goa was incorporated into India in 1962, N. G. Mookerjee began work there by giving Bible studies.

In 1964 India's Spicer Memorial College was the site of a division-wide youth congress. Almost 1,000 delegates were in attendance. Later in the year India's first course in the Five-Day Plan to Stop Smoking was conducted at Bangalore.

In the Voice of Prophecy work India has benefited from the fact that in 1971 broadcasts over Radio Sri Lanka again began after a silence of 10 years. As a result seven language broadcasts plus an English broadcast reach out to a potential audience of more than 1 billion people.

In 1974 Sikkim, on India's northern border, was entered and a small medical clinic set up.

In 1989 the Southern Asia division headquarters was moved to Tamil Nadu.

Indiana Academy

INDIANA ACADEMY. A coeducational boarding school on the senior high school level, operated at Cicero, Indiana, by the Indiana Conference. The academy is fully accredited by the Seventh-day Adventist Board of Regents, its most current certification having been issued in 1990. It was also granted “Continuous Commission” accreditation by the Department of Public Instruction of the state of Indiana in April of 1989.

Indiana Academy originated in 1902 as Boggstown Manual Training Academy (changed to Beechwood Manual Training Academy in 1905), at Boggstown, Indiana, on four acres (1.6 hectares) of land donated by William Applegate. Its first class graduated in 1908, with 11 members.

Eventually it was felt that a more centrally located site with adequate room for expansion and with better communication facilities should be found. After extended investigation the present property, a farm of 95 acres (40 hectares) near Cicero, was selected. In later years, the following properties were purchased: the Johnson farm, the Barnhiser farm, the Bowser farm, the Crumm farm, and the Miller farm. Additional property was purchased in 1974 and in the 1980s, making a present total of approximately 420 acres (170 hectares).

On Aug. 17, 1919, ground was broken for the girls’ dormitory, and during that school year the academy was moved and was renamed Indiana Academy. The class of 1923 was the first class to have spent all four years at Indiana Academy. Roscoe Moore, later president of the New York Conference, was president of the class; Lowell Edwards, vice president; Thelma Chew, valedictorian; and Josephine Cunnington, class poet. The first annual, The Ciceronian, was published that year, with Josephine Cunnington as editor in chief.

After some difficult years serious consideration was given to closing the school in 1934, but it survived and resumed a natural order of progress.

The academy has been blessed with many opportunities for the students to earn tuition dollars while they learn academically. It has been served by such companies as Harris Pine Mills (1960), Hoosier Plastics and Packaging (1969), American Color (1980), American Leisure-Little Lakes (1983), and currently has Zee Medical on the campus.

The most current construction includes two mini-dorms built in 1974. These small dorms have 30 students each and help to lend a more homestyle atmosphere to the boarding school campus. A new girls’ dorm was built in 1981. It houses approximately 48—50 girls comfortably. In 1985—1986 the Indiana Conference undertook the renovation of the gymnasium, which is utilized by the school for physical education, gymnastics, and recreation. It is also used by the conference for a camp meeting site. Approximately $450,000 was spent in the upgrading to provide a beautiful and comfortable facility. At present a new music/chapel complex is nearing completion.

History

History. Beginning of the Work in the Area. Joseph Bates, from Fairhaven, Massachusetts, was undoubtedly the first Seventh-day Adventist scout and missionary to enter Indiana on behalf of the Adventist faith, in July 1849. However, the earliest evangelistic teams heralding the Adventist message to former Millerites, and eventually to the populace at large, came the next year, 1850. Bates, with Abraham A. Dodge, of Battle Creek, Michigan, visited and preached in July; and Samuel W. Rhodes, from Oswego, New York, with John C. Bowles, of Jackson, Michigan, came in September and stopped long enough at Kingsbury, near La Porte, to convince Joseph and Jemima Catlin.

There is some evidence that in the autumn of 1851 John N. Andrews, of Poland, Maine, may have visited the state. During 1853 the far-ranging Bates came as far south as Lawrenceburg and Sullivan to confirm William Gould and Richard Moran in the faith, and John N. Loughborough, of Rochester, New York, and Merritt E. Cornell, of Michigan, won adherents-prominently, Joel and Lydia Locke-with meetings at Salem Center and Kingsbury.

An early group emerged around the Daniel Carpenter family at North Liberty from 1855 to 1858, when George Smith of Ohio, an artisan, came to work and witness near La Porte. Two of his converts-Peter Palmbad, from Sweden, and a man named Swartz, from Wittenberg, Germany-had been Adventists of a sort about 1844. These three teamed with Loughborough and won James and Addie Harvey, a man named Rupert, and others at North Liberty.

During the Civil War, when progress was slow, the converts pleaded with denominational leaders at Battle Creek for “preaching brethren.” Accordingly, well-recognized ministers of the period (Joseph Bates, Moses Hull, J. H. Waggoner, J. N. Loughborough, John Byington, W. S. Ingraham, D. M. Canright, R. J. Lawrence) appeared on tours almost yearly to preach and stabilize, principally in the northern counties.

In October 1861 Salem Center organized the first church. Near South Bend in August 1864 the first series of tent meetings, by Waggoner and Ingraham, was conducted. The North Liberty congregation in 1868 erected the first meetinghouse. For the time being these churches were accepted into the Michigan Conference. By 1870 “bands” had coalesced also at Sullivan, Russiaville, Cicero, Tipton, Spencer, Patricksburg, Fairfield, Erwin, Lancaster, Bowling Green, and Sulphur Springs.

A new, better-planned era opened when two brothers, Elbert B. and Sands H. Lane, from near Battle Creek, came to conduct “lectures” as fledgling ministers in 1869. The first state camp meetings, held near Tipton and Fairfield in 1870 and 1871, strengthened the idea of organizing a conference.

Organization. Final impetus for organization developed when a windstorm in June 1872 ruined the (Michigan) tent and cut short an evangelistic series by Waggoner and E. B. Lane, at Gosport. In order to have a tent of their own for camp meeting, stalwarts in the churches (W. R. Carpenter, J. Harvey, Jacob Styles, D. F. Randolph, Charles Seaward, W. Covert, Isaac Zirkle, Noah Carahoo, Anson Worster) gathered money, bought a new tent, set up camp meeting west of Kokomo, and there on Sept. 20 convened a business meeting.

With General Conference president G. I. Butler in the chair, Harvey successfully moved to form the Indiana Conference. To keep the Lanes preaching, however, the organizers chose only local men as officers: president, William Covert; secretary, James Harvey; treasurer, Isaac Zirkle. Constituent churches were Alto, Erwin, North Liberty, Patricksburg, and Salem Center.

Progress to 1900. For the remainder of the century the dominant purpose of organized Adventism in Indiana was statewide evangelism, and preaching was carried on in more than 300 recorded places. To captain this vast undertaking, reliance was put chiefly upon three able presidents—Covert, S. H. Lane, and Starr—and upon dedicated evangelistic workers, such as Arthur W. Bartlett, William and John Covert, J. P. Henderson, William Hill, N. W. Kauble, David H. Oberholtzer, Joseph M. Rees, F. M. Roberts, J. S. Shrock, Victor and Luzerne Thompson, and W. A. Young. These men worked long in building young churches in their state.

Many of these early churches do not now exist, because of mergers, deaths, removals, and lukewarmness, yet a surprising number do (some disbanded and later reestablished). They are listed here in order of initial dates: Marion, 1876; Lafayette, 1877; Alexandria, Noblesville, Bloomington (as Smithville to 1871, then as Unionville to 1916), and Wolf Lake, 1878; Hartford City, Kokomo, and Northfield, 1883; Middletown, 1884; Plymouth, 1885; Sullivan (as Dugger to 1892, then as Salem to 1937), 1886; Boggstown, Rockford (as Barber’s Mill to 1932), Rochester, and Wabash, 1887; Indianapolis, 1888; Angola, 1889; Terre Haute, 1892; Knox, 1893; Elnora, 1895; Monon (as Honey Creek to 1929), 1896; Fort Wayne, Tell City (as Mount Zion to 1917), 1897; Anderson, 1898; Connersville, Muncie, and South Bend, 1900.

It was arduous work to establish scores of churches with few workers and a scanty budget. Thus J. M. Rees, in bringing out a church in Terre Haute, borrowed $600 and reported, "I am almost broken down under it [the weight of the work]." E. E. Marvin, N. W. Kauble, and "Willie" Gray were stoned three times while holding meetings at Kempton, and also P. G. Stanley, S. S. Davis, and R. H. Sparks were threatened at Connersville. Nevertheless, these men established churches. Sands Lane was well along in a series at Wolf Lake when someone broke into the church and stole his charts from the wall in order to show that the law had been abolished. When his audience learned of the loss they raised money to buy new ones. A church emerged there.

In 1877 Bartlett's crowded meetings at Deedsville had to be moved from a church to a school, then to a barn, which became so packed that he had to enter through a window. A congregation was organized there. When Lane and Bartlett were holding meetings at Thorntown a windstorm ripped and flattened their tent, but community friends showered them with money to repair and reraise it. A church resulted there.

When Lane and W. W. Sharpe entered Sevastopol in 1879 to gather a church, they attracted so many from that farming hamlet to Sabbath services that "it made quite a change in the village—a merchant left his store, the shoemaker, harness maker, and the undertaker closed shop. Men came from the country with work, but were told they could not get it done till the next day" (Review and Herald 54:102, Sept. 18, 1879). A church resulted there.

Resourceful evangelists utilized their special skills. As early as 1888 John Covert conducted afternoon children's meetings at Rigdon, which attracted overflow audiences of adults to the evening services. In 1893 and 1894 at Priam and Farmersburg, Stanley prefaced his meetings with cooking demonstrations that brought out the curious to view this masculine and educational oddity. Converts were won in these places.

Often a series of meetings was conducted in a church of another denomination; this frequently resulted in opposition and eventually in locked buildings. Thereupon the SDA minister usually turned to house-to-house visiting.

On many occasions opposers demanded debates. Bartlett had five of these encounters at Wabash. Probably the most spectacular was the one that lasted four days between Lane and a Disciples' pastor at Farmersburg in the midsummer of 1883. This brought out 1,000 town and countryside listeners. Churches were begun in this vicinity.

Work in Indianapolis was started when Bartlett, as yet a teacher, formed a small Sabbath school in the spring of 1876. Finally in 1883 the conference, awaking to the strategic position of the city, authorized further endeavors. Various members, ministers, Bible instructors, colporteurs, and artisans played parts in this campaign, led by Bartlett and William Covert. At the outset, a "city mission" and lecture room were opened at 32 Cherry Street (1885); later a church was erected on Central Avenue (1887) and a church body was organized (1888). Early the next year Ellen White and A. T. Jones came and, with spiritual sermons, sparked the drive for converts. In 1888, 1892, 1893, and 1894 camp meetings were held on the north side of the city. By 1901 the membership approached 200.

The denomination thrived comparatively well in Indiana during the first half century of its history. By the end of the 1870s membership had increased from 150 to 522 and churches from 5 to 24. In 1890 there were 1,179 members in 50 churches; and by 1900 there were 2,226 in 69 churches. In sum, this forthright, earnest, horse-and-buggy generation of SDAs doubled its numbers every 10 years—a rate of growth not matched until the 1930s.

Since 1900. Indiana's membership from 1900 to 1930 remained close to 2,000. These decades were difficult ones for the conference. At the outset the "holy flesh" doctrine of 1900—1901 caused a stir that resulted in the resignation of the entire Indiana Conference committee, and consequent unrest that was calmed only by the ministrations of Ellen White, A. G. Daniells, O. S. Hadley, A. W. Bartlett, and a later conference president, W. J. Stone (1903—1909).

When the Lake Union Conference was organized in 1901, Indiana became a constituent member. A large percentage of the membership in the state is concentrated north of the Shelbyville moraine.

