The view that the sanctuary to be cleansed in 1844 is the one in heaven was first written out by Owen R. L. Crosier, in the Day-Dawn in 1845 and in the Day-Star Extra of Feb. 7, 1846. Crosier emphasized two aspects of the antitypical cleansing—the blotting out of sins and the disposal of sins by placing them, in figure, on the head of the scapegoat. This he based on Acts 3:19: “Repent ye therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out, when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord.”

Crosier connected this blotting out of sins with the cleansing of the sanctuary from the sins of the people on the ancient Day of Atonement. “A little attention to the law will show that the sins were borne from the people by the priest, and from the priest by the goat. 1st, They are imparted to the victim. 2nd, The priest bore them in its blood to the Sanctuary. 3rd, After cleansing them from it on the 10th day of the seventh month, he bore them to the scape-goat. And 4th, The goat finally bore them away beyond the camp of Israel to the wilderness. This was the legal process, and when fulfilled the author of sins will have received them back again, (but the ungodly will bear their own sins,) and his head will have been bruised by the seed of the woman” (ibid. 43).

About the time Crosier was first writing his view concerning the heavenly sanctuary William Miller wrote a letter (Mar. 20, 1845) in which he applied the judgment-hour message to the closing ministry of Christ in the heavenly sanctuary: “That the prophetic numbers did close in 1844, I can have but little doubt. What then was there worthy of note that could be said to answer to the ending of the periods under these numbers so emphatically describing the end? I answer. The first thing I will notice is, ‘The hour of his Judgment is come.’ I ask, is there any thing in the scriptures to show that the hour has not come, or in our present position to show, that God is not now in his last Judicial character deciding the cases of all the righteous, so that Christ (speaking after the manner of men) will know whom to collect at his coming or the angels may know whom to gather when they are sent to gather together the elect, whom God has in this hour of his Judgment justified? Rom. 8:33. . . . It also seems by John's description of this event, Rev. 19:1, 2, 11, that the scene of the Judgment begins in heaven, and the first thing mortals on earth will see will be the messenger of God, Rev. 20:1, who is Jesus Christ, descending from God, to execute the Judgment written in heaven, and fulfill the decrees and promises made in heaven by him who sitteth on the great white throne. . . . If this is true, who can say God is not already justifying his Sanctuary, and will yet justify us in preaching the time?" (Day-Star 5:31, Apr. 8, 1845).

Judging by their writings, Adventists who later formed the Seventh-day Adventist Church did not notice William Miller's suggestion relating the judgment of Rev. 14:6, 7 to the cleansing of the sanctuary mentioned in Dan. 8:14.

In his initial explanation of the October 1844 disappointment, Hiram Edson had spoken of Christ's having "a work to perform" in the heavenly sanctuary after the end of the 2300 days and before His return, but he gave no further explanation. Crosier's expanded discussion of the sanctuary in his 1846 article did not connect the cleansing of the sanctuary with the judgment. The nearest approach to the idea was an allusion to "the breast-plate of judgment" worn over the heart of the high priest when he went into the Holy of Holies on the Day of Atonement, "that he may bear their judgment" (Day-Star 9:40, Extra, Feb. 7, 1846).

He may or may not have derived this from Enoch Jacobs, who in November 1844 spoke of the names of the children of Israel on the "breast-plate of judgment" as typifying the people whose sins are put away before Christ personally returns, and suggested the possibility that on the antitypical Day of Atonement, the tenth day of the seventh month, Jesus had begun to sit in judgment and was on His way to execute the judgment in person (Western Midnight Cry 4:19, Nov. 29, 1844).

Neither is it clear whether Jacobs derived this idea of the final putting away of sins from a letter he had received from William Miller (dated Nov. 22) in which Miller, replying to an inquiry, wrote that Christ would come as judge, to bear our sins away; "that our sins cannot be blotted out until Christ comes to judge His people is evident from . . . Rom. 14:10; 2 Cor. 5:10; Rom. 2:6" (ibid. 4:26, Dec. 21, 1844).

Nor is it possible to find a connection between the SDA view and the earlier reference by Josiah Litch (Prophetic Expositions [1842], vol. 1, pp. 49—54) to a preliminary phase of the judgment—the examination, or trial, of every person preceding the resurrection, and the execution of the judgment at the Second Advent. The various elements—the blotting out of sins, the putting away of sins, the examination of the books, the cleansing of the sanctuary from the sins—were all present in Millerite thinking, but the synthesis cannot be traced exactly.

By 1849, when the early Seventh-day Adventist group had well established its identity, Ellen White wrote: "I saw that Jesus would not leave the Most Holy Place until every case was decided either for salvation or destruction" (Present Truth 1:22, August 1849; reprinted in EW 36), yet she did not call it the judgment.

In the same year David Arnold (Present Truth 1:43—45, December 1849) and the next year Joseph Bates (Review and Herald 1:22, December 1850) echoed the phrase "breast-plate of judgment," and carried the idea further, to equate the coming of the Bridegroom to the wedding with the entrance of the high priest into the Holy of Holies on the Day of Atonement, blotting out the sins of those whose names are on the breastplate (in the antitype, the Israel of God), but neither mentions the judgment. James White did not mention the breastplate of judgment in his article in Present Truth 1:75—79, May 1850; and in another discussion of the sanctuary doctrine (Review and Herald 1:29, January 1851), he mentioned only the removal of sins by placing them on the head of the scapegoat. In 1853 J. N. Andrews wrote a series of articles on the sanctuary. When he came to the cleansing on the Day of Atonement, he mentioned only the blotting out of sins and the transfer of sins to the scapegoat (Review and Herald 3:147, 148, Feb. 3, 1853).

However, in 1854 J. N. Loughborough, like William Miller in 1845, connected the cleansing of the sanctuary as a work of judgment with the message of the first angel of Rev. 14: “The hour of his judgment is come.” He asked: “What was that work of cleansing? Is the work of cleansing the Sanctuary fitly heralded by the first angel’s message? in other words, Is it a work of judgment? For light on this subject, we shall be obliged to go to the type. Let us look at the type. See the high priest preparing himself to cleanse the Sanctuary; almost the first thing he did was to gird upon him the breast plate of judgment. For what does he put that on? It certainly looks as though he was going to do a judgment work. . . .

“Now read 1 Pet. iv. Verse 5 declares that Christ is ready to judge the quick and the dead. Verse 7. ‘But the end of all things is at hand.’ Verse 11. ‘If any man speak let him speak as the oracles of God.’ (Oracles ten commandments. See Acts vii, 38.) Why speak as the oracles of God? Because the oracles are the duty brought out by the third angel’s message. Verse 17. ‘The time is come that judgment must begin at the house of God: and if it first begin at us, what shall the end be of them that obey not the gospel of God.’ Verse 19. Commit the keeping of your souls to God. 1 Tim. v, 24. ‘Some men’s sins are open before-hand going before to judgment.’ We see by this what the judgment is that the first angel of Rev. xiv refers to” (ibid. 4:30, Feb. 14, 1854).

The next year Uriah Smith formally developed the idea of judgment, building also on the connection between the cleansing of the sanctuary and the judgment-hour message: “The work of cleansing the earthly sanctuary was a work of judgment. The high priest went into the most holy place, bearing the breast-plate of judgment, and on that breast-plate the names of the twelve children of Israel, to make an atonement for the holy sanctuary, and for all the people of the congregation. Lev. xvi, 33. This prefigured a solemn fact; namely, that in the great plan of salvation, a time of decision was coming for the human race; a work of atonement, which being accomplished, God’s people, the true Israel, should stand acquitted, and cleansed from all sin. . . . We read in Dan. vii, 10, that the judgment was set, and the books were opened. Again in Rev. xx, 12, the books were opened, and the dead were judged out of those things written in the books, according to their works. From this we learn that a record is kept of the acts of all men; and from that record, their reward is given them according to their deserts. There is no judgment in this sense of the term, independent of these books of record; but we read [1 Pet. iv, 17] that there is a time when judgment must begin at the house of God; when some men’s sins are open beforehand, going before to judgment; [1 Tim. v, 24]; and if, says Peter, it first begin at us what shall the end be of them that obey not the gospel of God. This must be a judgment of the same nature and can refer to no other work than the closing up of the ministration of the heavenly Sanctuary, hence that work must embrace the examination of individual character; and we conclude that the lives of the children of God, not only those who are living, but all who have ever lived, whose names are written in the Lamb’s book of life, will during this time pass in final review before that great tribunal. We see, therefore, how in this respect, the work of the type is infinitely surpassed by that of the antitype. . . .

“The first angel proclaimed, Fear God and give glory to him; for the hour of his Judgment is come. At the end of the 2300 days, when that message closed, had that time come? If the judgment scene which takes place in the second apartment of the Sanctuary, to which this proclamation doubtless refers, did not then commence, it had not come; and the first angel with his message, was too fast. But we believe that work did there commence; that there was the time when judgment began at the house of God, and the time came when Daniel, and all the righteous in the person of their Advocate should stand in their lot” (ibid. 7:52—54, Oct. 2, 1855).

Finally, in 1857, James White rounded out the doctrine, using “investigative judgment”: “The time is come that judgment must begin at the house of God, and if it first begin at us, what shall the end be of them that obey not the gospel of God? And if the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear? 1 Pet. iv, 17, 18.

“This text we must regard as prophetic. That it applies to the last period of the church of Christ seems evident from verses 5—7, 12, 13. In the judgment of the race of man, but two great classes are recognized—the righteous and the sinner, or ungodly. Each class has its time of judgment; and, according to the text, the judgment of the house, or church, of God comes first in order.

“Both classes will be judged before they are raised from the dead. The investigative judgment of the house, or church, of God will take place before the first resurrection; so will the judgment of the wicked take place during the 1000 years of Rev. xx, and they will be raised at the close of that period.

“It is said of all the just, ‘Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection,’ therefore all their cases are decided before Jesus comes to raise them from the dead. The judgment of the righteous is while Jesus offers his blood for the blotting out of sins. Immortal saints will reign with Christ 1000 years in the judgment of the wicked. Rev. xx, 4; 1 Cor. vi, 2, 3. The saints will not only participate in the judgment of the world, but in judging fallen angels. See Jude 6.

‘Some men’s sins [the righteous] are open before hand, going before to judgment, and some men [the wicked] they follow after.’ 1 Tim. v, 24. That is, some men lay open, or confess their sins, and they go to judgment while Jesus’ blood can blot them out, and the sins be remembered no more; while sins unconfessed, and unrepented of, will follow, and will stand against the sinner in that great day of judgment of 1000 years.

“That the investigative judgment of the saints, dead and living, takes place prior to the second coming of Christ seems evident from the testimony of Peter. ‘Who shall give account to him that is ready to judge the quick [living] and the dead.’ . . . 1 Pet. iv, 5—7.

“It appears that the saints are judged while some are living and others are dead. To place the investigative judgment of the saints after the resurrection of the just, supposes the possibility of a mistake in the resurrection, hence the necessity of an investigation to see if all who were raised were really worthy of the first resurrection. But the fact that all who have part in that resurrection are ‘blessed and holy,’ shows that decision is passed on all the saints before the second coming of Christ. . . .

“When will the cases of the living saints pass in review in the investigative judgment of the house of God? This is a question worthy the candid and most solemn consideration of all who have a case pending in the court of heaven, and hope to overcome. In the order of heaven, we must look for their judgment to follow that of the dead, and to occur near the close of their probation” (“The Judgment,” ibid. 9:100, Jan. 29, 1857).

Summary of Seventh-day Adventist View. The best presentation of the investigative judgment in current SDA literature is the chapter entitled “The Investigative Judgment,” in

The Great Controversy, by Ellen White, from which the following summarizing sentences are taken:

“The work of the investigative judgment and the blotting out of sins is to be accomplished before the second advent of the Lord” (p. 485).

“He comes to the Ancient of days in heaven . . . at the termination of the 2300 days in 1844. . . . Our great High Priest enters the Holy of Holies, and there appears in the presence of God, to engage in the last acts of His ministration in behalf of man-to perform the work of investigative judgment” (p. 480).

“The intercession of Christ in man’s behalf in the sanctuary above is as essential to the plan of salvation as was His death upon the cross” (p. 489).

“In the great day of final atonement and investigative judgment, the only cases considered are those of the professed people of God” (p. 480).

“Beginning with those who first lived upon the earth, our Advocate presents the cases of each successive generation, and closes with the living” (p. 483).

“Every man’s work passes in review before God, and is registered for faithfulness or unfaithfulness” (p. 482).

“The books of record in heaven, in which the names and the deeds of men are registered, are to determine the decisions of the judgment” (p. 480).

“The law of God is the standard by which the characters and the lives of men will be tested in the judgment” (p. 482).

“All who have truly repented of sin, and by faith claimed the blood of Christ as their atoning sacrifice, have had pardon entered against their names in the books of heaven; as they have become partakers of the righteousness of Christ, and their characters are found to be in harmony with the law of God, their sins will be blotted out, and they themselves will be accounted worthy of eternal life” (p. 483).

“When any have sins remaining upon the books of record, unrepented of and unforgiven, their names will be blotted out of the book of life, and the record of their good deeds will be erased from the book of God’s remembrance” (p. 483).

“When the work of the investigative judgment closes, the destiny of all will have been decided for life or death” (p. 490).

“When the investigative judgment closes, Christ will come, and His reward will be with Him to give to every man as his work shall be” (p. 485).

Iowa Conference

IOWA CONFERENCE. A unit of church organization that existed from 1863 to 1980. The Iowa Conference was a part of the Northern Union Conference in 1980. In that year the Iowa Conference merged with the Missouri Conference. These are the statistics reported in early 1980: churches, 60; members, 4,473; church schools, 18; church school teachers, 31; ordained ministers, 16; licensed ministers, 9.

Local churches

Local churches at the time of the merger in 1980 were Albia, Ames, Atlantic, Audubon, Bedford, Bloomfield, Boone, Burlington, Cedar Rapids, Centerville, Charles City, Cherokee, Clinton, Council Bluffs, Creston, Davenport, Delphos, Des Moines, Dubuque, Estherville, Exira, Fairfield, Forest City, Fort Madison, Glenwood, Greenfield, Grinnell, Guthrie Center, Hampton, Harlan, Hawarden, Hawkeye, Humboldt, Indianola, Iowa City, Keokuk, Knoxville, Lake City, Marshalltown, Mason City, Missouri Valley, Muscatine, Nevada, Newton, Onawa, Osceola, Oskaloosa, Ottumwa, Ruthven, Sioux City, Spencer, Spirit Lake, Toledo, Ute, Village Creek, Washington, Waterloo, Waukon, and Winterset.

Early History.

Early History. Early contact with Iowa is indicated in a letter to the Review and Herald (editorial office dated Feb. 17, 1856), in which Alvarez Pierce of Hardin County, Iowa, stated that although he was isolated, he was a faithful member and appreciated receiving the Review. Probably the first evangelistic sermons in Iowa were delivered by Joseph Bates in response to an invitation from W. and H. Bates, who had recently moved to Iowa from Illinois. Beginning Apr. 24, 1856, he gave a course of lectures at a schoolhouse in Pony Hollow, Clayton County, and also preached at a number of other places.

On May 1 Bates went to Waukon, in Allamakee County, and was welcomed by a group of about 30 Seventh-day Adventists who had moved there recently from New England and New York, including the families of Andrews, Butler, Stevens, and Loughborough. Some of these families had felt hurt over the removal of the place of publication of the Review and Herald from the East to Battle Creek, and J. N. Andrews and J. N. Loughborough, ministers among the group, were discouraged.

In December 1856 James and Ellen White drove through snow and ice across the Mississippi River to Waukon to encourage Andrews and Loughborough to enter the field again. This resulted in a revival at Waukon and the return of the two ministers to the work.

The preceding summer Jesse Dorcas had made a lecture tour through the southern part of the state. In the latter part of 1857 Moses Hull conducted the first sustained evangelistic campaign in Iowa. The members at Decatur City were so well pleased with his services that they rented a home for him and presented him with a horse and buggy.

E. B. Saunders, in April 1858, eager to spread the Word of God in Iowa, appealed to the leading brethren of the denomination to send an evangelistic tent, guaranteeing transportation expenses and offering to spend at least half of his time working as a tent hand. In response to this appeal Vermont sent its tent (there were only three in the denomination at this time), and thus the Adventist believers held their first Iowa tent meetings in Lisbon that summer. J. H. Waggoner, who led in these meetings, reported that preachers were busy circulating falsehoods against Adventists and stirring up bitter prejudice, but that the people were listening gladly. The tent was moved to Iowa City later that summer, where James White came and preached.

On Feb. 15, 1859, Hiram Westover of Afton, Iowa, sent an appeal for a minister and wrote that W. H. Brinkerhoff, a lawyer by training, was preaching. He told of hard times and of his gratitude for the Review even though he was unable to pay for it. Westover, who owned two farms, was willing to sell one in order to secure the services of Moses Hull, but he could not find a buyer, nor could he find any money to borrow. Under the leadership of Jesse Dorcas, representatives of several companies organized the southern Iowa tent committee and made pledges for the purchase of a tent for Iowa.

With this tent, in the summer of 1859, M. E. Cornell and Moses Hull held a series of meetings at Knoxville. Widespread rumors that the ministers were Mormon polygamists only served to arouse an interest; attendance averaged 600 to 800. A church of 50 was organized, which by April of the next year reported a membership of about 100. When James and Ellen White visited there in March 1860, opponents accused them of being Mormons and threatened to tar and feather them. After a few meetings, however, the ill feelings melted and the crowds grew to such a size that it was necessary to take the windows out of the courthouse, where the meetings were held, in order for those outside to hear. It was here, at a time when the Sabbath school idea was new among Adventists, that the first Sabbath school in Iowa was organized with 70 members. Knoxville thus became the stronghold of Adventism in Iowa.

A hindrance to growth was found in the difficulty of separating the orthodox from the extremist, since no organization had been provided for by the leaders at Battle Creek—not even a name. The church at Fairfield, Iowa, organized with 48 members in June 1860, called themselves “The Church of the Living God”; and the Marion brethren, numbering 50, organized in July as the “Church of Jesus Christ.” The first company to organize with the name Seventh-day Adventists was the one at Richmond with 31 members.

Organization of the Iowa Conference. When Brinkerhoff, now a minister, proposed organizing two conferences in Iowa, James White endorsed the idea, and Brinkerhoff called the meeting to organize the Southern Iowa Conference at Knoxville, on Mar. 16, 1862. Thirteen delegates, representing seven churches, chose H. C. Whitney president and R. S. Patterson secretary. A line from Council Bluffs to Des Moines and thence to the Mississippi River was the territorial boundary for the Northern and Southern Iowa conferences. The Northern Iowa Conference was organized at Marion on May 10, 1862, with nine delegates from six churches. They elected J. T. Mitchell president and M. B. Smith secretary.

Before a year had rolled around, however, the two-conference setup was dissolved, and at a meeting at Fairview on Jan. 25, 1863, delegates from nine churches (Waterloo, West Union, Waukon, Marion, Lisbon, Millersburg, Knoxville, Dayton, and Fairview) organized themselves into the Iowa State Conference of Seventh-day Adventists, with J. T. Mitchell as chair and M. B. Smith as secretary. Another meeting was called for autumn. In May the General Conference was organized, and on September 20, when the Iowa delegates met again at Pilot Grove, they adopted the constitution recommended by the General Conference and elected B. F. Snook as the first conference president and W. H. Brinkerhoff as secretary-treasurer.

Subsequent History. The year 1865 saw a division in Iowa. Snook and Brinkerhoff returned from the General Conference session in the spring of that year with a critical attitude toward James and Ellen White and other leaders, and began to spread their disaffection among the churches. At the Iowa Conference session later in the year efforts of the Whites to conciliate them seemed to succeed, yet shortly afterward the old objections loomed large once more. One of their criticisms was that the counsels of Mrs. White during the Civil War had not given them the help needed in a time of crisis but dealt with less important matters. Their real objections seem to have been their loss of confidence in the leaders and an unwillingness to support the Whites. A change of leadership in Iowa was needed and the Iowa Conference elected as president George I. Butler, then still a layman, elder of the Waukon church. An open revolt resulted, with about half the Marion church following the dissidents into a new movement with headquarters at Marion. H. E. Carver, elected conference secretary, soon joined the Marion Party. Finally the Marion group was disfellowshipped in 1866. After this severe blow to the youthful conference, the General Conference sent seasoned workers, A. C. and D. T. Bourdeau and W. S. Ingraham, who brought prosperity out of chaos in Iowa.

In 1868, only a few weeks after the first Seventh-day Adventist camp meeting at Wright, Michigan, the first Iowa camp meeting was held at Pilot Grove in Washington County. On the last day of the meeting J. N. Andrews baptized 32.

Congregations increased rapidly in the seventies. Osceola, Ruthven, Cherokee, Union, Davis City, Fremont, Bentonsport, and Buffalo Grove joined the sisterhood of churches. Of the 13 companies of Scandinavians scattered in various parts of Iowa, 12 organized their own churches.

The group of adherents at Nevada, which was destined to play a prominent part in Iowa Conference history, was gathered again at this time. (Some Adventists who had looked for the Lord in 1844 and had welcomed Moses Hull when he held tent meetings there in 1858, had formed a company of Seventh-day Adventists then.) On Oct. 15, 1876, R. M. Kilgore organized the present church, with a charter membership of 15.

During the eighties churches were established in numerous places, including Forest City, Webster City, Algona, Fontanelle, Grinnell, Castana, Montezuma, Boonesborough, Council Bluffs, Exira, Alexander, Walnut City, Delphos, Atalissa, Milton Junction, Logan, Harlan, and Audubon. A church was founded in Des Moines in 1885. In the fall of that year A. G. Daniells and a group of young workers started a city mission in that city for the purpose of using it as a training facility. The next year the Iowa Conference purchased a building in Des Moines that served as the mission home, the conference headquarters, and the church. In 1899 a home for unwed mothers was established, and in the same year, the Iowa Sanitarium (later moved to the town of Nevada) and a health food factory. The year 1928 saw a noteworthy advance in Des Moines. As a result of a campaign by F. W. Johnson and his Bible instructor 126 persons were baptized. In the same year a new church school, called the Norman Wiles School, after the South Seas missionary, was dedicated.

The 1890s saw churches established at Cedar Rapids, Urbana, Milford, Sheldon, Muscatine, Davenport, and Dubuque.

In 1902 Iowa became a member of the newly formed Central Union Conference. However, in 1907 it was transferred to the Northern Union.

The worldwide Ingathering program originated from the 1903 project of Jasper Wayne, a nurseryman of Sac City, who traveled about the county selling nursery stock and who conceived the idea of giving away papers and asking for mission offerings.

In 1903 Iowa Industrial Academy, later called Stuart Academy, was established in Stuart. It was moved in 1911 to Nevada, Iowa, and renamed Oak Park Academy.

In the early part of the twentieth century, the Iowa Conference, at the suggestion of the General Conference, shared some of her experienced workers with weaker conferences and overseas areas, continuing to pay their salary for some years.

Later Developments. In the 1940s churches in the following places were organized: Newton, Washington, Ames, Spencer, Greenfield, Estherville, and Toledo. During the same decade two evangelistic campaigns in Des Moines resulted in the adding of 301 new members. In 1948 the Black church of Des Moines was transferred to the Central States Mission (now the Central States Conference) when that mission was expanded to include the territory of Iowa. During the later 1960s and early 1970s the church of Delphos was reestablished and organized again, which had started back in the 1880s, and a church was established in Bedford.

The Iowa Conference office was first located in Des Moines. However, from 1909 to 1940 it was in Nevada. In 1944 it was moved back to Des Moines and located at 504 42nd Street until 1969. At that time the clubhouse for the Des Moines Golf and Country Club became available, and a generous donation made it possible to purchase it in 1970. This provided adequate facilities for a new office.

On July 20, 1980, the Iowa constituency voted to merge with the Missouri Conference.

The states of Iowa and Missouri each had its own conference until the summer of 1980 when the two conferences merged. The Missouri Conference office in Kansas City closed when this merger occurred, and the office in Des Moines now serves as headquarters for the new two-state conference. Information on the history and development of both the Iowa and the Missouri conferences is presented in separate articles under each name.

Both states had their own academies until the spring of 1980 when circumstances made it necessary to close the Iowa school, Oak Park Academy. Later that summer when the Iowa and Missouri conferences merged, Missouri's Sunnydale Academy in Centralia, Missouri, began to provide high school education for the church members in both states. Information on both of these schools is provided in separate articles under Oak Park Academy and Sunnydale Academy.

Through the decade of the 1970s both the Iowa and the Missouri conferences had their share of financial difficulties. Early in 1980 both conferences reviewed these needs at various conference meetings. A committee was set up to study which locations would be best for administrative offices, the academies, and the youth camp. The leaders from both conferences discussed their options and felt it would be a benefit to the Lord's work to merge the two conferences.

On June 1 the Missouri Conference voted that they were favorable to a merger with Iowa. On June 29 the Iowa Conference voted that they also were favorable. On July 20 at a special joint session, delegates from the Iowa and the Missouri conferences met in Des Moines to finalize a merger. The officers chosen to lead the new two-state conference were Ralph Watts, Jr., president; Robert Peck, secretary; and John Amick, treasurer. Watts and Amick served for only one year. Don Gilbert became treasurer in August 1981, and W. D. Wampler became president in November 1981.

Not long after the merger the leadership discovered they had some tremendous financial challenges. The faithful constituency of both Iowa and Missouri arose to the need, and after a decade this indebtedness has been paid off. During this same time significant improvements of costing more than $1 million have been made to Sunnydale Academy and Camp Heritage without incurring additional indebtedness. At the same time a strong evangelism program has been carried out, funded by a strong conference budget program as well as a newly instituted annual evangelism offering.

Ten churches were added since the merger in 1980: Bolivar, Chillicothe, Kansas City Southland, Kansas City Central (Spanish), Marshall, Richville, St. Louis Northwest, St. Louis West County, and Troy, Missouri, and Fort Dodge, Iowa.

Presidents: R. S. Watts, Jr., 1980—1981; William D. Wampler, 1981— .

Iowa Sanitarium

IOWA SANITARIUM. A medical institution formerly operated by the Iowa Conference, established first at 603 East 12th Street, Des Moines, in 1899. In connection with it, a health food plant was opened the first year, and shortly thereafter a nurse's training program was set up. By 1905 the institution was in difficulty, apparently because of a lack of outstanding medical leadership, a decline in patronage, and the difficulty of collecting accounts. Although the patient capacity was 50, by 1908 patronage had declined to 304 for the year.

The "sanitarium plan" at that time called for the patient to stay at the institution for some time, relax, take walks amid nature, and learn new health habits. Since the city location, amid sundry noises, was not ideal, a tract of land a mile (1.6 kilometers) south of Nevada, Iowa, was purchased, and $47,118 pledged by the members toward an anticipated cost of $60,000. In August 1909 the building was dedicated. The nurse's training program was moved with the sanitarium, and the program was operated until 1929 with from 20 to 30 student nurses each year. Once again the institution began to run behind financially. It has been suggested that failure to change from sanitarium to hospital method, and failure to change to an open staff of local doctors, spelled its downfall. When on Jan. 30, 1943, the institution burned to the ground, with the loss of one life, no attempt was made to rebuild the sanitarium.

Iran.

IRAN. An Islamic republic in the Middle East, bounded by Turkey and Iraq on the west, the republics of Armenia, Azerbaijan, and Turkmenistan on the north, Afghanistan and Pakistan on the east, and the Persian Gulf on the south. It comprises 636,293 square miles (1.6 million square kilometers), and has an estimated population (1994) of 66 million.

Most of the population is of Aryan descent, speaking the Farsi language; about one fifth is of Turkish origin. There are also groups of Arabs, Armenians, and Assyrians. Almost 99 percent of the people adhere to Shiism. Zoroastrian, Jewish, and Christian minorities are also found in Iran.

Iran, known formerly as Persia, has had a long history. The empire of the Medes and Persians, founded in the sixth century B.C. by Cyrus the Great, extended at its height from the river Indus to the Aegean Sea. Persia appears in biblical history as the land of Cyrus, Darius, and Artaxerxes, who helped the Jews reestablish themselves after the Babylonian exile, and as the land of Esther and Ahasuerus. It was also the cradle of Zoroastrianism and its derivative Mithraism—the sun worship that competed with early Christianity in the Roman Empire. Despite numerous invasions by foreign armies throughout its history, Persia always maintained its identity.

During the period of Arab conquest Persia accepted Islam, but retained its own language. In modern Persia reaction to British and Russian influence resulted in nationalism and a constitutional government, which began a program of modernization. The country is still mainly agricultural, but has rich oil deposits. Since 1935 it has been known as Iran, its ancient Iranian name.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Iran was entered by the SDAs in 1911, when F. F. Oster and Henry Dirksen (both Americans) went there from Germany and settled at Rezā'iyeh (Urmia) in northwestern Iran near the Turkish border and worked among the many Christians (Armenians and Nestorian Assyrians) living in the area. In 1913 Dirksen left. In the same year Oster married, and with his wife moved to Magheh, where there were no other Protestant missionaries. Sometime about 1914 the first converts, a Russian musician and his wife, were baptized. Shortly after World War I broke out, Oster made a preaching tour of the region.

During the war, when all Christians in the area had to flee from the marauding Kurdish tribesmen, the Osters retired to Tabriz. By the time they left on furlough in 1919, there were two Sabbathkeeping families in Iran. Three years later, when the Osters returned to Tabriz, their teachings attracted much attention and led to the first baptism of nationals in Iran, on May 26, 1923. On the same date the first Seventh-day Adventist church in Iran was organized with 22 charter members. The Sabbath school, organized earlier in the year, had an average attendance of 130, and a Young People's Missionary Volunteer Society had about 70 members. The next winter two church schools were opened, one for the Assyrian and one for the Armenian children. Early in 1926 Oster reported that the enrollment in the school at Tabriz was about 120, and that there were six other schools in the country (Review and Herald 103:24, Apr. 22, 1926). At the time there were about 150 members in the northwestern part of Iran. In 1925 Dr. H. E. Hargreaves arrived from England to begin medical missionary work. During 1926 Dr. Arsen Arzoo, a Loma Linda graduate, began medical work at Julfa and later in Isfahan, in central Iran, and O. Olson came and took charge of the educational work that was growing rapidly, the enrollment having increased to about 500 students, mostly orphans and children of the refugees. At present the denomination operates no educational institutions in Iran, as both the academy and elementary schools were appropriated by the government.

There was a great need for Seventh-day Adventist publications in the national languages of the people. In Armenian there were only a few tracts, a collection of the Bible readings, and Ellen White's Steps to Christ; in Assyrian there were a few tracts, but reports mention no publications in Farsi, the language of the majority. In 1928 Dr. Arzoo moved to Sultanabad (now Arāk), a predominantly Farsi-speaking community, and opened a dispensary (later supervised by Dr. Hargreaves, it appears). The coming of SDAs was welcomed there, and at the request of the leaders of the Muslim community a school was opened in December 1929 with 35 students. By the close of the school year there were 50, and in 1931 there were 126, coming mostly from the Muslim families. In the 1930s, when the educational laws of the country were changed, the mission schools closed. The schools in Iran had served the double role of educating the young people and of creating a reservoir of teachers who could be called upon as national evangelists, of whom there were six in 1928.

As time went on, the work in Iran was carried on in many languages among its many national groups (for example, a station at Resht, opened in 1932, required someone familiar with Syriac, Farsi, Turkish, and Russian); yet, it was for many years largely limited to minority groups, such as Armenians, Russians, and Assyrians. But with the introduction of the Voice of Prophecy Bible Correspondence School in 1948, all the people of Iran came for the first time within the scope of SDA work.

In 1946 the Iran Training School, later called the Iran Adventist Academy, was opened. In 1963 it offered a full high school curriculum authorized by the Ministry of Education. On Mar. 4, 1962, the SDA physical therapy clinic (Tehran Physiotherapy Clinic) was officially opened in Tehran.

A new elementary school was built and dedicated in 1969, and under the principalship of Anoosh Keshishzadeh, grew to a full eight-grade school, with plans to expand to intermediate grades before it was nationalized by the government. Work was begun in Shiraz in 1965 and continued for about five years.

In 1967 the organization in Iran began to change its approach to meet the needs of the non-Christian peoples there. Temperance work was used successfully in the conducting of Five-Day Plans, film projections in schools, and television appearances. In 1971 the provinces of southern Iran were declared unentered territory and set aside for experimental evangelism for Muslims.

Organization.

Organization. Seventh-day Adventist work in Iran was first organized as a mission of the European Division. For a time after World War I it was part of the Levant Union and then was returned to the European Division. In 1928 it was assigned to the Central European Division, and was later a part of its Section II. In 1932 it was divided into the East and West Persian missions, then in 1935 reunited to form the Iran Mission with headquarters at Tehran. Later the Iran Mission became a part of the Middle East Union, and, still later, of the Middle East Division upon its organization in 1951. In the reorganization of 1970 it became the Iran Field, again under the Middle East Union, and part of the Afro-Mideast Division.

At present the Middle East Union operates as an attached field to the General Conference.

Iran Adventist Academy

IRAN ADVENTIST ACADEMY. A boarding school for boys on the secondary level, formerly operated by the Iran Mission on a seven-acre (three-hectare) piece of choice property about eight miles (13 kilometers) north of Tehran, Iran, in the foothills of the Alborz Mountains. The curriculum was that prescribed by the Iran Ministry of Education, with the exception of religion.

The school was founded by Paul C. Boynton in Darband in 1946 under the name of Iran Training School, as a coeducational high school, unlicensed by the government. After two years of operation at Darband, high rental costs, among other factors, forced the school to move to the mission building in Tehran. During the furlough of P. C. Boynton, the Iran Mission officers took over responsibilities of running the school until the arrival of C. L. Gemmell, who carried on under extremely adverse political conditions until the school was forced to close down. Thereupon the principal and a few students as well as the budget were transferred to Middle East College in Beirut, Lebanon.

The Iran school was revived under the principalship of M. E. Adams in October 1955 as a vocational junior high school with government recognition.

The Thirteenth Sabbath Offering overflow for the first quarters of 1955 and 1957 provided sufficient funds for the purchase of property and the construction of two buildings for a permanent home. During the first three years the school acquired a boys' dormitory, a teacher's cottage, a 230-foot (70-meter) well, and an elevated water-storage tank. On Nov. 27, 1958, R. R. Figuhr, president of the General Conference, preached at the dedication of the new administration building. In 1959 M. H. Morovati was elected as the first national principal of the school. Thereafter several additions were made to the physical plant, among them a chapel and a teachers' duplex. A notable milestone was passed when on Apr. 14, 1962, the minister of education signed the official permit to operate the school as a full-scale high school under its new name, Iran Adventist Academy. The first twelfth-grade class graduated in 1965. The academy was later appropriated by the government.

Iraq.

IRAQ. A republic in the Middle East, centering in the Tigris and Euphrates River valleys (Mesopotamia), and bounded by Iran on the east, the Persian Gulf and Kuwait on the south, Saudi Arabia on the southwest, Jordan on the west, Syria on the northwest, and Turkey on the north. It has a territory of 173,259 square miles (448,740 square kilometers) and a population (1994) of 20 million.

The Arabs predominate in the population, but there is a significant minority of Kurds in the north. There are also groups of Turkomans, Assyrians (Nestorian Christians), and Armenians; the Jews, who before the founding of the State of Israel numbered about 100,000, have almost all left the country. More than 90 percent of the people are Muslims, belonging either to the Sunni or the Shia sect. The latter has its international headquarters in Iraq. There are about 300,000 Christians and about 40,000 Yezidis (those of a sect worshipping an angel believed to have been formerly the author of evil). Christians are found in all of the main towns, but are concentrated chiefly in the Mosul district. There are the ancient Nestorian, Gregorian, Armenian Orthodox, and Jacobite churches, as well as some Eastern rite groups in union with the Roman Catholic Church, and a few Protestants.

The official language of Iraq is Arabic, but the minority groups have their own languages, and English is widely used for business purposes. The territory of Iraq has been called the cradle of civilization, for it was the land of Sumer, Babylon, and Assyria. It was the home of Abraham, the land of the exile of Israel and Judah, the scene of the long career of Daniel under the kings of Babylon and under Cyrus after the Persian conquest of Babylonia. During the Hellenistic period, in the priestly schools of Mesopotamia, Babylonian and Greek learning fused to produce scientific astronomy-and also astrology, with its planetary week and day of the sun. In the seventh century A.D. the land was conquered by the Arabs, who developed centers of learning and culture in the city of Baghdad before they were overrun by the Mongols in the thirteenth century.

From the sixteenth century until the end of World War I the area was a part of the Ottoman Empire; then after a brief period of British administration it became an independent kingdom in 1932. In 1958 it became a republic.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. SDA beliefs were introduced into Iraq by a native of Mosul, Bashir Hasso, who was baptized in 1911 in Beirut, having read Uriah

Smith's Daniel and the Revelation while he was a student at the American University there, and having been instructed further by W. K. Ising, the SDA missionary in Beirut. Although isolated from contact with the church during World War I, he had seven persons ready for baptism when Ising visited Iraq (then called Mesopotamia) in 1923.

During Ising's visit, the Mosul church was organized (Mar. 17, 1923). In 1924 James McGeachy went to Mosul, and three years later reported 19 church members. A. L. Barr came to Mosul in 1927. By 1931 a church school had been opened. Secondary school classes were added in 1945, so that by 1958 the enrollment reached 125. Early in 1955 a Mosul church and school building containing eight classrooms and an auditorium seating 250 was dedicated. Mosul was the first church in Iraq to have its own building, but during the political instability of the early 1960s in northern Iraq most of the church members left and the school (Iraq Training School) was closed. A small company was revived there by Fuad Ashkar in 1967.

The commercial contacts of the first Iraqi Seventh-day Adventists in Baghdad led to the development of a group of SDAs there by 1929. In 1946 the Dar es-Salaam Hospital was opened at Baghdad, and soon it earned a reputation as providing the best medical service in the country. (In June 1959 the hospital was nationalized, and was reopened in July as a government-managed hospital.) In 1947 a school was opened in Baghdad, which with the later addition of secondary school classes became one of the major SDA schools in the Middle East. The school was nationalized in 1974, but SDA teachers staff it and have Sabbath privileges. In the late fifties two churches were established in Baghdad. A major portion of the cost of their construction was raised locally.

Seventh-day Adventist groups were established also at Basra and Kirkuk. In 1936 Sabel Baghdassarian began a Sabbath school at Basra, and in 1948 Rose Haddad opened an elementary school there, which was closed a few years later when no suitable building was available. In 1959 land was purchased and plans were made for the erection of a church (completed 1965) and school building there. At Kirkuk a school was opened in temporary quarters in 1954. Later the school building was purchased and remodeled, providing a chapel seating 80 persons. That same year the Kirkuk school had an enrollment of 230.

Ingathering campaigns have been held since 1952, with Iraq leading the Middle East Division for several years in the amount of funds raised. The first camp meeting in Iraq was held in the summer of 1954 at Behbad. In 1955 the Dar es-Salaam Association, a welfare society, was organized and officially recognized. The same year the first summer camps for juniors were conducted. A Book and Periodical House was established in 1956. Between 1951 and 1960 membership grew from 127 to 163.

Organization. SDA work in Iraq was organized in 1923 as the Mesopotamian Mission of the European Division. In 1928 the mission became part of the Central European Division. Later it was a part of the Arabic Union, then of the Middle East Union of the General Conference Missions Division, and was placed in the Middle East Division in 1951. In 1970 it became the Iraq Field under the Middle East Union. It is the only self-supporting field in the Middle East.

The first Iraqi to direct the church, Behnam Arshat, elected president in 1957, administered the work during the 1958 national revolution, and in 1959 was able to secure official recognition of the church as a national religious organization, the Seventh-day Adventist Church of Iraq.

The work was directed for many years by Ghanem Fargo, a lay businessman in the Baghdad church. In 1992 Basim Aziz was elected president although he is residing in Amman, Jordan.

Ireland.

IRELAND. A republic comprising the southern portion of the island called Ireland, situated in the northern Atlantic Ocean and separated from England by the Irish Sea. It has an area of 26,600 square miles (68,900 square kilometers), and a population (1994) of 3.5 million, of whom more than 90 percent are Roman Catholic. Agriculture is the main industry of the republic.

Until some time after the English Reformation, the religion of Ireland was Roman Catholic. During the seventeenth century, as a result of the British sending in settlers, the counties of Northern Ireland became predominantly Protestant. The southern counties, which remained Roman Catholic, became increasingly dissatisfied with British rule, and Irish patriots made many efforts to break the alien yoke. However, all attempts to gain political independence failed until the twentieth century. In 1922 the 26 southern counties were constituted as the Irish Free State with dominion status. In 1937, under a new constitution, this territory became known as Ireland (Eire in the Irish language), and in 1948 it proclaimed itself a republic and withdrew from the Commonwealth. It was accepted into the United Nations, and in 1973 into membership in the European Economic Community. The capital city is Dublin, with a population of more than 500,000; Cork, the next city in size, has a population of 136,000, and only three other cities have a population of more than 20,000.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. In 1861 the Review and Herald published letters from Ireland reporting that five persons had begun keeping the seventh-day Sabbath as a result of receiving books and papers from relatives in the United States. Late in 1885 R. F. Andrews, a native-born Irishman who had gone to the United States and returned on a visit to relatives and friends, preached in Clones and other places, winning one convert. The following year he and S. H. Lane spent four weeks in Ireland preaching in various places including Clones. In 1888 S. N. Haskell, on a visit to that country, reported finding interested persons in Dublin. That same year J. H. Durland came to Ireland, where he spent a month. With Andrews he went to Clones for five days, and baptized a husband and wife.

In 1898 M. A. Altman began work in Dublin, where seven were baptized and organized into a company. During 1902 and 1903 William Hutchinson entered Limerick and Cork. One person accepted the SDA message in Limerick, and remained faithful.

In 1902 the Irish Mission was formed under the presidency of Hutchinson. By 1908 there were 21 members in southern Ireland, 20 of whom were in Dublin. In 1913, the Dublin church, with an organized membership of 15, was received into the fellowship of the Irish churches in Ulster.

Although the civil war of 1916 to 1922 restricted evangelistic activity, growth was steady. In 1928, when the membership stood at 33, the first church building was purchased.

Irian Jaya

IRIAN JAYA. See Indonesia.

Irian Jaya Academy

IRIAN JAYA ACADEMY (formerly West New Guinea Mission Training School). A coeducational senior boarding academy offering six years of high school (grades 7—12), operated by the Irian Jaya Mission and situated at Doyo Baru, 28 miles (45 kilometers) inland from Jayapura (formerly Hollandia). The school had a 1993 enrollment of 245 students. In addition to the accredited curriculum, the academy has 100 acres (40 hectares) of vegetables, coconuts, and cash crops; offers vocational training in mechanics, carpentry, and farming; is headquarters for training lay evangelists to primitive areas; and operates a two-teacher church school (grades 1—6) of 40 students.

Land for a training school was purchased in January 1954, and in March six young men from the Waropen coast enrolled, although there were neither buildings nor faculty. However, the mission personnel, K. Tilstra, E. H. Vijsma, and their wives, held classes in the back of the unfinished church building in Hollandia. Later two more enrolled. When the school year closed, six received certificates, and several of them entered denominational employment in 1956. One, Jacobus Bindosan, was sent to his own village to do evangelistic work. Others were sent out later to open schools in the interior among the primitive people.

When a flood damaged the original land, a new property, in a large grove, was purchased in February 1956. There were still no regular teachers. In November 1957 Leslie E. Keizer arrived with his family from Indonesia and opened the school six days later with eight students. Soon 60 were enrolled (in grades 4—6). In 1959 a church school was added for grades 1—3, taught by Gloria E. Keizer. In 1963 the European staff was replaced by Indonesians and Filipinos, with D. Kawai becoming the first Irian teacher. A 1965 Thirteenth Sabbath Offering overflow made possible the construction of the first permanent building, a boys' dormitory. From 1967 to 1969 two cement-block staff houses and a cafeteria were added. The school was granted full senior academy status in 1971. An overseas pilot's home, hangar, and airstrip were developed in 1972, making the academy base for the mission's aviation program. The S. Amprimo family returned to Australia in 1973 with the longest record of service to the school (12 years). In the late 1970s a permanent 10-classroom and administration building was constructed.

In 1993 the academy had an enrollment of 89 and a faculty and staff of 10.

Irving, Edward

IRVING, EDWARD (1792—1834). Scottish minister in London, a popular and eloquent preacher on the prophecies. A Presbyterian, he was expelled from his pulpit in 1832 for his unorthodox teachings and founded the “Holy Catholic Apostolic Church.” However, this church soon went to extremes that brought him discredit, though he was always respected personally as a devout Christian. He participated in the interdenominational Albury Conferences (1826—1830) and Powerscourt Conferences (1830 and later), for the study of prophecy, out of which grew the modern futurist type of premillennialism. Between 1826 and 1832 he preached in both England and Scotland, and drew large crowds to hear his sermons on the Second Advent. Although his views on the events connected with the Second Advent were vastly different from those of the Seventh-day Adventists, he is regarded as one of those who in the first half of the nineteenth century proclaimed the nearness of the Second Advent.

Irwin, Charles Walter

IRWIN, CHARLES WALTER (1868—1934). Educator; son of George A. Irwin. He received his A.B. from Battle Creek College (1891), his M.A. from the University of Nebraska (1927). After teaching Greek and Latin at Union College (1891—1898), he became principal of the Southern Industrial School in Graysville, Tennessee (1898—1900). From 1903 to 1908 he served in Australia as principal of the school that became Avondale College. This was the pioneer Seventh-day Adventist school in the Southern Hemisphere, and Irwin contributed much to its development.

Returning to the United States, he served as the first president of Pacific Union College (1909—1921), then as associate secretary, and later head (1930—1933) of the Education Department of the General Conference.

Irwin, George A.

IRWIN, GEORGE A. (1844—1913). Administrator. While imprisoned in Andersonville during the Civil War, he read Baxter's Saint's Everlasting Rest, which led to his conversion. He later joined the Congregational and then the Methodist Church. In the winter of 1884—1885 he accepted the Seventh-day Adventist faith. Shortly thereafter he entered denominational employment and served successively as district director, treasurer of the Ohio Conference, and president of the Ohio Conference (1889—1895). In 1895 he was appointed president of District no. 2 and in 1897 he was elected president of the General Conference. In 1901 he was chair at the opening of the General Conference when far-reaching changes were made in the organization of the church. After serving as president of the Australasian Union Conference (1901—1905), he served as vice president for North America (1909—1911) and head of the North American Foreign Department. He was president of the Pacific Union Conference (1910—1912), and then served as president of the board of directors of the College of Medical Evangelists (now Loma Linda University's School of Medicine) and as vice president of the Pacific Union Conference.

Isaac, Daniel

ISAAC, DANIEL (1871—1956). Minister, administrator. He was educated at Union College, and began preaching in July 1897, in the South Dakota Conference. The following summer he and his wife went to Battle Creek, where they spent two years taking a nurse's course. In January 1901 he resumed his work in the South Dakota Conference and remained there four years, during which time he was ordained.

In the autumn of 1904 Isaac was called to Europe, where for one year he engaged in evangelistic work in Germany. Then he was sent to Russia, where he served as a conference president from October 1905 until June 1921. After a year of furlough to recuperate his health he entered the employ of the Wisconsin Conference and remained until September 1927, when he transferred to the Oklahoma Conference. Because of sickness he was forced to retire in 1929.

Isaac, Frank R.

ISAAC, FRANK R. (1880—1962). Minister, administrator. He was born at Parker, South Dakota, and received his B.A. degree from Union College in 1915. Later he did postgraduate work in the Colorado University.

From 1904 to 1912 he worked in the South Dakota Conference, first as a teacher, then as conference treasurer, and later as principal of Elk Point Academy (later Plainview Academy). From 1912 to 1914 he was dean of men at Union College. One year, 1915—1916, he was president of Southwestern Junior College, at Keene, Texas. From there he was called to the presidency of Clinton Theological Seminary at Clinton, Missouri, where he remained until 1923. He was educational and Missionary Volunteer secretary of the Southeastern Union Conference (1923—1930), and of the Lake Union Conference (1930—1937). The next two years he served as president of Oshawa Missionary College at Oshawa, Ontario, Canada. From 1939 to 1950 he was chaplain, pastor, and teacher at the Boulder Sanitarium in Boulder, Colorado. At the age of 70 he retired to California.

Isaac, John

ISAAC, JOHN (1873—1956). Minister, administrator, teacher. He attended Union College in Nebraska, where he was converted to the Seventh-day Adventist faith. He immediately prepared for the ministry and began preaching in South Dakota in June 1897, and remained there until 1901 when he was called to Wisconsin. From May 1902 to August 1905 he worked in the Ontario Conference in Canada. From August 1905 to April 1906 he worked in Germany. The next seven years he taught German at Walla Walla College. From July 1913 to September 1918 he served as president of the Oklahoma Conference, after which he spent two years teaching in the Clinton Theological Seminary in Missouri. From June 1920 to August 1922 he worked in the West Oregon Conference. In 1922 he was called to Europe, where he served as president of the Polish Union Conference until April 1931. Returning to the homeland after nine years of taxing labor, he soon found it necessary to retire from active service.

Ishaka Adventist Hospital

ISHAKA ADVENTIST HOSPITAL. An 85-bed general hospital situated about 40 miles (65 kilometers) from Mbarara on the Fort Portal road in western Uganda. It is owned and operated by the East African Union. The present plant consists of two general wards, a simple maternity ward, two simple private wards, a semiprivate ward plus outpatient and operating blocks, and suitable housing for the staff. There is also a beautiful church building on the hospital grounds.

The current work of the hospital consists of general medical, surgical, pediatrics, obstetrics, and gynecology. Ishaka Adventist Hospital is the emergency and referral medical center of the Bushenyi district. Its community work consists of primary health care, including immunization, family planning services, and counseling, as well as antenatal and other maternal and child health services. AIDS care and counseling are available.

A deliberate spiritual outreach ministry is undertaken in conjunction with the local Adventist church. A primary school and a secondary school are located on the hospital campus. A nurse training program, which was initiated in 1976 but halted in 1977 because of oppressive political conditions, was vigorously revived in 1987, and government accreditation is now being sought for it.

Ishaka Adventist Hospital was located in western Uganda because of the medical needs of the then Ankole district. The omugabe (king) of Ankole made a grant of land for this purpose to the Uganda Field in the late 1940s.

Construction was begun in 1948 by S. Musa, a Kikuyu Seventh-day Adventist, assisted by another African, D. Senyonga, who, being a mechanic, was able to give valuable help, especially in transporting materials. R. J. Wieland, president of the Uganda Field, gave general supervision until 1949, when Dr. D. L. Stilson, under appointment for Ankole, made frequent journeys from Kampala to oversee the construction. A ministerial worker already on the scene began evangelistic work in a temporary chapel.

Medical work was opened in 1950 with only half of the plant complete. However, within a year the second half was opened and occupied. Else Brandt, of Denmark, served as matron. Dr. D. L. Stilson was assisted by his wife, Dr. Mildred Stilson, and during the years he served as medical director the hospital attained a high reputation throughout Uganda. Constant improvement of the physical plant was made as funds became available.

Medical Directors: D. L. Stilson, 1950—1961; W. H. Taylor, 1961—1964; R. M. Buckley, 1964—1967; A. S. Whiting, 1967—1968; E. C. Kraft, 1969—1971; E. J. Shidler, 1971—1972; S. I. Biraro, 1972—1977; hospital under oppressive regime of Idi Amin from September 1977 until April 1979; Sam I. Biraro, 1979—1980; R. Guerrero (hospital administrator), 1980—1982; E. K. Mpora, 1982—1985; A. Rocero, 1986—1987; Sam I. Biraro, 1987—1991; T. Fesaha, 1991—1992; J. M. Omwega, 1993— .

Ising, Walter Konrad Wilhelm

ISING, WALTER KONRAD WILHELM (1881—1950). Missionary to the Middle East, administrator. He was born in Danzig, Germany, accepted the Seventh-day Adventist faith in tent meetings held in Friedensau, Germany, in 1903, and was baptized by E. Frauchiger in Berlin the next year. In 1904 he was drafted into military service, court-martialed and imprisoned for refusing to serve on the Sabbath. In January 1905, after being discharged from the army, he became secretary of the German Union Conference and editor of the Zions Wächter. From 1909 to 1920 he was leader of the Syrian-Egyptian Mission, with headquarters in Beirut, Lebanon, although during World War I he was interned on the Isle of Malta for 61 months, during which his health suffered.

From July 1920 to December 1928 Ising was secretary of the old European Division, and from then until 1936 he was superintendent of the Arabic Union Mission. He opened SDA work in Iraq. In 1937 he became secretary of the General Conference branch office in Basel. The next year he was associate secretary of the General Conference Sabbath School Department in Washington. From 1946 until his retirement in 1950 he was a general field secretary. He spent much time and effort finding homes and occupations for European refugees displaced by World War II, and visiting German-speaking members in the United States and Canada. He translated George McCready Price's book Q.E. D. and wrote Among the Arabs in Bible Lands.

Israel

ISRAEL. A republic in the Middle East bounded on the north by Lebanon, on the east by Syria and Jordan, on the south by the Gulf of Aqaba, on the southwest by the Arab Republic, and on the west by the Mediterranean Sea. The country is 265 miles (425 kilometers) long, 70 miles (110 kilometers) wide at its widest point, and 12 miles (20 kilometers) at its narrowest point. Its population (1994) is about 5 million. In 1993 there were approximately 120,000 Christians and 36,000 Druzes. These minorities are largely of Arabic origin. Most Christians are Greek Orthodox or Catholic. Since 1948 between 3 and 4 million Jews have immigrated to Israel.

In addition to the areas known as Galilee, the Valley of Jezreel, the coastal plains of Sharon and Philistia, Judea, and the Negev, at the time of the Israeli-Arab war of June 1967, Israel occupied the Syrian Heights of Golan, Samaria (also known as the West Bank), the Gaza strip, and the Desert of Sinai.

On Mar. 26, 1979, a peace treaty between Israel and Egypt was signed, and on Sept. 13, 1993, Israel and the Palestine Liberation Army agreed on recognition of each nation, bringing autonomy for the Gaza Strip and Jericho.

The territory was the home of the Hebrews from the period of the gradual conquest of the land following the exodus from Egypt in mid-second millennium B.C.; and after the brief united kingdom under David and Solomon (about 1000 B.C.) was divided into the kingdoms of Israel in the north and Judah in the south. It was lost to Assyria and Babylon (eighth to sixth centuries B.C.) then reoccupied under the overlordship of the Persians, the Ptolemies, and the Seleucids. In the second century B.C. it was the seat of an independent Jewish state ruled by the Hasmonaean priest-kings; then it came under the power of Rome shortly before New Testament times.

Palestine remained the homeland of the Jews until the final dispersion under the Roman emperors of the first and second centuries. The area was taken over by the Arabs in the seventh century, and Jerusalem became one of the centers of Islam. Groups of Jews remained in the country through the centuries under Muslim rule (on the same basis as the Christian minorities), but there was no large-scale immigration of Jews until modern times. In the Middle Ages, for several centuries, the Crusaders struggled for control over the country, but eventually the land came under the rule of the Turks. The Turkish Empire held it until World War I, after which Palestine was made a mandate of Great Britain. In the course of that war the British government issued the Balfour declaration recommending "the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people." This declaration encouraged the Zionist dream of an independent Jewish state in Palestine, and spurred large-scale immigration of Jewish settlers into the area. When the British mandate lapsed, and the United Nations voted for the partition of Palestine, the ensuing Jewish-Arab war resulted in the present boundary, drawn as an armistice line, between Israel and Jordan. Thus the history of the present-day state of Israel dates from 1948 when Great Britain surrendered its mandate over Palestine and an independent Israeli state was proclaimed.

The official languages of Israel are Hebrew (developed from biblical Hebrew and enriched by a modern technical and cultural vocabulary borrowed partly from Western European sources) and Arabic. Most of the people, speaking the various languages of the countries from which they came, had to learn Hebrew almost as a foreign tongue. Although Israel is a Jewish state, religious freedom is accorded by law. Many Christian monks and pilgrims throng the monasteries established to preserve various traditional sites of the Holy Land.

Seventh-day Adventist Work.

Seventh-day Adventist Work.

Beginnings

Beginnings. The first Seventh-day Adventist to come to Israel (which was then Palestine) was Clorinda S. Minor, who came from the United States in 1849. She lived with some other SDAs working at rehabilitating the land, planting groves, and helping people, especially Jews, who were among the first returning to the land of their forefathers. She firmly believed that this was part of God's plan in the return of Jesus in glory.

According to extant records, another of the first SDAs to visit Palestine was G. C. Tenney, in 1892 (Review and Herald 70:106, Feb. 14, 1893). However, no work was begun at that time. Abram La Rue, the pioneer SDA lay missionary in the Far East, visited Jerusalem sometime between 1890 and 1897, but there is no record of any missionary work conducted there by him. SDA work in Palestine, in the area of Israel, began with the visit of Henry P. Holser, the superintendent of the European Mission, to Haifa, Jaffa, Sarona (near Jaffa), and Jerusalem early in 1898. He made the acquaintance of some of the German colonists settled near these cities, distributed literature among them, and took subscriptions to an SDA health journal. On his return to Europe he made an appeal at a general meeting held in Hamburg for volunteers to work in Palestine. J. H. Krum, a German SDA from the United States, responded, and with his wife went to Jaffa (biblical Joppa) in the same year and conducted colporteur work among the German colonists. Toward the end of 1899 F. Hörner, a male nursing graduate of the Basel Sanitarium, went to Jaffa and opened treatment rooms there. A few months afterward Miss Hausmann, a nurse, who later married Hörner, joined him in the medical work. According to a report that appeared in the Review and Herald of Nov. 26, 1901 (78:771), in the preceding 12 months these nurses had given 1,260 treatments. By 1901 Krum had moved to Jerusalem and had begun medical work there in the old city, joined by S. Jespersion and his wife, from Basel.

While on a visit to Palestine in 1904 L. R. Conradi, then director of the European work of the church, baptized three converts in Jaffa about the end of February and organized the Jaffa-Jerusalem church (Review and Herald 81:12, July 21, 1904), composed largely of workers' families and German converts. Four years later the total membership was about 20.

In 1908 the medical institution in Jerusalem reported that Europeans, Arabs, and Jews were seeking remedial treatments there.

In 1911 a tent meeting was held in a German colony that had established itself on Mount Carmel.

Interruption by World War I. In 1914, at the outbreak of World War I, several German missionaries (among them W. K. Ising) in Syria and Palestine were either interned, or forced to leave the field. Henry Erzberger, superintendent of the Syrian Mission from 1913 to 1917, who was a Swiss citizen, continued to live for a time in Jerusalem.

Reestablishment of the Work. Little is known about the development of the work from 1918 until 1929, when Ising returned to Beirut (in Lebanon) and took charge of the work in Palestine. In 1929 the medical institution in Jerusalem, confiscated by the Turks in the course of World War I, was reestablished by Bror Färnström and his wife, both physical therapists trained in the Skodsborg Sanitarium in Denmark. They found, left over from the pre-1914 institution, a sign "Wasserbehandlungen" (water treatments), a small faradic apparatus, and a book of statistics. They opened in rented quarters in a house outside the Damascus Gate, in what is now Israel. They remodeled the interior of the house to fit it for use, but the facilities were meager. The housing and facilities were not so good as before, but the situation improved considerably when in 1934 the treatment rooms were moved into a building erected by the mission on a site acquired in 1930 near the YMCA building, west of the walled city, and hence also in what is now Israel. The building, containing apartments, a meeting hall, and a basement for treatment rooms, was officially dedicated on Apr. 19, 1935. A workers' meeting was held on that occasion, attended by 35 missionaries and other workers from the Middle East countries.

About 1934 the headquarters of the Arabic Union Mission, which had been in Beirut, Lebanon, were transferred to Haifa. At Haifa another institute for massage, hydrotherapy, and electric treatments was established, and operated by two nurses, Alfred Piorr and his wife. Along with the medical work, Erich Schubert conducted evangelistic campaigns.

In 1935 the first thorough house-to-house canvassing with SDA books was conducted by a colporteur named Hamed Abeid, a national of the country who had accepted the SDA faith while in Cuba and had returned to Palestine. In the course of the 10 weeks that it took him to cover Jerusalem he sold 700 books in different languages, one third of them religious. He sold many copies of the book Health and Longevity, by Dr. A. C. Selmon.

In 1936 an interesting reference to Seventh-day Adventists in Jerusalem was made in a meeting of a standing committee of the British House of Commons. In the official report of the proceedings of Mar. 24, 1936, it is stated that "in Jerusalem they are well established and well known for their works of charity, and are held in deservedly high repute."

World War II and After. When World War II broke out the situation in the Middle East became most difficult for the SDA Church. Afterward, when the British mandate lapsed and Israel became an independent state in 1948, the church lost all its Arab members, who found refuge in the Arab countries. A few of Jewish origin remained. For the next several years the number of SDAs in Israel increased gradually, mostly through the immigration of SDA refugees of Jewish origin from Bulgaria and some from Shanghai. All through this period the Färnströms remained in charge, and when they left in 1952 for the SDA hospital in Karachi, Pakistan, there were about 12 members in Israel.

In 1950, on the occasion of a visit by an SDA minister of Jewish origin from Europe, a general meeting of all members was convened in Jerusalem for the purpose of reorganizing the church and celebrating the Lord's Supper. Many of the members could not understand each other, having come from various countries, so that it was necessary to use interpreters during services. On the occasion of a visit by

E. E. Roenfelt in 1951, the translations were made into the Russian, Bulgarian, German, and Hebrew languages.

This territory was a part of the Central European Division until its subdivision into Sections I and II in 1935, when it was assigned to Section II, with headquarters in Basel, Switzerland. In 1937 the headquarters were moved to Washington, D.C. In 1938 the mission was placed directly under the administration of the General Conference, where it remained until the organization of the Middle East Division in 1951.

Because of restrictions on travel to and from the Arab countries, a change became necessary, and in 1955 the Israel Field became a part of the Euro-Africa Division. Since the Israeli-Arab War (1967), the Arab East Center in Jerusalem has been attached to the field. As a result of further realignment of territories at the time of the 1985 General Conference session, the Israel Field became part of the territory of the Trans-European Division, in 1986. At this time the Arab East Center in Jerusalem was remodeled and is now the much-appreciated Jerusalem Study Center, operated by Andrews University.

Israel, Mendel Crocker

ISRAEL, MENDEL CROCKER (1834—1921). Evangelist, missionary. Born in Nova Scotia, he moved in his early 20s to New England, and in 1858 to Oregon. In 1874, while in Massachusetts doing carpentry work with his brother, John, an ardent Seventh-day Adventist, he accepted the SDA faith. The next year he attended a biblical institute in San Francisco conducted by James White, Uriah Smith, and J. H. Waggoner, and was encouraged to enter evangelistic work. He was ordained in 1878 and spent many years in evangelism in the California Conference.

In 1885, 10 years after Ellen White had urged the establishing of a mission in Australia, Israel went with the first group of SDA workers and conducted vigorous evangelistic campaigns in Melbourne, Adelaide, and other cities. After a conference was established in 1888, he did pioneering work in Tasmania, went to New Zealand in 1889, and later was president of the conference for several years. In 1896 he returned to evangelistic work in California and retired in 1905.

Israel, Prophecies Concerning

ISRAEL, PROPHECIES CONCERNING. OT predictions concerning the role of ancient Israel under the covenant relationship, here considered especially with respect to Israel's witness to the true God, to the coming of Messiah, and to the establishment of the Messianic kingdom. Seventh-day Adventists regard these predictions as a declaration of the divine purpose with respect to Israel as the covenant people and as conditional upon their cooperation with God's purpose for them as a nation.

Origin of the Seventh-day Adventist View

Origin of the Seventh-day Adventist View. Millerite Interpretation. William Miller and his associates firmly rejected the then popular millennial belief (of Literalist premillennialism) that the prophecies of the Bible predicted the last-day "return of the Jews, as such, either before, at, or after the Advent of Christ, to Palestine, to possess that land a thousand years" (Josiah Litch, in Advent Shield 1:47, 48, May 1844). All of them shared the conviction that Christ's return to this earth was imminent and that His coming would end human probation and that He would purify the earth by fire and set up His eternal kingdom.

J. V. Himes is quoted as saying in 1850 that the Millerites had always battled against the prevailing "Judaizing notions" in regard to the age to come, because "Judaism and Adventism are two different things" (Isaac C. Wellcome, History of the Second Advent Message, p. 592). By "Judaism" and "Judaizing notions" he was referring to the belief that the coming age would see the Jews restored not only to Palestine but also as God's chosen nation, ruling over mortal nations in a millennial kingdom on earth, in which sin and death would continue. That opposition to this was a distinctive point of Adventist doctrine from the first is seen from the recommendation of the twelfth Millerite Second Advent Conference (in 1842) that "all persons who reject the doctrines of temporal millennium and the restoration of the Jews to Palestine, either before or after the Second Advent, and who believe the Second Advent of Christ and the first resurrection to be the next great events of prophetic history, be invited to enroll their names as member[s] of this conference" (The Signs of the Times 3:69, June 1, 1842; see SB, no. 1083).

It is also affirmed: "No portion of the New Testament scriptures [gives] the most indirect intimation of the literal restoration of the Jews to old Jerusalem; we believe that the arguments drawn from the Old Testament prophecies are based on a mistaken view of those prophecies" (ibid.).

Branding the millennial view a "vain supposition," William Miller declared: "There is not a text, promise or prophecy, written or given of God" to support the application of OT prophecies concerning a future restoration of the Jews (Views of . . . William Miller, ed. 1842 by J. V. Himes [Second Advent Library, no. 1], p. 233).

Early Seventh-day Adventist writers differed from the Millerites in expecting the renewal of the earth, not at the Second Advent, but at the end of the millennium, but with them held that the Second Advent and the first resurrection will end human probation and usher in the reign of the glorified saints—all the redeemed, both Jew and Gentile—and that this allows no place for a post-Advent kingdom of restored Jews in the mortal state. Not much appears in SDA publications on the subject until the “Age to Come” disaffection of the early 1850s brought the topic into discussion. Probably the first major treatment of the subject was part of a series of articles by J. H. Waggoner in early 1856 (see Review and Herald 7:177, Mar. 6; 7:185, Mar. 13; etc.).

Reasons Given in SDA Writings. Reasons given by Miller and early SDA writers for rejecting the millennial view as unscriptural may be summarized as follows:

1. The OT prophecies were a declaration of God’s purpose for literal Israel, and their fulfillment to literal Israel was strictly conditional upon Israel’s cooperation with the divine purpose.

“All of God’s purposes of grace to man are conditional, [and] as the blessings set before them [the Jews] were conditional, they could claim them only on the fulfillment of the conditions. . . . We consider that this was a conditional prophecy, the promises of which have been forfeited” (J. H. Waggoner, The Kingdom of God [1859], pp. 87—109).

“This [the old] covenant was made at Horeb, and was conditional, as recorded in Ex. xix. The Lord said to them, ‘If ye will obey my voice indeed, and keep my covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto me above all people’ (J. H. Waggoner, in Review and Herald 9:77, Jan. 8, 1857).

“The promise to Abraham and to his seed of the possession of the literal land of Canaan was conditional [Deut. 4:1, 2; 5:32, 33; 6:1—3; 8:1 cited in proof]” (A. S. Hutchins, in Review and Herald 9:197, Apr. 23, 1857).

On this point of conditionality, Ellen White comments: “Through the Jewish nation it was God’s purpose to impart rich blessings to all peoples” (COL 286).

“[But] the glorious possibilities set before Israel could be realized only through obedience to God’s commandments” (ibid. 305; cf. PP 118, 368, 369).

2. The promises to literal Israel were based on the old covenant relationship, and because of the nation’s failure to comply with the conditions God attached to the promises, the Jewish people forfeited their right to those promises.

“Do the Scriptures teach that the natural descendants of Jacob are entitled to any special privileges or blessings under the new covenant [either now or in the future]? We affirm that they do not, and appeal to the testimony of God’s word” (J. H. Waggoner, The Kingdom of God [1859], p. 88). “The promises of the kingdom . . . were forfeited under the old covenant” (ibid., p. 101).

“They could claim them only on the fulfillment of the conditions. . . . Therefore it must be admitted that they can receive nothing in the future for any consideration in the past” (ibid., p. 87).

At Sinai, Israel “entered into a solemn covenant with God, pledging themselves to accept Him as their ruler, by which they became, in a special sense, the subjects of His authority” (PP 303).

“God had separated them from the world, that He might commit to them a sacred trust. He had made them the depositaries of His law, and He purposed, through them, to preserve among men the knowledge of Himself. Thus the light of heaven was to shine out to a world enshrouded in darkness, and a voice was to be heard appealing to all peoples to turn from their idolatry to serve the living God” (ibid. 314).

They were thus to “stand forth under His wise and holy rule as an example of the superiority of His worship over every form of idolatry” (ibid.).

“All who . . . turned from idolatry to the worship of the true God were to unite themselves with His chosen people. As the numbers of Israel increased they were to enlarge their borders, until their kingdom should embrace the world” (COL 290).

“If Jerusalem . . . had heeded the light which Heaven had sent her, she might have stood forth in the pride of prosperity, the queen of kingdoms. . . . She might through Him have been . . . the mighty metropolis of the earth” (DA 577).

“Had Israel as a nation preserved her allegiance to Heaven, Jerusalem would have stood forever, the elect of God” (GC 19).

“Had Israel remained true to God, this glorious building [the Temple] would have stood forever, a perpetual sign of God’s especial favor to His chosen people” (PK 46).

“Christ would have averted the doom of the Jewish nation if the people had received Him. . . . [But] they rejected the Light of the world, and henceforth their lives were surrounded with darkness as the darkness of midnight. The doom foretold came upon the Jewish nation” (ibid., p. 712).

“When Christ should hang upon the cross . . . , Israel’s day as a nation favored and blessed of God would be ended” (GC 21).

3. The restoration promises were made prior to, or in connection with, the return from Babylonian captivity, and applied to the restoration period.

“There is not a text, promise or prophecy written or given of God, which was not given before their return from Babylon, and I believe was then literally fulfilled” (William Miller, Views, p. 233).

“Had Israel been true to God, He could have accomplished His purpose through their honor and exaltation” (DA 28).

The covenant promises might “have met fulfillment in large measure during the centuries following the return of the Israelites from the lands of their captivity” (ibid. 703, 704).

4. The Jews are now entitled to salvation on the same basis as the people of every other nation, and OT promises not already fulfilled to them belong now in principle to the church, the spiritual seed of Abraham from all nations, in so far as they are applicable to the new historical situation. The Boston Second Advent Conference went on record to the effect that “the Old Testament prophecies . . . have been fulfilled in what the gospel has already done, or remain to be fulfilled in the gathering all the spiritual seed of Abraham into the New Jerusalem” (The Signs of the Times 3:69, June 1, 1842; see SB, no. 1083).

“There are other [OT] prophecies that cannot apply in the first dispensation, but to a state more glorious than the present, where death and mortality cannot enter” (F. M. Bragg, in Review and Herald 9:11, Nov. 13, 1856).

The Israelite people “forfeited their blessings as His chosen people.” Nevertheless “the glorious purposes which He had undertaken to accomplish through Israel were to be fulfilled. All who, through Christ, should become the children of faith were to be counted as Abraham’s seed: they were inheritors of the covenant-promises” (PP 476).

“That which God purposed to do for the world through Israel, the chosen nation, He will finally accomplish through His church on earth today” (PK 713, 714).

The prophecies of the OT concerning Israel’s Messianic role “are today meeting fulfillment in the advancing lines of mission stations that are reaching out into the benighted regions of earth” (ibid. 375).

5. For a valid application of OT prophecies in the new NT historical situation to the Christian church, we must look to the inspired writers of the NT for guidance. The Boston Second Advent Conference of 1842, as has been noted, based its rejection of a literal application of the OT prophecies to a future kingdom of the Jews in Palestine for a thousand years on the fact “that no portion of the New Testament scriptures” contains even an “indirect intimation of the literal restoration of the Jews to old Jerusalem.”

The same point is made in an early SDA book: “All of our views of the Old Testament promises and prophecies must bow to the expositions in the New Testament” (Waggoner, The Kingdom of God [1859], p. 97).

Biblical Basis of Seventh-day Adventist View.

Biblical Basis of Seventh-day Adventist View. Promises to Israel Based on the Covenant. All of God’s dealings with the Israelites in OT times were based on the covenant that had originally been ratified between God and Abraham (Gen. 12:1—3; 15:18; 17:2—7). At Mount Sinai, more than four centuries later, Israel took an oath of allegiance to God, accepting Him as their sovereign and becoming in a special sense subjects of His authority (Ex. 19:5—8; 24:3—8; Deut. 7:6—14). This covenant continued in force until the leaders of the nation formally rejected Jesus as the Messiah and declared before Pilate their allegiance to “no king but Caesar” (Matt. 21:43—45; 23:36—38).

Under the covenant relationship the people of Israel pledged themselves to obey God (Ex. 19:1—8; 24:3—8), and He, on His part, promised to give them the land of Palestine as their inheritance (Gen. 15:18; Deut. 1:7, 8) and to endow them with unique physical, intellectual, and material blessings designed to render them the greatest nation upon the face of the earth. Among these covenant blessings were health, vigor, and immunity to sickness and disease (Ex. 15:26; Deut. 7:12—15); superior mental acuity and sound judgment (Deut. 4:6); skill in the cultivation of the soil that would gradually restore their land to the fertility and beauty of Eden, and bring prosperity to their flocks and herds (Deut. 7:13; 28:3—5, 8, 12; Isa. 51:3; Mal. 3:10, 11). As a result of obedience Israel would enjoy unparalleled prosperity and reach the highest standard of living of any nation (Deut. 8:18; 28:11—13), and become the greatest nation on the face of the earth (Deut. 4:6—8; 7:14; 28:1, 2, 10, 13; Jer. 33:9; Mal. 3:12). All of these blessings were predicated on Israel’s wholehearted cooperation with the revealed will of God, and to their best effort He would add Heaven’s rich blessing (Deut. 4:9; 28:1, 13, 14; 30:9, 10). Israel was thus to be a living example and a witness to the world of the infinite superiority of the worship and service of the true God (Deut. 4:6—9; 7:12—15; 28:1—13; Isa. 49:3, 6; 61:9; 62:1, 2), and one by one the nations would unite with Israel in serving Him (Isa. 2:2, 3; 11:10; 14:1; 19:18—22; 45:14; 55:5; 56:6, 7; 60:1—12; Jer. 3:17; 16:19; 33:9; Zech. 2:11; 8:20—23).

But as a result of apostasy, Israel forfeited possession of the land of Canaan, which was theirs only by virtue of the covenant relationship, and spent 70 years as captives in Babylon (2 Chron. 36:14—17; Isa. 5:1—7; Jer. 25:5—7; 29:18, 19; 32:21—23; Eze. 7:2—9; 12:3—28; 20:28, 35—38; 21:25—32; 36:18—23; Micah 2:10; cf. Hosea 9:3, 15), where they were to learn in adversity the lessons they had failed to learn during times of prosperity (Jer. 25:5—7; 46:28; Eze. 20:35—38).

Restoration After the Exile. After the Captivity, God renewed His covenant with Israel, restored them to their own land, and promised that all the covenant promises might yet come to pass if they would be loyal to Him (Jer. 31:3—38; 33:3—26; Eze. 36:8—11, 21—38; 43:10, 11; Micah 4:8—12; Zech. 1:17; 2:12; 6:15; 10:6). It is significant that all OT promises looking forward to a time of restoration for the Jews as the covenant people anticipated their return from Babylonian captivity (Isa. 14:1—7; 27:12, 13; Jer. 16:14—16; 23:3—8; 25:11; 29:10—14; 30:3—12; 32:37—44; Eze. 34:11—16; 37; Amos 9; Micah 2:12, 13). A probationary period of 490 years was allotted to Israel in which to measure up to God's purpose for them as a nation (Dan. 9:24—27; cf. Jer. 12:14—17). This period of time was to culminate with the coming of Messiah and the establishment of His kingdom.

The Kingdom Forfeited in the Rejection of the Messiah. At the time appointed Messiah came, but His own people “received him not” (John 1:11). Three days prior to the crucifixion Christ pronounced Heaven's verdict upon the Jewish nation: “The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof”; “your house is left unto you desolate” (Matt. 21:43; 23:38).

The Babylonian captivity did not mark “a full end” of Israel's role as the covenant people (Jer. 4:27; 5:18; 46:28), but when the Jews rejected their Messiah there was no assurance of reinstatement; this rejection was permanent and irrevocable (cf. Jer. 12:14—17).

The Kingdom Transferred. With the irrevocable rejection of Israel as the covenant people at the cross, the rights, privileges, promises, and blessings of the covenant relationship passed to the Christian church as God's chosen representative on earth (Matt. 28:19, 20; 2 Cor. 5:18—20; Acts 10:34, 35; Gal. 3:9, 27—29; 1 Peter 2:9, 10; Rom. 9:24—26, 30, 31; 10:12, 13). Like everyone else, individual Jews could still find salvation, but they must do so as believers in Christ and not as descendants of Abraham (Rom. 9:6; 11:1, 2, 11, 15, 22—26). NT writers often reinterpret OT prophecies originally addressed to literal Israel, in terms of the new historical situation, applying them to the church (Acts 2:17—21; 15:15—17; Rom. 9:25—29; 1 Cor. 9:9, 10; Gal. 3:11, 16; 4:22—31; Heb. 4:1—10; 8:8—12; 1 Peter 2:9, 10. Many OT prophecies—such as those affirming Israel's worldwide mission and the ingathering of the Gentiles, and those pointing forward to the eternal rest in Canaan—never were, and now never can be, fulfilled to Israel as a nation.

The concept that the covenant promises must be fulfilled to literal Israel is based on a misconception of the conditional nature of prophecy. Since the Jews forfeited their special status as the covenant people, there is no valid scriptural basis for relating the present-day return of the Jews to Palestine, and the modern state of Israel, to the OT covenant promises.

Fulfillment Under the New Testament. After the transfer of the covenant relationship to the church, many OT promises not already fulfilled to literal Israel would never be fulfilled because they were strictly conditional upon Israel's retaining its status as the covenant people. Others would be fulfilled to the Christian church, as spiritual Israel, in principle-but not necessarily in detail, because of the fact that many details of the prophecies were made with respect to Israel as a literal nation situated in the land of Palestine, whereas the Christian church is a spiritual “nation” scattered all over the world. Obviously, such details cannot apply to the church, at least in a literal sense.

Inasmuch as all the OT promises originally applied to literal Israel, it is only when a later inspired writer applies them to the new historical situation, in which the church is God’s chosen instrument, that we can be positive of the validity of this application. Details that depended upon the Jews continuing as God’s chosen people in the land of Palestine have lapsed by default. To lift selected passages out of their literary and historical context in the OT and to apply them arbitrarily to our day is not valid exegesis.

In summary, the OT prophecies concerning Israel constitute a declaration of God’s purpose with respect to the Jews as the covenant people; these prophecies were strictly conditional upon their cooperation; by rejecting Jesus as the Messiah the Jewish nation withdrew from the covenant relationship and forfeited its special relationship to God under the covenant; the covenant promises and privileges were permanently transferred to the Christian church as the new covenant people, to be fulfilled to the extent that they are applicable under the new historical situation; details dependent on literal Israel retaining its status as the covenant people, resident in Palestine, have lapsed by default; we are dependent upon later inspired writers for a valid application of these OT predictions to the church.

Israelite Heritage Institute

ISRAELITE HERITAGE INSTITUTE. An organization to which was assigned, by action of the General Conference Committee, the work of fostering Seventh-day Adventist work among the Jewish people through Bible correspondence lessons, radio programs, a quarterly periodical, and also evangelistic work-either by public meetings, where advisable, and/or personal activities, such as house-to-house visitation.

Hebrew Scripture Association. The forerunner of the Israelite Heritage Institute, the Hebrew Scripture Association, was formed in 1955 with W. E. Read as its president. The work of the association was, in the main, initiatory and advisory, for its activities were carried on largely through the regular channels of the union and local conferences. The association was composed of 19 members, but its routine work was cared for by an executive committee of seven, operating from the denominational headquarters on budgets voted by the annual Autumn Council of the General Conference.

Earlier efforts to win Jewish converts had been included in the program of the Bureau of Home Missions (organized in 1905 as a department of the General Conference to promote gospel work among the foreign language population of the United States and Canada), because large numbers of the Jews in these countries at that time spoke Yiddish. About 1911 F. C. Gilbert, an English-born Jew converted to Christianity in America, who had become an SDA minister, was appointed to supervise the Jewish work. Gilbert for some time had been an editor of evangelistic publications for Jews, and under his supervision the development of SDA publications and fieldwork on behalf of the Jews had been begun.

Later S. Kaplan, his successor, also a convert from Judaism, became concerned about the need for literature for the Jewish people and initiated a quarterly journal named The Sabbath Exponent (now Shabbat Shalom). Other Jewish workers helped in caring for the work in different parts of the field.

The approach to Jewish people has been varied according to circumstances, and practically all who have been won have come in through personal ministry. There has never been any mass evangelism of the Jews. In recent years reports have come from all parts of the world regarding Jews accepting Jesus as the Messiah.

The Times Square Center, 410 W. 45th Street, New York City, was opened as an evangelistic center for Jewish work in 1959. Lectures on healthful living given by Jay Hoffman, an SDA minister of Jewish ancestry, attracted as many as 400 Jewish persons at one time.

The Spirit of Prophecy states that many Jews will be converted in the last days.

It Is Written

IT IS WRITTEN. A plan of global evangelism that centers on 30-minute videotapes (films until 1969) produced in color for television release. It combines mass communication with public evangelism and personal contacts made by laypeople.

The plan was developed in 1955 when George Vandeman, an associate secretary of the Ministerial Association (later a general field secretary of the General Conference), was asked to explore the possibilities of a new approach to city evangelism.

With an initial appropriation from the 1955 Autumn Council, the first films were made in California. Production moved to the East Coast in the fall of 1956. Two laymen, Dr. J. W. Field and Don Loveridge, contributed heavily to the new project. The General Conference was headquarters for production until the end of 1971 when It Is Written moved to Thousand Oaks, California, where the Seventh-day Adventist Media Center is now located.

During the early years It Is Written (IIW) operated with an extremely small staff. Marjorie Lewis Lloyd assisted with both scripts and production through 1971. At that time David L. Jones assumed production responsibilities. In 1993 the staff included 15 persons serving in production, field services, public relations, and prayer ministries.

Until 1992 the telecast featured George Vandeman as speaker, with a unique semidocumentary format. The series was supplemented by a blend of doctrinal, health, and felt-needs telecast messages designed to appeal to a broad secular audience. With an inventory of more than 550 Scripture-based programs, It Is Written produces each year approximately 36 additional telecasts to assure that material remains as up-to-date as possible.

Viewers are invited to telephone or write for free books or other materials. Interested individuals are guided through a Bible course by local conference laypeople or pastors. With careful follow-up, the program is a continuing source of baptisms.