During the early period the conference consistently put a great deal into nurturing its own young people. As early as 1892 the youth of the Indianapolis church organized a "young people's society," and other churches followed the precedent. In 1897 two churches began church schools—Farmersburg (with Maude Atherton as teacher) and Salem (with Mattie Pease). By 1930 about 20 of these schools existed. The conference operated a secondary school near Boggstown known as Beechwood Academy (1903—1919), which was continued near Cicero as Indiana Academy of Seventh-day Adventists. Grants were made to Emmanuel Missionary College, which was the Lake Union college at Berrien Springs, Michigan. Moreover, the Wabash Valley Sanitarium at Lafayette (established 1906) also helped train young people.

In 1917 the northern tier of seven counties was transferred to the West Michigan Conference. At the end of 1918 the westernmost part of the Lake County was given to the newly formed Chicago Conference and in 1931 became briefly a part of the reunited Illinois Conference. When at the end of 1931 it and the other northern counties came "home" again, they contained sizable churches not there before—that is, Hammond, Michigan City, and Gary.

Through the years as some old churches disbanded, new ones were established, some of which endure to the present—two prior to 1910, Elkhart and Logansport; three in the next decade, Cicero, Indianapolis South Side, and Vincennes; eight during the twenties, Bedford, Evansville, Frankfort, New Albany, New Castle, New Harmony, North Vernon, and Shelbyville.

The years of the Depression and of World War II and its aftermath were soul-searching ones for Seventh-day Adventists in Indiana. Between 1930 and 1950 churches increased from 47 to 68 (though six Black churches were transferred in 1945 to the newly formed Lake Region Conference), and membership doubled to more than 4,000. This advance was planned by conference administrators and spearheaded by evangelists, but the ranks were well bolstered with active laymen. The operational base was broadened by the addition of more churches: Bloomfield, Columbus, Converse, Elizabeth, Glezen, Huntington, Jeffersonville, Livonia, Martinsville, Rensselaer, Seymour, Valparaiso, and Versailles.

An example of the strategic methods is furnished by Indianapolis. At the depth of the Depression, in 1932, the members rallied to operate a penny-a-dish cafeteria for humanity's sake (611 were served on Thanksgiving), then girded themselves to help their ministers win converts. In doing this they expanded the membership in their churches to one seventh of the conference total, and set a pattern of progress. Many-faceted evangelism included preaching crusades, radio programs, Bible study classes, and Vacation Bible Schools. (The older use of camp meetings for evangelistic purposes in unworked areas had ended around 1920, and in 1949 a permanent camp meeting site and facilities were established on the Indiana Academy premises.) Thus through a period of hard times and war conditions, the two, then the four, metropolitan churches climbed in membership from 350 to 735.

The decade of the 1950s was one of only moderate gains. Membership in the 72 churches advanced to 5,000. This increase was obtained by adhering to the “Indianapolis pattern” in the larger cities, especially the holding of vigorous evangelistic series. Youthful churches of this decade were Brownsburg, East Chicago (Spanish), Indianapolis, Irvington, Monticello, Portland, Scottsburg, Warsaw, and Washington.

By 1960, therefore, in the 26 large-city churches were concentrated half of the SDAs in the state. South Bend was the largest, with nearly 400 members. In earlier years this congregation had included personnel of the Review and Herald branch office and warehouse (1908—1937) and of the Lake Union Conference office (1903—1915). After 1945 and repeated evangelistic campaigns, it rapidly expanded to first place.

However, since 1885, because of its central location, Indianapolis has usually been the headquarters of the conference. (Before this, conference officers conducted business from their own home, as some did even afterward.) Some 10 changes were made (it was at Cicero from 1923 to 1930), but in October 1955 it was moved from near the center of Indianapolis to 1405 Broad Ripple Avenue, near the suburbs, where it occupied a contemporary-style office building. In 1975 it was moved to 15250 North Meridian Street, Carmel.

Indiana’s latest undertaking was the purchase (1961), development, and operation of Timber Ridge Camp on 207 acres (84 hectares) of woodland and lake near Spencer. Youth camps, which do much to stabilize young people in the faith, had been conducted since 1931 on rented properties.

More and more the old landmarks, such as churches of wood, are being replaced with brick or Indiana-limestone edifices; more adequate budgets are possible (the conference debt, unpaid since 1900, was liquidated in 1942).

Indonesia

INDONESIA. A republic in Southeast Asia occupying most of the islands between the mainland of Asia and Australia, including Sumatra, Java, Sulawesi (Celebes), the southern part of Borneo, called Kalimantan, the western half of New Guinea, called Irian Jaya (incorporated in 1963), and East Timor, a former Portuguese colony that was integrated into Indonesia on July 17, 1979. Indonesia has some 17,000 islands, of which 6,000 are named and 1,000 are permanently settled. It stretches from 95° to 135° east longitude, a distance of about 3,125 miles (5,000 kilometers) from east to west, and from about 6° north of the equator to about 11° south of the equator, a distance of about 1,250 miles (2,000 kilometers). The republic has a total area of 735,268 square miles (1.9 million square kilometers) and is inhabited (1994) by 200 million people. Two thirds of them live on Java; thus this island is one of the most densely populated areas in the world. Ethnically, Indonesians belong to the Malay race and are related to the indigenous peoples of the neighboring areas of Asia and Polynesia; there are also significant groups of Chinese and other continental Asians.

The great majority of the people of Indonesia are Muslims, but there are Hindus, Christians, and pagans, and among the Chinese, Buddhists and Confucianists. The constitution of the country guarantees religious freedom to all. The official language of Indonesia is Bahasa Indonesia, developed quite recently from the Malay and local dialects, with words from Dutch, English, Arabic, and Sanskrit. English, which has become the second language of the republic, is taught in all high schools. For more than three and a half centuries the Dutch controlled the territory of Indonesia, first through the medium of the United East Indies Company and later directly through government administration. However, after World War II nationalists gained control of the country and proclaimed independence in 1945. In 1949 Indonesian independence was formally recognized by the Netherlands. In 1976 the eastern part of Timor was integrated to the territory of Indonesia.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. The first Seventh-day Adventist to visit Indonesia may possibly have been Abram La Rue, who is reported to have been in Java sometime between 1888 and 1903. SDA work in Indonesia began in 1900, when R. W. Munson, formerly a missionary for another denomination at Singapore, and well acquainted with the language of the people, opened a mission at Padang, on the west coast of Sumatra. One of his first converts was Tay Hong Siang, a Christian preacher, a Chinese who as an orphan had been in Munson's orphanage in Singapore a number of years previously.

Three years later, in 1903, the East Indian archipelago was made a mission field of the Australasian Union Conference. In 1905 Immanuel Siregar, a Christian from Batakland, accepted the SDA faith after Bible studies with R. W. Munson. He then returned to the uplands of North Sumatra, land of the cannibal Bataks, taking the doctrine to his own people. Other early missionaries were G. A. Wantzlick and his family in Sumatra; G. A. Teasdale and his family, Petra Tunheim, and Anna Nordstrom in Surabaya, East Java. Sim Gee Nio, who came from Singapore, proved a great help as a translator.

A workers' council for Java was held on Oct. 22, 1908, with J. E. Fulton, from Singapore, presiding. Publishing work was begun in Sukabumi, West Java, with printing equipment that had been brought over from Singapore in February 1910, and the publication of a quarterly periodical, Utusan Kebenaran Melayu ("Malay Messenger of Truth"), was begun. In 1911 the press was moved to Jakarta. This led to developing a church in that city. This church, organized in 1912 by G. F. Jones, the intrepid ship captain-missionary of the Pacific islands, was the first SDA church to be established on Java. Five souls were baptized in the first baptism in Java, which took place Mar. 29, 1911, at Sukabumi. One of the first to be baptized by R. W. Munson was Samuel Rantung, who pioneered the work in North Celebes.

Malaysian Union Mission. At a workers' meeting about the beginning of 1913, held at Sumber Wekas, a small hill station about 40 miles (65 kilometers) south of Surabaya, the missions in the East Indies field were organized as a union mission field, with F. A. Detamore as superintendent of the field. Three of the local missions included in it were the Sumatra, East Java, and West Java missions.

At a meeting of the Malaysian Mission workers at Sumber Wekas, Feb. 15—20, 1917, it was reported that there were two missions in Sumatra and two in Java—the East and the West. There were small companies in Kediri, Jogjakarta, and Semarang. In that year the Malaysian Union Conference was organized, including these missions in Indonesia. Melvin Munson, son of R. W. Munson, arrived in Java to be editor of the press. Instead of the former quarterly, the monthly Pertandaan Zaman ("Signs of the Times") was published. Literature was printed in Siamese, Batak, Nias, and Arabic Malay.

Workers from Europe began arriving in Indonesia during 1921. In that year A. H. Zimmerman and his wife came from Europe in September, and Peter Drinhaus and Friedrich Dittmar and their families in October. P. J. Raubenheimer and his wife came from South Africa.

Samuel Rantung, a Jakarta convert who had gone to Singapore to attend the training school and who later served as a teacher in that school, returned to his home in Ratahan, Menado, North Celebes, on a leave of absence in October 1920. His parents and relatives accepted his faith, and 22 people were baptized on Dec. 30, 1921, by F. A. Detamore. The next day the first church on the Celebes was organized with 25 members. Samuel Rantung and M. E. Diredja remained in the Celebes to foster the new interests.

In his report to the General Conference session in 1922, F. A. Detamore gave the following statistics for the Malaysian Union Mission: From a membership of 337 in 1917, four years later the number had almost doubled, increasing to 660.

In 1924, after a three-month series of evangelistic meetings in the city of Medan, northern Sumatra, by I. C. Schmidt, 32 baptized members were reported. These were chiefly from the Ambonese, Bataks, and Chinese. Colporteur work was the only means of evangelism outside the city of Medan. A Sabbath school was organized in Kutaradja, Atjeh, and another on the island of Sabang, off the northern tip of Sumatra. The latter had 35 members of whom 12 had been baptized.

Public evangelistic meetings in Java, held by J. S. Yates in a tent in Jakarta late in 1923 in 3 languages—Malay, Dutch, and Chinese—resulted in 20 baptisms.

The West Java Mission held its first mission session in Jakarta in December 1923. Delegates were present from five churches, representing a combined membership of more than 250. The church building there had been erected from funds collected locally. A mission school was in operation with two teachers and 60 students. At a mission session six years later, reports showed a membership of 530, and seven schools, all self-supporting, with 626 students enrolled. The mission operated 18 outstations.

East Java held a mission session in January 1929 and reported a membership of 385 in six churches and companies. At that time a Dutch-Chinese school with 170 students enrolled at Surabaya, and a Javanese school with 62 students was reported. In Samarang a Dutch-Chinese school with 200 students was directed by I. C. Schmidt.

At the end of 1924 Albert Munson (brother of Melvin) reported more than 500 believers in the Celebes, of whom 188 had been baptized. Early in 1925 P. Pietersz and a colporteur, J. Liklikwatil, went to Ambon. They met bitter opposition, but on Oct. 3 Albert Munson came from Menado and baptized 22 persons, the first SDA baptism in Ambon. In 1926 Samuel Rantung found 53 converts on the island of Saparua. During 1927 more than 100 persons had been baptized in Ambon, and the island of Banda was entered. Early in 1926 permission was given to SDAs to work in North Celebes.

Netherlands East Indies Union Mission Organized. In 1929 the territory of Indonesia was organized as the Netherlands East Indies Union Mission (since 1947 the Indonesia Union Mission), and transferred from the Far Eastern to the Central European Division. It was first reported as divided into six missions (Batakland Mission, North Sumatra Mission, South Sumatra Mission, West Java Mission, East Java Mission, and North Celebes Mission) and the Ambon and Padang districts (all eight listed as missions by the end of the year). There were then 48 churches and companies in Indonesia, with 1,736 members, and 13 schools, with 1,309 students. The officers of this new union mission were B. Ohme, superintendent, and H.E.R. Schell, secretary-treasurer.

Batakland Mission. Having been appointed to take charge of the Batakland field at the annual meeting in Singapore, Mar. 2—12, 1920, and being unable to conduct evangelistic work, D. S. Kime opened an English school at Sipogu. This school became an entering wedge into Batakland. Its students, who had come from all parts of the country, took the SDA message back to their own people. Eight were baptized in the first public baptism in Batakland, conducted by G. B. Youngberg on Mar. 23, 1929.

In January 1930 Kime called Karel Tambunan from Medan to work for 800 emigrant families from northern Batakland who had settled at Sajur Matinggi, in the Angkola and Sipirok district. In April 1931 S. Ritonga was sent there to open a mission school. G. A. Wood succeeded Kime as director, and on July 2, 1931, dedicated a church and school building. At that time there were 35 baptized members there.

In November 1932 permission was given to SDAs to work in all of Batakland. Immediately public evangelism was launched in different places. In spite of opposition 50 persons joined the church at Balige and 17 at Porsea.

At the 1936 session of the Batakland Mission, 13 churches were reported and 10 new churches were received into church fellowship at the session. The membership had grown to 443 by the end of 1935, and more than 1,000 persons were attending Sabbath schools.

In 1937 this mission was merged with the North Sumatra Mission.

South Sumatra Mission. A small company had been organized at Palembang when F. Dittmar went there early in 1929. Medical missionary work was begun by Maria Muster, a midwife from Germany. In December 1933 there were six national evangelists and four colporteurs in the field. By the end of 1940 the membership had reached 336.

West Java Mission. At the annual meeting in 1932 the West Java churches sent 54 delegates; at that time the Chinese church in Jakarta was accepted into fellowship. The mission then had a membership of 489. By 1935 there were 702 members. The West Java Training School gave diplomas to its first three graduates in 1936 (see Indonesia Union College).

East Java Mission. At the end of 1930 the East Java Mission had 12 churches and companies, 14 Sabbath schools, and three mission schools, with 585 students. In 1934 two more churches were accepted into fellowship.

Sangihe and Talaud Island Mission. Alex Lengkoan was born to Lutheran parents in Kakas, Tondano, July 4, 1900. Graduating from the nursing school, he worked as a nurse in Manado from 1922—1926. In Manado he met another nurse, Marie Lumabaeng. They studied SDA doctrines and were baptized and got married in 1926. Alex left nursing to become a colporteur. In 1928 a group of believers were worshiping in the village of Salurang, which was Marie's hometown. This became the first SDA church in the Sangihe and Talaud Island Mission. Alex later became a Bible teacher and then an ordained minister. From Salurang the work expanded to Tamako, Minanga, Tagulandang, and throughout the mission.

North Celebes Mission. When Ambon and South Celebes were made a separate district under the supervision of the union mission in 1929, this left the North Celebes Mission with a membership of only 477. However, by the end of 1930 its membership had increased to 600 in 13 churches, eight new churches having been accepted into the mission in 1930. Two of their most successful colporteurs were sent to New Guinea to work among "the Papuans and other inhabitants" of the island.

By July 1934 there were 42 churches, and the membership had grown to 1,155. The church at Manado was dedicated at the annual meeting of the North Celebes Mission in 1935, and 18 persons were baptized. A colporteur,

J. Moroisa, pioneered the work on Morotai. A Missionary Volunteer convention, held at Langowan, Manado, on June 6, 1937, was attended by more than 1,100 young people from the North Celebes. At the end of that year there were 54 churches in that mission.

Ambon Mission. Three colporteurs entered Ambon in 1922, and scattered many books and periodicals throughout the islands. Permission to do missionary work was finally granted in December 1928, and soon a church in Ambon was organized. The next March 41 were baptized there, among them four from Banda and nine from Saparua. The church at Ambon dedicated its newly erected church building on Nov. 6, 1935.

By the end of 1937 permission had not as yet been received to do missionary work on the Tanimbar Islands, although SDAs had visited these islands.

South Celebes. In February 1929 South Celebes was made a separate district under the direct supervision of the union mission at Bandung. Samuel Rantung was sent to Ujung Pandang, and on Apr. 4, 1930, the first baptism was held and a church was organized.

From Torajaland, about 180 miles (290 kilometers) north of Makassar (now Ujung Pandang), four persons came to Makassar on Mar. 29, 1935, in order to receive baptism.

From 1937 Through World War II

From 1937 Through World War II. At the close of 1937 the following statistics were given for the union: membership, 4,554 (an increase of 2,818 in nine years); churches and companies, 130; Sabbath schools, 134; membership, 5,497. MV Societies, 60; membership, 1,496; a training school with 15 students; other schools, 18 with 1,166 students; colporteurs, 62. There was no work as yet in the Lesser Sunda Islands, Borneo, and West New Guinea (now Irian Jaya).

Because conditions with the approach of World War II made it difficult for the Central European Division to administer the work in Indonesia, the Netherlands East Indies Union Mission was transferred back to the Far Eastern Division on Jan. 1, 1938. However, the general form of the union mission organization was maintained. The work continued to grow. By the second quarter of 1939 the North Celebes Mission had 1,926 members and Ambon had 267, and converts were found on many of the neighboring islands. The number of ordained ministers in the union had grown to eight, and national leaders were gradually assuming leadership of the work.

South Celebes was organized into a local mission during the session held at Bandung in 1939. In the Celebes, A. Londa baptized five candidates at Gorontalo in August of that year.

When the Nazis invaded the Netherlands during World War II, the Dutch interned all the German missionaries in Indonesia. In 1941 K. Tilstra was appointed union mission superintendent, but at the time of the occupation by the Japanese he was interned. In spite of the war the work of God went forward.

Postwar Developments

Postwar Developments. Reorganization, 1947. At the first union mission session after the war, held in Jakarta from Mar. 22 to 26, 1947, union mission appointments were made as follows: K. Tilstra, president (D. S. Kime acting as president while Tilstra was on furlough to the United States); secretary, Leo Hogendorp; acting treasurer, W. U. Hutapea. Changes were also made in the administration of local missions. Administrators were appointed as follows: D. S. Kime, West Java; M. Kauntul, East Java; A. Londa, North Celebes; A. Pasuhuk, South Celebes; R. O. Walean, Ambon; and S. H. Pandjaitan, Central Java, being stationed at Samarang.

At this first postwar union mission session, six nationals were ordained; thus the total number of national ordained ministers was increased to 20.

Irian Jaya (West New Guinea). In 1928 Albert Munson and V. L. Beecham made a short visit to the northwest coastal area of New Guinea. In 1941 two Indonesian colporteurs, A. Kadir and I. Tuamulia, were sent in; they reported one convert, a Chinese. After the interruption of World War II, D. A. Dompas was sent to Sorong in 1948, and later D. van Waardenburg went to Manokwari. In 1951 the Indonesia Union Mission sent E. H. Vijsma to organize the West New Guinea Mission. After independence for Indonesia came, many SDA members from Indonesia, mainly Dutch citizens, moved to New Guinea, and churches were organized in Sorong, Manokwari, and Hollandia (later renamed Kotabaru, still later Sukarnapura, and now Jayapura), where the first SDA church was built in 1954.

In 1953 the West New Guinea Mission was placed under the direct supervision of the Far Eastern Division, with Klaas Tilstra as president. In March 1955 the mission had 96 members.

In 1957 the first church composed entirely of indigenous members was organized in the coastal village of Mambui. In the same year SDA medical work was begun by Mrs. K. Tilstra, a registered nurse, and a training school was opened at Dojo Baru on Dec. 2, 1957, with L. E. Keizer in charge. Early in 1961 Dr. N. Twijnstra opened a dental clinic, which because of political conditions was closed in 1963. In 1963 the first Irian minister, J. Bindosano, was ordained.

Work among the primitive tribes of the Tor River area, near Sarmi, was begun in 1958, after a visit there by Dr. G. Oosterwal, an SDA missionary-anthropologist. Village schools were opened, and in 1962 the first convert from these primitive tribes was baptized.

Publishing Work. The first SDA missionary to Indonesia, R. W. Munson, was also the first to translate SDA publications into the Malay language. He translated a series of small tracts and a collection of hymns. A 30-page booklet, Second Advent of Christ, was published, and parts of Ellen White's Great Controversy were translated and prepared for printing in Arabic characters.

With the establishment of the Indonesia Publishing House (1949), production of much-needed publications was increased, opening the way for a large group of colporteurs to spread the SDA message in printed form rapidly throughout the many islands.

Among the Spirit of Prophecy books that have been printed are Counsels to the Church (four volumes), Steps to Christ, The Desire of Ages, The Great Controversy, and Messages to Young People.

Radio and Television. The Voice of Prophecy correspondence courses were introduced by Mrs. H.E.R. Schell in Cimindi in 1948. In 1950 the headquarters were moved to Bandung. In 1954 Bible correspondence courses were available for Voice of Prophecy students in Indonesian, Chinese, Dutch, and English. During the first nine years of operation 214,358 applicants requested lessons and 10,152 completed the courses. Baptisms reported as a result of these studies totaled 3,260.

A monthly TV program on a Jakarta station was introduced on Jan. 24, 1963, produced by J. T. Manullang, radio-TV secretary of the Indonesia Union Mission. It was the first live regularly scheduled SDA television broadcast in the Far Eastern Division.

Muslim Evangelism. At the 1926 General Conference session it was reported that 100 converts with a Muslim background had been won in Indonesia. For the nine-year period 1954—1962, the number of baptisms from among Muslims totaled 844. These baptisms were the result of Voice of Prophecy lessons, personal evangelism, and public evangelistic meetings.

Recent Growth. The Indonesia Union Mission passed the 10,000 membership mark during the year 1952. Although it took a half century to gain the first 10,000 converts, the second 10,000 required less than a decade.

As the Lord's work grew in the 1960s in Indonesia, it became necessary to reorganize the union. By the end of 1972, 15 local missions spread along the equator for more than 3,000 miles (5,000 kilometers). Thus it was that in January of 1964 the Indonesia Union Mission was divided into two unions. The East Indonesia Union Mission included Maluku, Sangihe, Talaud, and Sulawesi; and the West Indonesia Union Mission included Sumatra; South Borneo (now Kalimantan); Java; Madura; Bali, Lombok, and the Nusa Tenggara group (now Lesser Sunda Islands); Timor; and West Irian (West New Guinea). In 1972 West New Guinea, now known as Irian Jaya, became a part of the East Indonesia Union Mission.

Shortly after this reorganization a number of new missions were organized. In the East Indonesia Union the Sangihe-Talaud Mission was organized in 1964, and the Central Sulawesi Mission in 1965. The former included the Sangihe and Talaud islands, and the latter Buol Toli-Toli, Donggala, Luwuk-Banggai, and Posso. As the work grew in the North Celebes (or Sulawesi) Mission it became necessary to reorganize the mission. Thus, in 1971 two missions were formed from the former North Celebes Mission and became the North and South Minahasa missions. The North Minahasa Mission included Ternate, Morotai, and North Minahasa, while the South Minahasa Mission was comprised of Bolaang Mongondow, Gorontalo, and South Minahasa.

Later the West Indonesia Union Mission reorganized several missions within its territory. In December 1971 the West Kalimantan (Borneo) Mission became a district of the West Java Mission. In 1972 the island of Kalimantan (Borneo) was reorganized and became one mission, the Kalimantan Mission, its territory being the Indonesia section of the island of Borneo, with mission headquarters in Balikpapan.

In 1971 the North Sumatra Mission was also divided into two missions. Early in 1972 the Central Sumatra Mission was organized with the following territory: part of North Sumatra province from Sipintu-pintu to the south, West Sumatra province, and Riau province. The North Sumatra Mission then had part of the North Sumatra province from Sipintu-pintu to the north and Aceh province. In 1973 the two missions in Java were reorganized to form three missions, East Java, Central Java, and West Java. The West Java Mission was also to include Purwakarta Bogor, Cianjur, and Sukabumi. In the early 1980s the West Java Mission took over the territory of the Central Java Mission, and the Jakarta Mission was formed from the territory that had previously been the West Java Mission. In 1994 the East Java and Jakarta missions became conferences.

In 1992 total membership for the West Indonesia Union Mission was 69,099, with 66,548 in the East Indonesia Union Mission; or a total of 135,647 members and 157,733 Sabbath school members. Headquarters for the union were moved to a new strategic location in 1991.

The educational work has advanced rapidly, with two colleges and 13 senior academies in Indonesia. Of the latter, seven are boarding academies. The church school program has also been doing well.