Mark Finley became the speaker/director of IIW in September 1992. Ministerial secretary for the Trans-European Division from 1985—1990, Finley founded the North American Division Evangelism Institute in 1979. Vandeman continued with the ministry as speaker emeritus and consultant.

It Is Written has the distinction of producing the first religious telecast regularly broadcast in color. It has been aired at various times throughout Australia and Europe. A French It Is Written telecast, with George Hermans as speaker, covered eastern Canada from 1974—1990. In 1992 the It Is Written Foundation in Canada merged with the Destiny telecast and began producing programs for Canada exclusively, using Mark Finley as speaker and Henry Feyerabend as associate speaker.

After the collapse of Communism in the former Soviet Union, IIW blanketed the Commonwealth of Independent States with programs dubbed into Russian. During that same time a group of laypersons in Brazil funded the production of the Vandeman programs dubbed into Portuguese and using Brazilian musicians taped on the IIW set. In 1992, IIW was rated as the top religious program in Brazil. Nielsen ratings in the United States reflect favorable response to the programs throughout the country. The programs have garnered 17 Angel awards from Excellence in Media since 1978.

Italian Junior College

ITALIAN JUNIOR COLLEGE (Istituto Avventista Villa Aurora Scuola Media e Liceo Scientifico Seminario di Teologia). A coeducational boarding school on the junior college level operated by the Italian Union of Churches, serving a constituency numbering 5,236 (1993). The school is situated on a 50-acre (20-hectare) estate on the outskirts of Florence.

The school was opened in 1940 when World War II prevented the Italian students from attending the French seminary at Collonges. It was then housed in the building occupied by the Italian Union Mission and Publishing House in Florence. In the summer of 1947 the school was transferred to newly acquired property at Via del Pergolino 12. Alongside the central building, which is a large villa dating from the sixteenth century, a new dormitory for boys has been erected.

Courses offered are middle school, three years, recognized by the Italian educational authorities; secondary school, five years, officially recognized; the fifth year, introduced in 1975—1976; theology, three years, the remaining portion being completed at the French Adventist seminary at Collonges-sous-Salève. Bible subjects are also taken by resident students who are at the same time enrolled in the University of Florence.

Principals: G. Cupertino, 1940—1952; B. B. Beach, 1952—1958; S. Agnello, 1958—1963; Franco Santini, 1963—1964; Henri Long, 1964—1968; Michele Buonfiglio, 1968—1970; Alfredo Romano, 1970—1972; Francesco Santini, 1972—1980; Pierre Winandy, 1980—1985; Raul Posse, 1985—1990; Vittorio Fantoni, 1990— .

Italian Publishing House

ITALIAN PUBLISHING HOUSE (Edizioni A.D.V. L'Araldo della Verita). A publishing house operated at Florence, Italy. Although the Seventh-day Adventist message first came to Italy in 1864, many years elapsed before a solid work could be established. Impressed that publications in Italy would help to stabilize the work, J. N. Andrews and other pioneer workers in Europe took a keen interest in the preparation of literature in Italian. As early as 1884 a 16-page Italian quarterly, L'Ultimo Messaggio ("The Last Message"), appeared in Basel, Switzerland, the center at that time. Later the paper was printed in Genoa, Italy, and from 1909 to 1914 in Florence.

In 1921 a book depository was opened in Florence at the Italian Mission headquarters. A new monthly paper appeared entitled L'Araldo della Verità ("The Herald of Truth").

With the help of funds from Big Week, a building lot was bought in 1925 in Florence, and in 1926 a building was erected, which housed the Italian Publishing House (without printing plant) and the Italian Mission, with three second-floor apartments. At that time there were four employees: the manager (who was also the secretary-treasurer of the mission), the editor, one assistant, and the man in charge of the stockroom. Besides L'Araldo della Verità (which was published regularly until 1943, when it was discontinued because of World War II restrictions), a church paper, Messaggero Avventista ("Adventist Messenger"), was published.

In 1949, when conditions had improved, the offices of the Italian Union Mission were transferred to Rome, thus giving the publishing house full use of the building in Florence. In 1951 a bindery was set up, and in 1952 the Publishing Rehabilitation Fund of the General Conference equipped the press. Gradually new modern machines have been added, including, in 1956, an Intertype C-4 typesetting machine.

Expansion of the plant became necessary in 1966, but because of legal limitations only an underground and ground floor could be built for paper storage and bindery. In 1970 the first offset press was introduced, and in 1972, a second one. During 1974 an automatic assembler and a three-knife trimming stitcher were purchased for periodicals and tracts.

The Italian Publishing House produces various books and tracts, and three monthly papers: Messaggero Avventista ("Adventist Messenger") for the church; Segni dei Tempi ("Signs of the Times") since 1946—in place of L'Araldo della Verità, and Vita e Salute ("Life and Health").

At the present time (1993), the Italian Publishing House has 15 employees. The sales in 1993 amounted to L921,038,211.

Managers: L. Mair, 1926—1928; Giovanni Fenz, 1929—1954; Giuseppe Ferraro, 1954—1958; Silvano Cortesi, 1958—1962; Silo Agnello, 1962—1964; Ismaele Rimoldi, 1964—1982; Giuseppe De Meo, 1982—1986; Gaetano Pispisa, 1985—1990; Franco Evangelisti, 1990— .

Italy.

ITALY. A republic in Southern Europe occupying principally the boot-shaped peninsula extending southeastward into the mid-Mediterranean Sea, and bounded on land by France, Switzerland, Austria, and Slovenia. It includes the islands of Sicily to the south and Sardinia to the west, and other small islands. Within Italy, but independent of it, are the sovereign states of San Marino and Vatican City. The total area is 116,303 square miles (301,225 square kilometers); the population (1994) is 5.8 million.

The terrain and climate of Italy are diversified, varying from the frigid heights of the Alps in the northwest to the semitropical southern tip. The peninsula has the typical Mediterranean climate of rainy winters and dry summers. Ninety percent of the area is farmland or forest. Principal agricultural products are cereals, garden produce, wines, and olives. In industry, textiles are the most important. Industrial requirements for fuel and minerals cannot be met without imports, but hydroelectric power is plentiful and well developed.

The Italian people are a blend of the ancient Umbrians, Ligurians, Latins, Etruscans, Greeks, Spaniards, and others from Roman times, and the later Goths, Lombards, and even Saracens, with a German-speaking minority group in the Tyrol region. The vast majority speak Italian. They are 99 percent Catholic; the largest Protestant groups being the Waldensians, the Pentecostals, and the Baptists.

Once the proud homeland of the Roman Empire that ruled the Mediterranean world, Italy was overrun by successive barbarian invaders and remained dismembered through the Middle Ages, ruled in various areas by foreign kings, emperors, popes, and powerful nobles, later by princes of modern European states—Spain, Austria, France—and by princes of Italian principalities. Finally in the mid-nineteenth century arose a nationalist movement for liberation and unification that resulted in 1870 in the creation of modern Italy as a constitutional monarchy under the House of Savoy.

The incorporation of the Papal States and the city of Rome into the new nation left the pope without territory and at odds with the Italian government until the reconciliation of 1929. The Lateran treaty of 1929 made the pope a ruler again over Vatican City.

In World War I Italy sided with the Allies, and in World War II, under the rule of Mussolini, with Germany. In 1946, after the Italian people voted against the monarchy, Italy became a republic. In the constitution of 1948 all religions were declared equal, and freedom of worship was guaranteed.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. The territory of Italy, plus the two enclaves (unentered) of San Marino and Vatican City, and the island of Malta, constitutes the Italian Union of Churches, which is part of the Euro-Africa Division. Statistics (1993) for Italy: churches, 89; members, 5,236; ordained ministers, 41; credentialed commissioned ministers, 8; credentialed missionaries, 25. Headquarters for the Italian Union are at Lungotevere Michelangelo 7, Rome. The national territory is divided into four fields: North Field, Central Field, South Field, and Sicilian Field.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. Italy occupies a unique place in denominational history in that it was the first country in Europe in which SDA doctrines were preached. The herald was M. B. Czechowski, a Polish ex-Catholic priest who had been baptized in Findlay, Ohio, by M. E. Cornell in the summer of 1857, and had later worked with D. T. Bourdeau among French-speaking people in America, but had failed to persuade the Seventh-day Adventists to send him to Europe. Going under the sponsorship of another Adventist denomination, but not regarded by them as one of their regular missionaries, he arrived in Torre Pellice, in the Waldensian valleys of Piedmont, northern Italy, in 1864. He rented a hall, preached, and carried on religious discussions on the Bible. He also extended his activities to Turin, Milan, Bergamo, Venice, and Brescia. In some of these cities he may have won some converts. He taught the Sabbath, and his first converts in Torre Pellice and in Switzerland later became connected with the SDA Church. Catherine Revel and J. D. Geymet were the first to accept the Sabbath. Geymet became the first SDA colporteur in Europe, and worked in Italy, Switzerland, and France from 1864 to 1921. The Torre Pellice church provided a number of SDA workers, such as Alfred Vaucher (grandson of Catherine Revel), who for many years was the Bible teacher in the French college at Collonges-sous-Salève; Elie Bertalot, minister in Italy from 1910 to 1945; and Albert Long, missionary in Madagascar from 1928 to 1948.

In 1877 J. N. Andrews, the first missionary sent by Seventh-day Adventists to Europe, came from Switzerland to Naples and baptized H. P. Ribton, M.D., and his wife and daughter in the Bay of Naples near Pozzuoli (biblical Puteoli). Dr. Ribton held meetings in Naples and soon reported five converts; by 1878 there were 22 converts there. Ribton translated several tracts into Italian. Dr. Ribton came in contact with Ercole Volpi, a former minister of the Italian Free Church, who had become a pastor of the Baptist Church in Bari. This minister accepted the Sabbath truth and baptized a number of people into the SDA message. Volpi had lengthy correspondence with J. N. Andrews in Basel.

Beginning sometime in 1877, the Italian SDAs in Naples sent the French paper Signes des Temps to their acquaintances among the Italians in Alexandria, Egypt, and corresponded with them about SDA doctrines. In the spring of 1878 Romualdo Bertola, an Italian commercial traveler and self-supporting missionary, visited Alexandria on business and formed a group there, baptizing seven persons. He also visited other Mediterranean countries, including Turkey, Greece, and Malta, where he found others interested in the message. Italy was then the center of an extensive missionary movement in the Mediterranean area. A tract, IlGiorno del Signore ("The Day of the Lord"), was published in Naples in 1884 as a reply to the tract Il Sabato Cristiano ("The Christian Sabbath"), written by Daniel Wilson against the Sabbath.

In 1884 D. T. Bourdeau visited Italy and organized a church in Naples (10 members). He secured the help of A. Biglia and held meetings in Barletta and Bari. In 1885 A. C. Bourdeau settled in Torre Pellice, where there were a few adherents. Ellen White visited Torre Pellice in 1885. L'Ultimo Messaggio ("The Last Message") was the first SDA Italian periodical. It was printed in Basel, Switzerland, about 1884 and was circulated by A. Biglia. In 1895 H. P. Holser visited Naples, Turin, Torre Pellice, and Genoa and mentions that a Swiss SDA, J. Leuzinger, was doing missionary work in Genoa and on the ships.

As early as 1900 there were a "few Sabbathkeepers" in Rome, but no SDA worker had been sent there. In 1902 C. T. Everson and his wife and Mrs. J. R. Schell were sent from California to take up work in Italy, and settled in Rome. The first convert, named Lattoni, held meetings in Italian in 1904 in Rome, the first public SDA evangelism in the "Eternal City." A. Fant and D. Gaeta, baptized by C. T. Everson during his stay in Rome, assisted in the propagation of the faith in Italy before 1910. Another convert in Rome, Miss L. Chiellini, a member of the Waldensian aristocracy, later assisted in the translation of SDA publications into Italian, in particular Ellen White's book Steps to Christ.

In 1909 Everson was replaced as director of the Italian Mission Field by L. Zecchetto from America. Settling in Genoa, Zecchetto arranged for the periodical L'Ultimo Messaggio to be printed in Florence. Maria Cambiaso, a lay member found in Genoa by D. Gaeta while canvassing and baptized in 1910, was instrumental in winning converts in Genoa, Montaldo Bormida, and elsewhere. At the time of the 1909 General Conference session, there were 52 members in Italy.

Work in Florence was begun in 1910 and in Pisa in 1912 by G. L. Lippolis. At this time two members of the Gravina church, where P. Creanza had come in 1908, entered the work-G. Sabatino in Florence and N. Cupertino in Naples.

By December 1918 there were seven churches and 110 members in Italy. In 1920, members are mentioned in Torre Pellice, Bolzano, Montaldo Bormida, Genoa, Pisa, Bari, Gravina, and Firmo. Since Italy was a mission of the European Division, workers were sent from Austria, Germany, and Switzerland.

In 1922 the first general meeting and first colporteur institute were held. In 1923

V. Speranza came from the United States as publishing secretary. The publishing house "L'Araldo della Verità" was established in Florence in 1926 (see Italian Publishing House).

In 1928 the Italian Union Mission was established, with headquarters at Florence. It comprised the North, Central, and South Italian missions, with 19 churches and 410 members. G. L. Lippolis was elected president and served until 1934.

The Italian armed forces, who were in control in Addis Ababa in 1936, had as their objective the elimination of Protestant missions and the control of Catholic missions by Italians. In 1938 Giuseppe Cupertino took charge of the Ethiopian Mission, which was then part of the Italian Union Mission.

During World War II, Italy was separated from the division office in Berne. Quite a few of the Italian workers were on their own because war had interrupted communications within the country. Luigi Beer, president of the Italian Union Mission from 1934 to 1959, tried to keep in touch with the workers. In the Piedmont area, Riccardo Bongini prepared and mimeographed his own Sabbath school quarterlies. In the north some ministers had to be paid directly by the local church treasurers. In spite of difficulties, the publishing work steadily increased. The membership grew from 845 members in 1939 to 1,213 in December 1945. No other church in Italy grew so rapidly during the war years.

In 1959 Giuseppe Cavalcante became president of the Italian Union Mission, followed in 1964 by Silo Agnello. He held this position until 1971 when the Italian Union Mission was incorporated as a mission in the Southern European Union Mission.

Sicily. Sicily was entered in 1916 with the return of sisters M. and D. Infranco from the United States. In September 1920 R. Calderone came and baptized six people. In May 1921 the first church in Sicily was organized at Montevago. In September 1921 G. L. Lippolis had two discussions with G. Raimondo, professor of sacred eloquence in the Seminary of Palermo. As a result of these discussions Catholics published a tract entitled “Brevi risposte agli Avventisti del Settimo Giorno” (“A Brief Answer to the Seventh-day Adventists”), by G. Amodeo, to which G. L. Lippolis replied with the tract: “La luce dirada le tenebre” (“The Light Dispels the Darkness”). R. Valerio, converted in the United States, became an evangelist and established a church in Palermo in 1928, and companies in Catania, Piazza Armerina, and San Michele di Ganzaria.

By 1940 it became necessary to have an Italian training school to accommodate the young people who had been attending the Séminaire Adventiste in Collonges, France, since 1925. Thus a training school was established, first housed in the union and publishing headquarters in Via Trieste, Florence, but later transferred to Villa Aurora (see Italian Junior College). A recently purchased Methodist chapel became the temporary headquarters of the union. Later, property was purchased in Rome for the offices of the Italian Union, where they were transferred in 1949.

The Bible correspondence course, organized in 1947, had by 1973 served a total of 119,304 registered students, of whom 7,634 had finished the course and 995 had been baptized. Radio programs were broadcast in Italian over the local radio Bologna for nearly three years, from 1947 to 1950, and over radio Montecarlo from 1950 to 1957; also over radio Cagliari (Sardinia) from 1947 to 1952. It has not been possible to broadcast over the national network.

Religious Freedom. There is more freedom today than in the past, when religious authorities seriously opposed the work. The Italian government has recognized SDA ministers and, by decree, has granted them permission to celebrate marriages as state functionaries. It gives Sabbath free to those in military service, and to pupils in public schools and also releases them from attendance at Catholic religion classes. However, because of the difficulty of finding work with the Sabbath free, many people are hindered from accepting the SDA message.

The work is carried on by meetings in regular places of worship and by Bible studies in the homes of interested people. Colporteur work, the entering wedge in the early days, is still highly effective.

From April 27 to May 1, 1989, a national congress took place at Rimini celebrating 60 years of the Italian Union. Starting in 1990 the Seventh-day Adventist Church is included on 30 million income tax returns as part of the 8 percent campaign. In cooperation with ADRA International, the Adventist Church has carried out four promotional campaigns, with ads on radio, television, and in magazines, that have exposed the church to 55 million Italian citizens. The Public Affairs and Religious Liberty Department had the responsibility for this activity.

J

Jackson, Samuel Ellis

JACKSON, SAMUEL ELLIS (1873—1930). Missionary in the Philippines, conference administrator and teacher. Orphaned before the age of 7, he went to live with a Seventh-day Adventist family and soon accepted their beliefs. He attended Battle Creek College, canvassed, and taught school before he entered evangelistic work in the Minnesota Conference in 1902. Five years later, in 1907, he was ordained to the gospel ministry and soon after was elected president of the Minnesota Conference. In 1906 and again in 1912 he taught Bible at Maplewood Academy. He was president of the North Dakota Conference (1913—1918) and after that went to the Philippine Islands to be superintendent of the Philippine Union Mission. In 1929, his health failing, he returned to the United States and retired.

Jacobs, Enoch

JACOBS, ENOCH (fl. 1845). A non-Sabbatarian Adventist, a one-time Methodist Protestant minister, editor of the Day-Star at Cincinnati. After the passing of Oct. 22, 1844, when the major Millerite papers, such as the Advent Herald, abandoned that date as marking the end of the 2300 days of Dan. 8:14, Jacobs held that the prophetic period had indeed ended at that time (perhaps with Christ sitting in judgment before His return), although he opposed the contention of the “spiritualizers” that the Second Advent had taken place and that it was not personal but spiritual, and invisible except to the eye of faith (see [Spiritualism \[1\]](#)).

Because Jacobs’ paper supported the validity of the 1844 movement, a number of the Adventists who later formed the nucleus of the Seventh-day Adventist Church wrote in its columns in 1845 and early 1846 (see Day-Star).

However, in 1846 Jacobs adopted the “spiritualist” view that he had formerly opposed. This view was rejected emphatically by Ellen Harmon (see EW 77) and James White and their group. Before long Jacobs moved his family to a Shaker village, and he and his wife joined the Shakers. The Day-Star became a Shaker journal in 1847.

Jacob's Trouble, Time of

JACOB'S TROUBLE, TIME OF. In Seventh-day Adventist terminology a brief period of extreme tribulation through which the church is to pass immediately prior to the Second Advent. The expression is based on Jacob's experience at the brook Jabbok upon his return to Palestine after 20 years of exile in Haran, as recorded in Gen. 32:22—30, and on Jeremiah's application of the term to ancient Israel's experience in Babylonian captivity prior to their liberation and restoration to their own land (Jer. 30:3, 7—9, 11).

When Jacob was returning with his wives, children, flocks, and herds, he learned that his brother Esau was coming to meet him with 400 armed men, evidently bent on murder. Greatly alarmed, Jacob spent the night in prayer at the Jabbok, wrestling with an unknown assailant whom at first he probably thought to be one of Esau's retainers but who proved to be a celestial being (Gen. 32:6—30). Jacob emerged from this crisis with a new name-Israel, meaning "God contends"-and with divine assurance of protection. The meeting with Esau proved to be a cordial reunion (Gen. 33:1—4).

Jeremiah's use of the expression "the time of Jacob's trouble" occurs in Gen. 30:7, following his prediction that the Captivity was to continue for 70 years (Gen. 29:10), and that at its close the people would be restored to their homeland (Gen. 30:1—3). However, in the land of their captivity Israel's prospect of restoration would appear hopeless (vs. 5—7)-as a similar restoration had to Jacob at the Jabbok. It is in this setting that Jeremiah declares: "Alas! for that day is great, so that none is like it: it is even the time of Jacob's trouble; but he shall be saved out of it" (Gen. 30:7).

With these OT experiences in mind, Seventh-day Adventists have applied the expression "the time of Jacob's trouble" to the future experience of the church during the eschatological "time of trouble" referred to in Dan. 12:1-after the close of human probation, while the seven last plagues are falling (LS 117)-immediately preceding the deliverance of the saints at Christ's second coming. In SDA eschatological thinking the setting of this experience is described as follows: "As Satan influenced Esau to march against Jacob, so he will stir up the wicked to destroy God's people in the time of trouble. And as he accused Jacob, he will urge his accusations against the people of God. He numbers the world as his subjects; but the little company who keep the commandments of God are resisting his supremacy. If he could blot them from the earth, his triumph would be complete. . . . They afflict their souls before God, pointing to their past repentance of their many sins. . . . Their faith does not fail because their prayers are not immediately answered. Though suffering the keenest anxiety, terror, and distress, they do not cease their intercessions. They lay hold of the strength of God as Jacob laid hold of the Angel; and the language of their souls is, 'I will not let thee go, except thou bless me.'

"Had not Jacob previously repented of his sin in obtaining the birthright by fraud, God would not have heard his prayer and mercifully preserved his life. So, in the time of trouble, if the people of God had unconfessed sins to appear before them while tortured with fear and anguish, they would be overwhelmed; despair would cut off their faith, and they could not have confidence to plead with God for deliverance. But while they have a deep sense of their unworthiness, they have no concealed wrongs to reveal. Their sins have gone beforehand to judgment, and have been blotted out; and they cannot bring them to remembrance” (GC 618—620).

Deliverance follows the scenes of affliction and distress: “At that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book” (Dan. 12:1).

Jamaica

JAMAICA. An English-speaking island nation in the Caribbean. It is 90 miles (145 kilometers) south of Cuba and has an area of 4,411 square miles (11,400 square kilometers) and a population (1994) of 2.6 million. The island was discovered by Columbus in 1494 and remained in the possession of the Spaniards until it was taken in 1655 by the English, who controlled it until 1962.

The population, according to the latest statistics, is 76 percent pure African (Blacks were first imported into Jamaica in 1517, and until slavery was finally abolished in 1838 the island was one of the greatest slave markets in the world), 15 percent Afro-European, and the remaining 9 percent numerous racial mixtures, hence the motto on the coat of arms: "Out of many one people."

Agriculture is the basic industry. Nearly every tropical product can be grown there, though the chief economic crops are sugar, bananas, citrus, cocoa, coconuts, ginger, tubers and pimento (allspice). Cattle raising is extensive. The country is rich in minerals, and is among the world's largest exporter of bauxite. Gypsum and marble, and deposits of copper, zinc, lead, and manganese are found in fairly large quantities. The discovery of bauxite and the swift growth of the tourist industry have greatly strengthened the economy of the island.

Jamaica has a high standard of education. The University of the West Indies, founded in 1946, is situated on Jamaica, and medicine, the arts, education, and the natural and social sciences are taught. There are several private and government-subsidized colleges and high schools providing education to the level of the General Certificate of Education and Caribbean Examination Council Examinations. These schools are open to all.

Religion

Religion. There is no established church on the island, although the Seventh-day Adventist Church constitutes the largest single denomination. The Roman Catholic Church came with the Spaniards. Protestant denominations include the Church of England, introduced in 1662; the Moravians, whose missionaries arrived in 1754 and became the first to teach Christianity to the slaves; the Baptists, who founded their mission in 1782; the Methodists, who came in 1789; the Presbyterians, organized in 1819; the Congregationalists, formed in 1876; the Seventh-day Adventists, who began work about 1890; and many other less numerous Protestant bodies.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. Interest was aroused by the introduction of SDA publications. About 1889 or 1890 William Arnold, a colporteur, went to the West Indies, and on the Island of Antigua sold a book to a man who sent it to his son, James Palmer, in Kingston, Jamaica. James Palmer wrote to the International Tract Society for more publications, which, when they arrived, he distributed in the city. Some of the tracts he had received he gave to a doctor at a public hospital, who, not being interested, gave them (including the tract Elihu on the Sabbath) to Mrs. Margaret Harrison, an Englishwoman who devoted much of her time to visiting the sick and helping the unfortunate. Although she became convinced through her reading that the seventh day was the Sabbath, she decided to put away the thought of keeping it. However, while attending church one Sunday, at which the Ten Commandments were being read, the fourth commandment arrested her attention. Impressed by the plain teaching of the divine command, she decided that she would keep God's holy day. She also began correspondence with the International Tract Society. Meanwhile the Palmers had interested four or five other families in Seventh-day Adventist teachings. When Mrs. Harrison learned of these people, she opened her home for their meetings. This group constituted the first company of Sabbathkeepers on Jamaica.

In 1892 L. C. Chadwick from the International Tract Society visited the group, and James Patterson and B. B. Newman began work as colporteurs in Jamaica, and eventually placed hundreds of books and magazines in the homes of the people. In 1893 Mrs. Harrison went to Battle Creek for treatment. While there she attended the General Conference session and appealed for a missionary for Jamaica. In response to her plea, A. J. Haysmer and his family were sent to establish a mission from funds raised through the Sabbath school offering, which in 1892 had been allocated to the West Indies. Landing in Kingston in May 1893, they found six adherents waiting to welcome them. Haysmer conducted public evangelistic meetings, and in March 1894 organized the first Seventh-day Adventist church on the island, with 37 members. Several months later a church building was acquired in Blue Mountain Valley.

In March 1895 another minister, F. I. Richardson, joined Haysmer on Jamaica. In midyear the Review and Herald reported a membership on the island of 102. Several factors contributed to rapid growth in membership. The church members, active in circulating SDA publications throughout the island, lent or gave away large numbers of Signs of the Times, tracts, and pamphlets. Many of the young men and women who joined the church trained as colporteurs and sold Seventh-day Adventist books in every parish. As a result of this aggressive promotion of the SDA teaching the membership increased to 300 in 1896. Among the converts were ministers of other denominations who in many instances led some of their congregations with them. These ministers in turn helped to spread Seventh-day Adventist beliefs, and attracted persons who later became prominent workers in the church.

Organization and Growth

Organization and Growth. In November 1897 the first general meeting of workers for the West Indies was held in Kingston, and the West Indian Mission was organized with its headquarters in Jamaica. In 1903, during the visit of W. A. Spicer, then secretary of the Foreign Mission Board, the 1,200 Jamaican adherents were organized into the Jamaica Conference under J. B. Beckner, the first conference in the West Indies to be organized. The next year Jamaican churches sent out their first missionary, a young man, Nathan Moulton, directing him to go to Puerto Rico. Later others were sent out, opening the work in the Turks and Caicos Islands, and the Cayman Islands.

In 1906 the West Indian Union Conference was organized, with headquarters at Kingston, Jamaica. In 1907 the first union conference meeting was held at Kingston with more than 400 delegates from the Caribbean field. This meeting was in session when an earthquake destroyed the city, but no one in the building was injured. The next year the union headquarters were moved to Colón, Canal Zone, but they were returned to Jamaica in 1911. In 1908 the first national Seventh-day Adventist ministers, A. N. Durrfant, Hubert Fletcher, M. Jones, W. H. Randle, and Linton Rashford, were ordained.

In 1919 there were 2,200 members in 50 churches in Jamaica. In 1923, the year in which the Jamaica Conference (including Cayman Islands Missions) became a part of the newly organized Antillian Union Mission, its membership was 2,216 in 56 churches. By the end of 1943 the membership had grown to 9,255 in 150 churches. With this increase in membership, the Jamaica Conference was divided into two missions, which in 1944 were organized into conferences. At the same time a new union was organized, the British West Indies Union Mission, comprising Jamaica, the Bahama Islands, the Cayman Islands, Turks and Caicos Islands, and British Honduras, with headquarters in Jamaica. In 1952 Allan C. Stockhausen, a Jamaican, was the first national to become president of this union. The union's name was changed in 1959. In January 1962 the two Jamaican conferences were reorganized into the present three conferences: the Central, East, and West Jamaica conferences. At the time the total membership was 31,309.

The membership at the end of 1992 was 153,314 in 503 churches. If a cross were laid down the full length of the island, with the crossbeam at the widest part and the churches were strung out on these two lines, these churches would be less than a half mile (.8 kilometer) apart. The North Street church in Kingston is one of the largest SDA congregations in the world. Each Sabbath day in 1992 more than 190,000 persons met in the islands Sabbath schools, which meant that there was one Sabbathkeeper for every 15 persons in Jamaica.

Institutions and Departmental Activities

Institutions and Departmental Activities. Seventh-day Adventist medical work in Jamaica began in 1913, when D. E. Wellman opened treatment rooms in Kingston with four nurses (one man and three women). For lack of funds, this work was discontinued in 1918. After that, classes in home nursing were conducted from time to time at the West Indies College. In 1944 property was purchased in an attractive suburb of Kingston, and the next year medical work was reestablished when Andrews Memorial Hospital opened its doors. West Indies College, in conjunction with Andrews Memorial Hospital, operates a nursing program offering the bachelor's degree.

The West Indian Training School, offering courses on the secondary level for the whole Caribbean area, was opened at Riversdale, Jamaica, in 1907 with C. B. Hughes in charge. To help finance the institution, the General Conference Committee donated 3,000 copies of Ellen White's book Christ's Object Lessons, which were to be sold and the proceeds given to the school. In 1913 the school was closed. In 1919 a new school, also named West Indies Training School, was opened at Mandeville. This later became a junior and still later a senior college.

In 1947 the Voice of Prophecy programs were put on the air and a Bible correspondence school was opened, marking the beginning of radio work on the island. In the first 15 years of the correspondence school's operation, 144,000 persons enrolled for study and 3,000 had joined the SDA Church through baptism. The program still continues to play an important role in the union evangelism program. Over the past 10 years some 40,000 persons enrolled and 1,654 joined the church through baptism.

Literature evangelism, as the bedrock on which the work started in this union, continues to grow and expand. Between 1960 and 1990 more than 1,000 souls have been baptized as a direct result of the work of colporteurs. During this period approximately US$20 million worth of books have been sold by colporteurs and the Adventist Book Centers.

Lay evangelism had held an important place in SDA work in Jamaica. Having been encouraged to share their faith with their neighbors, the church members have brought into being most of the churches on the island. The ministers each usually hold two to three evangelistic campaigns a year, and in 1992 there were 29 ministers, each of whom baptized 100 or more; one baptized more than 300, and four more than 200.

The combined church ministries activities for 1992 were as follows: Bible studies, 40,712; units of Seventh-day Adventist publications distributed, 43,273; value of articles given away, $1,483,728.96.

James, George

JAMES, GEORGE (c. 1860—1894). First Seventh-day Adventist missionary to the indigenous people of Africa. As a young violinist in London, playing for concerts and in places of amusement but not satisfied with his future prospects, James decided to emigrate to the United States in the 1880s. Not long after his arrival he attended a series of evangelistic meetings and was baptized into the Seventh-day Adventist Church. In order to gain a more thorough knowledge of the Bible that he might share his faith more effectively, he attended Battle Creek College.

While at the college James became interested in foreign missions. Only a few years before, the first group of SDA workers had gone to Australia and the islands of the Pacific. James decided that he too wanted to work among people not reached by the gospel, and that he would follow in the footsteps of Judson, Moffat, and Livingstone. When a foreign mission band was formed at the college, he joined, and in time became its leader. In 1890 he asked the Foreign Mission Board to send him to Africa. The board replied that funds were limited, and they did not feel that the time had come to open up work among the pagans in Africa. Determined to follow his convictions, James sold all he had except his violin to pay his own way to Africa.

Arriving at Cape Town by January 1893, he set out for Nyasaland (now Malawi). He went by steamer to Durban and Chinde, at a mouth of the Zambezi River; by whaleboat, with a crew of 10 Africans, up the Zambezi and Shire rivers for 18 days; then by hammock 28 miles (45 kilometers) to Blantyre. Near there, at the nonsectarian mission of a Mr. Booth (apparently Joseph Booth, later at Malamulo), James introduced Sabbathkeeping and spent some time teaching the Seventh-day Adventist message.

Little is known of the activities of the young missionary during the next two years. He passed from village to village, mingling freely with the African people, preaching the gospel and treating the sick. Once he went to the assistance of a tribe in danger of being enslaved. Wherever he went, he carried with him the “box that could sing,” as the Africans called his violin. He loved the people, and they loved him. Many years later W. H. Anderson met some Nyasaland Africans who described the very features of George James. They told about his violin, and about his keeping “the right day” as his day of rest.

In 1894 James was thrilled to hear of the mission station being opened for the indigenous people in Matabeleland, near Bulawayo. Feeling that he could accomplish more by linking up with other workers, he bade farewell to his weeping converts, promising to return soon with other missionaries, and took a river steamer bound for the coast. On the way he was stricken with malaria and died. The steamer stopped briefly for a hasty burial in a lonely unmarked spot.

James, Judson S.

JAMES, JUDSON S. (1879—1965). Pioneer missionary, departmental secretary, publishing house manager, editor. He was born in Iowa and entered denominational work as a colporteur. He became field secretary, serving in Illinois, West Virginia, and the Northern Union. In 1906 he and his family went to India, where they opened up the work among the Tamil Sabbathkeepers. In 1917 and 1918 he was vice president of the China Division and after this served as home missionary secretary for the Central Union and associate Sabbath school secretary of the General Conference. In 1926 he became manager of the publishing house at Poona, India, and editor of the Oriental Watchman. He served as president of the West India Union in 1930. The James Memorial High School in Prakasapuram, South India, is named in his honor.

He returned to the United States in 1936 and for five years edited the Southern Tidings.

James Memorial Higher Secondary School

JAMES MEMORIAL HIGHER SECONDARY SCHOOL. A coeducational boarding school operated at Prakasapuram, Tamil Nadu, India, by the South Tamil Section of the South India Union in the Southern Asia Division. It is named for J. S. James, who with his wife pioneered in the area among a group of Tamil Sabbathkeepers in 1908. A small day school was opened in 1909, in the charge of a Mrs. Joseph. In 1912 the school, then called Tamil Day and Boarding School, and taught by E. D. Thomas, had 92 students, including 12 boarders. It served as a middle school for several terms, being known in 1921 as the Tamil Mission School and later as the Tamil Intermediate School. Beginning in 1925, high school work was offered for about 18 years, under several names: first, Tamil High School, the Prakasapuram High School, later Prakasapuram Secondary Boarding School, and still later James Secondary Boarding School. In 1953 overcrowding of the campus caused the transfer of the high school grades to Kudikadu, where E. D. Thomas Memorial High School was established.

It continued as an elementary school for several years, and now it has become James Memorial Higher Secondary School, with an enrollment of 342 students and 21 staff members. Plans have been laid for several new classrooms, a dining hall, and an adequate kitchen.

Japan

JAPAN. A nation with a democratic form of government that occupies a chain of islands lying off the eastern edge of the continent of Asia and consists of four main islands, Hokkaido, Honshu, Kyushu, Shikoku, plus the Ryukyu islands. On its total land area of 143,574 square miles (371,857 square kilometers) (slightly smaller than the state of California) live 125.1 million people (1994). The nation was formerly a kingdom with an emperor, but at the close of World War II the emperor became a symbol or figurehead, and his position results from the agreement of the people who hold the sovereign power. The population is largely homogenous, of a decidedly Mongoloid type, though there are indigenous Ainu peoples living on the island of Hokkaido who have some Caucasian features, which distinguish them from the Japanese, and there are also significant immigrant communities of Koreans and Chinese.

The authentic history of Japan dates from the fourth century A.D., when the Japanese came under the influence of the Chinese civilization and religion. The culture of Japan has been characterized through the centuries by its capacity to assimilate foreign influences. The Chinese provided a foundation for its development, supplying Japan with the literary language, and with Buddhism and Confucianism, but the Japanese built upon these contributions their own literary and religious systems; for example, by the end of the sixteenth century there was in Japan a specific brand of Buddhism. During the period when the national state was formed, religion was subordinated to the needs of the state and gradually developed into Shintoism, which became the state religion in the latter part of the nineteenth century. After World War II the support of religion by the state was discontinued. Buddhism and Shintoism are still predominant, and the ethics of Confucianism still permeate the social structure, but an interest in Christianity has developed.

The first Christian missionary to enter Japan was the Jesuit Francis Xavier, who arrived in 1549. His work and that of his successors met with remarkable success. It is estimated that at the end of 30 years there were 150,000 converts in 200 churches. However, political unrest and a growing mistrust of the real objectives of the missionaries led to the loss of official favor, to opposition, and to persecution, and thousands suffered martyrdom. Finally, all priests were expelled, the Christian faith was banned, and in 1624 Japan virtually closed its doors to the outside world. Jesuit records intimate that before the opposition was aroused there were a half million converts.

The isolation lasted for 230 years. The end of the period was marked by the arrival in the Bay of Yedo on July 8, 1853, of four American ships of war under the command of Commodore Matthew Calbraith Perry. Perry presented a letter from the president of the United States, and on a second visit a treaty was signed at Yokohama on Mar. 31, 1854, opening two ports to American ships. This opened the way for relations with other nations. Before long the island kingdom was reopened both to foreign trade and to missionary activity.

Government edicts against Christianity were removed from public bulletin boards in 1873, though laws restricting Christianity were not immediately repealed. In 1889 the emperor Meiji granted his people a constitution containing a religious liberty clause. That clause soon became a dead letter, because the militarists took control of the government and persecution of the Christians returned.

The new postwar constitution enacted in 1947 guarantees religious freedom for all and stipulates that the state “is to refrain from religious education or any other religious activity.” Japan now enjoys as much religious liberty as almost any other country, and Christianity has taken its place as one of Japan’s religions, with about 1 million members, 56 percent of them Protestants (1992).

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. The territory of Japan constitutes the Japan Union Conference, part of the Far Eastern Division. Statistics (1993) for Japan: churches, 108; members, 13,557; ordained ministers, 88; licensed ministers, 29; Bible instructors, 9; teachers of high school and college, 67. Headquarters for the Japan Union Conference: 846 Kamikawai-cho, Asahi-ku Yokohama 241, Japan. Official organ of the union: Adobenchisto Raifu (“Adventist Life”).

At the twenty-eighth session of the Japan Union Mission, held in December 1974, the union was reorganized into sections with administrative supervision and management at the union level rather than in local missions. The sections were as follows: Hokkaido, Tohoku, Kanto, Chubu-Kansai, Nishi Nippon, and Okinawa.

At the thirtieth session of the union mission in 1983, an action was voted to organize into two conferences and one mission. In the next year, at the extraordinary session of the Japan Union Mission, it was voted to organize a union conference, the second in the Far Eastern Division. From then on, the Japan Union Conference has had as its substructure the East Japan Conference, West Japan Conference, and the Okinawa Mission.

Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. As early as the spring of 1889, not long after reaching Hong Kong, Abram La Rue, the pioneer self-supporting missionary to the China coast, made a number of trips to Japan and distributed SDA publications in Yokohama and Kobe. S. N. Haskell visited Japan in 1890. Writing from Hong Kong July 16, he reported, "We baptized one man in Japan. There are others there who are interested; and we learned that the Sabbath question has been discussed among the Japanese, and that there are some of them keeping the Sabbath" (Review and Herald 67:518, Aug. 26, 1890).

The first Seventh-day Adventist missionaries sent to Japan were W. C. Grainger, of California, former president of Healdsburg College, and T. H. Okohira, a native of Japan, a former Healdsburg student. They reached Tokyo on Nov. 19, 1896, and began work by conducting the Shiba Bible School, which soon had an attendance of 60 young men. One of these young men was Hide Kuniya, who was in the first group of four Japanese to be baptized in Japan, and who later became one of the first two Japanese ordained SDA ministers, the other being Okohira. Until his death in 1962, this veteran worker was instrumental in bringing large numbers of converts into the church. He had been brought to the Bible school by a friend, a fellow soldier-an army doctor, M. Kawasaki, who entered practice in Tokyo and helped Kuniya take his training for the ministry. Dr. Kawasaki set out to learn SDA methods of treatment in order to become a medical missionary.

In November 1897 Grainger's wife and younger daughter joined him. Other workers soon followed-B. O. Wade and his wife, W. D. Burden and his wife (a daughter of the Graingers), and S. Hasekawa, a Japanese who had attended Healdsburg College. In January 1899 a second Bible school was opened in Tokyo.

The first SDA church was organized in Tokyo, June 4, 1899, with a membership of 13. In July a monthly church paper, Owari no Fukuin ("The Gospel for the Last Days"), was launched and paid for by profits from the sale of health foods to foreigners. It was renamed Toki no Shirushi ("Signs of the Times") in June 1917.

Grainger died Oct. 31, 1899. Late in 1901 F. W. Field, of Mount Vernon, Ohio, was sent with his family to be superintendent of the mission. At that time the Tokyo church had about 25 members, and there were several awaiting baptism at Wakamatsu and Nagasaki. One book had been printed in Japanese and two had been translated and were awaiting publication.

A sanitarium was opened in Kobe on June 1, 1903, with Dr. S. A. Lockwood in charge, assisted by Dr. Kumashiro (later Mrs. Noma) and later by Dr. Kawasaki, both Japanese physicians. Kobe Sanitarium operated until the end of February 1909. In 1908 other Japanese doctors under the leadership of Dr. Kiku Noma opened a privately owned sanitarium that carried on SDA medical work in Kobe for many years.

The first SDA tent meeting in Japan was held in Tokyo in 1905. That same year two churches were organized, one in Tokyo and the other in Kobe. In 1906 there were 126 adherents in Japan. The first general meeting for workers was held in January 1907, in the Kobe church, and was presided over by W. W. Prescott of the General Conference. In 1908 Hakodate, the chief city on the northern island of Hokkaido, was entered, and by the end of 1909 there were five churches and about 168 members. In 1911 the first evangelistic campaign on the island of Shikoku was undertaken.

A training school was opened in Tokyo in 1908, headed by Harry F. Benson, who had arrived in Japan in 1906. In 1913 J. N. Herboltzheimer and his wife, both nurses, who had worked with the Japanese doctors at their sanitarium in Kobe for a time, opened treatment rooms in Yokohama.

With the arrival of more missionaries in 1912 (B. P. Hoffman, A. N. Anderson, and

P. A. Webber, and their wives) the emphasis was placed upon the necessity of acquiring a good knowledge of the Japanese language. In 1914 a publishing house was established and the first mission headquarters building was erected in the western part of Tokyo. Members then numbered 243.

In 1915 Japan reported work in three new places and a new church organized at Nagoya. The first church school, under tentative permission, was opened at the mission headquarters early in September 1915. It was later closed by the authorities, and there were no church schools in Japan until April 1949, when one was opened at Ogikubo in Tokyo.

Organization. In 1917 the work in Japan was organized into the Japan Conference, with B. P. Hoffman, who had superintended the work, as president.

The spring council of the Asiatic Division Committee held in Shanghai in 1919 recommended further reorganization of the Japan field. Accordingly, at a conference session held the next August at Gotemba, near the foot of Mount Fuji, the Japan Union Mission was formed, comprising six local missions: Hokkaido, Tohoku, Kanto, Kansai, Chugoku, and Kyushu. B. P. Hoffman became the first union mission president. At that time there were 14 churches and 305 members.

Beginning in 1923 the following large denominational books were published in Japanese—Ellen White's Patriarchs and Prophets, The Great Controversy, and Christ's Object Lessons, and Uriah Smith's Thoughts on Daniel and Thoughts on the Revelation. Under the leadership of E. J. Kraft, union mission publishing secretary, the colporteur work in Japan grew rapidly.

In 1926 the training school was moved from the congested Tokyo compound to 35 rural acres (14 hectares) at Naraha in the province of Chiba and was reorganized. Students and teachers did all the work of building, farming, and running the school plant. The program of mental, physical, and spiritual education, alternating earnest study with practical work, attracted the favorable attention of the public and the national and provincial leaders.

With the arrival of Dr. E. E. Getzlaff and his wife in Japan on Dec. 1, 1927, a 20-bed hospital was built on the union mission compound in Tokyo, and was opened on May 1, 1929.

Seventh-day Adventists in Wartime Japan. After the "Shanghai incident" of July 1937, which was a harbinger of war, the government control over the lives of the people tightened. Detectives continually visited Christian churches in Japan, keeping watch over the movements of ministers and laity alike. It was not long until foreign missionaries were unwanted in the country, and by 1941 the General Conference had withdrawn all overseas SDA workers.

Because of their earlier close contacts with the West, the national workers and believers came to feel more and more the suspicion thrown on Christians by the officials and people. In 1943 the Seventh-day Adventist Church was dissolved because of its emphasis on the doctrine of the second coming of Christ, which clashed with the current national policy of extending the reign of the imperial house throughout the world.

On Sept. 20, 1943, the Japanese government in one day imprisoned 36 leaders and six laypersons. Church buildings, the publishing house, the school, and the hospital were ordered to be sold. It seemed that a deathblow had been dealt SDA work in Japan.

Seventh-day Adventists in Postwar Japan. With the surrender of the Japanese forces and the occupation of Japan by the Allied Powers in the fall of 1945, old restrictions were removed and new liberties given, which meant the beginning of a new era for SDAs. One of the first actions of Gen. Douglas MacArthur as supreme commander of the Allied Powers, was the release of political prisoners, which included SDA workers. Subsequently he issued a directive that properties wrongfully transferred be returned, under which three former missionaries, who returned to Japan immediately after the surrender, were able to get SDA properties returned. E. J. Kraft arrived in September 1945, and F. R. Millard and A. N. Nelson came in October. Millard was appointed first postwar president of the Japan Union Mission on Nov. 18, 1945.

With a new constitution, after the war Japan became a democratic nation. Church members reunited and missionary activities began. The General Conference allocated rehabilitation funds for Japan and sent over many workers. Churches were rebuilt, the college was reopened, and the work began to prosper more than before.

At the fifteenth session of the Japan Union Mission held in May 1948 the union mission, which since the war had operated as a single mission, was divided into the North and South Japan missions. President and secretary-treasurer of the North Japan Mission were P. H. Eldridge and Tsuruji Hasegawa, respectively. For the South Japan Mission the leading officers were V. E. Kelstrom and Kensaku Yasui. Three years later, in 1951, Okinawa was organized as a regular mission in the Japan Union Mission, with E. E. Jensen as president. In December 1965 the Hokkaido Mission was organized with five churches under the leadership of W. I. Hilliard, president. In December 1966 the Japan Union Mission office building was moved from Tokyo to Yokohama.

The Japanese Voice of Prophecy Bible Correspondence School, set up in Tokyo late in 1947, operated for some years before the first radio program was put on the air (on Aug. 2, 1952). In 1963 Japanese broadcasts were put on the air not only in Japan but also in Okinawa, Hawaii, the United States, and South America. During the 46 years of operation, the Voice of Prophecy Bible correspondence school recorded a total of 809,413 applications, 224,682 enrollments, and 93,812 graduates, which resulted in 8,751 baptisms.

Whereas cottage meetings were all that could be attempted before 1941, the postwar interest in Christianity brought people flocking to evangelistic meetings. In a 20-night series of meetings held in Tokyo during 1947 the average attendance was more than 600, even though the meeting hall was on the sixth floor of an unheated building that had no elevator and the time was the dead of winter.

Toward the end of 1950 the Japan Publishing House was moved to a new location on the outskirts of Yokohama. Sixteen books by Ellen White, newly translated into the Japanese language, have been published since the war. The work of literature evangelism has prospered. Every summer more than 100 students from the college are out selling publications to earn part- or full-time scholarships. As of 1992 there were 27 full-time literature evangelists and 272 working part time.

In 1952 an evangelistic center was opened in Tokyo, comprising the Tokyo Central church, North Japan Mission office Voice of Prophecy offices, and a clinic operated by the Tokyo Adventist Hospital. When the Japan Union Mission moved to its present location, the Voice of Prophecy also relocated on the union compound. The clinic was relocated on the compound of the Tokyo Adventist Hospital in 1973.

In 1959 an evangelistic center was dedicated in Osaka, with Leo Van Dolson serving as its first director. The main-floor auditorium had a seating capacity of 250 and was well furnished with musical and visual-aid equipment. On the second floor, space was provided for a clinic and a dental office. On the third floor were classrooms. There was a round-the-calendar program of evangelism. In this center an English language school program was started, taught by a group of student missionaries and AVSC volunteers. (The center was relocated to another site in Osaka in 1990.) As of 1992 English language schools were operated in Osaka, Kobe, Himeji, Hiroshima, Kagoshima, Tokyo, and Chiba, with a total enrollment of almost 1,000 students for the year.

As for educational institutions, Japan Union Conference has five kindergartens, 10 elementary church schools, three junior high schools, one senior high school, and one college (1992). Japan Missionary College (Saniku Gakuin College) offers five courses—theology, Christian studies, education, English, and nursing education. The college choir is well known for its beautiful performance of sacred music, and the Choral Arts Society made a concert tour of the United States in 1966. There are three medical institutions, with a total of 326 beds—Tokyo Adventist Hospital, Kobe Adventist Hospital, and Adventist Medical Center in Okinawa—operated by the Japan Union Conference. These institutions offer such community services as stop-smoking plans and welfare services that are much appreciated by the community.

Health food production is one of the unique activities in Japan. Saniku Foods for a long time was a part of the Work Education Department of Japan Missionary College, but in 1970 the management was transferred from the college to the Japan Union Mission, and Saniku Foods became a union institution. Sales in 1992 amounted to approximately $1 million. Soy milk, vegetable protein, whole-wheat bread, and cookies are the main products, many of which are exported to other countries.

Two nursing homes for the aged were established, one in 1984 and the other in 1992. The first, Shalom Nursing Home (Yokosuka), was established with 50 beds for the aged with disabilities and 50 beds for the aged with dementia. It is also used as a day-care center for those who are living in the nearby districts and have needs to be cared for. The second, Shalom Nursing Home (Higashikurume), is located in Tokyo. It has 50 beds for those with disabilities and 30 beds for those with dementia. It is also used as a day-care center. These nursing homes are managed in a Christian manner and are appreciated by those in need of their services.

Japan Food Factory

JAPAN FOOD FACTORY (San-iku Foods). Food industry of the Japan Union Conference. An institution begun as the Health Food Department of Japan Missionary College. After several years of expanding production, it was set up as a separate institution of the Japan Union Conference and given the present name. In 1993 it was situated in Sodegaura City. The factory has five departments. In 1992 there were 76 employees. Factory equipment was valued at US$5.2 million, and total assets listed as US$10.4 million. Control of this institution is vested in a board of directors that is elected by the Japan Union Conference committee. The board of management, consisting of the conference officers, plus several key members of San-iku Foods, handles the regular activities of the food program.

The Sanitarium Health Food Company in Australia has contributed greatly to the expansion of the health food program in Japan. Besides financial loans, L. A. Piper was sent from Australia to put the program on a commercial basis. Dr. H. W. Miller also contributed to the production of Soyalac, which is an important product of San-iku Foods.

Japan Missionary College

JAPAN MISSIONARY COLLEGE (Saniku Gakuin College). A coeducational boarding school on a senior college level, operated by the Japan Union Conference, near Naraha, 50 miles (80 kilometers) from Tokyo, across the bay from Yokohama.

Seventh-day Adventist educational work in Japan began on Jan. 1, 1898, with the opening in Tokyo of a Japanese-English Bible school, with some 80 students, by William C. Grainger, a former president of Healdsburg College, California. His interpreter was Teruhiko H. Okohira, a Japanese-born convert who had been a Healdsburg student. The two had arrived in Japan more than a year earlier. Okohira later became one of the first Seventh-day Adventist ordained Japanese ministers. Grainger's enthusiasm for the Bible made such an indelible impression on his Tokyo students that only a few months later, on Apr. 30, 1898, a baptism was conducted in the Meguro River, the first SDA baptismal service in Japan. Among those baptized was a young man, Hide Kuniya, who later became the first Seventh-day Adventist convert in Japan to be ordained to the ministry.

The work of the school progressed steadily, but on Oct. 31, 1899, after having been in Japan only two years and eleven months, Grainger died. His work was continued by William D. Burden, and two years later by Frank W. Field, director of the Japan Mission, who also fostered the work of training young people for service. In 1910 he was succeeded by F. H. DeVinney.

From 1908 to 1913 Harry F. Benson directed a training course for workers, including Bible, history, biology, English, and other subjects. During these years the school was operated at the mission headquarters in the Sendagaya district of Tokyo. In 1914, when the headquarters of the Japan Mission were moved from Sendagaya to Amanuma, on the outskirts of Tokyo, the school was moved to the same site and was called the Nihon Dendo Gakko (Japan School of Evangelism). It was primarily a workers' training institute, offering courses in Bible, history, language, and music.

The school operated until the spring of 1917. On Oct. 1, 1919, it was reorganized as Amanuma Gakuin, with an initial student body of 32, under the direction of Perry A. Webber as president and Andrew N. Nelson as manager. Within a short time the institution included an elementary school of six years, a secondary school of five years, and a junior college of three years.

There came a growing conviction that, in harmony with the SDA philosophy of education, the school should be situated away from the city in a place where students could engage in agriculture, building, and other practical arts. After careful search, 35 acres (14 hectares) (later increased to 44 acres [18 hectares]) of woodland and farmland were secured at Naraha, in Chiba Prefecture, on the eastern side of Tokyo Bay, some 50 miles (80 kilometers) from Tokyo. On May 2, 1926, the first group of teachers and students (boys only) arrived at the school site and began erecting buildings and cultivating the fields. The students and teachers were responsible for most of the work done in building the school.

On Oct. 14, 1926, opening ceremonies were held, with Frederick Griggs from the Far Eastern Division as speaker. The school, for boys only, was called in Japanese, Nihon San-iku Gakuin (“Japan Threefold Educational School,” with reference to the mental, physical, and spiritual aspects of true education). At the same time a similar school for girls was started in Tokyo.

The school at Naraha offered a six-year secondary course and a two-year junior college course. The president of the new school, Andrew N. Nelson, organized several strong work departments—carpentry, health food manufacture, commercial art, house painting, and agriculture. All teachers and students engaged in this work program, which also included landscaping the grounds and running the various service industries. During the difficult prewar years, while Francis R. Millard was in charge, the school successfully withstood government demands that conflicted with SDA principles.

During World War II, Christianity was restricted and the Seventh-day Adventist Church suppressed. The school was closed by a Chiba Prefectural order in December 1943. When the war ended, plans to reopen the school were made, and on Jan. 23, 1947, students were again admitted. To begin with, a sequence of subjects in training for evangelism on the high school level was offered. The girls’ school at Tokyo was moved to Naraha and merged with the boys’ school in one of Japan’s early successful coeducational experiments. As life returned to normal in Japan, the school resumed its prewar curriculum, then expanded both program and facilities. On July 1, 1953, the college was recognized by the General Conference as a full senior college. Since that time, course work leading to the Bachelor of Arts degree has been offered.

As requirements of accreditation in Japan are difficult to meet, there was a feeling of real accomplishment when the college received government recognition for both the junior and senior high school on Aug. 31, 1948; for the primary school on June 14, 1950; for the school of theology on Dec. 22, 1950; and more recently for the junior college department of English on Jan. 27, 1971.

Relocation of the college sector took place in August 1978. It was moved south of the old campus to Otaki-machi in Chiba Prefecture, about 80 miles (130 hectares) southeast of Tokyo. In 1987, when the Nursing Department received government accreditation as a junior college with a three-year program, the college was reorganized as a junior college with two departments (English and nursing), and a senior college with two departments (theology and education). Since 1988 the Theology Department has offered a five-year B.Th. degree program. During the 1992 school year the enrollment reached an all-time high of 350.

Japan Publishing House

JAPAN PUBLISHING HOUSE (Fukuinsha). A publishing organization with its own printing plant operated by the Japan Union Conference at Yokohama. It issues books and the following periodicals: Sainzu obu za Taimuzu (“Signs of the Times”), Ansokunichi Gakko Shotoka Kyoka (“Primary Sabbath School Lesson Quarterly”), Ansokunichi Gakko Chuto Kyoka (“Junior Sabbath School Lesson Quarterly”), Ansokunichi Gakko Kyoka (“Sabbath School Lesson Quarterly”).

In 1899, when the first church was organized in Japan, a publishing house, called Owari no Fukuinsha (literally, “Gospel for the Last Days Publishing House”), was established, though it did not have its own presses. Teruhiko Okohira and two of the first four men baptized, Mokutaro Kawasaki and Hide Kuniya, did the editorial work on the first paper published, Owari no Fukuin (“Gospel for the Last Days”), which later became Jicho (Sainzu obu za Taimuzu), the Japanese Signs. Steps to Christ, by Ellen White, was the first denominational book published in Japan (1901 or 1902).

In 1907 or 1908 W. D. Burden placed a hand press in the basement of his residence and began to print magazines and tracts. In 1914 a publishing house was built near the mission headquarters in the western part of Tokyo. To existing equipment were added in 1916 a new press, oil engine, and paper cutter. In 1922 the brick building was remodeled, a second story added, and a heating plant installed, making it, according to H. H. Hall, “the best plant we have in the Orient.” Subsequently a number of books were published, including abridged editions of Ellen White’s Gospel Workers (1920) and Patriarchs and Prophets (1922). A book on the Sabbath was published in 1923.

In the great earthquake of Sept. 21, 1923, the two-story publishing house was partially destroyed. The presses continued to operate in the old building until a new plant was ready early in 1924. The typesets were put into the Amanuma church building, and typesetting was carried on there for a few months.

When the Seventh-day Adventist work was suppressed in 1943, the publishing house was taken over by a secular publisher.

In 1946 the Fukuinsha (Gospel Press), as the publishing house has since been known, came back into denominational operation, but difficulties were experienced in securing adequate supplies of paper, ink, and other materials. Furthermore, the printing equipment was in very poor condition, and in 1947 there was only one worker with previous experience. In view of the situation, the three publishing houses in North America and the General Conference Publishing Rehabilitation Committee made appropriations for equipment over a period of years totaling $56,500, and the Far Eastern Division provided $25,000 for a new factory building. In later years appropriations were made through the budget committee, so that by the end of 1953 this committee had voted a total of $61,000 for building and operating funds. The new plant was built at Asahi-ku, near Yokohama, to which the publishing work was moved in 1948. To increase production, a large offset press and platemaking equipment were purchased in 1955.

After the war it was necessary to retranslate and reprint all denominational books in order to meet government requirements for simplifying written Japanese, but despite this delay the work has gone forward. At the first postwar union mission colporteur institute the colporteurs had only one small book, So Little Time, and the journal Signs of the Times for single sales.

By 1974 the house had published 16 of Ellen White's books in Japanese: Education, in 1953; The Story of Redemption, in 1955; Counsels on Sabbath School Work, in 1956; The Ministry of Healing, Messages to Young People, and Your Home and Health, in 1957; The Impending Conflict, in 1961; Steps to Christ, in 1962; The Desire of Ages and Thoughts From the Mount of Blessing, in 1963; The Adventist Home and Colporteur Ministry, in 1965; Christ's Object Lessons, in 1967; Christian Service, in 1970; Patriarchs and Prophets, in 1971; and The Great Controversy, in 1974.

It has also published 84 other books by various authors, ranging from children's books to introductory books to Christianity which are designed to acquaint the non-Christian Japanese readers with the basics of Christianity.

The funds that came from the sale of a portion of the press property to the Highway Authority in 1972 and 1973 helped the house to upgrade with a new two-color offset press, a small offset press, a perfect binder, a camera set, a cutter, and other items.

Japas, Salim

JAPAS, SALIM (1921—1992). Evangelist, educator, author. Born in Argentina, he accepted Christ at age 16 and was baptized into the Seventh-day Adventist Church. He was the only Adventist in his family, but this only fixed in him a strong faith and love for the truth. After graduating from River Plate College, he entered denominational service in the South American Division in 1946, where he served as pastor, departmental director, and evangelist until 1966. After a brief tenure in the North American Division, he went to the Middle East Division as an evangelist, serving from 1967 to 1970.

Japas arrived in the Inter-American Division in 1970 and served as professor and head of the Theology Department at Antillian College in Puerto Rico until 1985, when he became ministerial secretary and evangelist for the division. He retired in 1990 after 44 years of service to the church.

Japas authored six books and many magazine articles, all of which spoke of hope, trust, and security.

Jay Memorial Adventist Hospital

JAY MEMORIAL ADVENTIST HOSPITAL. A former 30-bed hospital situated in Jay, Oklahoma, operated under lease by the Oklahoma Conference.

The Jay community erected the building and in addition raised more than $20,000 to launch the hospital. On June 20, 1965, the hospital, fully equipped, was opened to the public. L.E.C. Joers, M.D., was the medical director and surgeon. On Aug. 11, 1965, Ethel M. Walker-Heras, M.D., joined the staff as a second physician, with offices in the hospital.

In 1970 an addition known as the East Wing was made to the hospital at a cost of approximately $84,000. This section housed the doctors' offices and clinic. From 1980 to 1985 Jay Memorial Adventist Hospital was operated by the Adventist Health System/Sunbelt.

Administrators/Presidents: L.E.C. Joers, 1965—1973; W. C. McConnell, 1973—1977; Billie Beesley, 1977—1980; Douglas Langley, 1980—1984; Robert E. Trimble, 1984—1985.

Jefferson Adventist Academy

JEFFERSON ADVENTIST ACADEMY. A coeducational boarding school on the senior high school level, situated on 18 acres (seven hectares) of land in the “Pines” of eastern Texas, a short distance off Highway 49, five miles (eight kilometers) northwest of Jefferson, Texas, in Marion County. It is operated by the Jefferson Seventh-day Adventist Church. Students come from other parts of Texas and the States of Arkansas and Louisiana, and some from a much greater distance.

Jefferson Academy grew out of the Jefferson Intermediate School established in 1914, with James H. Ball as the first principal. The first annual calendar, announcing 10 grades, tells of the origin of the school thus: In 1913 the Progressive Club of Jefferson approached the Southwestern Union and North Texas conferences, seeking the establishment of a Seventh-day Adventist colony and school in that section. W. A. McCutchen, president of the North Texas Conference, made arrangements for the purchase of an 1,800-acre (750-hectare) plantation to provide land for the school and land for subdivision into tracts of 10 to 100 acres (four to 40 hectares) for SDA families. The original school building was paid for by a gift of $2,000 from the citizens of Jefferson. The school appears as Berea Intermediate Academy in the 1919 Statistical Report and as Berea Intermediate School in the Yearbook from 1920 to 1928. It underwent varied experiences of growth over a period of years, operated under various names (Berea Junior Academy, Jefferson Junior Academy, Jefferson Rural Academy), and offered at different times 10 grades, 11 grades, and 12 grades, then in the 1950s returned to 10 grades.

In 1960 the school was reactivated as a 12-grade boarding academy. The original school building was enlarged to provide office space for the administrative functions of the school. A house, which was moved to vacate space for a new church building, was converted into a girls' dormitory, and barracks from an army installation were converted into a boys' dormitory. A new industrial arts building was completed in 1961, a food services building was put into service in 1962, and a new elementary school was completed in 1963. New dormitories and a gymnasium were erected in 1965. With these increased facilities, the enrollment was expected to increase to 100 boarding students plus another 25 to 40 day students.

In 1972 the local community church members reassumed the operation of Jefferson Academy.

Jefferson Academy offers courses in both college preparatory and vocational fields. Instruction is given in Bible, English, mathematics, science, home arts, commercial subjects, and other one-year courses.

Publications of the school are the Whispering Pines (eight issues per year) and the school annual, the Pine Cone.

Jeffes, Norman Fisher

JEFFES, NORMAN FISHER (1896—1963). Businessperson, school board member, and chair. A native of Australia, he accepted the Seventh-day Adventist message at the age of 11 and later attended Australian Missionary College. He was known for his industry in developing plants for the manufacture of Weetbix breakfast cereal. After developing three such plants in Australia and New Zealand, which were sold to the Sanitarium Health Food Company, he went to South Africa and established a similar industry.

He served as a church elder in both Australia and South Africa for more than 40 years and was a member of the Helderberg College board and the Cape Conference executive committee for 25 years. He played a leading role in developing Hillcrest Secondary School in Mowbray, Cape, South Africa, and also led out in the erection of the Plumstead church.

Jellico Community Hospital

JELICO COMMUNITY HOSPITAL. A 54-bed acute care hospital located in Jellico, Tennessee, operated by Adventist Health System/Sunbelt Health Care Corporation since 1974. A medical staff of three in 1974 grew to 15 by 1993. The hospital employs about 250 persons. It serves 20,000 patient visits per year, of which 18,000 are outpatient visits. Approximately 300 babies are born at Jellico Community Hospital every year.

The hospital expanded services in 1983 to include an intensive care unit. In 1984 the hospital was accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Health Care Organizations. A home health care agency was established in 1985.

Ground was broken in 1993 for a $3.8 million expansion project to include a new emergency center, expanded surgery suites and recovery room, expanded laboratory and diagnostic imaging facilities, gift shop, modern obstetrics unit, chapel, and new waiting rooms and lobby.

Jeløy Bad Og Diettkursted

JELØY BAD OG DIETTKURSTED (Jeløy Clinic). A former institution opened in 1938 by Skodsborg graduate physiotherapists Einar and Ellen Fahlberg, who operated it until the Seventh-day Adventist Church took over on Jan. 1, 1971. The bed capacity was then 34. This was increased to 68.

The institution accepted patients who were in need of hydrotherapy and physiotherapy. Even though most of the clients were not Seventh-day Adventists, the institution, with its vegetarian food, was a popular place for rehabilitation. Two physicians, one with a specialty in rheumatology, were connected with the various departments.

Jeløy is an island in the Oslo Fjord, and it is part of the town of Moss, located about 40 miles (65 kilometers) south of Oslo. The institution was located in a park of approximately two acres (one hectare). A nature park with forest and seashore borders the property.

An extension of the institution in several stages was completed. This included treatment rooms, patient rooms, and administrative offices.

The Norwegian Union sold Jeløy in 1994 because of the considerable financial commitment it took to maintain the hospital's first-class accreditation.

Administrators: Frithjof Asheim, 1971—1991; Erling G. Olsen, 1991—1994.

Jengre Seventh-day Adventist Hospital

JENGRE SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST HOSPITAL. A 103-bed general acute hospital situated at Jengre, a village north of Jos, northern Nigeria, owned and operated initially by the North Nigerian Mission but transferred to the West African Union Mission in 1959. In 1973 the hospital was staffed by one doctor, two midwives, one nurse, and one technician, all from overseas; three national midwives, five national nurses, and two laboratory technicians. Twenty-nine thousand patients attended the clinics, and 405 surgeries were done, mostly hernia and hydrocele. Formerly the hospital specialized in leprosy treatment.

J. J. Hyde and his wife began work in northern Nigeria in 1931. At the time there was an epidemic of jiggers (chiggers) in the country, and Mrs. Hyde, a nurse trained at The Stanboroughs, in England, opened a dispensary. In 1947 their son, Dr. J. Ashford Hyde, who had been with them as a boy in northern Nigeria, was appointed to enlarge the medical work and to establish a hospital. Capital investment in 1947 was $300. In 1948 a ward was established with a grant of $2,500 by the West African Union Mission, and the next year the hospital was completed with funds from a Thirteenth Sabbath Offering overflow. In 1971 a new ward with theater and maternity unit was in use.

The hospital was taken over by the Plateau state government in 1976; but it was handed back to the church with full compensation in 1980.

Medical Directors: J. Ashford Hyde, 1947—1955; H. Lamp, 1955—1957; R. E. Davenport, 1957—1958; D. I. Peterson, 1959—1960; A. M. Owens, 1960—1961; P. Genstler, 1961—1963; A. M. Owens, 1963—1967; K. L. Jespersson, Sven JESPERSSON, SVEN (1864—1927). Medical missionary in Palestine and Algeria. As a young man he went to Germany from his native Sweden and there in 1891 became a Seventh-day Adventist. He immediately began ship missionary work in Hamburg harbor and about a year later was sent by the mission to Battle Creek Sanitarium to take the nursing course. From there he went to Switzerland to help establish the Institut Sanitaire, later returned to Sweden, where he was associated with the training school, and then returned to Switzerland. After marrying Lydia Roumajon in 1901, he and his wife went to Jerusalem to serve as medical missionaries in the treatment rooms established by J. H. Krum. Because of a serious attack of malaria he returned to Switzerland four years later. There he taught at the newly opened Latin Union school at Gland for a year and then went to Algeria to begin Seventh-day Adventist medical missionary work there. Plagued by persistent malarial attacks, he gave up his mission work in 1909 and went to the United States, where he studied medicine. Upon completing his course, he was associated with Battle Creek Sanitarium for about 10 years, after which he practiced in the city of Battle Creek, Michigan.

Jewell, Frederick Burton

JEWELL, FREDERICK BURTON (1875—1967). Nurse and missionary. A native of Ithaca, New York, he was converted to the Seventh-day Adventist faith at 21 years of age and trained as a nurse at the old Battle Creek Sanitarium. In 1902 he told his wife, the former Elnora Van Horn, that he was offering his services to Africa. So began 43 years of service to the people of that continent. The Jewells settled first at Inyazura, then spent a short time in Zambia, but Solusi was to be their home. Here Jewell was in charge of the clinic, which soon drew patients from long distances. His particular interest was the maternity ward, and he studied constantly to improve his knowledge of safe methods of delivery. He set himself a goal of being able to cope with any complication so as to save the lives of the mothers and babies who were so precious to him. He delivered more than 1,350 babies and cycled thousands of miles through the veld to visit patients in their homes.

The Jewells returned to the United States only once during their 43 years of service in Africa. He passed to his rest at Bulawayo, Rhodesia, on May 16 and was buried at Solusi Mission.

Johanson, J. M.

JOHANSON, J. M. (1860—1928). Danish-born conference administrator, publishing house manager, colporteur leader, and college president. He was living in Tasmania when he began reading Seventh-day Adventist publications, as a result of which he began observing the Sabbath in 1891. Soon thereafter he met SDAs for the first time, left his cabinetmaking business, and together with his wife began canvassing. Eventually he became the canvassing leader of the Australasian Union Conference. After several years in this post he became associated with the Echo (later Signs) Publishing Company as sales manager, director, and later, general manager. In 1913 he was ordained and in 1915 was called to the presidency of the Australasian Missionary College. He left after two years to take charge of Seventh-day Adventist missions in Japan, Korea, and Manchuria. In 1919 he returned to the Signs Publishing Company in Australia and while managing it helped to establish a branch of the Sanitarium Health Food Company at Warburton. In 1926 he was elected general manager of the Australasian Conference Association.

John, Adelbert Allen

JOHN, ADELBERT ALLEN (1856—1921). One of the pioneer Seventh-day Adventist workers in England, medical missionary to Mexico. Converted at the age of 17, he entered SDA ministerial work about 1877 in his native Illinois and in 1882 was sent by the Mission Board to England four years after the Loughboroughs first went to that country. He worked in England and Wales for about eight years, and was elected secretary of the first “European Council.” Upon his return to the United States he worked in Iowa for a time, but having become interested in medical missionary work, he enrolled in 1894 in the medical course at the University of Michigan and graduated from Northwestern University in 1898. While at Chicago he was active in the work of the city mission there. After graduation and postgraduate work, he was sent to Mexico as medical superintendent of Guadalajara Sanitarium. After a year he took up private practice in Mexico. In 1912 he returned to Illinois and established a private sanitarium.

John G. Matteson Institute of Evangelism

JOHN G. MATTESON INSTITUTE OF EVANGELISM (Mattesonskolen). Established September 1986 at the Norwegian Publishing House, Oslo, on the initiative of Gunnar A. Gustavsen and Willy Hugstmyr, publishing directors in the West Nordic Union. The institute is situated in Mysen, about 50 miles (80 kilometers) southeast of Oslo.

The institute is not a school, but rather an activity or a training program that is run by the Church Ministries Department in the union. It has an advisory committee that helps plan the activities and recommends the operating budget. The program has only one salaried employee, the director of the program. The Matteson Institute owns no property or facilities, and its operation is financially based on regular and special appropriations made by the union and the local conferences. It is also supported by “Granheim-stiftelsen,” an independent, nonprofit corporation.

The program of the Matteson Institute of Evangelism is designed to train young volunteer workers so that they may be of help to the local pastors in their evangelistic outreach programs in the different local conferences in the union.

The training program includes field experience in the literature ministry for four or six weeks in the summer. The regular training program begins at the end of August with a five-week seminar, with special emphasis on the prophecies in Daniel and the Revelation. The fieldwork experience, which lasts from October through May, is interrupted by four 10-day seminars on topics related to personal evangelism. One of the highlights of the program is the New Year rally, which lasts for six days. As many as 150 young people have been assembled at these gatherings where the Advent message and its implications for “present time” have been studied. Such gatherings are planned and conducted by the young people connected with the program.

Johns, Alger Francis

JOHNS, ALGER FRANCIS (1918—1972). Teacher and author. A native of Missouri, he took his secondary education at Maplewood Academy in Minnesota. He received his Bachelor of Arts degree from Pacific Union College and his master's degree from the Seventh-day Adventist Theological Seminary. In 1959 he earned his Ph.D. degree from Johns Hopkins University. He taught in three denominational colleges and served on the staff of the SDA Theological Seminary from 1955 to the time of his death.

His published writings include contributions to The SDA Bible Commentary and the SDA Bible Dictionary and A Short Grammar of Biblical Aramaic.

Johnson, Lewis

JOHNSON, LEWIS (1851—1940). Minister, administrator. He was born at Nyborre, on the island of Moen, Denmark, and came to the United States in 1869, settling in Boone County, Iowa. As a young man he was converted and joined the Methodist Church. Soon thereafter he was granted a license and sent out to preach. In 1875 he attended several lectures by the Seventh-day Adventist evangelist J. F. Hanson. As a result, he accepted the SDA faith, was baptized, and became the elder of a newly organized church.

At a camp meeting held in Marshalltown, Iowa, in June 1876, he was granted a ministerial license and began to preach. The rest of that year and the next he worked in Iowa and in the Dakotas, and in 1878 and 1879 in Illinois, mostly in Chicago. During a camp meeting held in Bloomington, Illinois, in August 1878, he was ordained by George I. Butler.

At the invitation of the General Conference, Johnson left the United States Jan. 1, 1889, for Christiania (Oslo), Norway, to replace O. A. Olsen, who had been elected president of the General Conference. For 10 years he remained in Scandinavia, serving as president of three conferences, most of the time simultaneously (10 years of Norway, seven years of Sweden, and nine years of Denmark). During this period the membership more than doubled, increasing from 900 to 2,100.

When Johnson returned to the United States in September 1899, he was given charge of the Danish-Norwegian work in North America, with his home and office in College View, Nebraska. In 1912 he was elected president of the Washington Conference, a post he held for four years. Finishing his term as president, he continued working in this conference until the time of his retirement in 1927 at the age of 76.

Johnson, O. A.

JOHNSON, O. A. (1851—1923). Educator, administrator. Born in Ottawa, Illinois. In 1854 his family moved to Jefferson County, Wisconsin, where they joined several other Norwegian families, including that of O. A. Olsen, in the observance of the Sabbath. In the spring of 1860 this company was organized into a church, the first Norwegian church in the denomination. Johnson was baptized at the age of 13, and when 19 attended the Seventh Day Baptist College at Milton, Wisconsin, for one year. Then for four years he attended Battle Creek College. He established his first church in 1874 and was ordained in 1876.

Johnson preached in Wisconsin till 1882, when he was transferred to Nebraska to work among the Scandinavians. In 1888 he was transferred to Montana to open the work in that state, and in a short time organized a church in Livingston. Later that year he joined J. G. Matteson in conducting a training school in Chicago. In the fall of 1891 he went to Union College to take charge of the newly opened Scandinavian Department.

In 1894 Johnson was elected president of the Wisconsin Conference and served two years. He was then invited by the General Conference to attend camp meetings and other important gatherings in the Northern and the Central Union conferences. In the autumn of 1897 he was called again to head the Scandinavian Department of Union College. After three years in this post he was called to Europe to serve as president of the Norway Conference. During the school year of 1904—1905 he conducted a training school for workers in Christiania.

In 1908 Johnson accepted a call to head the Bible Department at Walla Walla College, where he remained until 1922. Because of failing health he resigned, but continued to attend camp meetings and to perform other duties as his strength permitted.

Johnson, Olaf

JOHNSON, OLAF (1843—1919). Evangelist, administrator. He was born in Vittensten, Vermland, Sweden. At the age of 33 he was baptized and joined the Baptist Church. About two years later he heard of, and accepted, the Seventh-day Adventist faith in Oslo, Norway, as a result of the work of J. G. Matteson, who had been sent to Europe in June 1877 to open the work in the Scandinavian countries. Shortly after becoming a Seventh-day Adventist, Johnson returned to Sweden to share his newfound faith with the people of his homeland. In the early years of his ministry the pioneer workers shared in common. He received no salary, and had to depend on the sale of books and papers and the meager earnings of his wife for the support of himself and family. He was ordained at the conference session in June 1883, and was soon regarded as the leading preacher in Sweden.

From 1889 to 1893 Johnson served as president of the Swedish Conference. In July 1892 he accepted the invitation to pioneer the work in Finland. During the years he spent there he laid a solid foundation for SDA work in that country. On his return to Sweden in 1901, he was again elected president of the Swedish Conference. In 1907 he undertook to pioneer the work in northern Sweden.

Jones, Alonzo T.

JONES, ALONZO T. (1850—1923). Minister, editor, author. He was born in Ohio. At the age of 20 he enlisted in the Army and for three years served his country. While most of his comrades spent their free time finding various pleasures he was in the barracks poring over his books—large historical works, Seventh-day Adventist publications that had fallen into his hands, and the Bible. Thus he was laying a strong foundation of knowledge for his later work as a preacher and a writer. After his discharge in 1873, he was baptized and began preaching on the West Coast for the SDAs. In May 1885 he became assistant editor of the Signs of the Times, and a few months later he and E. J. Waggoner became editors. This position he held until 1889.

These two men in 1888 stirred the General Conference session in Minneapolis with their preaching on righteousness by faith, and for several years afterward were sent by the General Conference Committee to preach on that subject from coast to coast at camp meetings and other large gatherings, in workers' meetings, in ministerial institutes, and in SDA institutions. Ellen White accompanied them to many of these places until she left for Australia in December 1891. Also for a number of years the two were principal speakers at the biennial sessions of the General Conference.

In 1897 Jones became a member of the General Conference Committee. From 1897 to 1901 he was editor in chief of the Review and Herald, with Uriah Smith as associate editor.

In 1889 Jones, with J. O. Corliss, spoke before a committee in Washington to oppose the Breckinridge Bill, intended to compel Sunday observance in the District of Columbia. The bill was defeated, and Jones soon became recognized as the denomination's most prominent speaker for religious freedom. At the time he was serving as editor of the American Sentinel (see Sentinel of Christian Liberty), the forerunner of Liberty. He also wrote voluminously for other Seventh-day Adventist papers and authored a number of books.

Feeling out of harmony with certain administrative policies, he resigned late in 1899 as a member of the General Conference Committee, but at the 1901 session he accepted membership again. While president of the California Conference (1901—1903), he accepted an invitation from Dr. J. H. Kellogg, who was then actively seeking to separate the Battle Creek Sanitarium from denominational control, to join his staff. Against the counsel of Ellen White he accepted the invitation.

Shortly after the removal of the General Conference headquarters from Battle Creek to Washington, D.C., in August 1903, Jones was invited to join the General Conference staff to work in the area of religious liberty and in other areas for which he was fitted. He accepted, but soon returned to Battle Creek, apparently for the purpose of helping Dr. Kellogg see the error of his way. However, he became sympathetic with the doctor in his warfare against the General Conference. This resulted in separation from denominational employment and, finally, in loss of church membership.

At the 1909 General Conference session, a supreme effort was made to bring him back. Three afternoons in succession he met with a large committee of leaders. At the last of the meetings, after an extended appeal for reconciliation, A. G. Daniells, the president of the General Conference, reaching his hand across the table, pleaded with Jones, saying, "Come, Brother Jones, come." Evidently moved, Jones arose, slowly extended his hand toward the outstretched one, then suddenly pulled it back and declared, "No, never," as he sat down.

Jones remained a Sabbath observer and was loyal to most of the other fundamental doctrines of the church. He died without a following.

Jones, Charles Harriman

JONES, CHARLES HARRIMAN (1850—1936). Publishing house manager. Previous to joining the Review and Herald at Battle Creek, Michigan, in 1871 and running the first power press operated by the Seventh-day Adventist denomination, he had worked as state printer in Manchester, New Hampshire. In 1879 he became an assistant in the Pacific Publishing plant in Oakland, California, and later, manager, and held that position except for a brief period of retirement until 1933. He directed the removal of the press to Mountain View, California, in 1904, retired briefly from the institution, but when the building burned to the ground in 1906 he returned as manager at the urgent request of Ellen White and the press leaders. In addition to his administrative work, he led in establishing publishing work in England and Canada.

Jones also took a leading part in the development of Sabbath school work and, with the exception of a few months, was president of the International Sabbath School Association from 1887 to 1898. He was also prominent in building the ship Pitcairn.

Jones, Dan T.

JONES, DAN T. (1855—1901). Minister, conference administrator, and leader of the first group of Seventh-day Adventist missionaries to Mexico. He joined the SDA Church in 1876. In 1881 he received a license to preach and was elected secretary of the Missouri Conference, and in 1882 became its president. In 1888 he left Missouri to become secretary of the General Conference and early the next year served on the committee that prepared the constitution of the National Religious Liberty Association. But the climate of Battle Creek and the heavy responsibilities were too burdensome for his health. In 1891 he went West to take charge of the Pacific Coast District (Number 6). In 1893, advised to seek a more southerly climate, he led the first group of Seventh-day Adventist teachers and medical missionaries into Mexico, where he established a mission school and the medical work that became Guadalajara Sanitarium.

Jones, Griffiths Francis

JONES, GRIFFITHS FRANCIS (1864—1940). Master mariner, missionary. Born at Hamefyl, Wales, early in life he took to seafaring, and subsequently qualified as a Master of the Mercantile Marine. Shortly after he accepted the Seventh-day Adventist faith, in 1893, he was associated with the Doctors Kress in medical missionary work in England. In 1900 he went to the United States and entered Keene Academy, where he graduated from the Bible Instructors' course. Then he went to the Society Islands, and began a period of devoted mission service in the Far East and throughout the South Pacific.

In 1904 he pioneered the work in Singapore, and subsequently in Java, Sumatra, Borneo, and the Malay States. He entered the Western Solomon Islands in 1914 and won many of the heathen inhabitants. He worked on many islands, such as New Caledonia, New Guinea, and Lord Howe Island. Because of a remarkable facility with foreign languages he was able to work in many different lands. Later in life he engaged for a time in city mission work in London, then went abroad again and worked in Algiers, Spain, Gibraltar, and South Africa.

In all, he and his wife worked in 38 different countries and islands, representing some 34 languages.

Jones, Robert Llewellyn

JONES, ROBERT LLEWELLYN (1903—1940). Missionary in Cameroon and the Congo. He was educated at Pacific Union College, Walla Walla College, and Washington Missionary College (B.A., 1927), and while a student he worked as an X-ray technician at the Walla Walla Hospital and the Washington Sanitarium. In 1925 he married Charlotte Boyd Jewell. In January 1927 he and his wife sailed for missionary service in Equatorial Africa, stopping en route for a year in Europe to learn the French language. In 1928 he opened Seventh-day Adventist work in Cameroon, settling at the Nanga-Eboco station, selected previously by the pioneer missionary W. H. Anderson.