With the arrival of two mission planes in Indonesia, based in Irian Jaya (western New Guinea), the prospects in this area are bright for rapid growth.

The Health Department of the East Indonesia Union Mission began a rural health program in 1988. Dr. Kathleen Kuntaraf, FED health director, conducted a training program for rural health student missionaries (RHSM) for the union. Since that time 14 RHSMs have been sent to various missions in the union territory. The effort was blessed with 57 baptisms, including the establishment of a company in the Maluku Mission.

Indonesia Publishing House

INDONESIA PUBLISHING HOUSE (Percetakan Advent Indonesia). A publishing house with printing plant operated at Bandung, Java, Indonesia, by the West and East Indonesia union missions as an interunion institution, through a board of directors representing both unions. No commercial printing is accepted. Publications are issued in the Indonesian language.

As early as February 1910 the Australasian Union Conference had established a small printing plant at Sukabumi, Java, called the Java Mission Press. It was under the supervision of R. W. Munson, who had served in Sumatra earlier and had also been employed at the Avondale Press, Australia, for some time. He was assisted at the Java Mission Press by

E. K. Hungerford and a man from Singapore named Lee; later by Immanuel Siregar, who had been his first Indonesian convert while working in Sumatra, and Samuel Rantung, one of the first converts to the Seventh-day Adventist Church in Jakarta, Java.

The Java Mission Press issued a quarterly Malay periodical called Utusan Kebenaran Melayu ("Messenger of Truth"); several Malay tracts ("Daniel 7," "About Opium Smoking," "Cigarettes," "The Lord's Sabbath," "The End of the World"); two Sundanese tracts ("The Love of God"-the first chapter of Steps to Christ, by Ellen White-and "Creation," by

J. E. Fulton); and Christ Our Saviour, by Ellen White, all of which had been translated by

R. W. Munson and formerly printed at the Avondale Press in Australia. Another book was also prepared by R. W. Munson containing a series of Bible studies, and it was called Pelajaran Kitab Alkudus, later Saksi Kebenaran. It was a translation of a book on doctrines by G. B. Starr.

After the Dutch government refused to grant permission for Seventh-day Adventists to do missionary work in Sukabumi, the press was moved to Jakarta in April 1911. It was later sold and a larger printing plant erected in Singapore, which was dedicated on Mar. 10, 1920.

Because it was less expensive and more convenient to print in Indonesia, the editorial staff was transferred to Bandung, Java, in March 1929 and located at Naripan 72; there was a publishing house board, a manager, and a book depot that distributed the publications through the Adventist Book Centers, but the printing was done by commercial firms.

After years of operation in this manner, a new building for offices and factory was constructed in Cimindi, a western suburb of Bandung, in 1954. The publishing house staff moved in during January 1955, and the plant was dedicated Feb. 18. The building was substantially enlarged in 1967, and again in 1974. An auditorium was added in 1978.

The one-story brick-and-concrete building faces the main east-west highway through Bandung. The various departments function in separate rooms; an assembly hall seats more than 100; a small English-Indonesian library is available; and a conference room was recently developed. One truck is used for delivery and pickup.

The pressroom operates one Heidelberg SORD, and two Heidelberg KORDs; and one Heidelberg cylinder press-all one color. New equipment has also been purchased for use in the composition room, offset section, and the bindery. These include a Roland Patva 2C (one color) in 1976; a Hamada (one color) in 1990; a Mueller (two colors), eight computers, a camera, and gang stitching machine in 1991.

The house served approximately 1,000 literature evangelists in 1992 and more than 120,000 church members. Subscription literature includes a monthly health journal, Rumah Tangga dan Kesehatan, and a list of 72 titles including Kebahagiaan Sejati (“Steps to Christ”); Kerinduan Segala Zaman (“Desire of Ages”); Narkotik; Menu Sehat (“Vegetarian Cookbook”); Penjaga Kesehatan (medical book); Sahabat Anakanak (“My Bible Friends”). Also included are stop-smoking, AIDS, and family planning materials; The Great Controversy; Bible Readings; and Maranatha.

The house attempts to meet the needs of the constituency of both Indonesian unions by providing Sabbath school lesson quarterlies, mission quarterlies, visual aids, church songbooks, and departmental supplies as well as the monthly church paper.

Indonesia Union College

INDONESIA UNION COLLEGE (Universitas Advent Indonesia). A coeducational boarding school on the senior college level, operated by the West Indonesia Union Mission on an estate of about 52 acres (20 hectares), 12 miles (20 kilometers) north of Bandung, Java. In 1993 the school had an enrollment of 910 and a staff of 90 (50 of them teachers). The students are mostly Indonesians, with some students from Malaysia. More than 80 percent are from Seventh-day Adventist homes; the rest are non-Christians or from other Christian groups.

History

History. Training School. The first SDA school for the training of workers in Indonesia was opened in 1929 at Tjimindi, near Bandung, Java. It was named the Opleidingsschool der Advent-Zending (listed in the Yearbook as Tjimindi Training School; after 1939, as Netherlands East Indies Training School). Earlier, when the Netherlands East Indies (now Indonesia) was a part of the Malayan Union Mission, with headquarters in Singapore, all Indonesian workers were trained in Singapore.

When the school opened (under the direction of H. Eelsing, with L.M.D. Wortman and K. Mandias as teachers), only a two-year ministerial training course was offered. At the first graduation, held in the fall of 1931, seven of the original 16 students received diplomas.

From 1929 to 1942 the school had an average enrollment of fewer than 30 students. When in 1936 an orphanage, which had been opened in Bandung the preceding year, was moved to Tjimindi and operated in connection with the school, it became evident that the Tjimindi property was not large enough for future development. Consequently a larger tract of land was purchased at Gadobangkong, a village a short distance west of Bandung. Buildings were erected, and the school was moved to the new campus in 1938. The orphanage remained at Tjimindi and was later closed. The new facilities enabled the school to accept more students. World War II forced it to close in 1942. Several of the teachers were placed in concentration camps, where two of them, L.M.D. Wortman and M. van Emmerick, subsequently died.

When peace returned, the buildings were quickly rehabilitated. In 1948 the school reopened under a new name, Indonesia Union Seminary. Under the instruction of Isaac C. Schmidt, a two-year ministerial course was again offered. The student body numbered 45, of whom four were young women.

Junior College. Up until this time the main aim of the school had been to train ministerial workers. In 1949 the entire educational system was revised in order to provide an education for all SDA young people. To accomplish this, a four-year secondary school was opened, which later expanded to a six-year program in harmony with the Indonesian government's educational system. Also in 1949 the ministerial training program was incorporated into a regular junior college curriculum. The college department also offered a normal course under the leadership of Lloyd W. Mauldin.

With the enlarged curriculum, the annual enrollment increased rapidly. Two factors contributed to this: a growing appreciation for Christian education and a steadily increasing church membership. However, the five-acre (two-hectare) tract of land at Gadobangkong was not large enough to provide for the needed expansion, so in 1953 the present school site of 57 acres (22.7 hectares) of fertile soil was purchased, about 12 miles (20 kilometers) north of Bandung near the village of Cisarua. Some abandoned dairy barns near the site were rented for use as temporary dormitories, classrooms, and teachers' homes, and in January 1954 the school opened. As the students watched the new buildings being erected across the valley from their barn homes, they called the new site the Promised Land, and longed for their "exodus from Egypt." By the spring of 1957 the last of the students had moved out of the cow barns.

Senior College. After that there was growth both in physical plant and in enrollment. A fourth year in the ministerial course was authorized, and in 1964 the school was recognized by the General Conference as a four-year senior college, with majors in theology, education, and accounting, and minors in the same subjects, and also a two-year curriculum in secretarial science, elementary education, and home economics. The Indonesian government approved the status of the college and the university in 1982.

Most of the younger denominational workers and leaders in Indonesia are graduates of this college. Graduates are serving overseas also.

Ingathering

INGATHERING (known formerly as Harvest Ingathering; also called in various parts of the world by other names). An annual worldwide denominational appeal to, and gathering in of funds from, the general public. The campaign serves a double purpose: (1) it provides funds to aid a world program that includes medical, educational, welfare, and evangelistic projects, which bring relief and uplift to humanity and a living Christ to the world, and (2) it is a means of making contacts in millions of homes, whose occupants are presented with a special issue of a magazine that describes the worldwide work of Seventh-day Adventists and that offers the opportunity of enrolling in a Bible correspondence course. This solicitation has been conducted every year since 1903 and has been extended to all countries where there is SDA work, where permitted by the government. Solicitors are unpaid volunteers from among the church members in all walks of life.

The Seventh-day Adventist humanitarian program of welfare, medical, educational, and evangelistic projects is the church's attempt to follow the example of Jesus Christ, who went about doing good, healing the sick, teaching the people, and preaching the gospel. In North America increasingly larger amounts of the Ingathering funds are being used each year for Community Services that extend emergency relief irrespective of race, creed, or color.

Funds sent to overseas countries provide for many projects, such as clinics, dispensaries, leper colonies, mission schools—often the only facilities available to large populations. At the same time, about one third of the total funds collected in the Ingathering campaigns is contributed by donors in overseas countries. In many of these countries, significant projects have been carried out with such funds. For example, in China several hospitals were established with funds raised locally.

The funds gathered in this campaign comprise only about 10 percent of the total annual budget of the General Conference, the major source of funding being the tithes and offerings of SDA members.

Origin. The idea of giving away magazines and asking, in return, for contributions for the mission program originated with Jasper Wayne, a traveling salesperson of nursery stock, who lived in Sac City, Iowa. As he related the experience in 1903, he ordered 50 copies of a special issue of the Signs of the Times.

Receiving them at the post office, he unwrapped them and began to hand them out to people standing in the lobby, saying that any money received would go to the cause of foreign missions. To his surprise he disposed of them immediately and received more than $4 for missions.

About 10 days later another package of 50 papers arrived, sent by mistake. He took these papers with him in his buggy to use as occasion offered. The first man he approached gave 15 cents and the next 18 cents, and then a woman gave 25 cents. This gave him courage to suggest 25 cents thereafter; some gave larger sums. Receiving about $26 by distributing these 50 papers and realizing the possibilities in this plan of securing money for missions, he at once ordered 400 copies more to carry with him. In about a year he had raised about $100 with them and had greatly enjoyed explaining the work of the church.

In 1904, at a camp meeting held at Omaha, Nebraska, he interested the president of the Nebraska Conference in his plan. Though reluctant to speak before a large audience, he mustered his courage and explained his method at one of the meetings. Also, he had a talk with Ellen White, who was present at the camp meeting. She manifested a deep interest and gave the plan her endorsement (Christian Service, pp. 167—177).

In 1908 the General Conference recommended the Ingathering plan to all churches, approving the use of a special Thanksgiving number of the Review and Herald for informing the public of SDA work, and in gathering Thanksgiving gifts for missions.

Objectives and Goals. The Ingathering program, promoted by the GC Church Ministries Department, with financial aspects managed by the GC Treasury Department. The program has five objectives: (1) 100 percent membership participation, (2) total coverage of territory, (3) searching for persons interested in the gospel, (4) increased offerings, and (5) a thorough follow-up of interests.

During the early years of Ingathering no specific financial objectives were set. In 1915 members were encouraged to set for themselves voluntary individual goals as to the total amount raised. The principle of an individual goal was recommended to all divisions of the world field, and in 1934 it was recommended that conferences assign Ingathering goals for each church. In 1935 the Autumn Council recommended the Minute Man goal, representing appropriations from North America to maintain the work overseas for one minute. Beginning in 1948, the Bible correspondence school advertisement and coupon became a regular feature in the Ingathering magazines. In 1959 the Minute Man goal was replaced by the individual Silver Vanguard objective of $25.

Methods. The campaign, officially limited to a maximum of six weeks, is conducted by various methods—street solicitation, visits to places of business and to homes, singing bands, Christmas caroling, and correspondence.

Results. Through 1992, $509,380,626 had been gathered in the countries of the world. The sum of $67,247,599 was raised in the five-year period 1988—1992.