In 1929, when the work in Cameroon was transferred from the African Division to the Southern European Division, Jones went to the Congo, where he took charge of the Songa, Kirundu, and Gitwe missions, and directed the Gitwe Training School. He was ordained in 1934. While on furlough he received an M.A. degree from the University of Southern California in 1935. Late in 1940 he went to the Bikobo Hill Mission and while there was attacked and mauled by a wild buffalo and died from the complications that set in.

Jones, William Mead

JONES, WILLIAM MEAD (1818—1895). Prominent Seventh Day Baptist minister and scholar; editor of the Sabbath Memorial (London, England). He was the pastor of the historic Mill Yard church in London at the time Seventh-day Adventists began their work in Europe. J. N. Andrews and other early missionaries in Europe maintained cordial relationships with him.

Jordan

JORDAN. A constitutional monarchy in the Middle East, officially called the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan (before 1947, the Emirate of Transjordan), situated in the northwestern part of the Arabian Peninsula east of the Jordan River. Until the six-day Arab-Israeli war in June 1967, it also included Jerusalem and the West Bank of Palestine. The area is 37,500 square miles (97,100 square kilometers). The population is mostly Arab. Most of the citizens are Sunni Muslims.

The present country of Jordan includes various regions described in the Bible-lands traversed by Abraham in his wanderings, inhabited at the time of the Exodus by the Ammonites, Moabites, Edomites, Canaanites, and Amorites, and occupied in large part by the Israelites at the height of their power. Jordan's capital, Amman, is the site of ancient Rabbath-Ammon, taken by David about 1000 B.C.

The land was overrun by the Assyrians and the Babylonians in the eighth and sixth centuries B.C., and the Hebrews taken into exile. The western part was resettled by the Samaritans, and after the Babylonian captivity by the returning Jews. Thereafter the land was ruled successively by the Persian, Macedonian, and Roman empires, and the south and east were part of a flourishing Semitic Nabataean kingdom.

Jordan embraces parts of what in New Testament times was called Perea and Decapolis.

The area of what is now Jordan and the West Bank became largely Christianized in the early centuries. After the Muslim Arabs defeated the Byzantine emperor Heraclius at the Yarmuk River in the seventh century, the country became overwhelmingly Muslim. The Crusader kingdom that occupied a large part of the country in the twelfth century did not change the basic Arab and Muslim character of the country. Later came centuries of Turkish overlordship, until 1917. After World War I the area came under British control, the western portion a part of the mandate of Palestine and Transjordan as a constitutional state (an emirate) under British tutelage. After World War II the latter became an independent monarchy and Emir Abdullah its king. In the partition of Palestine in 1948, Transjordan took over the Arab remainder of Palestine and the country was renamed Jordan.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings, in Palestine. Until the partition of Palestine in 1948, the work of Seventh-day Adventists on both sides of the Jordan River was directed from Jerusalem, headquarters of the Palestine-Transjordan Mission. However, the armistice line divided the city, and the mission headquarters with its book depot and hydrotherapy and electrotherapy clinic were included in the Zionist-occupied sector. Afterward new headquarters were established at Amman. The same missionaries worked in various places in what are now Jordan, Israel, Lebanon, and Syria; and sometimes the records are difficult to separate geographically.

Seventh-day Adventist work in Jerusalem dates from the beginning of the century when J. H. Krum, originally from America, who had come from Germany to Jaffa in 1898, moved to Jerusalem and opened treatment rooms about the beginning of 1901. He was joined in November 1901 by S. Jespersson and his wife, from Basel, Switzerland. Apparently this establishment was inside the walled city. In 1904 a Jerusalem-Jaffa church was organized, composed largely of workers' families and German converts. Jespersson had many opportunities to talk on medical and hygienic subjects to the foreign settlers at Jerusalem, and also to preach to small groups. But the work was not without sacrifice. In 1904 Krum left because of ill health, and that summer J. G. Teschner, a nurse from Germany, died of fever only a few months after his arrival at Jerusalem to replace the Jesperssons, who had to leave because of fever.

By 1908 the health institution, patronized by people of many nationalities, was almost self-supporting, and in 1910 it was moved to a better location, where it was carried on until 1916, when it was closed by the Turkish government.

In 1910 Marie Meyer, a German colonist, was baptized by W. K. Ising in a stream traditionally identified with the Brook Cherith, where Elijah was fed while hiding from Ahab. Frederich Gregorius worked among the villages north of Jerusalem. The town fathers of one of these, Et-Taiyibeh (possibly to be identified with ancient Ophrah), presented in 1911 a petition for a school, but for many years his request could not be granted because no workers were available. However, from Et-Taiyibeh came the first Arab convert in Palestine, a woman teacher, baptized in 1930. In 1931 G. W. Schubert baptized three Arabs in the Jordan, in the same general area where John the Baptist administered the rite. Two of these were young people from Et-Taiyibeh and the third a woman, the first convert from Bethlehem. Other Arab converts were won at Ram Allah, 10 miles (16 kilometers) north of Jerusalem, and at Beit Jala, near Bethlehem, where evangelism and branch Sabbath school work were reported by 1946.

East of the Jordan. In 1912 Tigran Zacharian (Brother Zachary), an Armenian colporteur who was working around Jerusalem, made a trip beyond the Jordan, and among other places left publications at Es-Salt. The next year Ibrahim el-Khalil (who later married Marie Meyer) held evangelistic meetings there but had to leave because of the war. However, as a result of his work Michael Hilal el-Haddad began to keep the Sabbath and pay tithe. Contact was reestablished in 1922. On Apr. 2, 1926, George Keough baptized 12 persons in the nearby river Jabbok and organized a church. A church building was erected later, but it was sold in 1954 after the members had moved to Amman.

Schools. By 1931 a school was operating in El-Husn, and from 1932 to 1939 Ibrahim el-Khalil pioneered the work. The school was closed in 1948 for lack of a worker but was reopened by Najeeb Azar in 1951. A school building and church auditorium was constructed in 1956, but it closed in 1963. Another school was operated at Es-Salt from 1934 till 1938. In 1942 a girls' school was opened at Amman by Ruby Williams and Farid Srour. Hana Jubran was named principal of this school in 1948, and classes were gradually added until in 1959 the first class of girls finished the secondary school (twelfth grade).

Additional classrooms were built in 1958, and a large auditorium was added in 1964. Mousa Azar attempted to operate a boys' school at Amman in 1948 and Ibrahim Ayoub in 1952, but these were not long continued. Later land was purchased and a school for boys again planned. Najeeb Azar opened a school in El-Karak in 1955 after the baptism there of Isbir Midinatt, a man who had observed the Sabbath since 1927, but who until 1954 had been unknown to Seventh-day Adventists. This school closed in 1962. Today the Amman Adventist Secondary School is in full operation.

Sabbath Schools and Evangelism. In the 1950s active Sabbath schools were established not only in the churches and schools at Amman, El-Husn, and El-Karak, but also in the homes of members at Amman Station and Ram Allah, and in small chapels, used also for evangelistic meetings, rented at Zerqa, Irbid, Sareeh, Khanzira, Beit Jala, Bethlehem, Jerusalem, Abboud, and Et-Taiyibeh. By 1955 Sabbath school membership was reported at 500, four times the church membership. Church membership also climbed steeply from 50 in 1950 to 164 in 1957.

In recent times literature evangelism has been carried on by the students working in the summer. There has been no medical work in the country since the operation of a massage clinic in the city of Amman for a few months in 1939.

At present a Bible correspondence school is being operated in Amman.

Notable Events. Noteworthy in the development of the work in Jordan were the printing of Sabbath school lesson quarterlies at Jerusalem in 1925 and 1926, the first printed in Arabic; the establishment of the Seventh-day Adventist Church as a legal association in Trans-jordan in 1936 with its own religious court (this was reaffirmed in 1961 when the church was recognized as a national denomination); the first MV junior camps in the Middle East Division, directed by Anees Haddad (1954); the ordination of the first Jordanian minister, Moussa Azar (1954); the first Arab president of the Jordan church, Chafic Srour (1957); the purchase of land in Jerusalem for the erection of a church auditorium (1960); the first decoration of the Christmas tree at Manger Square in Bethlehem (1960); the establishment of a Bible correspondence school in Amman (1963); the Jordan Welfare Society organized (1964); the first stop-smoking plans in the Middle East conducted by A. A. Haddad and H. C. Lamp (1965). The headquarters of the Jordan Section were moved to Jerusalem in 1966, but were moved back to Amman after the war in 1967.

A new orphanage was built and opened in Amman in 1969; but before it could begin operation, legal problems forced its closing. Efforts to reopen it were successful in 1974, and Kameel Haddad was appointed as the director.

JUAN PABLO DUARTE SCHOOL (Barahona). A 12-grade educational institution located in Barahona in the southern region of the Dominican Republic.

The school was founded in the year 1922 by James Phipps. Even though its beginnings were rather slow because the school was located in an area of poor economic resources, it has been greatly blessed.

The secondary level (grades 9—12) is accredited by the Education Commission of the Inter-American Division. It has 200 students on the secondary level, with nine teachers.

Some of the school directors have been Norma Familia, Magdalena Lizardo, Migdalia Lizardo, Maritza Manzanillo, Rosario Poueriet, Andrés Molina, Juan Reynaldo Rodríguez, and Elisa Mejía. The present director is Ariel de la Cruz.

Juan Pablo Duarte School (San Juan de la Maguana)

JUAN PABLO DUARTE SCHOOL (San Juan de la Maguana). A secondary school belonging to the South Dominican Mission. It is accredited by the country's Education Department. In 1993 it had 127 students and a faculty of seven.

The school had its beginnings in the year 1957 and is still at its original location on General Cabral Street. The first facility was a small room owned by the local Seventh-day Adventist church. The one teacher, Elida Amparo, had 50 students in first and second grades. By 1967 there were eight grades and 250 students.

In 1981 the school began offering secondary school grade 9. Grade 10 was offered in 1982, and 11 and 12 were offered by 1984.

The school building has eight classrooms on the first floor and two on the second. The church, situated across from the school building, is used for general meetings.

Principals of the school have included German Lorenzo, María Celeste Reyes, Esther-dreda Arrindell, Rafael Solís, Guillermo Rosario, and Juan Acevedo.

Juan Pablo Duarte Secondary School (San Pedro de Macorís)

JUAN PABLO DUARTE SECONDARY SCHOOL. A 12-grade educational institution located in San Pedro de Macorís, Dominican Republic. The school had its beginnings in the year 1923 and obtained government recognition in 1925. Its first teacher was Juan Rivera.

The school is community-oriented, conducting patriotic and antidrug marches, conferences, concerts, and other activities.

In 1966, under the leadership of Arístides González, the school's first building was constructed. In 1993 the school had 830 students in both the primary and secondary levels, and 20 teachers along with seven nonteaching staff.

Judgment

JUDGMENT. The eschatological process by which God intervenes in human history to reward “every man according as his work shall be,” to eradicate sin and its results from the universe, and to establish the righteous, universal, eternal reign of Christ. Seventh-day Adventists understand that the great final judgment involves three steps: (1) an investigative judgment, by which those eligible to eternal life are separated from those who are not eligible in a pre-Advent investigation; (2) an examination of the individual cases of the wicked by the righteous, during the millennium, to assure the latter that justice is being done in each case and to determine the sentence to be meted out in each case; and (3) the executive judgment, which takes place at the close of the millennium, when sentence is executed in the fires of hell.

In Millerite preaching, emphasis was placed on Christ’s coming to execute judgment upon sin and sinners, at His appearing. A strong emphasis in the 1844 message was the pronouncement that “the hour of his judgment is come” (Rev. 14:7). But as early as 1841 the idea of a two-phase judgment began to be taught. Josiah Litch in that year published an Address to . . . the Clergy, in which he spoke of “the judicial scene of judgment” preceding the resurrection (p. 39) and of the execution of the judgment following it (p. 38). The next year he explained at length the distinction between the two: “1. It [the verb judge] is used in the Bible in the sense of a trial according to law and evidence; the idea being drawn from a civil or criminal court. The term is used in this sense in Luke xix. 22. . .

“2. It signifies a penal judgment; or the execution of judgment; and is so used, Acts vii. 7. . . The terms are both used in reference to the judgment of the human race. 1. All men will be brought to trial, or into judgment, and all their deeds and their moral characters will be examined and their everlasting states will be determined by the evidence produced from God’s books, including the book of life. . . . No human tribunal would think of executing judgment on a prisoner until after his trial; much less will God. He will bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good or evil.

“But the resurrection is the retribution or execution of judgment, for ‘they that have done good shall come forth to the resurrection of life’ (Josiah Litch, Prophetic Expositions, vol. 1, pp. 49, 50).

“1. Daniel vii. 9, 10, presents the Ancient of days coming on his throne of fiery flame; the judgment is set and the books opened. He is distinct from the Son of man, spoken of in the 13th verse, when he comes to the Ancient of days.

“Thus the Saviour declares, John v. 27: ‘And hath given him authority to execute judgment also, because he is the Son of man’ (ibid., p. 52).

Of the phase of the judgment that takes place during the millennium Ellen White wrote that Christ and the saints “judge the wicked, comparing their acts with the statute-book, the Bible, and deciding every case according to the deeds done in the body. Then the portion which the wicked must suffer is meted out, according to their works; and it is recorded against their names in the book of death” (GC661; see 1 Cor. 6:2, 3).

Concerning the executive phase of the judgment the Scriptures declare, “Fire came down from God out of heaven, and devoured them” (Rev. 20:9). Commenting on the effects of this fire, Ellen White declares: “Some are destroyed as in a moment, while others suffer many days. All are punished ‘according to their deeds.’ . . . His [Satan’s] punishment is to be far greater than that of those whom he has deceived. After all have perished who fell by his deceptions, he is still to live and suffer on. In the cleansing flames the wicked are at last destroyed, root and branch” (GC 673).

An early Bible description of the great final judgment is that of Joel 3. Here, God delivers His people and sits in judgment on the nations that have oppressed them, and annihilates them (Joel 3:1, 2, 11—17, 19—21). Daniel develops the idea further in his description of “the Ancient of days” sitting in judgment upon the little horn. “The judgment was set, and the books were opened.” As a result, the “fourth beast, dreadful and terrible,” was “slain, . . . destroyed, and given to the burning flame. The Ancient of days then awards the dominion of this earth to the “Son of man,” that “all people, nations, and languages, should serve him; his dominion is an everlasting dominion,” and “to the people of the saints of the most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him” (Dan. 7:9—14, 26, 27). John describes a similar scene at the close of the millennium, with the wicked dead of all ages raised to life and arraigned before the bar of divine justice to receive sentence and to be “cast into the lake of fire” (Rev. 20:7—15).

The apostle Paul declares that God has appointed a day in which He will judge the world, and that all human beings, living and dead, must appear before the judgment seat of Christ, to be rewarded for what they have done in the flesh (Acts 17:30—31; Rom. 14:10; 2 Cor. 5:10; 2 Tim. 4:1; cf. 1 Peter 4:6). The judgment is closely associated, in point of time, with Christ’s second appearing and the establishment of His kingdom (2 Tim. 4:1; cf. Dan. 7:9, 10, 13, 14; Jude 14). In the judgment every deed will be considered (Eccl. 12:13, 14; Rev. 20:12). God’s moral law is the standard of judgment (James 2:10—12). The books of record in heaven include the book of life and the records of individual lives (Dan. 7:10; 12:1; Mal. 3:16; Rev. 20:12). God the Father and Christ the Son participate in the work of judgment (John 5:26, 27; Rom. 2:16; 2 Tim. 4:8; Jude 14, 15). The premillennial phase of the judgment of the wicked is described in Rev. 14:14—20 and 19:11—21. Prior to the executive judgment, at the close of the millennium, the unjust of all ages will be raised to life to hear sentence pronounced (Rev. 20:12—15). The earth is then purified of sin and sinners and created anew to be the eternal abode of the righteous (2 Peter 3:7—12; Rev. 20:14, 15; 21:1—5; 22:5).

Christ represented the judgment in the parables of the dragnet (separation of the righteous from the wicked), Matt. 13:47—50; of the talents (rewards), Matt. 25:14—30; and of the sheep and the goats (separation), Matt. 25:31—46; and of the man without a wedding garment (investigation of the guests, separation of the just and the unjust, and execution of the sentence), Matt. 22:2—14.

Juliaca Adventist Clinic

JULIACA ADVENTIST CLINIC (Clínica Adventista de Juliaca). A 21-bed general hospital owned and operated by the Inca Union Mission in Juliaca, department of Puno, in southeastern Peru. This was the first medical institution operated by Seventh-day Adventists in the Inca Union.

Seventh-day Adventist medical work in the highlands of Peru and Bolivia was started by F. H. Stahl, a missionary nurse, who went to this region in 1911 and worked there for many years. In 1922 Dr. S. Theron Johnston made his headquarters at the Platería Mission, and was the first SDA physician to enter the Lake Titicaca area. On Mar. 21, 1923, he rented a house in Juliaca, a more accessible center than the mission, and opened a small hospital. At that time the Southern Railway, one of Peru's two principal railway systems, made a contract with him to be its company doctor. Later the Social Security Service took over professional attention for all the workers' organizations in the area, including the railways, and amplified their contract with the hospital, signifying a considerable increase in the clinic's work. Fifty percent of operations performed are for patients affiliated with this state organization.

In 1927 the Inca Union Mission purchased, with money from the Missions Extension Fund, property on Loreto Street in Juliaca, one block from the central square; and under the direction of Dr. M. Bernard Graybill, a Loma Linda graduate, a one-story 20-bed hospital was constructed of adobe bricks. However, despite repeated attempts, Dr. Graybill was unsuccessful in obtaining a license from the government to practice medicine in Peru, and in 1928 the clinic was closed to White Peruvian clientele, with the exception of railroad and mine employees, with whom it had contracts, and cases specifically referred to it by recognized Peruvian physicians. However, within two weeks the local authorities requested that the clinic be reopened to the general public, and Dr. Graybill was guaranteed the necessary authorization to carry on his work. The original hospital building was modified and enlarged through the years and in 1961 was replaced by the present structure.

The clinic's area of influence extends not only to the approximately 100,000 inhabitants living in the surrounding area. In 1974 it became the center of the Juliaca Medical Association. At the initiative of Dr. Hugo Velarde, a specialized library, which renders invaluable service to all medical workers of that area, was founded. The clinic has established a nurse's aide program in connection with the Lake Titicaca Training School.

Justification

JUSTIFICATION. Justification is the divine act of acquittal, of declaring a repentant sinner released from the guilt of sin and restored to divine favor. In the NT the term occurs only in Rom. 4:25 and 5:16, 18, where justification is said to have been made possible by Christ's vicarious death on the cross and His resurrection. It is the atonement that makes justification possible. Justification involves grace on the part of God and faith on the part of humanity. The verb dikaiō, "to justify," "to acquit," "to reckon," occurs some 40 times in the NT, the majority of these being in the Epistles of Paul. This fact implies that the doctrine of justification is basically a Pauline theme. It is the foundation upon which depend our relationship to God in this life and our hope for eternal life.

In the NT "to justify" means to pronounce or to declare a person to be right, or just, as, for example, in Luke 7:29, the publicans "justified God"; and in Rom. 3:4, where Paul says, "That thou mightest be justified in thy sayings." The term also means "to acquit" those of charges brought against them, as, for example, in Acts 13:39, "justified from all things, from which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses." In the case of God justifying sinners, He does so by virtue of His favorable disposition toward them and His gracious purpose with respect to them.

Justification does not impart to the recipients, in their own right, the moral quality of being right, nor does it vest them with that quality. It simply vindicates them of the claims of the moral law against them because of their unlawful acts. It grants them the legal status of being considered as if they had never committed unlawful acts. Their new status is one they enjoy only by virtue of their new relationship to Jesus Christ, and can retain only by maintaining that relationship. But justification comprehends more than pardon alone. It not only declares a sinner righteous, but entitles him or her to all the rewards and benefits that properly belong to the righteous.

The Jew of Paul's day commonly thought of righteousness objectively, as a legalistic and meticulous observance of the requirements of the law of Moses. The apostle presents the matter subjectively, as an inward disposition of heart and mind that leads to right action in harmony with "the law" as magnified by Jesus Christ and exemplified by His life on earth. When a person accepts Jesus Christ as his or her Saviour, he or she stands accepted before God, and enters into a new status, that of righteousness. But to begin with, this righteousness is more ideal than it is actual. It does not, as yet, consist of perfect fulfillment of the divine will, but primarily the individual has been accorded the right to an acceptable standing before God.

From first to last, this right status depends upon faith, not simply an intellectual faith (which even devils have; James 2:19), nor even merely trust (which is so often a mere passive dependence upon a superior power), but an ardent, vitalizing grasp of an intimate, personal relation to a personal Saviour. Often the apostle designates the relationship with God through Christ of one who has been justified by the expression "in Christ," meaning a personal relationship with Christ (Rom. 8:1; etc.). Thus, believers are sons of God by virtue of their faith (Gal. 3:26). They live, metaphorically, within Christ, and literally within the orbit of His will. Justification is never attained by presumed works of merit, whether those prescribed by the law of Moses or by ecclesiastical legislation or by personal choice. “A man is not justified by the works of the law, but by the faith of Jesus Christ” (Gal. 2:16; cf. Gal. 3:11). Justification is not an objective relation to a legal system of ethics, with the expectation of thereby meriting and obtaining divine approval and award (see Rom. 4:6—8; 5:17—19). The one who stands justified shall be eternally saved from wrath at Christ’s second coming (Rom. 5:9, 10). God credits us with the life of perfect obedience our Lord lived on earth.

Justification carries with it the gift of peace with God (Rom. 5:1); it prepares the way for sanctification and glorification. Justification is ever a means to an end, not an end in itself. Paul sometimes uses the word “reconciled” to signify an experience similar to that of being “justified” (Rom. 5:10, 11). Unless God did something to change our status, He would be obliged to treat us as enemies.

The Seventh-day Adventist view of justification was set forth by James White in a Review and Herald editorial in 1869, in which he wrote: “How shall man be just with God? Or to speak still more definitely, how shall a sinner become just in God’s sight? There is but one answer that can be returned to this. His is clearly the case of that class who are justified by faith without works. But how shall the man who is thus justified maintain his justification before God? By faith which produces good works. His justification is therefore, maintained as James insists, by faith and works” (34:16, July 6, 1869).

To one who misunderstood the Seventh-day Adventist position Uriah Smith replied: “Who claims that we are to be justified by the deeds of the law? We certainly do not. Justification by faith is our sole dependence, and ever has been. . . . Do you believe you have liberty now to commit any of the sins forbidden by the ten commandments? You do not; neither do we. Do you expect to be justified by faith while living in the commission of those sins? You would not. Neither do we. This is the real question in this matter; and in this we are agreed” (ibid. 37:140, Apr. 18, 1871).

Of the relationship between justification and obedience D. M. Canright wrote: “The Gospel is not given to succeed the law, but to save men from their sins, the violations of the law. Hence faith in Christ and obedience to the commandments of God should always go together. . . . Be it understood, then, that we are not seeking to be justified by the law, but by faith, as was Abraham, Rom. 4:1—4; and yet we keep God’s law as did Abraham the father of the faithful” (ibid. 43:106, Mar. 17, 1874).

Ellen White has described justification in these words: “If you give yourself to Him [Christ], and accept Him as your Saviour, then, sinful as your life may have been, for His sake you are accounted righteous, Christ’s character stands in place of your character, and you are accepted before God just as if you had not sinned” (SC 62).

“The righteousness by which we are justified is imputed; the righteousness by which we are sanctified is imparted. The first is our title to heaven, the second is our fitness for heaven” (MYP 35).

“When the sinner believes that Christ is his personal Saviour, then, according to His unfailing promises, God pardons his sin, and justifies him freely. The repentant soul realizes that his justification comes because Christ, as his substitute and surety, has died for him, is his atonement and righteousness” (ISM 367).

Seventh-day Adventists believe in justification by faith alone, but also that those who have been justified by faith will aspire to make the perfection of Christ as reflected in the moral law their own pattern of life and conduct-not as a means to justification but as a result of it, out of dedicated appreciation for His infinite gift of love (John 15:10). See also Faith and Works; Law; Law and Grace; New Birth; Righteousness by Faith; Sanctification.

Kabiufa Adventist High School (Papua New Guinea)

KABIUFA ADVENTIST HIGH SCHOOL (Papua New Guinea). A coeducational boarding secondary school situated on 250 acres (100 hectares) of fertile soil at Kabiufa, about seven miles (12 kilometers) from the town of Goroka on the Highlands Highway, at an elevation of 5,480 feet (1,670 meters). The students come mostly from mainland New Guinea.

Land for the mission station at Kabiufa was purchased by L. I. Howell and H. W. Nolan in 1947. This was the first attempt by Seventh-day Adventists to open up mission work in the area, and it became the site for the Eastern Highlands Training School. After union mission boundary adjustments it became, in 1953, the Coral Sea Union Mission College. The Coral Sea Union College was first established at Kambubu on the island of New Britain in 1950. In 1953 that became the location for the college (subsequently renamed Jones Missionary College) for the newly formed Bismarck Solomons Union Mission, and Kabiufa became the location of the college for the Coral Sea Union Mission.

Early in the history of Kabiufa, a sawmill had been established, and this became a valuable asset to the new college. A joinery industry and maintenance department gave practical instruction to many of the senior students. Courses offered included ministerial training, teacher training, and building construction. In 1968 the training courses were discontinued at Kabiufa and combined with those at Kambubu. Kabiufa then became, and still is, Kabiufa Adventist High School.

Through the years Kabiufa has established a reputation for the production of vegetables in the school gardens. A significant contribution to better production methods was made by J. K. Mittleider in the mid-1960s. This work was carried on by A. L. Voigt. The gardens provide excellent food for the school, for local demands, and for distribution within Papua New Guinea.

Kalaka, David

KALAKA, DAVID (c. 1844—1904). Pioneer preacher, colporteur, translator, the first African Seventh-day Adventist in Basutoland, South Africa. Educated in a French Evangelical mission school, he worked for 15 years in a printing plant and assisted in translating the Bible into the Sesuto language.

In 1895, while serving as guide and interpreter for S. N. Haskell, who spent several weeks visiting Basutoland, Kalaka became interested in the seventh-day Sabbath, and after many discussions he decided to keep it. After the trip was over, Haskell arranged for Kalaka to translate Ellen White's book Steps to Christ into the Sesuto language (this was one of the earliest translations of this book into a pagan tongue) and to attend a general SDA meeting in Kimberley. There Kalaka was baptized. He then returned to his own country to tell others of his newly found faith.

When J. M. Freeman entered Basutoland in 1899 as the first appointed Seventh-day Adventist missionary, Kalaka became his assistant and worked under him for five years. In 1902 Kalaka took a supply of Steps to Christ in Sesuto and traveled far back into the mountains, where in three weeks he visited 20 villages and sold many copies of the book. He later went on similar trips to various places. When he died at about the age of 60, he left a son who was teaching in a mission school and who became an SDA minister.

Kalimantan Academy

KALIMANTAN ACADEMY (Perguruan Advent Kalimantan). A day school operated by the Seventh-day Adventist Church under the control of Kalimantan Mission. The school, which is located in east Kalimantan, Indonesia, was started in 1964 with elementary and junior high classes. The senior high school was added in 1982. The government's accreditation granted in 1985 for junior and senior high school was recognized as the registered status.

Kalimantan Academy particularly serves three churches in the Balikpapan district; however, some of the students come from Manado, Ujungpandang, and several other cities within the Kalimantan Mission territory.

Kamagambo High School and Teachers' College

KAMAGAMBO HIGH SCHOOL AND TEACHERS' COLLEGE. A coeducational boarding school on the senior high school level, operated by the East African Union, 14 miles (22 kilometers) south of the town of Kisii, the administrative headquarters of the South Nyanza district in Kenya, East Africa. It is situated on 60 acres (25 hectares) of land lying one-half mile (.8 kilometer) from the main road to Tanzania, and has an elevation of 5,000 feet (1,525 meters) and an annual rainfall of about 60 inches (150 centimeters). Swahili, the lingua franca of East Africa, is used with English in the classrooms. The school serves a constituency of 314,739 church members in Kenya, and the majority of the students are adherents of the Seventh-day Adventist Church. In 1993 the teaching staff was all African with an enrollment of 548 teachers-in-training, 38 ministerial students, and 134 in the secondary school.

History

History. The predecessor of the training school was a mission school opened on a site given by the chief and his elders in 1913 to A. A. Carscallen and Petro Oyier, an African mission worker. This tract, covered with bush and trees, was a kind of buffer zone between two tribes and had been used by them as a battleground. The government hoped that by getting this particular piece of land for the missionaries peace might be preserved between the two tribes. D. E. Delhove spent a few months in 1913 helping Carscallen get the school started. Evangelistic work conducted in connection with the school resulted in the baptism of six persons in 1918. Illiterate adult converts were taught to read and write.

In 1921 E. R. Warland began teaching additional subjects, and in 1922 Grace Clarke began a boarding school for girls. The first girls were so timid that they had to be induced to attend by promises of clothing. In 1928 a teacher training course was begun, which the government agreed to recognize. In 1933 a boarding school was opened for boys. In 1965, the elementary classes of the boys' school were moved to another site in order to make room for the addition of the first two years of high school work. In 1962 the eleventh year of work was added, and in 1963 the twelfth year. At present the school offers full secondary education for both boys and girls. A two-year primary teacher training course is offered after the twelfth year of schooling. A two-year ministerial course is also offered.

The buildings are permanent brick and stone structures, and there is a good water supply, which is piped into all the houses. Lights are supplied by a generating plant. There is a church, for the use of the school only, which seats 1,000 people. A modern cafeteria, elementary school block, and office quarters add to the efficiency of the school plant.

Kambubu Adventist High School (Papua New Guinea)

KAMBUBU ADVENTIST HIGH SCHOOL (Papua New Guinea). A coeducational boarding secondary school situated on nearly 5,000 acres (2,000 hectares) of land on the south coast of the island of New Britain approximately 35 miles (55 kilometers) southeast of Rabaul. In 1993 a faculty and staff of 22 served the students.

The students come from the islands of the Bismarck Archipelago and Bougainville. The school caters for the first four years of secondary education, and a number of young men are trained in building construction. Food for the students is grown on the school property, the gardens being cared for by the students during the afternoon work period. The staple crops are kau kau (sweet potato), manioc, and a variety of taro.

The school operates a joinery shop where some of the students learn skills in handling tools and making furniture for sale in Rabaul. Transportation between the school and Rabaul is by the school launch, M.V. Kambubu. There is access by road, but an unbridged river, which is crossed by canoe, is a handicap.

Land for the school was purchased in 1936, £4,000 being provided by the Sanitarium Health Food Company. A school known as the Put Put Training School was begun, and A. R. Hiscox was the headmaster. Others who helped in developmental work were G. Peacock, H. R. Steed, A. J. Campbell, L. M. Maxwell, H. White, A. Gallagher, R.R.D. Marks, A. Harrison (builder), and E. Cherry (sawmiller).

When Japan entered World War II and penetrated southward, Hiscox was evacuated to Australia and the school was discontinued. The school site was occupied by the Japanese during the war, and all the buildings were destroyed.

The work of rebuilding began in 1946, and in 1947 the school was reopened as the Kambubu Training School, the name derived from a small river flowing through the property. In 1950 it was decided that the Kambubu Training School should become the college for the Coral Sea Union Mission. In 1953, when the Coral Sea Union was divided into two unions, it became the college for the Bismarck-Solomons Union Mission and was renamed the Adventist Union College. When this name proved generally unacceptable, it became in 1954 the Jones Missionary College, named after G. F. Jones, a pioneer SDA missionary to the South Pacific Islands. Training courses for ministers and teachers continued until 1968 when Sonoma Adventist College was established. Jones Missionary College then became Kambubu Adventist High School, the name it now bears.

Kandana Seventh-day Adventist High School

KANDANA SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST HIGH SCHOOL. A coeducational day school on the elementary and secondary level, operated by the Sri Lanka Union of Churches of the Far Eastern Division. It is located in Kandana, Gampaha district, about nine miles (15 kilometers) north of Colombo beside Airport Road. It offers classes from preschool to grade 10 in the Sinhala language. English is taught as a second language. At the elementary level Tamil is also taught. When students complete grade 4 level, they sit for the government scholarship selection examination. Many pass the examination and are selected for prestigious schools in Colombo. At the end of grade 10, students sit for the GCE (O/L) examination, which is conducted by the Department of Examinations, Sri Lanka. Apart from the regular curriculum, special English classes are conducted in the afternoon for students who are interested in learning more English.

The main school campus is located on a one-acre (.5-hectare) site. Presently there is one two-story building with 11 classrooms, a library, and office space. A three-story building is in progress for another 11 classrooms and a science laboratory. In addition to this, there are classroom facilities at the premises of Kandana and Ja-Ela Seventh-day Adventist churches. In January 1993 the total enrollment was a little more than 1,000 students.

In 1961 Mrs. D. M. Fernando started a preschool, with an enrollment of six children, in the Voice of Hope Auditorium at 52, Negombo Road, Kandana. It was under the direction of D. M. Fernando, who was the pastor of the Enderamulla church and in charge of the work in Kandana. In 1963 Mrs. J. D. Peter was the teacher. The school has continued to grow, and many improvements have been added. Mr. H.G.M. Fernando was elected principal in 1987. Since then there have been more improvements, including the completion of the second floor with six classrooms, the library, and a staff room. Additional land was purchased and other physical improvements were made, including a miniscience lab. In 1988 the school received approval to present examinations conducted by the Department of Examinations, Sri Lanka.

Kansas Conference

KANSAS CONFERENCE. A former unit of church organization that included the state of Kansas. (See also Central States Conference.) Statistics in 1980 at the time of the merger with the Nebraska Conference: churches, 57; members, 4,697; church schools, 11; ordained ministers, 23; licensed ministers, 5; church school teachers, 22.

The conference formed part of the Central Union Conference.

Institutions that operated in the Kansas Conference included Enterprise Academy and Shawnee Mission Medical Center, located in Shawnee Mission, Kansas.

History

History. Beginnings of the Work in the Area. As early as the 1860s there were scattered groups of Seventh-day Adventists, immigrants from Eastern states, in Kansas. In 1866 several of these isolated pioneers, who often numbered no more than two or three in one place, wrote to the Review and Herald expressing their desire for other Seventh-day Adventists to join them and for ministerial help. In answer to these requests, other conferences sent workers to hold meetings, stimulate interest, and organize churches. These hardy preachers, holding meetings in tents or schoolhouses, worked under difficulties and often against opposition and prejudice.

The first tent meetings in Kansas appear to have been held by John Matteson during the fall of 1869. In October he preached in the area south of Mound City in Linn County, where there were already four members. Three were baptized, among the first in the state.

The following spring and summer found Matteson again in Linn County, holding meetings in Mapleton, Centerville, and Farlinville. In July 1870 he reported J. H. Cook's ordination as an elder of the Mound City church, and a three-day grove meeting at Farlinville.

Other outstanding early leaders in Kansas were D. J. Rousseau, Joseph Lamont, George Kennedy, J. N. Ayers (first Kansas Conference president), L. D. Santee, N. W. Vincent, D. T. Bourdeau, Smith Sharp, John Gibbs, R. G. Ranton, George W. Page, R. J. Lawrence, and George I. Butler.

Missouri-Kansas Conference. At the first camp meeting held in Kansas, at Pleasanton, in October 1870 (at which James and Ellen White were present), the Missouri-Kansas Conference was organized, with R. J. Lawrence as president. Two Kansas churches were taken into the new conference—Mound City and Centerville. Only a few of the widely separated members attended this camp meeting, but of those who did, some came amazing distances, leaving their sod houses and making the journey in covered wagons. One Kansan drove his team 270 miles (430 kilometers), and a wagonload of Missourians traveled six days. From a small beginning in 1870, including only five fully organized churches in both states, the membership increased to 22 churches by 1874.

The Kansas Conference Organized. At the Missouri-Kansas camp meeting held at Mound City, Kansas, in September 1875 the conference was divided into the Missouri Conference and the Kansas Conference, each having more than a dozen churches and about 300 members. The Kansas camp meeting held at Melvern in 1876 was described by James White as almost a miracle, considering the youth of the conference in the new state and the poverty of the people as a result of the drought and the grasshopper scourge. That year there were 235 members. By 1888, after active evangelism and the influx of many Adventists from the older Western states—Wisconsin, Illinois, and especially Iowa—the Kansas Conference was the second largest in the denomination, with a membership of 2,000. Although there was an exodus of settlers to Oklahoma and other states during the early nineties, by 1896 there were 85 churches and 3,000 members. During 1893 alone 148 were baptized at the four Kansas camp meetings.

Progress was not constant, however. Although the churches grew rapidly, there was occasional apostasy. George I. Butler in 1873 expressed concern for the spiritual condition of the cause in Kansas, fearing that some of the brethren were becoming too much involved in land speculation and profit. Then drought, distance, and discouragement plagued the pioneers. The dry weather of the late eighties and early nineties compelled many of the settlers to mortgage their farms, and many returned to the East. Whole sections of western Kansas were depopulated.

In general, the work in the early period was confined to small towns and rural school-houses, but prior to 1900 three now prominent city churches were founded: Topeka (12 members, 1882), Wichita (20 members, 1887), Kansas City (1890).

The German language work had a most phenomenal growth in western Kansas. In Rush County, where there was a large settlement of German people of various faiths, the work of L. R. Conradi and S. S. Shrock resulted in the Otis church (organized about 1883). From this German church families moved west and formed other churches at Shaffer and Nekoma in Rush County, and Bazine in Ness County, also at Garden City and Great Bend. In the winter of 1884, Conradi and Shrock established a church at Hillsboro, which by May of 1885 had 123 members.

About this time work began among the Black population (see Central States Conference).

During the late eighties the need for a denominational school was expressed. A preparatory school was opened at Ottawa late in 1888. Courses included “the common branches,” bookkeeping, and Bible, and students paid $2 a week for board and room with SDA families. L. J. Rousseau and his wife were the first teachers in this conference-operated school. A German school had operated at Lehigh and had closed by 1889, and one was opened at Otis in 1894.

To fill the needs of this frontier territory during the middle and late nineties, short-term workers’ institutes trained colporteurs and others desiring to engage immediately in some branch of evangelistic work. One such session held in 1894 at Ottawa, in the eastern part of the state, had about 60 in attendance. In 1896 a five-week school was held at El Dorado, offering three general lines of study besides preaching services each night for the benefit of the general public. No tuition was charged. To those already in the work, and those who planned to enter the work for at least six months, room, heating stove, and fuel were free, while meals were given at cost. Those who could not attend were urged to send a young man or woman; such were boarded for $6 for the five weeks. During the session an urgent appeal was made for donations or for the loan of horses and rigs for use by the young women canvassers.

Kansas became one of the leaders in the canvassing work. Shortly after the introduction of subscription-book sales, Kansas colporteurs were organized in each county into a band of five or six members, including a leader to encourage them, order their books, assist them in deliveries, and meet with them each Sabbath and Sunday. The June 1887 report states that about 100 working canvassers in the state had sold 7,000 books in two or three months.

During the severe drought of 1888, when the farmers had little money, canvassers suffered severely. Hardships notwithstanding, some 60,000 families were visited during that year.

Subsequent History. Statistics in 1902 showed 2,559 members, 100 churches, and 11 schools, with a total enrollment of 242. By the end of 1909 Kansas had 87 churches. Tithes in 1909 amounted to nearly $40,000, with offerings of about $18,000. Book sales during 1908 totaled $12,304.27.

In 1902 treatment rooms were opened at Wichita, which later became known as the Kansas Sanitarium. The sanitarium prospered for a time but by 1928 had accumulated a debt of more than $100,000 and was closed that year. In 1907 and 1908 Kansas had 20 church schools, but had no provision for education beyond the eighth grade. Because graduates could not all be accommodated at Union College, it seemed imperative to open a conference school. In 1908 an intermediate school at Oswego was made an academy (later, 1919, moved and renamed Enterprise Academy).

Another intermediate school opened between Downs and Portis in western Kansas on Nov. 15, 1910. It was named Hill Agricultural Academy. Z. M. Hill and his wife donated the 40-acre (15-hectare) site.

East and West Kansas Conferences. In 1910 Kansas was divided into two conferences, with L. W. Terry as president of the East Kansas Conference and N. T. Sutton as president of the West Kansas Conference. The two were reunited in 1914 as the Kansas Conference, and headquarters were established at Wichita.

Later Developments. The conference membership decreased from 2,863 in 1902 to 2,205 members 20 years later, with 67 churches, nine ordained ministers, and 18 church schools. After a fluctuating upward trend during the twenties and early thirties, the membership by 1935 had reached 3,012 (64 churches, 10 ordained ministers, and 12 church schools). For 15 years the figures remained almost constant. The 1951 statistical report showed 3,507 members (with 62 churches, 18 ordained ministers, and 10 church schools) and a peak of 3,720 in 1955 (with 15 ordained ministers and 11 elementary schools, though fewer churches).

Disaster struck twice during the fifties. In 1951 five churches were damaged by high water, and in 1956 (and again in 1961) the boys' dormitory at Enterprise Academy was extensively damaged by fire. By the early sixties the school had a new plant.

On Jan. 1, 1981, the Kansas Conference merged with the Nebraska Conference to become the Kansas-Nebraska Conference.

Kansas Sanitarium

KANSAS SANITARIUM. A former medical institution opened at Wichita, Kansas, in 1902, when the Nebraska Sanitarium, at Lincoln, sent two nurses, L. C. Christofferson and his wife, to open treatment rooms in Wichita. The Kansas Conference adopted the project, and in 1903 Dr. G. A. Droll joined the undertaking. A nurse's training class was opened in 1905. Later a 20-acre (eight-hectare) plot two miles (three kilometers) west of the heart of the city was purchased, and a four-story brick-veneer structure with a capacity of 30 patients was constructed. Toward this the citizens of Wichita raised $10,000 to match a similar amount from the conference, and on June 14, 1905, the new institution was opened. A 1909 report states that the patronage was good, that the financial condition of the institution was in good order, and that 22 nurses were in training. In 1911 as many as 50 patients were crowded into the institution. In 1923 the name was changed to Kansas Sanitarium and Hospital, and four years later, in 1927, to Wichita Sanitarium.

After the peak year, 1917, when 1,000 patients were treated, the average ran about 700 a year, until in the middle twenties patronage began to decline. This was attributed to a constant changing of medical superintendents, together with the failure to change to modern hospital organization with an open staff. To save the institution when a debt of more than $100,000 had accumulated, the Central Union Conference took over in 1927; but it was too late. On Oct. 16, 1928, it was voted to close the institution. The plant was later sold to the county for $60,000.

Kanye Hospital

KANYE HOSPITAL. A 167-bed medical institution situated in Kanye, Botswana. It is operated by the Zambesi Union, with financial aid from the Botswana government.

Kanye was the first Seventh-day Adventist hospital started for Africans and the first mission hospital to be established in Botswana. It is one of the oldest Seventh-day Adventist institutions in this part of Africa. It was opened in 1921 by Dr. A. H. Kretchmar, who received permission to do medical work at Kanye on condition that no preaching be done. Through the popularity, tact, and influence of Dr. Kretchmar, permission was obtained to hold religious meetings, which opened the way for evangelistic work among the Botswanas, near the area where Livingstone started his first mission station, Kolobeng (about 25 miles [40 kilometers] from Kanye). W. H. Anderson was the first missionary-evangelist to be stationed at Kanye, and he helped to establish the mission program.

In 1947 a nurses' training school was opened. Throughout the years more than several hundred nurses have completed their training. These trainees are serving at Kanye Hospital and at other institutions in Botswana. Two courses of training—a two-year enrolled nurses' course, and a four-year state registered nurses' course—are offered, both recognized by the Botswana government and the Nursing Council of Botswana, Lesotho, and Swaziland.

The hospital is responsible for the greater part of the health-care delivery in the southern district of Botswana, and a large portion of the Kalahari district. Monthly air trips, lasting three to five days, are undertaken in the mission plane, the Quiet Hour. When airfields (mainly dry salt lakes) are waterlogged, trips at six-week intervals are undertaken by truck. These trips last six to eight days and 500 to 1,100 patients are seen in the desert. Roads are primitive, often consisting of only two deep ruts in the desert sand.

In 1963 a new two-story 100-bed wing was completed. The daily census, including newborns, ran just under 150 for the first eight months of 1974, compared with 15 in 1950 and about 100 in 1961.

During 1974 a new dispensary with 10 maternity beds was erected at Moshupa, a village 16 miles (25 kilometers) from Kanye. This facility was staffed by five national workers. Another dispensary at Tshane in the Kalahari Desert was staffed by two national workers.

Two permanent church buildings have been built and companies organized in the Kalahari Desert, at Lehututu and Hukuntsi, as a result of the medical work in this area.

Karachi Adventist Hospital

KARACHI ADVENTIST HOSPITAL. A modern general hospital in Karachi, Pakistan, with a capacity of 158 beds controlled and operated by the Pakistan Union as part of the Trans-European Division. The hospital operates a dental clinic, a School of Nursing, a School of Midwifery, as needed a School of Medical Technology, a School of Physiotherapy, and a School of X-ray Technology. It has a Community Outreach Department affiliated with ADRA, currently running an ADRA-Rural Health and Education project and a portable water project.

Forerunner of the hospital was a clinic opened in 1949 by Dr. Genevieve Joy Ubbink and her husband, Richard Ubbink, who later served as the business manager of the hospital.

The clinic had two doctors' offices, a laboratory, a pharmacy, a surgery unit, and a small maternity ward. R. H. Dunn, M.D., took charge of the clinic in October 1950. Later, Beverly Bunnell came as the nursing superintendent. Other members of the early staff were G. Branganza and Miss Maher, nurses; Lal Baz, pharmacist; and Cecil Stout, laboratory technologist.

The great need for medical service in Pakistan influenced the mission to establish a fully equipped hospital. The main building was erected in 1951, and the hospital, with an 80-bed capacity, was officially opened in October of that year (four years after construction had begun), with George A. Nelson as the first medical director. A new wing added in 1961 increased the hospital capacity to 120 beds. Partial remodeling in 1989 increased the bed capacity to 138.

The hospital in 1993, 42 years after its establishment, had 30 private/semiprivate rooms, 14 general wards, three labor rooms, an ICU, major and minor operating rooms, a delivery room, and support services, including laboratory, X-ray, physiotherapy, and respiratory therapy.

In 1992 an average of 173 outpatients visited the hospital, and there were 102 inpatients. Overseas staff included one medical doctor, one dentist, and eight support staff. National workers included 40 full- and part-time physicians, 68 staff nurses, midwives, and 286 support staff. Approximately 23 percent of outpatients and 35 percent of admissions were given charity.

Karachi Seventh-day Adventist Hospital had the distinction in 1963 of having the first heart surgeries performed when a team from Loma Linda, having been invited by the government of Pakistan and supported by USAID, spent five weeks doing 41 heart surgeries.

The School of Nursing opened in 1956 and held its first graduation in 1961. Since its inception 555 students have been enrolled. A School of Midwifery was established in 1962 with a total of 195 students to date having been enrolled. Giebal Hall, a four-story Nursing School and dormitory for 90 residents, was completed in 1977. A modern dental clinic staffed by the expatriate dentist is part of the hospital complex.

The overall plan calls for replacing the existing 42-year-old structure in four phases with a new modern facility as funds are available.

Karlman, Alf Marcus

KARLMAN, ALF MARCUS (1903—1965). Treasurer of various fields. He was a native of Sweden and accepted the Seventh-day Adventist message when he was 21. He immediately enrolled in the Nyhytten School, which in those days was the training center for Swedish workers. Upon completion of his course in 1927 he entered the organized work as treasurer of the publishing house in Stockholm. He remained there until 1937, when he was appointed treasurer of what was then the East Nordic Union Conference, where he served until 1947. At this time he was appointed treasurer of the provisionally reorganized Northern European Division, with headquarters in Stockholm, Sweden. In a further reorganization in 1951 he became assistant treasurer of the division, which position he held until 1958, when he became treasurer. He was ordained in late 1963 and the following year requested release from his work because of failing health.

At this time it operated only as a small clinic and was subsequently funded by the government, thereby ceasing operations as an institution of the church in 1978.

Kauble, Nelson Walker

KAUBLE, NELSON WALKER (1857—1927). Educator, editor, administrator. He began to teach school at the age of 19, and while teaching studied to prepare himself for ministry in the United Brethren Church. His studies led him to the conviction that the seventh day of the week was the true Sabbath. Joining the Seventh-day Adventist Church, he began preaching in Indiana in 1885. About 1890 he went to South Dakota in ministerial and religious liberty work. Afterward he was president of the Colorado Conference (1894—1896), of Union College (1897—1898), and of the Illinois Conference (1899—1901); helped to found Fox River Academy and for a while served as principal of it (1901—1904); was president of Emmanuel Missionary College (1904—1908); edited the Advocate of Christian Education (1904—1905); was principal of Strode Industrial Academy (1908—1911). In 1912 he became head of the Bible Department at Lodi Academy. Later he served the Northern California Conference as a minister and as religious liberty secretary until his death.

Kauma Adventist High School

KAUMA ADVENTIST HIGH SCHOOL. A 7- to 11-grade coeducational boarding and day school, situated on the Kauma estate, a tract of some 35 acres (14 hectares) on the northern strip of Abemama Island in the island nation of Kiribati. This school has a staff of 13 teachers and an enrollment of 207 students. Although difficult to operate because of the problem of growing food and the lack of opportunity for earning income, the school has nevertheless been worthwhile as an evangelizing agency.

The school, consisting originally of primer classes, was established in 1949 on the site of the original mission headquarters. It was opened by Mrs. J. T. Howse and her daughter, Joan, assisted by Samuel, a native of the Ellice group, who had been educated in the training school in Samoa. It grew steadily, with the addition of further classes, until in 1952 the school was relocated on its present site, on which buildings of native materials were erected. During 1953 and 1954 Forms I and II were added and a boarding department was operated.

Form III was added to the secondary section in 1970. This allowed for further preparation before the students attend Fulton College.

W. M. Dawson, who became principal in 1955, was successful in having the school registered with the government. In 1957 the boarding department was enlarged; in 1959 a concrete and brick classroom and office block was erected, and a permanent boys' dormitory in 1960. The development of the estate was continued by further planting of coconuts and such other food crops as can survive in the poor atoll soil and the droughts, which are frequent.

Valuable service has been rendered to the school by national headmasters from various Pacific territories, namely Tavita Niu from Samoa, Henry Moala from Tonga, and Marika Tuivawa from Fiji, as well as by a number of local assistant teachers.

From the school, numbers have gone on for further training to Fulton College in Fiji, while others have been baptized as a result of their school experience.

More permanent buildings were begun in 1974 with the construction of two new classrooms, a store, and a new home for the principal.

More recently new dormitories, a chapel, and a dining hall, all in concrete block, have been added, as well as permanent staff homes.

Principals: Mrs. J. T. Howse, 1949—1952; F. W. Gifford, 1953—1954; W. M. Dawson, 1955—1956; A. J. Sonter, 1957—1961; R. N. Sutcliffe, 1962—1968; A. W. Clover, 1969—1971; R. L. Cole, 1972—1974; W. Kazakhstan

KAZAKHSTAN. An Asian country bordered by Russia, China, Uzbekistan, Kyrgyzstan, Turkmenistan, and the Caspian Sea. It occupies an area of 1,049,200 square miles (2,700,000 square kilometers) and has a population (1994) of 17.3 million.

The region came under the Mongols in the thirteenth century and gradually came under Russian rule during the years 1730—1853. It was admitted to the USSR as a constituent republic in 1936. Kazakhstan declared independence on Dec. 16, 1991, and became an independent state when the Soviet Union dissolved on Dec. 26, 1991.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. The territory of Kazakhstan comprises the Kazakhstan Conference and part of the Southern Conference, which are part of the Southern Union conference of the Euro-Asia Division. In 1992 there were 36 local churches and 142 companies in Kazakhstan, where the membership is 2,096. Many church buildings were constructed during the 1980s, but many members migrated to Germany, which hampered the progress of the work.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. Andrei Lubchenko, a participant in World War I, was the first to spread the Seventh-day Adventist message in northern Kazakhstan after his return from the war. Soon his fellow villager, N. I. Krikun, from the village of Chernigovka (Kustanai region), accepted the message. After the revolution some Kustanai ministers visited them and conducted several home church services. These visits resulted in the conversion of the Bedenko, Velgosha, and two Pavelko families. A Bible worker, Fjodor Cherkassky, was appointed minister of the local church. This church took as their example the first apostolic church and united into one agricultural cooperation, but because of crop failure in 1921 it was disbanded.

In 1922 Adolf Rebein moved to Kustanai but was murdered the same year while visiting the remote villages. I. I. Stieben and A. Paal worked in this field after him. In 1924 at the Seventh-day Adventist Congress in the village of Annovka, Elders Kurilko and A. D. Kalashnikow were elected ministers.

Samson Ratnikov worked as a pastor in Kustanai in 1928. Under his leadership, the local church grew and a choir was organized. But a lot of people left the place when the repression started. Ratnikov moved to Altai, where he was repressed in 1937—1939 and died in prison, as did many other brethren. Many widows and children were left. Holding worship services was prohibited, and if two families gathered together they were severely punished.

Some revival of the preaching activity started in the 1950s. The first was in the Kushmurun station under the leadership of I. I. Koner, who was later ordained.

Michael Kulakov, at the age of 26 years, was discharged from prison and exiled to Kazakhstan. He gave great support to the restoration and development of the SDA message in the country. After Stalin's death he was freed from exile, and in 1955 he moved to Alma-Ata. He managed to reorganize the church there in a very short time. Kulakov gathered together the members of the formerly repressed and separated SDA families (Pronevich, Chizhov, Pavelko, Frolov, Lebsok, Rybalko, Butenko, etc.) and some Povolzhsky (down the Volga River) Germans and others who had accepted Jesus Christ. Kulakov worked under the leadership of an experienced minister, Kzimir A. Korolenko, who was responsible for the work in Central Asia and Kazakhstan.

At the time of Khrushchev's repressions local churches were dispersed, so the members met in small groups. Korolenko was arrested and taken to prison. Kulakov moved to Uzbekistan and lived in the city of Kokand, where there were no SDAs.

During the mid-1960s the repression was stopped, and Seventh-day Adventist missionary work was immediately activated. People started to build and purchase church buildings, new congregations were established, and different contacts were developed. At the end of 1968 Alf Lohne, from the General Conference, visited this region. Later on, Kulakov had an invitation from his relatives to visit the United States, and while on this visit he established friendships with Robert Pierson and Alf Lohne. These men received an invitation to visit the USSR. Lohne visited Alma-Ata several times the same year.

The state has adopted the law of religious liberty by which any denomination has equal rights and the citizens may choose any religion or none at all.

Keene Sanitarium

KEENE SANITARIUM. A small medical institution formerly operated by the Texas Conference at Keene, Texas, a Seventh-day Adventist community built around Keene Academy (now Southwestern Adventist College). The sanitarium began in 1901 under the supervision of D. Edson Garvin, M.D., but apparently was not fully operative until late in 1902, when Dr. Pliny F. Haskell and his wife took charge.

Other physicians connected with the institution in later years were D. C. Ross and Thomas J. Leach. The sanitarium ceased operations sometime in 1907 and its building was taken over by the school. For several years the sanitarium was known as the Lone Star Sanitarium.

Keh Nga Pit

KEH NGA PIT (fl. 1904—1928). First ordained Chinese Seventh-day Adventist minister. Member of a Chinese Christian family living in the vicinity of Amoy, Fukien, southern China, he was educated (reportedly on a collegiate level) in the English Presbyterian schools in that city and became principal of the Presbyterian Theological Seminary there. In 1904 he met Timothy Tay, a young Seventh-day Adventist worker, who had gone to Amoy to perfect his knowledge of the local dialect. Seeking to correct Tay, he studied the Bible with him and as a result became an SDA. In the spring of 1906 he was ordained to the ministry by J. N. Anderson (Review and Herald 83:16, Aug. 23, 1906). He wrote several pamphlets and expositions of prophecies in Chinese and devoted much of his time to propagating the gospel among his own people and among the different ethnic groups in the Fukien province. In the SDA Yearbook his name appears for the last time in 1928.

Keller, Florence Armstrong

KELLER, FLORENCE ARMSTRONG (1875—1974). Physician and missionary. Keller was born in Missouri and as a young child lived with her family in Arkansas. When Keller was 10 the family moved by covered wagon to the state of Washington, where she grew up among the Indian children.

Later they moved to Walla Walla, where Keller was a member of the first class to matriculate there at the new college. From Walla Walla she went to Battle Creek to study nursing. She worked for Dr. J. H. Kellogg, who encouraged her to study medicine.

Keller graduated from the American Medical Missionary College, precursor of the College of Medical Evangelists. She had the distinction of being the first woman physician to be sent overseas by the church. In Australia she was married to her college sweetheart, Dr. Peter Martin Keller. Shortly after marriage they went to New Zealand, where they served for 19 years. During this time Dr. Keller was physician to the Maori royal family and became the first woman and first physician to be elected to the board of management of all hospitals in Auckland, although she was not a citizen of the country.

Upon returning to her homeland, Dr. Keller joined the faculty of the new College of Medical Evangelists. She spearheaded a campaign to raise funds to build the White Memorial Medical Center, which was officially opened in 1918. Many honors came to her during her 67 years as a physician and surgeon. At the age of 92, she was still doing surgery and seeing patients six days a week. She retired from active practice in 1967.

Kellogg, John Harvey

KELLOGG, JOHN HARVEY (1852—1943). Surgeon, inventor of surgical instruments, pioneer in physiotherapy and nutrition. He was born on a farm in Tyrone township in Livingston County, Michigan, one of 16 children. When he was young the family moved to Jackson, Michigan, and two years later to Battle Creek, Michigan, where the father established a broom factory. At 10 John worked in the broom factory, and at 12 he learned the printing business; at 14 he was proofreader, and at 16 a public school teacher. When he was 17 he attended high school one year and graduated. Early in life he exhibited boundless energy for work and for obtaining knowledge. From his boyhood he burned midnight oil. In 1873, encouraged by James and Ellen White to take a medical course, he enrolled as a student in Bellevue Hospital Medical College in New York. In his determination to acquire all the knowledge possible, he arranged with leading professors to give him private lessons in subjects not covered in the regular courses. It is said he spent more money for tutors than for tuition. In addition to his overcharged study program, he served as editor of the Health Reformer (later Good Health), a position he held throughout his life.

In 1876, shortly after having finished his two-year medical course, he was appointed superintendent of the Western Health Reform Institute in Battle Creek. This institution had been opened 10 years before in answer to a call from Ellen White that Seventh-day Adventists should provide “a home for the sick, where they could be treated for their diseases, and also learn how to take care of themselves so as to prevent sickness.”

The institution, although small at first, had already attracted considerable attention. Under the skillful management and the abounding enthusiasm of a young doctor it entered upon a new era of prosperity and expansion. In order to accommodate the rapidly growing list of patients, it soon became necessary to erect a large, modern well-equipped sanitarium and hospital building that sprouted wings and additional buildings as needed. When the institution burned to the ground in 1902, Kellogg immediately set about to erect a larger, more modern, and better-equipped sanitarium building. A School of Nursing was established and a large staff of qualified doctors was built up. Later he had a leading part in organizing the American Medical Missionary College, which began to function in 1895 and in which many SDA young people received their medical training. He himself made several trips to Europe to study surgery under the world’s most famous surgeons in London, Paris, Berlin, and Vienna. It was not long before he became known in the United States and across the seas as one of the ablest surgeons of his time. Rich and poor, high and low, including royalty, came from far and near to be treated by him. However, it was not surgery alone that gave the Battle Creek Sanitarium its universal favorable reputation; it was also adherence to principles set forth by Ellen White for its operation—proper diet, natural remedies, and simple treatments, with faithful, loving care. Dr. Kellogg did much in the development of therapeutic principles and methods.

Dr. Kellogg was a confirmed vegetarian and an enthusiastic advocate of the principles of health and temperance. It was he who invented the cornflakes and other dry cereal breakfast foods now available the world over. He also invented Protose and other meat substitutes. Furthermore, he was the inventor of the electric cabinet, numerous other electric appliances, and machines for the treatment of various ailments. Many of these instruments are now in use in hospitals around the world. He was fully as interested in preventive medicine as in the healing art. In teaching healthful living, he freely paid tribute to the principles set forth in the writings of Ellen White, principles that were being confirmed by the findings of scientific research.

In addition to being an able physician and a famous surgeon, he was also a great writer. He wrote more than 50 books, most of them large scientific works, and numerous articles for medical journals, besides serving as editor of Good Health. He was also an interesting and instructive lecturer on health and temperance and a good preacher. He was always in demand at camp meetings and other large gatherings.

Shortly after the turn of the century Dr. Kellogg came into conflict with the leaders of the General Conference over his attempt to get control of all SDA medical institutions with which he had been associated. He finally did succeed in getting control of the Battle Creek Sanitarium, the Battle Creek Food Company, and the health institution in Mexico. He also began teaching strange doctrines. His book The Living Temple was permeated with the principles of pantheism.

Everything was done to help him see his error. Ellen White worked with him personally and sent him many messages, but in vain. In 1907 he lost his membership in the church. Only a few intimate friends followed him.

In 1927, some years after the break and against the instruction he had received, he and his associates built a mammoth addition to the Battle Creek Sanitarium and in so doing involved the institution in an indebtedness running into millions of dollars.

The depression that broke upon the United States in 1929 threw the institution into great financial perplexity, resulting ultimately in bankruptcy. When the United States became involved in World War II, an opportunity came in 1942 to the receivers to sell the institution to the government for an amount sufficient to meet all obligations and leave to the sanitarium corporation a surplus of funds.

The sanitarium business was moved across the street into smaller buildings that the corporation held. Conflicts soon arose over the true ownership of the surplus funds received from the sale of the large building. The conflict climaxed in a lawsuit, instigated by the doctor against the Seventh-day Adventist Church and its leaders, which was ultimately settled by a division of certain assets between the sanitarium corporation and the General Conference corporation. This resulted in about $650,000 being reverted to the church.

Dr. Kellogg took a great interest in the welfare of children and young people. He and his wife had no children of their own, but they provided the funds for the education of many young people, virtually rearing 40 boys and girls, and adopting many of them.

From his earliest connection with the organized work of the church, Dr. Kellogg manifested a deep interest in starting and developing new health institutions and treatment rooms in different parts of America and across the seas. On at least two occasions he was sent to Europe to help the leaders there establish medical institutions in their fields.

During his connection with the church Dr. Kellogg doubtless did as much as any man in the denomination, if not more, to bring the name and work of Seventh-day Adventists favorably before the world. Had he remained loyal, he could have continued as a mighty tower of strength. Many hoped and prayed that he would return. At times he seemed friendly. At his invitation the General Conference Executive Committee held its Autumn Councils in the Battle Creek Sanitarium in the years 1926, 1932, 1933, 1934, 1937, and 1941. He passed away in his Battle Creek home, Dec. 14, 1943, without having returned to the church.

Kellogg, John Preston

KELLOGG, JOHN PRESTON (1807—1881). Cofounder of institutions. The father of Dr. Merritt Kellogg; Dr. John Harvey Kellogg; Will K. Kellogg, the cornflake king; and 13 other children. At the age of 29 he settled on a farm in a pioneer settlement in Tyrone township, Livingston County, Michigan. Being religiously inclined, he took the lead in arranging with his neighbors for calling a minister and establishing a place of meeting.

In 1852, while Kellogg was raking hay, a neighbor, M. E. Cornell, a young Adventist minister, who had just learned about the seventh-day Sabbath from Joseph Bates, leaped over the fence, and poured out the joyful news to him. Going to hear Bates, Kellogg became fully convinced and gladly accepted the Adventist message. From that moment he always manifested a deep interest in the progress of the Adventist movement. He became a strong pillar in the young movement and a liberal contributor to its many growing needs.

In 1855 Kellogg together with Henry Lyon, Dan Palmer, and Cyrenius Smith provided a fund of $1,200 for the purchase of ground and the erection of a building to house the Review and Herald publishing work, which they proposed should be moved from its rented quarters in Rochester, New York, to Battle Creek, Michigan. This proposal was gladly accepted by James White and his associates. It was the first step toward anchoring the headquarters of the denomination in the city of Battle Creek.

At a conference held in Battle Creek May 20, 1856, Kellogg was appointed a member of a committee of five, of which he was made treasurer, to manage the tent operations in the state of Michigan. At the same gathering he was made a member of a committee of three to manage the affairs of the newly established publishing house. In this capacity he served until May 1861, when he became one of the incorporators of the Seventh-day Adventist Publishing Association and served on the board of trustees till 1863.

In 1867 Kellogg joined nine others in signing articles of incorporation for the Health Reform Institute (later known as the Battle Creek Sanitarium), which had been opened in September 1866. He headed the list with the largest subscription—$500—to its capital stock. He was elected a member of the board of directors and served in that capacity until 1869.

Because of increasing infirmity, the later years of Kellogg's life were spent in comparative retirement. To the end, which came May 10, 1881, he maintained a sustaining trust in God and an abiding confidence in the faith he had espoused nearly 30 years before.

Kellogg, Merritt Gardner

KELLOGG, MERRITT GARDNER (1832—1922). Physician, missionary. He was the oldest son of John P. Kellogg. Accepting the Adventist faith at the age of 20, he became active in the organization of the Battle Creek Sabbath school and was elected its first superintendent. In 1859 he moved to California, being probably the first Seventh-day Adventist in the state. In 1861 he gave a course of lectures in San Francisco and baptized 14 converts. In 1867 he returned to the East and took a short medical course at Troll's Hygieo-Therapeutic College in New Jersey. At the General Conference session in May 1868 he made a stirring appeal for workers to be sent to California. In response, J. N. Loughborough and D. T. Bourdeau were sent. The doctor joined these two men in their evangelistic campaigns, speaking especially on health subjects. It was with considerable satisfaction that he was able to report to the General Conference that the work in California was self-supporting.

In 1870, when he and Loughborough were conducting evangelistic meetings in Bloomfield, California, an epidemic of smallpox broke out. They immediately closed their meetings and went to work caring for the sick, using water treatments and diet. Kellogg lost only one patient, an infant, out of 11 cases, while another doctor using drugs lost four out of five. This experience gave the doctor and his drugless treatments a high standing in California. His work for the next six years was largely evangelistic. In 1877 and 1878 he helped to establish the Rural Health Retreat, later St. Helena Sanitarium, near St. Helena, California. As soon as doctors with more advanced training were available he withdrew in their favor.

In 1893 the General Conference sent Kellogg out to the South Sea Islands as a medical missionary. He sailed on the mission ship Pitcairn on her second trip and worked on several of the islands in the Tonga group. Later he was in Australia, where he designed and superintended the building of the Sydney Sanitarium.

Returning to America from Australia in 1903, he made his home in Healdsburg, California, and resided there the rest of his days. Because of failing sight and hearing, most of the last 19 years of his life were spent in retirement.

Kellogg, Will Keith

KELLOGG, WILL KEITH (1860—1951). Cornflakes manufacturer. He was born in Battle Creek, Michigan, the seventh son of John P. Kellogg, and brother of Drs. M. G. and J. H. Kellogg. From his boyhood he worked in his father's broom factory, and at 14 was traveling salesperson for the company. At 19 he was asked by James White to go to Texas to manage a broom factory that White and George King had set up in Dallas.

In 1879 Kellogg returned to Battle Creek. In 1880 he finished a business course in Kalamazoo, Michigan, married, and entered the employ of the Battle Creek Sanitarium, of which his brother, Dr. J. H. Kellogg, was the medical superintendent. For the next 25 years Will was connected with this institution, filling various positions, from janitor to business manager. This was the time during which the doctor invented and developed numerous health foods, including cornflakes. The original idea came from the doctor, but it fell to the lot of Will Kellogg to carry on the research and the experiments required to perfect a food that would be palatable and wholesome. The production of these foods was carried on as a department of the sanitarium, and was primarily for the patients, with no thought of developing it into a commercial enterprise. But as former patients sent in orders for the health foods, the business grew to such proportions that the erection of a factory became a necessity. When the sanitarium board refused to launch out in the heavy expense involved, Dr. J. H. Kellogg decided to go into business for himself and established the Sanitas Food Company. The sanitarium continued to handle the old line of foods and retained the profits from them, while the doctor received the profits accruing from his new venture.

To the many duties already carried by Will Kellogg was now added the work of business manager of the Sanitas Food Company. In lieu of salary, he was granted 25 percent of the profits from the new enterprise. In 1899, when the Sanitas Food Company was incorporated, Will was given a written contract confirming the arrangement.

However, the two brothers began to differ radically regarding the operation of the food business. There were frequent serious misunderstandings, until at the age of 46 Will Kellogg decided to part company with his older brother. He bought from him the patent right to manufacture and sell cornflakes, and on Feb. 19, 1906, the Battle Creek Toasted Corn Flake Company was incorporated. Funds being scarce, the new enterprise started operation in a "shanty" on Bartlett Street. But with hard work, wise management, and liberal advertising the business grew rapidly into a large, prosperous affair. With two expanding businesses operating virtually side by side, the two brothers soon found themselves in conflict with each other. Each instituted court proceedings against the other. Legal battles dragged on for years, and the courts finally decided in favor of Will. On the proposal of John, Will agreed to waive all claims for damages, whereas the doctor paid all the legal expenses for both sides, which amounted to $225,000.

Under the driving energy and the wise management of Will Kellogg, his cornflake business grew to fabulous proportions. In addition to the enormous plant in Battle Creek and three other factories in the United States, the company established plants in Canada, Australia, England, South Africa, and Mexico, with branches in other lands. Will Kellogg became a multimillionaire.

Instead of leaving all his wealth to his heirs, Will Kellogg in 1930 set up a foundation, the main purpose of which was “the promotion of the health, education, and welfare of mankind, but principally of children and youth.” Commenting on this humanitarian act, Time magazine in its issue of Dec. 8, 1930, said: “Will Keith Kellogg . . . again belied the general impression that he is a dour moneymaker. He created the W. K. Kellogg Foundation, gave it $1,000,000 for immediate use and promised for it a total of $50,000,000 if and when needed.” In 1956 it was reported that this foundation had assisted more than 1,500 projects on three continents with a total expenditure of nearly $50 million. The annual grants at that time approximated $4 million.

In his youth Will Kellogg had become a member of the Seventh-day Adventist church in Battle Creek, but soon after his marriage he discontinued church attendance. When he finally was dropped from the membership list, he said the church could hardly do otherwise, seeing that he had not attended services in his own or any other church for 27 years. Although he did not frequent the church, he remained loyal to its principles of health and temperance. Although the food company, of which he was the principal stockholder, operated on the Sabbath, he claimed he personally kept the Sabbath. In his home the household servants were urged to have all preparations made before the setting of the sun Friday evening. He believed in God and had no sympathy with the atheists and pantheists of his time.

In his declining years, especially after he lost his sight in 1941, he spent much time on his expansive estate near Pomona, California, but the last few months of his long life were spent in his beloved hometown, Battle Creek, where his ashes were buried in Oak Hill Cemetery.

Kellogg-Mookerjee Memorial Seminary

KELLOGG-MOOKERJEE MEMORIAL SEMINARY. A coeducational boarding school on the junior high school level, at Jalirpar, a village on the Lower Ganges in Bangladesh, operated by the South Bangladesh Mission. The school is situated on a 22.5-acre (nine-hectare) tract, much of which is used for agricultural purposes.

The school is named in honor of Grace Kellogg Mookerjee, an early American teacher at the school, and her husband, L. G. Mookerjee, the pioneer worker in Bengal. The present enrollment of the Kellogg-Mookerjee Memorial Seminary is 475. The faculty consists of 22 members.

This school is a successor to the Gopalganj Boys' School opened in 1920 at Gopalganj, the first Seventh-day Adventist mission in Bangladesh, in a town situated on the Madhumati River in Faridpur District, East Bengal (Bangladesh), by Mookerjee, the superintendent of the field. In 1929 Dr. C. F. Schilling, who came to Gopalganj to open medical work, took charge of the school. Soon thereafter, when a Bengali girls' school was transferred from Hooghly, near Calcutta, to Gopalganj, the school became coeducational.

In 1931 the school was made a full high school under the direction of LeRoy Hunter.

H. H. Mattison came in 1938, and the next year the school was transferred from Gopalganj to Jalirpar, 18 miles (30 kilometers) away on the Madaripur-Madhupati Canal, exchanging places with a hospital that had been established there in 1931 (see Gopalganj Hospital). The vacated Jalirpar Hospital building provided school and dormitory accommodation. On its new campus it was known first as Jalirpar Secondary Boarding School; then, since 1946, as the Kellogg-Mookerjee Memorial Seminary.

A building program begun in 1957 provided a boys' dormitory, a girls' dormitory, a chapel, kitchen, press building, industrial building, and four duplex homes for teachers. All the buildings are of brick construction.

In recent years capital developments have taken place. A new chapel building has been built, a three-story boys' dormitory was constructed, and a two-story orphanage center was built. It is presently accommodating 118 orphans.

A bakery has also been added along with a storage building and staff quarters. In addition, two shallow pumps were installed for school drinking water and for irrigation.

Kendu Adventist Hospital

KENDU ADVENTIST HOSPITAL. A 164-bed general hospital situated three miles (five kilometers) from Kendu Bay on Lake Victoria, in Kenya. Owned and operated by the East African Union, it ministers to the medical needs of the Luo and Kisii peoples, who live principally in the thickly populated South Nyanza district of Kenya.

In 1974 the staff consisted of three doctors and five to seven European nurses, besides the following Africans: eight medical assistants, one laboratory technician, four midwives, one accountant, and one African business manager. Medical, surgical, and obstetrical services are provided, with X-ray, laboratory, and some physiotherapy facilities.

In 1993 the staff consisted of four doctors, 50 enrolled nurses, eight registered nurses, 23 medical assistants, two laboratory assistants, two technicians, two technician assistants, two accountants, one X-ray technician, and two physiotherapists.

The hospital provides general medical, surgical, pediatric, and obstetrical services. Outreach programs include maternal child care and immunization, family planning, and AIDS prevention education. Evangelistic activities are carried on through the chaplain's office.

In 1948 a medical assistants' course was started. This course has been changed to a nursing course. From 1984 the school has been training enrolled community nurses recognized by the Kenya's Nurses and Midwives Council. The present enrollment is about 16 students a year. In addition, the hospital has entered into affiliation with the University of Eastern Africa Baraton to provide a clinical facility for the B.S.N. of the University. It is hoped that this association will be expanded and upgraded.

Kendu Adventist Hospital School of Nursing graduates serve in many parts of the country and even in other countries of East and Central Africa. The hospital in the past has operated several dispensaries, but these are now managed under Seventh-day Adventist Rural Health Services.

Kendu Hospital was planned when G.A.S. Madgwick, of England, arrived at Gendia Station to pioneer the medical work in 1921. Pending the erection of suitable buildings at Gendia, he went to Kanyadoto Station for two years. By the time Dr. Madgwick returned from furlough in 1925, the builder, F. Solway, had made good progress and the hospital opened shortly as the Kenya Hospital. (The name was changed a few years later to Kendu Hospital.) The first nurses, Karen Nielsen and Carentze Olsen, both from Skodsborg Sanitarium in Denmark, arrived in December 1925. Both gave more than 25 years of service to Kendu Hospital and other medical centers in East Africa.

The most common medical problems at Kendu Hospital are malaria, bilharzia, gastroenteritis, and other parasitic infestations, as well as malnutrition. Tuberculosis, tetanus, and meningitis are still common, and measles is endemic. Because the old superstitions and African medicines have lost much of their grip on the people, modern medical care is generally accepted and appreciated. A small leprosarium was operated for a number of years but was closed for lack of space.

Most of the time there has been one doctor, but since 1966 there have been generally at least two doctors, and at times three, on the staff. With the arrival of a doctor couple in 1971, it has been possible to have three full-time doctors serving the hospital. Much credit must be given to the Africans who have served at the Kendu Hospital. An ordained African chaplain provides for the spiritual needs of the patients.

Kendu Adventist Hospital has added to its compound a hospital airstrip, a 30-bed maternity ward, female and private wards, administrative offices, a new laboratory, and a large warehouse or store for medicines and supplies. The old maternity ward was renovated into a new school and library. Many patients are served through the outpatient clinic, which operates every day except Sabbath. Prenatal, well-baby, and family planning clinics are held every week.

History

History. Beginnings of the Work in the Area. Apparently the first Seventh-day Adventist minister to preach in what is now the Southern Union Conference was Elbert B. Lane, who was sent in March 1871 to Edgefield Junction, Tennessee, a few miles north of Nashville, to visit and baptize a small group of converts won through reading SDA publications. His reports in the Review and Herald (May 2, 1871, and later) tell how he held public meetings in the railroad station, the White listeners occupying one room and the Black another; as the crowd grew they used the freight room and the platform.

Before leaving the state in May, Lane had baptized five and had others interested. By autumn a letter from R. K. McCune describes the group as consisting of four White families and one Black preacher (a Baptist, convinced by reading after Lane's departure). Two years later Lane returned for a short time, baptized seven, and organized a church of 13 in May 1873. (It was at Edgefield Junction in the 1880s that the first Black Seventh-day Adventist church was organized. See South Central Conference.)

The earliest recorded evangelistic meetings in Kentucky began also in 1871, with the visit of Squier Osborn, who later became the first president of the Kentucky and Tennessee Conference. Osborn, a native Kentuckian living in Iowa, and not yet ordained, held meetings in his home county of Greenup, at Springville, Kentucky, across the river from Portsmouth, Ohio. About the beginning of 1872 he was joined for a month by J. Hare (both were commissioned by the Iowa Conference). Osborn left 11 converts by April 1. (The Springville, Kentucky, church was organized in 1874.) D. T. Bourdeau, sent by the General Conference at the same time, visited Hardin County, Kentucky, south of Louisville, where contacts had been made by J. B. Brown of California. Bourdeau's frequent reports from Nolin and Locust Grove tell of his 65 lectures in three places, from January through May 1872; of his visits in the homes; of his debate with an opposing preacher; and of the little Sabbath school begun at Locust Grove. A year later Osborn held meetings at Locust Grove, baptized seven, and organized the first Seventh-day Adventist church in Kentucky (1873).

Kentucky and Tennessee Conference (1876—1879). The first conference organization, set up in 1876 with S. Osborn as president, was the Kentucky and Tennessee Conference, which lasted only three years.

Kentucky Conference and Tennessee Conference (1879—1889). The two-state combination was divided in 1879 into two conferences, with Osborn as president in Kentucky and G. K. Owen in Tennessee. However, Owen moved to Michigan soon after. Until his successor, Samuel Fulton, came in 1882, Osborn visited the Tennessee Conference occasionally and acted as president pro tem.

On one of these Tennessee trips, in 1881, Osborn reports visiting the Cross Plains, Edgefield Junction, Ridge, and Springville churches. This Springville, Tennessee, church, which had been organized as a result of Owen's evangelistic meetings in 1878 (and which was later moved to nearby Mount Vista, then to Parvo, and in 1935 to Paris), was soon to receive widespread attention in the press. Beginning in 1885, an intermittent series of prosecutions of SDAs, under the state Sunday law, during the eighties and nineties involved nearly every man in the Springville church. A number of these men were convicted and sentenced to fines or imprisonment, and in some instances to road labor on the chain gang. Several of these Springville cases, and notably that of R. M. King in another county, resulted in winning public sympathy for the accused. The obvious prejudice of the complainants, the character of the defendants, and the reputation of several of the attorneys who defended them combined to draw nationwide attention to the principles of religious liberty and church-state separation. From this Springville-Paris church came three foreign missionaries.

In 1882 Kentucky had two ordained ministers, two licensed ministers, and five churches, with 84 members; Tennessee had one ordained minister, three licensed ministers, and five churches, with 54 members.

In those days an evangelist sometimes faced not only legal but physical opposition. For example, when S. Fulton, president of the Tennessee Conference, held meetings in 1883 in the Leach community, a rural area 25 miles (40 kilometers) east of Jackson, Tennessee, opposers burned down his tent and threatened him with bodily harm. Undaunted, he continued preaching in the open air. Friends came with a volunteer guard of 12 armed men, gave offerings for a new tent, and built a log church. Two months later he held the Tennessee camp meeting there in the new tent, and organized a church. From this organization came one of the early conference presidents, W. R. Burrow.

In 1887 churches were organized in Bowling Green, Kentucky, and in Lane, Tennessee, where a church school was opened in 1891.

Tennessee River Conference and Cumberland (Mission and) Conference (1889—1908). The Tennessee River Conference, organized in 1889 with E. E. Marvin as its first president, included, roughly, the western half of both Kentucky and Tennessee. The eastern half of both states became the Cumberland Mission, administered by the Southern District of the General Conference. In 1891 the Tennessee River Conference had two ministers, seven scattered churches, and 172 members, while the Cumberland Mission had two ordained ministers, one licentiate, and two churches, with 37 members. In 1900 this mission became the Cumberland Conference, and in 1901 these two conferences became members of the new Southern Union Conference. In 1900 the Tennessee River Conference reported two ordained and four licensed ministers, 13 churches, and 400 members, while the Cumberland Conference reported a similar staff, with six churches and 400 members. The boundary between them was the western line of the Kentucky counties of Bullitt, Nelson, LaRue, Green, Metcalfe, and Monroe, and the Tennessee counties of Clay, Jackson, Putnam, White, Warren, Grundy, and Marion.

The Tennessee River Conference organized churches during this period at Trezevant (1889), Memphis (1895), Nashville (1895), Madison (1906), and Jackson (1906) in Tennessee, and at Sand Hill in Kentucky (1897). Between 1897 and 1908 churches were reported as being organized in Lexington (1901 or after), Louisville (1905); the Grove church was organized (1907), seven miles (11 kilometers) from Kings Mountain, Kentucky, in the Cumberland Conference.

Nashville, Tennessee, where there were Seventh-day Adventists as early as 1881, was destined to become an institutional center. About the turn of the century J. E. White made it the headquarters for his river steamer Morning Star and his Southern Missionary Society, through which he conducted work among Blacks, also for his Gospel Herald Publishing Company, which was soon to become part of the nucleus of the Southern Publishing Association. Near Nashville, under Ellen White's personal direction, E. A. Sutherland and P. T. Magan in 1906 founded the educational and medical institutions that became Madison Sanitarium and Madison College. Near Nashville also later was founded the Riverside Sanitarium and Hospital, an all-Black hospital.

Kentucky Conference and Tennessee River Conference (1908—1932). In 1908 another change in conferences took place. To form the Kentucky Conference, western Kentucky (except eight counties in the southwest) was taken from the Tennessee River Conference, and eastern Kentucky from the Cumberland Conference. (Then the Cumberland Conference, reduced to east Tennessee alone, became part of the Southeastern Union Conference, which was separated from the Southern Union from that year until 1932; see Georgia-Cumberland Conference.)

The Tennessee River Conference was left with 15 churches and 408 members. The new Kentucky Conference, organized in February 1908, with A. O. Burrill as president, had 14 churches and 263 members, with the conference office in Louisville. One small change came in 1909 when three Tennessee counties (De Kalb, Smith, and Macon) were transferred to the Cumberland Conference, thus leaving the eastern boundary of the Tennessee River Conference at the eastern line of Sumner, Trousdale, Wilson, Cannon, Coffee, and Franklin counties. Another change, in 1922, added six Kentucky counties (Trigg, Christian, Todd, Logan, Simpson, and Allen) to the Tennessee River Conference.

Churches organized in the Kentucky Conference during this period (1908—1932) included those of Sewellton (1915), which became in 1962 the Jamestown church; Belcher (1919); Covington (1919); Hill Top (about 1912), later disbanded and organized as the Stearns church (1922); Pewee Valley (1925), meeting in the Pewee Valley Sanitarium; and Ashland (1925). Churches organized in this period by the Tennessee River Conference included, in Kentucky: Paducah (1915); in Tennessee: Fountain Head (1907, now Highland, in connection with what are now Highland Hospital and Highland Academy); Lawrenceburg (1912); Bordeaux (1919); Murfreesboro (1923); and Dyersburg (1929).

Kentucky-Tennessee Conference. In 1932—the year in which the Southeastern and Southern Union conferences were reunited—the Kentucky Conference and the Tennessee River Conference were combined to form the Kentucky-Tennessee Conference, with headquarters at Nashville and C. L. Butterfield as the first president. This conference, including all of Kentucky and the western portion of Tennessee, began with 2,562 members, 43 churches, 10 ordained ministers, and four licensed ministers. In 10 years, by 1942, the membership grew to 4,326 (a yearly average increase of 168), with 54 churches (five composed of Black members, totaling 645) and 18 ordained ministers (four of whom served the Black Department). The tithe for 1932 was $41,262; the yearly tithe doubled in five years, and by 1943 was $196,064.

The conference lost about 600 members in 1946 in connection with the formation, in most of the union conferences of North America, of self-administered conferences composed of the Black congregations. The five Black churches in the Kentucky-Tennessee Conference joined the new South Central Conference, one of two such “regional” conferences covering the territory of the Southern Union.

This left the Kentucky-Tennessee Conference with 46 churches, 3,808 members, and 18 ordained ministers at the close of 1946. Ten years later it had 71 churches, 34 ordained ministers, 15 licensed ministers, 46 church school teachers, 21 colporteurs, and a membership of 5,338. The tithe for 1956 was $547,470. The year 1962 closed with these statistics: tithe, $738,851; 77 churches; 6,333 members; 32 ordained ministers; seven licensed ministers; 38 teachers; and 16 full-time colporteurs. At the end of 1992 these statistics were reported: tithe, $6,867,484.93; 79 churches; 10,681 members; 40 ordained ministers; seven licensed ministers; 53 teachers; and 10 full-time literature evangelists.

Later Developments. In 1945 the conference office in Nashville was moved from the corner of 24th Avenue, North, and Seifried Street to 3208 West End Avenue, and in 1959 to three and a half miles north of Madison, Tennessee.

Also in 1959 the conference bought 34.5 acres (14 hectares) for a youth camp on Center Hill Lake, about six miles (10 kilometers) northwest of Smithville, Tennessee, in De Kalb County (which, with several other border counties, was transferred to the Kentucky-Tennessee Conference territory; see beginning paragraph of this article for the boundaries). Four permanent camp buildings were finished by 1963. During the following 10 years 24 permanent buildings were added, which include a chapel, gymnasium, and a home for the camp ranger.

In 1967 the Adventist Book Center erected a new building on the campus near Madison Academy and Madison Hospital.

In 1979 the conference office moved from Gallatin Road in Madison to its present location in Goodlettsville, Tennessee. Twenty-nine new church buildings have been built since 1974, and the youth camp has been provided with a home for the camp director, with guest rooms on the lower level, a cafeteria with additional guest rooms, laundry, and staff lounge, and a swimming pool.

The Adventist Book Center moved its location next door to the conference office.

Kenya

KENYA. An East African republic, formerly a British protectorate and colony but independent since December 1963. The country is bounded on the north by Ethiopia and Sudan, on the east by Somalia and the Indian Ocean, on the south by Tanzania, and on the west by Uganda. The equator crosses it, yet the 17,000-foot (5,180-meter) Mount Kenya, lying a few miles south of the equator, is covered with perpetual ice and snow. It has an area of 224,960 square miles (582,650 square kilometers), and a population (1994) of 28.2 million, the majority of whom are Christians.

Agriculture is the principal occupation of Kenya's people, the principal domestic crops being maize and beans. Large quantities of tea, coffee, sisal, pyrethrum, and cashew nuts are exported annually.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. The first Seventh-day Adventist missionary to Kenya was Canadian-born A. A. Carscallen, who arrived from Britain in 1906. With the assistance of E. C. Enns, a German missionary from Pare in Tanzania, he chose as the site for the first mission station a five-acre (two-hectare) plot at Gendia Hill, about two miles (three kilometers) inland from Kendu Bay of Lake Victoria. This site was among the Luo people in what is now South Nyanza.

Working with Carscallen was Peter Nyambo, a Seventh-day Adventist worker originally from Malawi who had come with him from England. Within 14 months Carscallen reported that he had erected the basic mission buildings and had learned the Luo language, which had never before been reduced to writing. Later, he made a Luo translation of the Gospel of Matthew, which was accepted for publication in 1913 by the British and Foreign Bible Society of London.

In 1907 Carscallen was joined by J. D. Baker and his wife, who in 1909 opened a new station about 15 miles (25 kilometers) from Gendia. On May 21, 1911, the first 10 Luo believers were baptized. In 1912 four new stations were opened. At Nyanchwa Mission I. R. Evanson began work among the Kisii people. Records indicate that the work was difficult and no real impact had been made by the time World War I closed the station. After the war L.E.A. Lane, assisted by a Luo worker, Yakobo Olwa, reopened the station and built a school. Not until 1922 were the first two Kisii baptized. Later, the work in Kisii expanded rapidly. Paulo Nyamweya, one of the early converts, became the first African worker in Kenya to become a mission station director.

The Karungu Mission Station was opened by E. B. Phillips of England at a former government administrative post on Lake Victoria. Because the climate of the region was unhealthful and the population was decreasing, the station was soon closed, the buildings dismantled, and the materials used to build the Kanyadoto Mission, from which the work in the Karungu area was then cared for.

Work began at Kanyadoto in 1912 when a layman, J. H. Sparks, camped and preached under a large fig tree until land could be secured and temporary buildings erected. Mariko Otieno, a Luo worker, assisted in the early years at Kanyadoto, and in 1914 A. A. Matter and his wife, and Swiss workers, came to take charge. A. Watson opened work on the island of Rusinga in Lake Victoria. In 1913 Carscallen moved some 40 miles (65 kilometers) inland, southeast of Gendia, and opened the Kamagambo Station and was assisted for a short time by D. E. Delhove.

When the Germans invaded South Nyanza during World War I, the missionaries were evacuated to a camp near the Kaimosi Station of the Society of Friends, not far from Kisumu. None of the missionaries except Matter and Carscallen got back to their stations before 1916. When they did, they found the stations had been thoroughly looted and the buildings badly damaged. The large house at Gendia had caught fire while occupied by the military. The missionaries, many with furloughs long overdue, set about the uphill task of rebuilding and of recovering their scattered flocks.

Chaotic conditions following the end of the war prevented sending out replacements before 1920. In that year a large group of fresh recruits were sent from Britain to relieve the tired veterans. There were 10 in the first group, led by W. T. Bartlett. Of them Bartlett and W. H. Matthews stayed at Gendia, which served as headquarters; E. A. Beavon went to Nyanchwa Mission; W. W. Armstrong to Kanyadoto; S. G. Maxwell to Kamagambo; T. G. Belton to Wire Hill Station. All were faced with an urgent rebuilding program. Before leaving Kenya, Carscallen handed over to Bartlett detailed maps showing the location of the various missions in Kenya and Western Tanzania.

Another group of new missionaries arrived in 1921, among them Dr. G.A.S. Madgwick, who in 1925 opened the Kendu Hospital about two miles (three kilometers) from Gendia Mission. E. R. Warland went first to Kanyadoto, later to Kamagambo. Also in this second group were Mrs. Bartlett and her daughter, Margery, who taught at Gendia, and Grace Clarke, who went first to Wire Hill, then to Kamagambo to build a girls' school. Miss Clarke developed a proficiency in Luo and Swahili that enabled her later to make a valuable contribution as a translator.

Prior to 1930 little had been done outside an area around Lake Victoria, but in 1933 the Karura Station was opened near Nairobi, with W. W. Armstrong as the first director. This became a base for work among the two principal tribes of Central Kenya, the Kikuyu and the Kamba. In 1934 W.C.S. Raitt, sent to begin work on the coast of Kenya, opened the Changamwe Station, near Mombasa, close to the main Mombasa-Nairobi road two and a half miles (four kilometers) from the center of the city. Work in this predominantly Muslim area developed slowly, as it did among the Kikuyu and Kamba peoples, but a number of churches and companies were established.

During 1930 to 1935 a number of new workers went to Kenya, among them C.T.J. Hyde, who worked first at Kendu Hospital, later at the Kamagambo school; and Jean Schuil, who gave nearly 20 years to the work of training teachers at Kamagambo.

Education. From the first, Seventh-day Adventist missionaries in Kenya, as elsewhere in Southern Africa, sought to build a strong school system, believing that literacy was necessary to develop strong church members and trained workers to care for them. The central stations developed schools offering up to five or six years' education, which were fed by numerous two- or three-grade "bush" schools. During the late 1920s Kamagambo Training School (now Kamagambo High School and Teachers' College) was made the teacher training center for SDA work in Kenya. This training program received government recognition, its graduates sitting for government examinations before being sent out as teacher-evangelists. Schools for girls were established at Kamagambo, Nyanchwa, and Karura.

Hundreds of teachers went out to establish village schools, most of which clustered around the principal missions, which were concentrated in South Nyanza, bordering the lake. The typical schoolhouse was the place of worship on the Sabbath day for the village church, and the teacher of the school usually served as the leader of the company.

In 1947 the European constituency in East Africa, whose children were attending public schools, requested a church school to be established in Nairobi. The school (since 1962 called the Maxwell Preparatory School) was opened in 1949 with a hostel for boarders. Currently it is divided into Maxwell Adventist Preparatory School (elementary) and Maxwell Adventist Academy.

Problem of Government Aid. Government grants-in-aid were offered to managers of these SDA schools in the district of South Nyanza. These funds came from the annual tax levied on every male, for the government operated no schools, finding it more economical to make cash gifts to the missions that provided education for the indigenous inhabitants. This was a common practice of the British in various parts of the empire.

The grants-in-aid were of two kinds: (1) capital, available to directors of the larger missions for providing buildings and other educational facilities; and (2) recurring, made on behalf of all certificated teachers working in mission schools in Kenya, European and African alike.

The system eventually created problems. As the government wage scale rose rapidly, particularly after World War II, it became difficult to explain why a young man just out of school should receive considerably more than the mission could pay an experienced pastor. Probably more serious was the result that many of the teachers, in view of the source of their salaries, came to regard themselves as government rather than mission employees.

The pros and cons of accepting government aid were debated in Kenya church committees for more than two decades. The problem was also considered by the Southern African Division committee, which finally decided that no SDA organization should accept further government financial assistance for educational purposes after 1956 (this did not exclude grants made for medical work).

The results were far-reaching. SDA missions in Kenya entered upon an extremely difficult time. The East African Union did not have funds to operate the schools that had been receiving the grant. Many of them were either turned over to other mission societies or operated as independent African schools, the teachers continuing to receive salaries from the local government. Some of the teachers remained faithful to the church; others did not.

More recently the church members in the South Nyanza, Kisii, Migori, and Nyamira districts (which comprises a majority of the Kenya Seventh-day Adventist constituency) advocated a return to the practice of receiving government grants for educational work. After careful consultation with higher authorities, the union voted its approval as from 1962. This, however, did not apply to schools on central Kenya mission stations.

Organization and Growth. Originally the mission stations in Kenya, in what was then British East Africa, were under the sponsorship of the British Union Conference. From 1909 to 1912 the Yearbook lists the British East African Mission as “under the direction of the General Conference Committee in Europe,” from 1912 to 1918 as part of the European Division, from 1918 to 1923 as part of the British Union.

In 1921 Kenya became part of the East African Combined Mission, with headquarters at Gendia Mission Station, Kenya. In 1924 Kenya is listed in the East African Union Mission, which after the formation of the Northern European Division in 1928 became a part of that. In the 1934 Yearbook four Kenya missions are listed; in 1938 there were five missions composing the Kenya Union Mission, with S. G. Maxwell as president; thereafter headquarters were in Nairobi.

Since World War II made it difficult for the Northern European Division to administer the East Africa missions, these were transferred in 1941 to the Southern African Division. In 1943 a new East African Union emerged, which included Kenya, with H. M. Sparrow as president. Headquarters were in Kisumu, a town central to SDA work in Kenya, then from 1950 in Nairobi.

With the continued growth of membership it was decided in 1953 to set up once more field organizations within Kenya much as it had been when Kenya was a union. These were South Kenya (Kisii, Masai), Kenya Lake (Luo), and Central Kenya (areas outside of Nyanza province); in 1961 another field was formed known as the Ranen Field, also in Luo, Kuria, and Abasuba country.

Today African workers are carrying most of the work and also holding executive positions. In November 1972 D. K. Bazarra was appointed the first national president of the East African Union. Now all of the Kenya fields are administered by African presidents.

In 1981 the Western Kenya Field was organized, serving the Luhyas and Kalenjins of the Western Province of Kenya. In 1981 the South Kenya Field was organized into the South Kenya Conference. In 1986 the Kenya Coast Field was organized to serve the tribes of the Coast and North Eastern provinces. In 1989 the Central Kenya Field was organized into Central Kenya Conference. In 1990 the North Nyanza Field was organized to serve the Luo people.

Keough, G. Arthur

KEOUGH, G. ARTHUR (1909—1989). Educator, administrator, missionary. Born in Cairo, Egypt, he served the church for 57 years on four continents. He founded Middle East College and later served as its president. He was the author of four books, several adult Sabbath school lesson quarterlies, and numerous articles.

In 1981 he was awarded the Citation of Excellence from the General Conference, one of the highest honors given to any Seventh-day Adventist educator. In his last position he served in the Religion Department of Columbia Union College. Upon retirement, he was named professor emeritus.

Keough, George D.

KEOUGH, GEORGE D. (1882—1971). Missionary and educator. A native of Crieff, Scotland, he entered the ministry in South England in 1905. Three years later he answered a call to mission service in Egypt. He mastered the Arabic language, and for the next 21 years he worked for the Muslims. In 1929 the Keoughs returned to England, where he taught Bible at Newbold College until 1937, when he was sent again to work another five years among the Arabic-speaking people.

When plans were laid for the preparation of missionaries for Islam, he was called to the Theological Seminary in Washington, where he taught Arabic and Bible from 1942 to 1946. At this time he returned once more to the Middle East to care for the newly established Voice of Prophecy organization in Beirut, Lebanon. Retiring in 1955, he returned to Britain and again taught at Newbold, continuing until 1965.

Kern, Milton Earl

KERN, MILTON EARL (1875—1961). Educator and youth leader. He was educated at Union College, Lincoln, Nebraska, and in 1900 married Florence Pierce.

For four years, from 1900 to 1904, Kern was head of the Bible and history departments at Union College, and because of his promotion of student missionary activities he was appointed secretary of the young people's department of the Central Union Conference in 1904, the first young people's secretary in the denomination. He had previously organized a "Young People's Society of Christian Service" in response to appeals from Ellen White to provide missionary opportunities for the youth of the church (1893).

At a General Conference Council held in Switzerland in 1907, when the Young People's Department of the General Conference was set up, Kern became the first chair, with Matilda Erickson as secretary. Later in the year at Mount Vernon, Ohio, the new organization was named the Young People's Missionary Volunteer Department, and Kern became its first secretary.

From 1910 to 1914 Kern was also president of the Foreign Mission Seminary (now Columbia Union College) at Washington. During the 1920s he spent most of his time overseas building the Missionary Volunteer Societies. In 1922, when the Home Commission was established by the General Conference Kern became chair. He was elected associate secretary (1930), then secretary (1933), of the General Conference.

In 1933 he entered another phase of his lifework when he was made dean of the Advanced Bible School. When in 1936 this school became the Seventh-day Adventist Theological Seminary (later a part of Andrews University), he became its first president. In 1943 he became field secretary of the General Conference and president of the board of trustees of the Ellen White Publications. He retired in 1950, remembered as the pioneer head of the youth movement in the Seventh-day Adventist Church.

Ketring, Herman Feaster

KETRING, HERMAN FEASTER (1873—1913). Pioneer missionary on the west coast of South America. His parents became Seventh-day Adventists when he was a boy, and he was baptized at the age of 14. At the age of 18 he began canvassing in Arkansas and Kansas. Later, he studied for the ministry, first at Union College (1892—1894), and then at the General Conference Bible School (1894—1895). Between 1894 and 1901 he worked as an evangelist in Kansas and Wyoming. He was ordained in 1899 by G. A. Irwin. In 1901 he volunteered for service in South America and was sent to Chile. While there, he edited Señales de los Tiempos and for a time was superintendent of the West Coast Mission. Returning to the United States in 1905, he preached in Kansas, then became president of the Central New England Conference (1906—1909). Shortly after this he contracted tuberculosis, from which he never recovered. About 1910 he went to Denver, Colorado, and for a time was pastor of a church. Later he sought to recover his health in California.

Kettering College of Medical Arts

KETTERING COLLEGE OF MEDICAL ARTS. See Kettering Medical Center.

Kettering Medical Center

KETTERING MEDICAL CENTER. A complex of service, education, and research institutions including Charles F. Kettering Memorial Hospital, Sycamore Hospital, Kettering College of Medical Arts, and Sycamore Glen Retirement Community. The medical center is an integral part of the health-care mission of the Seventh-day Adventist Church and is dedicated in perpetuity to serving the Greater Dayton, Ohio, community. There are 673 patient beds in total-482 at the Charles F. Kettering Memorial Hospital and 191 at Sycamore Hospital. Seven hundred and twenty-five college students, 79 medical residents, and a staff of research scientists complement the 3,700 employees that make up KMC on the campuses situated in Kettering and Miamisburg, south of Dayton, Ohio.

Its beginning dates back to 1958, when Eugene W. Kettering and his wife, Virginia, announced plans for building a 100-bed hospital on the family estate as a memorial to Eugene's father, Charles F. Kettering, renowned inventor, scientist, and humanitarian. The Ketterings agreed to underwrite 100 additional beds if the community would provide funds for a matching number. In a short time a team of interested community leaders raised approximately $2 million. With the matching Kettering funds, the capacity was thus tripled.

Impressed by previous contacts with the Hinsdale Sanitarium and Hospital, the Ketterings selected the Seventh-day Adventist Church to build and operate the new hospital. The Columbia Union on Nov. 13, 1959, took action establishing the charter and organization of the new hospital, and appointed George B. Nelson as executive officer. On Dec. 21, 1959, a nonprofit corporation was formed, and the church agreed to provide funds for construction of a school of nursing and for initial operating costs.

Construction began after a groundbreaking ceremony on July 7, 1961. In December 1963 the family of O. Lee Harrison, longtime personal friend and professional associate of Charles F. Kettering, presented a gift of $800,000 to the hospital. This was immediately supplemented by another $1 million from the Ketterings for the purpose of adding a fifth floor. This floor, containing 100 beds for medical-surgical patients, was completed in 1965, bringing the hospital's bed capacity to more than 400. Medical, surgical, and pediatric services began on Mar. 3, 1964, and the Obstetrical Department was opened early in 1965. A broad complement of ancillary services, including a large Rehabilitative Medicine Department, is provided for both inpatients and outpatients. In 1993 there were 3,761 employees and a medical staff of 767 and 650 volunteers. The hospital and college represent a total investment of $30 million.

College Established. The educational programs of the medical center were developed between 1964 and 1967 under the direction of George Nelson, Anna May Vaughan, and Dr. William C. Sandborn.

Late in 1965 the board approved the funds and plans for the correlation of all the educational activities of the hospital into the academic structure of an associate degree college with special emphasis on health careers. In 1966 it was officially named Kettering College of Medical Arts. It enrolled its first students in 1967 in five allied health curriculums:

nursing, radiology, respiratory therapy, environmental management, and medical record technology. In 1993 the college offered associate degrees in nursing, biomedical electronics technology, physician assistant, audiological sciences and imaging, general diagnostic radiologic technology, diagnostic special procedures technology, medical sonography-abdominal/obstetrics gynecologic, cardiovascular-nuclear medicine technology, respiratory care, preprofessional, and general education. Four additional curriculums were added in succeeding years: clinical dietetic technology, biomedical equipment technology, medical office assisting, and physician's assisting.

Campus Church. In December 1963, as the staff of the hospital was being assembled, a church was organized with 141 charter members. It first met in the hospital auditorium but soon moved to the gymnasium. In 1971 the congregation moved into a new church building constructed on land donated by Mr. and Mrs. Kettering. The congregation has grown to 1,010 members as of 1993. The growth of the churches in Dayton has been significant since the establishment of the medical center, growing to 16.5 percent of the conference membership.

Governance. As an Ohio nonprofit corporation and an integral part of the health-care mission of the Seventh-day Adventist Church, Kettering Medical Center is dedicated to serving the Greater Dayton, Ohio, community.

Governance of the institution is directly effected through the board of trustees, which is composed of 18 individuals, six ex officio representing union, conference and medical center administration, six community trustees who are members of the Seventh-day Adventist Church, and six community trustees who are not members of the church.

Presidents of the Medical Center: George B. Nelson, 1959—1968; Marlowe H. Schaffner, 1968—1979; Robert L. Willett, 1979—1994; Frank J. Perez, 1994— .

Khalil, Ibrahim

KHALIL, IBRAHIM (c. 1870—1946). One of the first national Seventh-day Adventists in Lebanon; evangelist and minister. He was a Kurd from north Syria brought up as a Muslim, but came into contact with Christianity and accepted it. Fearing for his life, he changed his name to Ibrahim el-Khalil (or al Khalil) and fled to a village in the mountains of Lebanon. There W. K. Ising found him and studied the Bible with him. As a result Khalil became an Adventist in 1911. Afterward he preached in Egypt (he is listed first in the 1912 Yearbook), Lebanon, and Jordan (both Palestine and Transjordan), pioneering Adventist work in some places. He was ordained to the ministry about 1935. In 1924 he married Marie Meyer, one of the earliest SDA members in Palestine. He taught Arabic in the school that later became the present secondary school in Egypt. He retired about 1940 and was last listed in the 1946 Yearbook.

Kidder, Florence M.

KIDDER, FLORENCE M. (1885—1967). Educator. A native of Canada, she lost her mother at an early age and grew up in a foster family in Massachusetts. She graduated from South Lancaster Academy in 1903, and from that time on taught elementary school for 65 consecutive years. During this time she took her bachelor's degree from Emmanuel Missionary College. Her last post of service was the school at Pittsfield, Massachusetts. She passed away in her sleep on Dec. 21, just after closing school for the Christmas vacation.

Kien Khuong Maternity Home

KIEN KHUONG MATERNITY HOME. A medical institution operated from 1940 to 1961, part of the time by the Vietnam Mission. It was situated for about a year in Phnom Penh, French Indochina (now the capital of Cambodia), thereafter for 20 years in Cholon, a suburb of Saigon, Vietnam. It was opened in Phnom Penh under the direction of Mrs. Robert Bentz and Mrs. Chen Keng Huy, with 20 beds and 15 workers, including three midwives and three students. It carried its name over the entrance in four languages—French, Cambodian, Vietnamese, and Chinese.

The maternity clinic averaged 100 deliveries a month until war broke out in Southeast Asia and the Bentzes were forced to leave Phnom Penh for Saigon. In the fall of 1941 the clinic was reestablished in Cholon, Vietnam. During the war years when all outside income was cut off, the operating gains of the maternity clinic provided subsidies for the continued operation of the mission.

After Mrs. Bentz returned to France following World War II, Mrs. Chen carried on with the help of local midwives until 1955, when Wong Mo Sun was called from Hong Kong. She stayed until 1959. Because of decreasing patronage and the danger of incurring heavy indebtedness, the maternity home was sold in September 1961.

Kilgore, Robert Mead

KILGORE, ROBERT MEAD (1839—1912). Evangelist, administrator. Returning home from an army captaincy in 1865, he found his parents observing the seventh-day Sabbath, and soon joined them. Three years later he joined the evangelistic team of G. I. Butler and M. E. Cornell as tentmaster. Shortly afterward James White ordained him.

After working in the Eastern states for a time, he was sent by the General Conference in 1877 to Texas. A year or two later A. G. Daniells worked with him as his tentmaster. Within two years 200 persons had been won, and in 1878 Kilgore became the first president of the Texas Conference.

He was at different times president of the Illinois Conference, superintendent of General Conference District no. 2 and District no. 5; for one year he was president of the Southern Union Conference, and for four years its vice president. While holding these offices, he continued to engage actively in evangelism.

Kilgore, Rochelle Philmon

KILGORE, ROCHELLE PHILMON (1887—1993). Educator. Born on a cotton plantation in Georgia, she began teaching at age 17 for $15 a week. She graduated from Graysville Academy (forerunner of Southern College) in 1904 and received her master's degree from the University of Georgia in 1924. In 1929 she married Charles Kilgore and moved to South Lancaster, Massachusetts, where she worked on her doctorate at Boston University. In 1936 she was hired as a "temporary" teacher by Atlantic Union College, where she stayed for 25 years. She was known as a mentor of students, and more than 90 made their temporary homes with her. During World War II she was deeply committed to helping Seventh-day Adventist servicemembers, and corresponded with hundreds of them, encouraging them to finish college. She attended 25 consecutive retreats for servicemembers at Berchtesgaden, Germany. Retiring in 1960, she continued to teach part-time and was active in alumni affairs. She retired from alumni work just prior to her one hundredth birthday. Atlantic Union College bestowed upon her its first honorary doctorate in 1977. Dr. Kilgore devoted 75 years to SDA education, 50 of which were at Atlantic Union College.

King, George Albert

KING, GEORGE ALBERT (1847—1906). Pioneer canvasser who developed the idea of subscription sale of Seventh-day Adventist books. A native of Canada, he came to the United States as a young man in search of fortune. Having accepted SDA beliefs, he desired to preach, but was discouraged by James White, who did not regard him a promising candidate. Eventually a Seventh-day Adventist layperson, “Uncle Richard” Godsmark, advised him to try selling SDA tracts and magazines. This he did with much success in both the United States and Canada. In 1878 and 1879 he was selling books and subscriptions to Good Health and Signs of the Times in Ontario (Review and Herald 53:54, Feb. 13, 1879). According to the recollection of C. F. Wilcox, another pioneer colporteur, King and he sold J. H. Kellogg’s Home Hand-Book of Domestic Hygiene and Rational Medicine, a substantial book of more than 1,600 pages, in 1880, and thus gained experience in selling large books to the public.

At the 1881 General Conference session King urged those assembled to carry out the counsel given by Ellen White in 1879 that Seventh-day Adventist books should be sold widely among the public, and forcefully argued that two small books written by Uriah Smith, Thoughts on Daniel and Thoughts on the Revelation, could be published together in an attractive form for sale by canvassers to the public. As a result of his appeal, these were reprinted together, with new illustrations, by the Review and Herald early in 1882. D. W. Reavis relates that by way of demonstration King sold him the first copy of this edition of Thoughts on the Book of Daniel and the Revelation the very morning it was off the press Apr. 3, 1882. The book had good sale and was followed by other subscription books.

There is some uncertainty among SDA historians about the dating of this edition. M. E. Olsen (Origin and Progress of Seventh-day Adventists, p. 427) and Spalding (Captains of the Host, p. 416) give the date of the General Conference session as 1880, while J. N. Loughborough (in the Rise and Progress of Seventh-day Adventists, pp. 330, 331, and in a letter to W. W. Eastman in the Review and Herald 97:8, July 15, 1920), Matilda E. Andross (Story of the Advent Message, p. 124), and King’s obituary (Review and Herald 83:19, Dec. 6, 1906) place this event at the 1881 session. The 1881 date appears more likely because there was a General Conference resolution on canvassing in that session, Dec. 12, 1881. Therefore this special subscription edition does not seem to be the first time that Thoughts on Daniel and Thoughts on the Revelation were offered to the public in a single binding, for at King’s request, trial copies of the combined books had been made before the end of 1881 by putting together into one binding the already printed sheets of the two separately paged books plus a newly printed index. (See Review and Herald 96:332, Mar. 13, 1919; cf. Review and Herald 59:32, Jan. 10, 1882; General Conference proceedings, Dec. 12, 1881, in Review and Herald 59:10, Jan. 3, 1882, col. 2.)

In 1887 King visited British Guiana in South America, where there was no permanent SDA work at that time, and sold about $900 worth of books. After that he canvassed in the city of New York for about 19 years until his death in 1906. Throughout his life he was an enthusiastic recruiter and instructor of other canvassers.

King, George Donald

KING, GEORGE DONALD (1903—1966). Evangelist, departmental secretary, administrator. A native of England, King graduated from Stanborough Missionary College in 1923 and became publishing department secretary of the North England Conference. In 1924 he and his wife went to West Africa for two years, followed by six years of evangelism in Scotland and North England. He was asked to serve as president of the Welsh Mission in 1932, and in 1936 he became publishing department secretary of the British Union. In the years that followed he served in administrative and secretarial capacities in the South England Conference, British Union Conference, and Northern European Division. In 1962 he suffered a stroke that left him unable to serve the church longer in an active way. In spite of this, he maintained a lively interest in the work of the denomination.

King, R. M.

KING, R. M. (1856—1891). Tennessee farmer whose prosecution for plowing his field on Sunday attracted wide attention. He accepted the Seventh-day Adventist faith in 1884, one of the first in his community. In 1889 he was charged with violating Sunday laws, convicted, and imprisoned. His case was appealed to the Tennessee Supreme Court and to the United States district court. It was hoped to make his a test case in the United States Supreme Court on the constitutional principle relating to the establishment of religion by law, but his untimely death ended the proceedings.

Kingdom of God

KINGDOM OF GOD. In the Bible this phrase refers primarily to the kingly rule or sovereignty of God, which according to the NT, He exercises through Jesus Christ. The dominant theme in the teachings of Jesus as set forth in the Synoptic Gospels—His early preaching (Matt. 4:17; Luke 4:43), in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5—7), in the early parables (Matt. 13), and at the Last Supper (Luke 22:29—30)—is the kingdom of God.

The actual phrase does not occur in the OT, though “kingdom” in relation to God is found referring almost always to His authority or kingly rule (Ps. 22:28; 45:6; 103:19; 145:11, 13; Dan. 4:34; 6:26; etc.). In the Gospels, “kingdom of God” is used 15 times in Mark, 33 times in Luke, two times in John, and five times in Matthew. The phrase “kingdom of heaven” occurs 29 times in Matthew and once in some of the manuscripts of John 3:5. The two phrases are used synonymously. Matthew reflects the Jewish practice of substituting a reverent periphrasis, “heaven,” for the sacred name, to avoid using the latter unnecessarily. The two phrases are used interchangeably in Matt. 19:23, 24. “Kingdom of God” is found seven times in Acts, nine times in Paul’s writings, and once in the book of Revelation. In addition, such equivalent expressions as “thy kingdom,” “his kingdom,” “the kingdom,” “my Father’s kingdom,” and “the kingdom of their Father” occur in the Synoptics. The kingdom of God is also the kingdom of Christ (Matt. 13:41; 16:28; Luke 22:30; John 18:36; Col. 1:13; 2 Peter 1:11; Rev. 11:15; 12:10).

The basic meaning of the Hebrew and Greek words for kingdom (513*malkûth* and basileia) is kingly authority or sovereignty rather than the realm, or sphere, in which this authority operates. This primary meaning is reflected, for example, in Jesus’ parable of the nobleman who went into a far country to receive a kingdom; that is, to receive regal power and authority (Luke 19:11, 12). The kingdom of God, then, is God’s kingship, His sovereignty, His rule, His authority. When one seeks the kingdom (Matt. 6:33), or receives the kingdom (Mark 10:15), that kingdom has reference to God’s sovereign rule over his or her life. God’s kingdom is to be found where He is recognized as king.

There is a sense, of course, in which God is always and everywhere king (Ps. 47:2; 103:19; 145:13; Dan. 4:25). But His reign has not yet become a reality in history. Our world is in revolt against God, and Satan has usurped the rulership. However, God has not relinquished His sovereignty.

Jesus Christ entered earthly history to restore God’s rulership on this earth (Dan. 2:44; 7:14; 1 Cor. 15:24, 25). This new manifestation of power and sovereignty is now the kingdom of God. God has taken the initiative in defeating Satan and in restoring mankind to willing subjection to His authority. Jesus came to our world as the head of this great kingdom, which is freeing men and women from bondage to Satan and making them citizens of a heavenly commonwealth (Phil. 3:20, 21).

This kingdom has two phases—“the kingdom of grace” and “the kingdom of glory.” Although these terms are not used in the Bible, the Scriptures do speak of “the throne of grace” (Heb. 4:16) and “the throne of glory” (Matt. 25:31, 32), and thrones represent kingdoms. The throne of grace implies the existence of a kingdom of grace, and the throne of glory represents the future kingdom of glory.

The kingdom of grace, the soteriological phase, was present in the days of Jesus (Mark 1:15; Luke 16:16; 17:20, 21; Matt. 21:31; Col. 1:13^f), and was manifested in Him as the Messiah. Individuals can enter this realm of grace here and now by acknowledging Him as ruler of their lives. This is the great spiritual kingdom of God's grace and righteousness. The controlling principles in this kingdom are not power and force, but justice, mercy, and love. Jesus' healings were part of the work of bringing this kingdom to humanity (Luke 11:20). Christ fully established this phase of the kingdom by His death. Where Satan had set his throne, Christ raised up His cross. Individuals enter the kingdom of divine grace by repenting, believing, and accepting the new birth (Matt. 18:3; John 3:5), and by submitting voluntarily to Christ's rule. This kingdom is established "by the implanting of Christ's nature in humanity through the work of the Holy Spirit" (DA 509). The ethical principles for citizens of the kingdom are set forth in the Sermon on the Mount. They are to make the kingdom supreme in their affections and devotions (Matt. 6:33).

But the kingdom is also future and eschatological. God's will and reign will never be perfectly realized in this age. They will not be fully realized until our Lord steps again into human history, asserts His universal rule, and puts an end to rebellion (Matt. 13:41—43). "When the Son of man comes in his glory, and all the angels with him, then he will sit on his glorious throne" (Matt. 25:31, RSV). As there are two advents of Christ, so there are two manifestations of His kingdom. It was for this second phase of the kingdom that Jesus taught the disciples to pray (Matt. 6:10). This kingdom is to be set up at the Second Advent and the resurrection of the just. Since this is a glorious, incorruptible, and everlasting kingdom, humans in their present state cannot enter it. "Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth corruption" (1 Cor. 15:50). Hence the nature of the living and of those who are resurrected is changed from corruptibility and mortality to incorruptibility and immortality. To those who experience this change the King of glory will say: "Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world" (Matt. 25:34).

Kingsway College

KINGSWAY COLLEGE (formerly Oshawa Missionary College). A coeducational boarding high school, operated by the Seventh-day Adventist Church in Canada on a tract of land at Oshawa, Ontario, 30 miles (50 kilometers) east of Toronto.

The high school is accredited by the Department of Education of the province of Ontario and by the Seventh-day Adventist Board of Regents (1992). The 1992—1993 enrollment was 217; the faculty numbered 19, and the total staff, 40.

The school was originally (1903) called Lornedale Academy, later Buena Vista Academy, Eastern Canadian Missionary Seminary, Oshawa Missionary College, and Kingsway College. Motivation for the establishment of the school was the fact that many of the Canadian SDA young people who were attending Battle Creek College, in Michigan, were not returning to Canada. (Until 1899, when the SDA churches of the province of Ontario were organized as the Ontario Conference, the area had been a mission field of the Michigan Conference.) The school was established on a 50-acre (20-hectare) farm at Lorne Park, about 15 miles (25 kilometers) from Toronto, with Eugene Leland and his wife as the first teachers. For the first few years the school was operated like a large family enterprise, with the farm as the only industry, producing chiefly fruit and offering seasonal employment. The buildings consisted of a large stone house, a smaller house, and a large barn. In 1906 an addition to the old farmhouse provided a chapel, offices, and additional student rooms. The academy prospered as equipment was donated piece by piece. Appeals for cash and needed articles brought ready response. Those who had time but not money to give took their families to Lornedale and donated labor in the construction of the 1906 annex. The rooms were furnished at $25 each through individual pledges. The school had no electricity, no steam heat, no plumbing. The water supply was a local well.

In 1906 there were approximately 25 students, most of them from Ontario. Grades 1—11 were offered by 1908, and grade 12 was added in 1910. School expenses amounted to only $2.50 per week, and each student was required to work at least one hour a day. Under a scholarship plan a student could pay for a year's schooling by selling $150 worth of Ellen White's Christ's Object Lessons.

Early teachers included Walter Hancock, Mabel Patterson, Blanche Walker, and L. A. Jacobs. Although the school was called an industrial school, the influence of the classical schools of the day was strong. Hira T. Curtis, who came from Keene, Texas, as principal in 1908, taught Latin, German, mathematics, and history. M. E. Kern's New Testament History was used, as well as G. H. Bell's English texts.

Because the work provided by the fruit farm was seasonal, the Lornedale property was sold and the school was moved in the summer of 1912 to its present location at Oshawa, on a farm of 128 acres (50 hectares). The total acreage became 240 (100 hectares), when C. D. Terwillegar, the first SDA in Oshawa, offered his property to the school. The school was appropriately named Buena Vista Academy for its beautiful view of the surrounding countryside and Lake Ontario.

The first new structure was a small building, which for two years housed the classrooms, the printing press, and the business office. Later the school laundry and bakery operated in this building. The original farm building housed some of the students. Other students temporarily lived in tents.

A new multipurpose building was completed in 1914, toward the cost of which $4,000 was contributed at the 1912 Ontario camp meeting. This building was large and housed the assembly hall, classrooms, the business office, and living quarters for the staff and students.

Upon the advice of the General Conference, the school was turned over in May 1914 to the Eastern Canadian Union Conference. The following year Buena Vista Academy was chosen as the training center for French-speaking workers in North America, and the French Department of South Lancaster Academy was moved to Oshawa.

Herminie L. Roth had charge of this French Department for the first two years. She was followed by Jean Vuilleumier until 1920, when Joseph Curdy, of France, came to head the department. Subjects taught in French were grammar, rhetoric, literature, Old and New Testament history, Bible doctrines, and general history. Later E. A. Curdy joined the staff (see Review and Herald 97:30, Nov. 25, 1920). During this time Sabbath services were conducted in French for the French-speaking students. However, a steadily declining attendance of French-speaking students during the depression of the 1930s brought an end to the plan.

To identify the school with its purpose of training denominational workers, the name Buena Vista Academy was changed to Eastern Canadian Missionary Seminary in 1916. In 1919 an administration building was erected, providing space for carpentry rooms, offices, classrooms, a chapel, and piano rooms. During the 1920s the school, incorporated under the name of Oshawa Missionary College (1920), strengthened its academic program. Courses were offered in Bible, history, languages, sciences, commerce, music, and teacher training on the junior college level. Vocational training included, at different times, agriculture, carpentry, domestic science, hydrotherapy, nursing, and sewing.

The early years of the college followed the typical SDA pattern of industry combined with education. The woodwork industry, established in September 1921, has been, and is, the backbone of the industrial program.

After a lull in expansion caused by the economic problems of the early 1930s and by the Second World War, a college auditorium was built in 1949, which served as a church for the college and the community until 1960, when the new $350,000 College Park church, seating 1,200, was built.

In 1958 the college entered a new phase of expansion. The women's dormitory and the administration building were completely remodeled. The secretarial department was improved by the addition of new equipment and new classrooms. Additional music facilities were provided in a new building and the Home Economics Department expanded its quarters and equipment.

In 1958 the enrollment reached 200. In 1960 the first year of a three-year nursing course was offered, in affiliation with the newly established North York Branson Hospital in Toronto. The first class of nurses was graduated in 1963. Greater opportunities for student employment were provided by the completion of a 40,000-square-foot (3,750-square-meter) college woodwork factory. In 1965 a 14-room science and class room building was completed.

In 1973 a new women's dormitory complex was built, including a cafeteria and dining room, and a student chapel with a seating capacity of 350. The former elementary school building was remodeled in 1974 to provide a Family Studies Department and a fine arts ceramics workshop. An industrial education building, also housing plant services, was added in 1980.

A new administration building was completed in 1988, and in 1989 the A. E. King Memorial Physical Fitness Complex was opened. This facility includes a large gymnasium, kitchen, seminar room, shower and change areas, weight room, squash and racquet ball courts, and serves both the school and the local community.

The school name was changed once again in 1966 to Kingsway College to reflect the total academic program offered by the institution. In the late 1970s the college section of the school was transferred to Canadian Union College in Alberta, the nursing program was phased out because of changing government regulations, and Ontario grade 13 was added to the academic program. In 1989 the Ontario Department of Education replaced grade 13 with courses designated as Ontario Academic Credits. Kingsway College graduates currently receive the Ontario Secondary School Diploma.

Throughout its history the school has served the constituency of eastern Canada, although, especially since the late 1950s, it has drawn its students from all of Canada and many parts of the world. Its alumni have given outstanding service to the church and community in many lands.

Kingsway High School

KINGSWAY HIGH SCHOOL. A coeducational day school on the senior high school level, operated by the East Jamaica Conference at 10—12 Osbourne Road, Kingston 10, Jamaica, West Indies. It was established in 1943 under the direction of W. F. Atkin, then president of the Jamaica Conference. The first principal was Vernon E. Berry, who was on loan from the Antillian Union, where he served as educational secretary. The school has an enrollment of 540 and a teaching staff of 23. The course of instruction is approved by the Jamaican government.

The school was known as New Hope College until 1946, when its present name was adopted. Construction of a new school building was begun in 1954 and completed in 1957. The need for more classroom space led to the acquisition of neighboring property in 1961. In 1974 a new building to accommodate 250 pupils was completed for the preparatory department of the school. In 1989 a new wing housing the kindergarten and grade 6 classrooms was constructed and a plan was drawn for the construction of an upper floor, which was completed in 1991, consisting of a science laboratory, a staff room, and two extra classrooms.

Graduates from this school are now working in the three conferences in which Jamaica is divided.

Kinney (Kinny), Charles M.

KINNEY (KINNY), CHARLES M. (1855—1951). Evangelist. As a youth he worked his way to Reno, Nevada. While there he attended evangelistic services conducted by J. N. Loughborough, accepted the Seventh-day Adventist faith, and became the first Black member of the Reno, Nevada, church. After two years' attendance at Healdsburg College (1883—1885) he entered the colporteur work in Kansas. He was assigned by the General Conference in 1889 to work in Louisville, Kentucky, and was ordained the same year, being apparently the first Black SDA to be ordained. His wife's invalidism eventually made it impossible for him to carry on full ministerial work. He retired in 1911. It was his privilege to see the Black membership of the Seventh-day Adventist Church in North America swell to 26,500.

Kinsaung Publishing House

KINSAUNG PUBLISHING HOUSE. A publishing house, with printing plant, operated by the Burma (now Myanmar) Union in Dagon until 1969 and then moved to Kanbe, about four miles (six kilometers) away from the mission headquarters.

After World War II the Kinsaung Publishing House was established. A substantial two-story brick building was erected at 72 U Wisara Road, Dagon, and printing work began May 28, 1950. With help from the Review and Herald Publishing Association and from the General Conference Publishing Rehabilitation Fund the plant acquired a Babcock no. 5 cylinder press, a smaller cylinder speed press, two Chandler and Price presses, a folder, a cutter, and suitable type and equipment.

The first manager was J. O. Wilson, who had been closely connected with the prewar publishing work. Later, supervisors trained at the Oriental Watchman Publishing House in Poona began carrying this responsibility. U Saw U, a member of Bamar's earliest Seventh-day Adventist family, led out during both prewar and postwar periods in editing and translating. From 10 to 13 workers are employed. Publications are issued in Bamar, Chin, English, Pwo Kayin, and Sgaw Kayin.

KIRIBATI. An island country in the Micronesian Island group that encompasses 266 square miles (690 square kilometers), slightly smaller than New York City. The population (1994) is nearly 80,000. The citizens speak Gilbertese and English, which is the official language. Kiribati's nearest neighbors are Nauru, Tuvalu, and Tokelau. The economy is based on the exportation of copra and phosphates.

Christianity first came to this area around 1840, and at the present time the population is almost equally divided between Roman Catholics and Protestants.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. Seventh-day Adventist work in the Gilbert and Ellice Islands, of which Kiribati was a part, began in 1947. On May 31 of that year John T. Howse, an SDA pastor from Fiji, arrived at Funafuti in the Ellice Islands on the mission ship M.V. Fetu Ao ("Morning Star" in Samoan). He was met by Tavita Niu, a Samoan, who had arrived a few months earlier to begin work in the Ellice group. Persecution later made it necessary for Tavita to transfer to Abemama in the Gilberts, where he joined the staff of the Gilbert and Ellice Islands Missionary School.

After some time on the Ellice Islands, Howse proceeded to the Gilberts and secured a lease on Abemama, where he settled with his family, Oct. 6, 1947.

The first Sabbath school was organized on July 10, 1948, with a membership of 26. The first baptism was conducted at Abemama on Jan. 29, 1949, when five people were accepted into the mission church. SDA work spread from island to island, and qualified converts were placed in charge of the work.

The work of translating began soon after the missionaries arrived, the first project being the translation of the Voice of Prophecy Bible correspondence lessons.

In later years teachers from Fiji staffed church schools on the Gilbert Islands, while ministers from Samoa have been the district directors on the Ellice Islands.

Klabat Academy

KLABAT ACADEMY (SMA Advent Klabat). A senior academy located in Manado, Indonesia, to accommodate graduates from four Seventh-day Adventist junior academies in this city. It began operation in 1981. There were 110 students enrolled in two courses: social studies and sciences, in five classes taught by four full-time teachers and three part-time instructors. The school operated in the afternoon and made use of the renovated Tikala's Elementary and Junior Academy School building.

In 1982 a new temporary school building was built at Pall II (next to the mission office), and the school was operated in the morning. Later, in 1986, the school moved to Tikala Baru (the present site) in a permanent building. At present there are 160 students enrolled in three courses: social studies, science, and mathematics, in seven classes taught by nine full-time teachers.

Klein, Jacob

KLEIN, JACOB (fl. 1890). Pioneer Seventh-day Adventist minister in Russia. Few details of his life have been preserved. It is known that he was born in a German settlement on the Volga River in eastern Russia and that he emigrated to the United States, where he became a Seventh-day Adventist. He is listed in the 1888 Yearbook as a missionary worker in Nebraska. In 1889 he went to Hamburg, Germany (reportedly from Kansas, where lived many of the earliest German-American converts to Seventh-day Adventist beliefs), together with J. T. Boettcher and L. R. Conradi. There, after a short training at the newly established missionary school, he was ordained to the ministry and proceeded to his native area on the Volga River.

There he began missionary work, apparently not only among the German settlers but also among their Russian neighbors, for he was promptly arrested on the accusation of proselyting the members of the state church. After a detention of several weeks he was confined to the settlements and their immediate vicinity. During two years of his enforced stay in the area he established a group of strong adherents to the SDA faith. Later he served congregations, baptized new members, and organized churches in the Caucasus region, along the river Don, in the Crimea, and in the Mennonite colonies on the north shore of the Black Sea. In 1893 he attended a general meeting of the workers in Hamburg in company with H. J. Loeb sack, who was probably one of his converts from the Volga, and who later led the SDA work in Russia for many years.

In 1895 Klein and his wife visited their aged parents in Kansas, but returned to Russia the same year. After his return he was listed in 1898 as president of the Sabbath School Association for the Russian field. Thereafter his name disappeared from the Yearbook.

Kleuser, Louise Caroline

KLEUSER, LOUISE CAROLINE (1890—1976). A native of Germany, she came with her parents to the United States at the age of 9. Ten years later she united with the Seventh-day Adventist Church. Her work for the church includes service as a Bible instructor, pastor of several churches, departmental secretary, teacher, writer, second lieutenant in the SDA Medical Cadet Corps (she was the first woman to complete this training course), and finally, associate secretary of the General Conference Ministerial Association, a post she held for 16 years, until her retirement in 1958.

She was the author of The Bible Instructor, a book used in teaching the art of personal soul winning.

Klingbeil, Reinhold Gustav

KLINGBEIL, REINHOLD GUSTAV (1868—1928). Evangelist, pastor, and administrator. Brought as a child from his native Germany to the United States, he accepted Seventh-day Adventist beliefs at an early age and attended Union College. In 1893 he was sent by the General Conference to Europe, where he worked as an evangelist, first in Germany, then about 1893 in the Netherlands.

Klingbeil was ordained in Hamburg in 1896. In the course of the next 30 years he helped to establish the Seventh-day Adventist Church organization in the Netherlands and among the Flemish people of Belgium, serving as an evangelist, conference president, and for a time editor of the Dutch-language paper Zions-Wachter. During World War I he remained with his family in Brussels, where one of his daughters fell victim to wartime privations. Upon his return to the United States in 1926 he held the pastorate of a church in Michigan until his death.

Kneeland, Warren George

KNEELAND, WARREN GEORGE (1867—1943). Missionary to Central America. Born into a pioneer Seventh-day Adventist family in Michigan, he attended Battle Creek College and was given a license to preach in 1890. In 1892 he married Mary E. Benton. The next year he was ordained to the ministry and went to British Guiana to organize SDA work there. Three years later an illness in the family forced their return to the United States, where he worked two or three years in the Dakota Conference. In 1901 he went to Trinidad as superintendent of the field and pioneered the work in Tobago and Grenada. From 1907 to 1909 he was president of the Jamaica Conference. Returning to the United States, he preached in Michigan, West Virginia, and New Jersey. In 1914 he was called to the presidency of the West Caribbean Conference, and during his term of service there he led in the pioneering of Seventh-day Adventist work in Colombia. Another illness sent him home, where he assumed the pastorate of churches in the Lake Union Conference. In 1921 he went to Bahama Islands, where he stayed three years. Back in the homeland, he pastored churches in Florida, Tennessee, and Georgia until his retirement in 1941.

Knight, Anna

KNIGHT, ANNA (1874—1972). Educator, missionary nurse, Bible and departmental worker, author. As a child in Mississippi, Anna found educational opportunities for a Black child to be almost nonexistent. On Sundays she would play with some White neighbor children, and by listening to them read and spell she soon learned the basic skills. Having no paper or pencil, she practiced her writing by scratching the earth with a stick. By the time she was in her teens she had completed the common branches taught in the country schools of the time, though she had never been inside a schoolhouse.

After writing to a New England newspaper requesting that reading materials be sent to her, she received the Signs of the Times from a reader of that paper and was converted to the Seventh-day Adventist faith. Through the help of a conference worker in Tennessee, Anna was able to attend Mount Vernon Academy in 1894. In 1898 she graduated from Battle Creek College as a missionary nurse and returned to her home state to operate a self-supporting school in Jasper County for Black children.

In 1901 she was appointed a missionary to India, where she served six years. In 1909 she was called by the Southeastern Union to work in Atlanta. Her duties included nursing, teaching, and Bible work. When the Southeastern Conference and Southern Conference merged she served in the Educational Department until regional conferences were formed, at which time she retired.

She was the author of Mississippi Girl, the story of her life. At 98 years of age she was serving as president of the National Colored Teachers' Association. A few months before her death she was awarded the Medallion of Merit Award for extraordinary meritorious service to Seventh-day Adventist education.

Knowlton Sanitarium

KNOWLTON SANITARIUM. A medical institution formerly operated at Knowlton, Quebec, some 75 miles (120 kilometers) east of Montreal, with a capacity of 20 patients. It was operated by the Quebec Conference between 1903 and 1908. Connected with it was the first Seventh-day Adventist nursing school in Canada, which graduated its first class of six students in 1905. Dr. W. H. White served as its first superintendent, from 1903 to 1906; then it was directed by a non-SDA physician, R. M. McDonald, and was eventually closed because there was no physician available who could qualify for provincial certification.

Knox, Walter Tingley

KNOX, WALTER TINGLEY (1858—1931). Administrator, General Conference treasurer. He was born in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. At the age of 21 he was converted and joined the Methodist Church. He became a Seventh-day Adventist in 1889 in California and almost immediately entered denominational employment. As early as 1894 he is listed as an ordained minister. From 1897 to 1900 he was president of the California Conference. At the 1901 General Conference session he was elected president of the newly organized Pacific Union Conference when it comprised all California, Nevada, Utah, Alaska, the Hawaiian Islands, and Mexico, which position he held until 1904. In 1905 and 1906 he served as president again of the California Conference (called the California-Nevada Conference in the 1905 and 1906 Yearbooks).

Being a keen businessperson and an able administrator, in 1909 Knox was elected to serve as treasurer of the General Conference. In this position there fell to him the responsibility of working out the details of a financial program that would provide a steady flow of means into the mission treasury for the support of a rapidly expanding work.

In 1922 his request for release from his position to undertake less strenuous work was granted. He returned to his home in Mountain View, California, and for a number of years served as chair of the board of the College of Medical Evangelists. He also was a member of the board of the Pacific Press Publishing Association.

Kobe Adventist Hospital

KOBE ADVENTIST HOSPITAL (Kobe Adobenchisuto Byoin). A 116-bed medical institution situated on a four-acre (1.6-hectare) plot of land in the northern suburbs of Kobe, a thriving port city of central Japan.

Medical work began in Kobe in 1903 when a small sanitarium was operated there for six years. Shortly before World War II, a small Seventh-day Adventist hospital opened for a brief period. These modest beginnings were the forerunners of a clinic begun by E. H. Krick, M.D., in downtown Kobe in 1967 as a branch of the Tokyo Sanitarium and Hospital. This clinic has now become the Kobe Adventist Hospital and has been transferred to a more ideal location. Dedicated on Oct. 30, 1973, the hospital has made continuous growth.

In 1988 the first major building plan was completed, bringing the number of patient beds to 116. Doctors' offices, laboratory facilities, a physical therapy unit, and a patients' business office were also added.

In 1992 a second major renovation and expansion provided more space for diagnostic radiology, dietary service, and administrative offices, as well as space for the hospice service, which began on June 1, 1992.

Another unique program is a health promotion center building that provides space for various programs that promote the Seventh-day Adventist lifestyle. The building was completed in 1983, and accreditation was given as a health center from the Labor Department on Apr. 1, 1992.

Medical Directors: C. D. Johnson, 1973—1974; J. Henmi, 1974— .

Koelling, Wilhelm John

KOELLING, WILHELM JOHN (1888—1963). Missionary in East Africa and in Indonesia. He was born and brought up in Hamburg, Germany, baptized in 1903 or 1904, and studied at Friedensau Missionary Seminary (1904—1907). In 1907 he worked as Bible instructor at Cassel (in the West German Union Conference) and in 1908 went to German East Africa (now Tanzania) as a missionary. He returned in 1914 and worked as a minister in Germany until 1920, when he went as a missionary to Ethiopia. In 1929 he was assigned to the Netherlands East Indies (now Indonesia), where he was in charge successively of several missions. During World War II he was interned in Sumatra and in India and afterward retired in the United States.

Koilpillai, V. D.

KOILPILLAI, V. D. (1899—1957). Teacher, evangelist, and administrator. He was born into a family that belonged to a community of Sabbathkeeping Hindu Christians in the Tinnevely district in southern India. His father was one of the prominent leaders of the group. When in 1907 these Sabbathkeepers heard of Seventh-day Adventist missionaries in India, they invited them to visit and to work among them. Since the Hindu Christian church did not offer schooling in the English language, Koilpillai's father arranged private tuition for a group of children in the community, but when the accommodations became too small, the SDA Mission took charge of the school and moved it to a larger building. Koilpillai attended this school, then the first SDA boarding school in India, and after that the South India Training School, from which he graduated in 1917. In that year he entered denominational work as a teacher in the Prakasapuram school and from then on occupied several important positions, such as headmaster, circle leader, principal of Prakasapuram school; president of the Tamil and Malayalam fields; union Sabbath school and home missionary secretary; and South India Union field secretary. He died while in an evangelistic campaign in Tanjore.

Konigmacher, Samuel M.

KONIGMACHER, SAMUEL M. (1877—1952). He was born at Ephrata, Pennsylvania, of Seventh Day Baptist parents who, while Samuel was a child, joined the Seventh-day Adventist Church. After two years at South Lancaster Academy he went to Battle Creek, where he took the nurse's course. Returning to Massachusetts, he worked as a nurse at the New England Sanitarium. Here he met and married Ruth Mason, who was likewise a nurse. Together they went to Battle Creek Sanitarium, then on to St. Helena Sanitarium, where they worked until called to Africa in 1907.

Konigmacher's first field was Nyasaland (now Malawi), where for a time he worked in the Malamulo Mission. Then he and his wife were sent to pioneer the work at Matandani Mission up in the Neno Hills, some 70 miles (110 kilometers) west of Blantyre. Here they worked for about five years. During that time they lost two infant sons, James and Martin, both stricken by malaria.

From Nyasaland the Konigmachers were called to Northern Rhodesia (now Zambia), and this remained their field of labor for 25 years. After a year at Rusangu during the absence on furlough of W. H. Anderson (c. 1917), they pioneered the work at Musofu Mission, near the Congo border. Here they buried their third son. During this period Konigmacher was ordained to the ministry (c. 1921).

Early in the 1920s the Konigmachers were asked to pioneer yet a third station far up the Zambezi River in Barotseland, Zambia. To reach this mission they proceeded up the river for two weeks by riverboat. For the next 18 years Barotseland was their home. At times, particularly when the river was in flood, they found it extremely difficult to secure essential supplies. The sandy nature of the country made it necessary to walk nearly everywhere. A number of outschools were established and a firm foundation was laid for the strong work that is now conducted in Barotseland.

Failing health compelled the Konigmachers to return to America, but their one living son, Arthur, remained in Africa. Accustomed to the warmth of Africa, Konigmacher sought a mild climate, and this he found in the Hawaiian Islands, where he died.

Konola Academy

KONOLA ACADEMY. A coeducational boarding school on the senior high school level, formerly operated at Konola, 14 miles (22 kilometers) from Kakata, Liberia. The 75-acre (30-hectare) site, granted by the government, is in the heart of the rubber-growing area of Liberia and on the main road leading into the interior. It was one of four schools above the primary level operated by the Liberia Mission. The student body included Muslims, Catholics, and members of several Protestant churches, besides Seventh-day Adventists.

Konola Academy offered (on the American pattern) a four-year college preparatory course requiring 24 units to graduate. By special arrangement students who were unable to complete the basic academic subjects could take a course in trades-apprenticeship worked out on an individual basis. This gave young Africans an opportunity to learn a trade in the atmosphere of a Christian institution. Most of the school land was under cultivation, producing rice, vegetables, citrus fruits, bananas, and oil palms.

Established in 1937 by German missionaries as a primary training school for mission workers, Konola grew into an accredited high school recognized by the denomination and the Liberian government. The first classes were held in a mud building that served as school, dormitory, dining room, and church. At first only boys were accepted. In 1948 the first cement-block structure was erected, which provided classrooms, dormitory, and dining room. In 1951 girls were admitted for the first time, and a new dormitory was erected for boys.

In 1954 a new classroom block was completed, and in 1955 a new boys' dormitory constructed, giving room for the girls in the building vacated by the boys. Boarding was introduced in 1962.

A poultry farm and livestock were added to the farm in 1964. In 1965 an electric pump and water tower were installed and a woodwork shop was built.

In 1971 the building of a new cafeteria was begun, under Principal Fred Webb. It was used for the first time in March 1974, after extensive equipment was secured through K. Lethbridge.

A permanent and impressive church was built mainly under the initiative of J. King. It was dedicated in 1974.

Through a Swedish relief organization, funds were made available for the building of a primary school on the campus in 1974 under the supervision of S. Larsson. Also in 1974 a new staff house was added to the school. The same year 1,500 books were donated to the library, negotiated for by Miss E. Eckerman.

The academic program in Konola was greatly strengthened since 1972 through student missionaries and Volunteer Service Corps workers. The Konola Academy Choir gained national recognition for its excellent performances in 1973—1974 under the leadership of Roseclaire Musson.

In 1974 Principal T. Jarry opened a rice farm for Konola Academy near the Kavalla River. A rice milling machine was installed through D. Harrison. It served both school and public, thus providing a source of income to the institution.

For years the school taught grades 1—8, but in the 1949 Statistical Report Konola Mission School is listed among the training schools, with nine grades; in 1951 with 10 grades. Konola Academy as a full senior academy had its first high school graduation in 1958. The first senior class to register for the national examination was that of 1961.

The following buildings were constructed after the year 1961: four new additional staff houses for overseas and African workers, including a clinic, were completed in the early 1980s under the initiative of Principal B. A. Roberts, and a modern library was erected by Principal R. D. Gibbon. The library was dedicated in January 1990.

Because of civil unrest, the school is not able to function at the present time.

Korea

KOREA. A peninsula of the Asian continent, lying between the Yellow Sea and the Sea of Japan, that is divided into two political entities, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea (North Korea) and the Republic of Korea (South Korea). Numerous small adjacent islands are part of these countries. Korea's continental boundaries, which run along the Yalu and Tumen rivers, separate it from China to the northwest and Russia to the northeast. It has an area of 85,286 square miles (220,900 square kilometers), and a population of about 66 million. The people are of the Mongolian race. The Korean language belongs to the Ural-Altaic group and is similar to Japanese in its grammar, but has a distinct vocabulary. It uses a phonetic alphabet consisting of 10 vowels and 14 consonants, but employs along with its alphabet Chinese ideographs. Their religions are animism, Buddhism, Confucianism, Christianity, and Chondokyo (a mixture of the other four).

The economy of South Korea is essentially agricultural, but since 1963 the country has made tremendous industrial growth. Modern highways, industrial complexes, and modern buildings have been constructed. The standard of living has been raised considerably.

Historical Background

Historical Background. National Development. The recorded history of Korea (Chosen) dates from the first century B.C., when its people were organized into three kingdoms. The Mongols invaded the country in A.D. 1231, but withdrew a century and a third later. In the mid-seventeenth century the Chinese placed Korea into a tributary relation, but Korea did not really lose its independence until it was annexed by Japan in 1910.

During most of its history Korea was under the Chinese cultural influence and could boast of a high state of learning. Some 50 years before the invention of printing in Europe, the Koreans used movable type to print Chinese characters, and by the middle of the fifteenth century an indigenous phonetic alphabet was developed. Their contacts with the West began in the middle of the seventeenth century, but they resisted all approaches of foreigners until Japan began foreign diplomatic relations in 1876.

The United States was the first Western nation to conclude a treaty with Korea (1882). In the early years of the present century, Japan acquired control of the country, and between 1910 and 1945 Korea was a part of the Japanese Empire. During this period Japanese was the official language, and the use of Korean was discouraged. The annexation had some beneficial results in the expansion of the educational system and in the industrialization of the country.

After World War II Korea was divided along the 38th parallel into two zones of occupation, the United States occupying the south and the USSR the north. The southern and northern parts have since developed their own governments, which are mutually hostile. The Korean War, fought between 1950 and 1953, devastated the country, but failed to reunite the northern and southern parts of Korea.

Entrance of Christianity. Christian books circulated in Korea in the seventeenth century. In the eighteenth century, Korean ambassadors and merchants came in direct contact with Christianity (Catholic) in Beijing, China. Thereafter tracts on the Catholic religion were circulated and the doctrine spread rapidly. However, the social leaders resented Christianity, and in 1789 an edict of suppression was promulgated, which was enforced for three years. Thousands of Christians were tortured and killed, but the faith was not destroyed. The last great persecution came as late as 1866.

In 1832 Dr. K.F.A. Gutzlaff, a Protestant translator of the Bible into several Asian languages, visited Korean schools while serving as a surgeon and an interpreter on an English trading vessel, and distributed Chinese Bibles. In 1866 Robert J. Thomas, representing the American Bible Society in China, arrived on the American schooner General Sherman and tossed portions of the Chinese Scriptures and some tracts to the Koreans on the bank of the river below Pyongyang. Infuriated, the people attacked the ship, killing the crew, Thomas among them. But the Bibles he had thrown ashore were taken and read, and thus the knowledge of the gospel came to many in that area. When Korea opened her doors to the West by making treaties with the United States in 1882 and with Britain and Germany in 1883, embassies were opened in Seoul. Dr. H. N. Allen, a Presbyterian minister in China, who came in 1884 as a doctor for the embassies and for the royal court, became the first resident missionary in Korea.

In 1885 H. G. Underwood, a Presbyterian, and H. G. Appenzeller, a Methodist, from America, arrived in Korea, the first of a large number of Protestant missionaries who since that time have rendered service there. The New Testament in the Korean language had preceded them. In 1863 John Ross, a Scottish Presbyterian missionary in Mukden, Manchuria, China, had become so interested in the Korean people that he learned the Korean language, and he made the first translation of the New Testament into the Korean script. In 1882, 3,000 copies of the Gospel of Luke and 3,000 of the Gospel of John were published in Mukden; Yun Soh Sang, the first Korean Bible colporteur, brought some of these to Korea. Later 5,000 copies of the New Testament were distributed. As a result of this work, when Protestant missionaries came to northern Korea they found whole communities professing Christianity, even though they had never met a Protestant missionary.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. The Seventh-day Adventist message was introduced into Korea shortly after the turn of the century. At this time many Koreans were emigrating to Siberia, Manchuria, Hawaii, and Mexico. One day in May 1904 a Korean, waiting for his ship to Hawaii, was walking along a street in Kobe, Japan. He was attracted by a signboard that read in Chinese characters (Korean, Japanese, and Chinese use common ideographs), "The Seventh-day Sabbath Jesus Second Coming Church."

Being a Protestant, he became interested in this new church. He met Hide Kuniya, the evangelist, and a conversation began by means of writing the Bible texts in Chinese characters. Thus they studied the Seventh-day Adventist message. The next day the Korean brought a fellow Korean to study these new doctrines. These two men soon became convinced that the SDA teachings were biblical, and the evening before the first Korean, Lee Eung Hyun, was to leave for Hawaii, the two men requested baptism. It was past midnight when the two Korean converts, escorted by a group of Japanese believers, went up to the pool below Nunobiki Falls, were baptized, and became the first Seventh-day Adventists from among the Korean people.

Lee Eung Hyun left for Hawaii, but the second man, Son Heung Cho, returned to Korea. On shipboard he met Im Ki Pan, a Korean returning from Hawaii, and imparted to him the knowledge he had gained from Hide Kuniya. Im Ki Pan accepted these truths and proposed to give them to his people. Son Heung Cho went down to Pusan, and there he began to spread the new message. Soon about 35 persons were keeping the Sabbath. Meanwhile, Im Ki Pan continued up the west coast of Korea to the port of Chinnampo, where he created a great interest among the Christian Koreans. An urgent plea, signed by 36 persons, was sent to Hide Kuniya asking him to come over to teach them the Bible more fully.

In answer to this call, Hide Kuniya arrived in Korea on Aug. 10, 1904. He soon called for F. W. Field, of Japan, to help him organize churches. They visited many interested people, baptized 71 persons, and organized four churches, at Sondol, Kangdemuro, Yongdong, and Pamegi. They discovered in all some 140 Sabbathkeepers. Four charter members at Sondol—Kim Kyu Hyuk, Kim Ye Choon, Lee Keun Ok, and Kim Suk Yung—later developed into strong church workers. In September 1904 the work in Korea was put in the charge of Im Ki Pan.

Early Mission Work. To fill the need for a resident missionary who could speak Korean, W. R. Smith from the United States arrived late in 1905, and spent that winter in Seoul studying the Korean language. In the spring of 1906 he moved to Chinnampo to be near the Seventh-day Adventist churches. In the summer he moved to Sunan, where a new group of 22 baptized church members lived.

In January 1907 Mimi Scharffenberg, another SDA missionary from the United States, arrived in Sunan. During that summer a schoolhouse was built, and in the fall Smith and Mimi Scharffenberg opened a church school for boys and also began a workers' training course in which eight men and five women enrolled. Responding to calls for a doctor and other workers, Dr. Riley Russell and his wife, C. L. Butterfield and his family, and Helen May Scott, a qualified teacher, arrived in Sunan in 1908. Dr. Russell set up his clinic in one section of the schoolhouse. Later he also took charge of the boys' school.

In the fall of 1908 I. H. Evans, of the General Conference, and F. W. Field, of Japan, visited Korea. At a council held at that time the Korean Mission was organized, with Butterfield as superintendent and Smith as secretary-treasurer. A committee was appointed to find a site for the mission headquarters, a publishing house, and a sanitarium. There were then five churches with 105 baptized members in Korea.

At first, SDA publications in Korean were printed in Japan. In 1909 an old proof press was set up in the schoolhouse in Sunan, and in that year 18,000 tracts and also some of G. H. Bell's Bible lessons and Sabbath school lessons were printed. During the summer the first colporteur went out to sell these publications to a much interested public. Also in 1909 a girls' school was opened at Chinnampo under the supervision of Mimi Scharffenberg.

In September of 1909 Butterfield and Mimi Scharffenberg moved to Seoul, where for a time the work was carried on in rented quarters outside West Gate. Several Korean workers were also moved to Seoul to assist in the publishing and evangelistic work. A Sabbath school was organized in Seoul in 1909, and later, in January 1911, a church with 31 members.

R. C. Wangerin and his wife (sister of Mimi Scharffenberg) came to Korea in October 1909, and H. A. Oberg and his wife arrived a month later. Oberg served as secretary-treasurer and publishing secretary. Howard M. Lee and his wife (sister of May Scott) arrived in Sunan, Apr. 5, 1910, to take charge of the educational work.

In August 1910 I. H. Evans, president of the Asiatic Division of the General Conference, and F. W. Field, of Japan, met with the missionaries and Korean workers for study and counsel. The group laid plans to print a missionary paper at once, of which Mimi Scharffenberg was to be editor. Also at this meeting Dr. Riley Russell was ordained, and two Koreans, Lee Keun Ok and Kim Sung Won, were added to the mission committee.

The name chosen for the monthly magazine was Gospel for the Last Days. When government authorities objected to this name (Korea having been annexed to Japan in August 1910), the title Three Angels' Message was chosen. In January 1911 all missionaries, workers, and students joined in a sales campaign that extended from Busan to Wiju, and sold more than 36,000 copies. In addition, 30,000 pages of leaflets were given away. In January 1917 the name of the magazine was changed to Shi Jo ("Signs of the Times").

In 1911 an acre (.4 hectare) of land was purchased at Kyung San, a county seat some 10 miles (16 kilometers) south of Taegu, on which a 28-foot-square (six-meter-square) tent was pitched. Wangerin and his family lived in one part of the tent while the other half was used for evangelistic meetings conducted by Butterfield, Wangerin, and Kim Kyu Hyuk. The next May a church of 30 members was organized there. During the summer of 1911 a camp meeting was held in Chinnampo.

After much searching in the environs of Seoul, a suitable place to locate the mission headquarters was found three miles (five kilometers) outside the East Gate. At this place three mission homes, a church, the publishing house, and mission offices were erected in the summer of 1912. While the buildings were under construction, the families connected with the mission work lived there in tents. On the first Sabbath in February 1913 the mission compound was dedicated. Present was H. R. Salisbury, representing the General Conference. During the summer of 1913 new school buildings and a dispensary were erected in Sunan.

In 1915 A. G. Daniells, president of the General Conference, attended the general meeting of the mission held at Sunan, at which two Korean workers, Lee Keun Ok and Chung Mun Kuk, were ordained to the ministry. This greatly encouraged the Korean members. That same year Oberg and Wangerin were ordained at the Asiatic Division meeting in Shanghai, China.

Organization of the Conference. At the 1917 meeting of the mission, at which A. G. Daniells was present, the Chosen Conference was organized, with C. L. Butterfield as president and B. R. Owen as secretary-treasurer. Another Korean worker, Kim Kyu Hyuk, was ordained at the time of this meeting.

After Wangerin died in 1917, his wife became the secretary of the Sabbath School and Missionary Volunteer departments, and later she served as editor of the Signs of the Times for nearly 20 years, also of the church paper Kyo Hoi Chi Nam.

In 1919 the Chosen Conference became a union mission with three local units: West Chosen Conference, Central Chosen Mission, and South Chosen Mission.

A food factory was opened at the school at Sunan in 1927, with L. I. Bowers in charge. A small clinic was opened in Seoul in 1931 and plans were laid to establish a hospital there. The present Seoul Sanitarium opened its doors early in 1936 (Review and Herald 113:21, Sept. 24, 1936), under the direction of Dr. G. H. Rue, who came to Korea in 1929, and gave almost continuous medical missionary service at that institution until his return to the United States in 1967.

World War II. As World War II approached the Far East, the United States Government advised all American missionaries to leave Korea. In response, the missionaries left in the spring of 1941, but not before organizing the Korean workers to carry on the work. In February 1943 the leaders of the church, Choi Tai Hyun (or Chae Tae Hyun), Oh Yung Sup, Kim Sang Chil, Lee Sung Eui, Pak Chang Uk, and Kim Nae Chun were arrested by the Japanese police and held in prison until the end of the year. Choi Tai Hyun died as a result of torture inflicted in prison. Two of the others, Kim Nae Chun and Lee Sung Eui, were released from prison but, their health broken, they died soon after. Lee Myung Choon died also. In all, some 40 Seventh-day Adventists were imprisoned for their faith.

Because of suppression and persecution many of the workers and members fled to the mountains. There Kim Myung Kil shepherded many of these refugees and baptized 153. Cho Kyung Chul was another stalwart shepherd. One group went into the mountain ranges of central Korea, maintaining themselves by cutting wood and selling charcoal. The Bible and the books of Ellen White that had been translated into Korean were of great comfort to them at that time.

At the close of the war, Aug. 15, 1945, the members came out of their hiding places. In October 1945 Seventh-day Adventists from all parts of Korea gathered in Seoul for a 10-day general meeting. Here they shared the joy of reunion and expressed gratitude for God's protection. They also elected temporary officers for the union mission: Im Sung Won, president; Oh Syuk Yung, secretary-treasurer; Lee Ryu Sik, departmental secretary. Afterward they set out to recover the mission properties.

The first postwar missionaries, Ralph S. Watts, who returned as president of the union mission, and his wife, came in January 1947; in April Dr. G. H. Rue, James M. Lee, and Leland Mitchell were permitted to return to aid in the restoration of the medical and educational work.

In June 1947 the South Korean and the Central Korean missions were organized and staffed with Korean workers. Im Sung Won had already been appointed director of the North Korean Mission (north of the 38th parallel) in the spring of 1946.

In 1947 Mrs. Theodora Wangerin returned to resume the editorial work; Irene Robson arrived to be the director of nurses in the Seoul Sanitarium; R. C. Mills to be secretary-treasurer of the union mission; later Dr. R. W. Pearson came to work at the Seoul Sanitarium and Hospital.

Korean War. The work was developing rapidly when on June 25, 1950, the North Koreans invaded South Korea, and the missionaries were evacuated to Japan. During the war the Christians suffered greatly. Although less than 50 Seventh-day Adventists lost their lives, many others lost all their possessions, and many churches were destroyed.

Many members who had lived in North Korea came south during the winter of 1950, thus adding to the church membership in South Korea.

Meanwhile, the missionaries who had been evacuated to Japan began active evangelism in Osaka, where there was a large Korean population, with James M. Lee and George Munson conducting evangelistic campaigns. These resulted in many baptisms, and a church building was erected in Osaka for the Korean converts. The first baptism among these Koreans took place in Kobe at the foot of Nunobiki Falls, where the first two Korean converts had been baptized in 1904.

At the Far Eastern Division Council held in February 1951, Pak Chang Uk was appointed secretary-treasurer of the union mission. In the fall of that year Clinton W. Lee returned to Korea as president of the union mission and led in the restoration of the work that had been severely disrupted by war.

Postwar Growth. In 1951 a period of rapid growth in membership began in Korea. Although there were few overseas missionaries, at times only three, and there were neither offices nor secretarial staff, the average membership gains for those years was almost 25 percent a year. With more baptisms each year and thousands of new converts joining the Sabbath schools, C. H. Davis, who in 1958 came to Korea as president of the union mission, and the Korean leaders found it impossible to provide the funds needed to build churches to house the growing congregations. Many groups met in private homes, makeshift shelters, army tents, on the open hillsides, and under trees. Humble halls were built for worship in some farming areas where the people pooled their meager resources. Congregations more than doubled in a few months. Consecrated laymen left the larger cities to carry the message to unentered areas, pagan islands, and mountain villages. Colporteurs carrying publications into every office, factory, and home surpassed previous sales records year after year.

Thousands of young men and women spent their summer and winter vacations holding evangelistic meetings and conducting Vacation Bible Schools. Ten young overseas missionaries with their families joined the Korean workers and laypersons in the effort to print more books and magazines, organize more schools, guide more young people into mission service, enlarge the medical program, broadcast more radio programs, and reach out into new fields of evangelism.

In commemoration of the seventieth anniversary of the Korean Union Mission the Korean Publishing House (Shi Jo Sa) in 1974 printed 42,000 copies of The Great Controversy in a one-volume paperback edition. There were approximately 100 literature evangelists selling Spirit of Prophecy books, the Signs of the Times, and a Korean vegetarian cookbook.

When the Voice of Prophecy Bible correspondence school started in 1948, one series of Bible lessons was offered. In 1974 five different courses were available, including a braille Bible course. Approximately 500 enrolled in the different sets of lessons each month. Since 1948, 103,488 have graduated and 11,422 have been baptized. In 1957, radiobroadcasts were begun once a week. By 1974 the Voice of Prophecy was broadcasting over 22 stations each week.

The first Koreans to serve in other fields were two nurses, Oh Hei Cha and Cho Chung Cha, who were sent to Benghazi, Libya, in 1968. In December 1968 a Korean pastor, Shin Byung Hoon, was sent to São Paulo, Brazil, to serve the São Paulo Korean Seventh-day Adventist Church. Up to March 1993 another nurse and 23 more pastors were sent overseas to serve in foreign countries. In 1982 Kim Tong Choon was elected as the secretary of the Far Eastern Division. In 1992 Chun Pyung Duk was elected as president of the division. As many as 14 Korean pastors are serving in such countries as Germany, Paraguay, Russia, Saipan, Kazakhstan, Argentina, Philippines, Singapore, Japan, and China.

Active lay workers in the Central Korean Mission and the Southwest Korean Mission have formed layperson's associations for the purpose of raising money to help lay workers become established as self-supporting lay pastors in various areas where no regular worker is located. Approximately 1 million won (US$2,500) was contributed for this each year by these groups.

English language school evangelism opened in Korea in the fall of 1969. Dean Hubbard, then ministerial secretary, led out in the opening of this new school, patterned after the one in Osaka, Japan, which was reinstated in 1966 by M. T. Bascom.

A section of a new building near the union mission headquarters in Seoul was leased and a laboratory constructed along with a number of classrooms. This school became the largest English school in the Far Eastern Division, with nearly 1,400 students enrolled. Teachers for this school were student missionaries from colleges in North America.

By 1992 a total of 15 institutes were opened in the major cities of Korea, making a total enrollment in 1992 of 64,388 students, taught by a staff of 113 volunteers. Language institutes have proved to be a great evangelistic outreach. Not only are English, Japanese, and Russian classes offered, but also Bible classes. Continuous evangelistic meetings harvest the interests created by the work of the volunteers.

In March 1978 the Central Korean Mission was divided into two missions—East Central Korean Mission and West Central Korean Mission. This accelerated the church growth. As a result, all of the five South Korean missions became conferences in 1983.

The English language schools have proved to be a great evangelistic outreach. Not only are English classes offered but also Bible classes. Continuous evangelistic meetings in the language-school chapels harvest the interests created by the work of the student missionaries.

Korean Publishing House

KOREAN PUBLISHING HOUSE (Sijosa) (Signs of the Times Publishing House; in 1965 it was renamed Korean Publishing House). A publishing organization with its own printing facilities, operated by the Korean Union Mission at Seoul, Korea. It issues Seventh-day Adventist books and the following periodicals: Shi Jo (“Signs of the Times”); Kyo Hoi Chi Nam (“Church Compass”); Home and Health; senior, earliteen, and primary Sabbath school lesson quarterlies; and Sabbath School Helper.

The publishing house was established in the spring of 1909, when a printshop was set up in one of the rooms of the three-room schoolhouse in Soonan. Its printing equipment included a George Washington handpress and a small font of type, a gift from the Japan Mission. The first publications produced there were the Sabbath school lesson quarterly and 18,000 copies of three tracts that had been translated into Korean. They were followed by G. H. Bell’s Bible Lessons, Nos. 1 and 2 (1,000 copies of each), “Helps to Bible Study,” and other Sabbath school materials. Mimi Scharffenberg was the first editor.

In the summer of 1909 the publishing house and the mission office were moved to Seoul, the capital of Korea. For a time the work was conducted there in rented quarters outside the West Gate.

Late in 1912 a permanent location for SDA institutions was found at Hoi Ki Dong, near the East Gate of Seoul. There the buildings were erected, and in January 1913 the first printing was done in the new plant. On Jan. 24, 1930, that building was burned to the ground.

A new building 63’ x 81’ (19 m. x 25 m.) was erected. It was occupied in April 1931 and is still in use. In this building there are six offices, two storage rooms, vault, bindery room, and the factory in which are four presses, a typesetter, and other small equipment. On Sept. 11, 1963, a new German Heidelberg giant automatic cylinder press was dedicated.

A new two-story addition to the main building was occupied in May 1966, housing offices, library, chapel, and an enlarged printing plant. New German Original Heidelberg automatic one-color offset presses were added in 1965 and 1969. In 1974 a Japanese Sha-Ken photocomposing press was installed.

The printing done is a combination of Korean script and Chinese characters. Printing is also done in English.

Quite early in the publishing work it was decided to print an eight-page monthly missionary journal. This later became known as the Shi Jo (“Signs of the Times”). The church paper, the Church Compass, was begun about 1916. More than 22 of Ellen White’s books have been translated, as well as evangelistic books, church hymnals, and the Church Manual. In 1994 the Korean Publishing House also was printing Home and Health magazine, the Sabbath school lesson quarterlies, and the Sabbath School Helper.

In 1973 the Korean Publishing House received a certificate from the Ministry of Culture and Information of Korea in honor of Shi Jo, the Signs of the Times, the oldest continuously published magazine in Korea, in both the religious and secular field. In 1974 the Korean Publishing House published more than 40,000 copies of The Great Controversy in a special paperback edition.

Korean Sahmyook Food

KOREAN SAHMYOOK FOOD. A health food factory located at Panjeong-ri, Jiksan-myun, Chunan-gun, Choongchungnam-do, 50 miles (80 kilometers) from Seoul, Korea. It is operated by the administrative board of the Korean Union Conference, under the supervision of the Far Eastern Division.

Sahmyook Food Company was established in 1978, when it began producing gluten foods developed by a team at Sahmyook University Industry. This food company, as a profitable company of the legal association of Sahmyook Hakwon, has as its purpose giving financial support to the education work and providing employment for Seventh-day Adventist youth.