Ingersoll, Olive Grace (Perry)

INGERSOLL, OLIVE GRACE (PERRY) (1873—1955). Medical missionary to India; wife of Dr. Robert S. Ingersoll. At the age of 10 she was baptized by the Free Will Baptists, but her parents shortly afterward accepted the Seventh-day Adventist faith, and she was rebaptized in 1886. In 1892 she began work as corresponding secretary of the Michigan Tract Society, and in 1893 worked at the Battle Creek Sanitarium. The next year she enrolled in the medical course at the University of Michigan, from which she graduated in 1898. That same year she married Robert S. Ingersoll, a fellow graduate, went with him to India, and there shared his work. Upon their return to the United States she joined the staff of the Washington Sanitarium, then helped her husband operate a private sanitarium and later practiced privately with him and their son.

Ingersoll, Robert Stephenson

INGERSOLL, ROBERT STEPHENSON (1874—1955). Medical missionary to India. His parents became Seventh-day Adventists shortly after his birth, and he joined the church at the age of 14. In 1898 he graduated from the medical course at the University of Michigan, married a fellow graduate, Olive Perry, and sailed to India, where the two doctors joined the pioneer SDA medical missionary O. G. Place in Calcutta. After Place returned to the United States, the Ingersolls carried on the work of the Calcutta Sanitarium and helped to expand SDA medical work in India. Returning about 1909, Dr. Robert Ingersoll became superintendent of the Washington Sanitarium. Later, after briefly operating a private sanitarium, he headed the Florida Sanitarium at Orlando. From 1918 to 1930 he was superintendent of the Madison, Wisconsin, Sanitarium, after which he practiced privately in Wisconsin.

Ings, William

INGS, WILLIAM (d. 1897). Publishing house worker, minister. He was born in Hampshire County, England, but grew up in the United States. As a young man he entered the employ of the Review and Herald publishing house in Battle Creek. In 1877 he was sent to Switzerland to assist J. N. Andrews in equipping and organizing the new publishing house in Basel. On May 23, 1878, he went to England, the land of his birth, for a short vacation in Southampton. Before returning to Basel two weeks later he had won two converts to the Seventh-day Adventist faith. When Andrews heard the result of this brief visit, he arranged for Ings to return to England to establish the work there in that country.

Back in Southampton, Ings began distributing SDA publications and holding meetings. After 16 weeks he reported 10 people keeping the Sabbath. In answer to his earnest appeals for an experienced man to help him the General Conference sent J. N. Loughborough in December 1878 to take charge of the work in the British Isles. After this Ings left most of the preaching to Loughborough while he devoted most of his time to the circulation of SDA publications. The first baptism took place on Feb. 8, 1880.

In 1882 Ings returned to the United States and entered the work in the California Conference, where he was ordained in 1884. In 1886 he was called back to England to help establish a publishing house in London. In 1889 he returned to his post in California and remained there until his death in 1897.

Inisha Community Medical Centre

INISHA COMMUNITY MEDICAL CENTRE. A 46-bed medical institution that has grown out of the missionary activities of Ile-Ife Hospital (see Seventh-day Adventist Hospital Ile-Ife) in Nigeria. It is owned by the Inisha community, but the church operates the institution.

The clinic became a hospital in the early seventies when Dr. Gulleng was the medical director. The facilities (January 1993) include two wards, an Outpatient Department, one X-ray building, a medical laboratory, stores, kitchens, and two resident houses for medical doctors. In 1993 Inisha had 30,000 patients, 200 prenatal visits, and 300 deliveries.

Insight

INSIGHT (1970— ; weekly [except June-August 1974, 1975]; RH, 1994 circulation, 20,000; file in RH). A 16-page paper for readers ages 14 through 19.

Publication of The Youth's Instructor ceased in April 1970 under Editor Walter T. Crandall. A new youth magazine, Insight, began publication in May 1970. Insight developed from a special committee set up by the General Conference when it became apparent that the church needed to update its senior youth magazine.

The emphasis of Insight is the mission of Jesus Christ and its implications for young Christians. It offers practical ways of understanding Scripture and living the Christlike life. Helping young people live successfully through the trials and confusion of the last days is a prime objective.

Insight encourages reader involvement and builds Christian commitment and a sense of community for Seventh-day Adventist teens through a blend of feature articles, short stories, poetry, question-and-answer columns, youth testimonials, Bible explanation, youth service reports, and how-to articles. Articles are approximately 50 percent assigned and 50 percent freelance.

Editors: Donald Yost, 1970—1971; Roland Hegstad (acting), 1971—1972; Michael Jones, 1972—1975; Donald John, 1975—1981; Dan Fahrback, 1982—1985; Christopher Blake, 1986—1993; Lori Tripp Peckham, 1993— .

Insight/Out

INSIGHT/OUT (1988— ; monthly; RH; file in RH). A 16-page outreach paper for readers ages 14 through 19.

Insight/Out is a monthly edition of the weekly Insight subscription. It focuses on Christian life-changing themes while avoiding SDA jargon. Insight subscribers are encouraged to share this edition with non-SDA relatives, neighbors, classmates, workmates, and acquaintances and to order subscriptions for outreach to nonbelieving teens.

Inspiration of Scripture

INSPIRATION OF SCRIPTURE. In their statement of fundamental beliefs Seventh-day Adventists set forth their position on the inspiration of Scripture as follows: “The Holy Scriptures, Old and New Testaments, are the written Word of God, given by divine inspiration through holy men of God who spoke and wrote as they were moved by the Holy Spirit. In this Word, God has committed to man the knowledge necessary for salvation. The Holy Scriptures are the infallible revelation of His will. They are the standard of character, the test of experience, the authoritative revealer of doctrines, and the trustworthy record of God’s acts in history (2 Peter 1:20, 21; 2 Tim. 3:16, 17; Ps. 119:105; Prov. 30:5, 6; Isa. 8:20; John 17:17; 1 Thess. 2:13; Heb. 4:12)” (Church Manual [1990], p. 23).

SDAs do not believe in verbal inspiration, according to the usual meaning of the term, but in what may properly be called thought inspiration. The SDA point of view on this matter has best been set forth by Ellen White: “The Bible is written by inspired men, but it is not God’s mode of thought and expression. It is that of humanity. God, as a writer, is not represented. Men will often say such an expression is not like God. But God has not put Himself in words, in logic, in rhetoric, on trial in the Bible. The writers of the Bible were God’s penmen, not His pen. Look at the different writers.

“It is not the words of the Bible that are inspired, but the men that were inspired. Inspiration acts not on the man’s words or his expressions but on the man himself, who, under the influence of the Holy Ghost, is imbued with thoughts. But the words receive the impress of the individual mind. The divine mind is diffused. The divine mind and will is combined with the human mind and will; thus the utterances of the man are the word of God” (ISM 21).

“The Bible, with its God-given truths expressed in the language of men, presents a union of the divine and the human. Such a union existed in the nature of Christ, who was the Son of God and the Son of man. Thus it is true of the Bible, as it was of Christ, that ‘the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us’ (John 1:14).

“Written in different ages, by men who differed widely in rank and occupation, and in mental and spiritual endowments, the books of the Bible present a wide contrast in style, as well as a diversity in the nature of the subjects unfolded. Different forms of expression are employed by different writers; often the same truth is more strikingly presented by one than by another. And as several writers present a subject under varied aspects and relations, there may appear, to the superficial, careless, or prejudiced reader, to be discrepancy or contradiction, where the thoughtful, reverent student, with clearer insight, discerns the underlying harmony.

“As presented through different individuals, the truth is brought out in its varied aspects. One writer is more strongly impressed with one phase of the subject; he grasps those points that harmonize with his experience or with his power of perception and appreciation; another seizes upon a different phase; and each, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, presents what is most forcibly impressed upon his own mind—a different aspect of the truth in each, but a perfect harmony through all. And the truths thus revealed unite to form a perfect whole, adapted to meet the wants of men in all the circumstances and experiences of life” (GC vi).

The original autographs of Scripture have, of course, long since been lost, and the sacred documents have passed through the hands of countless copyists, redactors, and translators. Naturally, there have been certain modifications but, almost without exception, these have been of relatively minor importance. The Bible has been transmitted to us with vastly greater accuracy and reliability than any other similar ancient document. Of textual changes such as these, Ellen White wrote: “I saw that God had especially guarded the Bible; yet when copies of it were few, learned men had in some instances changed the words, thinking that they were making it more plain, when in reality they were mystifying that which was plain, by causing it to lean to their established views, which were governed by tradition. But I saw that the Word of God, as a whole, is a perfect chain, one portion linking into and explaining another. True seekers for truth need not err” (EW 220, 221).

“Some look to us gravely and say, ‘Don’t you think there might have been some mistake in the copyist or in the translators?’ This is all probable, and the mind that is so narrow that it will hesitate and stumble over this possibility or probability would be just as ready to stumble over the mysteries of the Inspired Word, because their feeble minds cannot see through the purposes of God. . . . All the mistakes will not cause trouble to one soul, or cause any feet to stumble, that would not manufacture difficulties from the plainest revealed truth” (MS 16, 1888; The Testimony of Jesus, pp. 12, 13).

We should not “lament that these difficulties exist, but accept them as permitted by the wisdom of God.” The Bible “is plain on every point essential to the salvation of the soul” (5T 706).

Despite the finite limitations of human language, and of the human writers, and of those through whose hands the sacred documents have since passed, the Scriptures as we have them today are sufficient to convey a knowledge of God’s infinite purpose for humanity and to lead all to salvation in Jesus Christ. Essential truth, perhaps obscure in one passage, shines forth with clear luster elsewhere. In their present state, and taken as a whole, the Scriptures are altogether adequate, for all practical purposes, to fulfill the purpose for which they were intended by their divine Author.

Institute of Church Ministry

INSTITUTE OF CHURCH MINISTRY. An official department of the Seventh-day Adventist Theological Seminary at Andrews University, founded in 1979 as the Institute of Church Ministry by Desmond Cummings, Jr. The purpose of this new institute was to share the expertise and resources of Andrews University with the SDA Church in North America, thus aiding denominational decision-makers and facilitating the larger church in the accomplishment of its goals. As such, ICM serves as the North American Division strategic resource center, with a sustaining grant from the division. In 1993 ICM became the home of the Center for Latino Research on Religion and Society, also sponsored by the North American Division. In addition to its ongoing relationship with NAD, ICM provides services on a fee basis for other denominational entities. It lists the General Conference, local conferences and churches, and SDA journals among its clients.

The work of ICM is based on the belief that the tools of social science can join with biblical and theological insights in advancing the objectives of the church. Its mission is conducted through field-based research, preparing marketing reports based on census data, publications, preparation of various materials, information processing, and consultation. Some of the areas in which ICM has been active are a 10-year longitudinal study of the retention of youth in the SDA Church, lay member involvement in local congregations, the most effective training for pastoral ministry, SDA Church growth factors, SDA ministerial morale, human relations, youth drug usage, church giving patterns, preferences of readers of the Adventist Review, SDA women in leadership, SDA Hispanics, and attitudes of SDA members in a variety of areas. The information gained has been shared with the church through published books, manuals, pamphlets, journal articles, and research reports. Some findings have been shared with the wider world through publications in scholarly journals. Institute personnel also make presentations at church conventions, ministers' meetings, teachers' meetings, camp meetings, and in local congregations.

In addition to full-time staff, ICM employs students to assist in the various tasks. These include seminary students in training for ministry, who gain valuable practical experience relevant to their future vocation. ICM also consults with other Andrews University faculty members in departments such as marketing, communications, and behavioral science when their expertise can prove beneficial in meeting a challenge. Desmond Cummings, Jr., served as director of the institute from 1979 to 1984. Roger L. Dudley has served as director from 1984.

Institute of World Mission

INSTITUTE OF WORLD MISSION. An entity of the Seventh-day Adventist Church that came into existence by Annual Council action in 1956. Because the missionary situation was radically changing at the time, it was felt that missionaries needed better training to cope with the new and ever-changing challenges of cross-cultural missions. It was voted that all newly appointed missionaries, missionaries on furlough, and national workers returning to their home fields would receive an intensive missionary training of six weeks' duration in such areas as missionary anthropology, the Adventist message in a changing world, health and hygiene, principles of Adventist mission work, and specific area studies.