In 1985 other products such as soy milk, Soyalac, and Soycool were added to the industry. In late October 1992 research was completed for the Sahmyook Melon Juice that is prepared with melon juice and soy milk. In 1985 the factory developed a soy milk drink with the help of Japan Food Factory and started to sell it in the market. This made the factory grow fast, and allowed them to extend their factory building and install many different types of modern machines. The following comparative figures indicate the factory's rapid expansion between 1981 and 1993: the number of employees increased from seven to 192, and buildings from one small structure to several, including a machine shop, a boiler house, and storage rooms. In 1992 the factory produced more than 26.8 million tons (24.3 million metric tons) of soy milk, and the total sales stood at US$21.8 million. One half of all profit was used to support the Korean Union Conference.

A second factory has been added and is located in the Southwest Korean Conference. This factory will produce mainly a health ion drink. A third factory located in the Southeast Korean Conference will produce a type of instant noodles (ramyun) and breakfast cereals.

The union executive committee appointed Lee Bo Duk as the first manager. He devoted himself to buying land for the food factory building site in 1978. Yoon Choong Yuh, a full-time business administration director of the Korean Sahmyook University, was appointed general manager in 1981. Mr. Yoon erected a factory building and installed the various machines needed, and started to provide and sell gluten foods such as vegeburger and vegemeat. On Mar. 19, 1990, Mr. Yoon received an award from the South Korean prime minister for supporting enterprise.

Korean Sahmyook University

KOREAN SAHMYOOK UNIVERSITY (Sahmyook Taehakkyo). A coeducational boarding institution featuring college and graduate levels, operated by the Korean Union Conference, and situated on a 200-acre (80-hectare) site on the northeastern boundary of Seoul. In 1993 university enrollment was approximately 2,700, with a full-time faculty of more than 80. More than 400 elementary and 1,300 secondary pupils attend school on the same campus.

Early History

Early History. In September 1917 a two-year ministerial course for older students was introduced to provide qualified workers for the newly established Chosen Conference. Classes in theology were taught by C. L. Butterfield, conference president, at the Chosen Industrial School in Soonan-immediately north of P'ongyang in North Korea-which in 1911 replaced a boys' and a girls' school established in 1907 and 1909, respectively.

After the formation of the Chosen Union Mission in 1919, with headquarters in Seoul, the Chosen Industrial School became the Chosen Union Training School. During several years in the next decade, some course work was offered beyond the twelfth-grade level, but in general the school operated on the secondary level. In the fall of 1928 Clinton W. Lee joined the faculty and developed a curriculum.

In the spring of 1931 the ministerial school was separated from the Chosen Union Training School (which appears in the Statistical Reports through 1936; then is replaced by the Soonan Academy in 1937, 1938), and was moved to the union mission headquarters in Seoul. Because of financial problems, however, it did not operate from the summer of 1932 until May 1937. During this interim the students and some of the workers studied correspondence courses conducted by Clinton W. Lee. The reopened school was called the Chosen Union Workers' Training Institute. The faculty was increased, and Clinton W. Lee served as principal.

When World War II forced the overseas personnel to leave Korea in 1941, the work at the training institute was carried on for a year by Principal Lee Sung Eui and other nationals. However, under pressure from the Japanese police, it closed in May 1942. Up to this point, the school had produced more than 100 graduates, many of whom became pillars of the work in Korea.

Post-World War II Period

Post-World War II Period. The school, listed in the Yearbook as Korean Union Seminary, reopened in September 1947, with 42 students. Ralph S. Watts, Sr., was principal and Lee Ryu Sik dean. Teachers included James M. Lee, Pak Chang Uk, Leland Mitchell and his wife, Betty (née Rue).

In November 1949 the school was moved from the city to its present site, about 12 miles (20 kilometers) from downtown Seoul. When the Korean War broke out in 1950, students were scattered and many of the buildings under construction were damaged or destroyed. In November 1951 the school, called Korean Union Training School, opened with about 40 students. Because of the damage to the buildings, some classes were conducted in the open air. Students bathed and washed their clothes in a creek that flowed through the school property. Secondary work, which had been offered by the Seoul Junior Training Institute—a secondary school established in the late 1930s—was now combined with seminary work on one campus.

Post-Korean War Period

Post-Korean War Period. In 1954 the school received a government permit to operate a college. During the ensuing years there was peaceful growth, and college industries prospered. Leading educators in Korea looked to the Adventist educational system as a pattern.

In February 1961 the Korean Ministry of Education gave Korean Union College a permit to operate as a four-year theological college and to grant degrees at the bachelor's level. In 1962 the government approved the addition of an industrial junior college, specializing in agriculture for young men and home economics for young women. In 1964 the General Conference Educational Department recognized the school as a four-year senior college.

In 1966 theological was dropped from the Korean name of the college, and it began operation as a liberal arts school, with home economics and agriculture departments added to the curriculum. Also in 1966 the junior college was closed, and from 1968 an English major was offered. In 1973 a two-year industrial school on the junior college level was begun with George Haley as principal. Courses in dairy science and food and nutrition were offered. In that same year the government granted permission for the college to begin a four-year baccalaureate nursing course, which was implemented in 1974.

In 1975 the higher educational institutions in the Korean Union Mission were united under an integrated board of management, administration, and faculty, and began to operate as a university under one school system. The Graduate School was established in 1981.

Korean Sahmyook University in 1993

Korean Sahmyook University in 1993. The university offers an Associate of Arts degree in dairy science, food technology, office automation, early childhood education, applied music, auto maintenance, and tourism English language interpretation. The senior college offers baccalaureate degrees in theology, English language and literature, business administration, music education, nutrition, chemistry, biology, horticulture, dairy farming resources, nursing, pharmacy, and rehabilitation therapy.

The Graduate School features the master's program in theology, religious education, pharmacy, and chemistry, and a doctorate (Ph.D.) in theology. The Theological Seminary, which started in 1990, offers an M.A. in theology for ministers. The School of Lifelong Learning—offering adult and continuing education courses—is a recent addition to the university curricula. The E. G. White-SDA Research Center and Northern Missionary

College, and the extension school on the Sakhalin Island (Russia) are also newly inaugurated features of the university.

The college foods industry, begun in 1955 under the direction of Lee Mitchell, for many years supplied dairy products and garden produce to the Eighth U.S. Army and the Seoul foreign community. Dairy products are delivered daily to 90 distribution points throughout the Seoul area. In addition to the university's off-campus dairy farms and rice properties, vineyards, orchards, and garden areas are features of the main campus.

Korean Vocational Training Institute

KOREAN VOCATIONAL TRAINING INSTITUTE (Sahmyook Gisul Hak-won). A coeducational boarding institution on the senior high school level, operated by the Korean Union Conference at Seoul, Korea. The institute was founded in July 1970 at Yungnam Academy at Kyongsan near Taegu, a provincial capital between Seoul and Pusan, Korea.

In 1968 the vocational training center opened in Yungnam Academy to the many students who had not gone on to college. As the program was successful, it was opened to the students of all the seven academies in Korea and had a new start as a vocational training institute under the direction of the Korean Union Conference. The Korean Vocational Training Institute was founded in 1979 with the help of $10,000, the overflow offering of one of the Thirteenth Sabbath offerings in 1979. In 1984 the institute was moved from Kyongsan to Seoul.

Korean Vocational Training Institute welcomes all junior high school graduates. Normal graduation requires three years' attendance. A work program enables students to provide for their tuition and living expenses. The curriculum offers mechanical engineering, electrical engineering, construction, and computer programming. Students receive a national technician's license, approved by the government, and a certificate of credit that is comparable to that of a senior high school diploma.

Kotz, Siegfried Arthur

KOTZ, SIEGFRIED ARTHUR (1915—1967). Physician, medical administrator, and secretary. He was born in Africa of missionary parents and his childhood years were spent there and in Switzerland and Germany. When he was 10 the family moved to the United States, where the influence of denominational schools led him to Loma Linda University, from which he graduated as an M.D. in 1940. He was in general practice in Maryland for several years and served on the staff of the Washington Sanitarium and Hospital. Then he and his wife, the former Ethel Carr, and their children left for Africa, where he served at the Malamulo Hospital and Leprosarium at Malawi and then at Kendu Hospital at Kendu Bay, Kenya. During this time he was ordained to the ministry. In 1961 the family returned to the United States, where he earned a master's degree in public health from Yale University. In 1963 he was called as medical secretary for the Australasian Division.

Kowloon Sam Yuk Secondary School

KOWLOON SAM YUK SECONDARY SCHOOL. A coeducational day school on the senior high school level, situated in Kowloon, on the mainland across the strait from the island of Hong Kong, and operated by the Hong Kong-Macao Conference.

Kowloon Sam Yuk Secondary School began as a kindergarten and primary school in 1937 when many refugees, including numerous Seventh-day Adventists, poured into Hong Kong at the outbreak of the Sino-Japanese War. To meet the need for educating the children, a church school, sponsored by the local Mongkok church, was opened on the second floor of a rented house at 13 Fa Yuen Street, Kowloon. S. S. Ha, the first teacher, taught primary 1 to 4. By the time of the Japanese invasion of Hong Kong, December 1941, which resulted in the closing of the school, instruction had expanded to primary 6. K. C. Lo was the teacher at that time.

When a new chapel was built at 52 Boundary Street, Kowloon, in 1950 to replace the former building at Tung Choi Street, plans were laid by W. P. Chung, the pastor, and his members to restore the school. As a result of liberal contributions for furniture and equipment, school opened Feb. 12, 1951, with 76 pupils and five teachers in three classrooms. The next year enrollment grew to 182, and each succeeding year saw an increase in the number of students.

With more room in a five-story building, completed in 1956 with funds received mainly from Ingathering solicitation, the school was upgraded to the junior middle school level (seventh grade) and the enrollment rose to 542.

In 1961, by permission of the Far Eastern Division, the school was upgraded to senior middle level (tenth grade).

In 1967, to meet the need for education in English by the community, the school began to operate an Anglo-Chinese section, using English as the teaching medium. Students may choose to study in either of these two sections.

In 1978 the Hong Kong government introduced the nine-year compulsory education program, which made it necessary to buy places in local private schools. Sam Yuk participated in the program. The project to develop the north wing of the school building for the primary church school was launched. In 1983 Sam Yuk became a "Caput" school, which enabled school facilities and staff salaries to be upgraded.

A new building was completed in 1988. In 1989 the school was officially named Kowloon Sam Yuk Secondary School. Further improvements have been made. For more efficient administration the Chinese secondary section ended in September 1991. The summer of 1992 saw the opening of form 6 (twelfth grade) and in 1993 form 7 opened to prepare students for tertiary education.

In 1993 there were 191 students enrolled. A total of 20 classes were looked after by a 39-member teaching staff, 19 of whom are Seventh-day Adventists. The school always has been and remains a strong evangelizing agency for winning souls. More than 688 students have been baptized.

Principals: Lo Hing So, 1960—1981; Tang Chung Huen, 1981—1987; Liang Wai Hong, 1987—1989; Mrs. Doris Foo, 1989— .

Koza Adventist Hospital

KOZA ADVENTIST HOSPITAL (Hôpital Adventiste de Koza). A 140-bed general hospital owned and operated by the Central African Union Mission at Koza, Cameroon, near the northern tip of the republic. Nestled in the mountains, it is 680 miles (1,100 kilometers) by air from the Guinea Gulf coast, and 160 miles (260 kilometers) south of Lake Chad, in the most densely populated area.

Seventh-day Adventist mission work at Koza was begun in 1949 by R. Bergstrom, from Sweden. A Thirteenth Sabbath Offering overflow in 1950 helped to provide funds for a hospital, although construction was delayed several years. Dr. F. W. Brennwald and his wife, who arrived in August 1953, conducted their medical work under the trees for some months, and then continued it in a temporary dispensary. In the summer of 1955 they had an eight-room dispensary with operating room, obstetrical unit, and pharmacy. A. Bodenmann, a Swiss missionary-builder, did most of the permanent construction. Dr. A. R. Bergman and his wife worked on the staff from December 1955 to 1961. Nurses were drawn from France, Switzerland, Germany, and Austria. Besides the doctor there are usually two European nurses.

In 1974 a new maternity ward with 12 beds and a surgical unit was inaugurated. These very modern additions are contributing to more efficient medical care. Thanks to this institution, the work of evangelism in northern Cameroon is progressing in spite of the strong Muslim influence.

Kranz, Alfred F. John

KRANZ, ALFRED F. JOHN (1900—1993). Born in South Australia, he studied at Adelaide University, Avondale College, and the Seventh-day Adventist Theological Seminary, where he earned his master's in theology in 1948.

He taught at the Adelaide Adventist School in 1921 and spent the following year in evangelism. He returned to teaching for two years in the North New Zealand Conference, and then served as preceptor and Bible teacher in New Zealand Mission College from 1923 to 1929. He was called to Avondale College as Bible teacher from 1930—1939 and then became principal of Western Australian Missionary College for six years. After his retirement in 1965 he continued to serve at that school for a number of years in a voluntary capacity.

Kress, Daniel Hartman and Laretta (Eby)

KRESS, DANIEL HARTMAN (1862—1956) and LAURETTA (EBY) (1863—1955). Physicians. Kress was born in Ontario, Canada, and Laretta in Michigan. They married in 1884, took their medical training together in the University of Michigan, and graduated in 1894. They had three children and adopted and educated 11 others. Before becoming a Seventh-day Adventist (1887), Daniel Kress had been a Baptist minister in Michigan.

After a period of service at the Battle Creek Sanitarium, the Kresses went to England in 1898 to establish Seventh-day Adventist medical work there. The first year they gave lectures, began health schools, and started a magazine called Life and Health, which was published for nearly a year. Appointed to Australia in 1900, they laid the foundation for a strong medical work there. After working in New Zealand for a time, they returned to Australia, and in 1907 to America. Daniel Kress became the first medical superintendent of the newly established Washington Sanitarium and Hospital; his wife was staff physician.

Daniel Kress specialized in health education and internal medicine, and from the time of his conversion was an ardent crusader against tobacco. In 1947 the Kress Memorial Foundation was set up in Washington, D.C., to promote research in narcotics.

In 1939 the Kresses intended to retire, but were called into service for a time as staff physicians at the Florida Sanitarium and Hospital. They wrote an autobiography entitled Under the Guiding Hand (1941).

Krieghoff, Carlos Enrique

KRIEGHOFF, CARLOS ENRIQUE (1870—1969). Pioneer worker in South America. Krieghoff was born in Switzerland and at the age of 15 emigrated to Chile with his family. After reading the book Daniel and the Revelation, he accepted the Seventh-day Adventist faith and was baptized in 1897. In 1902 he and his wife gave 45 acres (18 hectares) of land for the building of a school in Pua, Chile. The school began operation in 1906, and by the next year a building was erected with a capacity of 100 students. Krieghoff was the carpenter-builder, and also the first president of this training school, which eventually became Chile College.

In 1908 he was called as secretary-treasurer of the Chile Conference. After his ordination in 1912, he again served as president of the school in Pua until 1916 when he was assigned the work of secretary-treasurer for the newly formed Argentine Conference. Following this he was appointed superintendent of the Uruguay Mission and in later years he was secretary-treasurer of the Central Argentine Conference. In 1937 he retired in Argentina, in the city of Rosario, where he served as elder of the Central church for 12 years.

KRUM, JOHN HARRY (1866—1949). Minister, pioneer Seventh-day Adventist missionary to Palestine. He was born at Reamstown, Lancaster County, Pennsylvania. He joined the Seventh-day Adventist Church in 1890, and through his efforts a sister and her husband became SDAs. The following year he became a colporteur. During 1892—1893 he attended Union College, Lincoln, Nebraska. In December 1893 he was sent to Germany, where, following one year's training at Hamburg, he conducted evangelistic meetings in Berlin and other cities. One of his converts, Leontine Hulda Michaeli, became his bride in 1897.

In 1898 he was asked to pioneer the work of Seventh-day Adventists in Palestine, as the first European SDA worker sent to the Holy Land. At first he sold publications to settlers in German colonies at Jaffa and other cities. Later, employing the medical knowledge acquired from a two-year course at Baltimore Medical College, Baltimore, Maryland, five years of experience as a pharmacist, and a special course in hydrotherapy and electrical treatments taken at the Basel Sanitarium, Switzerland, he opened medical missions in Jaffa and Jerusalem, the mission in the latter city continuing for 14 years. He worked in both Palestine and Syria (the Lebanon area).

He endeavored to carry the SDA message also to the Armenians, Greeks, and Turks of Asia Minor, where he traveled extensively, working where the apostle Paul had labored, and experiencing similar dangers and narrow escapes. Despite persecution and prejudice, he won a number of converts before his health forced him to return to America in June 1904.

Subsequently he worked as a pastor in many states, among them Pennsylvania, Oklahoma, Texas, Arkansas, Tennessee, Ohio, and Florida, where he spent the last 25 years of his long term of denominational service.

Krumm, Wilhelm

KRUMM, WILHELM (c. 1861—1932). Business leader. In 1894 his wife joined the Seventh-day Adventist Church, and a few years afterward he followed her. In 1901 he gave up a profitable business to manage the business of the Friedensau institutions (see Friedensau Theological Graduate School). He stayed there until the school was closed at the onset of World War I in 1914. He then assumed leadership of the SDA Hamburg food factory, Nahrungsmittelfabrik des Deutschen Vereins für Gesundheitspflege (see German Health Food Factory). In 1920 he returned to Friedensau and managed the affairs of one or another of its institutions until a stroke incapacitated him in 1929. He also managed an old people's home, and served as elder of the local congregation and as a member of conference and union committees.

Kucera, Louis Frank

KUCERA, LOUIS FRANK (1877—1959). The first Seventh-day Adventist Czechoslovakian colporteur in the United States through whose efforts the work among the Czechs and Slovaks of North America began. He was born in Czechoslovakia. About 1906, when in the New York area, he was given a German pamphlet entitled “Which Day and Why?” As a result of reading it he began to keep the seventh-day Sabbath. Later, he had three SDA tracts translated and printed for distribution among the Czech- and Slovak-speaking people. From 1909 to 1913 he looked after a Czechoslovak church in the New York area, then worked as a colporteur for two years and later took charge of a Czechoslovak church in Chicago. In 1919 he joined the international branch of the Pacific Press Publishing Association at Brookfield, Illinois, as a linotype operator for the Slavic languages, and continued with this work until he retired in 1948.

Kuhn, May Gilman Cole

KUHN, MAY GILMAN COLE (1882—1964). Poet, missionary, teacher. She later received her B.A. degree from Washington Missionary College and her M.A. from the University of Southern California. She taught at Washington Missionary College, Union College, Emmanuel Missionary College, La Sierra College, Shanghai Missionary College, and the Home Study Institute. In 1909 she became educational secretary for the Atlantic Union Conference and then taught for a time in the Bermuda Islands. After returning to the United States, she studied nursing. In 1911 she married Pastor Otto B. Kuhn, and in 1916 they went to China, where they served until 1937. After returning home, she taught for a time at Loma Linda Academy. She was the author of several books, a number of articles, and many poems.

Kuniya, Hide

KUNIYA, HIDE (1872—1962). Pioneer Japanese Seventh-day Adventist minister, first Japanese to be baptized in Japan. During the Sino-Japanese War he was with the paymaster corps of the Japanese Army in China and there met Christians. Upon his return to Japan he met Japanese Christians, and one of them invited him to read tracts published by the first Seventh-day Adventist missionaries in that country. Later he met these missionaries, attended their Bible school in Tokyo, and joined the SDA Church in 1899. Soon thereafter, he took up the colporteur work and began to preach. In 1904 he was instrumental in introducing the Seventh-day Adventist work into Korea. In 1907 he was ordained. For 61 years he served the church as colporteur, pastor, editor, or mission director. After his retirement he was largely responsible for establishing two churches in Tokyo.

Kunz, August

KUNZ, AUGUST (d. 1906). Teacher and editor. He was born in Germany and came to America about 1867. His name appears in the bulletin of Battle Creek College in 1879, and so far as is known he taught Hebrew and New Testament Greek until 1881. In this capacity, he taught Uriah Smith, C. C. Lewis, and L. R. Conradi. Later he taught German and Greek language and literature. He taught at Battle Creek until 1887 or 1888, and apparently at the same time carried on German language missionary correspondence for the General Conference, because Gerhard Perk, one of the earliest Seventh-day Adventists in Russia, reported in 1909 that he had correspondence with Kunz in 1882 and that it was Kunz who sent out German publications from the United States. His name first appeared in the Yearbook (listed as a licentiate) in 1883.

Late in 1887 or early in 1888 he went to Europe (the fifth European Council held in June 1888 passed a resolution that Kunz continue in the German work in Europe). Later, notations in the Yearbooks indicate that besides serving as a secretary of the German Department of the Central European Conference he was engaged in editorial work. He translated into German several books, such as Ellen White's Great Controversy and Steps to Christ, and Uriah Smith's Daniel and the Revelation. In 1892 and 1893 he is listed as a teacher at Battle Creek College. From 1892 to 1894 he was one of the editors at the Central Seventh-day Adventist Publishing Association (Review and Herald) at Battle Creek.

About 1895 he joined the faculty of Keene Academy and taught there for about seven years. From 1904 to 1906 he taught at Union College, laying down his work only in the last stages of cardiac illness.

Kurbadet

KURBADET (Oslo Health Home). A 25-bed clinic and hospital formerly operated in Oslo, Norway, by the West Nordic Union. The institution conducted a department for outpatients and employed one medical doctor who was a specialist in rheumatism, 10 physiotherapists, and 28 other workers. During 1974 Kurbadet's vegetarian restaurant was enlarged, and it served more than 200 meals a day.

Seventh-day Adventist health work in Oslo began July 4, 1898, when a clinic was opened by two graduates of Battle Creek Sanitarium, Alma Andersen and her sister, Emma Fleischer. They were followed in 1900 by O.J.O. Røst, who was trained at St. Helena Sanitarium, California, and later by managers C. M. Scott, Chr. Tobiassen, Bjarne Røst, Ola Stavadahl, and Arne Dyresen. (For a number of years the institution was listed in the Yearbook as Christiania Health Home.)

Kurbadet ceased operation in 1992.

Kuwait

KUWAIT. Its people are Arabs, but Indians and non-Kuwaiti Arabs are employed in large numbers. The oil fields employ several thousand Europeans and Americans. The official religion is Islam, with about three fourths of the population being Sunni and the rest Shia.

In 1963 there were two Sabbath schools in Kuwait, one at Kuwait, the capital, and another at Ahmadi. A church meeting hall was rented in 1964 and work there officially opened. The first baptism in Kuwait was conducted early in 1965 at a cove near Fahahil. Three were baptized.

The work in Kuwait has been carried on principally through student literature evangelism in the selling of health books, Ingathering solicitation, and temperance work in the showing of films and conducting of stop-smoking plans. Kuwait's church was organized in 1979. In 1983 the church was attached to the Middle East Union. In 1985 Kuwait was added to the East Mediterranean Field. By 1988 the membership was 188. Kwahu Hospital

KWAHU HOSPITAL. A general acute hospital of 140-bed capacity, operated by the West African Union Mission until it was nationalized by the government of Ghana on Sept. 16, 1974. It was situated near Mpraeso, Ghana, and was built with funds donated by the Ghana government, whose officials felt at that time that the Seventh-day Adventists could run a hospital efficiently and could give the nurses a moral as well as a medical training. The hospital, which was of pavilion-type construction, had separate units for male and female patients, a pediatrics ward, and a 50-bed obstetrical wing with 38 bassinets. It had facilities for medical and surgical cases, an X-ray Department, and a Department of Physiotherapy, and operated a School of Nursing and a School of Midwifery. The total capital investment in the institution was approximately $1 million. It served a population of about 50,000.

The hospital was opened in 1955, and Dr. J. Ashford Hyde, who was transferred from the Jengre Hospital, Nigeria, became its first medical director. L. Acton-Hubbard, also from Jengre, was director of nursing services, and Amy Horder was director of the School of Nursing. In 1961 the first business manager, B. J. Powell, came from England.

The School of Nursing, which operated from the founding of the hospital, was accredited by the Nursing Council of Ghana from its inception. The School of Midwifery was accredited by the Midwives' Council of Ghana in 1962.

Lacey, Herbert Camden

LACEY, HERBERT CAMDEN (1871—1950). Educator. Born in England, he moved with his family to India, and when 11, to Tasmania, where his family accepted the Seventh-day Adventist faith in 1887.

Coming to the United States, he graduated from Healdsburg College in 1892, then finished the classical course at Battle Creek College. After marrying Lillian Yarnell in 1895, he joined the first faculty of what is now Avondale College, where he taught Bible and Greek, and engaged in summer evangelism.

Returning to Healdsburg College, he taught Bible and ancient languages (1902—1904); then he became head of the Bible and Greek departments (1904—1913), and also president (1907—1913), of Stanborough Park Missionary College, which was to become Newbold College, England.

He taught Bible and biblical languages at Union College (1913—1918) and at what is now Columbia Union College (1918—1920), and then spent 15 months assisting in holding conventions in the Far East. Later he was pastor of churches in New York City and in southern California. For a time he was also professor of biblical exegesis at what is now Loma Linda University.

Lacunza, Manuel de

LACUNZA, MANUEL DE (1731—1801). A Jesuit of Chile and Italy, writer on the prophecies. Born in Santiago, he was admitted to probation in the Jesuit Order in his youth, became celebrated locally as a preacher, and took his vows in 1766. But in 1767 he was expelled from Chile, with all other Jesuits, when the order was suppressed in the Spanish dominions. Going first to Cádiz, Spain, and then settling at Imola, near Bologna, in central Italy, he began to study the Church Fathers and then the biblical prophecies, reading all the commentaries he could find. In 1779 he devoted himself solely to the study of the Scriptures.

The fruit of 20 years' study was his La Venida del Mesías en Gloria y Magestad ("The Coming of the Messiah in Glory and Majesty"), written in Spanish about 1791 under the pen name of Juan Josafa Ben-Ezra, supposedly a Christian Hebrew. The book emphasized the Second Advent at the beginning of the millennium.

There were no printed editions of his treatise before his death, but it soon became popular in manuscript form and was circulated in Spain and all the way "from Havana to Cape Horn."

The book was first printed in 1810 or 1811 near Cádiz, the printing being done secretly. It was subsequently printed in Spain in 1812, in London in 1816 (at the expense of General Belgrano, of Argentina), in Mexico in 1821—1822, in Paris in 1825, and again in London in 1826. Prominent Catholic writers either attacked or defended the work. In 1824 it was placed on the Index of Prohibited Books because Lacunza had exalted Scriptures above tradition, had taught that the antichrist was not an individual, had not acceptably venerated Catholic exposition, and had invited criticism by writing in the vernacular. In 1827 Edward Irving issued a two-volume English translation in London, as a result of which the book became well known in Britain.

Lacunza helped to turn the attention of many to the second advent of Christ. In this sense, he was regarded as a forerunner of William Miller. However, his interpretations of prophecies differed from Miller's on many points, and his futurism influenced the trend of British premillennialism into modern futurist dispensationalism.

Lake Geneva Sanitarium

LAKE GENEVA SANITARIUM (Clinique La Lignière). A 98-bed medical, dietetic, and physiotherapeutic institution held by the Société Philanthropique de “La Lignière,” Inc., Gland, Vaud, Switzerland, and operated by the Euro-Africa Division. There are four full-time physicians employed by the institution, including the medical director. The total number of employees is about 84. The yearly gross income is in the neighborhood of $6.5 million.

The institution was established in Basel in 1895 in the building vacated when the printing plant was closed because of the enforcement of Sunday laws, and was called the Institut Sanitaire (also listed as Basel Sanitarium). P. A. De Forest, M.D., a Canadian who had studied at Battle Creek, arrived with his wife and two little daughters in August 1895, and opened the institution at the beginning of 1896. Operating with the sanitarium was a school of nursing, training both men and women.

In 1904 a property of 90 acres (35 hectares) was purchased on the shores of Lake Geneva in La Lignière, Gland, Vaud, halfway between Lausanne and Geneva. Some of the buildings on the property were quickly adapted to meet immediate needs, and it was possible to move the medical institution and the school of nursing from Basel to Gland in June 1905. Dr. De Forest continued in charge, but since he was a foreigner without a Swiss diploma, a Swiss physician was legally responsible. The institution in Gland took the name Sanatorium du Léman (Lake Geneva Sanitarium). A large addition was erected in 1911 for treatment rooms. During World War I an operating room was added under the supervision of Dr. L. E. Conradi. There have been other expansions through the years. The equipment has been constantly improved in keeping with modern requirements. There is no longer a surgical section or nursing school.

A new wing was opened in 1955 and another in 1968. Reconstruction of the original building and the main entrance was completed in 1972. In 1962 a new chapel was dedicated. The nurses' home was completed two years later. During the years apartment houses have been constructed to house staff members. In 1978 the first cardiovascular rehabilitation center of French-speaking Switzerland was established. In the 1980s the building was substantially renovated.

Adjacent to the sanitarium, a horticultural unit and a farm provide flowers, vegetables, and fruit for the well-being of the patients.

History

History. Beginnings of the Work Among Blacks in the Area. At the time of the Civil War most Seventh-day Adventists lived in the North and for the most part were strongly against slavery. In SDA evangelism Black converts were brought into the churches with the Whites, and separate congregations were not at first formed. In churches where the Black membership was relatively small there was no inclination to form separate congregations, but Black churches were organized in some of the large cities.

In Chicago in 1905 a group of Blacks, members of the Southside church, organized a neighborhood church, with J. R. Buster, a literature evangelist, as W. D. Forde, who was made pastor in February 1910, recalls finding the group meeting in a rented store building on State Street, near Root Street. Later the congregation, which continued to grow, purchased a building on Dearborn Street, then in 1918 moved to larger quarters on Prairie Avenue. During these years several successful tent meetings were conducted. When a new church was built in 1925 on the site of G. E. Peters' evangelistic meetings, the congregation took the name Shiloh Seventh-day Adventist Church. With a membership nearing 500, the church was the largest in the Chicago Conference. M. G. Nunez, Herbert D. Greene, O. A. Troy, Harry E. Ford, T. H. Allison, Samuel Meyers, and H. W. Kibble are some of the workers who contributed to the work in the Chicago area. The 1993 membership was 3,036. Fifteen Chicago area churches began at Shiloh.

In Detroit, Michigan, the work began with J. W. Owens, who in July 1910 systematically distributed tracts and small books, hoping to find openings for Bible studies. By Dec. 31, 1910, he had organized a group of 17. The work later developed under the leadership of such men as W. H. Green (later secretary of the North American Negro Department of the General Conference), T. B. Buckner, under whose leadership the Hartford Avenue church was constructed, U. S. Willis, J. H. Laurence, and L. H. Bland. The Hartford Avenue church became mother to at least seven churches in the Detroit area.

In Indianapolis, Indiana, in 1907, L. W. Browne held tent meetings and won about 15 converts. One of his assistants was William A. Green, who had been a worker on the Morning Star, J. E. White's Mississippi riverboat, which had been used in the missionary venture that developed extensive Black work in the South. The Indianapolis church purchased its first building in 1911, but in 1938 erected a new brick building on Capitol Avenue (the church is presently located on East Forty-ninth Street). E. L. Campbell, Sydney Scott, W. D. Forde,

E. A. Jarreau, and J. H. Laurence were among those who built up the cause in the Indianapolis area. By 1915 a church had been established also in Springfield, Illinois.

The various congregations that had been established opened church schools. From these large centers the work extended into the smaller cities. Membership increased as Southern SDAs joined in the great wave of Black migration from the Southern states to the Northern industrial centers during and after World War I. By the end of 1944 membership among Blacks in the Lake Union Conference area had grown to about 2,500.

Lake Region Conference Organized. The General Conference in its Spring Meeting, Apr. 10, 1944, recommended: "That in unions where the Colored constituency is considered by the union conference committee to be sufficiently large, and where the financial income and territory warrant, Colored conferences be organized."

The Lake Union Conference executive committee adopted the recommendation of the General Conference on July 17. Then a special meeting of the African-American constituents of the Lake Union Conference was called for Sept. 26, 1944. In this meeting, held at the Shiloh church in Chicago, the Lake Region Conference was formed. It was so named because this one conference encompassed the whole region of the Lake Union Conference. J. G. Dasent was elected president; F. N. Crowe, secretary-treasurer; Virgil Gibbons, publishing secretary;

W. J. Kisack, MV and educational secretary;

L. B. Baker, Book and Bible House manager; J. E. Johnson, Sabbath school and home missionary secretary. The Lake Region Conference began to function as such Jan. 1, 1945.

Soon after organization, the new conference purchased a tract of 120 acres (50 hectares) in Cass County, Michigan, for camp meeting purposes. The property has been constantly improved, until at the present time the total value of buildings and land is in excess of $2 million.

Since its founding, the Lake Region Conference has continued to grow. By 1993 the conference membership increased from about 2,500 at its inception to 20,905. In 1960 a new conference office building was constructed, replacing the old building that had served since its organization. This structure is valued at $105,000.

Lakeside Adventist Hospital

LAKESIDE ADVENTIST HOSPITAL (formerly Lakeside Medical Centre). A 40-bed medical institution located at Kandy, Sri Lanka. Land was purchased in 1963 opposite the world-famous tooth temple of the Buddha. The hospital actually began as an outdoor clinic in 1964 under the direction of Dr. and Mrs. Noel Fernando. A Thirteenth Sabbath Offering overflow assisted in erecting a new building. In 1993 the hospital offered in-patient and out-patient departments, laboratory, X-ray, surgery, physiotherapy, pharmacy, and free health-education facilities. The present staff is approximately 80 percent Seventh-day Adventist.

Lakpahana Adventist College and Seminary

LAKPAHANA ADVENTIST COLLEGE AND SEMINARY (Light of Sri Lanka Training Institute). A coeducational boarding school on the elementary, secondary, and junior college levels, operated by the Sri Lanka Union of the Southern Asia Division at Mailapitiya, Kandy district, Sri Lanka (near the center of the island, about 85 miles [135 kilometers] from Colombo). The school's name means "Light of Sri Lanka." It offers preschool through the General Certificate of Education examinations conducted by the Education Department of the Sri Lanka government. The school owns 168 acres (68 hectares) of land. Buildings constructed with the help of the Thirteenth Sabbath Offering overflow of June 1955 include an administration building housing offices, classrooms, library, science block, and chapel; men's dormitory; women's dormitory; 18 staff residences; and various industrial buildings providing facilities for approximately 220 students.

One hundred twenty acres (50 hectares) planted to coconut provide opportunity for student labor. Additional work opportunities are provided in the poultry, carpentry, and dairy industries.

The institute had its beginning in a mission school, which was opened in Moratuwa, near Colombo, in 1923, with an enrollment of 18. After opposition from the government and from the Buddhists of the neighborhood, the school was transferred to Kottawa, Pannipitiya, 12 miles (20 kilometers) from Colombo, and under the management of Miss Goonetilleke, was operated there as a boarding school, named Sinhalese Primary School, or Ceylon Mission School. In 1926 the school was transferred to a seven-acre (2.8-hectare) coconut estate. This school in 1950 became the Ceylon Union High School, which was moved in 1952 to Mailpitiya, its present site, and was renamed the Lakpahana Training Institute. Later it was renamed Lakpahana Adventist College and Seminary.

In 1970 it was moved to rented quarters near Colombo, Sri Lanka, and enlarged with the aid of press rehabilitation funds. In 1974 a building was constructed and additional equipment added. In recent years it has been modernized with both offset and letterhead printing facilities. Recently a Macintosh desktop publishing capability was added.

Lale, Donald

LALE, DONALD (1931—1981). Educator, missionary, martyr. Reared on the Isle of Wight, he joined the Royal Air Force and was stationed on Mauritius, where a French family studied the Bible with him. He was baptized after returning to England and attended Newbold College. Later he took further training at Stoke Rochford College. With his wife, Ann, also a teacher, who had been born and reared a Seventh-day Adventist and had graduated as a Bible instructor from Newbold College, he answered a call to Rhodesia (now Zimbabwe), where they taught at Lower Gwelo College for two years. During the years of war for independence, they moved to Anderson School for three years.

In 1980, with Zimbabwe newly independent, the Lales moved to Inyazura Secondary School to teach Bible and English. There Don and Ann were cruelly murdered by terrorists less than two months after their arrival, leaving their two sons orphaned.

Lamb Shelters

LAMB SHELTERS. Inexpensive Sabbath school rooms constructed for the use of children. They are used extensively in the Far Eastern Division.

The first lamb shelter was dedicated on Mar. 4, 1967, at the Togop church in Sabah, Borneo. The idea originated with Mrs. Paulene Barnett, who in 1967 was serving as Sabbath school secretary of the Southeast Asia Union Mission. At a presidents' annual committee meeting in Singapore, George Munson, president of the Borneo Mission, was given $100 for the building of the first lamb shelter. Church buildings consisting of one room in some missions of the Far Eastern Division were for adults only. Mrs. Barnett insisted that the "lamb must be fed too!"

As a direct result of the fourth quarter's Thirteenth Sabbath Offering in 1971, 161 lamb shelters were built. Forty-nine more were provided by a subsidy by the Far Eastern Division, and 92 others were built as a result of special donations received from the United States. This made a total of 302 in 1974, but many more have been built of which we have no accurate records.

All labor in building the lamb shelters is the responsibility of the members. Subsidies are granted by the mission. Each shelter is a simple building 12' x 18' (4 m. x 5 m.). Minimum standards for construction are: cement floor, zinc or aluminum roof, wood siding, door that can be locked, wire mesh screening over window areas, benches, exterior painting and creosoting of all wood framing, adequate storage for supplies. Double lamb shelters should be divided by a permanent partition and contain a minimum size for either side of 200 square feet (20 square meters).

Lamb shelters, started in the Far Eastern Division, have become popular in many other areas of the world field.

Lamson, Mary Elizabeth

LAMSON, MARY ELIZABETH (1875—1969). Educator. She was born in Michigan and received her early education in local schools. In 1895 she began teaching, a career that was to span 40 years.

In 1898 the first summer school for the training of teachers for Seventh-day Adventist schools was started. Mary borrowed the $5 entrance fee from her brother and enrolled. That fall she lived in the home of Dr. J. H. Kellogg and taught six of his adopted children, all ninth graders.

She served for two years as preceptress of Battle Creek College. She enjoyed the work, but when the college moved to Berrien Springs she remained in Battle Creek, where she taught church school for five years.

In 1918 she was invited by newly elected president Frederick Griggs to serve as preceptress of Emmanuel Missionary College and held this position until her retirement in 1935. During this time she took graduate studies and received her B.A. degree in 1928. Lamson Hall, residence for young women at Andrews University, is named in her honor.

Lamson, Phoebe

LAMSON, PHOEBE (fl. 1860s). Physician. Born in New York, she was an alumna of the Dansville, New York, Health Reform and Hydrotherapy Center. She was one of the first physicians at the Western Health Reform Institute at Battle Creek, and knew personally John Harvey Kellogg and James and Ellen White. It was noted that she gave herself unreservedly to the care and nurture of her patients.

Landmarks

LANDMARKS. An expression taken apparently from Prov. 22:28 (“Remove not the ancient landmark, which thy fathers have set” (cf. Prov. 23:10; see also Deut. 19:14) and used by Seventh-day Adventists to describe the doctrines that have made them a distinct religious group. These doctrines are commonly understood to be those relating to the sanctuary, the three angels’ messages of Rev. 14, the Second Advent, the millennium, death, the seventh-day Sabbath, and the Spirit of Prophecy. Among other terms used with a meaning similar to landmarks are: “waymarks,” “special points,” “pillars of our faith,” “the foundations,” “pegs,” and “pins.” In SDA thinking, the landmarks are doctrines of such vital importance that they cannot be altered without changing the nature of the SDA Church.

Among the early Sabbathkeeping Adventists the term landmarks was used with reference to the ending of the 2300 days of Dan. 8:14. It was later that the expression came to denote other doctrines that have made SDAs a distinct religious group.

The earliest appearance of the term landmarks in an SDA publication was James White’s use of it in connection with the 1844 ending of the 2300 days of Dan. 8:14 (A Word to the “Little Flock” [1847], p. 5).

Another of the early occurrences of the expression in Seventh-day Adventist writings is a letter by Ellen White (in The Present Truth 1:64, March 1850) in which those who abandoned Miller’s chronology of the 2300 days and set a new date for the end of the period are said to “have removed the landmarks.”

In a statement about a year later, those who were setting new times for the ending of the 2300 days were again warned that they were removing the landmarks. “Do not think us harsh and unchristian when we, honestly and in love, tell you that this work of removing the ‘landmarks,’ and following on from one point of time to another to find the end of the 2300 days, like a man following his shadow, dishonors the Advent cause, destroys true faith, offends God, and if persisted in, will lead to certain ruin” (James White, in Review and Herald 1:52, March 1851).

An article entitled “Removing the Landmarks” appeared in the Review and Herald of June 9, 1853, written by E. R. Seaman, of Rochester, New York, deploring the fact that some who had acted a conspicuous part in giving the judgment-hour message had ranked themselves “among the number who were still removing the landmarks,” because they persisted in fixing new dates “for the termination of the days.” As SDA doctrines developed, the term came to include other distinctive Adventist teachings. In retrospect in 1889 on the ancient landmarks Ellen White wrote: “The passing of the time in 1844 was a period of great events, opening to our astonished eyes the cleansing of the sanctuary transpiring in heaven, and having decided relation to God’s people upon the earth, [also]the first and second angels’ messages and the third, unfurling the banner on which was inscribed, ‘The commandments of God and the faith of Jesus.’ One of the landmarks under this message was the temple of God, seen by His truth-loving people in heaven, and the ark containing the law of God. The light of the Sabbath of the fourth commandment flashed its strong rays in the pathway of the transgressors of God's law. The nonimmortality of the wicked is an old landmark. I can call to mind nothing more that can come under the head of the old landmarks" (Counsels to Writers and Editors, pp. 30, 31).

On several occasions Ellen White warned concerning attempts to remove the landmarks of the Seventh-day Adventist faith. "After the truth has been proclaimed as a witness to all nations, every conceivable power of evil will be set in operation, and minds will be confused by many voices crying, 'Lo, here is Christ, Lo, he is there. This is the truth, I have the message from God, he has sent me with great light.' Then there will be a removing of the landmarks, and an attempt to tear down the pillars of our faith" (Review and Herald 69:769, Dec. 13, 1892).

"Spurious scientific theories [pantheism] are coming in as a thief in the night, stealing away the landmarks and undermining the pillars of our faith. . . . The most specious temptations of the enemy are coming in on the highest, most elevating plane. These spiritualize the doctrines of present truth until there is no distinction between the substance and the shadow" (General Conference Bulletin, Apr. 6, 1903, p. 87).

Lane, Elbert B.

LANE, ELBERT B. (1840—1881). Evangelist. Selling his farm, he began to preach in Michigan in 1868. In 1869 he and his brother, S. H. Lane, engaged in evangelism in Indiana, which was then a mission, but which he left a conference. In 1871 he spent some time in Tennessee near Nashville, being the first Seventh-day Adventist minister to enter the South. The church he established at Edgefield Junction was the first Seventh-day Adventist church in the South. During his illness, his wife, Ellen, took his place in the pulpit and in visiting, and from then on preached independently with marked success.

In 1872 he returned to evangelism in Michigan, and two years later entered the Seventh Day Baptist college in Milton, Wisconsin, to further his knowledge of Hebrew and Greek. He then worked in Ohio and New England, and in 1876 he and J. O. Corliss began work in Virginia, where there were no SDAs at that time. Two years later he was recalled to Michigan for evangelistic and pastoral work, and remained there until his death.

Lane, Ellen S.

LANE, ELLEN S. (1800s). Health and temperance worker, preacher. Married to Elbert B. Lane, a minister, Ellen was able to preach in his place during his illness. She was the first Seventh-day Adventist woman to receive a ministerial license. This was issued to her by the Michigan Conference. The Lanes worked together in Pennsylvania and in the Shenandoah Valley of Virginia, where they lectured around the New Market area and helped develop the New Market church. Ellen spoke mostly on health and temperance subjects and worked from house to house, holding prayer meetings in the homes. Her license was renewed in 1878. She continued working with her husband until his death in 1881, then labored alone until 1889.

Lane, Sands Harvey

LANE, SANDS HARVEY (1844—1906). Evangelist. He was employed as a youth in the printshop of the Review and Herald, but in 1869 joined his brother, E. B. Lane, in evangelistic work in Indiana. Some years later (1877) he became president of the Indiana Conference. Called to England in 1885, he engaged in evangelistic work in England and for a time in Ireland. He was president of the New York (1889—1895, 1903—1906), Illinois (1895—1899), and Southern Illinois conferences (1902—1903). He was president of the board of the Seventh-day Adventist Publishing Association (1899—1900), and also of the board of trustees of the General Conference Association (1901—1903).

Laos

LAOS. A small People's Democratic Republic bordered by Thailand, China, Myanmar, Vietnam, and Cambodia, with a population (1994) of 4.7 million and an area of 91,428 square miles (236,800 square kilometers). Buddhism is the state religion and is practiced by the lowland Lao; the inland tribal people are animists. Christian missions are working in a number of areas.

The territory of Laos is a part of the Thailand Mission in the Southeast Asia Union of the Far Eastern Division. The first Seventh-day Adventist mission station was opened in 1957 by Richard C. Hall and his family at Nam Tha, the center of one of the northwestern provinces. A short time later Nai Mun Lansri and Abel Pangan and his wife joined them, and by 1961 a church with 44 members, mostly from the Maeo tribe, had been organized.

Because of war, all mission personnel were evacuated from Laos early in 1962. Shortly after their departure military forces overran Nam Tha, and the mission buildings were destroyed.

A Filipino missionary was called to reopen the work in 1967. A. G. Biton and his family arrived in the field in 1968. By 1974 two churches were organized—one at Nam Yawn, with 73 members, and the other at Vientiane, with 14 members. In 1975, because of Communist advances in Southeast Asia, all SDA contact with Laos was cut off until Laos opened her border with Thailand in 1984. At that time Rungsit Saejang was able to enter the country and survey the situation. He found two churches still active: the Laos church in the capital city of Vientiane and a Hmong church at Nam Yawn.

Because the Laotian government would not allow a Thai pastor to work there, it was not until 1991 that Pastor Houmphanh, a former refugee repatriated from France, was assigned to oversee the work. In 1993 there were 120 church members and Sabbath school attendees in Laos.

By 1963 the school had 200 students in grades 1 to 8 with Ginovio Eustaquio as its principal. In 1993 the school had 304 students and nine teachers. It has had 14 principals. In 1993 Petronila Santana was principal.

La Paz Adventist Clinic

LA PAZ ADVENTIST CLINIC (Clínica Adventista de La Paz). A service begun in 1980 in a building near the headquarters of the West Bolivia Mission offices. It began as a pharmacy and served the area where the Chulumani Hospital had operated before closing in 1970. The mission had maintained the Adventist Ambulant Clinic in answer to the needs of the community.

The La Paz Adventist Clinic was officially opened on Nov. 19, 1989. The effect has been the relief of pain and illness for many people as well as a promotion of the gospel message.

La Rue, Abram

LA RUE, ABRAM (1822—1903). Pioneer self-supporting lay missionary in eastern Asia. Born in New Jersey, he spent his early manhood in California and Idaho, where he amassed and lost a considerable fortune in gold mining. He spent some time in the Hawaiian Islands, returned to California, and there, while working as a shepherd, he accepted the Seventh-day Adventist faith. Immediately the new convert requested a mission appointment to China. The General Conference declined because of his advanced age and advised that he go to one of the Pacific islands. After spending a term in Healdsburg College, he worked his way to Honolulu, arriving in 1883 or 1884 with another colporteur, and sold books in the city and on the ships in port, with the result that W. M. Healey was sent in 1885 to establish Adventist work in the islands.

In 1888 La Rue went to Hong Kong. He set up a seamen's mission and for 14 years did colporteur work, mainly on the ships in Hong Kong harbor, but during that time he also made trips to Shanghai, Japan, Borneo, Java, Ceylon, Sarawak, Singapore, and once even to Palestine and Lebanon, selling books and distributing tracts wherever his ship stopped.

Although he worked in Hong Kong chiefly for Europeans, he did circulate two tracts in Chinese, translated for him by a Chinese friend, a colonial court translator. In 1902 J. N. Anderson arrived in Hong Kong and baptized seven of La Rue's converts, including six British Navy seamen.

Until the time of his death in Hong Kong, La Rue was a man of tireless energy, with a rare gift in meeting people and conveying his own religious convictions.

Las Condes Adventist Academy

LAS CONDES ADVENTIST ACADEMY (Colegio Adventista de Las Condes). A coeducational institution offering the two last years of primary school and the complete secondary course. It belongs to the Central Chile Conference and is situated in Santiago, the capital city of the country. The staff is composed of three administrative workers and 17 teachers. The 1993 school year ended with 143 students in the high school section and 180 in the primary section.

In 1962, before the existence of the Chile Union, a request was submitted to the South American Division via the Austral Union to organize a day academy for the first three years of secondary classes. In 1963 the school began to function, and in 1968 authorization was requested to add the second cycle of secondary-level courses, which began in 1969.

In 1971 land was purchased in Las Condes municipal district, with an area of 81,420 square feet (7,567 square meters) providing 14,000 square feet (1,300 square meters) of construction suitable for the academy. Two years later two additional classrooms with a total area of 1,500 square feet (140 square meters) were built. In 1993 the library contained about 2,000 books.

La Sierra Adventist Academy

LA SIERRA ADVENTIST ACADEMY. A coeducational day school on the senior high school level at Riverside, California. Along with an elementary school under the administration of a principal, it is operated by a board representing 15 constituent churches, La Sierra University, and the Southeastern California Conference. Both academy and elementary teachers are considered members of the college staff by virtue of their responsibility in the Department of Education as supervising instructors. The early history and circumstances of its establishment are covered in detail under La Sierra University.

La Sierra Academy was originally founded in 1922 at the site of the present college campus; in 1925 it was renamed La Sierra Academy and Normal School; in 1927 it became Southern California Junior College, and in 1939 La Sierra College. During these years of rapid growth, the grades of the secondary level were referred to as La Sierra Academy, but under the varied titles of the parent institution.

In 1940 the secondary grades, under the title of La Sierra College Preparatory School, were provided with separate classrooms in the basement floor of Hole Memorial Auditorium, and the lower chapel in the same building was used for assembly. So far as possible, the secondary students were housed apart from the college students, and the preparatory school staff had no control over the government of the dormitories.

The need for separate academy facilities was recognized by Elmer Digneo, on the academy staff since 1940 and principal from 1947 to 1953. During the administration of

G. T. Anderson, the college board purchased nine and a half acres (four hectares) next to the La Sierra College demonstration (elementary) school and the Loma Linda Food Company for the erection of new and separate facilities for the elementary and secondary grades. A single administrator, as principal and manager, was to coordinate the teacher education program with the college Department of Education and to provide for the community needs of the constituent churches, and also to handle the funds. The academy moved to the new location during Christmas vacation of the school year of 1954—1955.

In 1958—1962 a long-range development plan was made and implemented so that the elementary and secondary schools are contained entirely on the new premises. The La Sierra church sponsored a development program amounting to about $100,000, providing a well and an irrigation-sprinkler system, a woodshop and equipment, slab and surfaced courts with fully equipped shower and locker facilities. A gymnasium-cafeteria building was completed in 1967, and a vocational building was erected in 1968. That same year a science building and an administration building were completed.

The La Sierra College Demonstration School and the La Sierra College Preparatory School combined in 1962 to become the La Sierra Academy and Elementary School. In 1987 “Adventist” was added to the school’s name. More than 3,700 students have graduated from the twelfth grade at La Sierra Adventist Academy during the 71 years of its existence.

La Sierra University

LA SIERRA UNIVERSITY. A coeducational institution of higher learning located in Riverside, California. In 1993 approximately 1,800 students were enrolled in the university's various on- and off-campus programs; these students were served by some 250 faculty and staff. The center of the university is the College of Arts and Sciences, which offers undergraduate and graduate instruction in 17 fields. It also comprises Schools of Business and Management, Education, and Religion, each of which offers undergraduate and graduate degrees, along with a Center for Lifelong Learning, designed to meet the higher educational needs of adults.

According to the university's mission statement, its Seventh-day Adventist heritage and commitment provide "a perspective for its educational programs and projects, a motivation for its intellectual vitality and rigor, a framework for its moral values and lifestyle, and a basis for its social consciousness and public service." The integration of religious belief with academic study is fostered by the requirement that a student in almost any degree program complete a course focusing on the relationship between religion and the issues confronted in connection with the field of study. The central function of Christian faith in the life of the campus is evinced by its weekly chapel services; on-campus, student-led religious programs; and ongoing community-involvement efforts. An annual Community Service Day has drawn positive media comment since its inception in 1989, and the university is involved in a number of other projects, including: prison ministries, Adopt a Grandparent, housing repair and painting for the needy elderly and disabled, counseling services for local juvenile offenders, outreach to Mexico, and various other programs for children and churches. The Resurrection Pageant, a dramatic indoor/outdoor portrayal of the Passion of Christ, draws more than 5,000 people to the campus each year.

The Seventh-day Adventist Church's first student missionary was sent abroad from La Sierra for a full-year term in 1964. This was the beginning of a continuing program of volunteer service that soon expanded to involve numerous students in yearlong mission stints around the globe. A major form of student mission service has traditionally been teaching in mission-operated English-language schools. Since 1990 La Sierra students have also assisted with overseas service projects under the auspices of the Adventist Development and Relief Agency in such locations as Kenya, Tanzania, and Nicaragua. As of mid-1993, 261 La Sierra students had served traditional student mission assignments, and an additional 56 had worked as ADRA volunteers.

Various campus resources add to the quality of the university's educational programs and enhance its ability to contribute to the life of the church and the local community. The Brandstater Gallery regularly features work by significant contemporary artists and provides a genteel setting for university cultural programs. The World Museum of Natural History features, among other things, one of the world's largest and finest collections of mineral spheres as well as notable taxidermy displays of crocodilians, turtles, tortoises, lizards, snakes, and Southeast Asian birds (the work of world-class taxidermist and La Sierra alumnus E. A. “Billy” Hankins III). The John Hancock Center for Youth Ministry supports the Seventh-day Adventist Church’s local and global efforts to meet the spiritual needs of its young people. And the Fernando and Ana Stahl Center offers opportunity for the university community to promote the cause of world service in a variety of ways.

The university library’s holdings include some 175,000 books, 35,000 bound journal volumes representing more than 1,500 currently received journal titles, and extensive microfilm and microfiche collections. The Heritage Room provides members of the university community and others with access to invaluable information about SDA history; a particular strength of the Heritage Room collection is its array of materials related to the origin and development of SDA education. The William M. Landeen Collection on the history of Christianity contains items significant for the study of the Protestant Reformation.

Among the university’s publications are Adventist Heritage, a journal of Seventh-day Adventist history; La Sierra Today, a magazine for alumni and friends; Musings, a literary and cultural journal; and various specialized newsletters. By 1993 the University Press had issued 13 volumes—among them the principal report on the Valuegenesis study, designed to aid the church in eliciting and retaining the commitment of young people to Adventism and its values. (V. Bailey Gillespie, La Sierra professor of theology and Christian personality, served as a principal Valuegenesis investigator.)

Campus diversity is a longstanding element of the university’s heritage. At the beginning of the 1990s, undergraduate students represented 34 states and 75 different countries. In 1992—1993 African-Americans and other Blacks made up 7.6 percent of the on-campus student body; Native Americans and Alaska Natives, 0.4 percent; Caucasians, 40.5 percent; Hispanics, 15 percent; persons from the Indian subcontinent, 2.8 percent; persons from the Middle East, 2 percent; and East Asians and Pacific Islanders, 31 percent. This diverse student body is served by faculty and staff members from numerous ethnic and cultural backgrounds.

University faculty contribute to progress in their disciplines and enrich their teaching by engaging in research and other professional development activities. The number of professional presentations and publications has increased strikingly in recent years, as has university funding of research grants; in 1989—1990 university faculty members made some 140 presentations related to their areas of study. Recently published books by LSU faculty have focused on such diverse areas as the relationship between faith and reason and the development of Central American railways.

History

History. 1. La Sierra Academy. When the Southeastern California Conference was formed (1915), it had no academy. The Southern California Conference had, since 1902, operated San Fernando Academy, at San Fernando (as Fernando College, 1901—1907; Fernando Academy, 1907—1914). By 1920 it had outgrown its antiquated buildings, which had been purchased from a Methodist school of theology. In view of this, the presidents of the Southern and Southeastern California conferences, W. M. Adams and J. J. Nethery, began looking for a suitable site for a new academy to serve both conferences. After the failure of joint efforts to find a site at reasonable cost, the Southeastern California Conference purchased in 1922, at the cost of $112,500, 330 acres (135 hectares) of land from the Hole estate near Riverside.

Meanwhile, in May 1922 this conference had organized the new school, named La Sierra Academy, with J. I. Robison as principal and R. F. Emerson as general manager. On July 1, 1922, Robison announced the opening on Oct. 3 of a full-fledged 12-grade school. He later described the situation: “We did not have a building. We did not have a book in our library, nor a test tube for the laboratory. We did not have a desk or a chair. We did not even have a faculty. . . . But we did have faith. . . . And so with faith and courage and loyal cooperation and united effort we stepped forward, facing every difficulty, confident that the Lord was leading, and that we would open school on October 3, as we had advertised.”

By Oct. 3, 1922, the boys’ dormitory, including classrooms on the first floor, was ready. The girls’ dormitory was only half plastered, and with the stairs not in, the girls had to climb ladders to get to their unfinished rooms. The building was completed before the end of the school year. Oil and wood stoves were used for heating, and oil lamps or candles for lighting. School opened with 84 students.

Plans were made immediately for two-year commercial and teacher-training curriculums beyond the academy level. In 1923, with the closing of San Fernando Academy, students from the Southern California Conference were encouraged to attend La Sierra Academy. The administration building was finished during the second year of the school’s existence. That year La Sierra Academy had 204 students, with 31 graduates.

From 1925 the academy was operated jointly by the Southern and Southeastern California conferences. Enrollment growth was slow because five nonboarding academies were developing in the two conferences.

The problem of adequate water for the institution was solved in the fall of 1925, when W. J. Hole, former owner of the property, gave the school one of his wells in the valley and $5,000 with which to construct a pipeline to the institution. He later contributed two additional wells. (See also La Sierra Academy.)

2. Southern California Junior College. In 1927 La Sierra Academy became Southern California Junior College, whose first president and general manager was W. W. Ruble. To provide for the needs of the enlarged institution, major additions were made in office space, laboratory equipment, heating facilities, and the library, and an elementary school was built on the north side of the campus. During the next three years other facilities and the industrial program of the college were improved.

A critical period came when, because of the economic depression and the founding of new academies in the area, the academy enrollment decreased from 250 in 1928 to 95 in 1935. At the same time the junior college enrollment grew but slowly. Yet the improvement of the scholastic program and the physical plant continued in spite of the 1930s depression. The weekly newspaper, The College Criterion, was published for the first time in 1929. Also, during this time an efficient program of student recruitment was organized. In 1930 a “college day” program, the first in any SDA college, was held, in which academy seniors from the two conferences visited the campus. The associated student organization was established in the winter of 1931—1932. A new science hall was constructed in 1932, the addition of which led the Northwest Association of Colleges and Secondary Schools to accredit the junior college on May 1, 1933. A swimming pool, a camp meeting auditorium, and Hole Memorial Auditorium were constructed between 1935 and 1937.

3. La Sierra College. La Sierra College was accredited as a three-year college in 1939 by the Northwest Association of Colleges and Secondary Schools. This three-year accreditation granted by the association was unique and was designed to strengthen the premedical curriculum. In 1939 and 1940 a new men's dormitory and a new women's dormitory were constructed on the campus; a cafeteria building was completed in 1941. The increase in enrollment to 480 by 1940 made necessary the rapid expansion of the physical plant and the staff. In that same year the preparatory school was separated from the college.

With the coming of World War II and the resultant freezing of educational programs in Seventh-day Adventist colleges, the advance of La Sierra College to full college status was delayed. The war brought other critical problems. A personal appeal by the college president prevented a camp directly in front of the campus. The Navy manifested interest in taking over the school, but fortunately did not. In 1944 the General Conference authorized La Sierra College to offer four years of work, and in 1945 the college conferred its first degrees. One year later, in 1946, the institution was accredited as a four-year college by the Northwest Association of Secondary and Higher Schools.

The postwar period was marked by rapid advancement. The college enrollment grew steadily after 1942, and in a boom period it reached 919 during the winter term of 1947—1948. New buildings erected in this period were the library-administration building (1946), the college church (1947), an industrial arts building, and a science building.

The 1950s saw continued growth of the physical plant, the increase of enrollment, and the continued strengthening of the college staff. In 1953 the college was accredited by the Western College Association. In order to protect the water supply of the college, 86 acres (35 hectares) of land to the south of the campus were acquired in 1954. By 1962 there were added a modern physical education facility, which included shower rooms, swimming pool, and tennis courts; a modern dairy; and poultry buildings.

By 1974 further major construction on the La Sierra campus included, besides additions to existing buildings, a high-rise men's residence hall housing 284 students, classroom-office buildings to house the departments of consumer-related sciences and agriculture, a gymnasium-auditorium (known as the Alumni Pavilion), and a library designed to accommodate 235,750 volumes and 550 patrons plus facilities for audiovisual services and a curriculum laboratory.

After World War II, the college saw a marked increase in cultural diversity among its students. Professors such as Edward Heppenstall encouraged creative reflection on the SDA heritage. And the growing appreciation for the serious thinking fostered at La Sierra was matched by the recognition that the college was establishing a unique link with the nearby College of Medical Evangelists (CME). SDA students began to look to La Sierra to provide them with the skills and contacts needed to make them successful applicants for admission to the church's health-science school. (The 1966 Danforth Foundation study, "Church-sponsored Higher Education in America," noted that a higher percentage of La Sierra graduates had received M.D. degrees in the years 1950—1959 than those of any other church-related institution of higher learning in the United States.) Academic programs flourished; by 1965 La Sierra College had a graduate division, and the faculty were cultivating an institutional vision that promoted postbaccalaureate studies in more than a half dozen fields.

La Sierra College's relationship with Loma Linda University, as CME was renamed in 1961, came under close scrutiny as church leaders considered options for converting Loma Linda University from a health sciences institution to a comprehensive university. Rejecting plans to create a competitive liberal arts college in Loma Linda, LLU's leaders pressed for a merger with La Sierra College, which occurred in 1967 when La Sierra became LLU's Riverside campus. Productive scholarly interchange and creative synergy resulted from the merger. However, after a 1986 meeting of the university constituency, at which concerns regarding university organization and operations surfaced, church and university administrators began to explore the possibility of consolidating all university programs in Loma Linda. But the cost of relocation together with on-campus and community support for retention of La Sierra in its current location led the trustees to abandon plans for consolidation.

Following further discussions of LLU's structure, the trustees voted to recommend a complete organizational separation between the La Sierra and Loma Linda campuses (officially effected at a meeting of the LLU constituency on Aug. 25, 1990). Fritz Guy, a 1952 graduate of La Sierra College and a former dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, was provisionally named to head the institution, identified temporarily as Loma Linda University, Riverside.

Broad-based alumni and community support led the trustees of the new university to adopt the name La Sierra University for the fledgling institution on Mar. 7, 1991. Their resolution noted that by opting to include the word "university" in La Sierra's name, they had "taken a policy position affecting, at the least, resources and governance." With this commitment clear, and with a new administration in place, La Sierra University began the task of charting a course toward the future.

Under its new name, La Sierra continued its progressive commitment to teaching, scholarship, and service and began to reestablish an independent identity. Especially important in this process was Global Village '92, a yearlong series of programs, organized in conjunction with ADRA International, that accented global service and responsibility and garnered significant attention from national and international news media.

Educational sociologist Garland Dulan, formerly of Oakwood College, assumed the newly created position of provost in 1992. Fritz Guy decided to return to the classroom at the conclusion of the 1992—1993 academic year. To succeed him the trustees named Lawrence T. Geraty, an internationally noted archaeologist who was serving at the time as president of Atlantic Union College.

In 1993 anticipated projects included a proposed science center, a major library addition, and expansion of the University Commons. The university's current property holdings included 520 acres (210 hectares) of land, of which approximately 300 were available for potential development. University policy dictates that proceeds from the development of land assets be invested to preserve the principle in perpetuity and that only a portion of the income be used to fund university operations and capital improvements. Thus, the proceeds from the development of any land will become an endowment that will provide a permanent source of income for the university.

Current Academic Programs

Current Academic Programs. College of Arts and Sciences. The purpose of the College of Arts and Sciences is to provide an environment for learning and personal growth that challenges and enables students to develop their intellects and their intellectual skills, to examine their values, and to mature in character and in Christian commitment. The college offers coursework in the traditional liberal arts and sciences (the humanities and fine arts, the natural sciences and mathematics, and the social and behavioral sciences) as well as in various areas of applied study (physical education, office management, and social work).

In 1993—1994, 17 departments of instruction offered 15 Bachelor of Arts degrees, seventeen Bachelor of Science degrees, a Bachelor of Music degree, a Bachelor of Social Work degree, a Bachelor of Fine Arts degree, six Associate in Arts degrees, and two Associate in Science degrees. Graduate study—leading in some cases to the master's degree—is possible in art, chemistry, English, history, modern languages, music, office management, health and physical education, and psychology. The college offers course work leading to admission to professional curricula and programs at various levels; and it cooperates with the School of Education in offering graduate programs in teaching.

School of Religion. The Department of Religion at La Sierra College was consistently an active contributor to the life of the campus. It became part of Loma Linda University's Division of Religion when La Sierra and LLU merged in 1967. Twenty years later, in 1987, the division became the School of Religion, the name change serving to highlight the diversity of the school's academic roles and the importance of religious instruction within the university. Loma Linda University's La Sierra-based religion programs and faculty became the La Sierra University School of Religion when La Sierra became an independent university in 1990; La Sierra's School of Religion also assumed responsibility for all graduate programs in religion offered by Loma Linda University at the time of La Sierra's separation from Loma Linda.

The School of Religion provides general religious studies for all students in every school of the university. It prepares undergraduate majors for the ministry and for graduate and professional study. It offers graduate education for teachers and other Christian workers. And it supports the university, the church, its institutions, and the discipline of religious studies with research and publication and various programs of interest to the church and the community.

The school offers B.A. degrees in ministerial studies (with emphases in pastoral ministry, bilingual ministry, and educational ministry) and religion, and M.A. degrees in systematic theology, Christian ethics, church history, mission studies, church and ministry, and biblical studies. It also offers continuing education classes in various parts of the Pacific Union.

School of Education. In 1968 La Sierra's Department of Education became Loma Linda University's School of Education, which was retained as part of La Sierra University when the university came into being in 1990. The school seeks to enable students to gain the knowledge, skills, and attitudes required for success in their chosen areas of study in education; to help educators build sound philosophies of education in theological, historical, and sociological contexts; and to promote useful educational research.

Curricula are offered leading to B.A., M.A., Ed.S., and Ed.D. degrees in such areas as elementary and secondary teaching, educational administration and leadership, educational psychology and counseling, and educational foundations. Programs offered at the baccalaureate and postbaccalaureate levels qualify students for teaching credentials issued by the General Conference Department of Education and the California Commission for Teacher Preparation and Licensing.

School of Business and Management. The Business Department of the College of Arts and Sciences became the School of Business and Management in 1986. The school's purpose is to provide students with the variety of skills necessary to success in the business environment. The school offers baccalaureate degrees with majors in business and management, accounting, management, management information systems, and marketing; and the M.B.A. in accounting, financial management, health administration, human resources and industrial relations, and marketing.

Center for Lifelong Learning. The Center for Lifelong Learning serves the educational needs of adult students 25 years of age and older. It coordinates programs leading to undergraduate degrees, with flexible requirements combining general education and career-related courses. Students at the center may receive credit not only for traditional academic achievement but also for prior experiential learning.

The center offers the Associate in Arts degree in human services; the Bachelor of Arts degree in liberal arts and business administration; the Bachelor of Science in health science; and the Bachelor of Social Work.

The university is accredited by the Western Association of Schools and Colleges and the North American Division Commission on Accreditation of the Board of Regents of the General Conference of Seventh-day Adventists. The School of Education's teacher-training curriculum is accredited by the California State Commission on Teacher Credentialing, and the School of Religion is working to secure accreditation by the Association of Theological Schools for the School of Religion. The university is a member of the American Council on Education, the Association of American Colleges, and the Association of Independent California Colleges and Universities. The program in social work is fully accredited by the Council on Social Work Education.

Last Day Shepherd's Call, The

LAST DAY SHEPHERD'S CALL, THE (Mo Shih Mu Sheng) (1921— , with interruptions; monthly). Church paper and official organ of the South China Island Union Mission, first published for the China Division by the Signs of the Times Publishing House in Shanghai, China, in 1921. When the Pacific war broke out in 1941, the paper was discontinued for about one year. After that it was divided into two separate papers, one printed in Shanghai, China, and the other in Chungking, Szechuan, China. In 1946, when the China Division was reorganized, the two papers were again merged and published in Shanghai. After two years the political disturbances in China increased, and, as a result, the paper was discontinued.

In July 1954 the Signs of the Times Publishing Association of the South China Island Union Mission (see [Signs of the Times Publishing Association \[Taiwan\]](#)) began printing The Last Day Shepherd's Call at the Taiwan Missionary College Press, Taipei, Taiwan, until the publishing work moved to rented quarters adjacent to South China Island Union Mission office. At present the magazine is supplied to Chinese Seventh-day Adventists throughout the world.

Latter Rain

LATTER RAIN. Literally the spring rains at the close of the wet season in Palestine that matured winter grain for the harvest (Deut. 11:14), in contrast with the “early,” or “former,” rain the preceding autumn (Joel 2:23; Jer. 5:24; James 5:7) that germinated the seed and gave the crop a start before the onset of winter; theologically, in a metaphorical sense, the outpouring of the divine Spirit upon God’s people to prepare them for the figurative harvest of the world at the end of time (cf. Hosea 6:3).

With respect to the gospel commission that Christ entrusted to His church on earth (Matt. 28:19, 20; Acts 1:8), Seventh-day Adventists refer to the experience at Pentecost as the “early,” or “former,” rain, and to the divine favor that will accompany the efforts put forth by consecrated believers under the guidance of the Holy Spirit at the end of time as the “latter rain”—in other words, to the seedtime and harvest of the gospel: “The outpouring of the Spirit in the days of the apostles was the beginning of the early, or former, rain. . . . But near the close of earth’s harvest, a special bestowal of spiritual grace is promised to prepare the church for the coming of the Son of man” (AA 54, 55).

“The outpouring of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost was the former rain, but the latter rain will be more abundant” (COL 121).

The relationship between the two is stated thus: “As the ‘former rain’ was given, in the outpouring of the Holy Spirit at the opening of the gospel, to cause the upspringing of the precious seed, so the ‘latter rain’ will be given at its close, for the ripening of the harvest. . . . The great work of the gospel is not to close with less manifestation of the power of God than marked its opening. The prophecies which were fulfilled in the outpouring of the former rain at the opening of the gospel are again to be fulfilled at its close. Here are ‘the times of refreshing’ to which the apostle Peter looked forward when he said [Acts 3:19, 20 quoted]” (GC 611, 612).

The early rain is also applied to a preparatory personal experience prerequisite to receiving the latter rain. As a result of the early rain experience of the individual, the heart is “emptied of every defilement, and cleansed for the indwelling of the Spirit” (TM 507). The latter rain, in turn, qualifies the church for bearing witness in the “loud cry” and to stand firm during the last great time of trouble: “The ripening of the grain [as a result of the latter rain] represents the completion of the work of God’s grace in the soul. By the power of the Holy Spirit the moral image of God is to be perfected in the character. We are to be wholly transformed into the likeness of Christ. The latter rain, ripening earth’s harvest, represents the spiritual grace that prepares the church for the coming of the Son of man. But unless the former rain has fallen there will be no life, the green blade will not spring up. Unless the early showers have done their work, the latter rain can bring no seed to perfection” (ibid. 506).

The latter rain “revives and strengthens” God’s people “to pass through the time of trouble” and fits them for translation (1T 353; 2SG 226).

“The latter rain is coming-the refreshing from the presence of the Lord. Those will receive it, in the church already gathered by the third angel’s message see [Three Angels’ Messages], who are prepared for it; and honest ones without will, under its influence, soon be gathered in” (Roswell F. Cottrell, in Review and Herald 31:280, Apr. 14, 1868).

Latvia

LATVIA. A republic on the Baltic Sea whose neighbors include Estonia and Lithuania, Belarus, and Russia. It has an area of 24,900 square miles (64,491 square kilometers) and a population (1994) of 2.7 million. More than half the people are Latvians, who belong to the Baltic branch of Indo-European peoples; of the remainder, Russians, whose proportion has increased in the past 20 years, constitute the largest group. The area shows a strong imprint of German colonization, the land having been controlled by the Teutonic Knights for several centuries. About half the population is Lutheran; there is also a strong representation of Roman Catholics. Before World War II there were many Jews.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. Until the separation of Latvia from the Soviet Union, the territory was a part of the West Russian Union. Afterward the Latvian Conference was organized, and in 1923 the Baltic Union Conference was formed. After the absorption of Latvia by the Soviet Union, the work there became a part of the Federation of Seventh-day Adventists in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. Latvia now is in the Latvian Conference, a part of the Baltic Union, which is a constituent of the Trans-European Division. Statistics (1993) for Latvia: churches, 35; members, 2,808.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. Begin-nings. The work in Latvia began in the middle 1890s when several colporteurs and Gerhard Perk worked in the Baltic cities. In 1895 Perk went to Riga, the capital of Latvia, to begin evangelistic work. On May 14, 1896, L. R. Conradi organized a church of 12 members in that city. When the Russian Union was organized in 1907, its headquarters were established in Riga, where the largest group of Adventists in the area were congregated. Over the years Seventh-day Adventists found Latvia a most fruitful evangelistic territory. Consistently the largest Baltic membership was found there.

Evangelism in Latvia. Little is known about evangelistic work in Latvia for a period after Perk left the country in the last years of the nineteenth century. In 1908, when the Russian Union and the Baltic Conference were organized, the Baltic Conference, which also included Estonia and St. Petersburg and Pskov and their environs, had 383 members in three churches.

In 1898 the first local colporteurs, J. Schneider and H. Meyer, began to work there. In the 1900s H. J. Lebsuc began working in Riga.

The church in Liepaja was founded in 1905 (the building was built in 1912). In 1908 churches were begun in Jelgava and Ventspils. In 1909 a worker went to the city of Libau (now Liepaja), where he found 15 members. Within three years their number had increased to 93 and they were building a chapel of their own. In the same three years a group of 100 members was gathered in Mitau (Jelgava), and the Riga group doubled its membership from 150 to 300.

This growth occurred under stringent governmental regulations that allowed no meetings for the public-only the regular church services were permitted. Despite the adverse conditions, in 1910 there were 445 baptisms in the Baltic Conference outside the area of Riga, many of them in Latvia.

After Latvia became an independent republic and complete religious freedom prevailed, the church work prospered. In 1924, although Latgale, the eastern province, inhabited mostly by Catholic and Greek Orthodox farmers, was not yet entered, there were in Latvia 34 churches and 1,800 members using Latvian, German, or Russian in their services. In 1927, in the city of Riga alone, there were 800 members in five churches-Latvian, German, and Russian. The chapel completed in Riga in 1928 had two auditoriums, one seating more than 600, and another seating 250.

Evangelism took different forms. In 1927 the Baltic Union School conducted a Vacation Bible School for the children of patrons of the summer resort. The next year a Russian evangelist came to work specifically among the many Russians in the Baltic states.

Membership continued to increase, until by 1931 Riga had more than 1,000 members. In 1932 there were seven churches in that city. In 1934 the membership of the Latvian conferences reached 2,113 (its territory had been divided into two conferences some time previously). A new chapel and a conference office were built in the city of Jelgava, for which the woodwork was made by the students of the Baltic Union School.

The rapid growth of the church in Latvia resulted from active lay participation in evangelism. One church elder in a community where there was no regular minister won a total of 37 converts. These lay evangelists, including many young people, were trained with the help of two manuals published at about that time, entitled How Shall I Give Bible Studies? and Gospel Sales Manual.

But by 1935 conditions had changed: all public lectures were required to be registered beforehand and the material was to be censored. Nevertheless, church membership continued to grow.

In 1937 there were 3,199 members in 60 churches, served by 15 ministers. Then in 1940 the area was incorporated into the Soviet Union.

Publishing Work in Latvia. The circulation of publications played a prominent role in the growth of the church. In Latvia the first SDA publications to be printed in Russia were produced in 1899 when a number of Latvian and Estonian tracts were published in Riga. Books published included Christian Temperance (1898), Christ and His Righteousness (1899), Steps to Christ (1905), and many others. After several years the publishing enterprise of the church was suppressed, but the tracts continued to be issued by private firms organized by evangelists in their own names. About the end of the first decade of this century, there are references in church papers to the publishing house in Riga. Actually the full development of publishing work was achieved only after the country became independent of the police control and religious totalitarianism of czarist Russia. In 1910 there were only 14 regular colporteurs in Latvia, and no work could be organized because of the restrictions. Then in 1922 a publishing house was established, and the sales began to grow. In 1924 there were 40 colporteurs in the field, and their number was limited only by the small size of the country.

Among the 1.5 million people of Latvia at that time, colporteurs placed some 30,000 copies of Ellen White's Great Controversy, or about one copy for every 50 people.

Work for the Youth. Much of the success of the SDA message in Latvia is credited to the role that youth evangelism played in the history of the church. Although Latvia did not operate church schools, it did provide a high school for the training of evangelistic workers. This school, called the Baltic Union School, was opened in 1923 with 34 or 35 students on an estate called Suschenhof on a lake near Riga. Because most of the students were poor and the members were not wealthy enough to support the school, it was forced to operate on an almost self-supporting basis.

There were several industries—such as a dairy, a poultry farm, a soap factory, a wood-working shop, and several other enterprises—where students learned a trade and were able to earn their educational expenses. In 1927 the first graduates came out of the school; most of them were absorbed into the evangelistic force. Even during the most difficult years of the 1930s depression, the conference employed the school's graduates for evangelistic work. The school also operated a summer resort in order to use its facilities during the summer. The clientele, mostly Jewish, was highly pleased with the service.

By 1930 the first two missionaries had gone from the Baltic Conference to Africa. In 1932 the first youth congress in the union was held on the grounds of the Baltic Union School. Some 500 young people attended the four-day session and covered their travel expenses by giving a choral and instrumental public concert in the city.

In 1934 the first SDA youth paper in Latvia was published by the young people themselves, without cost to the church. It was a 24-page monthly called Jaunatnes Vadonis ("Youth Leader"). One evangelist organized special youth Bible classes, a choral society, and an orchestra, in which membership was conditioned on high standards of behavior. After four years of careful training, the young people were ready for participation in a countrywide evangelistic campaign. They toured the land, providing music for evangelistic services and at the same time giving public concerts that provided more than enough funds for the expenses of the trip. In 1935 another unionwide youth congress was held in Riga.

Other Activities. During the great financial depression in the thirties, the Seventh-day Adventist Church organized welfare services, providing, among other things, meals for the unemployed and a day nursery and a summer camp for the underprivileged children of Riga.

Workers. Among the prominent leaders in Latvia were Janis Sprogis, Jacob Schneider, Janis Birzinsh, Karlis Sutta, Aleksandrs Eglitis, Arturs Jurkevics, Janis Oltinsh, Ernests Klotinsh, Arvids Cholders, and many others.

The Period After World War II

The Period After World War II. The last legal Seventh-day Adventist Church congress was held in Riga in May 1944, and E. Klotinsh was elected as a leader. Later when Latvia was absorbed by the Soviet Union, no church congresses were allowed. The Union Council, which was elected in 1944, continued its work until 1949. Then began a period of repression and arrests of the leaders of the church by the government.

The Seventh-day Adventist Russian church appointed A. Cholders supervisor of the work in 1950. As a member of the Union Seventh-day Adventist Church in the USSR he was authorized to lead the work in Latvia. His assistants were J. Oltinsh and E. Pavasars.

In 1960 the Russian Seventh-day Adventist Church Center was abolished by the state powers together with its accredited post in Latvia. All further work was to be carried out only in accordance with the Religion Department Council in Latvia. The council appointed J. Oltinsh to this work in 1964. He was also elected as a local council leader in the 1970s and completed his work in 1986, when official permission to organize a Seventh-day Adventist Latvian church congress was received after a 45-year break, and Valdis Zilgalvis was elected as conference president. When the Baltic Union was formed in 1989, V. Zilgalvis was elected as president of the union and Victor Geide was elected as president of the Latvian Conference. The next Seventh-day Adventist Latvian church congress was held in 1992, and V. Geide was reelected to the post of conference president.

Church membership in Latvia dropped from 2,058 in 1965 to 1,665 in 1988. Because of freedom to evangelize again, two large evangelistic campaigns were conducted by Jack Colon in 1991 and by Kenneth Mittleider in 1992.

Latvian Conference School

LATVIAN CONFERENCE SCHOOL (Adventes Misijas Seminars). A former training school operated by the Latvian Conference in Riga, Latvia, listed in the Yearbook from 1938 to 1946. It succeeded the Baltic Union School, also operated in Riga, after the Estonian Conference established its own school in 1935. World War II necessitated its closure.

Laubhan, Conrad

LAUBHAN, CONRAD (1838—1923). The earliest Seventh-day Adventist worker in Russia. He was born in a settlement of German colonists at Tscherbakovka, on the Volga River, in Russia. In 1861 he married Katherine Sophia Meier, and in 1878 they emigrated to America, settling in Kansas, where, responding to the preaching of L. R. Conradi, they joined the Seventh-day Adventist Church. Soon afterward he became an evangelist and was listed in the 1886 Yearbook as a licentiate with an address at Lehigh, Kansas. In May 1886 he went to Russia and began preaching among the German colonies along the Volga River. He was ordained to the ministry in July 1887 at Basel, Switzerland. Later he worked in the Caucasus, the Don region, the Crimea, and in other areas of southern Russia. For 12 years he preached under most trying circumstances. Proselyting among the Orthodox Russians was regarded as a crime, and the other Protestants were ever ready to turn him over to the authorities. His health finally failed, and he returned to the United States, where he lived first in Oklahoma and later at College View, Nebraska.

Laurelwood Adventist Academy

LAURELWOOD ADVENTIST ACADEMY. A former coeducational boarding senior high school, situated at the western foot of the Chehalem Hills, 4 miles (seven kilometers) southeast of Gaston, 25 miles (40 kilometers) southwest of Portland, Oregon, owned and operated by the Oregon Conference until 1986.

The school was located on 483 acres (200 hectares) under cultivation. There were 17 major buildings, including a 15,000-square-foot (1,400-square-meter) gymnasium and an outdoor athletic field. There was an instructional emphasis on agriculture.

History

History. In 1904 the board of the Western Oregon Conference voted to establish a secondary school for students in the 16 church schools then operating. The original 58 acres (25 hectares) were purchased Aug. 5, 1904, and construction was begun immediately. The entire neighborhood turned out to help in the work of tree clearing and erecting the first one-story building, used for a music studio, grammar school, and laundry. The second building, a two-story frame structure, later became the administration building.