The Annual Council action of 1956 was first implemented in the summer of 1966, when Myrl O. Manley and Gottfried Oosterwal led out in a four-week intensive training institute. It was conducted on the campus of Andrews University and attended by 21 newly appointed and furloughing missionaries.

From that year on, intensive training sessions on Adventist world mission have been conducted every summer. They became known as the Summer Institute of World Mission. At first they were of four weeks' duration. In 1971 an extra week was added, and the next year the Annual Council action of 1956 was fully implemented when another week was added to the program. In that same year the name Summer Institute of World Mission was dropped and the name Institute of World Mission adopted. Soon after the first training began, mission administrators in the field saw the great difference this new missionary training made in the life and work of the missionaries. They insisted that all missionaries should attend these institutes before departing for their fields of labor. In 1972 another institute was added, conducted in the winter. As the number of missionaries grew in this heyday of Adventist overseas missions, a third was added in 1975. From that year until the present three intensive missionary training programs have been conducted every year in North America: one in the summer, one in the fall, and one in the spring.

The effectiveness of such missionary training showed itself in many different ways: a sharp decline in the number of missionaries returning prematurely, an increase in the number of those who stayed longer than one term of service, less suffering from culture shock, and greater effectiveness in missionaries' work, including language learning.

As North America was not the only home base of missionaries at the time, areas such as Europe and Australia also showed an interest in offering better training for their missionaries. First in 1972, then in 1975, and again in 1978, Gottfried Oosterwal, who in 1969 had been appointed the director of the Institute of World Mission, led out in missionary training institutes in Europe. The first two were held on the campus of Newbold College, England, and the last one at the seminary at Collonges, France. Three years later these institutes led to the establishment of the European Institute of World Mission under the direction of Borge Schantz. In the same way, the Institute of World Mission spawned the Australian Institute of World Mission. Dr. Oosterwal first led out in a special missionary training program at Avondale College in 1981, and then every year from 1983 on. In 1993 the Australian Institute of World Mission was established with its own director, John Gate, and its own board.

At first the Institute of World Mission was organizationally linked to the newly established Department of World Mission at the SDA Theological Seminary, of which Gottfried Oosterwal was the founder and first chair (1969). As the institutes continued to grow in size and in number, and as new functions were added to their operation, a separate organization was needed for a more efficient operation. This happened in 1981 when what is now known as the Seventh-day Adventist Institute of World Mission was established, with its own board (chaired by the secretary of the General Conference), its own budgets, its own staff, and its own building. Dr. Oosterwal was called to lead out in this new and expanded venture of the institute. Besides the training of missionaries around the world, other functions given to the Institute of World Mission included research and publications on missions, missionary consultations in the field, and the promotion of missions in the SDA Church, worldwide.

As the institute grew in size, tasks, and functions, more staff were added. In 1971 Russell Staples joined Gottfried Oosterwal as a staff member of the Institute and the Department of World Mission. Four years later Werner Vyhmeister was called to join the staff, and in 1980 Nancy Vyhmeister was invited to join. After the separation of the Institute of World Mission from the Department of World Mission at the SDA Theological Seminary, Gottfried Oosterwal and Werner Vyhmeister stayed with the institute, while Russell Staples and Nancy Vyhmeister remained with the department.

In 1987 the institute ventured out into a new endeavor: the training of nonchurch workers for their assignment in cultures other than their own. This included business leaders, health personnel, educators, and people in technical aid and development. To accomplish this new venture, a separate organization was called into existence: the Center for Intercultural Relations. Structurally, this center is part of Andrews University. Gottfried Oosterwal is its director.

As of January 1993 the staff of the institute consisted of Gottfried Oosterwal, director; Jon Dybdahl, associate director; Reinder Bruinsma, staff member; and Mrs. Pam Swanson, administrative assistant. The institute is located in the Sutherland House on the campus of Andrews University, Berrien Springs, Michigan.

Institutes of Scientific Studies for the Prevention of Alcoholism

INSTITUTES OF SCIENTIFIC STUDIES FOR THE PREVENTION OF ALCOHOLISM. Organizations set up in various parts of the world to carry on research work and provide training in all phases of the alcohol problem. Sponsored by the National Committees for the Prevention of Alcoholism in the respective countries, these institutes carry on educational programs for the prevention of alcoholism through publications, films, forums, and radio and television programs.

Educationally, the institute conducts sessions at which instruction is given on the graduate level. The institute course of study is not designed primarily for the layman, though many civic-minded laymen attend the courses; it is intended for people on the professional level, such as teachers, educators, law-enforcement officials, public and mental health leaders, physicians, editors, social and welfare workers, and religious leaders.

Each session consists of lectures, discussion periods, seminars, forums, workshops, and field trips. Nationally and internationally known authorities lecture in their special fields. The scientific facts and basic information gained qualify the graduates of the sessions to work more effectively toward the prevention of alcoholism. In some of the sessions the students receive graduate university credit for their study. Selected lectures are transcribed and made available for permanent reference, and basic materials are published in reprint form for professional use.

The first Institute of Scientific Studies was established in 1950 at Loma Linda, California, at the Loma Linda University medical school. Since that time more than 1,000 students have pursued the annual course of study offered by that institute. In 1961 this institute began to offer a unique annual service to professional groups, the first Medical Seminar on Alcoholism being conducted that year in Los Angeles and in the same year the first in-service training workshop for public school teachers.

The second institute, established at American University in Washington, D.C., in 1956, became known as the Washington Institute of Scientific Studies.

The All-European Institute, sponsored by the European Bloc of the International Commission in cooperation with the International Bureau Against Alcoholism, was launched in 1955. Its first four sessions were held in Geneva, with subsequent sessions being held in various cities, including Vienna, Paris, Lausanne, Warsaw, London, Amsterdam, and Oslo. This organization is now called the International Council on Alcohol and Alcohol Addicts. The ICPA, apart from this cooperation, conducts seminars in the European area.

The All-Asian Institute, sponsored by the Southern Asia Bloc of the International Commission, was launched in 1956, and was conducted on the Wilson College campus in Bombay, India. Many prominent Indian leaders serve on the institute committee and take part in seminars.

The Australian Institute, plans for the launching of which were laid at the organizational meeting of the Australian National Committee on Oct. 13, 1958, conducted its first session on the medical college campus of the University of Sydney, Jan. 18—29, 1960.

The South African National Committee was organized on Sept. 14, 1959. Its first session was conducted on the campus of the Witwatersrand University, Jan. 2—13, 1961.

The first session of the Philippine Institute, conducted under the auspices of the Philippine National Committee, was conducted on the campus of the University of the Philippines, Apr. 10—21, 1961. This committee has continued to hold annual institutes and seminars throughout the Philippines with great success.

Other national institutes and seminars as a part of the ICPA program have been held in Mauritius, Cameroon, Kenya, Tanzania, Malagasy, Turkey, Korea, Japan, Sri Lanka, Israel, Iran, Zambia, Central African Republic, Togo, Brazil, and Yugoslavia. The First World Congress of the ICPA was held in Afghanistan in 1972.

INSTITUTIONAL RESEARCH. An activity that collects and analyzes data to provide information for administrative decision-making. Currently serving the Board of Higher Education, this service was begun in 1972 with the formation of the Board of Higher Education and since 1988 has been directed by Dallas Kindopp.

Institutional Services/ESDA

INSTITUTIONAL SERVICES/ESDA. The former purchasing agency of the General Conference designed to serve the denomination's institutions and its workers in the United States and overseas. It was administered by a general manager, assistant managers (East and West Coasts, U.S.A.), and treasurers, and had ordering, sales, automobile, export, and shipping departments. The sales department also distributed supplies, books, and syllabuses sponsored by the Educational, Health, Ministerial, Publishing, and Youth departments of the General Conference.

ESDA History

ESDA History. ESDA was a trade name, the significance of which is no longer known, but is believed to be the acronym for Seventh-day Adventist prefixed with an E, either for euphony or standing for "East," since there was an East Coast as well as a West Coast branch of the organization. The agency originated in 1920 as the Purchasing Bureau composed of H. H. Cobban, J. J. Ireland, L. A. Hansen, C. W. Irwin, H. H. Hall, and a member each from the Review and Herald, Pacific Press, and Southern Publishing associations.

Previous to this a small store had been operated for a time in the basement of the General Conference office primarily for the handling of packaged foodstuffs for the office workers.

L. A. Hansen, of the General Conference Medical Department, sensing that the overseas institutions, particularly sanitariums, needed help with their purchases, had made contact with various firms for discount purchasing. Later, schools and conference offices and institutions in foreign countries also were invited to channel their purchasing through the bureau, thus enabling all to receive lower prices.

In 1946 the name of Bureau was changed to Department of Purchase & Supply. In February 1947 the department was moved from two rooms in the basement of the General Conference building to what was then called the Northwestern Building (later renamed ESDA Building, at 107 Carroll Street, Takoma Park, Maryland).

During the early postwar years, when many articles were scarce, an unusually large amount of purchasing was carried on by ESDA for both overseas and North American organizations. As materials and products became more plentiful after the war years, the sales reached a level of approximately $2 million per year.

In 1950 the trade name of ESDA Sales & Service was adopted. Operation continued in the Northwestern Building until March of 1969 when the building was torn down to make way for the new General Conference office building, called the North Building. The administrative offices were moved to what had formerly been Dr. Queen's house at 7112 Willow Avenue. The rooms were remodeled and offices set up for the manager, export, and treasury sections. The store section was moved to the end of the warehouse building so as to continue to serve the local area on a limited basis. In June 1972, after the completion of the North Building, the administrative offices were moved to its fifth floor, with N. W. Litchfield, manager.

Institutional Services History

Institutional Services History. In 1956 John Knipschild, then superintendent of schools for the Southern California Conference, approached his conference president, R. R. Bietz, about experimenting in a new way of purchasing so as to save SDA schools and other SDA institutions purchasing funds by pooling the buying strength. Upon approval in the summer of 1956, bids were placed with leading manufacturers and distributors to supply for the school year 1956—1957, sanitary supplies, classroom paper supplies, sporting and playground equipment. As a result of the initial bid, more than $8,000 was saved over the preceding average five years of yearly purchasing. This was the beginning of developing a concept of buying to save metropolitan, urban and rural, large and small SDA institutions in their purchasing needs of all types of hardware and software supplies. This procedure was expanded and refined during the years that John Knipschild was superintendent of schools in the Southern California and Northern California conferences.

In 1968 the Pacific Union Conference invited Knipschild to join the Pacific Union as a full-time coordinating purchaser for the schools, churches, hospitals, rest homes, camps, and administrative office in its territory. At the same time, the North Pacific and Southwest unions requested to be a part of these pioneering services. The North Pacific employed James Costa to promote and clear orders for its union to Institutional Services/SDA—its first official name.

IS/ESDA History

IS/ESDA History. During the summer of 1973 John Knipschild was invited by the General Conference to take over the management of ESDA and reorganize the denominational purchasing procedures so as to incorporate buying and distribution procedures for the whole world field. In August 1973 the ESDA nomenclature was expanded to its current official title of Institutional Services/ESDA (abbreviated IS/ESDA), which merged the two organizations into one facility to provide expanded services to the world field through its headquarters office located in the General Conference North Building. IS/ESDA eventually became Adventist World Purchasing Service, which continued purchasing for the world field for a number of years. AWPS was closed in 1992 after the General Conference determined that each division and institution could handle its own purchasing.

History

History. The Inter-American Health Food Company was established in 1977 in order to become the coordinating and management organization for the newly emerging food factories that were then beginning to be established as separate institutions on the campuses of the Adventist senior colleges and universities in the Inter-American Division. The company headquarters were located at the division office in Miami, Florida.

Factories located in Navojoa, Mexico (Alimentos Colpac), Costa Rica (Fundacion CETEBEDI) and Jamaica (Westico Foods) were the first to join the Inter-American Health Food Company, presenting their first balance sheets in 1977. The Medellin Branch in Colombia joined in 1978. Montemorelos (Panificadora la Carlota) was established in 1980, and the Monterrey Restaurant opened its doors in 1985. The year 1987 saw the opening of the Trinidad Branch and the incorporation of the old Pacific Press printing plant into the operations of the company. The Mexico Sales Branch was organized in 1989. The Puerto Rico Branch was also established in 1989. The food work in Colombia expanded with the opening of the Cali (Viva Mejor) Branch in 1989, the starting up of the Bucaramanga (Viva Mejor) Branch in 1991, and the establishment of a farm and rice processing factory in Los Llanos in 1993.

INTER-AMERICAN HEALTH FOOD COMPANY, COLOMBIA BRANCH (Productos Icolpan). A bakery started in Colombia in 1978 that was incorporated into the Inter-American Division Health Food Company in 1979. See Inter-American Division Health Food Company.

Inter-American Health Food Company, Costa Rica Branch

INTER-AMERICAN HEALTH FOOD COMPANY, COSTA RICA BRANCH (Fundacion CETEBEDI). The Costa Rica food factory of the Inter-American Health Food Company and the philanthropic foundation (Fundacion CETEBEDI) that owns and operates it.

In 1954, under the leadership of Manuel Carvajal and the manager, Francisco Arroyo, the Vocational College of Central America, located in La Ceiba, City of Alajuela, Costa Rica, began a bakery with the purpose of creating a source of assistance for students with low incomes. The first bakery was so small that only one person was needed to distribute the bread on a bicycle with baskets attached to it, front and back

In 1960 Israel González was inspired by Miguel Drachenberg, who on his arrival began to promote the production of protein products. Drachenberg had established similar factories in Jamaica and Mexico.

Between 1974 and 1975 Kenneth Fleck brought about a more industrious and competitive tone to the operation of the bakery. Equipment was purchased in the United States, and managers were contracted to train the personnel working in the factory.

In 1980 the factory began to produce soy milk and other products based on soybeans, with the assistance of machinery that was imported from Mexico. These products were well accepted by the people in Costa Rica. Even high-ranking government officials became interested in how the soybean could be turned into milk and other useful healthy products.

In July 1980 a new building was constructed for the bakery and for the manufacture of soy proteins under the industry name Industrias Covac SA. In October 1987 the name was changed to Fundacion CETEBEDI, which implies objectives of education and the use of resources in the training of students. The new name better fitted the purpose for which the industry was started. Fundacion CETEBEDI also operates a printing press that serves the Central American Union as well as the needs of Costa Rica. Many of the workers in the Central American Union have been able to complete their studies because of the benefits provided by the bakery and the press.

Inter-American Health Food Company, Haiti Branch

INTER-AMERICAN HEALTH FOOD COMPANY, HAITI BRANCH. A food company located on the grounds of the Haitian Adventist College campus in Carrefour, Port-au-Prince, Haiti.

Planning for its installation commenced early in the 1980s. In 1986 commercial baking equipment was donated by ADRA/Holland through VIWOS. Political unrest caused a long delay, but after a break of several years, construction of the factory building commenced in 1991. ADRA/Canada provided substantial assistance toward the cost of this construction. The first manager, Lawrence Fowler, came from Australia in 1991 and completed the building equipment and installation.

Production commenced in July 1993. Initial products included a range of breads plus bottled potable water.

Boulangerie Adventiste is operated by the Inter-American Division and the Haitian Union for the benefit of the youth studying at Haiti Adventist College.

Manager: Lawrence W Fowler, 1991— .

Inter-American Health Food Company, Mexico-Montemorelos Branch

INTER-AMERICAN HEALTH FOOD COMPANY, MEXICO-MONTEMORELOS BRANCH (Panificadora la Carlota). A health food industry that is an active member of the Inter-American Health Food Company, with headquarters in Miami, Florida. It is situated in the heart of the citrus zone of Mexico, Montemorelos, in the state of Nuevo León, about 45 minutes from the northern city of Monterrey, on the campus of the Montemorelos University.

The factory area is approximately 15,000 square feet (1,400 square meters) including warehouses, work area, workshop, and offices. There are five principal lines of products: breakfast cereal products, cookies and bread, canned products, packaged products, and texturized products.

The history of Panificadora la Carlota is divided into two major stages—the period before it became a member of the Inter-American Division Health Food Company, and the time since it joined the Inter-American Division Health Food Company in 1979.

Before 1979 the bakery was a local industry serving only the community of Montemorelos and the students of the then Vocational and Professional College of Montemorelos, which later became Montemorelos University. Despite its local nature, the industry was always noted for its good bread.

When the Inter-American Health Food Company took over the management of the industry, it became an industry of influence both in the local and regional areas, and during the period 1979—1985 supplied a large portion of the bread for Montemorelos and Monterrey.

In 1985 Panificadora la Carlota began to diversify its production and became an industry selling its products throughout the country of Mexico. Breakfast cereals and whole-grain cookies and crackers were developed. Health food products were packaged and canned meat substitutes were made, and finally, with the gift of an extruder from the food company in Australia, the factory began to attend to the growing need for texturized soy protein in Mexico.

Panificadora la Carlota has specialized in employing students. Yearly it employs an average of 60 students studying at the University of Montemorelos, fulfilling the SDA ideal of combining study and work programs.

Managers: Meliquiades Sosa, 1979—1982; Emilo Wandersleben, 1982—1986; Cesar Campos, 1986—1987; Raul Pairo, 1987—1988; Juan Martin Mendoza, 1988—1990; Adolfo Ruiz, 1990— .

Inter-American Health Food Company, Mexico-Navojoa Branch

INTER-AMERICAN HEALTH FOOD COMPANY, MEXICO-NAVOJOA BRANCH (Alimentos Colpac). A health food factory working principally with health foods based on soybeans. It is located at Pacific Academy (Colegio del Pacifico), in Navojoa, Sonora, in northwest Mexico. Alimentos Colpac operates on an irrigated farm of 700 acres (285 hectares). Forty acres (15 hectares) are set aside for citrus crops and another plot for vegetables. There is also a manufacturing plant.

Alimentos Colpac originated in 1968 when Paul Allred commenced work with foods based on gluten and texturized soy protein. At its beginning the factory was administered by Pacific Academy, but for financial reasons the Colpac became part of the Inter-American Division Food Company on July 2, 1975.

This date marked the beginning of the second stage of development of Alimentos Colpac, during which its installations and equipment have been greatly improved. Its products are based on texturized soy protein, with variations in flavors, shapes, and sizes. Colpac also manufactures soy milk, breakfast cereals, and a wide variety of cookies, crackers, and whole-wheat products.

The production capacity of the factory can yield seven tons (6.5 metric tons) of texturized soy protein per day and up to 30,000 whole-grain cookies. Annual sales are in excess of $1 million.

The founder of the factory was Paul Allred; Pedro Midguet Sanchez helped in the area of production.

Managers: Jesus E. Ferreyra, 1975—1978; Filiberto Verduzco, 1979—1984; Juan M. Meza, 1984—1987; Adaias Rivas, 1988—1989; Manuel Rubio, 1990— .

Inter-American Health Food Company, Trinidad Branch

INTER-AMERICAN HEALTH FOOD COMPANY, TRINIDAD BRANCH (College Health Foods). A food factory on the campus of Caribbean Union College. Nestled in a beautiful valley, at just about the middle of the northern range, it was set up because exchange control restrictions made it difficult to import vegetarian foods.

This industry began operations in August 1987. It is owned by the Inter-American Division and the Caribbean Union Conference. The college is a recipient of the profits and benefits from industrial rents and student labor.

The products, which are well accepted by the islands of the Caribbean and the home base, consist of bakery items, granola, oats, bran, wheat germ, peanut butter, fruit mixes, nut mixes, dried soy products, frozen soy products, and nut meat.

A large portion (65—70 percent) of the workforce comes from student labor. The full-time staff range between 22 and 25 persons through the year.

The industry's first manager, Isaac Mohamed, is still at the helm, providing the leadership that gives stability, and is responsible for the steady growth rate of this potential giant.

Inter-American Messenger

INTER-AMERICAN MESSENGER (Mensajero Interamericano). (1927—1973; monthly, then quarterly; Spanish). Organ of the Inter-American Division for its Spanish-speaking members until 1974, when it was replaced by the Spanish edition of the world Review and Herald, La Revista Adventista, in a special monthly edition for the Inter-American Division. The Spanish-speaking members of the division also receive the monthly, four-page Chispazos de Interamerica.

The Mensajero Interamericano was nearly a duplicate of the English Inter-American Messenger, as seemed advisable. Beginning with the February 1937 issue, the Mensajero adopted the same volume and number as that of the Messenger.

The translating and printing of the Mensajero were done at the Pacific Press Branch in the Canal Zone until 1948, when the printing was given to the press at Antillian Junior College. The Mensajero was then edited and translated in the Inter-American Division office in Miami, Florida, and printed at the Montemorelos Vocational and Professional College in Montemorelos, Mexico, until it ceased to be published at the close of 1973. It had a circulation of 21,000 and was sent free to Spanish-speaking members.

Inter-American News Flashes

INTER-AMERICAN NEWS FLASHES (1924— ; 1927—1962 as Inter-American Division Messenger; monthly until 1970; quarterly since then, supplemented by the fortnightly, two-page Inter-American Messenger Flashes; file in GC). Official organ of the Inter-American Division. The first issue, a 12-page magazine bearing the date April 1924, was published to be a “channel of inspiration and blessing to the workers” of the newly organized Inter-American Division.

The Inter-American Messenger reported the activities, growth, and plans for future development of the work of the Seventh-day Adventist Church in the territory of the Inter-American Division and carried articles of an inspirational and instructional nature. The magazine was sent to church members in the English-speaking areas of the division and to a few readers in other divisions who have ties with Inter-America.

The Messenger was printed first at the Pacific Press Branch in the Canal Zone, from 1948 to 1953, at the Antillian Junior College in Cuba, then at the Caribbean Union College in Port of Spain, Trinidad. The periodical is edited at the Inter-American Division headquarters, which are situated in Miami, Florida.

A Spanish edition, Mensajero Inter-Americano, was issued monthly, and then quarterly, for Spanish-speaking members until replaced by the Spanish edition of the world Review and Herald, and a French edition, Messenger de la Division Inter-Americaine, at the same frequency for French-speaking members. The Inter-American News Flashes appears in Spanish (Chispazos de Interamerica) and French (Eclair d'Inter-Amerique).

Inter-American Publishing Association

INTER-AMERICAN PUBLISHING ASSOCIATION (Asociación Publicadora Interamericana). A publishing association with editorial and administration staff that coordinates the publishing of books and periodicals in the Inter-American Division. It has no printing facilities. A warehouse stores books printed by other denominational publishers or contracted printing companies.

The publishing house was established in January 1983, when Pacific Press Publishing Association, because of monetary restrictions among the countries of the Inter-American Division, passed on this responsibility to the IAD administration. This publishing association serves the three main languages of the IAD: Spanish, English, and French. The headquarters are located in Miami, Florida, and the editorial staff is located in Mexico. The printing work is done in Mexico, Colombia, Argentina, Spain, the United States, and the United Kingdom.

The publishing association markets on a worldwide basis. Finished goods are purchased from other publishers, or the plant negotiates the publishing rights of other books and magazines to be printed locally whenever the quality and the printing costs suit the needs.

In the beginning the administrative offices were located in one of the offices of the IAD headquarters in Miami, Florida. Later they were moved to a rented premises, and since 1991 the plant has had its own building at 1890 NW. 95th Avenue, Miami, Florida. It contains 19,000 square feet (1,770 square meters), of which 3,000 square feet (280 square meters) are dedicated to office space and 16,000 square feet (1,500 square meters) are for warehouse purposes.

The Inter-American Publishing Association serves its 950,000 Spanish-speaking members with trade books, missionary magazines, and subscription books for 4,000 regular and student colporteurs. It also provides subscription books for 550 French-speaking and 576 English-speaking regular and student colporteurs. Ninety percent of the English trade books are channeled by the publishing association from books printed by Pacific Press, Review and Herald, and other denominational publishers. The French constituency of the IAD is supplied for the most part with trade books printed at the Life and Health Publishing House in France. The entire division's sales operations for 1992 exceeded $6 million.