At the camp meeting in 1905 money was raised for the girls' dormitory, a three-story building, with the kitchen and dining room on the lower floor. A barn was added the same summer, and a dairy begun, which supplied grade A milk for the school and for Portland Sanitarium. The water system was installed the next year, but a boys' dormitory was not built until 1921.

The school began as an intermediate school, teaching the first nine grades; the first tenth grader was graduated in 1906. At the conference session of 1909, the school, which now taught grades 7—12, was named Laurelwood Academy, after the community that residents had named Laurelwood because of the abundance of laurel in the vicinity.

In 1918 Laurelwood Academy became Laurelwood Junior College. A Normal Department was added, industries were established, and vocational training, including typing, was emphasized. Campus improvements, such as paving and electric lights, were effected. The junior college section was discontinued in 1925, since it was felt there were not enough students to supply both Laurelwood and Walla Walla College.

Extensive reconstruction plans began in 1942. Because no construction permits could be secured during the war, funds were temporarily invested in Series G war bonds. Less than a month after the war ended in 1945, construction began on an administration building and a new dormitory to accommodate 150 girls.

The school was renamed Laurelwood Adventist Academy at the time of the triennial constituency meeting held April 28, 1974. Increasing operating costs and decreasing enrollment led to the school being closed in 1985.

Lavanchy, Francis

LAVANCHY, FRANCIS (1899—1973). Evangelist, departmental secretary, administrator. He began evangelistic work in Le Havre, France, and later became a departmental secretary in France. He served as president of three European conferences: Belgian, Swiss-French, and Franco-Belgian Union, holding the latter position for 16 years.

La Voz de la Esperanza

LA VOZ DE LA ESPERANZA (“Voice of Hope”; Spanish Voice of Prophecy). A syndicated weekly Spanish broadcast with a Bible correspondence school, video production, and music and daily radio programs, all under the same name. The weekly program can be heard in most of the Spanish-speaking countries over more than 400 radio stations, including Adventist World Radio-Latin America. Its main offices are in Thousand Oaks, California, with 32 branch locations in Spanish-speaking countries. Even though it is sponsored by the General Conference as one of the components of the Adventist Media Center, its financial support comes primarily from direct contributions.

The weekly broadcast began in 1942 as a subsidiary of the Voice of Prophecy, with speaker Braulio Perez Marcio, a Spanish evangelist and writer who throughout three decades of broadcasting became one of the most outstanding, trusted, and loved preachers for both Seventh-day Adventist and non-Seventh-day Adventist listening audiences.

First to air the weekly broadcasts were the former KOWL in Santa Monica, California, and CMQ in Havana, Cuba. Beginning in 1943, the program could be heard across Latin America, primarily over the former Pan American Broadcasting Company. A former vice president of Peru called it “the father of Spanish Christian radio programs.”

Since 1971 Dr. Milton Peverini has led La Voz (first as associate speaker and later as director-speaker) into becoming a corporation independent of the Voice of Prophecy. He also has led in the producing of many new programs, videos, and books, and in assisting with evangelistic campaigns in North, Central, and South America.

The La Voz Correspondence School, through its full spectrum of courses on doctrines, family, health, and youth counseling, has graduated more than 1 million students. Since 1953 thousands of church members serving as carteros misioneros (“missionary mail carriers”) have been key participants, using these courses for promoting both the radio program and the gospel.

Law

LAW. Seventh-day Adventists have always distinguished the moral law, or Ten Commandments, from the ceremonial law, or the ritual requirements of the Jewish religious system. The moral law is a transcript in human language of the character and will of God, and of the principles by which His creatures are to live. Because the moral law comes from God and expresses His character, and because God's character is changeless, the principles this law sets forth are likewise eternal.

Both the OT and the NT sum up the 10 precepts of the moral law, though often worded in the form of two great commandments—love to God (the first four), and love to our fellowman (the last six; Deut. 6:5; Lev. 19:18; Matt. 22:34—40). In the Sermon on the Mount, Christ explained some of the principles of the moral law and made a practical explanation of them to life situations. Originally God implanted these principles in the very fiber and being of Adam and Eve, together with a natural inclination to live in harmony with them. The Creator also endowed humanity with the faculty of free choice; people might choose to acknowledge the lordship of the Creator by voluntary obedience, or they might choose to disobey. Obedience would guarantee eternal life; disobedience would incur condemnation and death. Humanity would find true liberty through obedience motivated by love. The moral law has never been against humanity; it is our guarantee of freedom in Christ.

The moral law requires righteousness and condemns unrighteousness. By His perfect life as a man, Christ met all the requirements of the law and demonstrated that it is just and good. By His vicarious death on the cross He satisfied the righteous demands of the law upon transgressors. By His grace He exchanges His own perfect righteousness for humankind's unrighteousness, and enables people to overcome every sinful tendency and to grow up, point by point, into the fullness of Christ's perfect character. All of this is accomplished by faith, apart from works of law.

In the heart of the repentant, forgiven sinner, transformed by divine grace, there will be a sincere desire, motivated by love, to live in harmony with all the divine requirements—not in order to be saved by any supposed works of merit on his or her part, but because he or she has already found salvation by faith in the infinite grace of Christ. “Do we then make void the law through faith? God forbid: yea, we establish the law” (Rom. 3:31). Forgiveness for past transgressions of the divine law does not carry with it a plenary indulgence to keep on transgressing that law. “God forbid. How shall we, that are dead to sin, live any longer therein?” (Rom. 6:2).

The principles set forth in the moral law are eternal. As we have seen, the Creator implanted these principles in the hearts of our first parents when He created them. At Mount Sinai He set forth these principles in the form of 10 explicit commands, in language suitable to the condition of humanity, fallen in sin. These commands He uttered with His own voice and inscribed with His own finger upon two tables of stone.

Subsequently He revealed to Moses the ceremonial code, whose types and symbols were designed to point forward to Christ and to help humanity understand and lay firm hold on redemption through the infinite sacrifice of Christ. Its rites and sacrifices could neither actually take away sin nor set the conscience free, but they could lead to faith in the coming Redeemer, in whom they all met fulfillment and reality. Without faith in that one great Sacrifice, divinely provided and promised, they were meaningless (Heb 9:8—15).

The moral law is spiritual and can be kept only by those whose hearts have been renewed by the Spirit of God. Never in any age has its Author sought from humanity a mere outward response to the letter of the law. The moral law exercises its authority upon the inner person. It reveals sin as a conscious violation of the known will of God, thereby compelling sinners to acknowledge themselves as such, and thus to prepare to seek for, and receive, the mercy of God in Christ. It forbids not only outward acts of transgression, but every thought and motive that would lead to such acts. It requires submission of heart as well as life to God, and in so doing exposes sin at its source and in all its forms, and points the sinner to Christ for forgiveness. All attempts to earn righteousness by adhering scrupulously to legal requirements, even those of the moral law, are futile.

Christ's life and His teachings were altogether in harmony with the moral law. He vindicated this law, established it, confirmed it, and honored it by perfect obedience to its requirements. Those who choose to follow Christ will seek to become like Him. God's moral law will be written on their hearts and minds. All who have been truly converted and saved by grace will find their supreme joy in loving submission to the divine authority of the moral law, for in acknowledging that authority they acknowledge the authority of its Author, Jesus Christ.

The proper function of the moral law is to make a clear-cut distinction between right and wrong, to make known to humanity the standard of conduct of which God approves, to condemn all conduct that falls short of that standard, to convict those guilty of such conduct, and to convince sinners of their need for salvation by faith in the grace of Christ. But the moral law cannot justify sinners who violate it, nor can it provide either the desire or the ability to live in harmony with its precepts, nor does observance of it ingratiate a person with God. These are improper uses of the moral law and constitute what is known as legalism, which is the belief and attempt to find salvation and acceptance with God by one's own effort to keep the law, in contradistinction to salvation by grace alone. SDAs insist that there can be no salvation by works of law (see Legalism).

The gospel brings a change, but that change is not in the moral law. It is the transformation of believers by virtue of their new relationship to Christ. The gospel releases believers from the penalty of the law, but not from their obligation to live in harmony with its precepts.

In general, Protestants have affirmed belief in the binding force of the moral law, or Ten Commandments (see SB, Nos. 970—986), a position SDAs recognize as being in harmony with the teachings of Scripture. But when SDAs insisted that the fourth commandment requires observance of the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath as a logically inevitable corollary, they encountered the vigorous assaults of certain groups who insisted that such Pauline passages as Col. 2:14—17 indicate the abolition of all OT law in the Christian Era, including the moral law. SDAs, in turn, called attention to the sharp distinction between the moral and the ceremonial law, as to character, function, and binding force in the Christian Era. For instance, in a book entitled The Law of God (1854) J. H. Waggoner called attention to the following: "Under the Jewish dispensation were incorporated two kinds of laws. One was founded on obligations growing out of the nature of men, and their relations to God and one another, obligations binding before they were written, and which will continue to be binding upon all who shall know them, to the end of time. Such are the laws which were written by the finger of God on the tables of stone, and are called moral laws.

“The other kind, called ceremonial laws, related to various outward observances which were not obligatory till they were commanded, and then were binding only on the Jews till the death of Christ” (pp. 120, 121).

Elsewhere he says of these two laws: “By comparison, we find that two different laws are spoken of in the New Testament: one which is not made void through faith in Christ, which he came not to destroy; and another which he blotted out, and nailed to his cross” (ibid., p. 73; cites Matt. 5:17, 18 and Col. 2:14—16 to illustrate this distinction).

Concerning these two laws, J. N. Andrews wrote: “The law within the ark was that which demanded atonement; the ceremonial law which ordained the Levitical priesthood and the sacrifices for sin was that which taught men how the atonement could be made” (The Two Laws, p. 28).

“Surely these two codes should not be confounded. The one was magnified, made honorable, established, and is holy, just, spiritual, good, royal; the other was carnal, shadowy, burdensome; and was abolished, broken down, taken out of the way, nailed to the cross, changed, and disannulled on account of the weakness and unprofitableness thereof. Those who rightly divide the Word of truth will never confound these essentially different codes, nor will they apply to God’s royal law the language employed respecting the handwriting of ordinances” (ibid., pp. 31, 32).

Law and Grace

LAW AND GRACE. Grace is divine favor extended to those who stand guilty and condemned to die before divine law. The necessity for divine grace arises from the sinner's inability to satisfy the demands of the law, except by his or her own death. Were it possible to change or abolish the divine law, there would be no need for grace. The sinner cannot bridge the gulf that his or her transgression of the law has made; the sinner cannot restore himself or herself to favor with God.

Law and grace are not contrary to each other. They are not mutually exclusive. Grace offers salvation from the penalty of the law, through the righteousness of Christ. It preserves both the honor and the majesty of the divine law and government, while giving life to those who have violated the law and rebelled against the government of heaven. Grace is not emancipation from the law, but it is emancipation from sin and from the penalty of the law. Grace provides salvation not by canceling the requirements of the law, but by cooperating with the law. The law condemns the transgressor; grace meets the penalty and sets the sinner free. Grace honors the law by presenting the perfect obedience of Christ in place of the sinner's disobedience. Grace does not lessen the authority of the law, but recognizes and maintains its authority by satisfying its claims. Grace forgives, but it leads those who have been forgiven to serve God in newness of life, according to His righteous will. Grace delivers the sinner from the condemnation of the law in order that he or she may obey and honor the law by a new and holy life. The Christian is to "grow" within the sphere of God's grace.

Of the relationship between law and grace as determining a person's preparation for eternal life, M. B. Smith wrote: "In this life we are justified freely by His grace. . . . But in the judgment grace is not the rule by which men are justified, but they will then be judged 'according to their works, whether they be good or bad'" (Review and Herald 20:15, June 10, 1862).

To some who misunderstood the Seventh-day Adventist concept of law and grace, James White replied: "Those who represent Sabbathkeepers as going away from Jesus, the only source of justification, and rejecting His atoning blood, and seeking justification by the law, do it either ignorantly or wickedly. . . . One may observe the letter of all ten of them [the Ten Commandments]and, if he is not justified by faith in Jesus Christ, never have right to the tree of life. The gospel arrangement is plain. God's law convicts of sin, and shows the sinner exposed to the wrath of God, and leads him to Christ, where justification for past offenses can be found alone through faith in His blood. The law of God has no power to pardon past offenses, its attribute being justice, therefore the convicted transgressor must flee to Jesus" (ibid. 3:24, June 10, 1852).

While believing that the born-again Christian will obey all of God's requirements, motivated by love, SDAs have always repudiated the idea that their obedience is a means to salvation, and clearly affirm that this is by grace alone: "Let it be distinctly understood that there is no salvation in the law. There is no redeeming quality in law. Redemption is through the blood of Christ” (Signs of the Times 3:378, Dec. 20, 1877).

“You may observe all these precepts, to the best of your ability, conscientiously; but if you look no further than the law for salvation, you can never be saved. The hope of eternal salvation hangs upon Christ” (ibid. 379). See also Faith and Works; Justification; Law; Legalism; Sanctification.

Law Keem

LAW KEEM (1867—1919). Pioneer medical missionary in China. He was born in Kwangtung, China, and in 1882 went to the United States to obtain an education. While there he accepted Seventh-day Adventist beliefs and subsequently attended Healdsburg College and California Medical College (1896—1900). For several years Law Keem operated a private sanitarium in California. In 1904 he married Edith Miller, a graduate nurse, and in 1905 they became the fifth family to be sent by the mission board to China. There he promoted SDA work by opening chapels and dispensaries in several places in the southern and southwestern provinces. He died at his station at Nanning, Kwangsi province.

Lawhead (Loughhead), James White

LAWHEAD (LOUGHHEAD), JAMES WHITE (1860—1937). Educator and administrator. Educated at Battle Creek College, he was teaching at his alma mater when he was chosen in 1891 to be the resident principal of the newly established Union College, whose president, W. W. Prescott, was simultaneously in charge of Battle Creek College and Union College. Lawhead served as its president from 1893 to 1896. Later he was principal of Mount Vernon Academy (1896—1904) and in 1904 became president of the newly founded Washington Training College, Takoma Park, Maryland (now Columbia Union College). Failing health led to his resignation and retirement in 1907.

Lay Activities Department

LAY ACTIVITIES DEPARTMENT (formerly Home Missionary Department, now part of Church Ministries Department). The department of the General Conference that, with its secretary, associate secretaries, and staff, fostered the activities of laity in any line of local missionary service anywhere in the world. By “missionary” service is meant personal or public evangelism or Community Services (formerly Health and Welfare Service). There were corresponding departments in the divisions, unions, and conferences. See Church Ministries Department; Personal Ministries.

Lay Evangelism

LAY EVANGELISM. The lay member's sharing of his or her faith with others, singly or in groups, by public speaking or private witness, by word or deed; especially the presentation and communication of the good news about Jesus Christ to others by way of opening to them the Word of God. The Seventh-day Adventist Church, recognizing that much of the growth of the church has been the result of lay evangelism, promotes lay evangelism by various methods, chiefly through the General Conference Church Ministries Department.

Personal Evangelism. Every committed SDA is expected to be a personal evangelist. Opportunities for missionary endeavor begin among friends, relatives, neighbors, and contacts in the workplace and include such ministry as personal house-to-house visitation, comforting the sick and mourners, helping the poor and afflicted, speaking peace to the disconsolate, and also giving Bible studies in the homes. SDAs are taught that it is the church's responsibility to carry the Word of God to every person's door. SDAs are offered training courses in the local church and shown that there are many opportunities for personal evangelism—in the home, in hotels and rooming houses, within prison walls, at the bedside of the sick, in parks, on ships, in public conveyances, in public places, in business offices, and at social gatherings.

A variety of well-tested audiovisual aids and materials are available for use by laypersons. Bible studies and evangelistic series have been prepared on filmstrips, cassette tapes, and videotapes. Several Bible courses are available. There are Picture Rolls, pictorial aids, and Bible-marking plans available. Laypersons also accept the call to lay preaching as a challenge.

In the fastest-growing divisions most of the outreach is done by laypersons trained, organized, and encouraged by pastors. Several divisions have strong programs for developing lay evangelists.

In 1979 Samuel Monnier introduced an eight-day Lay Evangelists' Training Seminar. These seminars have become annual events in many fields around the world. Training is provided in every area of lay evangelism, including on-the-job training in house-to-house visitation.

Another program, called Lay Bible Ministers, follows a curriculum that is taught on three or four weekends each year. Both programs provide the opportunity of returning for additional training after field experience.

Coordinated Evangelism. In recent years there has been a reemphasis on "coordinated evangelism"—the united efforts of laypersons and ministers conducted through the cooperation of the departments of the conference and the local church, and of the laity and pastor, in the common objective of winning souls to Christ.

A number of unions in North America and several world divisions have outlined a coordinated evangelism program and prepared booklets presenting steps to be taken by the departments, churches, and members.

Lay Training. From early times the denomination has offered training in evangelism, open to laypersons as well as workers, in the form of Bible schools and institutes.

The first division-wide lay congress was held in Grand Ledge, Michigan, Aug. 29 to Sept. 2, 1951, with delegates representing the churches in the North American Division. Training and demonstration workshops in the methods of soul winning and the first commissioning of the “120” were the highlights of this meeting. In the united lay advance that followed this congress there was a simultaneous launching of 4,237 lay evangelistic meetings on Sunday, Nov. 11, 1951.

Lay congresses overseas followed in 1953 and onward, some of the largest being held in eastern Asia in 1956 and in New Zealand and Australia in 1959. Other lay congresses offered also a decision and problem clinic and classes in the following: audiovisual aids, contemporary groups, leadership, lay preaching, and branch Sabbath schools. Beginning in 1979 in four different parts of the division, Inter-America has had large Festivals of the Laity once a quinquennium. Many lay evangelists attending consistently lead more than 100 a year to baptism. Lay congresses have trained thousands of laypersons in effective evangelistic methods, have given impetus to missionary activity, and have increased soul-winning results.

Some significant Annual Council recommendations and events influencing lay evangelism in the latter part of the twentieth century include:

1975—Publication of Witnessing for Christ as a joint project of the Ministerial Association and the following GC departments: Lay Activities, Sabbath School, Temperance, and Youth.

1976—The “Evangelism and Finishing the Work” document, and the recommendation “challenging every family to accept a territorial assignment.”

1980—The Prayer Offensive, encouraging each church family/member to pray daily for their neighborhood and a specific unentered territory.

1982—The recommendation to appeal to members to dedicate two or more hours a week to working for others.

1986—The challenge to develop a global strategy to fulfill our global mission.

1987—Sabbath School Action Units. From the early days of the SDA movement inspired counsel emphasized the potential of the Sabbath school, with its small groups, as an effective soul-winning instrument. This has been dramatically demonstrated in some world divisions. Since 1987 Calvin Smith, of the Church Ministries Department, developed and systematized a plan that worked in North America and then spread worldwide. In each small class there is a care coordinator and a discussion group leader who share the hour of class time.

1994—The Adult Sabbath School Lesson Quarterly featured lessons on personal evangelism.

Lay, Horatio S.

LAY, HORATIO S. (1828—1900). Pioneer Seventh-day Adventist physician and editor of the Health Reformer. He was born in the state of New York and reared in Pennsylvania, where he was apprenticed to a physician for the study of medicine. Having graduated from Western Reserve College at Cleveland and from Detroit Medical College, he began his practice at Allegan, Michigan. In 1852 he married Julia M. Barber, and about four years later joined the Seventh-day Adventist Church through the influence of M. E. Cornell. In the early 1860s he took his wife, who had become ill, to a “water-cure” institution operated by Dr. J. C. Jackson at Dansville, New York, and apparently at the same time joined its staff and acquired practical experience in what was termed “rational medicine.” Some three years later he returned to his practice, but was called in 1866 to head the newly established SDA health institution, the Western Health Reform Institute—later named Battle Creek Sanitarium—and to edit the first SDA health journal, the Health Reformer. He remained at the head of the institute for about four years. After that he practiced at Allegan and Petoskey, Michigan, until 1884, when he entered the ministry in the Michigan Conference. In the early 1890s he contracted tuberculosis, which resulted in his death at the age of 71.

Leach, Clarence Victor

LEACH, CLARENCE VICTOR (1889—1965). Pastor, departmental secretary, administrator. He was converted under the preaching of W. C. Moffett. For many years he gave faithful service to the church in the following capacities: pastor and publishing secretary of the West Virginia and Columbia Union conferences, home missionary secretary of the General Conference, and president of the West Virginia, East Pennsylvania, Ohio, Chesapeake, and Minnesota conferences.

Lebanon

LEBANON. A republic in the Middle East situated on the eastern shore of the Mediterranean Sea and bounded by Syria on the north and east and by Israel on the south. Its area is 4,015 square miles (10,400 square kilometers); its population, representing nearly every nationality of the Middle East, has been estimated (1994) at 3.6 million. Seventy percent of the people of Lebanon are Muslims; the other 30 percent are Christians. Arabic is the official language, but the minorities use their own languages-French is the second language of many Christians, and English is rapidly gaining ground throughout the country.

Trade provides two thirds of the national income. Half the workers are employed in agriculture, the chief crops being apples, citrus fruits, olives, tobacco, grapes, vegetables, and cereals. Manufacturing is also rapidly developing.

There is a correspondence between modern Lebanon and ancient Phoenicia. The Phoenicians were Canaanites who were pushed northward by the Hebrew conquest of Palestine. They in turn influenced the Hebrews; for example, Hiram of Tyre furnished cedars from the Lebanon mountains and craftsmen to build Solomon's Temple at Jerusalem; Jezebel, the queen of Israel who promoted Baal worship in Israel, was a Phoenician princess; and her daughter Athaliah, queen of Judah, promoted Baal worship in Judah.

Seafaring Phoenicians, traders and colonizers in distant lands, carried the alphabet to Greece and spread Eastern culture to Europe. The Phoenician city-states were, like Israel, tributary to Egypt, Assyria, Babylon, and Persia, successively, and later formed a part of the Seleucid Empire and the Roman province of Syria. Early Christianized, Lebanon provided a mountain stronghold for Maronite Christians seeking refuge from Byzantine orthodoxy and Muslim rule. Here through the centuries several kinds of Christians and Muslims, in nearly equal numbers, have preserved an equilibrium. After many centuries of Turkish rule, Lebanon became in 1921 a mandated territory under French administration, at first as part of Syria, later as a separate area. It became an independent republic in 1941.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. Before any organized work was begun in Lebanon, Seventh-day Adventists had visited there. In 1897 H. P. Holser, of the Central European Conference, reported that Abram La Rue, pioneer missionary to the China coast, had spent a short time in Beirut and had left some publications there. In 1898 Holser visited there with a view to making plans for publishing in Arabic. About 1902 a Syrian who had lived in the United States visited his parents in Lebanon, bringing a copy of Bible Readings, and convinced the Presbyterian pastor in his town of the claims of the seventh-day Sabbath. The pastor, Elias Zarub, not knowing that there were SDAs in the Middle East, went to the United States and spent six months in Berrien Springs, Michigan, then in 1903 returned to Beirut as an SDA worker. With J. H. Krum, head of the mission that included Syria (with Lebanon) and Palestine, he went among his friends and won converts. However, Zarub seems to have joined another religious group in 1908.

Sabbathkeepers were reported in Beirut as early as 1904. Near the end of 1905 W. H. Wakeham, superintendent of the Egyptian Mission, visited the area and baptized Anistas Khouri, a woman who had begun to keep the Sabbath five years before, while on a visit in New York, and who was teaching a private school at Schwaifat, near Beirut; he also baptized a former Catholic priest in the village of Magdouche, near Sidon. At that time there were several adherents in Malaka, near Beirut, and Deir Mimas, near Mount Hermon, and in Beirut a German masseur named Haussman and his wife, who was a nurse from the Basel Sanitarium, were engaged in private health work. Haussman was a convert of the Krums in Jaffa. In 1908 W. K. Ising arrived from Germany, and in 1909 he became head of the Syrian-Egyptian Mission, which was then organized, with headquarters in Beirut. There were possibly seven or eight members in the city at that time. Early in 1910 a canvasser, T. Zachary, was working in Beirut, an Armenian who had come from Persia to Cairo and had there become an SDA in 1909.

Ising rented a house near what is now the American University of Beirut and gathered a group of young men, some of whom were students, for Bible lessons in his home. In 1911 he baptized five persons, including Ibrahim el-Khalil, an ex-Muslim, who later became a minister in Palestine and elsewhere; Shukri Nowfel, later the first Arab-speaking national to be ordained in the Arabic Union Mission; and Bashir Hasso, pioneer layman in Iraq.

In 1912 Ising reported some keeping the Sabbath in three places in Lebanon, one a Protestant Bible woman, who joined the church the next year. He also reported two canvassers at work. In 1913, while Ising was away in Mesopotamia for nine months, Zachary and Khalil worked in Lebanon.

Henry Erzberger, who came to Beirut from Switzerland about this time, remained throughout the period of the war, during which time the members held their Sabbath services at Bhamdoun, in the mountains and at the Erzberger home in Ras Beirut. In 1915 the Beirut church had 10 members. The 1917 Yearbook lists Erzberger for Jerusalem and does not name a worker for Beirut. No mission director was listed for the Syrian Mission until 1923, when Nils Zerme, from Berne, was named. The original membership seems to have dwindled or scattered.

Later Developments. In 1923, 10 SDA Armenian refugees from Turkey formed the beginning of the Beirut Armenian church, and Erzberger baptized Armenian converts.

The first elementary school was opened in Beirut in 1929, with Hana Jubran Nasr as headmistress. In 1953 it offered some secondary schoolwork and then was renamed the Beirut Junior Academy. Later it became a 12-grade secondary school and was again renamed Museitbeh Adventist Secondary School.

In the autumn of 1939 a training school for national workers, which later became Middle East College, was opened in Beirut.

In 1939 Neshan Hovhannessian founded a school for the Armenian Adventist children in Khalil Badawy, Beirut. This grew into a mission school, with facilities connected to the Bourj-Hammoud church, which was completed in 1965.

Sabbath school lessons in Arabic were printed in Beirut in 1928, but it was not until 1947 that the Middle East Press was established to issue SDA publications in the area. The first colporteur in the country, Zachary, who worked in Beirut about 1910, was joined later by Michael Ghafaryo. They sold SDA publications in most of the major mountain villages, especially in the popular resort towns frequented by visitors from all parts of the Middle East. Colporteurs continued to sell SDA publications in these towns, making Lebanon an important center for distribution to the other countries in the area.

By 1938 Armenian and Arabic congregations in Beirut had places of worship, but it was not long before these were overcrowded. On July 30, 1955, a new church for the Armenian believers, constructed on property adjoining the school, was dedicated. A new Arabic church was built at Museitbeh in 1959, the building including office space for the headquarters of the Lebanon Section. Hostile political conditions in the neighborhood of the Armenian church threatened the lives of worshipers and forced them to move to the other side of the Beirut River. A new church auditorium was completed in Bourj Hammoud in 1965, the largest Seventh-day Adventist church building in the Middle East.

Work was begun in southern Lebanon, at Aramoun, by a lay member, Nabeeha Nowfel Khoury. In the mid-1940s an elementary school was established there. For a time there was a worker at Marj'youn.

In 1948 W. E. Olson opened work in the el-Koura district of northern Lebanon. A school was begun that autumn at Shekka, with about 60 students, but it was shortlived. But in 1955 a church seating 125 persons was dedicated at Bishmezzine. The next year a school was opened there.

An Arabic branch Sabbath school, conducted by Edith Davis and students from Middle East College in the neighborhood of the college, grew until a small evangelistic center was opened there in 1954. When members of the branch Sabbath school were denied education privileges because of their interest in the Sabbath, it was decided to conduct an elementary school for them near Middle East College. School opened Oct. 12, 1956, as a laboratory for teacher-training students, under the auspices of the Education Department of Middle East College. It was upgraded to a high school affiliated with the college, and in 1969 was separated from the college and moved to its present location in Boushrieh.

By 1957 the branch Sabbath school had, through the efforts of Miss Davis and the college ministerial students, become a regular Sabbath school, and church services were held. In 1960 these meetings were conducted in the college chapel after the English services, and in 1965 they moved to the men's dormitory worship room, with Samir Shahine as the first pastor. Later the group moved to the Boushrieh district, and in 1970 the Boushrieh Seventh-day Adventist Church was dedicated.

An evangelistic center in Beirut was completed in 1959. It provided space for the Voice of Prophecy Bible Correspondence School, a physical therapy clinic, a large auditorium, and rooms for cooking and Bible classes. The clinic was opened in the autumn of 1960, with Leif Jensen in charge, but it closed when he left in 1968. Harry E. Robinson presented there the first series of public meetings in Arabic by an SDA missionary from the United States. A church was organized at the center on Oct. 7, 1961.

The Voice of Prophecy Bible Correspondence School was opened at Beirut in 1948. Seven years later a recording studio for preparing broadcasts was constructed on the campus of Middle East College. From 1956 to 1959, Dr. Clifford Anderson's health lectures translated into Arabic were broadcast regularly by the Lebanese national radio. The first Vacation Bible Schools in Lebanon were conducted at four places during the summer of 1957. During the summer of 1953 an MV leaders' training camp was conducted, and since then summer camps for juniors have operated annually. The first senior camp was organized in 1959. In 1963 the Lebanon Section became the first mission in the Middle East to purchase an MV campsite-mountain property forested with cedars in northern Lebanon. Government regulations, which required military training in the schools, led to the formation of Medical Cadet Corps camps in the summers of 1956 and 1957, and for a few years civil defense classes were taught throughout the school year.

Organization. During the formative period of SDA work in the Middle East, a single organization guided the work in the area, including Lebanon, Palestine, Iraq, Jordan, and Egypt, and was first known as the Syrian-Egyptian Mission, then as the Syro-Arabic Field, and later as the Egypto-Syrian Mission. After that the work in Lebanon was directed by the Syrian Mission, with headquarters in Beirut. In 1948 this was renamed the Lebanon-Syria Mission, and by 1958 was called the Lebanon-Syria Section. In 1959 this was divided into the Lebanon Section and the Syria Section. In 1970 it was reorganized as part of the East Mediterranean Field under the Middle East Union.

In 1967 the emphasis in missions began to be placed on the outreach of the church to non-Christians, and a program was inaugurated at the Beirut Adventist Center by Harley Bresee. Work was also pioneered in the mountain village of Bikfaiya by Jerald Whitehouse in 1970. In the northern Lebanon city of Tripoli an experimental evangelistic program was conducted among the non-Christians of the city by the Middle East Union TEAM.

Work in Lebanon is carried on principally by regular church evangelism programs, summer youth camps, temperance programs, and the mission schools. With the increasing shift to health evangelism approaches, an Adventist Health Education Foundation was formed in 1974.

Having survived the 16-year-long civil war in Lebanon (1975—1991), the Seventh-day Adventist Church continues to carry on its multifaceted program in this challenging area.

Lecoultre, David

LECOULTRE, DAVID (1863—1951). Pioneer evangelist in Switzerland, France, and Belgium. As a young child of 5, he lost his father, a Swiss contractor. Later his stepfather, who had become interested in Seventh-day Adventist doctrines through the preaching of James Erzberger in Orbe, Switzerland, introduced him to Seventh-day Adventism. He was baptized at the age of 15. In 1889 he married Adele Hirschy. Although he had had training in public school, he enrolled in 1893, when he was 30 years old, in one of the earliest training schools conducted by Seventh-day Adventists outside North America, which operated at Peseux, Switzerland, and there spent two years. Receiving a license as a minister, he worked as a colporteur and conducted public evangelism. He was the first SDA evangelist to preach in Paris, arriving there in 1900 during the time of the World's Exposition. Though he was never ordained, he helped to found several churches in Switzerland, among them those at Moudon, Payerne, Chateau-d'Oex, and Fleurier.

Ledgeview Memorial Home

LEDGEVIEW MEMORIAL HOME. A 79-bed nursing home formerly operated at West Paris, Maine, by the Northern New England Conference. It was the wish of Mr. and Mrs. Adelbert Bowen to have a well-equipped, up-to-date nursing home in the West Paris area. In 1967 a group of Seventh-day Adventist laypersons formed a nonprofit corporation, received a $5,000 bank loan, and purchased a five-acre (two-hectare) tract of land. Contributions were given from the surrounding communities, and excavation began in 1969. In 1970 the project was given to the Northern New England Conference and, through the special efforts of Erland Thurlow and other workers, the nursing home opened on Sept. 13, 1971. The home was opened with a licensed capacity of 74 beds. Remodeling was done in 1973, allowing for the addition of five more beds. In 1974 a farm, which borders the nursing home property, was purchased. In 1988 the Northern New England Conference sold the nursing home to Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence A. Wilday.

Lee, Frederick

He edited the Chinese Signs of the Times and was later associate editor of the Review and Herald for 19 years. After the death of his wife, he married Emma Iversen Paul. His son Milton followed in his footsteps as a long-term missionary to China.

Lee Keun Ok

LEE KEUN OK (also transliterated Ne Kun Ok, Lee Keun Uk, and either K. U. or K. O. Lee, 1881—1932). Korean minister and administrator; one of the earliest Seventh-day Adventists in Korea; one of the first two ordained Korean Seventh-day Adventist ministers. He was baptized by Hide Kuniya in 1906 and attended the SDA school at Sunan, where he later taught from 1908 to 1910. In 1910 he began evangelistic work; in 1915 he was ordained to the ministry; in 1925 he became president of the West Chosen Conference, and about 1930 he was appointed director of the Central Chosen Mission, from which office he retired, because of failing health, shortly before his death.

Lee, Leonard Crosswell

LEE, LEONARD CROSWELL (1900—1974). Minister, author, radio speaker. A native of North Dakota, he graduated from Emmanuel Missionary College in 1927. That year he married Audra Reichenbach, who served with him in Michigan, Iowa, Louisiana, Ohio, West Virginia, and New York.

During his ministry he authored seven books, one of which was published in eight languages. He also wrote hundreds of articles appearing in church publications. He conducted a weekly radio program at Des Moines, Iowa, and served as the Faith for Today Bible School director for five years before his retirement.

Leeward and Windward Islands

LEEWARD AND WINDWARD ISLANDS. A group of islands in the West Indies. The Leeward Islands group includes Anguilla, Antigua and Barbuda, the British Virgin Islands, Guadeloupe and dependencies (including Désirode, Les Saintes, Marie-Galante, St. Barthélemy, and St.-Martin [French Section]), Montserrat, St. Christopher (St. Kitts) and Nevis, and Saba, St. Eustatius, and St. Maarten (Dutch Section) in the Netherlands Antilles. The official language is English, but in the southern islands French is spoken. Sugar cane is the principal economic resource of the area.

SDA Work

SDA Work. SDA work on these islands began in the 1880s. In 1888 a Mrs. A. Roskruge from the island of Antigua became an SDA, while on a visit to England. Returning the next year to her home, she interested some of her friends and neighbors in her new beliefs and with them formed a Sabbath school. About that time William Arnold, a colporteur, made a trip through the islands of the Caribbean selling SDA books. He reported selling as many as 30 books in one day and 300 in one month. From 1890 to 1892 D. A. Ball, an ordained minister, preached on the islands from St. Thomas in the north to Grenada in the south and organized a company on the island of Antigua in 1890. In 1896 two colporteurs, T. Critchlow and J. Lewis, went to Monserrat, and two others from Barbados, W. F. Cozier and R. N. Batson, went to Antigua. In 1895 E. Van Duesen, who was stationed on Barbados, preached on the neighboring islands and began work on St. Vincent.

In 1897 the work on the islands was organized into the West Indian Mission, with A. J. Haysmer as superintendent, and a year later A. Palmquist and his wife were assigned to the Lesser Antilles Islands. In 1899 J. A. Morrow began work on the island of St. Kitts. Palmquist moved northward, and in 1900 entered the Virgin Islands with SDA books, and the next year Haysmer went there.

The number of workers in the area increased rapidly after the turn of the century. In 1901 D. E. Wellman went to Antigua, S. A. Wellman was assigned to the Lesser Antilles in general, and L. E. Wellman began work on Tortola in the British Virgin Islands. In 1904 W. G. Kneeland pioneered on Grenada, and in the same year the pioneer Inter-American worker P. Giddings, from British Guiana, opened SDA work in the island of Dominica. With the work by that time having become almost self-sustaining, in 1903 the Lesser Antilles islands were organized into the East Caribbean Conference. By 1907, when the first meeting of the West Indian Union Conference was held at Kingston, Jamaica, the work had been well established on Antigua, Dominica, St. Lucia, St. Vincent, Grenada, Tortola, St. Kitts, and Nevis.

In 1910 the mission operated a motor launch in the Virgin Islands and the surrounding area, then superintended by H.C.J. Walleker. In 1911 A. N. Durrant preached in tents on the Grenadines. This is the first time this area is mentioned in the reports, which also note that on Grenada one third of the members were Indians.

In the 1920s I. G. Knight established his headquarters on the islands of St. Kitts. There is also a report that much of the work on the islands was done by lay members, especially on the predominantly Catholic island of St. Lucia.

In the early 1930s there were four ministers in the Leeward Islands, 1,427 members, 25 organized churches, 30 Sabbath schools, and 23 young people's societies. Work on the island of Anguilla is first mentioned in 1933, when C. G. Van Putten preached there. By 1937 two companies were ready to be organized into churches. In 1934 there were six churches on Antigua, two churches on Nevis, and several elsewhere on the islands. The colporteur work continued to play an important role in the advancement of the SDA work throughout the area.

Work was started in the British Virgin Island of Virgin Gorda by L. D. Brathwaite, and in 1972 I. I. Berkel began work in Saba. The first welfare center was opened in 1973 on the island of Antigua in the capital of St. John's. In Antigua there is one SDA to every 25 of population.

In 1973 St.-Martin (French Section) and St. Barthélemy were turned over to the Guadeloupe Mission (now Guadeloupe Conference) of the Franco-Haitian Union Mission (now French Antillies-Guiana Union Mission).

The Leeward Islands have been part of the North Caribbean and Guadeloupe conferences, and the Windward Islands part of the East Caribbean Conference, since the mid-1970s. In 1983 Grenada left the East Caribbean Conference and became part of the Grenada Mission.

Legalism

LEGALISM. The view that salvation can be achieved or merited through compliance with a legal code. NT writers, particularly Paul, staunchly oppose such a view. Especially in his Epistles to the Romans and to the Galatians, Paul seeks to prove that no one can be justified in the sight of God by the works of the law. He sees legalism as the great shortcoming of Judaism, as he knew it in his time.

“Israel who pursued the righteousness which is based on law did not succeed in fulfilling that law. Why? Because they did not pursue it through faith, but as if it were based on works” (Rom. 9:31, 32, RSV).

To Paul, legalism was impossible as a means to salvation.

In contrast with faith, which requires a positive relationship toward God, legalism represents a negative attitude. It is at this point, ultimately, that the question of whether a person is a legalist or not must be settled. Theologically a person may hold that righteousness is by faith, but if his or her way of life and attitude toward God are basically structured in terms of a mere checklist code of do's and don'ts, he or she is still a legalist-“the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life.” Christian freedom does not mean that the Christian no longer observes God's requirements; it means that he or she does so through faith, in thankfulness for the salvation God has given. Having received salvation, the Christian obeys as an act of love and thanksgiving, out of a desire to comply with God's will. This view rules out any possible basic approach to religion in terms of a legal code.

Leland, James Arthur

LELAND, JAMES ARTHUR (1871—1951). Missionary, administrator. Trained at Battle Creek College, he entered evangelism in Colorado in 1893, married Hattie Emma Green (1869—1950) in 1894, and was ordained several years later. In 1898 in Argentina, he and N. Z. Town established the first Seventh-day Adventist school in Argentina (now River Plate Adventist University). He served briefly in Uruguay, then in Mexico as an evangelist and as a dentist at the Guadalajara Sanitarium (1901—1904). He worked especially among Spanish-speaking people in Albuquerque, New Mexico, and in Colorado (to about 1909) and Texas (1909—1917) among both English and Spanish congregations. Between 1913 and 1922 he was president successively of the South Texas, Virginia, and East Pennsylvania conferences, and later (1928—1932) of the Chesapeake and Kentucky conferences. During another mission term he was superintendent of the Aztec (1923) and Antillian (1923—1927) unions. Later he pastored churches in Florida. His wife served as Bible instructor in Colorado; teacher in New Mexico, Texas, and Washington, D.C.; and Sabbath school and MV secretary in the Chesapeake and Kentucky-Tennessee conferences and in the Mexican and Antillian unions.

Le Môme, Rosina (Rose, Rosa)

LE MÔME, ROSINA (ROSE, ROSA) (c. 1880—1919). First Seventh-day Adventist on the island of Mauritius. From her childhood she was deeply interested in spiritual things and in works of mercy. About the time she was 26 or 27, she decided that since she could not find satisfaction for her heart's longing on the island, she would go to Europe. This she did in 1910. After traveling in England and France, she went to Lausanne, Switzerland, where someone left at her door an announcement of a series of evangelistic meetings conducted by SDAs. She attended, and soon was baptized by H. H. Dexter, then superintendent of the French-Swiss Conference. In 1912 she returned to Mauritius, where she shared her new faith with her sisters. Despite much opposition from other relatives and former friends, she traveled throughout the island to tell of the soon coming of Christ. Soon she wrote to Europe that there were 24 persons studying the Bible with her. In response to her appeals for a minister, Paul Badaut went to the island in 1914, baptized those who had accepted the SDA faith, and established an SDA church there. She and her sister used part of the funds from their inheritance to build a chapel for the congregation. She devoted the rest of her life to spreading the Bible message among the people of the island.

The story of her life was related in the Youth's Instructor of Apr. 22, 1958.

Lesotho

LESOTHO (formerly Basutoland). Previously a British protectorate from 1868—1966, when it became an independent country completely surrounded by the republic of South Africa, bounded by the Orange Free State on the west and north, by Natal on the north and east, and by the Cape Province on the south. It has an area of 11,716 square miles (30,344 square kilometers). In 1994 the population was 1.9 million, almost all Sotho. The country is extremely mountainous (elevation 5,000 to 11,000 feet [1,500 to 3,300 meters]). Agriculture is the principal occupation. The exports are wool, mohair, beans, and peas. Labor forms an important export from Lesotho, 90,000 leaving each year to work in the republic of South Africa, chiefly in the mines. About 80 percent are Christian, 75 percent of these being Roman Catholic. Sesotho is the principal language, but both English and Sesotho are official. King Letsie III has since 1990 been the head of the Lesotho nation, which is governed by parliament, through a prime minister.

He learned SDA teachings while serving as a guide for S. N. Haskell on a trip to Basotoland. In 1899 J. M. Freeman, in company with David Kalaka, established the first Seventh-day Adventist Basotoland mission at Kolo. This site was personally allocated to them by Lerothli, the paramount chief of Basotoland. The second mission, Emmanuel Station, was established in 1910 by H. C. Olmstead and has continued ever since.

Lewis, Charles Clarke

LEWIS, CHARLES CLARKE (1857—1924). Educator. He was born at Lisbon, New York. At the age of 8 he moved with his parents to a farm at Buck's Bridge, New York. He began to teach at the age of 16. In 1877 he became a Seventh-day Adventist and the same year entered Battle Creek College, from which he was graduated in 1882. During his last year in college, he taught several classes and served as secretary to Uriah Smith, the editor of the Review and Herald. After graduation he spent the summer canvassing and assisting two evangelists with tent meetings. Then he taught public school for one year. From 1883 to 1887, he taught in Battle Creek College, after which he was called to head the Minneapolis Conference School.

In 1890—1891 he studied at Yale University. On leaving Yale, he was invited to teach in Union College, where he remained until 1896, after which he was made principal of Keene Academy at Keene, Texas. In 1892 while serving in Union College, he was ordained. After several years at Keene, he was elected president of Walla Walla College, where he served until 1904, when he accepted the presidency of Union College, which position he occupied until 1910. During the next three years he was professor of education and philosophy at Pacific Union College. From there he was called to fill the same position in Washington Missionary College and at the same time to head the Fireside Correspondence School. This work he carried till the time of his death.

Lewis, Elizabeth Ann Wiley

LEWIS, ELIZABETH ANN WILEY (1857—1915). Educator, Sabbath school worker, editor, writer. Born in Toronto, Canada, of Scottish-Irish parents, she attended Battle Creek College. She married Charles C. Lewis, a graduate of the college, and they both taught at Sumner, Michigan. Later they returned to Battle Creek, where he taught and she was part-time preceptor. She developed the first kindergarten Sabbath school class at the Battle Creek Tabernacle and introduced the idea wherever she went.

They taught in Minneapolis and then moved on to Union College, where she started a monthly paper, Early Education. Later they both worked at the Keene Academy in Keene, Texas, then while he served as president of Walla Walla College, she helped establish the elementary school. Back at Union College, she again complemented her president-husband by serving as dean of women and teacher. Later they spent three years in St. Helena, California. In 1912 the General Conference asked her to edit the Home Education Department's publication Christian Education, the forerunner of Journal of True Education.

The country is bounded on the south and west by the Atlantic Ocean, on the north by Sierre Leone and Guinea, and on the east by Côte d'Ivoire. Agriculture is the principal occupation of the people, with rubber, iron, cacao, and coffee the principal exports.

Liberia has a low coastline stretching 350 miles (550 kilometers) along the Atlantic Ocean and a hinterland extending into the interior for some 200 miles (300 kilometers). The climate is hot and humid. English is the official language, but approximately 28 different dialects are spoken. Since 1847 Liberia has been an independent Black republic.

In the early nineteenth century, when the pangs of conscience began to trouble the minds of Europeans and Americans and forceful appeals were made for the abolition of slavery, the American Colonization Society decided that the Liberian coast would make a suitable home for repatriated Blacks. Since that time hundreds of freed slaves and their descendants migrated there so that by 1925 there were about 25,000 American Liberians in the country.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. The GC Daily Bulletin of Oct. 24, 1889, contains a reference to "Bro. Gaston from Liberia, who recently embraced the truth, and has gone back to his country to sow the seeds of precious truth among his kindred." Later reports reveal that he was of the Washington, D.C., church. In reporting his 1892 visit to West Africa at the January 1893 General Conference session, Lawrence C. Chadwick appealed that a missionary be sent to open a mission "at or near the home of Brother Gaston" (GC Daily Bulletin 5:2, Jan. 29, 1893). However, Liberia was to wait another 33 years for its first Seventh-day Adventist missionaries.

In 1926 the European Division sent R. Helbig and E. Flammer from Germany to Liberia, where, with L. F. Langford, of England (who had worked in the Gold Coast), they found a suitable site for the first SDA mission inland in Grand Bassa County, at Seahn. The next year Helbig and Flammer, making final arrangements for the piece of land, secured from the government a grant of 100 acres (40 hectares) of land for 99 years, on which were built the first school, church, and dispensary. Early in 1927 K. Noltze arrived from Germany to assist in the work in Liberia and remained there for 15 years.

On Apr. 30, 1930, the first four SDA converts were baptized at Seahn. Among them was Willie Helbig, who later became the first Liberian ordained minister. Later D. K. Reider arrived to join the missionary families. Noltze and Reider were sent to Liiwa, in the Gbarnga district, to begin another mission station.

In 1935 K. Noltze established the Konola Mission, where in 1937 he opened a boarding school for boys, which later became an accredited boarding academy for both boys and girls (see Konola Academy). N. S. Durning, an African pastor from Sierra Leone, was sent to Liberia in 1937 for schoolwork at Konola, and stayed there until 1939.

In 1936 T. N. Ketola, from Finland, arrived at the Konola Station and was moved to Liiwa Station in the following year. In 1941, after Noltze returned to Germany, Ketola moved back to Konola. In 1942 he bought property for new mission headquarters at Monrovia, the capital city of Liberia, and began the work there. He prepared buildings and made contacts with leaders and with the people before going to the United States in 1943. At that time the church membership in the entire country was 303.

In the meantime, in 1933, I. W. Harding, an African, had been sent as a missionary from neighboring Sierra Leone to Lower Buchanan in Liberia. When during World War II the overseas missionaries had to leave Liberia, Harding became, in 1942, the first African president of the Liberia Mission, a post he held until 1945. Under his leadership the work was expanded into Lower Buchanan and Monrovia, the capital city. By 1940 there were three mission stations and a baptized membership of 137 in the Liberia Mission.

Late in 1945 three Black American families appointed by the General Conference arrived in Liberia. G. N. Banks became president and secretary-treasurer of the mission; P. E. Giddings, the principal of the Konola School; and C. D. Henri, evangelist and leader in the Bassa district. Since 1945 Black missionaries from the United States have held the leadership of the field.

The temperance work progressed in Liberia, with successful use of stop-smoking plans and radio and television programs.

On Dec. 24, 1989, civil unrest developed, and since then more than half the population have become refugees. Many church members and pastors have been scattered to remote areas of Liberia and to neighboring countries. During this period 11 new churches have been raised up in Liberia and in neighboring countries.

LIBERTY (1906— ; bimonthly; 1994 circulation, 190,614; files in R&H). A magazine of religious freedom; a publication of the North American Division, sponsored by the Public Affairs and Religious Liberty Department of the General Conference. It is successor to Sentinel of Christian Liberty (originally the American Sentinel), founded and first published in January 1886 as a monthly by the Pacific Press, at that time in Oakland, California.

At first a 32-page quarterly, Liberty became a bimonthly with the January 1959 issue. Liberty was launched in 1906, two years after its predecessor, Sentinel of Christian Liberty, had ceased publication. It was published for the Religious Liberty Bureau of the General Conference “as a medium for disseminating the principles of Christian Liberty.” Its first issue carried the subtitle “A magazine of religious freedom, devoted to the American idea of religious liberty exemplified in the complete separation of church and state.” The current issues carry a “Declaration of Principles of the Religious Liberty Association of America,” which “was organized in 1889 by the General Conference of Seventh-day Adventists. Dedicated to the preservation of religious freedom, the association advocates no political or economic theories.”

Library Program

LIBRARY PROGRAM. A plan launched in 1939 to acquaint the reading public with Adventists and their message by supplying to public, seminary, college, university, and Bible institute libraries a selected group of denominational books that set forth the fundamental tenets held by Seventh-day Adventists.

Thousands of copies have been distributed through this plan. For public libraries the cost is shared equally by the local conference and church or churches. For university and seminary libraries the cost is shared equally by the General Conference, union conference, local conference, and publishing house concerned. Introduced in North America, it is now being fostered in other divisions.

Libya

LIBYA. An Arab republic on the north coast of Africa. It borders on Egypt and Sudan to the east, on Chad and Niger to the south, and on Algeria and Tunisia on the west. Its area is 679,359 square miles (1,750,000 square kilometers) and its population (1994) of 5 million consists primarily of Arab-Berbers. Arabic is the language of the country.

Orthodox Islam is the state religion, and though freedom of conscience has been provided by law, the making of converts is proscribed. In Greek and Roman times Libya was a thriving agricultural land, but by the twentieth century it had become a desert and a part of the Turkish Empire. In 1911 Italy occupied the country. In 1951, in accordance with a United Nations resolution, Libya became independent. In 1969 it became a republic.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. After the territory of Libya was assigned to the newly formed Southern European Division in 1928, colporteurs selling Italian publications visited Benghazi and Tripoli. When the Middle East Division was organized in 1951, Libya was assigned to the Nile Union of that division. The territory is now assigned to the Middle East Union.

After an exploratory visit early in 1952, Seventh-day Adventist representatives in 1953 were granted a permit to open medical work—the first time a Protestant organization was allowed to work in Libya—although all evangelistic activity or proselyting was proscribed. Subsequently Dr. Roy S. Cornell, from the United States, opened a hospital on May 21, 1956, at Benghazi.

From the hospital, welfare work was promoted through the distribution of food and clothing, especially during 1957, and through providing free medicines and clinical treatment. Also, temperance lectures and films were presented throughout the country during December 1957 and January 1958.

The medical work grew until in 1968 a new 65-bed hospital, financed principally by the oil companies in Libya, was opened, with

D. Clifford Ludington as the medical director. In November 1969 the hospital was nationalized by the Revolutionary Command Council of Muammar el-Qaddafi.

On Aug. 13, 1960, a church was organized at Benghazi, consisting of 17 members from the hospital staff.

A first in the work in Libya was a Vacation Bible School conducted in 1964. Another first was the junior camp held in 1969. After the nationalization of the hospital, all workers left Libya and the work closed except for the occasional visits of literature evangelists. Only a few SDAs live in Libya, all non-Libyans from North Africa and Asia. Little contact has been made since the 1970s. There is no knowledge that SDAs are meeting as groups.

Licentiate (licensed minister)

LICENTIATE (licensed minister). One who has been granted a ministerial license by the conference. He or she is authorized to preach, assist in a spiritual way in any church activities, and lead in missionary work, and especially to engage in evangelism.

He or she may be elected as a local elder of a particular church and ordained as such, provided special arrangements have been made with the conference. In such a case he or she is vested with the authority of a local elder, but no more. This ordination as local elder qualifies him or her to serve only in such churches as have elected him or her as their local elder, and then only on the advice of the conference committee or president.

Conference committees do not have the right to authorize a licensed preacher to go from church to church baptizing or performing other church rites pertaining to the functions of an ordained minister. A conference committee action cannot be substituted for church election or ministerial ordination. See also Minister.

Lickey, Arthur Edwin

LICKEY, ARTHUR EDWIN (1895—1974). Educator, pastor, author. He was a native of Missouri and took his secondary education at Keene Industrial Academy in Texas. In his early ministry he labored in evangelistic and educational work in south Texas and New Mexico. Later he served as MV secretary for the Southern California Conference. He also worked in Colorado, Washington, and Oregon. He later served in a pastoral capacity in a number of large cities. He is the author of the Twentieth Century Bible Lessons and the book God Speaks to Modern Man.

Liechtenstein

LIECHTENSTEIN. A small independent principality (area, 62 square miles [160 square kilometers]); population (1994), 30,000. It is situated between Switzerland and Austria, united with Switzerland by monetary and customs union. The language is German and the religion about 85 percent Roman Catholic, 10 percent Protestant, 5 percent others.

The territory of Liechtenstein is assigned to the German Swiss Conference, part of the Swiss Union Conference, which in turn is part of the Euro-Africa Division.

Seventh-day Adventists have never had a church in Liechtenstein. Church members have lived there from time to time, but have moved away. In 1993 eight members lived there. Those living there generally attend church services in the nearby village of Buchs, Switzerland. The towns of Liechtenstein are visited annually for the Ingathering campaign, and by literature evangelists from time to time.

Since 1985 special evangelistic activities and efforts have been conducted. In 1993 regular home Bible studies were being conducted, with about 20 participants and interested friends.

Life and Health Medical Institution

LIFE AND HEALTH MEDICAL INSTITUTION (Institution Medicale “Vie et Sante”). A former 37-bed institution, situated in South France at Labastide-Villefranche, near the thermal springs of Salies-de-Béarn, at the foot of the Pyrénées. Before World War II an effort was made to reestablish the medical work in the Franco-Belgian Union Conference. In 1967 and again in 1969 the delegates to the Franco-Belgian Union Conference sessions voted that study should be given to the opening of a sanitarium. In March 1970 a commission appointed by the union committee began its task by going to the Spirit of Prophecy for guidance in establishing a medical work. The Lord led step-by-step.

The union chose a beautiful property of about 57 acres (23 hectares) with an old mansion and a lake. After it was voted by the union committee to make the purchase of this property on Sept. 27, 1971, church members donated the necessary funds (approximately $70,000). A young couple, Gérard and Colette Chartres (he, a civil engineer, and she, a medical doctor) were placed in charge of the new institution. Under their direction the existing building was remodeled.

In May 1971 the institution opened with 32 beds. From the start there was not enough room for those who wished to come. In July 1971 three rooms were added, providing an additional five beds. Plans were made to build a 35-bed addition, but the institution closed in 1976.

Life and Health Publishing House (France)

LIFE AND HEALTH PUBLISHING HOUSE (France) (Maison d'Édition Vie et Santé). A publishing firm at Dammarie-les-Lys, France, operated under the supervision of the Euro-Africa Division. There are 54 regular employees and one apprentice. Besides books, pamphlets, and tracts, the plant regularly prints three important periodicals: one for evangelism, Signes des Temps ("Signs of the Times"); a health paper, Vie et Santé ("Life and Health"); a church paper, La Revue Adventiste ("The Advent Review"); and also Sabbath school quarterlies.

Beginnings of publications in the French language can be traced to Switzerland. A French paper, L'Évangile Éternel ("The Everlasting Gospel"), was published monthly (with a few exceptions) from June 1866 to December 1868, together with various tracts, by M. B. Czechowski, who was the first to preach Seventh-day Adventist doctrines in Europe, even though sent there by another denomination.

When J. N. Andrews, the first Seventh-day Adventist representative, arrived in Switzerland in 1874, he immediately produced French tracts and laid plans for a periodical. With the assistance of D. T. Bourdeau he launched Les Signes des Temps ("The Signs of the Times") in July 1876 in Basel. It was published monthly, at first with eight pages, 12" x 16" (30 cm. x 41 cm.), changed in June 1880 to 16 pages, 8" x 13" (20 cm. x 33 cm.). This monthly periodical is still being published.

The publishing house began to operate in 1885 on Weiherweg Street, Basel, in a building erected mainly as a printing plant. For 10 years it produced many books and tracts in French and German as well as other languages, working under the name of Librairie (Imprimerie) Polyglotte ("Polyglot Bookstore"), listed in the Yearbook as Basel Publishing House. In addition to Les Signes, in 1890 a monthly health paper, Le Vulgarisateur ("The Popularizer"), was introduced, which became Vie et Santé in 1923.

When the plant had to be closed because of Sunday laws in 1895, the building was occupied by a medical institution. But the publishing office continued in Basel until 1903, though all the printing had to be done by other firms. When the printing plant was closed, the publishing house assumed the name of Société Internationale de Traités (International Tract Society), listed in the Yearbook as Latin Union Publishing House, and its future publications were limited to the French language. It was transferred to Geneva in 1903, and a branch office was opened in Paris, functioning there until 1905. In 1910 the publishing house was moved to Gland (Vaud), Switzerland, and a printing plant added in 1914 under the direction of L. E. Borle (manager 1910—1915). For many years the publishing house had been under the direction of Jules Robert, and he was again in charge from 1915 to 1922.

When at the close of World War I it was felt that the French language publishing house should be in France, the publishing house and printing plant were transferred from Gland in 1922 to a property acquired in the town of Dammarie-les-Lys (Seine-et-Marne), near the city of Melun and some 30 miles (50 kilometers) southeast of Paris. It then took the name of Maison d'Édition Les Signes des Temps. It is now called Maison d'Édition Vie et Santé.

Equipment: To meet increasing demands from the field, the equipment was updated from time to time, and new facilities were added, such as an electric generating plant. In 1924 additions were built on the factory and the administrative offices, and further additions were made to the printing plant in 1935 and 1954. Besides the administrative and editorial staffs (four editors, one layout artist and designer), the publishing house includes a printing plant. The photocomposition section is equipped with a monophoto with a clavier, a photo laboratory, and a mounting room. The books are no longer printed and bound in the publishing house, but the pressroom still contains an offset press for small work.

Circulation: After reduced activity during World War II, the French Publishing House revived with the reorganization of the colporteur work in France. In addition to the magazines referred to above, it publishes church and trade books, with special promotion for sets of books, The Practical Guide to Life (seven volumes on health and family living) and The Spiritual Guides to Life (the Bible and the five-volume Conflict of the Ages Series). French Publishing House publications are sold in all the French-speaking countries of the world.

Managers: G. A. Huse, 1922—1923; L. E. Borle, 1923—1925; H. L. Henriksen, 1926—1933; Ernest Meyer, 1933—1940; Georges Haberey, 1940—1948; Robert Erdmann, 1948—1952; Maxime Duploux, 1952—1954; Elisée Bénézech, 1954—1968; Eugène Vervoort, 1968—1970; André Garsin, 1970—1980; Jean Scippa, 1980—1985; Alain Menis, 1985—1993; Aldo Monet, 1993— .

Lifestyle Magazine

LIFESTYLE MAGAZINE. A magazine-format program launched in 1985 by Faith for Today. First known as Christian Lifestyle Magazine, it featured interviews and stories of people who are making a difference by doing. The name was changed to Lifestyle Magazine in 1991. Topics range from such issues as AIDS, incest, and domestic violence to nutrition and drug addiction and therapy. It also focuses on relationships-in marriage, parenting, and with God.

Dan Matthews, as host and executive producer of Lifestyle Magazine, serves as moderator between on-camera guests, the 200-plus studio audience, and the thousands in the weekly listening audience. Drs. Rebekah Cheng and Edwin Nebblett help make up the regular team of medical professionals, and Dr. John McDougall often fields questions about nutrition.

Lifestyle Magazine has received many media honors and reaches a potential audience of 40 million homes each week. During the February 1992 Nielsen ratings, the program tied for first place in the devotional category for numbers of households per broadcast station. In June 1993 the Nielsen ratings ranked the program number one in its time slot in metropolitan New York City-the largest market in the world. Since November 1992, 13 new radio stations have been added to the list of television stations carrying the program when an audio version was offered to the Adventist Radio Network stations. In addition to being carried over the Armed Forces Television Network, Lifestyle Magazine was being broadcast twice each week over Adventist World Radio-Europe in 1994 and is telecast by a station in Athens that also serves the areas of Corinth and Thessalonica.

Light

LIGHT (1951—1994; monthly; file in GC). Organ of the Northern Europe-West Africa, Northern European, and Trans-European divisions; superseded the Advent Survey, 1929—1941, the publication of which closed because of war conditions. From 1951 to 1970 and from 1980 to 1985 it was called Northern Light.

Light House Publishing Company

LIGHT HOUSE PUBLISHING COMPANY (Ekdotikos Oikos Pharos tis Ellados). A publishing enterprise, without a printing plant, conducted by the Greek Mission at Athens, Greece. The need for Seventh-day Adventist publications in the Greek language to help in evangelism was sensed by E. Hennecke, who was mission director from 1926 to 1932. Since it was difficult at that time to have SDA literature printed in Greece, he imported from America a number of books printed in Greek, whose English titles are: The Bible Made Plain, Steps to Christ, Words of Comfort, His Second Coming, and Fighting Illness. About the same time World Empire and Pictures From Life were printed in Greece. Young people from the SDA orphanage, formerly operated (1923—1926) at Thessaloníki, were the first colporteurs to circulate these publications in various parts of Greece.

The publishing house was formally established in 1930. N. S. Pappastamoulis, a Greek who had come from North America, supervised this department of the work for many years, during which time many books were sold.

After World War II new books were produced in Greece, mostly Greek translations of English books such as The Ministry of Healing, Steps to Christ, His Cross and Mine, We and Our Children, God Speaks to Modern Man, and a variety of tracts.

The publishing work was reorganized under the direction of Nick Tallios, who in 1961 took charge both of the publishing house and the colporteur work.

In the years that followed as many as 35 colporteurs worked for the Book and Bible House. When Nick Tallios left, Nick Germanis became manager. Later Eleftherios Dialektakis took over with Nick Giantzklides as leader of the colporteur work.

Although new books were published, The Desire of Ages, and later Christ's Object Lessons, the publishing work came to a virtual standstill. In 1992 Christoforos Christoforides' book The Revelation was published, and efforts are being made to reopen the publishing work with a bookshop in Athens.

A Light in the Way Productions

A LIGHT IN THE WAY PRODUCTIONS (Producciones “Una Luz en el Camino”). A communication center organized Apr. 19, 1972, and situated at Echeverría 1452, Florida, Buenos Aires, Argentina. The name of the institution corresponds to the radio and TV program Una Luz en el Camino (“A Light in the Way”), which is broadcast throughout the three countries of the Austral Union Conference (Argentina, Paraguay, and Uruguay). The radio version is a five-minute program created in 1964 and transmitted daily, free of charge, by 140 radio stations (in 1993), mostly in Argentina, but also in Paraguay and Uruguay, and in the territory of the Inca Union. The TV version begun in 1970 is 10 minutes in length, and is broadcast weekly by some 650 TV channels free of charge.

The center also produces religious music, records, and cassettes. The Bible correspondence school has thousands of active students, from this program and The Voice of Hope.

Lilydale Adventist Academy

LILYDALE ADVENTIST ACADEMY. A coeducational boarding school on the secondary level, situated near Lilydale, at Mooroolbark, Victoria, Australia, about 30 miles (50 kilometers) from Melbourne, the capital of Victoria, and a similar distance from the Seventh-day Adventist community at Warburton. It offers courses preparatory to entry to Avondale College or any Australian university.

The estate on which the school stands comprises 40 acres (16 hectares) of good farming land and is beautifully situated on the hills overlooking the Shire of Lilydale and a portion of the Yarra Valley. In recent years an ornamental tree industry has enhanced the estate, providing income to the academy. The school opened February 1964, and among the initial 100 enrolled were representatives from all the eastern states of Australia and from Papua New Guinea. Enrollment in 1992 was 339.

The main buildings are the administrative block, dormitories, science laboratories, manual arts building, dining room, kitchen, and staff homes. A sports center was opened in 1993. The administrative section includes nine classrooms, a music studio, a library, and the office of administration.

During the first two years all students follow the same general course, and after that, certain core subjects designed to aid the development of a balanced personality are required of all. Other subjects are added according to the special abilities and objectives of the individual student.

Linda Vista Academy

LINDA VISTA ACADEMY (Colegio Linda Vista). A coeducational boarding school situated on a 1,200-acre (500-hectare) ranch property in Pueblo Nuevo, Solistahuacan, Chiapas, Mexico. It is owned and operated by the Asociación Civil Filantrópica y Educativa de Mexico (the Civil Association of Seventh-day Adventists in Mexico). The school is accredited by the state of Chiapas and from its beginning has had the support of the local educational authorities. Classwork is offered from the primary through the equivalent of the twelfth grade. Beginning with the 1972—1973 school year, the school has offered the first year in the theological program as an affiliate of Montemorelos University. All instruction is in the Spanish language.

The school site consists of pine and oak woodland interspersed with meadows and a few small areas suitable for cultivation. A number of springs provide water, and the annual rainfall is about 70 inches (180 centimeters). The climate is cool, with little seasonal change in temperature.

Linda Vista Academy was established in September 1957 as a training school to serve the growing constituency in southern Mexico. It is considered the successor of a primary boarding school (the Escuela Agrícola e Industrial del Sureste) in Teapa, Tabasco, which had served the constituency of the Southeast Mexican Mission since 1948.

When construction on the new school began, part of the staff and a small group of older students were invited to help in constructing the plant. Horace Kelley was called to serve as principal and to direct the building program. The school plant was built largely with materials produced on the property and with student labor under the direction of the teachers. Using the existing buildings, which consisted of a large stone house without windows and an adobe chapel, plus tents, the school opened in June 1958 with 60 students. Classes were held six days a week.

The first class graduated from the three-year secondary course in 1960, and a year later the first group of four completed the Bible instructor's training course. These four, in addition to those who later finished the Bible instructor's training course, became denominational workers in the Mexican Union. A large portion of the workers of the Mexican Union are graduates of Linda Vista or have studied there for several years.

He was treasurer of the General Conference from 1874 to 1875 and from 1888 to 1893, and participated in the establishment and development of Battle Creek College and Oakwood College. He also served as treasurer of several other church institutions, among them the Central SDA Publishing Association (now Review and Herald Publishing Association) in the 1890s. Later in his life he left the Seventh-day Adventist Church and joined the Christian Scientists.

Lindsay, Katherine

LINDSAY, KATHERINE (1842—1923). Physician, founder of the first Seventh-day Adventist nurse's training school. After receiving some training in nursing and attending college for six years, she entered, in 1870, the University of Michigan Medical College. In 1875 she was graduated at the head of her class, with the first group of women to receive the college's degree. In early life she had been deeply influenced by reading the story of Florence Nightingale and by watching the development of nurse's training in England.

Joining the staff of the Battle Creek Sanitarium, "Dr. Kate" vigorously set about establishing there the first SDA school of nursing. Through the introduction of thorough classwork, she became known as a foremost teacher of student nurses.

In 1895 she went to South Africa. She worked in Claremont Sanitarium at Cape Town, became a leading consultant, and traveled under most difficult conditions to mission stations in the interior. En route to the United States, she traveled extensively in Europe, and in 1900 began 20 years as an active member of the medical staff and faculty of the Colorado Sanitarium in Boulder, devoting special interest to the Nursing School. She retained her unusual mental vigor until the time of her death.

Lindsey, Sarah A. Hallock

LINDSEY, SARAH A. HALLOCK (late 1800s). Preacher. She was converted to Seventh-day Adventism in 1860 and married John Lindsey, a lay preacher. Their joint ministry held the Pennsylvania and New York churches together during a difficult time of apostasy and lack of good leadership. In 1872, along with her husband, Lindsey was licensed to preach, hold evangelistic meetings, and lead out in church business and committee sessions.

Line Islands

LINE ISLANDS. A Pacific island group running south-southeast from the Hawaiian Islands to the northern part of the French Polynesian group. The islands that comprise this group are Kingman (U.S.), Palmyra (U.S.), and Jarvis (U.S.), as well as Washington, Fanning, Christmas, Malden, Starbuck, Caroline, Vostok, and Flint, which are part of Kiribati. They have a total area of 255 square miles (660 square kilometers), and the population on the following islands (1994) is Washington, 936; Fanning, 1,309; Christmas, 2,537; and Kanton, 45, for a total population of 4,827, the rest being uninhabited.

They all were uninhabited for many years, until immediately prior to World War II, when most of them were garrisoned by United States forces. Today Christmas Island is run as a copra plantation by the Kiribati government, and is under special study as a development area for deep-sea sport fishing. Flint and Caroline islands are leased to a Tahitian merchant. Malden, Starbuck, and Vostock do not support even trees.

The group, including Christmas Island, is assigned to the Kiribati Mission in the Western Pacific Union Mission, which forms part of the South Pacific Division. A Seventh-day Adventist minister serves the 98 members on Christmas Island. See also Kiribati.

Lipa Adventist Academy

LIPA ADVENTIST ACADEMY. A boarding academy operated at Bugtong, Lipa City, Philippines, by the South-Central Luzon Mission of the North Philippine Union. In 1975 Lipa Adventist Academy opened with 98 students. The school was previously known as South-Central Luzon Academy, which began in 1969.

From 1975 to 1992, 3,984 students attended the four high school levels, and 832 seniors have graduated from the school.

Lipke, John

LIPKE, JOHN (1875—1943). Pioneer missionary in Brazil; teacher, administrator, and physician, who helped to establish Adventist publishing, educational, and medical work there. He was born in Berlin, Germany, and was named Johannes Rudolf Berthold Lipke. After studying for the ministry, he canvassed for three or four years. About 1896 he went to the United States and studied at Battle Creek Sanitarium. In 1897 he went to Brazil as a missionary teacher and taught in various centers. Recognizing the need for publications produced locally, from about 1902 to 1905 he promoted and edited a German-language magazine, naming it Der Missionarbeiter. In 1904 he made a trip to the United States urging the establishment of an Adventist press in Portuguese-speaking Brazil. Gifts gathered on this trip helped to establish the Brazil Publishing House. From 1905 to 1907 he taught and preached. In 1907 he was ordained and the next year took charge of the Rio Grande Mission. Three years later, in 1910, he became superintendent of the East Brazil Mission, and the same year edited a short-lived youth magazine, Der Jugendfreund. Beginning in 1913 or 1914, he superintended the São Paulo Mission, and while carrying this post developed and directed the Adventist Seminary at São Paulo. In 1918 he became superintendent of the North Brazil Union Mission. In 1920 he went to the United States and took the medical course at the College of Medical Evangelists. After graduation in 1925, he returned to Brazil and practiced medicine in Rio de Janeiro for 10 years, until an illness forced his retirement. He died at São Paulo.

Listen

LISTEN (subtitled “A Journal of Better Living”) (1948— ; monthly; R&H; 1994 circulation c. 40,000; file in editorial office). A temperance journal published by the Review and Herald Publishing Association, Hagerstown, Maryland. It is the largest of all temperance publications, both in size and in circulation, and is now widely quoted, not only in the United States but in some 50 other countries of the world.

Originally a quarterly (through 1957), Listen continued as a bimonthly through 1965, changing to a monthly with the January 1966 issue.

Listen was inaugurated (1) to help launch and foster a worldwide educational program in behalf of total abstinence; (2) to publicize facts and data from current scientific and medical research on the effects of the use of alcoholic beverages and other narcotics on the physical, mental, and moral powers of the individual, and on the social, economic, political, and religious life of the nation; (3) to counter misleading and fallacious propaganda for alcoholic beverages in the press, on the billboards, and over radio and television, by the publication of facts proved by laboratory experiments and authentic surveys and studies; (4) to cooperate with other organizations and movements working for the elimination of intemperance from personal, family, and national life; (5) to encourage alcohol education in the schools and to advocate all other reasonable means of saving young people from the danger of alcohol and other narcotics, and to influence them toward sane, wholesome, and temperate living; (6) to offer aid and inspiration to those suffering from alcoholism or who are tempted to drink, pointing them to the true Source of help in divine power; (7) to aid in the dissemination of basic health principles, since true temperance is intimately connected with the development of a “sound mind in a sound body,” thus to promote good mental health habits, a well-rounded personality, and emotional stability, along with methods of strengthening self-control, overcoming wrong habits, and developing a positive, healthy approach to life.

Editorial material in Listen focuses primarily on positive alternatives to an intemperate way of life, especially for young readers of high school age.

Color cover designs for Listen feature prominent personalities in various walks of life who have strong convictions about temperance. Among those featured have been cabinet members, governors, members of Congress, business and professional leaders, outstanding youth personalities, and well-known leaders in the world of sports and entertainment.

Listen is youth-slanted and circulated chiefly in high schools and among youth organizations. It is used by Community Crusades Against Drugs in a national program of introducing temperance materials into public school systems. It is unique in its field in being officially approved for use in the public school curriculum by about three fourths of the states through their commissioners of education. A teaching guide for classroom use is provided with each issue.

Listen magazine is the youth drug education publication of the International Commission for the Prevention of Alcoholism and Drug Dependency (ICPA), a nongovernmental organization of both the United Nations and the World Health Organization. Through the ICPA Listen articles and information are circulated throughout the world.

Listen produced and sponsored the film I Took the High Road, a story of contemporary youth who found the solution to their drug problems in a spiritual conversion and belief in the second coming of Christ.

Another extension of Listen's services was added in 1972 in the form of the Listen Fingertip Data Service. This consists of approximately 80 reference cards a month containing carefully selected facts on alcohol, tobacco, and drugs. These are available on a regular subscription basis.

A series of books containing reprint materials from Listen forms Listen's Better Living Library. Among them are Invasion Upstairs

(alcohol); If You Smoke, What Have You?

(tobacco); and To Go to Pot, or Not? (marijuana). These books are intended primarily for reference purposes, have wide circulation in school libraries, and are used extensively for classroom study. Frequently reprints of Listen articles are used in local option elections and for general circulation.

Listen has been awarded the National Safety Council's Public Interest Award for exceptional service to safety.

Editors: J. A. Buckwalter, 1948—1953; Francis A. Soper, 1953—1984; Gary B. Swanson, 1984—1990; Lincoln E. Steed, 1990— .

Litch, Josiah

LITCH, JOSIAH (1809—1886). Methodist minister, the first well-known minister in New England to take his stand with William Miller, later a physician. He had a vigorous mind, a bent for investigation, and the courage to advocate what he believed to be truth. In the early days of slavery and temperance agitation, he was constantly in the forefront. He was a power in the pulpit and equally forceful with his pen, both as an editor (associate on The Signs of the Times) and as an author on prophecy.

Having accepted Miller's views in 1838, he wrote a 48-page synopsis of them entitled Midnight Cry or; A Review of Mr. Miller's Lectures. In the same year he wrote a 200-page book, The Probability of the Second Coming of Christ About A.D. 1843. In 1841 his Methodist Conference investigated his views, decided that he held nothing contrary to Methodism—though he went in some points beyond it—and permitted him to retire from the itinerant ministry. This allowed him to devote his time to the dissemination of the Second Advent doctrine.

Soon, however, Litch became a full-time traveling “general agent” of the Millerite Committee of Publication. He also became one of the editors of The Signs of the Times and of another Millerite paper in Philadelphia, the Trumpet of Alarm. He traveled extensively and preached on the prophecies with great effect. His prediction in 1838, based on prophetic interpretation, of a loss of Turkish power in August 1840 aroused widespread interest and spurred the study of prophecy. His Address to ... the Clergy moved many ministers to examine the Adventist doctrine candidly, persuading not a few of them.

Litch was a pioneer in several points of prophetic interpretation that later were adopted by Seventh-day Adventists: that there was to be a “judicial scene of judgment” (Address to ... the Clergy [1841], pp. 38, 39; cf. Prophetic Expositions [1842], vol. 1, pp. 49—54) preceding the resurrection, and separate from the execution of judgment (see Investigative Judgment); that the seven plagues were still future (Prophetic Expositions, vol. 1, p. 175). His expositions of the historical fulfillment of prophecy had considerable influence on Uriah Smith's interpretations.

Although Litch had earlier thought that “the door of mercy” would close some time preceding the Second Advent, he refused after the disappointment of 1844 to believe that any door was shut (see Open and Shut Door), and in consequence he abandoned the belief that the 2300 days ended in 1844. For a time he remained with that branch of the Adventists who did not accept the doctrine of conditional immortality, but in later years he left all connection with any Adventists. Wellcome says that Litch became a futurist, expecting nearly all the prophecies of Revelation after the fifth chapter to be fulfilled in the future, immediately preceding the Second Advent (Isaac C. Wellcome, History of the Second Advent Message [1874], p. 678 note).

Literature Evangelist (colporteur)

LITERATURE EVANGELIST (colporteur). A Seventh-day Adventist who regularly sells denominational books and magazines from house to house to the public. He or she is considered a gospel worker whose efforts are coordinated with those of the other evangelistic workers of the church. The work is a sacred one and partakes of that of a minister, a teacher, and a salesperson. Going directly into the homes of all classes of people, literature evangelists (LEs) tell their customers of the way of salvation and pray with them, hoping that God will impress them as the books they leave in the homes are read and studied. Many are thus led into fuller understanding, spiritual conviction, and then into church fellowship through the influence of the press. Thousands of people who become interested in the SDA teachings first, in this way, enroll in Bible correspondence schools or attend evangelistic meetings and become members of the Seventh-day Adventist Church.

Literature evangelists receive a commission on their sales and also certain financial benefits if they meet stipulated requirements set forth in denominational policies.

History of the Work of the Literature Evangelist. Probably the first book evangelists worked in Europe during the 1860s. These men, Jean David Geymet, Sigismund Hanhardt, James Erzberger, and Michael B. Czechowski, although not under the sponsorship of the General Conference in Battle Creek, nevertheless proclaimed the Advent message, including the seventh-day Sabbath. Their ministry covered portions of Italy, Switzerland, and France.

In 1879 Ellen White began urging the two publishing houses, the Review and Herald and the Pacific Press publishing associations, to sell doctrinal books to the public through house-to-house canvassers. In 1880 Dr. J. H. Kellogg wrote a large book on health, Home Handbook (1,600 pages), which he sold by this method in advance of publication. One of the men who sold this book was a Canadian, George A. King, who had already canvassed several years, selling tracts, small books, and subscriptions to periodicals such as Good Health. King's success with Kellogg's subscription book may have been what fired him with the desire for a large volume setting forth SDA beliefs, published in an attractive subscription edition for the general public.

King once had a desire to become a preacher. James White, who was skeptical of King's abilities, requested Richard Godsmark to take King out to the Godsmark farm near Battle Creek, Michigan, and let him practice preaching, and then report on him. As the story is told, King would often be heard in his room praying early in the morning. At other times he would place his charts in the living room and preach to empty seats. One day after a Sabbath school conducted in the Godsmark home, he preached his trial sermon and made a miserable failure. Godsmark informed him that he would never make a minister, but encouraged him to try selling SDA publications to the people in their homes, and offered to supply him with some tracts and pamphlets. King went out with these and sold them, thus proving that he could sell SDA publications. This incident must have occurred some time before 1878, because in 1878 King had been canvassing for periodical subscriptions and for books in Ontario (Review and Herald 53:54, Feb. 13; 53:78, Aug. 28, 1879, etc.).

In 1881 he came to Battle Creek again, this time not asking to preach, but asking to put into systematic operation Mrs. White's plan of evangelistic bookselling. Having found that he could sell Uriah Smith's two small books on Daniel and the Revelation, he urged the Review and Herald to print the two books as one in a subscription edition in a larger size. The publishing house finally agreed to print 5,000 copies of the combined book, Thoughts on Daniel and the Revelation, in improved format, if King would assume responsibility for 1,000 copies. First, they made up sample copies by binding together already existing sections of the two books. After King and others sold these successfully, the two books were reprinted together with continuous paging in a larger size, and with illustrations. On Apr. 3, 1882, King sold the first copy of this new Daniel and the Revelation to D. W. Reavis for $2.50.

The story of the beginning of the work of the Seventh-day Adventist Church in many parts of the world is the story of literature evangelists preparing the way for the preacher.

In all the South American countries except Peru, the SDA work began either through SDA publications being sent into the countries or through the work of LEs. The first SDA LE or colporteur on South American soil was George King, who in 1887 canvassed for several months in British Guiana and sold 400 books.

In 1891 the General Conference sent three colporteurs, Elwin W. Snyder, C. A. Nowlen, and A. B. Stauffer, to open up the work in South America. Their original plan was to begin work in Montevideo, Uruguay, but after a "thorough looking over" they decided to go to Buenos Aires, Argentina (Home Missionary 4:46, February 1892). Stauffer went to the northern part of Argentina and worked among the Germans, and his two companions began their work in Buenos Aires. After four months, they had sold about 200 books and made a number of converts, among them Lionel Brooking, an immigrant from England. In July 1892 Brooking sold books in the Gran Chaco of Paraguay (General Conference Bulletin, Mar. 4, 1895, pp. 461, 462). At that time it was extremely difficult to sell books there. Early in 1893 Stauffer and Snyder returned to Uruguay to sell SDA publications. Stauffer sold The Great Controversy and other books and gave Bible studies to several families in the German-Swiss colonies, while Snyder worked in Montevideo. In 1896 F. H. Westphal baptized 18 converts and organized the first SDA church in Uruguay (Review and Herald 74:89, Feb. 9; 74:507, Aug. 10, 1897).

The first SDA to enter Ecuador was the literature evangelist Thomas Davis, who with F. W. Bishop had previously (1894) helped C. A. Nowlen initiate the work in Chile. In spite of many difficulties, great opposition, and the death of his wife, Davis canvassed for four years (1904—1908), working among the towns and villages along the railway that runs from Guayaquil to Iquitos. One year after his arrival, in 1905, the first Seventh-day Adventist preacher arrived in Ecuador. R. A. Caldwell pioneered the book work in the Philippines, as well as in Malaysia and China. He remained in the Philippines for several years, being joined by other colporteurs, first of whom was Floyd Ashbaugh.