Because this is a division organization, the IAD president is the president of the board. The members are the division administrators, all the union presidents, and two division departmental directors. Day-to-day operations are overseen by a general manager and three associates.

International Commission for the Prevention of Alcoholism

INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION FOR THE PREVENTION OF ALCOHOLISM. An organization established in 1950 to help unite the efforts of leading citizens of various nations interested in solving the problems arising from beverage alcohol. In harmony with the trend of modern medicine, the emphasis of the commission is toward prevention rather than cure. Though the organization, whose program is exclusively of an educational nature, is recognized as nonsectarian and nonpolitical, Seventh-day Adventists took a leading part in launching the organization.

The commission consists of approximately 250 members chosen from every country on the basis of its respective population. Thomas R. Neslund now serves as ICPA executive director; Lincoln Steed is associate director.

The immediate objective of the commission is the setting up of affiliated National Committees in all major countries. W. A. Scharffenberg, instigator of the ICPA, along with Dr. Andrew C. Ivy and Dr. Haven Emerson, established the first National Committee in the United States in 1952. The major objective of each National Committee is to set up an Institute of Scientific Studies in strategic areas that will provide scientific training and conduct research work in all phases of the alcohol problem. Many such institutes have been established.

The commission also prepares and publishes authoritative materials for teachers and professional temperance workers, and for use in general educational work, and fosters a worldwide program for the prevention of alcoholism through films, forums, and radio and television programs. A book, Toward Prevention, has been published, featuring the best lectures during a 10-year period, and a series of basic scientific articles has been prepared in brochure form for distribution among professional groups. The organization sponsors a newsletter known as the ICPA Reporter, designed to keep members of the commission informed on the latest methods being used to check the rise and spread of alcoholism.

The commission endeavors to put the spotlight of science on alcohol in order to show alcohol's effects on the individual and the nation, and to encourage and publicize the educational, legislative, and social measures that have been effectively used against alcohol in various parts of the world.

International Health and Temperance Association

INTERNATIONAL HEALTH AND TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION. The organization set up by the General Conference to launch, foster, and coordinate the church's temperance program conducted throughout the world, both within the church and outside the church. Its constitution was adopted by General Conference action at the Autumn Council of 1947, at which time representatives from the world divisions were present.

The principal objectives of the International Health and Temperance Association are to enlighten the peoples of the various countries of the world concerning the effects of the use of alcoholic beverages, tobacco, and narcotics, to enlist the active participation of all church members and other interested persons in temperance endeavor, and to encourage the habits of better living.

The Executive Committee of the General Conference, and the presidents and executive secretaries of the various division and national societies affiliated with the International Health and Temperance Association, comprise the board of governors, which meets annually in connection with the Annual Council and quinquennially at the time of the General Conference session.

Membership in the International Health and Temperance Association consists of such division or national societies as may be sponsored by Seventh-day Adventist conference organizations throughout the world. Each division is encouraged to organize a society within its area, which in turn organizes and fosters a national society in each country in the division territory.

Members of the division committee and the presidents and executive secretaries of all the national societies affiliated with the division society serve as the board of governors for the division society.

Financial support for the International Health and Temperance Association comes from offerings and special contributions; 10 percent of the funds received through the annual Health and Temperance Offering is remitted to the association international headquarters for support of the worldwide work.

The International Health and Temperance Association uses its resources in educational and promotional programs of the world church, including Global Mission projects, Adventist Youth to Youth programs, and various training seminars.

Annually, the International Health and Temperance Association promotes the World Health and Temperance Day, at which time the basic health and temperance beliefs of the church are emphasized for church members, and the challenge of the church's temperance program for the church and the public is presented.

International Health Food Association

INTERNATIONAL HEALTH FOOD ASSOCIATION. A General Conference service organization made up of Seventh-day Adventist Church-owned food companies from around the world. The director coordinates the various phases of denominational food production and marketing activities throughout the world field. (For a brief history of Seventh-day Adventist food manufacture, see Food Companies.) The association received its current name in 1987 when the food companies, meeting in Brazil, recommended the adoption of a name that better described the aims and objectives of the church's food companies, which up to that time had been coordinated in their activities by the General Conference World Foods Service, which was established in 1968 by vote of the General Conference Autumn Council.

The association is a service of the General Conference for church-owned food companies that have separate institutional status. The officers of the association are appointed by the General Conference. The purpose of the association is to coordinate manufacturing and sales activities, to promote interchange of ideas and information among members, and to help establish standards for the types of foods produced and the manner in which food company business is run.

The association promotes the manufacture and distribution of health foods and supports SDA health principles as a way to better health. It also encourages the extension of church-operated food companies to new areas by encouraging members to contribute annually to a development fund, which is used to assist in the establishment of new industries. The association also provides technical assistance to church-owned industries that do not yet qualify for separate institutional status.

In 1992 there were 49 food factories affiliated with the International Health Food Association. These factories operated in 25 countries and had a combined annual turnover in excess of $285 million. They employed a total of 708 students and had 3,800 full-time employees.

International Medical Missionary and Benevolent Association

INTERNATIONAL MEDICAL MISSIONARY AND BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION. A legal corporation founded in 1893 under the name Seventh-day Adventist Medical Missionary and Benevolent Association (renamed International Medical Missionary and Benevolent Association in 1896). It was dissolved in 1904. The association aimed to promote the medical activities of the denomination and to hold the properties of the church's medical and charitable enterprises. The objectives of the association, specifically, were "to erect and manage homes for orphan children and for friendless aged persons, also hospitals and sanitariums for the treatment of the sick poor and others, the same to be either self-supporting or supported in whole or in part by funds secured for the purpose; to establish dispensaries in cities, medical missions at home and abroad, visiting nurses' work, Christian Help work; to educate missionary physicians and nurses; to provide for the needy poor; to promulgate the principles of health and temperance and to do good in a variety of ways" (Yearbook of the International Medical Missionary and Benevolent Association, 1896, pp. 58, 59).

Although the association was intended to be a holding corporation for the several Seventh-day Adventist sanitariums and other enterprises, in practice it became a consultative body with a constituency composed of the General Conference Committee, presidents of local conferences, several men appointed for two-year terms by the General Conference in session, all donors of $1,000 or more to its treasury, and delegates from the various sanitariums and subsidiary organizations. On the administrative side, it became the employing agency for the Seventh-day Adventist medical missionaries. Dr. J. H. Kellogg was its prime mover and president. The activities of the association were taken over largely by the Medical Department (now Health and Temperance Department) of the General Conference that was created in 1905.

International Religious Liberty Association

INTERNATIONAL RELIGIOUS LIBERTY ASSOCIATION. An organization founded to disseminate the principles of religious liberty throughout the world, and to defend the right of all men to worship (or not to worship) as their consciences shall dictate; and incorporated to hold title to property or to receive bequests to be used to achieve the objectives of this corporation.

The association was formally incorporated Aug. 16, 1946, in the District of Columbia by

S. A. Wellman, E. W. Dunbar, and H. H. Votaw.

The IRLA board of trustees is elected at biennial sessions. Provision is made in the bylaws for an unlimited number of members, including Seventh-day Adventists and others interested in the aims of the organization. The board elects a president, vice presidents, a secretary-general, associate secretaries, and a treasurer. This association developed out of an earlier International Religious Liberty Association, organized in 1893, which in turn was a development of the National Religious Liberty Association organized in 1889. The offices were in New York City until, in March 1898, the office was moved to Chicago, Illinois, where it remained until the transfer of denominational headquarters to Washington, D.C., in 1904.

Affiliated religious liberty associations have also been organized in a number of countries, most recently in India, Romania, Russia, Poland, Hungary, and Croatia.

The International Association for the Defense of Religious Liberty, located in Bern, Switzerland, is a sister organization with which the IRLA closely cooperates. The latter is in consultative status with the United Nations Economic and Social Council.

The most visible activity of the IRLA has been the organization of world congresses in Amsterdam (1977), Rome (1984), and London (1989); and regional congresses in New Delhi (1986), Nairobi (1991), and Suva, Fiji (1993). It has also cosponsored religious liberty conferences in Parma (1988), Budapest (1992), and Moscow (1993). The first international conference regarding human rights to be held in Albania after atheistic rule was cosponsored by the IRLA and the University of Tirane in 1992.

Investigative Judgment

INVESTIGATIVE JUDGMENT. A Seventh-day Adventist term for the preliminary phase of the great final judgment by which God intervenes in human affairs to bring the reign of sin to a close and to inaugurate Christ's eternal reign of righteousness (see Dan. 7:9, 10, 13, 14). This opening phase is called an investigative judgment because it consists of an examination of the life records of all who have ever professed to accept salvation in Christ and whose names are therefore inscribed in "the Lamb's book of life." Its purpose is to verify their eligibility for citizenship in God's eternal kingdom. At the close of the investigative judgment the sins of those who have endured to the end are "blotted out" from the books of record and the names of all others are stricken from the book of life (Ex. 32:32, 33; Rev. 3:5; 20:12, 15; 22:19). Seventh-day Adventists teach that in view of the fact that at His second coming Christ rewards "every man according as his work shall be" (Rev. 22:12; cf. Rom. 2:5—11), it is evident that this investigation of the life record takes place before He returns to earth to gather the elect. The divine proclamation "Fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of his judgment is come," is specifically presented as preceding the Advent (Rev. 14:7; cf. v. 14).

To be sure, God does not need to investigate the records in order to learn or to determine who is eligible to be saved. It is for the benefit of all created beings that the facts with respect to each person's fate should be known, as an assurance to all that justice has been done and as a guarantee of the eternal stability of the divine government. The Bible writers speak of "books" in which God keeps a record of character-of good and evil deeds as measured by a person's knowledge of, and voluntary relationship to, divine grace and God's revealed will (Ex. 32:32; Mark 16:16; Phil. 4:3; James 4:17; Rev. 20:12, 13; 22:11, 12).

The doctrine of the investigative judgment is an integral part of the sanctuary doctrine, and relates especially to the fulfillment in antitype of the ancient Day of Atonement service. In brief, the Day of Atonement consisted, in figure, of a review of the individual records of God's people-of their personal relationship to God through the sanctuary ministrations. At the close of the special service of the day a final disposal of all sins that had been confessed, forgiven, and transferred in figure to the sanctuary during the preceding year was made; the sanctuary was "cleansed" of the record of these sins removed (see Lev. 16).

Persons whose sins were included in this work of cleansing were released from further responsibility for their past record of sin, and their status under the covenant relationship was revalidated. Those no longer eligible to continue in the covenant relationship were to be "cut off" from Israel. The ancient Day of Atonement was thus a day on which the eligibility of each individual Israelite to continue under the covenant relationship was reviewed, and it was therefore a day of judgment (see SB, Nos. 111—118; SDADic, "Atonement, Day of").

Development of Seventh-day Adventist View. William Miller based his 1843/1844 message chiefly on the text (Dan. 8:14) "Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed," holding that the period of time here specified terminated in that year (see Sanctuary; Twenty-three Hundred Days). He understood this cleansing of the sanctuary to involve a work of judgment and to consist in the purification of this earth by the fires of the last day, at the second coming of Christ in power and glory. When, after the disappointment of 1844, those who later became Seventh-day Adventists reviewed Miller's interpretation of Dan. 8:14, they became convinced of the validity of Miller's exposition of the time period, but concluded that the sanctuary here referred to is the sanctuary in heaven, mentioned in the book of Hebrews, where Christ now ministers as our great high priest. Inasmuch as the earthly sanctuary and its services were types of the heavenly sanctuary (Heb. 8:2, 5; 9:6—9, 23; cf. Ex. 25:8, 9), as the earthly sanctuary was cleansed on the ancient Day of Atonement (Lev. 16), and as the earthly sanctuary ceased to exist in A.D. 70, early SDAs concluded that the cleansing of the sanctuary foretold in Dan 8:14 must refer to a counterpart of the ancient Day of Atonement to be conducted in the heavenly sanctuary. The SDA understanding of a cleansing of the heavenly sanctuary, of a great antitypical day of atonement, and of an investigative judgment is based on this analogy drawn in the book of Hebrews between the earthly and heavenly sanctuaries.