The Chinese province of Shaanxi was entered in 1915. This province, in the interior bordering the Yellow River, is the oldest site of Chinese civilization and culture, and here, at Sianfu, was the first capital of China. A colporteur found there a town called Gospel Village, which had been built 30 years before by a company of Christians emigrating from Shantung. Here his literature was gladly received, and the SDA faith made steady progress.

At the beginning of the SDA work in Australia and New Zealand, the leader of forces was S. N. Haskell, a strong promoter of literature distribution. In his company was William Arnold, one of the earliest and most successful SDA colporteurs, who, in the face of initial difficulties, led in putting this work on a paying basis there.

The Publishing Department of the General Conference, organized in 1902, laid plans to build publishing houses in strategic areas over the world, so as to serve the different language areas; secure proper publishing leadership; and recruit literature evangelists. Today more than 23,000 literature evangelists go from door to door selling the products of 59 publishing houses. Their retail sales annually in the world field exceed $100 million.

But the work of the literature evangelist is evangelistic. For example, these men and women annually distribute millions of pieces of free literature and pray in nearly 1 million homes. Baptisms each quinquennium as a result of contacts by literature evangelists total approximately 150,000.

Training of Literature Evangelists. Throughout the history of the Seventh-day Adventist Church the training of literature evangelists has received much attention, and many SDA educational institutions, especially outside North America, trace their beginnings to training schools for colporteurs and Bible instructors.

The current program for training literature evangelists in North America includes a short indoctrination session usually held at one of the publishing houses. Through lectures, training filmstrips, and the reading of training materials, the candidate is introduced to the elements of book production, the purposes and methods of SDA book distribution, and the principles of effective salesmanship of health and religious literature. This is usually followed by a period of individual on-the-job training by the conference publishing department secretary or one of his assistants. In many countries outside North America, literature ministry seminaries conduct three- to five-week training courses for literature evangelists, creating more professional workers.

The literature evangelist in the field is kept in touch with the developments in his line of work through periodical bulletins issued by local and union conference publishing departments and the quarterly, Literature Evangelist, issued by the Publishing Department of the General Conference. The LE also attends three or four district LE sales meetings a year and an annual LE institute, where additional training is given.

An increasingly important role in the training of literature evangelists is being played by the LE clubs on the campuses of SDA colleges and academies. Special student LE training classes are planned by conference publishing leaders before the students go out for their vacation-time work. Some of these students later become full-time literature evangelists or leaders in the publishing work.

Lithuania

LITHUANIA. A Baltic republic whose neighbors include Latvia, Poland, and the Russian Federation. Lithuania formally declared itself independent from the USSR on Mar. 11, 1990. It has a land area of 25,170 square miles (65,190 square kilometers), and a population (1994) of 3.8 million. The people are akin to the Latvians, and the great majority of them are ardent Roman Catholics. Their language, which retains traces of Sanskrit, is among the most ancient in Europe.

Lithuania was an important kingdom in Eastern Europe in the early Middle Ages, then for many centuries was joined to Poland, and together with Poland was divided between the Russian and the German empires, Germany holding the area of Klaipeda (Memel) to the end of World War I.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. Lithuania forms the Lithuanian Field, which is part of the Baltic Union of the Trans-European Division. In 1994 there were 539 members in eight churches.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. SDA work within the present boundaries of Lithuania began in the city of Memel and its environs some time before World War I, while the country was a part of Prussia. Churches developed at Memel, Heydekrug, Didshen, Pogegen, and Wilkishken. In addition, there were probably a few SDAs in other areas of Lithuania as well.

After Lithuania became independent in 1919, W. Strohl, a young German-speaking native of Jelgava, Latvia, who had become an SDA in St. Petersburg, Russia, was invited by a small group of recent SDA converts at Zagare, on the Latvian border, to preach in Lithuania. Arriving there, he reported that these were the only Seventh-day Adventists in the country outside of a group in Memel. Strohl earned his living by teaching English and bookkeeping for four and a half days a week. The other two and a half days he devoted to evangelistic work. Since he could not speak Lithuanian, his sermons and Bible studies were translated from Russian by one of the local church members.

Some time after the war several SDAs native to the area returned home after their wartime absence and, together with the group already in Zagare, formed the first Seventh-day Adventist church in Lithuania outside Memel.

In 1920 the work in Lithuania was attached to the East German Union and placed under the direction of E. Enseleit. In 1921 the first general meeting of Seventh-day Adventists took place at Memel. Two years later Strohl, returning from ministerial training at the Friedensau Missionary Seminary, began work in Siauliai, the second-largest city of the country. In two years a church of 17 members was organized there. In 1923 Lithuania became a mission field in the Baltic Union Conference. About 1924 SDAs entered Kaunas, the capital, and about two years later a church was organized there. By that time Strohl had mastered enough of the language to preach in Lithuanian. By mid-1924 there were 130 members in the mission.

In 1925 a book depository was established in Lithuania under the name of Lietuvos Knygas Leidings "Uola," under the direction of Enseleit. A periodical titled Krisciones Namu Prietelis ("Christian Friend of the Home") was published, which was replaced from 1930 until World War II by Dabarties Klausimai ("Problems of the Present Day"), under the editorship of M. Gnedinas, W. Strohl, V. Kavaliauskas, and K. Stradauskas.

A measure of religious freedom prevailed in Lithuania between the two world wars. In 1927 the 160-member church received recognition as a religious society and acquired corporate rights. Many of the SDA publications, including the monthly paper, Sabbath school quarterlies, the Ingathering pamphlet Piuties Padeka, and the Week of Prayer readings were printed in a government-operated printing establishment. In 1929 a hymnbook, Kankliu Aidai, containing some 160 hymns was issued.

Among the books printed over the years were the following: Kekias i Kristu ("Steps to Christ"), by Ellen White; Pasaulio krizio isvakarene ("On the Eve of the World's Crisis"), by C. B. Haynes; Busimasis Pasaulio karas ("The Coming World War"), by J. Birsin; Kuomet ayeis geresni laikai ("When to Expect Better Times"), also by

J. Birsin; and Kova pries Dieva ("The Struggle Against God"), by C. L. Taylor. About 10 colporteurs were engaged in the distribution of SDA publications throughout the country.

A number of national workers were trained at the Friedensau Missionary Seminary in Germany or in the Suschenhof school of the Baltic Union. When the foreign workers were forced to leave in the course of World War II, the work was left in the charge of two national ministers, who, it appears, could function only as elders of local churches.

Persecution following World War II caused many members of German and Latvian origin to leave Lithuania. That left only a few members of Lithuanian origin and two pastors—A. Virbitskas in Shaulyai and E. Kantauchunas in Kaunas. Most of those baptized during that period were in the 45-to-80-age bracket. In 1981 D. Ojalis took the post held until then by A. Virbitskas, and new people began to join the church.

After N. Link replaced E. Kantauchunas, who died in 1988, he worked with D. Ojalis in evangelistic campaigns in Panevejis, Shaulyai, and Ionava. Don Barnt and Ben Owing from the United States held evangelistic meetings the same year in Vilnius, organizing a church of 172 members there.

Since 1990 church literature and periodicals have been translated and published, and some of the young workers have been sent for training to the Zaoski Theological Seminary in Russia.

Little Time of Trouble

LITTLE TIME OF TROUBLE. A relatively brief time of adversity and persecution immediately prior to the close of human probation. The phrase “little time of trouble” is based on an explanatory statement in the 1854 supplement to Ellen White’s first book, A Sketch of the Christian Experience and Views of Ellen White, first published in 1851. She had written: “At the commencement of the time of trouble, we were filled with the Holy Ghost as we went forth and proclaimed the Sabbath more fully” (p. 17). Incorrectly identifying this “time of trouble” with that mentioned in connection with the standing up of Michael in Dan. 12:1 (taken to be Christ’s standing up at the close of probation), some pointed out the futility of going forth to proclaim the Sabbath at all after probation had closed.

In the supplement Ellen White explained that “the time of trouble” to which she referred would be immediately prior to the close of probation. She wrote: “‘The commencement of that time of trouble,’ here mentioned, does not refer to the time when the plagues shall begin to be poured out, but to a short period just before they are poured out, while Christ is still in the sanctuary” (EW 85).

This “short period,” accordingly, came to be known as “the little time of trouble,” in contrast with the “great time of trouble” spoken of by Daniel. Mrs. White wrote further: “At that time, while the work of salvation is closing . . . the nations will be . . . held in check. . . . The ‘latter rain’ . . . will come, to give power to the loud voice of the third angel, and prepare the saints to stand in the period when the seven last plagues shall be poured out” (ibid.).

For those who remain loyal to the expressed purposes of Heaven, the little time of trouble will thus be a time of intensive evangelistic endeavor. See also Latter Rain; Loud Cry; Probation; Three Angels’ Messages; Time of Trouble.

Littlejohn, Wolcott Hackley

LITTLEJOHN, WOLCOTT HACKLEY (1834—1916). Minister, author. He was educated at Kalamazoo College and the University of Michigan, but left the latter in his sophomore year because of an infection in the eyes, which left him totally blind 15 years later. He became a Seventh-day Adventist in 1866, later entered the ministry, and was appointed pastor of Battle Creek Seventh-day Adventist Church in 1883. Shortly afterward he served as president of Battle Creek College (1883—1885). From that time on he devoted himself chiefly to writing on biblical subjects. Numerous articles for denominational papers, tracts, and pamphlets came from his pen. He was on the committee that prepared the articles (1882) that were the forerunner of a church manual. He was the author of The Coming Conflict, Rome in Prophecy, and other works. In the discussions on righteousness by faith conducted near the turn of the century, he staunchly defended the position of Uriah Smith, as opposed to that taken by E. J. Waggoner and A. T. Jones.

Littleton Hospital

LITTLETON HOSPITAL. A general, acute, 105-bed hospital operated at Littleton, Colorado, by the Mid-America Union Conference. It is accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Healthcare Organizations and has an open staff of 310 active physicians and 486 employees. The hospital features such services as obstetrics and gynecology, pediatrics, medical/surgical, radiology, cardiopulmonary, rehabilitation, and 24-hour emergency care. All of its rooms are private, billed at semiprivate rates. Its Family Life Center offers a wide variety of classes and programs, and the hospital serves the community with ASK-A-NURSE, a 24-hour free health information and physician referral service. The hospital is a member of Rocky Mountain Adventist Healthcare.

History

History. Littleton Hospital was established in 1989 by Porter Memorial Hospital to meet the needs of the rapidly growing southern corridor of metropolitan Denver. It opened an 85-bed facility on Apr. 9, 1989. In November 1990 the vacant sixth story of this facility was finished, allowing for 26 additional patient rooms, and in January 1992 the birthing center was expanded to 40 beds. The emergency center was expanded in 1991, adding five additional procedure rooms.

LIVINGSTON, JOHN DOUGLAS (1894—1967). Missionary, administrator, and teacher. He was born in Kansas and educated at San Fernando Academy and Pacific Union College in California. In 1915 he began more than 40 years of dedicated service to the church by teaching church school in Oakland and Mountain View. After his marriage in 1918 to Mabel Swanson, the young couple left for Cuba, where Livingston served as evangelist and mission superintendent for five years. Back in his homeland he taught at La Sierra and Phoenix academies, and then returned to Cuba as director of the Antillian school for several years. Later he was called to River Plate College in Argentina, where he headed the Theology Department from 1931 to 1948. In 1949 he received his M.A. degree at the SDA Theological Seminary and his B.D. degree from the same institution in 1950. From 1949 until his retirement he taught Bible and biblical languages at Columbia Union College and also served on the staff of what was then the Home Study Institute. After retiring he continued to teach Bible doctrines in Spanish for Home Study Institute until the day of his death.

Lloyd, Ernest

LLOYD, ERNEST (1880—1985). Editor. Born in Canada, he attended school at Battle Creek College and the New England Sanitarium,. After serving in various publishing positions and teaching posts, he joined Pacific Press in 1917. He became editor of Our Little Friend in 1924, a position he held until 1949.

Lloyd, Marjorie Lewis

LLOYD, MARJORIE LEWIS (1911—1985). Author, composer. She was born in Nebraska; her education was cut short by illness after only six weeks at Walla Walla College, but she worked with Seventh-day Adventist broadcasting from its inception in 1956 until shortly before her death. For almost 29 years she assisted in the preparation of scripts and books for the It Is Written television ministry.

Two of her major projects written for television audiences were the book The Cry of a Lonely Planet and The Truth for the End-Time Bible study series. Her personal testimony is contained in the book If I Had a Bigger Drum.

She was also a prolific writer of poems and songs; her grave marker bears the title of her best-known gospel song, “Jesus, Take My Hand.”

Loasby, Roland E.

LOASBY, ROLAND E. (1890—1974). Missionary, evangelist, educator. A native of England, he emigrated to the United States at 18 years of age and was a member of the 1915 graduating class of Washington Missionary College in Maryland. From 1910 to 1912 he served as a missionary in Bermuda. After his marriage in 1913 to Bernice Manuel, they went to India, where they spent 23 years in evangelistic and educational work. In 1938 he became chair of the New Testament Department of the Seventh-day Adventist Theological Seminary, a post he held for 22 years. From 1960 to 1969 he engaged in part-time teaching.

Lodi Academy

LODI ACADEMY. A coeducational day school operated by the Northern California Conference on a 38-acre (15-hectare) tract just inside the southeast corner of the city limits of Lodi, California. Students come from the two churches in Lodi, the Galt church, and three churches in Stockton. In 1992—1993 there were 19 staff members, and the enrollment in grades 9 to 12 was 136.

The school is listed by the University of California as an approved college preparatory secondary school, and it is accredited by the Seventh-day Adventist Board of Regents and the Western Association of Schools and Colleges (WASC).

Lodi Academy was established in 1908 by a stock corporation. The members of the first corporate board were Elton D. Sharpe, president; W. A. Williams, secretary; C. P. Moon, business manager; Sylvia Sharpe; and Lula Moon. The project was financed by the sale of stock to the amount of some $8,000, by $7,500 in donations, by heavy bank and individual loans, and by $8,500 worth of land contributed by the Lodi Chamber of Commerce.

Originally called Western Normal Institute, the school was established to specialize in teacher education, for neither Healdsburg College nor San Fernando Academy was meeting the demand for teachers. Since Healdsburg College closed in the spring of 1908, and Pacific Union College did not open until the fall of 1909, Western Normal Institute offered some advanced college courses. Charles E. Nixon, B.A. in 1909, was apparently the only person who received a degree from Lodi. The following in teacher education was offered over the years: 1908—1910, four-year college normal course; 1910—1911, subjects in grades 11 and 12; 1911—1914, two-year teachers' course beyond the academy; 1914—1915, only the second year of the teachers' course (graduating the class that had already begun); 1916—1924, one teachers' subject in grade 11 and one in grade 12; 1924—1932, two-year teachers' course beyond the academy; 1932 to the present, no teachers' training.

The name of the institution changed as follows: 1908—1910, Western Normal Institute; 1910—1911, Lodi Normal Academy; 1911—1914, Lodi Normal Institute; 1914—1925, Lodi Academy; 1925—1932, Lodi Academy and Normal; 1932—1967, Lodi Academy; 1967—1968, Lodi Union Academy; since 1968, Lodi Academy.

The institution was controlled by the Northern California Conference from 1911 until June 1914, then came under the control of the Pacific Union Conference until 1918; from 1919 to 1929 it was under the Northern California Conference and the Central California Conference, and since 1949 under the Northern California Conference.

In 1967 and 1968 the dormitories were closed, the original buildings demolished, and a new plant built to serve day students only. The new construction consists of five units, four being of modular design, housing classrooms, library, and administrative offices; and a chapel with seating for 400, with an adjacent music department.

Other buildings are a gymnasium/auditorium seating 4,000, a warehouse, an industrial arts building, and eight homes for staff, three of which are duplexes.

The two publications are the Gateway, a monthly newspaper published during the school year since May 1928, and the school annual, the Lodian Light, published since 1950.

Loebsack, Heinrich J.

LOEBSACK, HEINRICH J. (d. 1938). Evangelist and administrator; the first Seventh-day Adventist to be ordained as a minister in Russia (in 1894). He was born in a German colony on the Volga. He became an SDA as a young man and soon after, early in 1890, went to Hamburg, Germany, where he attended an SDA mission school for six months. On his return to Russia in August 1890 he worked as a colporteur in the German Volga colonies.

In 1895 on his way to a workers' meeting in Switzerland, Loebsack held meetings in the Crimea, then in Volhynia (near Romania), and found hundreds of interested people. After working for about six months in Germany, he visited Riga, Latvia, where work had been begun some months earlier; he baptized several people there and also in Poland. In 1897, while in the Volga colonies, he received calls from various Mennonite settlements on the border of Siberia.

By World War I Loebsack had worked in the Caucasus, Crimea, Volhynia, Poland, and the Ukraine, and had been president of the Southern Russian Conference. During the war he was president of the Little Russian Conference, which included Kiev, Poltava, and Chernigov provinces, and Poland. When O. E. Reinke died in 1921, Loebsack succeeded him as president of the Russian Union. In the early 1920s Loebsack led in reorganizing the conferences and missions. He became the first president of the All Russia Federation of Seventh-day Adventists.

When the Soviet government changed its policy on religious freedom in 1929, communications between conferences, workers, and churches were disrupted. The conference offices were closed, and many ministers and lay members in all parts of Russia were arrested, imprisoned, and exiled. By 1934 Loebsack was left alone in Moscow, because all his coworkers had been exiled. Upon applying to the government for permission to get help, he was asked to submit names with biographies. Thus permission was granted to call G. Grigoriev from Novosibirsk in Siberia. Soon after Grigoriev's arrival, Loebsack was arrested and sentenced to three years of isolated imprisonment in the city of Yaroslav, northeast of Moscow. Afterward his term was extended indefinitely. He died in prison in 1938. His wife died in 1961 in Alma Ata, Kazakhstan. His eldest daughter, Amalie Galladshev, died in exile.

He was editor of Adventbote ("Advent Messenger"), published in Moscow 1925 to c. 1929, and Golos Istiny ("Voice of Truth"), both monthly papers. He wrote a history of the early SDA work in Russia, but the unpublished manuscript, sent to the Hamburg Publishing House, was destroyed in the bombings of World War II.

Lohne, Alf

LOHNE, ALF (1915—1993). Administrator, writer. Born in Kristiansand, Norway, he studied at Onsrud Missionary College in Norway, Newbold College in England, and the Seventh-day Adventist Theological Seminary in Washington, D.C. While a student he spent summers canvassing. In 1935 he began his denominational service as a Bible worker and literature evangelist in the East Norway Conference, and then served that conference and the North Norway Conference as evangelist.

After further studies at Newbold College, he married Agnes Plata Torkelsen in 1940. In his capacity as a departmental secretary in the West Nordic Union and later in the Northern European office, he made an outstanding contribution to the church in that part of the world, particularly in the field of communications.

In 1951 he was called to serve as president of the East Norway Conference, where he had begun in the work. He held this position until 1967, when he was first secretary and then president of the Northern Europe-West Africa Division. At the General Conference session in 1975, he was elected a general vice president of the General Conference. His main responsibility was to coordinate the work of the church in the Soviet Union and other Eastern European countries. With the help of other administrators he accomplished the delicate task of bringing about a reconciliation among differing factions of the church in the Soviet Union at a time when religious worship was restricted. During those years a strong foundation was laid that bore much fruit after restrictions were removed.

A prolific and gifted writer, his articles in denominational periodicals always attracted many readers and kept local church members in touch with the progress of the message around the world, particularly in the Soviet Union. He authored several books, the most popular of which was Tomorrow Begins Today, which went through a number of editions and was translated into several languages. His last book, Adventists in Russia, has also been widely read. It gives insights into the beginnings of Seventh-day Adventist work in that important area of the world, as well as intriguing stories of his visits there.

Loma Linda Academy

LOMA LINDA ACADEMY. A coeducational K-12 day school comprised of three divisions: the elementary school, the junior high school, and the senior high school. The academy is operated by 11 constituent churches, which have a combined membership of 12,914. The 19 buildings are situated on a 28.5-acre (11.5-hectare) campus at 10656 Anderson Street, Loma Linda, California, approximately one quarter mile north of Loma Linda University.

The academy is accredited by the Seventh-day Adventist Board of Regents, and in 1962 the high school became a charter member of the Western Association of Schools and Colleges. It is on the list of approved schools of the University of California.

The total 1992—1993 enrollment was 1,511. There were 531 enrolled in grades 9—12, 208 in grades 7 and 8, and 772 in grades K-6; 55 of the staff of 116 served the elementary school, 11 served the junior high level, and 32 were members of the secondary staff. The remaining 18 comprise the K-12 support staff.

The school is descended from the original Loma Linda church school, opened in 1906 in a tent pitched on the side of the sanitarium hill. Among the six original students were F. D. Nichol, former editor of the Review and Herald, and his two sisters. The following year, with 12 students, the school met in the building later known as Alumni Hall, and the next year, with 46 students, it occupied a new school building at the foot of the hill on Mound Street, northeast of the sanitarium. During the principalship of James I. Robison (1910—1913), later a missionary in Africa and an associate secretary of the General Conference, the school moved to a new building situated north of the present site, across San Timoteo Creek, and became a 10-grade school.

The list of board members in those early days included the names of J. A. Burden, W. A. George, G. M. Price, and Clarence Santee.

The school year of 1920—1921, under the principalship of Elson H. Emmerson, was the first year in which 12 grades were offered by Loma Linda Academy. A class of six graduated in the spring of 1921. However, in 1922 the academy was reduced to 10 grades, and the students for the eleventh and twelfth grades commuted to the new La Sierra Academy. The school again became a 12-grade academy in the fall of 1930, at the beginning of the principalship of W. C. Flaiz.

The first building on the present site was an elementary school unit built in 1931. The next year, 1932, the old school buildings were moved and reassembled on the present academy site, and the dedication of the new plant took place at the beginning of the 1932 school year.

The high school library and chapel, built in 1946, were saved when the rest of the administration building burned in March of 1946. The structure was rebuilt in time for the opening of school that fall. Flaiz Hall, the science-mathematics building, was completed in 1965.

In February of 1969 a flood caused extensive damage to the campus of the academy. In May of 1969 the Loma Linda Academy constituency voted, in view of projected enrollment growth and the severe flood damage done to the property, to initiate a comprehensive building program consisting of four phases:

(1) gymnasium-classroom complex; (2) industrial education and academy classroom and administration complex; (3) elementary classroom complex; (4) preschool facilities. The first phase was completed in the spring of 1971, the second in 1974. In 1988 a new elementary school plant was completed south of the original campus. The new plant includes classrooms, offices, auditorium, gymnasium, food service facility, and specialty use rooms.

The high school student association publishes a paper, The Mirror, and a yearbook, The Lomasphere. The junior high school publishes a yearbook, Reflections, and the elementary school publishes a yearbook, Footprints.

Loma Linda Adventist Sanitarium

LOMA LINDA ADVENTIST SANITARIUM (Chaco Sanitarium and Hospital; Sanatorio Adventista Loma Linda). A medical institution situated 1.2 miles (two kilometers) from the city of Presidencia Roque Sáenz Peña (60,000 inhabitants), province of Chaco, Argentina.

In 1964 Mrs. Esther Leiva, who had been an inpatient at the River Plate Sanitarium and Hospital and was much impressed by the Christian assistance given by its personnel, desired that a similar sanitarium be founded in her city. She began to work among the inhabitants of Presidencia Roque Sáenz Peña, and captured the interest of Dr. Juan Carlos Moroni, who had been her doctor at River Plate Sanitarium, and of Dr. Arturo Weiss. They presented the idea to the leaders of the work.

In 1966 Drs. Weiss and Moroni were sent to establish a clinic in the city prior to the initiation of the sanitarium. A medical director and an administrator for the clinic and future sanitarium were appointed. The following year plans were laid for the building to be constructed in three stages. The third stage was begun in 1973.

By 1993 the sanitarium was serving a large area in north Argentina. There were 43 beds, 7 full-time doctors, and 15 nurses.

Loma Linda Foods/La Loma Foods

LOMA LINDA FOODS/LA LOMA FOODS A nonprofit corporation manufacturing and distributing health foods in the United States and Canada. It was owned and operated by the General Conference of Seventh-day Adventists for the purposes of (a) furthering by all proper means a better knowledge of the laws of healthful living, (b) manufacturing and selling healthful foods and related products, and (c) encouraging and supporting benevolent, educational, and religious enterprises of the Seventh-day Adventist Church. The main office, factory, and headquarters were at 11503 Pierce Street, Riverside, California; the second factory (featuring the production of soy milk in liquid and powdered form) was on Wooster Road, Mount Vernon, Ohio. Products included vegetarian protein foods (canned and frozen), soy milk, cereal coffee, gravy mixes, and canned soybeans.

History

History. Forerunner of Loma Linda Foods was the Loma Linda Sanitarium bakery, which began operation in 1905. It was called the Sanitarium Food Company, and its plant was situated on Anderson Street in Loma Linda. At first it manufactured a variety of breads and wafers, but it soon added other health food items. On Feb. 6, 1933, the name “Loma Linda Food Company” was adopted, and on July 1, 1935, the first articles of incorporation were filed for a perpetual, nonprofit organization with a 12-member board of directors elected every two years by a General Conference-selected constituency, the Pacific Union Conference, each local conference in the Pacific Union Conference, and the board of Loma Linda University. On Nov. 14, 1937, groundbreaking ceremonies for a factory building were held on a nine-acre site donated by the Southern California Junior College (now La Sierra College) at Arlington (Riverside). The new factory began operations on July 16, 1938, the main product being Ruskets, a flaked whole-wheat biscuit cereal, but later more than 30 other products were added, the main emphasis being upon the development and perfection of high-protein foods of vegetable origin. The company also distributed related food items processed and packaged by others under the Loma Linda Foods label.

On Jan. 1, 1951, Loma Linda Foods took over the business of the International Nutrition Laboratories, Inc., Mount Vernon, Ohio, purchased from Harry Willis Miller, M.D. Charles Percy Miles was named manager. The Canadian Division of Loma Linda Foods was established at Oshawa, Ontario, in 1962 on a site donated by Oshawa Missionary College (now Kingsway College). Frank L. Wessely was appointed its manager. It was closed in 1965. In 1951 the original corporation was liquidated and the ownership of the business was transferred to the Pacific Union Association. It was presented to the General Conference as a gift from the Pacific Union Conference on June 30, 1970. The affairs of the General Conference Corporation doing business as Loma Linda Foods was directed by a general board of management consisting of 25 members elected by the General Conference Executive Committee. The composition of the general board includes General Conference, union and local conferences, as well as Loma Linda Foods and church laity personnel.

Loma Linda Foods began with limited capital, and as the company grew, much of the earnings were invested in necessary buildings and machinery. Considerable sums were devoted to market development, to nutritional and product research, and to public nutrition education programs. Loma Linda Foods also afforded financial support to the Seventh-day Adventist Dietetic Association and provided fellowships to selected postgraduates of the School of Dietetics of Loma Linda University. By Jan. 1, 1965, it had also contributed to the denominational mission program more than $300,000 through the Loma Linda Foods label-saving plan for Sabbath school investment.

In 1989 Loma Linda Foods sold its name and infant formula business to another company and renamed the remaining organization La Loma Foods. In 1990 La Loma was sold to Worthington Foods, an organization owned mainly by Seventh-day Adventist laypersons.

Loma Linda University

LOMA LINDA UNIVERSITY. A Seventh-day Adventist coeducational health sciences institution in inland southern California, 60 miles (100 kilometers) east of Los Angeles (in the San Bernardino, Redlands, area).

I. General Features

I. General Features. Professional curriculums are offered by the Schools of Allied Health Professions, Dentistry, Medicine, Nursing, and Public Health. Graduate programs are offered through the Graduate School.

There are 870 full-time faculty. Part-time and voluntary teachers, especially clinicians in the professional curriculums, bring the total to more than 1,900. Approximately 90 nations and virtually all of the states of the Union are represented in the annual enrollment of more than 3,000 students. Health science curriculums are offered for the Associate in Science (A.S.), Associate in Arts (A.A.), Bachelor of Science (B.S.), undergraduate and graduate certificates, Master of Science in Public Health (M.S.P.H.), Master of Health Administration (M.H.A.), Master of Public Health (M.P.H.), Master of Social Work (M.S.W.), Master of Physical Therapy (M.P.T.), Master of Science (M.S.), Master of Arts (M.A.), Doctor of Physical Therapy (DPT), Doctor of Public Health (Dr.P.H.), Doctor of Dental Surgery (D.D.S.), Doctor of Medicine (M.D.), and Doctor of Philosophy (Ph.D.) degrees.

The university was founded as the Loma Linda College of Evangelists in 1905 and chartered as the College of Medical Evangelists in the state of California in 1909. It was accredited by the Northwest Association of Secondary and Higher Schools in 1937, a relationship that was voluntarily surrendered in favor of the Western Association of Schools and Colleges in 1960 (prior to January 1962, Western College Association). The institution became Loma Linda University on July 1, 1961.

The professional schools and curriculums are approved by their own national accrediting organizations.

The Del E. Webb Memorial Library is the main library for the institution. The building was completed in 1981. Attached to it is the Vernier Radcliffe Wing, which houses the Heritage Room and the stacks. Also a part of the library building is the Randall Visitors' Center. This houses an amphitheater and the Jorgensen Learning Center, as well as the Robert M. Ricketts collection.

As of 1994 the holdings of the library included more than 375,000 books, bound periodicals, and audiovisual materials, and 2,500 current subscriptions. Special collections of Seventh-day Adventist and health sciences materials enrich the holdings and include the Clark, Lebowitz, Peterson, and Remondino collections. This is augmented with the Ellen White Estate Branch Office. The library is a depository for books published by the Pacific Press Publishing Association and the Review and Herald Publishing Association. Administratively separate departmental libraries exist on campus.

Several cooperative arrangements with other libraries give students and faculty access to their collections. These include the five largest libraries as well as most of the other academic libraries in the area. The library also participates in the Pacific Southwest region of the National Network of Libraries of Medicine, serving as one of the resource libraries.

Besides the traditional library services, the library faculty participate in course-integrated bibliographic instruction and work with the various schools to assure that the library is filling their information needs. The library has joined with the Medical Library and Information Center (MLIC) of the Loma Linda University Medical Center to move toward a local implementation of the Integrated Academic Information Management System concept, endorsed by the National Library of Medicine.

The publications of the university include the bulletins of the schools of the university; student handbooks and directories; Scope and the Today (successors to The Medical Evangelists, 1908—1962, and the University Observer, 1962—1988), as interpretative media for students, parents, alumni, faculty, and institutional family; a student newspaper; and the alumni publications of the schools of the university. (Medical Arts and Sciences, a quarterly scientific journal reflecting research and clinical investigation at the university, was published from 1947 to 1974.)

The Drayson Center is a 100,000-square-foot (9,300-square-meter) state-of-the-art fitness/wellness facility. It serves as the focal point for out-of-class campus life at Loma Linda. Students, faculty, at staff at Loma Linda and employees at Loma Linda University Medical Center may participate in the multifaceted programs involving the wholistic concept of social, intellectual, physical, emotional, and spiritual wellness that supports Loma Linda's motto, "To make man whole."

The closing of the Norton Air Force Base (in San Bernardino, three miles [five kilometers] from the Loma Linda Campus) in the early 1990s turned into a great opportunity for Loma Linda. After negotiations the clinic located on the base was donated to Loma Linda, along with a lot of clinic equipment. The Social Action Community Health System (SACHS) is centered in the 42,300 square feet (4,000 square meters) of clinic space. All of the Loma Linda health professional schools are intrinsically involved in providing interdisciplinary, comprehensive primary care for the uninsured in communities surrounding Loma Linda. SACHS also has several satellite clinics in neighboring communities. The roots of SACHS are found deep in the missionary outreach activities of Loma Linda University, Loma Linda University Medical Center, the University church and the Southeastern California Conference.

1. University Administration and Control. Loma Linda University is a nonprofit corporation organized and existing under the laws of the state of California. The president of Loma Linda University is the president of the corporation. The Foundation, a division of the corporation, manages investment properties and securities, annuities, trust agreements, and life-income contracts.

Total land, buildings, and equipment are valued at more than $51 million. The Loma Linda campus consists of 142 acres (60 hectares). Adjacent reserve land totals 220 acres (90 hectares); other properties owned by the university in the community amount to 47 acres (20 hectares). Employees total approximately 1,300.

The institution is supported by the General Conference and, in addition, receives other financial support. Six of the 23 members of the board of trustees are elected from among the General Conference administrative staff. Also serving as members of the board are the president of the North American Division and up to four presidents of union conferences in the North American Division. Other trustees include alumni and laypersons.

The university, consisting of six schools and the faculty of religion, is administered by the president of the university, who represents the entire institution on the board of trustees and is responsible for all operations. There are five vice presidents in specific areas of operation: academic and research affairs, financial affairs, advancement, public affairs, and medical affairs. In addition to the school deans, there is a dean of student affairs, two special assistants to the president of the university in the area of diversity and international affairs. The medical center, although a separate corporation, is used in the educational function of the university.

2. Consolidation of the School of Medicine. A most significant event in the development, location, and expansion of the university involved the consolidation of the School of Medicine and the paramedical programs. From its inception as a medical school, the first two years of the medical curriculum were offered at Loma Linda. Because of the paucity of clinical material and the lack of proper clinical facilities at Loma Linda, the third and fourth years were taught at Los Angeles, at what is now the White Memorial Medical Center and with the excellent affiliation at the Los Angeles County General Hospital. Clinical teaching and medical research were carried on at these locations until the middle 1960s.

In time and after prolonged urging by the accrediting groups concerned, the School of Medicine was consolidated on a single campus at Loma Linda. The construction of a new 500-bed medical center, including a research wing, made this consolidation possible. This new facility was opened in July 1967. In addition, affiliations with other medical institutions in the vicinity of Loma Linda have been utilized.

3. Relationship of La Sierra University With Loma Linda University. When the Loma Linda trustees voted to unite the four years of medicine on the Loma Linda campus, the need was felt to undergird the professional studies on that campus with expanded offerings in the liberal arts. Various ways of implementing this action were given consideration. The eventual decision of the trustees was to merge La Sierra College, located 20 miles (30 kilometers) away, with Loma Linda University, which arrangement became effective July 1, 1967. The La Sierra College campus assumed the name Riverside Campus of Loma Linda University. In 1990 the Loma Linda University Board of Trustees voted to separate the two campuses as independent corporations. This was done in order to allow each campus to more clearly focus on its distinctive mission. The Riverside campus is now known as La Sierra University. (See La Sierra University.)

4. Humanitarian Outreach. Loma Linda University is and always has been a part of the Seventh-day Adventist global mission. This is why the university was founded, and this is why it exists. If each Loma Linda University presence was represented by a dot, there would be 70 such dots on a world map emphasizing the global outreach of the university. Some of these dots represent university-wide projects, and others the program of a single school of the university, or even one individual. During the decade from 1984 to 1993 there was a significant and progressive increase in international activities at Loma Linda University. This encompassed all of the schools of the University in both faculty and student groups. To complement the activities within the schools there is also a steady stream of international visiting professors averaging 150 in number every year. All of this is in harmony with the global mission thrust that is the foundation of Loma Linda University. Only some of the varied activities of the university will be mentioned.

For many years the medical students and dental students have had opportunity to go on mission electives. This program continues to flourish, and through the years these students have gone to mission stations in almost 50 different countries as part of their professional education. Another active student group is Students for International Mission Service (SIMS). The SIMS groups go outside the United States to all parts of the world, and from 1985 through 1994, 2,247 students participated in different teams. These trips take place during vacation periods and are made up of multidisciplinary teams, with faculty supervision providing medical, dental, allied health, and public health assistance.

Since early in the 1980s Loma Linda University has had an agreement with Kasturba Medical College and the other schools of that university located in Manipal, India. This agreement has provided a way for Seventh-day Adventist students in India to receive their medical education there. Loma Linda University reciprocates with faculty exchange programs from all the different schools of the university. This program has been quite successful, and each year five Seventh-day Adventist Indian students graduate from medicine and/or dentistry, ready to serve local health needs. A similar program is in place at Obafemi Awolowo University in Ile Ife, Nigeria.

Another university-wide project is the Overseas Heart Surgery Team, which has functioned since 1963. From 1963 through 1992 the team has made 23 trips to 12 countries. Through the years thousands of patients have had lifesaving surgery and hundreds of local medical personnel have been trained. In many cases the ideal goal has been achieved, and the local country has been able to continue the same type of work after the team has left. In some countries self-sufficiency in cardiac surgery required a continuing program that was started with health-care personnel being rotated from Loma Linda University. From 1963 through 1992, 837 individuals were sent from Loma Linda University to carry out these services in the various countries.

The School of Medicine, using the experience obtained from the demonstration of the heart team, has encouraged the various departments to develop their individual overseas projects. Scores of such independent teaching missions have been sent to many countries, with results that are mutually beneficial. Ophthalmology, plastic and reconstructive surgery, and urology are just a few such participants. In each of the schools of the university there is an extensive faculty and medical exchange with countries throughout the world.

The School of Allied Health Professions has been active in assisting in curriculum development and faculty preparation in many countries, including India, China, Puerto Rico, and Jamaica. The Department of Cardiopulmonary Sciences has organized the School of Respiratory Therapy in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia. This is a unique situation, with Loma Linda University granting a degree in respiratory therapy to Saudi Arabian students who have been taught the same material that they would have received in Loma Linda. The first graduating class finished in 1990, and the program continues to flourish.

The School of Public Health provides extended programs that have now functioned well in more than 10 countries. This is a mechanism whereby the local people can obtain a public health degree from Loma Linda University by attending intensive summer sessions over a four-year period. This enables Loma Linda to extend its borders geographically and to be of greater assistance to other countries. The School of Public Health at Loma Linda has just been designated as a collaborating center by the World Health Organization (WHO). This honor carries with it the opportunity to serve as an overseas consultant under the auspices of WHO.

The School of Dentistry has a strong continuing education program that is active both domestically and overseas. They have conducted courses in more than 20 countries and continue to expand their offerings. There is also an active faculty and medical exchange throughout the school with other dental schools in many countries. The most innovative program in the dental school, as regards the global mission, has been the international dentist program. This is designed to allow qualified dentists educated in other countries to earn an American Doctor of Dental Surgery degree. This program has been in place for the past several years, and more than 100 students have come from 30-plus countries. This program helps to develop strong ties with the countries of origin of these students.

As Loma Linda University is now a health sciences university, it has become more of a focal point for visitors from other nations. This gives an opportunity for the Loma Linda faculty to share not only their scientific expertise but their desire to use global outreach as a vehicle for “making man whole.”

II. Historical Backgrounds: Loma Linda and Los Angeles. 1

II. Historical Backgrounds: Loma Linda and Los Angeles. 1 . Forerunners and Beginnings. The nucleus on which the university was formed in 1961 was the College of Medical Evangelists. This was the second Seventh-day Adventist medical college, but there was no organizational or legal connection between it and its predecessor, the American Medical Missionary College (1895—1910). The latter was connected with the Battle Creek Sanitarium, and both went out from denominational control about 1907. Even before that time Loma Linda was chosen as one of several sites for medical institutions in southern California. In 1900, soon after her return from Australia, Ellen White made her home at St. Helena, California, where a sanitarium had been established in 1878, and began to urge that medical institutions be established in southern California. She enlisted the assistance of a minister, John A. Burden, who in 1904 began to canvass the region for suitable sanitarium locations.

When Burden surveyed the coastal plains and valleys of southern California, he found for sale many tourist hotels and health resort buildings, which stood as mute evidence of the real-estate boom and subsequent debacle of the 1880s. Two of these were purchased privately on the advice of Mrs. White, and in time they came to be denominationally operated as the Paradise Valley Sanitarium at National City and the Glendale Sanitarium at Glendale, a suburb of Los Angeles.

Another of these was the Victorian-styled Loma Linda resort hotel, constructed in 1887—1888 as part of the Mound City development, which collapsed with the end of the great boom. It was bought in 1900 by the Loma Linda Association, a group of Los Angeles businessmen and physicians, the latter hoping to establish a health resort. The association remodeled and richly furnished the hotel, adding five patient cottages and a recreation hall, and landscaping the hill, raising the total investment above $150,000. This venture also failed, and by 1904 the luxury hotel stood almost empty. So matters stood early in 1905 when Ellen White, charmed by the beauty of the San Bernardino Valley and impressed by its possibilities as a location for a country sanitarium, instructed John A. Burden to look for a site. Burden found Loma Linda (Spanish for "Hill Beautiful"), including the hotel, the ancillary buildings, and 76 acres (30 hectares) of land, for sale for $110,000.

The owners of Loma Linda, desperate to sell and hoping to sell to someone who could be expected to succeed where they had failed in creating a health resort, lowered the price to $40,000, which Mrs. White instructed Burden to accept. The option was signed on May 26, 1905, with a down payment of $1,000, and two months later, on July 26, the indenture was signed, in which the Loma Linda Association, the party of the first part, sold and conveyed to John A. Burden, the party of the second part, the property known as Loma Linda, including all lands, buildings, furnishings, equipment, wells, insurance policies; 20 shares of capital stock in the Big Bear Water and Pipe Company, and 15 shares of capital stock in the Bryn Mawr Water Company-without which valley land would have been almost worthless in those days. Money came from unexpected sources, and by Apr. 15, 1906, the entire purchase price (discounted to $38,900) had been paid, and a dedication service was held on the sanitarium grounds. On June 20, 1905, the Southern California Conference of Seventh-day Adventists had agreed to accept the property as a denominational institution, which became a fact when the corporation was formed. In the beginning John Burden was the chairman of the board, president of the corporation, manager, and chaplain of the sanitarium.

2. The First Schools at Loma Linda. During the summer and fall preceding the opening of the sanitarium, young people began to arrive in anticipation of taking the nursing course at Loma Linda, for in those days it was taken for granted that an SDA sanitarium should have its own school of nursing. In November, with the arrival of Julia A. White, M.D., recruited by Mrs. White to be the sanitarium's obstetrician and head of the training program for nurses, it was announced that instruction in nursing would begin early in January of 1906. Actually, informal instruction had probably begun with the arrival of the students.

A council representing the Pacific Union Conference and the Southern California Conference in April 1906 gave substance to the educational program. Warren E. Howell was elected "president of the faculty" and instructed to gather a faculty and construct nursing, general collegiate, and evangelistic-medical curriculums. The school was named the Loma Linda College of Evangelists. Howell and his staff put together a prospectus for the college, then Howell departed for a mission appointment in Greece in the spring of 1907, and George Knapp Abbott, M.D., became head of the school in his place.

The curriculum in nursing was constructed along conventional Adventist lines for the first two years of the course, after which the students were eligible to take the first year of the evangelistic-medical course. Nine years of school were required for admission to the course in nursing. There were seven in the first class, all transfer students, which made possible their graduation on July 10, 1907.

Putting together a curriculum in medicine was a more difficult matter for the administration, which was plagued with uncertainties as to philosophy, and therefore content, in addition to uncertainties about the relationship between them and the sanitarium. On Dec. 9, 1909, under a new name, the College of Medical Evangelists received from the state of California a charter authorizing the granting of academic and professional degrees.

In 1910 the College of Medical Evangelists took definite shape in a series of decision-making conferences. In January the Pacific Union Conference in biennial session at Mountain View, California, heard an appeal from Loma Linda leaders for broader support and for assistance with planning for medical education. A committee appointed at this session secured from Ellen White a statement, dated Jan. 27, 1910, calling for quality medical education. In response, the conference recommended that CME offer a full medical course, that controlling board be enlarged to include representation from the General Conference and the union conferences in North America, and that the financial support be equally broad. In April the Spring Council of the General Conference voted to approve the Pacific Union Conference recommendation and suggested three General Conference members for the CME board, including President A. G. Daniells.

Finally, a representative council met at Loma Linda, May 6—10, 1910, to give substance to the developing concept of CME. As a final result, the college and the sanitarium became one corporation. A board of 10 members was selected, including the president of the General Conference and the presidents of the Pacific Union Conference and the Southern California Conference. An appropriate financial base was approved, and operating funds for the next school year were voted. CME had become a General Conference institution. Formal instruction in medicine began over the year-end of 1909—1910, and the first class of six members was graduated on June 11, 1914.

The future of the College of Medical Evangelists appeared to hang in the balance when the Autumn Council met in Loma Linda in 1915. The denomination did not adequately understand the nature and objectives of the educational program. War clouds were gathering and institutional costs were rising, and despite the heroic efforts of the administration the American Medical Association had given the medical curriculum the poorest of all possible ratings. However, the College of Medical Evangelists had a new leader, a medical scientist and educator of distinction and experience, Newton G. Evans, M.D. Under his leadership, and with the loyal support of Arthur G. Daniells, president of the General Conference, I. H. Evans, and others, the council declared the denomination in favor of the expansion of the Loma Linda programs, including a fully accredited medical school.

Plans had to be laid for clinical practice on a wider scale than Loma Linda provided. As early as the fall of 1913, some months before the graduation of the first class in medicine, a clinic had been opened in Los Angeles, and the way was clear for limited student instruction at the Los Angeles County General Hospital. In 1915 Percy T. Magan, M.D., an experienced educator and administrator, was added to President Evans' staff as dean of the Los Angeles Division. Shortly thereafter land was purchased in Boyle Heights for the cottage-type original White Memorial Hospital, where upperclassmen in medicine received their clinical training under denominational auspices.

Changes in the constitution and bylaws, organizational structure, and administrative staff, as well as growth and progress in physical facilities, educational conception, and spiritual perception, have characterized the passing decades since the college in 1915 became more certain of its future course. From a very small institution with overlapping curriculums and uncertain objectives, it came to be, under the General Conference aegis, the denomination's largest and most complex institution. It became Loma Linda University in 1961.

3. Loma Linda University Medical Center. On Oct. 1, 1905, a few persons began to prepare Loma Linda Sanitarium for the admission of patients. Various dates have been given for the opening. On Oct. 9 Burden notified Mrs. White that "Loma Linda is now open to receive patients. Doctor Abbott is with us, and a number of other workers." Although the official patient register lists the first admission as on Oct. 12, Burden, the first manager, officially fixed Nov. 1 as the date of opening and issued his financial statements accordingly. There were as many as 55 patients at one time during the first winter season.

Because of the need for practical instruction in the care of surgical and critically ill patients, authorization was given in 1910 to raise $25,000 for the construction of a small hospital on the campus site, west of "the hill." This was occupied in 1913, but by 1915 it was apparent that the patronage was not sufficient to satisfy educational needs.

The transfer of Loma Linda Sanitarium assets to the College of Medical Evangelists on June 15, 1910, made Loma Linda Sanitarium legally an integral part of the college. However, the sanitarium, because of its independent origin and the recognized necessity of establishing a teaching hospital in Los Angeles, came to be less intimately related to undergraduate medical education, though it continued as the primary training facility for the School of Nursing. Its steady growth reflected a well-earned reputation as a popular community hospital in the San Bernardino Valley and a health center in the Pacific Southwest.

In May 1923 the trustees adopted a plan for a new building to be constructed on top of the hill. Construction on a one-story hospital facility was near completion in January 1924, but for lack of funds it was not furnished and occupied until the following August. A plan to add a second floor to the new hospital unit and to remove the two top floors of the sanitarium was abandoned in favor of constructing a new three-story sanitarium building adjacent to the hospital unit. Construction began in April 1928. Although the finished building cost only $2.52 a square foot, the money was hard to secure. Completion and occupancy came in March 1929, and the official opening on April 7. The upper floors of the old building were removed, and the modified structure was demoted to an annex status.

Full patronage soon created a demand for additional beds. Funds earned by the institution were sufficiently augmented to finance a half-million-dollar hospital unit, which was added to the east end of the new sanitarium building. The 1924 unit was converted into additional bed space and doctors' offices. Except for laboratory and radiology additions to the main structure, there were no major additions to the sanitarium and hospital until it was completely renovated in 1968 for classrooms, laboratories, and offices for the Schools of Health and Allied Health Professions.

In late 1962 the university trustees voted to consolidate on one campus at Loma Linda, including the programs that had previously been conducted partially in Los Angeles. To accommodate the heavier programs in professional curricula that the consolidated arrangement would require at Loma Linda, they launched plans to erect a new, larger hospital-medical center complex there.

Actual construction of the nine-story structure, with two levels underground, was begun soon after formal groundbreaking ceremonies on June 6, 1964. In July 1967 it was completed and occupied.

In the early 1980s Loma Linda University Medical Center became the only state-designated, level 1, regional trauma center for Inyo, Mono, Riverside, and San Bernardino counties, an area covering approximately one fourth of California.

Loma Linda University Medical Center is staffed by 4,500 employees and provides services for more than 23,000 inpatients annually. Outpatient visits total more than 500,000 each year. In 1993 the medical center was licensed for more than 700 beds. Its community hospital (with 120 beds) and its Behavioral Medicine Center (an 89-bed psychiatric hospital) take the total to more than 900 beds.

Up to 35 percent of the medical center's patients are served in eight intensive-care units: surgical/trauma, neurosurgical, cardiothoracic surgery, pediatric cardiothoracic surgery, coronary, medical, neonatal, and pediatrics. It is one of the busiest university medical centers in the western United States. The medical center is licensed for 72 neonatal intensive-care beds for premature or sick babies, one of the largest facilities of its kind in the world. Half of the neonatal intensive-care unit's patients are transferred to Loma Linda from outlying community hospitals, and half of those transferred arrive by helicopter. An average of four helicopters a day fly into one of LLUMC's two heliports.

Loma Linda University Medical Center is best known around the world for its pioneering infant heart-transplant program, under the direction of Leonard L. Bailey, M.D., chair of the Department of Surgery. On Nov. 20, 1985, Baby Moses (Eddie Anguiano), at 4 days of age, became the youngest person in the world to undergo heart transplantation. To date, 150 babies under 6 months of age have received new hearts at LLUMC, with an overall success rate of approximately 80 percent. The tiny hearts weigh about one ounce. The youngest heart-transplant patient was baby Paul Holc, a Canadian, transplanted on Oct. 16, 1987, when he was just 3 hours old. He became the youngest person ever to receive an organ transplant of any kind.

The world's first hospital-based Proton Treatment Center was opened at LLUMC in October 1990, under the direction of James M. Slater, M.D., chair of the Department of Radiation Medicine. Patients at the Proton Treatment Center are now receiving a form of radiation therapy capable of irradiating cancerous tumors more precisely than conventional radiation, with far less of the debilitating side effects associated with conventional radiation.

LLUMC's proton accelerator, built by the U.S. Department of Energy's Fermi National Accelerator Laboratory, is the world's smallest synchrotron. The accelerator, producing up to 250 million electron volts of energy, and its proton guidance system, standing three stories tall, weigh 400 tons (360 metric tons).

"Loma Linda has taken a very courageous step by being the first medical institution in the world to bring the practical medical treatment to what has been, up until now, highly scientific research," says United States Congressman Jerry Lewis of California. "It is characteristic of Loma Linda University Medical Center to be in the forefront of this type of medical research and to have the vision to provide this sophisticated technology to cancer patients. The pioneering work is critical to our efforts to effectively treat and cure cancer. I believe this state-of-the-art facility at Loma Linda will be a model for the world medical community to emulate in future years."

The opening of the Loma Linda University Children's Hospital in 1993 is a response to the expanding need for specialized neonatal and pediatric care in the fastest-growing region in North America. With 275 beds, it is one of the largest children's hospitals in the United States.

Hanging on the east wall of the main lobby is Sallman's famous painting, Head of Christ. From the inspiration of the Great Physician, the institution chose as its motto, "To Make Man Whole," to emphasize a Christian philosophy that the human body is the temple of God (1 Cor. 6:19, 20).

III. School of Nursing

III. School of Nursing. Informal instruction in nursing for a group of transfer students who had been accepted in the fall of 1905 was the first educational activity in Loma Linda. The School of Nursing was officially opened in January of 1906 by Julia A. White, M.D., the first superintendent of nurses. The first graduate nurse to serve as superintendent of nurses was Mrs. Emma Martha Pallant Semmens (1913—1914), who had entered the nurse's training course at the Battle Creek Sanitarium in 1887 under the direction of Kate Lindsay, M.D.

After the opening of the White Memorial Hospital in Los Angeles in 1918, its facilities were used by student nurses from the training school at Loma Linda until mid-1966. From 1923 to 1948, two separate hospital schools of nursing were in operation—one at the Loma Linda Sanitarium and the other at the White Memorial Hospital. Both schools were under the same director from 1923 to 1926. One year of college prenursing curriculum was required for admission by both schools after 1932.

In 1948 the trustees authorized the organization of a single collegiate School of Nursing to use facilities at both campuses, to be administered by a dean, and to offer a curriculum leading to the Bachelor of Science degree, based upon one year of prescribed college courses before admission. The first class under this program graduated in June 1952. The class of 1959 was the first to receive public health nurse certification. Advanced instruction for the Master of Science degree was first offered in 1954 (see under VIII).

When the Associate of Science program was transferred from the College of Arts and Sciences on the La Sierra campus, the affiliation with the White Memorial Hospital was resumed for a short period from 1970—1975. Two specialty programs that could be started during the senior year of the baccalaureate program were begun in 1971: the pediatric nurse associate and the nurse midwifery programs. The pediatric nurse associate program was moved into the graduate program in 1978 and the curriculum revised as a postbaccalaureate program to prepare pediatric nurse practitioners. An adult nurse practitioner program was added at that time. The midwifery program was phased out in 1975. The pediatric and adult nurse practitioner programs were closed to new admissions in 1982.

In 1986 the School of Nursing reaffirmed its primary goal of preparing professional nurses at the baccalaureate level. The Associate of Science program was made an option that could be completed by the end of the junior year, at which time the student would also be ready for the state licensing examination, NCLEX-RN. Since 1990 the graduate program has offered clinical nurse specialist/practitioner programs in neonatal and pediatric critical care.

School of Nursing total number of graduates (through 1994): 5,417.

IV. School of Medicine

IV. School of Medicine. 1. Charter, 1909. The School of Medicine may be said to date from Dec. 9, 1909, the date of the corporate act authorizing the College of Medical Evangelists to give academic and professional degrees. Ten students had begun the medical curriculum shortly before, not knowing precisely whether the college had a legitimate lease on life. By the time school opened on Sept. 29, 1910, a five-year curriculum had been developed, consisting of 6,109 clock hours of “didactic, laboratory, and clinical” subjects, and 1,037 hours in “biblical subjects.” Students of the previous year were given credit for the work they had finished. Among these 10 were the six students who received the first Doctor of Medicine degrees in June 1914.

Students entering in 1909 were required to have only a high school diploma. But in 1910 a baccalaureate degree or, in lieu of it, a high school diploma plus a collegiate transcript certifying a limited number of required preprofessional subjects was required. An applicant also was eligible scholastically if he or she presented a certificate from the California State Board of Medical Examiners indicating that on examination the candidate had demonstrated a satisfactory knowledge of specific premedical subjects. The annual tuition was $100; a matriculation fee of $5 was paid on entering the first year only. Board and room were available at $3 a week.

2. Early Clinical Instruction. The original faculty roster listed 14 basic science teachers, with George K. Abbott, M.D., as dean. One of the 14, Alfred Q. Shryock, continued on the faculty until his death in 1950. Edward H. Risley joined the faculty in 1911 and continued until his death in 1943.

Facing the necessity of providing a clinical faculty in 1912, the school began recruitment immediately. Without the dedicated, continuing support of a nucleus of SDA physicians and a relatively larger number of other physicians who were leaders in their respective specialties, many of whom served the school from its beginning in Los Angeles until their retirement or death, the institution could not have attained its stability and growth. Numbered among this group of clinicians were George Thomason, Clinton A. Burrows, Wilburn H. Smith, Daniel D. Comstock, R. Manning Clarke, and August H. Larson.

Affiliation with the Los Angeles County General Hospital, with increasing use of its teaching facilities, began in 1913. By 1914 the officers of the college were keenly aware that the institution must have control of more clinical facilities than the Loma Linda Sanitarium could offer, if the medical school was to have more than a class “C” rating. This need led to the establishment of the White Memorial Hospital and Clinic in Los Angeles as a home for the clinical division, used by those in the third and fourth years of the curriculum.

3. White Memorial Hospital and Clinic. In October 1913 a one-room store building at 941 East First Street in Los Angeles was rented and readied for the conducting of a clinic. Dr. August H. Larson was the first full-time director of this First Street clinic.

The 1915 Autumn Council, meeting at Loma Linda, authorized the constituency to raise $61,000 to build and equip a teaching hospital. In 1916 half a city block was purchased in the 300 block on the east side of North Boyle Avenue in Los Angeles. In order that the entire block might be available when needed for the hospital, the remaining half of the block was purchased with private funds and later transferred to institutional ownership when the college was financially able to make the purchase. In 1917 the First Street clinic was housed in quarters on the newly acquired site and was known for some years as the Boyle Avenue Dispensary.

On Jan. 7, 1918, White Memorial Hospital received its first patient. The official dedication of the completed hospital was held on the afternoon of Apr. 21, 1918. The plant was enlarged in 1937 with the completion of a five-story, steel-and-concrete, fire- and earthquake-proof building, increasing the bed capacity to approximately 200. A seven-story wing incorporating surgeries, central services, and approximately 200 beds was completed in 1955 and dedicated on March 14. The demolition of certain old structures that housed patients left a total capacity of 256 patient beds and 40 bassinets.

The White Memorial Clinic served for many years as the largest private part-pay and charity clinic in the Los Angeles metropolitan area. It was a valuable facility for the education of nurses, technologists, therapists, medical students, interns, and resident physicians that was fully used until the phasing out of university teaching in Los Angeles began in 1964.

The White Memorial Hospital and Clinic continued under the ownership and control of the university until Jan. 1, 1964, at which time it became the property of the Southern California Conference and was renamed the White Memorial Medical Center. At the present time the university uses the White Memorial facilities, but the relationship is that of an affiliation. (See also White Memorial Medical Center.)

4. The Climb to “A” Rating. The first inspection of the medical school by a representative of the Council on Medical Education of the American Medical Association resulted in a “C” classification in February 1915. President Evans’ forthright report to the Autumn Council in 1915 on the institution’s deficiencies in medical education stimulated the decision to give earnest support to upgrading the college. The rise to a “B” rating was stimulated by sheer necessity in 1917, when the school was faced with the loss of all its male students to the draft. Selective service regulations permitted medical students in only class A and class B schools to continue their studies.

The coveted “A” rating was received on Nov. 14, 1922, and retained until the Council on Medical Education and Hospitals in 1929 began classifying all medical schools as approved or unapproved. The School of Medicine has continued on the list of approved medical schools without interruption.

5. Innovative Programs. A 12-month internship as prerequisite to obtaining the M.D. degree became a requirement for the class that entered in 1922.

An experimental program in medical education, known as the cooperative plan, was inaugurated in 1924. According to this program, students in the first two years were divided into two equal groups and spent alternate months in employment in some occupation related directly or indirectly to medicine. It was believed that the plan had educational virtue as well as economic value for the student. On recommendation of the Council of Medical Education and Hospitals of the American Medical Association and the Association of American Medical Colleges in 1935, the cooperative plan was eliminated and a conventional curriculum schedule was established.

When the United States entered World War II, all medical schools went on an accelerated program, making it possible to graduate four classes in three years. As a protection against interruption of medical training by the draft, most of the students enlisted in the Army or Navy and were assigned to respective medical military units that were established on the campus. It is significant that the contractual agreements with the military organizations took cognizance of SDA beliefs and practices. Even before the war, the School of Medicine had become the official sponsor of the 47th General Hospital of the United States Army Medical Reserves, which it staffed in large part from the faculties in medicine and nursing. Called to active duty in 1942, the unit served in New Guinea and the Philippines until the close of the war.

6. Consolidation on One Campus. Beginning as early as 1935, the difficulties associated with a divided campus became increasingly apparent and were repeatedly noted with emphasis by visiting committees representing the Council on Medical Education and Hospitals of the American Medical Association and the Association of American Medical Colleges. Between 1952 and 1963, the pros and cons of consolidation, and of consolidation on this campus or that campus, were thoroughly considered. The recommendation of the trustees and the decision of the church was to locate the School of Medicine in Loma Linda.

Because of its vital interest in the work of the White Memorial Hospital as an accessory of the church in the Los Angeles area, the Southern California Conference assumed ownership and control of the hospital on Jan. 1, 1964. The transfer of ownership included provision for the continuing for a time of several university schools in Los Angeles and for an educational affiliation between the university and the hospital for as long as this should be mutually beneficial.

In order to provide adequate clinical facilities for the School of Medicine students at Loma Linda, construction of the University Medical Center at Loma Linda commenced in 1964 and the initial phase of 320 beds was completed in 1967. Additional beds were opened over the next few years, bringing the total to 546 by the mid-1970s. In subsequent years additional wings were added, including the Schumann Pavilion, which houses the International Heart Institute and the medical center library for use by students and faculty. The Behavioral Medicine Center opened in nearby Redlands in 1990, providing an excellent facility for rotations in psychiatry. In 1990 the Proton Treatment Center opened, providing the opportunity for medical students to experience the application of this revolutionary technology to the therapy of cancer. Instruction in pediatrics is greatly enhanced by the Children's Hospital, which was completed in 1993. New facilities for cancer research and for a major conference center were begun in the mid-1990s. The School of Medicine's administrative offices will also be housed in this new building.

7. Curriculum. The curriculum in medicine consists of four academic years. Instruction is on the quarter system. The first six quarters are oriented to the sciences basic to the practice of medicine, including recent advances in such areas as cell and molecular biology and immunology. This portion of the curriculum is currently increasing emphasis on new methodologies for instruction, such as problem-based learning in small groups and computer-based graphics and databases. The remaining two academic years are made up of clinically oriented core instruction and five months of clinical electives. Clinical instruction takes place in the University Medical Center, the Jerry L. Pettis Veterans Memorial Hospital, and many affiliated hospitals, including Riverside and San Bernardino County hospitals, the White Memorial Medical Center, and Glendale Adventist Hospital.

Personal and professional growth for the student in whole person care in medicine is the focus of all disciplines in the school and of faculty in both the School of Medicine and the Faculty of Religion. Courses and contents are offered to emphasize biblical, ethical, and relational aspects of the practice of medicine. The core for "whole person formation" consists of 12 quarter hours of religion and ethics, and is completed during the first two years of the curriculum; clinical application of these principles is modeled by faculty during the junior and senior years of the curriculum.

In addition to the professional curriculum for the M.D. degree, the school collaborates with the medical center in providing opportunities for residencies and fellowships in all major medical and surgical specialties. A conjoint M.D./Ph.D. program is also available through the medical scientist training program, offered in collaboration with the Graduate School graduate programs in the basic medical sciences.

School of Medicine total number of graduates (through 1994): 7,703.

V. Faculty of Religion

V. Faculty of Religion. Because religious instruction has occupied a central place in all curriculums, the faculty and the course offerings in religion have been correspondingly enlarged as the university has expanded. In 1953 the program in religion was organized as a major division of the university, and in 1967 when the schools on the La Sierra campus united with the university, the Division of Religion continued to offer religious instruction, and in 1987 became the School of Religion.

In the configuration of Loma Linda University as a health sciences university in 1990, the role of religion as integrative in each of the programs of the university is mandated and continuously affirmed by university administration and the Loma Linda University board of trustees.

To assist in this integration, the Faculty of Religion (formerly the School of Religion) was established in July 1990.

The Faculty of Religion is committed to following four tasks, as defined by the teachings and practice of the Seventh-day Adventist tradition and mission:

1. To focus Christian wholeness for faculty and students in their personal and professional lives and witness.
2. To provide a religion curriculum with the following emphases:
 - a. Foundational studies (biblical, theological, and historical).
 - b. Ethical studies (personal, professional, and social).
 - c. Relational studies (personal, professional, and missions).
3. To foster and support research in the foundational, ethical, and relational disciplines.
4. To serve the university, the church, and the larger world community by personal involvement in fostering deeper spirituality, theological integrity, and social justice.

Directors/Deans: A. L. Bietz, 1944—1961;

A. Graham Maxwell, 1961—1976; Walter Specht, 1976—1978; Kenneth Vine, 1978—1989; Niels-Erik Andreasen, 1989—1990; Wilber Alexander, 1990—1993; Gerald Winslow, 1993— .

VI. School of Dentistry

VI. School of Dentistry. The 1909 charter of the College of Medical Evangelists had listed the degree of Doctor of Dental Surgery among the professional and academic degrees authorized, although the first such degree was not given until 1957. Through the years, administrators of the College of Medical Evangelists, denominational leaders, and special committees had at different times considered the feasibility of establishing a dental school.

Meanwhile, through the efforts of J. Russell Mitchell, D.D.S., and Gerald Alexander Mitchell, D.D.S., members of the faculty of Atlanta Southern Dental College, an arrangement was made in 1934 for that institution to enroll and give Sabbath privileges to a limited number of SDA students. This arrangement was terminated in 1947 when the dental college was merged with Emory University. (For these preliminary years, see Dental Education.)

In 1941 J. Russell Mitchell and M. Webster Prince, D.D.S., a well-known Detroit dentist and SDA layperson who had served eight years as a member of the Council on Dental Education of the American Dental Association, were appointed to a General Conference committee to pursue the subject further. Two years later (1943) the National Association of Seventh-day Adventist Dentists (NASDAD) was organized to promote the founding of a dental school; it has since become a large professional society and continues to be a strong supporter of the School of Dentistry.

In April 1951 a new committee was appointed, with R. R. Figuhr as chair and M. Webster Prince, J. Russell Mitchell, T. R. Flaiz, Walter E. Macpherson, W. P. Elliott,

C. L. Torrey, Keld J. Reynolds, E. D. Dick, and W. H. Branson as members. This committee's report to the Autumn Council in Cleveland, Ohio, Oct. 21, 1951, was accepted, and the Autumn Council recommended that definite plans be laid for the launching of a Seventh-day Adventist School of Dentistry as an integral part of the College of Medical Evangelists. Prince was appointed to serve as dean.

The school accepted its first class in the fall of 1953 in temporary quarters in Loma Linda and moved in 1955 into its own new building, a structure with 48,500 square feet (4,500 square meters) of floor space. The building was expanded in 1976 to double the amount of floor space so that the current facility has approximately 100,000 square feet (9,300 square meters) of net useable space. Basic science courses are provided by faculty who are shared with the School of Medicine and other health science schools on the Loma Linda campus.

The School of Dentistry is accredited by the Commission on Dental Accreditation and is a member of the American Association of Dental Schools.

In 1959 the School of Dentistry established a dental hygiene curriculum leading to a Bachelor of Science degree. From 1968 through 1986 a dental assisting curriculum was offered, leading to an Associate in Science degree; this program was terminated for reasons of fiscal exigency. Advanced (postdoctoral) education programs are offered in dental anesthesiology, endodontics, oral implantology, oral surgery, orthodontics, pediatric dentistry, periodontics, and prosthodontics. These postdoctoral programs are conducted through the administrative aegis of the Graduate School, under the operational control of the School of Dentistry.

School of Dentistry total number of graduates (through 1994): 4,193.

Deans: M. Webster Prince, 1951—1960; Charles T. Smith, 1960—1971; Judson Klooster, 1971—1994; Charles Goodacre, 1994— .

VII. School of Allied Health Professions

VII. School of Allied Health Professions. The School of Allied Health Professions was established in 1966 (under the name School of Health-Related Professions, 1966—1971) to consolidate the administration of the following individual curriculums initiated in the university earlier: medical technology, 1937; physical therapy, 1941; medical radiography, 1941; occupational therapy, 1951; health information administration (formerly medical record administration), 1963.

Curriculums added since the school was established are nuclear medicine technology, 1970; radiation therapy technology, 1970; cardiopulmonary sciences (formerly respiratory therapy), 1971; nutrition and dietetics, 1972; medical sonography, 1976; special imaging technology, 1976; cytotechnology, 1982; coding specialist, 1987; occupational therapy assistant, 1988; physical therapist assistant, 1989. The curriculum in speech-language pathology and audiology, initiated in 1965 under the auspices of the College of Arts and Sciences of La Sierra University (formerly Loma Linda University), was transferred to the School of Allied Health Professions in 1987.

The goals of the School of Allied Health Professions are as follows:

1. To provide opportunity, instruction, and guided experience by which the student may acquire the basic knowledge and attain the skills essential to the practice of a chosen profession.

2. To help the student accept responsibility for integrity, ethical relationships, and empathic attitudes that can contribute to the welfare and well-being of patients.

3. To help the student develop a background of information and attitudes conducive to interprofessional understanding and cooperation.

4. To encourage the student to cultivate habits of self-education that will foster lifelong growth.

5. To engender and nurture in the student the desire to serve mankind, and in particular to serve as needed in the medical centers sponsored by the Seventh-day Adventist Church both in this country and elsewhere.

Total number of graduates (through 1994): 6,650.

Deans: Ivor C. Woodward, 1966—1986; Joyce W. Hopp, 1986— .

VIII. Graduate School

VIII. Graduate School. Instruction in the various health sciences and professions progressively assumed the role of academic disciplines during the second quarter of the twentieth century. A natural result was a demand for graduate instruction in the areas basic to the maintenance of these professions, as well as in related areas capable of enriching the preparation of professional men and women.

The postdoctoral hospital internship in preparation for general practice was established at an early date in the hospitals of the university. Also, the professional schools offer from time to time postgraduate and refresher courses for specialists as well as for general practitioners. In addition, the School of Medicine, especially at the White Memorial Hospital prior to 1964, organized graduate residencies in the principal clinical fields meeting the requirements for certification by the respective American specialty boards.

In 1946 to meet the postwar educational needs of returning medical veterans, the institution organized a Graduate School of Medicine under the deanship of Harold M. Walton, M.D., which established a nine-month basic science course as a foundation for residencies in surgery, medicine, obstetrics and gynecology, and orthopedics. A student who completed such a course, with an approved thesis, qualified for the Master of Medical Science degree. When this program gradually gave way to residencies enriched by basic science and research, the Graduate School of Medicine and its courses were terminated.

In 1953 a conventional graduate program was inaugurated in the basic science departments of the School of Medicine. In 1954 graduate instruction was offered in the School of Nursing leading to the Master of Science degree, under the direction of R. Maureen Maxwell, Ed.D. At the same time a School of Graduate Studies was authorized; in 1961 it was officially designated as the Graduate School. The following year instruction leading to the Doctor of Philosophy degree was authorized in certain basic medical sciences. Graduate instruction in nutrition was first offered in 1956—1957, and in dentistry in 1960—1961.

The Graduate School has extended its offerings into the following liberal arts areas: anthropology; biology; communicative disorders; English; history; marriage, family, and child counseling; mathematical sciences; Middle Eastern studies; religion; and sociology. Programs also leading to a master's degree are offered in medical technology and psychiatry. The Doctor of Philosophy is given in anatomy, biochemistry, biology, mathematical sciences, microbiology, pharmacology, and physiology.

The nursing program now offers a graduate curriculum with a nursing administration major and various clinical nurse specialist/practitioner options. The dental graduate programs cover endodontics, oral implantology, oral and maxillofacial surgery, orthodontics, and periodontics.

The Graduate School has extended its offerings into the following areas: biology, marriage and family therapy/family life education, and speech-language pathology. Programs also leading to a master's degree are offered in biomedical and clinical ethics, clinical ministry, and social work. The Doctor of Philosophy is given in anatomy, biochemistry, biology, microbiology, pharmacology, and physiology.

Graduate School total number of graduates (through 1994): 2,630.

Deans: Keld J. Reynolds (acting), 1957—1961; Thomas A. Little, 1961—1964; J. Paul Stauffer, 1964—1975; Norman J. Woods (acting), 1975—1977; Victor Griffiths, 1977—1978; Maurice Hodgen, 1978—1987; William Allen (acting), 1987—1988; W. Baron Rippon, 1988— .

IX. School of Public Health

IX. School of Public Health. The School of Public Health had its beginning with the organization in 1948 of the School of Tropical and Preventive Medicine, the purpose of which was to provide a base for research and teaching. After its reorganization in 1961, the Division of Public Health and Tropical Medicine began to offer master's programs through the Graduate School. Harold N. Mozar, M.D., was the director from 1948 to 1964; Mervyn G. Hardinge, M.D., Ph.D., Dr.P.H., became the director of the Division of Public Health in 1964.

The establishment of a School of Public Health was authorized in 1964, and plans were made for faculty and facilities to meet the requirements of the Committee on Professional Education of the American Public Health Association. Dr. Hardinge became the dean in July 1967. In October 1970 the name of the school was changed to School of Health. Authorization was given to offer work leading to the degrees of Master of Public Health and Master of Science in Public Health.

In 1972 the school was authorized to offer the Doctor of Health Sciences degree. Subsequently the Doctor of Public Health degree was authorized, with the first Dr.P.H. in epidemiology being granted in 1980. Students were first admitted to the Dr.P.H. program in health education in 1981 and to the Dr.P.H. program in nutrition in 1987. The Doctor of Health Sciences degree program was restructured to a Dr.P.H. in preventive care in 1991.

In the fall of 1979 the school was approved to begin a preventive medicine residency. An M.P.H. degree in a selected area is an integral part of the residency program.

The original name, School of Public Health, was readopted in 1987. In 1991 the School was reorganized to include the Center for Health Promotion and the Preventive Medicine Faculty Practice. The school provides the services of the Department of Preventive Medicine for the School of Medicine.

The instructional, research, and service programs within the school are organized and administered by six academic departments and three centers. The academic departments are Environmental and Occupational Health, Epidemiology and Biostatistics, Health Administration, Health Promotion and Education, International Health, and Nutrition. The three centers are the Center for Health Promotion (CHP), the Center for Health Research (CHR), and the Center for Health and Development (CHD).

A large spectrum of programs are offered by CHP, including weight management, executive health, stress management, smoking cessation, nutrition, exercise, and alcohol and drug dependency. Group sessions, individual counseling, and health assessment are conducted in the community or in corporate settings. CHP serves more than 10,000 clients per year and is a major training center for students.

The Center for Health Research opened in 1990 and reflects the school's growing involvement in public health research. The school is active in research projects involving preventive medicine, epidemiology, health education, nutrition, and other aspects of public health. Most notably, it has directed the Adventist Health Study, internationally recognized as a pathbreaking project in health research. CHR administers a research endowment fund and provides technical support for faculty projects in the school. It provides consultation to researchers throughout the university and surrounding community.

The newest center in the school, CHD, coordinates and directs all of the service and community development programs in the school that have a cross-cultural emphasis. It has four components. It directs the university Students for International Missions Service (SIMS), providing short-term mission opportunities around the world as well as in local communities. It also directs the Social Action Corps (SAC), which operates medical and dental clinics in the surrounding area for persons who cannot afford adequate health care. This provides a valuable community service through which students gain experience and understanding. The center also assists faculty in arranging international consulting projects with a variety of organizations and works with World Health Organization and its primary health-care projects.

Majors are offered in the following areas: biostatistics, environmental health, epidemiology, health administration, health promotion and education, international health, occupational health, nutrition, and preventive care.

Through its off-campus program, the school was a pioneer in bringing graduate education in public health to health professionals who could not leave their place of employment for full-time education. Courses have been offered in Canada, the Far East, Inter-America, as well as several sites in the United States. The first off-campus class graduated in 1978, and 814 persons (through December 1992) have received their public health degrees through this program. Of these, 252 were in international settings.

School of Public Health number of graduates (through 1994): 3,416.

Directors/Deans: Harold N. Mozor, M.D., 1948—1964; Mervyn G. Hardinge, M.D., Ph.D., Dr.P.H., 1964—1976; James M. Crawford, D.D.S., M.P.H., 1977—1980; Andrew P. Haynal, M.D., M.P.H., 1980—1983; James M. Crawford, 1983—1986; Edwin H. Krick, M.D., M.P.H., 1986—1990; Richard H. Hart, M.D., Dr.P.H., 1990— .

Longacre, Charles Smull

LONGACRE, CHARLES SMULL (1871—1958). Minister, evangelist, school administrator, editor, author. He was born Dec. 1, 1871, at Valley Forge, Pennsylvania. His ancestors came from Zurich, Switzerland, and had been Mennonite preachers for six generations prior to his father's. After graduating from State Teachers College, Kutztown, Pennsylvania, he taught in the public schools.

Longacre first heard of Seventh-day Adventist doctrines through Oliver Thompson, a colporteur who in 1895 brought copies of Signs of the Times to the Longacre home. A short time later two SDA ministers, J. G. Matteson and Lee S. Wheeler, conducted Sunday night meetings east of Norristown, which Longacre's parents and sisters attended from the first. Longacre himself, who did not attend until some time later, heard R. A. Underwood, a guest minister, deliver two lectures on the prophecies of Daniel. He became so interested that he dropped the law course he was taking at night school, and two weeks later, when Matteson planned to close the evangelistic meetings, Longacre suggested that he be permitted to continue the meetings and teach the people what he had heard and read in SDA books. Matteson accepted this offer, and Longacre continued the meetings all winter. That spring he had eight converts ready for baptism. These eight, with Longacre and others, were baptized and became charter members of the Norristown, Pennsylvania, Seventh-day Adventist Church.

During the summer of 1896 Longacre sold religious books in and around Norristown, Valley Forge, and Phoenixville, to earn money to attend Battle Creek College, Battle Creek, Michigan. He enrolled that fall and completed the ministerial course in May 1898 (he was granted a Bachelor of Arts degree by Emmanuel Missionary College, Berrien Springs, Michigan, in 1914). In June of that year he was employed by the Pennsylvania Conference to assist Lee S. Wheeler in evangelistic work at Pittsburgh.

On June 7, 1899, at Battle Creek, Longacre and Florence Martha Hughes were married by Uriah Smith. Two children, Ethel Elizabeth and Clarence Hughes, were born, the latter dying in infancy. Longacre continued evangelistic work in Pennsylvania until Dec. 31, 1907, and established SDA churches in Pittsburgh, Greensburg, Uniontown, Connellsville, and Washington. For nine years he was also religious liberty secretary of the Pennsylvania Conference. His personal appearance at house and senate hearings helped to defeat Sunday law bills that came before the state legislature at Harrisburg.

On Jan. 1, 1908, Longacre moved to South Lancaster, Massachusetts, to teach Bible and history at South Lancaster Academy. The next year he became principal of the academy, a position he held until Jan. 1, 1913.

From South Lancaster, Longacre moved to Washington, D.C., where on Jan. 1, 1913, he became associate secretary of the Religious Liberty Association. Later in the year he became its secretary and held that position to 1936 (in the meantime the name of the association was changed to Religious Liberty Department). Afterward he again was an associate secretary of the department until 1950. He edited Liberty, the association's journal, from 1914 to 1942 and was on the editorial staff at the time of his death. From 1932 to 1941 he also was secretary of the American Temperance Society. From 1943 until his retirement on Dec. 31, 1950, he was associate secretary of the Religious Liberty Association.

In 1916 George Washington University in Washington, D.C., granted him a Master of Arts degree in philosophy, with a minor in international law. He completed a three-year law course by correspondence with the La Salle Extension University in Chicago.

In 1919 he served as secretary of the General Conference Home Missionary Department.

In 1931 he was sent to Geneva, Switzerland, by the International Religious Liberty Association to oppose the World Calendar, backed by George Eastman.

He wrote many articles for SDA and other periodicals. He was author of the following books: Freedom: Civil and Religious, The Church in Politics, Religious Liberty and Civil Government, Roger Williams-His Life, Work, and Ideals. He also edited American State Papers, a compilation of documents on the separation of church and state.

In 1955, 1956, and 1957 Longacre received medals from Freedoms Foundation, Valley Forge, Pennsylvania, "for outstanding achievement in bringing about a better understanding of the American Way of life." In 1956 he received a citation from Protestants and Other Americans United for Separation of Church and State "in appreciation of his decades of distinguished service on behalf of religious freedom."

Longburn Adventist College

LONGBURN ADVENTIST COLLEGE. A coeducational boarding school, years 6-12, situated at Walker's Road, Longburn, four miles (six kilometers) from Palmerston North, on the North Island of New Zealand. It is owned by the Trans-Tasman Union Conference and is operated by a board of management with representation from the two New Zealand local conferences and the union conference. The enrollment, averaging 140, includes students from New Zealand, Australia, the Pacific Islands, and some Asian countries. In 1993 the school had a staff of 19, including 13 teachers and administrators.

History

History. Advanced schoolwork in New Zealand began in February 1908 when the Pukekura Training School opened its doors in a beautiful rural setting of 170 acres (70 hectares), four miles (six kilometers) southwest of Cambridge, in the northern portion of the North Island. The first board of control, with S. M. Cobb, president of the New Zealand Conference, as chairman, was elected at the annual conference at Cambridge, Jan. 9—19, 1908. The first principal was F. L. Chaney.

As the spread of Seventh-day Adventist work to south New Zealand made a more central site for the school advisable, the school was moved in April 1913 to a 30-acre (12-hectare) site near Longburn, in a quiet rural district. For a time the institution was called the Oroua Missionary School, later New Zealand Missionary College. The school property, comprising some of the richest farming land in the Dominion, provides an opportunity for training in dairying, vegetable growing, orcharding, and poultry farming. Through the generosity of G. F. Wright, the owner of adjoining property and for many years a member of the board, the original acreage was increased to 60 (25 hectares) by 1933, and further purchases in 1952 and 1961 brought the total to 132 acres (55 hectares). In addition, the school owns a block of 144 acres (58 hectares) of grazing land at Oroua Downs, about 12 miles (20 kilometers) away. In 1952 the Sanitarium Health Food Company built a food factory close to the campus, providing employment for a number of students.

In 1974 the college buildings consisted of two separate residences for the young men and young women, a classroom and administration building with a well-equipped library and science laboratory, a spacious modern church with seating for 400, a woodwork and engineering shop, and a laundry. The kitchen, dining room, and chapel remain in the original building. Recreational facilities include a swimming pool; tennis, basketball, and volleyball courts; and a playing field. During 1974 an additional science laboratory was erected, and future plans provide for the erection of a larger social hall and indoor sports center. Thirteen residences are provided for faculty and staff families, and in 1974 a block of four apartments for single staff members was opened.

More recently the following additions have been constructed: gymnasium (1978), industrial arts complex (1978), second story added to main building used as classrooms, home economics lab, seminar rooms and staff offices (1980), and cafeteria and lounge (1981).

Scholastic Standards. Longburn College is registered as a secondary school with the New Zealand Ministry of Education and completes the work of the secondary grades, preparing students for the New Zealand School Certificate and the university entrance examinations. Students are also prepared for the Form Six Certificate, University Bursary and Scholarship, and the Higher School Certificate. A one-year postsecondary course in English as a foreign language is provided for students from the Pacific Islands and Asia.

In 1970 a new course was established to train primary school teachers. The nontheological subjects are those prescribed by the New Zealand Education Department for the internal Trained Teachers' Certificate examination. This course was discontinued in 1992.

Lopez Miranda, Rafael

LOPEZ MIRANDA, RAFAEL (d. 1922). First Puerto Rican Adventist colporteur and missionary. He was running a laundry business at Santurce, Puerto Rico, when a colporteur sold him the book The Coming King in Spanish. Earlier he had read the Spanish paper El Centinela. He readily accepted the doctrines contained in these publications and soon entered the colporteur work himself, working not only in his homeland but in Santo Domingo (Dominican Republic) and in Venezuela. On one of his pioneering trips in Venezuela he was assassinated by unknown assailants.

Lord Howe Island

LORD HOWE ISLAND. A dependency of New South Wales, Australia, situated 436 miles (700 kilometers) northeast of Sydney. The island has an area of five square miles (13 square kilometers) and a population of 260.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. There is one church on the island, with a membership of 22, belonging to the Greater Sydney Conference in Australia.

Seventh-day Adventists first visited the island in 1895—1896, when J. M. Cole stopped there on his way from Norfolk Island to Sydney on the schooner Oscar Robinson. Then “in 1912 the light from Norfolk kindled a spark at Lord Howe Island” (E. H. Gates, In Coral Isles, p. 167), and a church of nine charter members was organized on May 11, 1913. In April 1920 the first Seventh-day Adventist church building on the island, erected by A. H. Ferris, was dedicated. In 1959 a new home for the minister was erected, and in 1960 a new church building was completed.

Lord's Supper

LORD'S SUPPER. The symbolic meal Jesus instituted on the night of His betrayal to commemorate His death and to foreshadow His coming kingdom; from the Gr. kuriakon deipnon (1 Cor. 11:20).

Seventh-day Adventist Practice. The "Outline of Doctrinal Beliefs" appearing in the Church Manual [1990] states: "The ordinance of the Lord's Supper commemorates the Saviour's death; and participation by members of the body is essential to Christian growth and fellowship. It is to be preceded by the ordinance of foot washing as a preparation for this solemn service" (p. 182; see Foot Washing).

In general, Seventh-day Adventists observe the Lord's Supper once each quarter. A typical service would be as follows: A short sermon precedes the ordinance of foot washing, for which the men and women meet separately. The church then reassembles, and the minister and elder(s) officiate at the Communion table. The bread is uncovered,

1 Cor. 11:23, 24 is read, and the prayer of blessing offered; the bread is then broken by the elders and distributed to the congregation by deacons. A similar procedure is followed for the wine, after the reading of 1 Cor. 11:25, 26. In each instance the congregation waits until all have been served, and partakes of the emblem simultaneously. The service is completed by the singing of a hymn and prayer.

Only unleavened bread and unfermented wine are used, leaven being considered a symbol of sin (1 Cor. 5:7, 8), and fermented wine an unworthy representation of the blood of Christ. Seventh-day Adventists practice open Communion: "Christ's example forbids exclusiveness at the Lord's Supper. It is true that open sin excludes the guilty. . . . But beyond this none are to pass judgment. God has not left it with men to say who shall present themselves on these occasions. . . . There may come into the company persons who are not in heart servants of truth and holiness, but who may wish to take part in the service. They should not be forbidden" (DA 656; cf. Church Manual, p. 81).

Communion services are conducted only by ordained ministers and ordained church elders who are elected to office by the church in which they serve (ibid., p. 83). Pastors who are not ordained ministers do not conduct the Lord's Supper unless they have been elected and ordained as local elders by the congregation in which the service is being celebrated.

Historical Development in the Seventh-day Adventist Church. The Lord's Supper has been a part of SDA services of worship from the beginning. For example, it is recorded that those attending the early Sabbath conference held in Volney, New York, beginning Aug. 18, 1848, celebrated it (2SG 97f.). As organization developed, it became a regular part of what was termed the "quarterly meeting." With members often widely scattered, this meeting was a major institution in organized church life. According to recommendations, it was opened with the reading of the membership roll by the church clerk, each member giving testimony regarding his Christian experience as his name was called (a form of this practice is sometimes still followed in smaller congregations). Next the church record for the previous quarter was read and corrected. Then if an ordained minister or elder was present, the Lord's Supper was celebrated. After sunset, or the next day, a church business meeting was held. Absence from quarterly meeting without report for nine months was grounds for dismissal from the church. While other aspects of this meeting have largely disappeared, in many congregations the Lord's Supper is still commonly referred to as quarterly meeting.

Throughout SDA history there appears to have been little change in understanding of the meaning of the Lord's Supper. The bread and wine have been seen as symbols of the body and blood of Christ, as reminders of Christ's passion and death. The Lord's Supper is also a witness to the believer's acceptance of Christ as his Saviour and of his faith in the Second Advent (cf. 1 Cor. 11:26). In the Communion service Christ meets with His people and the Spirit is present to seal them as His (DA 149, 659).

The Lord's Supper in the NT. The institution of the Lord's Supper is recorded in Matt. 26:20—29, Mark 14:17—25, Luke 22:14—20, and 1 Cor. 11:23—25. In both the Gospels and Paul's Epistle the words of institution contain the same three themes—substitution, covenant, and eschatology. Each of these is found in the background of the NT: Jesus repeatedly compares His mission to the OT figure of the vicariously suffering Servant (cf. Isa. 53:12; Mark 14:24; Luke 22:37); the “blood of the covenant” and the “new covenant” are familiar OT themes (Ex. 24:8; cf. Mark 14:24; Jer. 31:31; cf. Luke 22:20; 1 Cor. 11:25), as is also that of the eschatological banquet (Isa. 25:6—8; cf. Rev. 19:9; 21:3, 4, 9—14).

This eschatological orientation of the Lord's Supper as an anticipation of the Messianic banquet in the coming kingdom of God finds a particularly relevant parallel in the communal meals at Qumrân (see especially IQSa II, 1ff.). After describing the entrance of the members of the community to their sacramental meal, “The Messianic Rule” states: “When the common table shall be set for eating and the new wine [poured]for drinking, let no man extend his hand over the first-fruits of bread and wine before the Priest; for [it is he]who shall bless the first-fruits of bread and wine, and shall be the first [to extend]his hand over the bread. Thereafter, the Messiah of Israel shall extend his hand over the bread, [and]all the Congregation of the Community [shall utter a]blessing, [each man in the order]of his dignity” (G. Vermès, The Dead Sea Scrolls in English [1962], p. 121).

This is reminiscent of Luke 22:21 (“The hand of him who betrays me is with me on the table” [RSV]), and the information is interesting from the Seventh-day Adventist viewpoint that the wine used at Qumrân was “new wine” (Heb. tîrôsh). The broader significance of this meal is especially important: as in the Lord's Supper, the Qumrân meal represents at once both the present community and the future banquet of the elect. Thus the eschatological aspect of the Lord's Supper seems to have had a clear background in contemporary Judaism (F. M. Cross, The Ancient Library of Qumrân [1958], p. 64). This does not mean that the rite was simply borrowed from Qumrân; rather, we see both in Qumrân and in the NT similar developments, in the late Jewish milieu, of basic OT themes.

Lorenz, John P.

LORENZ, JOHN P. (1872—1917). Pioneer Seventh-day Adventist worker in Austria and Czechoslovakia. He was born in Messer, a German settlement in Russia. At the age of 4 he was brought to the United States, where he grew up near Lehigh, Kansas, and later attended Union College. He entered colporteur and evangelistic service before he was 20 years old. About 1900 he went to central Europe, where he pioneered Seventh-day Adventist work in Czechoslovakia (1901) and in Austria (1902), being the first ordained minister there. After four years in Europe he returned to America and taught at Keene Academy for two years and for some time preached in Texas, Oklahoma, and Missouri. In 1911, having graduated from the St. Louis College of Physicians and Surgeons, he entered private practice in Oklahoma.

Los Angeles Adventist Academy (California)

LOS ANGELES ADVENTIST ACADEMY (California) (formerly Lynwood Adventist Academy and Los Angeles Union Elementary School). A coeducational day school on the senior high school level, formerly situated in Lynwood, California. It is owned by the Southern California Conference and is operated by a board with representation from the churches in the southern portion of Los Angeles County, which it serves.

Forerunners of Lynwood were Los Angeles Seventh-day Adventist Academy (founded 1923), at 3210 Post Street in Los Angeles; and Long Beach Academy (established 1925), at 1880 Dawson Avenue in Long Beach. The last chairs of the two boards were, respectively, C. E. Kellogg, M.D., and Scott Donaldson. In 1937 David Voth, president of the Southern California Conference; B. M. Emerson, conference treasurer; C. D. Striplin, principal of Los Angeles Academy; and W. S. Potts, principal of Long Beach Academy, actively promoted plans for the combined school. Construction began in November under leadership of F. W. Paap, building superintendent;

C. J. Kjose, contractor; and Clinton Nourse, architect. The cafeteria and manual arts building, the administration building, and the large camp meeting pavilion and school gymnasium were completed before the school was opened on Sept. 6, 1938. Work soon began on Rupp Memorial Chapel—a gift from Mrs. Emma Rupp in memory of her late husband, John Rupp, a Los Angeles businessman—which provided, besides the school chapel, facilities for the Lynwood church and the Music Department. There followed an auto mechanics building (1939), physical education locker and shower rooms (1953 and 1954), and a two-classroom unit (1962). Buildings are of Spanish architecture, in cream-colored stucco with red roofs. Throughout the years the conference used these facilities, school buildings, and grounds for its annual camp meetings.

In June 1963 the Rupp Memorial Chapel was destroyed by fire of undetermined origin. The Lynwood Seventh-day Adventist Church and the academy shared the costs of rebuilding.

Earlier school papers, The Breakers (Long Beach) and Los Angeles Academy Broadcaster, were succeeded in December 1938 by the Lynwood Log (eight issues a year). The school annual, The Shipmate, was first published in 1948.

When the Lynwood site was sold to the Lynwood Unified School District through eminent domain, the academy was moved to the Los Angeles Union Elementary School location in 1993 and renamed Los Angeles Adventist Academy.

Los Angeles Adventist Clinic

LOS ANGELES ADVENTIST CLINIC (Clínica Adventista de Los Angeles). A 23-bed medical institution located in Los Angeles, Chile. In the early 1970s decisive plans took shape to initiate medical work in the southern part of Chile; thus in 1976 attention was given to the city of Los Angeles. In 1977 a preliminary construction plan was approved that would be carried out in Los Angeles itself; on Aug. 15, 1979, the first stage was inaugurated, with the name Los Angeles Adventist Sanitarium. The institution began its services and became a government authorized institution in 1981.

In 1976 the first donation of equipment was received from Germany. In 1979 X-ray equipment was acquired from the United States, and in 1980, 14 boxes with medical equipment was also received as a donation from the United States. X-ray services began in February 1980, and in March of the same year the clinical laboratory was started.

In 1993 the Los Angeles Adventist Clinic offered the following services: general medicine, internal medicine, general surgery, OB-Gyn, pediatrics, ophthalmology, dermatology, ENT and digestive endoscopy exams, kinesiatrics, laboratory, dentistry, radiology, inpatient, surgeries, childbirth and hospitalization, nursing, outpatient procedures.

These activities were enhanced by chaplaincy ministry as well as guidance given by the administrators. Plans are to develop a healthful living center to demonstrate the advantages of the Adventist lifestyle to the community.

Loud Cry

LOUD CRY. The proclamation of the message of Rev. 18:1—4, represented as proclaimed by an angel who came “down from heaven, having great power,” and with whose glory “the earth was lightened.” The phrase reflects the statement that this angel “cried mightily with a strong voice.” The message proclaimed by the angel is God’s final call to those of His people still in mystical Babylon to “come out of her” in order to avoid being “partakers of her sins, and . . . of her plagues.” This message is evidently given prior to the close of probation, inasmuch as there is still an opportunity for people to find salvation by fleeing from Babylon. It is also Heaven’s final appeal to humanity, the last such message recorded in Scripture, for it immediately precedes the fearful scenes of divine retribution that mark the transition from the kingdoms of this world to the kingdom of Jesus Christ.

Seventh-day Adventists understand that the angel of Rev. 18 unites his voice with that of the third angel of Rev. 14:9—11, in view of the fact that the message proclaimed by the latter, in its context, is also God’s last message to man and immediately precedes the coming of Christ and the final judgments of God upon this earth. This angel also spoke “with a loud voice.” Accordingly, Seventh-day Adventists sometimes blend the two into one message, to which they refer as “the loud cry of the third angel.” The first angel of Rev. 14 announces the hour of divine judgment; the second angel, the spiritual fall of mystical Babylon. The third angel warns against Babylon’s counterfeit gospel.

“The work of this angel comes in at the right time to join in the last great work of the third angel’s message as it swells to a loud cry” (EW 277).

“These announcements [Rev. 18:1—4], uniting with the third angel’s message [Rev. 14:9—11], constitute the final warning to be given to the inhabitants of earth” (GC 604).

“It is a message from Heaven uttering a final warning against a corrupt and backslidden Christianity, and going forth with such power that the whole earth is lightened with its glory” (James White, in Review and Herald 55:40, Jan. 15, 1880). “The third message is to ripen the harvest of the earth” (ibid. 18:20, June 11, 1861).

As for the literal application of this symbolic prophecy, Uriah Smith wrote: “The angel is not a literal angel, and we are not to suppose that we are to hear a literal voice sounding through the land giving the warning of this proclamation. It is to be simply the truth making its way into all parts of the earth” (ibid. 51:36, Jan. 31, 1878).

Ellen White described this future development in more detail as follows: “Servants of God, with their faces lighted up and shining with holy consecration, will hasten from place to place to proclaim the message from heaven. By thousands of voices, all over the earth, the warning will be given. . . . Thus the inhabitants of earth will be brought to take their stand” (GC 612).

People everywhere will come out of the apostate churches that compose mystical Babylon and unite with God’s remnant people (EW 33). All who “had not heard and rejected the three messages obeyed the call and left the fallen churches” (ibid. 278).

Of the crisis in which the loud cry culminates, Mrs. White wrote further: “Fearful is the issue to which the world is to be brought. The powers of earth, uniting to war against the commandments of God, will decree that all, ‘both small and great, rich and poor, free and bond,’ shall conform to the customs of the church by the observance of the false sabbath. All who refuse compliance will be visited with civil penalties, and it will finally be declared that they are deserving of death. On the other hand, the law of God enjoining the Creator’s rest-day demands obedience, and threatens wrath against all who transgress its precepts. With the issue thus clearly brought before him, whoever shall trample upon God’s law to obey a human enactment receives the mark of the beast; he accepts the sign of allegiance to the power which he chooses to obey instead of God” (GC 604).

Compare Rev. 13:13—17. “When this last loud blast of the gospel trumpet is given,” wrote M. E. Cornell, “probation will end, and the eternal decree go forth [Rev. 22:11 cited]. The destiny of all will then be irrevocably fixed” (Review and Herald 6:72, Oct. 10, 1854). Probation closes, and the seven last plagues fall. See also Latter Rain; Three Angels’ Messages.

Loughborough, John Norton

LOUGHBOROUGH, JOHN NORTON (1832—1924). Pioneer evangelist and administrator. He first heard the present truth preached by J. N. Andrews in September 1852 at Rochester, New York, and was immediately convinced of the seventh-day Sabbath. For three years prior to this he had preached, as a laypreacher, the doctrines of the first-day Adventists, but had become dissatisfied. He took a public position to keep the Sabbath in October of 1852 and immediately began to proclaim his new belief. He had preached and supported himself by working, but in December 1852 he devoted himself to full-time ministry. He was ordained in 1854, and for several years conducted evangelistic work in Pennsylvania, New York State, and the Middle West. He pioneered the selling of Adventist literature in quantity when in 1854 he began selling it at 35 cents a packet at one of his tent meetings in Michigan. After a brief period of discouragement in 1856 because of financial straits, he returned with great zeal to his work, although for some time he still labored under difficult circumstances.

As the result of a serious illness brought on by overwork (1865), he became deeply interested in health reform and wrote a book called Hand Book of Health; or a Brief Treatise on Physiology and Hygiene (1868).

In 1868 with D. T. Bourdeau, he pioneered Seventh-day Adventist work in California, and by 1871 had helped establish five churches in Sonoma County, one of them in Santa Rosa, where the first Seventh-day Adventist church building west of the Rockies was erected in 1869. He baptized the first three SDA members in Nevada in 1878.

The same year (1878) he was sent by the General Conference to open SDA work in England, although the field had been prepared previously by the work of William Ings, a colporteur. Loughborough's five years in England resulted in the baptism of 37 persons and the establishing of a church in Southampton.

After his return to America (1883), he traveled as a representative of the General Conference in the North Pacific region, visiting camp meetings and strengthening members who had become confused because of apostate movements.

He was president of the Michigan Conference (1865—1868), treasurer of the General Conference (1868—1869), and for six years (1890—1896) was superintendent of several General Conference districts. He was also first president of the California Conference (1873—1878; again, 1887—1890), and of the Nevada Association (1878), the Upper Columbia Conference (1884—1885), and the Illinois Conference (1891—1895).

In 1892 he published The Rise and Progress of Seventh-day Adventists, the first denominational history (revised in 1905 as The Great Second Advent Movement). He published a number of other books, among them The Church, Its Organization, Order, and Discipline (1907), which for many years served in place of the church manual, and wrote many articles for denominational papers and edited the Pacific Health Journal for a time.

Loughborough made a world tour in 1908, including Europe, Africa, Australia, and New Zealand in his itinerary, which closed his active service, with the exception of occasional preaching at camp meetings and attendance at General Conference sessions.

Loveless, William C.

LOVELESS, WILLIAM C. (1897—1974). Pastor, writer, dean, teacher. A native of Missouri, he was educated at Southwestern Union College. He taught at Oshawa Missionary College in Canada and Columbia Union College in Maryland. As director of youth activities he was a pioneer promoter of youth congresses and junior camps in a number of areas. He served as educational secretary in Colorado and promoted the development of Mile High Academy in that state.

Lowe, Harry

LOWE, HARRY (d. 1908). Probably the first Black American Seventh-day Adventist minister. He was born a slave, but by the time E. B. Lane came to preach SDA doctrines in Tennessee in 1871 (see South Central Conference), he had become a Baptist minister. He accepted the SDA faith and began to work for Black converts in his section of the state. The Tennessee Conference granted him a ministerial license in 1881. In 1883 he became the leader of a Black Seventh-day Adventist company formed at Edgefield Junction, Tennessee, which was organized as a church in 1886, the first Black Seventh-day Adventist church. In 1884 and 1888 the Yearbook lists him as a licentiate, but in 1886 and 1889 as a regular minister, although there is no record of his ordination in the SDA Church.

Lowe, Harry W.

LOWE, HARRY W. (1893—1990). Minister and administrator. Born in Southampton, England, on Aug. 14, 1893, Harry W. Lowe became a pastor in Great Britain and served as president of the conference in the British Isles until 1947, when he moved to the United States. He took up work with the General Conference as associate Sabbath school director. Later he became a general field secretary, which post he held until 1971, when he retired and moved to Napa Valley, California. He died on July 31, 1990, in Calistoga, California.

Lower Gweru Adventist Secondary School

LOWER GWERU ADVENTIST SECONDARY SCHOOL (formerly Lower Gwelo College). A coeducational boarding school operated by the Zambesi Union. It is situated 22 miles (35 kilometers) from the town of Gweru, Zimbabwe. In 1993 it had an enrollment of 665 in the primary course, including a number of blind boys and girls; 594 in the secondary school; and 44 in the Teacher Training Department.

History

History. The forerunner of the college was an elementary school at Somabula Mission Station. The site for the mission was chosen by F. B. Armitage, who in 1901, with his family and a group of African teachers headed by Harry Sibagobe, left Solusi Mission to open up a new mission east of Bulawayo. Because the site was within the African reserve, the land had to be leased, and could not be bought. A school was opened in 1902, and in 1904 eight students were baptized. When the site proved unhealthful, the station was moved to its present location, on land granted by Chief Bunina, and renamed the Lower Gwelo Mission.

In 1952 the Teacher Training Department formerly conducted at Solusi was transferred to Lower Gweru Mission Training School. In 1955 when the Southern Rhodesia Field headquarters were moved to the town of Gweru (they had been intermittently at Lower Gweru from 1923 to the early thirties and then continuously until 1955), Lower Gweru became the center of the teacher-training work for the entire Zambesi Union, and a higher course of teacher training was added to the former lower course. In 1963 secondary education was added to the lower and higher primary work, which had existed from the early years of the station. The school then became known as the Lower Gwelo Training College until 1978 when the teacher training school was discontinued because of the war. A school for the blind was opened in 1967. After learning to read and type in Braille, the pupils are integrated into the normal classes in the primary school. They use specially prepared textbooks, and all assignments are typed in Braille. This is known as the open system.

In 1980 the school was renamed Lower Gweru Adventist Secondary School. In 1992 it became the first SDA school to be granted

A-level status. The church had been expanded, and a large auditorium and dormitories have been added.

At the Mississippi camp meeting of 1909 he was ordained, his father being among the officiating ministers. In 1946 the school property was relinquished to the government again, and the school was moved for the last time to its present location. Following the addition of the high school section, the school was renamed Lowry Memorial High School in honor of the late G. G. Luxembourg

LUXEMBOURG. An independent grand duchy in Western Europe bounded by Belgium, France, and Germany, with an area of 998 square miles (2,600 square kilometers) and a population (1994) of 402,000, predominantly Roman Catholic. French is the official language, but German is also spoken, and the common speech is in Letzeburgesch, the original local dialect.

The territory of Luxembourg was assigned to the French Conference, but since 1968 it has been a part of the Belgian-Luxembourg Conference, part of the Franco-Belgian Union, which in turn is a part of the Euro-Africa Division.

From 1924 to 1931 Charles Kamm, a Seventh-day Adventist minister from Alsace, eastern France, was assigned to Luxembourg to work under the direction of the Belgian Conference. He baptized a small group in 1926 and more in 1927 and 1929, but the converts were never organized into a church. In 1928 at least two young women from Luxembourg attended the Seminaire Adventiste du Salève in Collonges, France.

In 1947 an active lay member living in France near the border attempted to hold some meetings in Luxembourg, but this was not permitted by the authorities. An SDA minister from the Saar held some lectures in the 1950s, but with small attendance and without visible results. Colporteur work is forbidden. Three families were won by a lay member from Germany and met each Sabbath in the home of R. Tanson, a civil engineer.

During the fall of 1968 a series of 13 religious programs was telecast over Radio-Luxembourg. In January 1969 a short public effort was held by Pierre Lanarès and Raymond Meyer, from France, in a public hall. In the spring of 1969, a hall was rented in a hotel, and ministers from Belgium conducted weekly Sabbath meetings to follow up the public effort. In 1971 Marc Cools, a young Belgian missionary who had returned from Cameroon to finish his studies, was sent to Luxembourg by the Belgian-Luxembourg Conference to organize a church with 13 members. He and his family stayed in Luxembourg for 10 years. In 1993 there were 55 members in Luxembourg. For many years Luxembourg's powerful, privately owned radio station has broadcast SDA programs in many languages.

Because of his active role in the promotion of SDA teachings by word and pen, he was exiled to Kazakhstan. After five years he was released during the general amnesty in the middle 1950s. He returned to Moscow, where he died soon after.

Macao (Macau)

MACAO (Macau). An overseas province of Portugal, six square miles (16 square kilometers) in area, situated at the mouth of the Canton River in southern China, about 40 miles (65 kilometers) west of Hong Kong. It consists of the city of Macao and three small offshore islands. It came into Portuguese possession in 1557 and for many years was a point of contact between China and the West. With the joint declaration between the Sino-Portuguese governments, Macao will be returned to China in 1999. Macao, which served as an early center for Jesuit activity in eastern Asia, has a population (1992) of nearly 400,000. The citizens are predominantly Chinese.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. The territory of Macao is a part of the Hong Kong-Macao Conference, in the South China Island Union Mission, which is a part of the Far Eastern Division of the General Conference.

Seventh-day Adventist teachings were brought to Macao by the first SDA missionary to reach China, Abram La Rue, who visited the city with SDA literature in the 1880s. When the first regular SDA missionaries were appointed to China in 1902, they used Macao as their summer residence. It appears that permanent work was established in Macao only in 1922, when H. B. Parker and Ho Wai Yu went there from Canton.

In 1953 a primary school and kindergarten were established. In 1961 the secondary section was added, with a total enrollment of 150 students. In 1967 the school was suspended because of government reclaiming of the building for cultural preservation. In 1993 the government procured a piece of land for the church to use for a new school building with a capacity for 1,485 students.

There is one church in Macao with 26 members.

In 1947 this was extended to grade 11. To provide for an increased enrollment in both the primary and the secondary sections of the school, a new block containing four classrooms was erected in 1962. In 1972 a further building program was undertaken, and by 1976 the upgrading of all facilities was complete.

In view of the limited space at the Kemp Street site in 1989 the school board established the Hunter Adventist Education Foundation Ltd. to provide for future development and expansion of the school.

In 1992 a new 15-acre (six-hectare) site on Lake Road, Wallsend, was purchased with the purpose of relocating the school as well as providing for preschool facilities. In 1994 the school moved to the new location and changed its name from Newcastle Seventh-day Adventist High School to Macquarie College.

Madagascar

MADAGASCAR. The world's fourth-largest island, lying 250 miles (400 kilometers) off the southeast coast of Africa, and an independent republic since June 26, 1960. Formerly a French colony, the island has an area of 226,857 square miles (587,600 square kilometers) and a population (1994) of 13.5 million. The population includes some French. Agriculture is the principal occupation, with coffee, vanilla (of which Madagascar supplies a large percentage of the total world output), maize, coconuts, rice, manioc, and sugarcane the principal products. More than 40 percent of the population is Christian, about equally divided between Catholic and Protestant. Seven percent is Muslim.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Interest in the Seventh-day Adventist faith sprang up in Madagascar in 1917. In that year André Rasamoelina, an inspector of Protestant schools, met a young man by the name of Tuyau, who had attended several SDA meetings in Mauritius. His interest aroused, Rasamoelina wrote to Paul Badaut, pioneer Seventh-day Adventist missionary on Mauritius, whose address Tuyau had given him. Badaut sent Rasamoelina's name and address on to the General Conference. On Dec. 8, 1918, J. L. Shaw wrote to Rasamoelina and sent him a package of Present Truth. In 1919 there was a further exchange of letters, and the Home Missionary Department sent him publications, including a copy of Ellen White's book Steps to Christ. During 1920 and 1921 Rasamoelina translated this book into Malagasy in his spare time. During July 1922 Marius Rascal, an SDA missionary on Mauritius, spent 10 days with Rasamoelina, giving him

Bible studies. In 1924 Raspal visited him twice. It was decided to publish Rasamoelina's translation of Steps to Christ, the General Conference furnishing $800 toward the publication. In 1925 a small bookshop was opened in Romaines Desfossés Street in Tananarive to handle the edition of 5,000 that was ready on June 22, 1925.

In February 1926 Raspal and his wife went as missionaries from Mauritius to Madagascar. To conduct evangelistic meetings it was necessary to have government authorization, which could be obtained only by submitting a petition signed by 10 members of the church. Because this was impossible, tracts were translated, printed, and sold in the bookshop. As conversations with customers turned into Bible studies, soon enough people were won to sign a petition for the opening of a mission. The first authorized Sabbath school was held in the home of Raspal on Oct. 2, 1926. The first number of a missionary paper Témoign ("Witness") (now Ny Vavolombelona) was printed in March 1927.

During 1927 chapels were opened at Toamasina, the main post of Madagascar situated on the east coast, Manjakaray, and Tsararay, and the first baptismal service was conducted by Raspal. André Rasamoelina was one of four candidates.

At the end of October Raspal left for Europe, and M. J. Bureaud, of France, became the director of the work in Madagascar. He was assisted by Albert Long, of Italy, and by active national lay workers. On Apr. 15, 1928, 18 people were baptized. In the spring of 1928 J. C. Raft, field secretary of the European Division, visited this mission and held a workers' meeting from May 7—9, which A. Rasamoelina and C. M. Ramiakabola attended as national workers. By the end of 1929 there were 102 church members in Madagascar.

The Indian Ocean Union Mission, comprised of Madagascar, Mauritius, Réunion, and the Seychelles, began to function on Jan. 1, 1936, with its headquarters in Tananarive (now Antananarivo), under M. J. Bureaud, the first president. At the same time E. Bénézech, who had arrived in 1929, was appointed president of the Madagascar Mission. The Malagasy Publishing House was established in 1930, and a printing plant added in 1950.

The educational work has played an important role in Madagascar. The first primary school had been established in Andina at the beginning of the 1930s under the direction of André Rasamoelina who, after the war, was called to assume the direction of the first primary school in Tananarive with the help of Bertha Ranorohanta.

The Indian Ocean Union Training School was established in 1938 (now Soamanandrany Adventist Secondary School). Other schools followed: the École Adventiste d'Ankazambo, on the west coast of the island, in 1951; the Ivoamba School, near Fianarantsoa, for the South Malagasy Mission, in 1970; the Ambatoharanana School, which is now a day school near Toamasina, on the east coast of Madagascar (1954); and a primary day school near Fort Dauphin, in 1965. Unfortunately, because of the diminution of the number of students resulting from the opening of government schools on the secondary level, many SDA schools had to be closed.

The country was divided into three districts in 1949 and into seven local missions in 1960. In 1972 Madagascar was again reorganized into the present three missions.

Seventh-day Adventist radio work began on Madagascar Dec. 7, 1946, with French broadcasts by Jean Zurcher introduced by the words "Voici notre émission adventiste ["Here is our Adventist broadcast"]." In three years Zurcher broadcast 149 talks on various biblical topics. On Nov. 5, 1949, the Voice of Hope program was introduced, and also an educational program by Maurice Tièche. In 1948 J. Rajoelison began a broadcast in Malagasy, which continued weekly for 10 years and then was continued by his brother, Rabarijoel. This broadcast still continues every Saturday evening from 6:00 to 6:30. A Bible correspondence course in Malagasy was organized in 1947 by Zurcher and was later directed by Berthe Ranorohanta for many years. The course is offered in Malagasy and French. Since the beginning of 1993 the Seventh-day Adventist Church has had access to the Malagasy television broadcast on the third Sunday of each month.

The medical work in Madagascar was started in 1969 at the Ambatoharanana Dispensary, under the direction of Mildred Vel, from the Seychelles. This small beginning grew to a 10-bed dispensary and a 10-bed maternity ward. In 1974 construction began on a hospital at Andapa, in the northeastern part of Madagascar. A dental clinic opened in 1975. Since 1992 a dispensary has functioned in Manjakaray with a large patronage. That same year a modern dentistry was opened on the site of the Indian Ocean Union Mission.

Madeira Islands

MADEIRA ISLANDS. A cluster of islands (Madeira, Porto Santo, and two uninhabited islets) about 500 miles (800 kilometers) west of Morocco in the North Atlantic Ocean, discovered by the Portuguese in 1418 and now administered as a province of Portugal. The total area is 307 square miles (800 square kilometers) in size, and the population (1992) was 253,000. The principal agricultural products are wine and sugar. Among the chief industries are embroidery, wine making, and tourism, the islands being popular as a winter resort for vacationing Europeans.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. The Madeira Islands (and Porto Santo Islands), formerly a mission of the Portuguese Union, are now part of the territory assigned to the newly organized Portuguese Union of Churches, in the Euro-Africa Division. Statistics (1992) for the Madeira Islands: churches, 2; members, 354.

The first Seventh-day Adventist minister to visit the Madeira Islands appears to have been S. N. Haskell, who stopped there on his way to Africa in July 1889. Thirty-three years later, in 1922, W. E. Howell stopped on Madeira Island on his way to South Africa. Howell wrote an article for the Review and Herald in which he appealed for the establishment of work there. Having read the article, Joaquim Gomes da Silva, a Madeiran living in Hawaii, decided to go canvassing in Madeira. As a result of his work there, in 1930 some interested people began meetings in Funchal. In 1931 E. P. Mansell and his wife arrived as the first missionaries. On July 29 of the following year the first 14 converts were baptized. Other missionary families followed. Two churches have been erected and dedicated, one in Funchal, the capital, in 1955, and another in Canico in 1969. For further information, see Portuguese Union of Churches.

Madgwick, George Alex Sheridan

MADGWICK, GEORGE ALEX SHERIDAN (1892—1954). Missionary doctor. Born on Antigua in the West Indies, he received his education in the government schools of England, took the medical course in London, and was graduated in 1916. He began his work for the church at the Stanborough Park Sanitarium, whose medical director he became. In 1919 he married Vera McLean.

On Jan. 21, 1921, Dr. Madgwick and his wife sailed to Africa to begin the medical work in the Kenya colony. To assist him in getting his work started, he was given £75 for supplies. He first went to Kanyadoto Mission near the shore of Lake Victoria, where, because the people were backward, it took some time to gain their confidence. It proved to be a most unhealthful site, and the doctor was forced to work under extremely primitive conditions. Operations were performed on the kitchen table in a mud hut under a thatched roof. His instruments were sterilized in kerosene tins boiling over open fires.

In 1924 it was decided that a hospital should be built in a more healthful place. A site was found about two miles (three kilometers) from Gendia Mission, and here the doctor began the arduous task of building a hospital from its foundation. He remained there 15 years, and had the satisfaction of seeing the hospital grow into an institution of considerable influence.

In 1939 Dr. Madgwick began his third pioneer experience by opening the Ile-Ife hospital in Nigeria. Soon after this hospital was in operation, he was invited to go to Abyssinia to help restore the medical work there after the expulsion of the Axis armies in 1942. Later he was called to South Africa to pioneer yet another new hospital, the Nokuphila institution in Johannesburg, where he spent the remaining 12 years of his life. He practiced medicine for 38 years in all, most of that time in Africa.

Madison Academy

MADISON ACADEMY. A school on the senior high school level that came into being with the closing of Madison College in the summer of 1964. A secondary school, known as Madison College Academy, had been operated in connection with the college. This was renamed and its ownership taken over by the Kentucky-Tennessee Conference. In 1965, after extensive renovation of some of the buildings and tearing down of others, the school became a boarding academy.

The science building was leveled by fire of undetermined origin in November 1967, and a new gymnasium was erected on the site. Remodeling was done in the remaining buildings to accommodate the science and home economics departments.

In 1968 the board voted to close the dormitories and make the school a day academy. The enrollment since that time has fluctuated between 139 and 162, with the average being about 150. Madison Academy received accreditation with the Seventh-day Adventist Board of Regents in 1970, and is approved by the state of Tennessee.

With the completion of a new administration building and chapel in 1991, and with the removal of Druillard Library, Madison Academy, with its beautiful grounds, continues to offer excellent Christian education.

Madison Institutions

MADISON INSTITUTIONS. A group of institutions situated at Madison, Tennessee, 10 miles (16 kilometers) northeast of Nashville, owned and operated from 1904 to 1963 by the Nashville Agricultural Normal Institute Corporation independently as a self-supporting institution, but closely allied to the Seventh-day Adventist Church. Included were a school (grades 1—16), a sanitarium-hospital, a food factory, and a farm of more than 800 acres (320 hectares).

Ownership of the college and hospital was transferred to the Seventh-day Adventist denomination in April 1963. In 1964 Madison College was closed, and Madison Hospital became a Southern Union institution. Madison Academy continues to operate under the ownership of the Kentucky-Tennessee Conference. Madison Foods was turned over to the Southern Union Association in 1964, and became a division of Nutritional International Corporation (Worthington Foods). The food factory was operated on the Madison campus until 1972, when it was moved to Worthington, Ohio.

Origin of the School. The idea that bore fruit at Madison originated with David Paulson, M.D. At a Michigan meeting he and Edward A. Sutherland (first president of Walla Walla College, president of Battle Creek College when it moved to Berrien Springs, and first president of Emmanuel Missionary College) were discussing the need for educational opportunities for needy students. Dr. Paulson said, "If I were in your place I would establish a school whose doors would swing open to any young man or woman of worthy character who is willing to work. You ought to have a large tract of land and provide facilities for student self-support." Sutherland, who from his study of the writings of Ellen White and of the Oberlin system had become an educational reformer, was impressed.

In 1904 Sutherland and P. T. Magan, under conviction that they should work directly for the people of the Southern mountains, resigned their posts at Emmanuel Missionary College and went to Nashville, planning to proceed to the mountains of east Tennessee or the Carolinas to find a site for their school. Informed of their plans, Ellen White, who repeatedly had published appeals for denominational work in the South and who was in Nashville at the time, told Magan and Sutherland that they should locate the school within a few miles of Nashville. Mrs. White invited the two men to go with her son Edson (J. E.) and a group on a trip up the Cumberland River in the boat Morning Star. When the engine broke down a few miles from Nashville opposite an old, half-worn-out plantation, Mrs. White went ashore with W. O. Palmer and looked at the old Nelson farm. Returning to the boat, she told the men that she believed this to be the place on which God would have them establish a school.

Accordingly, the farm was purchased. Mrs. Nellie Druillard assisted financially and became a member of the founding group. The type of organization was agreed upon and chartered under the General Welfare Act of Tennessee. S. N. Haskell and his wife acted as trustees and held the deed until the corporation was perfected. On July 4, 1904, the first meeting of the incorporators was held at Emmanuel Missionary College. The board of managers included G. I. Butler, N. W. Allen, Mrs. S. N. Haskell, J. E. White, Mrs. E. G. White, and the owners. This is the only occasion on which Mrs. White agreed to become a member of the board of trustees of any institution. She remained a member of the board until her resignation in 1914, because of failing health, and during that time she made many appeals in behalf of the Madison institution.

In October 1904 possession of the farm was secured, and the first term of the Nashville Agricultural and Normal Institute (NANI) began with 11 students. E. A. Sutherland was installed as president and continued in office until he resigned in 1946 to become the first secretary of the General Conference Commission on Rural Living.

Self-supporting "Units" Established. Established to train home and foreign missionary teachers, the institution, soon after its establishment, began to send out self-supporting workers. The first to go were the Wolcotts and the Kinsmans, who had come South from EMC. They went to Cuba to establish a mission school, which, unfortunately, did not long survive. Next, in February 1906, C. F. Alden, B. N. Mulford, and Charles Ashton established the Oak Grove School, seven miles (11 kilometers) back in the hills from Goodlettsville, Tennessee. The next year Mulford and his brother-in-law, Forrest West, established the Fountain Head School.

Nearly 40 small outpost schools and centers were started from Madison. As early as 1909, 13 rural or "hill schools" had been started, with more than 500 children in attendance. These "units" included schools and sanitariums located on farms, also vegetarian cafeterias and treatment rooms in several large cities of the South—Nashville, Knoxville, Louisville, Memphis, Birmingham, and Asheville. Usually when a unit was established, it led to the formation of a company or church.

The work of establishing these self-supporting educational and health centers was greatly augmented through the encouragement and finances of Mrs. Lida Funk Scott, a woman with vision who invested most of her wealth in Madison and the "little Madisons" that sprang up throughout the South.

Five of the units have not only a medical facility but have developed into full-fledged senior self-supporting academies doing creditable work. At Fletcher, North Carolina, there is an academy and hospital, and an accredited three-year Nursing School (the only SDA diploma school still in existence). The other four institutions affiliated with the Layman Foundation are Little Creek School and Sanitarium, Knoxville, Tennessee (it has now become Heritage Academy, Crossville, Tennessee); Pine Forest Academy and Sanitarium-Hospital, Chunky, Mississippi; Laurelbrook School and Sanitarium, Dayton, Tennessee; and Harbert Hills Academy and Sanitarium, Savannah, Tennessee.

Wildwood Sanitarium and Institute, Wildwood, Georgia, is another self-supporting institution of note. Although it is not one of the Layman Foundation affiliates, Wildwood has been carrying on a strong medical missionary and evangelistic work with an unaccredited adult education program. Several other units of the Wildwood type have been established, among them Stone Cave Institute, Daus, Tennessee; Eden Valley Institute, Loveland, Colorado; Castle Valley Institute, Moab, Utah.

Some of these self-supporting institutions are now conference-owned and -operated, such as Fountain Head School and Sanitarium, which became Highland Academy and Sanitarium-Hospital at Portland, Tennessee (in 1945); Pisgah School and Sanitarium, which became Mount Pisgah Academy, at Candler, North Carolina (in 1951); Hurlbutt Farm School and Scott Sanitarium, which became Georgia-Cumberland Academy; and Madison Academy and Madison Sanitarium-Hospital.

Madison Rural Sanitarium. Health work was practically forced on the founding group before they were ready. Soon after they came, while still in the old “Plantation House,” a sick man came from Nashville saying he understood that with rest, diet, and treatment he could get well. They tried to turn him away, but he insisted, so they curtained off one end of the porch and cared for him. He soon recovered his health and sang their praises. The word spread, and there was demand from more and more patients. On Mrs. White’s advice, and with union conference approval, the NANI board voted in 1906 to establish a sanitarium in connection with the school.

Mrs. White not only pointed out the place where Madison School was to be located in 1904, but a little later, on one of her visits, also said that God wanted a sanitarium built, and pointed to the west, stating that that was the spot. She insisted that they get a plow and team to turn the soil. This became the site of the small sanitarium, at first only a four-room cottage (in 1907); then other cottages were added in a row. In 1908 a 12-room cottage was built in the shape of a carpenter’s square.

The plan of the sanitarium was simple—the buildings were on one floor with wings extending from the central corridor to form patios and sheltered areas. Church officials from the Southern Union Conference and from the General Conference were present at the dedicatory ceremonies on Oct. 18, 1908.

The patronage of the sanitarium grew by leaps and bounds, or, as one writer put it, cottage by cottage. By 1927, when North Hall (12 rooms) was built, there were 47 rooms in the several cottages.

In 1928 all the cottages and North Hall were given a coat of white stucco and connected with covered runways and arched openings on sides, thus giving the appearance of Spanish architecture. Rooms 1—35 became known as “Lower General,” and rooms 36—47 as “Upper General.” Also in 1928 the administration building (for both sanitarium-hospital and college) was constructed a short distance to the south.

In 1938 construction began on a surgical and OB wing to the west of the ad building and connected with it. These buildings were also connected with the original cottages by a covered ramp. The bed capacity was more than 200 beds by 1954. The original cottages remained and were in use for patients for 56 years until construction of the new hospital began in 1964.

The first physician at Madison Rural Sanitarium was Dr. Lillian Magan, wife of Prof. Percy T. Magan. Dr. Newton Evans also assisted at first while teaching at the University of Tennessee Medical School. When Dr. Evans left to head the medical school at Loma Linda, California, he persuaded Sutherland, age 46, to study medicine. Magan also enrolled, and the two men rode motorcycles to Nashville for their studies. They graduated from the University of Tennessee Medical College in 1914.

Dr. Lillian Magan headed the sanitarium until her husband received his degree. Drs. Magan and Sutherland jointly cared for the sanitarium until Dr. Magan was called to Loma Linda, after which Dr. Sutherland took sole direction. His son, Dr. Joe Sutherland, followed in the post and was succeeded by Dr. Julian Gant. The position of medical director was abolished in 1952 and the administration of the hospital was carried successively by A. A. Jaspersen, James Zeigler, P. C. Dysinger, R. W. Morris, and V. O. Dortch.

In the early years Mrs. Nellie Druillard (Mother “D”) trained three nurses. The first nurses to finish the one-year uncertified course were listed in 1910. In 1915 nursing became a two-year course, and in 1919 a three-year professional R.N. program was begun.

In 1919 the first two Madison graduate nurses took the Tennessee State Board examination. The R.N. program continued at Madison from 1919 until 1964, when the college proper was closed, and a two-year associate degree was offered on the Madison campus as an extension of SMC. Paramedical courses (anesthesia, medical technology, X-ray, and medical records) started in earlier years were continued as hospital schools. A one-year practical nurse’s course was given in former years, and since 1958 was again offered under the Metro Board of Education in cooperation with Madison Hospital.

Two small cottages, Davison (built in 1907) and Hankins (built in 1924), named for the people who built them, were used first as dwellings for the school family, and later for patients. Davison had nine beds and was used for mental health patients and was connected to another building by a runway in 1952. Two years after North Hall was built in 1927, West Hall with 15 rooms was built. By 1930 the bed capacity of the several cottages and buildings had reached 100. In August 1963 a modern new 46-bed psychiatric building, Parkview, was dedicated.

Parkview was the beginning of an extensive new building program. The hospital administration sensed the need for a more up-to-date and compact facility. After 1963, when the Southern Union assumed ownership, “Sanitarium” was dropped from the name and the institution was called Madison Hospital.

On Oct. 31, 1963, groundbreaking occurred for the first new wing (South Wing), which was completed in 1965, bringing the number of beds to 180. The next year, 1966, ground was broken for the East Wing. This was completed in 1967, bringing the bed capacity to 238.

In 1973 construction began on the final wing (West Wing), to be completed in 1975, adding 150 beds, making the total number of beds 388. In addition, a new boiler house and a 12-office-suite physicians’ building were also built.

In 1962 Madison Hospital was designated as a 200-bed civil defense disaster hospital for the area. A helicopter pad, to the west of the hospital, was dedicated on Oct. 16, 1969.

In 1973 an emergency communication system was installed, whereby Madison Hospital was tied in with all hospitals in the area. In 1985 Madison Hospital became the Tennessee Christian Medical Center, which was changed to Tennessee Christian Medical Center—Nashville in 1994. See Tennessee Christian Medical Center—Nashville.

Industries. The 20 campus industries provided employment as well as learning skills for the students, who could earn all their expenses.

The sanitarium-hospital might have been considered the biggest industry and chief source of income for the school. The food factory and the large farm also provided employment and food to feed both students and staff as well as patients.

As early as 1907 Mrs. White had advised operating a food factory in connection with the Madison school. A decade later, in 1917, a food factory was purchased and moved to the campus. The industry became known as Madison Foods.

At one time 100,000 copies of the Madison Health Messenger were sent out each year. The food factory building, which also contained a bakery, was a five-story structure with a tower, and was situated on the east end of the campus. Madison Foods went through a series of managements until taken over by Worthington Foods in 1964, and in 1972 was moved to the main office in Ohio. In 1973 the building was put to use by the Madison School of Industrial Services.

Mrs. White had also urged the development of a model school farm. In 1931 the farm produced 5,450 bushels (192,000 liters) of fruit and eight tons (seven metric tons) of grapes. The school canned 6,700 gallons (25,400 liters) of fruit and vegetables for use in the cafeteria. For many years the dairy herd was rated among the best herds in the state. There was also a poultry industry with 1,000 hens housed in seven modern units in 1948.

At one time the institution had an acreage of 906 acres (350 hectares), with 789 acres (320 hectares) at Madison and 117 acres (50 hectares) at Ridgetop. There were more than 3,000 apple and peach trees at Ridgetop. Mention was also made of a farm at Union Hill, Goodlettsville, Tennessee.

Madison College. The name given in 1904 was Nashville Agricultural Normal Institute (NANI), indicating training in agriculture and “normal” courses, or teaching. It was not until 1937 that the name became Madison College.

Some of the cardinal principles upon which the school was built were self-supporting missionary training, self-government, work and study, and teachers and staff working along with students, those without cash being able to work their way through. There were 11 students to begin with, and short courses were offered. Classes were given in practical arts, health, teacher training, general economy, rural sociology, and included Bible, history, English, bookkeeping, home economics, agriculture, physiology and other sciences, and “the history of our message.” There were eight cottages for students in 1918.

The first record of graduates, or “finishers,” was in 1910. Nursing was predominant at first. Nursing training began with an uncertified one-year course, which became a two-year course in 1915, and a three-year registered nursing program in 1919. The first formal graduation program was in 1927. At that time, in addition to nurses, graduates were also listed for cafeteria, normal, and premedical courses. In 1928 agriculture and treatment rooms were added to the list. The junior college was recognized by the Tennessee State Department of Education in 1922. In 1923 membership was granted in the Tennessee College Association. The first formal graduation exercises were held in June 1927.

In 1927 the high school was accepted into the Southern Association of Colleges and Secondary Schools. In 1928 Madison was accredited as a junior college. In 1933 it was accepted as a four-year college by the Tennessee College Association. The first senior college class was graduated Aug. 27, 1933.

Madison College Graduates. A nurses’ alumni association was formed in 1931. Later it included Bachelor of Science and other graduates, and was incorporated as Madison College Alumni Association in 1960. By 1963, when the college was taken over by the Southern Union, 140 of Madison’s graduates had advanced through the doctorate degree; 302 had gone into self-supporting institutional work; and 228 had entered denominational service. Of the latter, 64 were serving in 23 countries outside the North American Division. Since 1963 many more could be added to these figures. About 60 additional Madisonites (nurses, physicians, relief doctors, student missionaries, nationals returning, etc.) went to foreign fields to serve.

In 1960 the Madison College Alumni Association obtained a full-time executive secretary and editor of The Madison Survey, Mable H. Towery. A room was set aside on the ground floor of the Druillard Library for headquarters, and in 1966 the office was moved to the second floor over Helen Funk Assembly Hall. After the college closed in 1964 the Alumni Association decided to continue the office, also The Madison Survey, which had been published continuously since 1919. At one time 21,000 copies of the Survey were sent out each month free of charge as the voice of Madison College. Also homecomings were continued each year. The first record of a homecoming, as recorded in Sandborn's History of Madison College, was by the nurses' class of 1935, held in April 1938. Another homecoming was mentioned in 1946. Annual homecomings began to be held regularly in 1962.

Some of the outstanding personalities associated with Madison have been women. M. Bessie DeGraw, an educator of exceptional ability, was one of the founders. Mrs. Nellie Druillard, another of the founders, was one of the three women who contributed largely to the institution. Her later gifts enabled the college to construct the Druillard Library. Josephine Gotzian, after helping provide funds with which the Portland, the Loma Linda, and the Paradise Valley sanitariums were established, came to Madison and remained a member of the board until her death in 1935. Mrs. Lida F. Scott, daughter of Dr. Isaac K. Funk, cofounder of Funk and Wagnalls Publishing Company, visited Madison as a patient in 1914, soon after joined the organization, and in 1924 was instrumental in establishing the Layman Foundation, fostering self-supporting work in the South.

Among the college deans, perhaps the most notable was Dr. Floyd Bralliar, author, lecturer, writer, naturalist, who spent 35 years at Madison. Two other deans might be mentioned—Howard J. Welch (1938—1949) and J. A. Tucker, who succeeded him in 1948.

Because of its unique program, Madison College received much publicity through the years. Most notable was an article in the May 1938 Reader's Digest, which resulted in 5,000 inquiries from prospective students, many non-SDA.

Changes in the 1960s. Because of the dire financial straits of the institution, which had become heavily in debt, and the necessity to replace the old sanitarium-hospital building with a new modern facility in order for the nursing course and hospital to continue, danger signals had been flying. Both the nursing school and the hospital were in jeopardy without the necessary accreditation. It seemed impossible for the self-supporting constituency to raise the large amount of money necessary to pay off the debts and undertake the necessary upgrading and expansion program. On Feb. 3, 1963, the Nashville Agricultural and Normal Institute constituency voted to transfer control of the Madison institutions to the Southern Union Conference of Seventh-day Adventists. The union conference accepted control on Feb. 7 pending General Conference approval. On Apr. 4, 1963, the General Conference approved denominational operation and designated Madison College as a professional and technological training center for the North American Division.

It was planned for the college to continue as a denominational institution, with emphasis on practical arts and industrial courses. The nursing school and hospital paramedical courses were to continue. But these plans did not materialize. On Nov. 6, 1963, the news came that accreditation for the nursing education program at Madison College had been withdrawn by the state of Tennessee until further requirements and higher standards had been reached. The administration was unable to meet the ultimatum. Loss of accreditation for the nursing course, coupled with the heavy debt on the institution, and other circumstances, ultimately caused the closing of the college. On Feb. 6, 1964, the NANI board voted that following the spring quarter all offerings of Madison College be suspended. Students and alumni sprang into action to try to save the college, but all efforts failed. Madison College was officially closed as of Sept. 1, 1964, one year after being taken over by the Southern Union, and 60 years after the school had opened in 1904.

Madison Sanitarium-Hospital continued under the Southern Union Conference as Madison Hospital, and the paramedical courses also continued under the hospital. Madison College Academy continued to operate under the name Madison Academy as a Kentucky-Tennessee Conference school.

One year of an accredited two-year A.D. nursing course was taught at Madison as an extension course of Southern Missionary College. The first year was given on the SMC campus and the second year on the Madison campus.

Madison Sanitarium (Wisconsin)

MADISON SANITARIUM (Wisconsin). A medical institution operated from 1903 to 1922 at Madison, Wisconsin, by the Wisconsin Conference. The original building, a four-story frame structure erected on a five-acre (two-hectare) site with a 200-foot (60-meter) frontage on Lake Manona, was dedicated June 7, 1903. There were 50 employees. By 1907 there were four buildings on nine acres (four hectares) of land and a reported capacity of 60 patients. Although the sanitarium enjoyed a good patronage, it was plagued by debt for many years. To help liquidate the outstanding obligations, church members in Wisconsin sold thousands of copies of Ellen White's Ministry of Healing. Pledges and subscriptions were sought as well. In 1922 the institution was sold to Drs. R. S. and Olive Ingersoll, who, in 1929, sold it to Drs. C. P. and Anna B. Farnsworth, its original medical superintendents.

Magan, Percy Tilson

MAGAN, PERCY TILSON (1867—1947). Physician and administrator. Born in Ireland, he emigrated to the United States in 1886. He became a Seventh-day Adventist the same year, worked as a licensed minister in Nebraska in 1887, and entered Battle Creek College in 1888, from which he later graduated.

After a journey around the world in 1889 as secretary to S. N. Haskell, he became associate secretary of the Foreign Mission Board (1890—1891), head of the Department of Bible and history at Battle Creek College (1891—1901), and dean of Emmanuel Missionary College (1901—1904). He was cofounder, with E. A. Sutherland, of the Nashville Agricultural and Normal Institute (1904), later generally known as Madison College, and was its dean.

He took the medical course at the University of Tennessee and soon after, in 1915, was elected dean of the College of Medical Evangelists (now the Loma Linda University School of Medicine), and later served as president (1928—1942). He was active in raising funds for the medical college and was largely responsible for its accreditation. A biography on Magan was written by Merlin L. Neff, under the title For God and CME (1964).

Maison de Retraite (La Marnière)

MAISON DE RETRAITE (LA MARNIÈRE). A home for the aged formerly operated in Ittre (Brabant), Belgium, situated on a wooded, parklike estate 20 miles (32 kilometers) from Brussels.

Established in 1954 by the lay members, it was self-supporting. The estate was sold in 1989, and presently the home is seeking a new location in Brussels.

Maison de Retraite (Le Foyer du Romarin)

MAISON DE RETRAITE (LE FOYER DU ROMARIN). An old people's home inaugurated Feb. 25, 1974, in Clapiers, Montpellier, France. It replaces the former institution at Pignan, which opened in 1950. Built on a property that measures 23,000 square meters (247,500 square feet), on the side of a pine-covered hill, the building includes every modern convenience for the comfort of its residents: 80 attractive rooms, spacious living rooms, and a beautiful chapel with seating capacity for 120.

The North and South French conferences and the Franco-Belgian Union shared in financing 20 percent of the total cost, which came to about 4 million French francs. The other 80 percent was covered by state subsidies and loans, as well as by the sale of the old building at Pignan. The home is managed by a board of directors.

Because social security is nationalized in France, every senior citizen can enjoy a peaceful retirement. Financing for the residents is automatic, with the state setting the rates yearly according to the cost of living. From the start Romarin has been filled to capacity, with the majority of the residents being Seventh-day Adventists. The non-SDAs share in the blessings of the religious atmosphere. A high spiritual level is maintained by daily devotional meetings and a devoted personnel. This home is not just a place to end one's existence, but rather an opportunity to prepare to spend eternity in the kingdom.

Malamulo Hospital

MALAMULO HOSPITAL. A medical institution operated by the Malawi Union on the 150-acre (60-hectare) property of Malamulo Secondary School, 40 miles (65 kilometers) south of Blantyre, Malawi, and 14 miles (22 kilometers) from Thyolo. The hospital offers full medical care for African, Asian, and European patients. The leprosarium is a half mile (.8 kilometer) from the principal buildings on the eastern end of the estate.

Malamulo was opened for general mission work in 1902 (see Malamulo Secondary School; Malawi). Medical work at Malamulo began in 1915 in a clinic opened by nurse Irene Fourie in a farm building, a service that continued, with some interruptions, until August 1925, when the first medical director, Dr. Carl Birkenstock, of South Africa, arrived. A step forward was taken in 1927, when the first permanent hospital buildings (office, surgery, laboratory, and two 15-bed wards) were completed. The services of the hospital were in great demand, and the meager facilities were taxed constantly to the limit. In the first eight months of 1926 Dr. Birkenstock and nurse Daisy Ingle treated more than 17,000 patients. In 1942 regular child welfare and prenatal clinics began with weekly classes for the mothers. In 1973 hospital capacity was 130 beds for general and eight for private use. In the same year the hospital served 4,600 inpatients and 70,000 outpatients.

A general rebuilding plan was voted by the committees of the then Southern African Division and of the Nyasaland Union in April 1951. Funds for the initial work came from a Thirteenth Sabbath Offering overflow, and other financial help came from government grants and mission funds. The completion of the building program was marked by the official opening of the 95-bed wing (wards and maternity) of the African hospital on Apr. 11, 1960, by Sir Robert Armitage, governor of Nyasaland.

In 1929 Dr. H. Erickson began to treat European patients. A small ward for Whites was completed at Malamulo in 1935, and once a week the doctor went to Blantyre to care for European and Asian patients there. In 1942 a ward was erected at Malamulo for Asians with funds donated by the community. This was enlarged in 1945 and remodeled in 1962. Remodeling of the ward for Whites was completed in 1961. As an extension service of the hospital, a clinic operation was begun in Limbe.

Work for lepers was begun in 1926 by Dr. Birkenstock, and by 1936 two six-bed wards, a clinic, and 100 one-room brick dwellings were occupied. Expansion in 1963 brought the capacity to 300 inpatients and 250 outpatients. A new leper hospital, comprising an administrative block, male and female wards for 36 patients, a surgery and a service block, was completed in the same year. This addition was made possible by grants from the Brown Trust Fund. Church and church school buildings for lepers have also been erected.

In 1973, with updated techniques for the treatment of leprosy, the Malawi government, through the LEPRO organization, assigned Malamulo Hospital as the leprosy control center for the Lower Shire River Valley. Former inpatients were repatriated to their villages. Weekly treatment is made available by hospital personnel who reach the designated centers by Land Rover. Shire Valley Leprosy Control Project continues to serve patients suffering from leprosy, tuberculosis, and eye diseases under the supervision of P. C. Katumbi. The doctors from Malamulo Hospital pay monthly visits.

In November 1935 a three-year hospital assistant's course (post six years of elementary education) was opened. There were two graduates from this course in 1938. In 1954 the level of training was raised to four years (post 10 years of education), and in 1963 Malamulo Hospital received government accreditation, the graduates being known as medical assistants. In 1963 a four-year government-accredited course (post eight years of education) was opened for women, consisting of three years of nursing and one year of midwifery training. With the accreditation of this course, the former two-year course for women was discontinued.

In 1992 the hospital was operating four government accredited teaching programs, namely, medical assistant training, enrolled nursing, enrolled midwife, and laboratory technician. There were 124 students enrolled in these various courses. The graduates staff SDA clinics or join the government or other organizations in medical work. These workers are greatly appreciated by their employers.

Through Malamulo Hospital the medical work has expanded greatly throughout the country. The hospital has one permanent clinic run by one medical assistant, three mobile clinics with building structures, and some mobile clinics that operate under trees. The rest of the 20 clinics scattered countrywide are under the Adventist Health Services (AHS).

Besides these activities, the hospital has community health projects, namely, family spacing, mother-child, preventative care, ivermectin, eye, tuberculosis surveillance.

Malamulo Publishing House

MALAMULO PUBLISHING HOUSE. A publishing house with printing facilities located in Makwasa, Malawi, Africa. Printing was begun on a small handpress in 1926. The Malamulo Press (the former name) printed mainly for Malamulo. In 1930 the work was updated. The Sentinel Publishing Association assisted with capital grants, which made possible the erection of a larger building in 1934. The press then undertook commercial as well as denominational printing. In 1965 the name was changed from Malamulo Press to Malamulo Publishing House. A limited range of photographic and process equipment enables the house to produce its own litho printing plates. Sabbath school lessons are printed in the Tonga and Chichewa languages; Voice of Prophecy lessons in Chichewa, Tumbuka, Swahili, and French. A number of vernacular books have been printed, including Steps to Christ.

Malamulo Secondary School

MALAMULO SECONDARY SCHOOL. A coeducational boarding school offering the complete senior high school course. The school is situated on a 150-acre (60-hectare) tract in the Shire Highlands, about 40 miles (65 kilometers) south of Blantyre, the commercial capital of Malawi (formerly Nyasaland). It is owned and operated by the Malawi Union and serves the constituency of Malawi. The school is situated among the Nyanja tribe, but other ethnical groups are represented. English is the medium of instruction.

Enrollment (1993): 396 high school students, with 10 teachers; 375 primary students, with seven teachers. Students take government examinations at the end of primary school and also after the tenth and twelfth grades of high school.

The present school developed from the elementary school of the Malamulo Mission station (formerly called the Plainfield Mission established in 1897 by a Seventh Day Baptist group, who in 1902 sold the property of 2,000 acres (800 hectares) to the Seventh-day Adventist Church; see Malawi). Thomas Branch, a Black American minister sent out in 1902, established an elementary school that was taught by his daughter, Mabel. Branch gave much attention to manual labor as part of the activities of the school. Because the mission drew the attention of the people to the Ten Commandments, the name of the mission and school was changed in 1907 to Malamulo—the Chichewa word for “commandments.” In 1910 special classes for girls were started by Etta Austin and expanded by Miss E. Edie in 1912.

Emphasis was placed on the Home Economics Department. Cooking, sewing, and needlecraft were offered.

Expansion and Progress. In 1925, under the leadership of E. M. Cadwallader, a teacher-training course was introduced, and in 1947 a two-year ministerial course with an eighth-grade prerequisite. The next year saw the beginning of secondary schoolwork. Known for many years as the Malamulo Mission Training Institute, the school was renamed Malamulo College in 1963.

In 1968 a dining unit was completed with assistance from the Beit Trust. In 1969 and 1972, with further assistance from the Beit Trust, a two-classroom and laboratory building was constructed and equipped for the departments of biology, math, and physical science.

In 1990 the old secondary school block was demolished and replaced by a modern complex housing seven classrooms and administration offices. The funds were donated through ADRA.

MALAWI (formerly Nyasaland). An East African country independent since July 6, 1964. A British protectorate from 1891 to 1953, it was then made a part of the Federation of the Rhodesias and Nyasaland, a political union that continued 10 years. The country is bounded on the north and east by Tanzania, on the east, south, and west by Mozambique, and on the west by Zambia. With an area of 45,747 square miles (118,500 square kilometers), it supports a total population (1994) of 9.7 million. It took the name of Malawi after the independence date in 1964. On July 6, 1966, the country became a republic.

Malawi is mostly agricultural, and has only a few light industries. Four main crops—cotton, peanuts, tea, and tobacco—account for 90 percent of the country's exports. Sugar, rubber, coffee, and soybeans are of some importance to the economy.

Beginning in 1967, factories were built to provide some products that were previously imported. These include textiles, shoes, sugar, and farm implements, among other things.

Malawi trades mainly with the United Kingdom, South Africa, and the United States. The country depends on neighboring Mozambique for rail trade routes to the ocean. In 1974 construction was begun on a new capital at Lilongwe.

It is often called the land of Livingstone, because of the extensive explorations carried out by that missionary. The people have responded readily to the teaching of Christianity. In the nineteenth century the country was entered by many English and Scottish missionaries.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. The first Seventh-day Adventist missionary to Malawi was George James of London, England, who attended Battle Creek College, came to Malawi in 1893, and worked as a self-supporting missionary. He visited missions of other churches, talked freely of his faith, and entranced the Africans with his violin, playing the hymns they had learned to love. When he heard that a group of SDA workers were on their way to what became Solusi Mission, in Rhodesia (now Zimbabwe), he decided to visit them and tell them of the bright prospects in Malawi. He never reached them. Aboard a steamer headed down the Zambezi River, he was stricken with malaria and after a short illness, died. He was buried at a lonely spot along the river.

In 1902 the General Conference purchased from a group of Seventh Day Baptists the Plainfield Mission in Malawi, which Joseph Booth, a former Seventh Day Baptist, had established. Booth, who had become an SDA, was sent back to the mission, and with him was sent a black American minister, Thomas H. Branch, and his family. These were the first Seventh-day Adventist missionaries to Malawi. Booth did not stay long, but Branch, an energetic gospel minister, opened a school on the station, and his daughter, Mabel, became the first Seventh-day Adventist teacher in Malawi. On Sept. 30, 1905, the first baptism took place when seven boys joined the church. Prominent among Branch's converts was Morrison Malinki, an African, who had worked as Branch's translator. Going back to his home at Monekera, near Blantyre, he opened several self-supporting schools, which were later accepted into the SDA mission organization. He gave a lifetime of service to the church as a teacher and later as a minister.

In 1907 J. C. Rogers arrived with his wife to take charge of the Plainfield Mission. Shortly after his arrival he changed the name of the mission to Malamulo, a word meaning "commandments," or "laws," in the Chichewa dialect. Rogers and his wife worked diligently at building up the school, preparing charts and writing readers. In 1908 S. M. Konigsmacher and his wife, trained nurses from the Battle Creek Sanitarium, arrived and were sent 70 miles (110 kilometers) west of Blantyre to pioneer the work at the Matandani Mission. In November 1910 G. A. Ellingworth joined the staff at Malamulo. When he left the country in 1927 he had given many years to the upbuilding of the work.

In 1912 Rogers was succeeded at Malamulo by Christopher Robinson, who remained for eight years and introduced a number of innovations, which were copied in other fields. These included the holding of institutes for African teachers, organization of Africans into Young People's Societies, development of work for women and girls, and most important of all, the annual camp meetings.

In the northern part of the country the Seventh Day Baptists had organized a strong work as early as 1911, but had failed to find men to care for their converts. Many of these converts then turned to the Seventh-day Adventists for help. Some had backslidden before finally help became available in the opening of Luwazi Station by R. G. Pearson and James Ngaiyaye in 1928, and the opening of the Mombera (now Lunjika) Station by James Malinki, a Malawian worker, in 1929. The Luwazi Station was 14 miles (22 kilometers) from Nkhata Bay, on Lake Nyasa (now Lake Malawi), and Mombera Station was 27 miles (43 kilometers) north of Mzimba. The work in the north grew steadily, and in 1929 five Malawian workers were ordained to the ministry and six churches were organized.

In the South Malawi (now South Lake) Field new centers were opened in 1934 at Zomba and Lake View as stations under Malawians.

In 1935 work was opened at the northern end of Lake Malawi at Ighembe near the Tanganyika (now Tanzania) border by two African evangelists, B. Sapa and S. Kaundi, and from here the work spread into southern Tanganyika.

In 1946 two Malawian workers, A. Kambua and D. Nkolokosa, opened a school and a prayer house among the Yao tribe, mainly Muslims, at the south end of Lake Nyasa (now Lake Malawi).

In 1949 Chambo Mission, near Fort Hill (now Chitipa), was opened under Malawian leadership. Later it became known as the Chambo Station.

Organization

Organization. During the first years of the work in Malawi, Malamulo was recognized as the center. From 1902 to 1917 all SDA mission work in southern Africa was directed from the union conference headquarters in Cape Town. In 1916 it was decided to organize the Rhodesia-Nyasaland Mission, which was put into operation in 1917. This, in 1919, became the Zambesi Union Mission, which was organized to have administrative charge of all work north of the Limpopo River, which included the work in Malawi. By 1925 the Zambesi Union was divided, and what became known as the South-East African Union Mission was organized to administer the work in Malawi, the eastern portion of Northern Rhodesia (now Zambia), and Mozambique. G. A. Ellingworth was chosen as the first president, and the headquarters were shortly established in Blantyre.

In 1928 the union was divided into three local mission fields, but during the 1930s depression these local fields ceased to function.

In 1958 two fields, North Nyasa (including northeast Rhodesia) and South Nyasa, were set up with headquarters in Mzimba and Limbe, respectively, and in 1961 the territory surrounding and including the Thekerani and Chinyama missions was separated from the South Nyasa Field and organized into the Ruo Field.

In July 1963 Mombera (now Lunjika) Mission School became a union institution. It has developed into a senior secondary school.

In December 1963 the union was reorganized into the North Nyasa, Central Nyasa, and South Nyasa fields. In 1974 they became known as North Lake, Central Lake, and South Lake fields.

In one important aspect of the work, Malawi has been a pioneer—from the earliest years heavy responsibilities have been placed upon the Malawian ministers. These have served as mission station directors, departmental leaders, and in more recent years as officers in the mission fields. Some of those who served for many years were James and Simon Ngaiyaye, Sofa Saiwa, Yolam Kamwendo, Roman Cimera, John Thomas, the Malinkis, father (Morrison), and sons (James and Joseph), Yokaniah Sosola.

The Malawi workers have proved to be reliable missionaries to other parts of this division. They have supplied workers for Tanzania, Kenya, Zaire, Zambia, Zimbabwe, Botswana, and South Africa.

In 1964, with financial assistance from the Brown Trust Fund, a new leper hospital unit was constructed, and served up to 350 inpatients who lived in separate 8' x 8' (2 m.

x 2 m.) dwellings. In 1972 and 1973 the Malawi government initiated a Leprosy Control Program (LEPRA) that virtually seeks out those afflicted and provides treatment at numerous centers near the village homes of the patients. This allows the patients to remain with their families instead of isolated from them for months and even years. Under the control program Malamulo Hospital has been designated as headquarters for the Lower Shire area, and virtually all the patients formerly housed at Malamulo have been repatriated and continue to receive treatment near their homes. In 1974 some 1,200 leprosy patients were benefiting from treatment rendered by the Malamulo staff. The hospital still cares for a few leper patients, but most of the inmates are now TB sufferers.

In May 1965 the name of the Nyasaland Union was changed to the South-East Africa Union, its boundaries being the country of Malawi. In 1994 it became the Malawi Union.

The Malamulo College Press was designated as the Malamulo Publishing House in May 1965, to become the denomination's forty-third publishing house.

In November 1965 Malamulo Hospital became a member of the Private Hospital Association of Malawi (PHAM). In 1992 this became the Christian Hospital Association of Malawi (CHAM).

Malaysia

MALAYSIA. A federated state in Southeast Asia, governed by a constitutional monarchy, created by the merger on Sept. 16, 1963, of the federation of Malaya, the state of Singapore (which separated from the federation in 1965 to become an independent republic), and the former British colonies of North Borneo (renamed Sabah at the time of the merger) and Sarawak. Its area is 127,316 square miles (329,750 square kilometers), and its population (1994) is 19.3 million.

The federation occupies the southern part of the Malay Peninsula and most of the northern part of the island of Borneo (Kalimantan) in the East Indies Archipelago.

Malaysia has land boundaries with Thailand on the Asian mainland and with Indonesia on the island of Borneo. The part of the federation on the Asian mainland is separated from the section on the island of Borneo by about 400 miles (650 kilometers) of the South China Sea, in which are scattered islands belonging to Indonesia.

Because the Seventh-day Adventist work in the constituent countries developed separately, the history of the work will be dealt with under the subheadings of the member states.

A. Peninsular Malaysia

A constituent part of the federation of Malaysia, comprising the 11 mainland states of the southern end of the Malay Peninsula in Southeast Asia: Johor, Pahang, Negeri Sembilan, Selangor, Perak, Kedah, Perlis, Kelantan, Terengganu, Pinang, and Melaka. To the north of it lies Thailand; on the west the Strait of Malacca separates it from the island of Sumatra (Indonesia); on the south the republic of Singapore, on the island of the same name, is separated from it by the narrow Johor Strait (less than a mile wide); and on the east the South China Sea forms its boundary. The area of Peninsular Malaysia is about 50,700 square miles (131,500 square kilometers), and the population (1994) was estimated at 16 million, comprising Malays, Chinese, Indians and Pakistanis, and small groups of Europeans, Eurasians, and certain other peoples.

Most Malaysians are Muslims, and Islam is the official religion. Other groups, however, largely follow their national religions: usually the Indians are Hindus and Sikhs; the Pakistanis Muslims; and the Chinese are Buddhists, Confucianists, and Taoists. Malay is the national language of the country; it can be written in Arabic or Latin script. But English, Chinese, Tamil, and Arabic are also used. The federation of Malaysia is a producer of raw materials, chiefly tin, rubber, palm and coconut oil, and copra. Much of the world's supply of tin comes from Peninsular Malaysia.

Historical Background

Historical Background. The Malays have inhabited the peninsula since some time in the second millennium B.C., and by about A.D. 600 they had established an Indo-Malay empire on the Malacca Strait. About the beginning of the fifteenth century a principality was established at Malacca, and after its rulers accepted Islam, missionaries propagated their faith throughout the peninsula and the Malay Archipelago. The first Europeans to obtain control of territory in Malaya were the Portuguese, who captured Malacca in 1511 and put an end to the Malay empire. After that the various Malay states came under the protectorate first of the Dutch, who replaced the Portuguese in 1641, and then of the British, who acquired Penang by a lease from a local sultan in 1786, established Singapore in 1819, and acquired Malacca from the Dutch in 1825. The British organized these possessions into the Straits Settlements Colony in 1829 and thereafter gradually extended their control over the whole southern part of the Malay Peninsula. During World War II the Japanese occupied Malaya. After the war the Malayan states, with the exception of Singapore, which remained a crown colony, were formed first into a Malayan Union, and then into a federation of Malaya. In 1957 the federation became an independent member of the British Commonwealth of Nations. In 1963 Malaya joined with other British territories in the area to form the federation of Malaysia.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. Evangelistic work was begun in 1911 at Kuala Lumpur, the capital of the Malay states, by R. P. Montgomery, who was succeeded in 1913 by A. R. Duckworth, a convert from Singapore. By 1914 G. A. Thompson and his wife went to Malaya; at Kuala Lumpur the first Seventh-day Adventist church in Malaya was organized with 12 members, and also the Federated Malay States Mission was organized that same year.

The work progressed slowly. By the end of 1931, before the Singapore Mission was merged with the Malay States Mission (so named since 1918), there were only five churches in the Malay States Mission, and a membership of 251, most of them from non-Malayan racial groups.

In 1932 the Singapore Mission became part of the Malay States Mission. After the fall of Malaya and Singapore to the Japanese in the early 1940s, the Malay States Mission was divided into three missions: the Central, Northern, and Southern Malayan missions. After the war the three missions were united again as the Malayan Mission in early 1946 with headquarters temporarily in Singapore.

The mission soon assumed the old name of Malay States Mission, with headquarters again at Kuala Lumpur. The name of the mission was changed to the Malaya Mission in 1957, and to the West Malaysia-Singapore Mission in 1973. In 1988 it became the Peninsular Malaysia Mission when the territory of Singapore became a separate mission.

To foster the work for the Malay-speaking people in Malaya and Singapore, a separate mission, the Sidang Advent Mission, with headquarters in Singapore, was organized in late 1956. This mission integrated with the Malaya Mission in 1961.

In 1925 J. E. Gardner, M.D., established a medical mission in Penang (then part of the Straits Settlements), and soon was treating 1,500 cases every month. This clinic in time grew into the Penang Adventist Hospital.

B. Sabah

Formerly the British colony of North Borneo, a constituent part, since 1963, of the federation of Malaysia, with 29,388 square miles (76,100 square kilometers) of land area, and a population (1994) of 1.8 million. The Dusun tribe, now called Kadazans, constitutes the largest racial group in a mixed population that also includes the Muruts, Bajaus, Malays, Chinese, Europeans, Indonesians, and Filipinos—a mixture reflected in both church membership and staff of the mission.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. The territory of Sabah constitutes the Sabah Mission, which is in the Southeast Asia Union Mission, which in turn is part of the Far Eastern Division. Statistics (1993) for Sabah: churches, 113; companies, 59; members, 17,608; church or elementary schools, 11; ordained ministers, 22; licensed missionaries, 29; credentialed missionaries, 41; licensed ministers, 10; credentialed literature evangelists, 1; licensed literature evangelists, 5. Headquarters: Tamparuli.

Because of the rapid growth of members and interested adherents, an urgent need was felt for buildings to be used for worship and Sabbath school classes. A program of building jungle chapels and lamb shelters (buildings especially for child evangelism) was initiated in 1967. A total of 132 of these were erected in Sabah between 1967 and 1974. With increased members and improved finance of the mission, and with financial assistance given by the Sabah government, all these buildings were replaced with more permanent buildings during the period from 1985 to 1993.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. The first Seventh-day Adventist to visit Sabah (then North Borneo) was probably Abram La Rue, who is reported to have visited there some time between 1888 and 1903. The next SDA to visit there was probably a Chinese colporteur who went there from Singapore in 1909. In June 1913 R. P. Montgomery and his wife went from Singapore to the North Borneo Mission with an office in Sandakan, at that time the capital of North Borneo. The first converts, seven Chinese, were baptized on Jan. 1, 1914. The next year L. B. Mershon became director of the mission, and during his term of service (1915—1928) the headquarters were moved to Jesselton (now called Kota Kinabalu), the present capital of Sabah. Later they were moved to Tamparuli, their present address, also the site of the Sabah Adventist Secondary School.

During the early years of the work in North Borneo, government policy restricted the work of missionaries to coastal cities and to an area within one mile (1.6 kilometers) from the center of town. However, between the years 1923 and 1925 work was begun in interior areas by a number of young Indonesian workers, among them J. Pasariboe, L. S. Sibarani, and M. Agian, who opened schools among the rural population. To carry on their work it was necessary to develop a system of writing for the local language. Converts resulted, with two Dusuns baptized at Tuaran about 1925. A few years later work was begun among the Murut tribe in the Tenom area, but it was not continued. In 1961 the work in the interior was revived through the conversion and subsequent employment of a young Murut Bible instructor, Inauk S. Gullah.

In the fall of 1928 J. W. Rowland and his family went to North Borneo to take charge of the mission. At that time, according to the 1929 Yearbook, there were six churches and 251 members. Later G. B. Youngberg superintended the work until interned by the Japanese in the course of World War II. He died in internment. The 1942 Yearbook reported eight churches and 337 members.

During the war the work was carried on by national evangelists, and the 1947 Yearbook reported two additional churches in the area. In 1947 the mission received a new superintendent, Robert R. Youngberg, the son of G. B. Youngberg.

After the war the church membership grew rapidly, and on Apr. 14, 1956, the first national SDA was ordained to the ministry.

In April 1956 the British North Borneo Mission and the Sarawak Mission (including Brunei) were merged into the Borneo-Brunei-Sarawak Mission, which lasted until January 1961. The former North Borneo Mission was then designated as the Seventh-day Adventist Church of North Borneo, later the Seventh-day Adventist Church of Sabah.

After 1961 more missionaries from Indonesia, Philippines, and the United States were employed to work in this mission. In 1970, however, the government changed its attitude toward the importation of missionaries from outside Malaysia. By 1972 all missionaries had to leave the country. The Sarawak Mission president was then appointed as the acting president of the Sabah Mission until 1977, when the government relaxed its immigration regulations and a limited number of missionaries were again allowed to enter the country. James E. Thurmon was appointed the president of the mission. Three years later, in 1981, his work pass was not renewed. His departure ended the employment of overseas missionaries to work in the mission. But in spite of this immigration restriction and the absence of leadership personnel from overseas, the work continued to grow rapidly. In March 1983 Charles S. Gaban was appointed the president of the mission, the first national worker to hold this position.

C. Sarawak

C. Sarawak

A constituent state of the federation of Malaysia, Sarawak comprises an area of approximately 48,250 square miles (125,000 square kilometers) on the northwest coast of the island of Borneo. Its population (1994) of 1.9 million is made up of Ibans (Sea Dayaks), Chinese, Malays, Bidayuhs (Land Dayaks), and Melanaus, plus several other smaller tribes.

Sarawak is basically an agricultural country, producing rubber, pepper, and sago. The majority of the indigenous peoples are spirit worshipers. Christians maintaining missions in Sarawak include Anglicans, Roman Catholics, Methodists, Seventh-day Adventists, the Borneo Evangelical Mission, Salvation Army, and Baptists. There are also small groups of Hindus, Buddhists, and Baha'is. Islam is the faith of most of the Malays.

The area of Sarawak was given to an Englishman, Sir James Brooke, by the Muslim sultan of Brunei in 1841. Brooke's successors enlarged the possession to its present size, but in 1946 it was surrendered to the British Crown as a colony. In 1963 Sarawak joined the other British colonies in North Borneo and the Malay states in a federation of Malaysia.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. The first-known SDA in Sarawak is believed to have been Abram La Rue, who is reported to have visited there some time between 1888 and 1903. Later, in 1915, a Chinese colporteur, Phang Soon Siew, came and worked there. Because of a great interest aroused by his work in Kuching, the capital, an evangelist, R. P. Montgomery, was sent from Singapore, whom, however, the rajah refused permission to stay in Sarawak. Thereupon a layman from Singapore, S. M. Tan, set up a dental clinic in Kuching, in which he conducted a Sabbath school. In 1916 C. M. Lee, another SDA layperson from Singapore, opened a photographic studio in Kuching and conducted evangelistic meetings. Upon the death of the rajah in 1917, and at the installation of the new rajah, Sir Charles Vyner Brooke, religious liberty was proclaimed. This encouraged the SDA group to rent a house on Gartak Street in which to conduct meetings. The group that met there developed into the first organized SDA church in Sarawak. In 1925 a small school was opened in Kuching. In 1927 this school moved onto a property purchased by C. M. Lee for $800, and was named the Sunny Hill School. Later this property was taken over by the SDA mission. Chan Thiam Hee, the father of both Mrs. C. M. Lee and Mrs. S. M. Tan, joined the Lees soon after they came to Kuching, and had a large part in establishing the work in Sarawak. He later became the first national to be ordained in Malaysia.

At first evangelism was conducted chiefly for the Chinese and Malays, but in 1931 G. B. Youngberg and E. Sinaga pioneered among the Sea Dayaks, indigenous peoples on the Tatau River. About two years later, when Albert Munson directed the mission, the Ayer Manis Training School was opened in the Land Dayak area. By 1936 there were in the two Sarawak missions, two well-organized schools, medical service on the Tatau River, a large Chinese church at the third mile on the road from Kuching, and a small English congregation in Kuching. There was also a Land Dayak church at Ayer Manis School.

After the interruption caused by the Japanese occupation of Sarawak during World War II, the work was reestablished in 1947 under the leadership of L.E.A. Fox. Schools and churches were established in several villages among the Dayak peoples. In 1956 the Sarawak Mission was reorganized and became part of the Borneo-Brunei-Sarawak Mission. In 1961 this mission was again separated and became known as the Seventh-day Adventist Church of Sarawak. After Sarawak joined in the Malaysian federation, the work was again reorganized. The territory of Brunei is now again a part of the Sarawak Mission.

Maldives

MALDIVES. A republic situated in the Indian Ocean 417 miles (673 kilometers) southwest of Sri Lanka, independent since 1965. There are 210 inhabited islands in the country, with a total population (1994) of 252,000. The people are descended from the Sinhalese of Sri Lanka. Their religion is Islam, to which the entire population was converted through the influence of Arab traders in 1153. During the past 500 years the Maldives have been ruled by the Portuguese, Dutch, and British. Long a sultanate, it became a republic in 1968. The territory of the Maldives is included in the South India Union, which is part of the Southern Asia Division, but there is no Seventh-day Adventist work there.

Mali

MALI. A republic in West Africa, independent since 1960. It is bounded on the north by Algeria, on the east and southeast by Niger, on the south by Burkina Faso and Côte d'Ivoire, on the southwest by Guinea, on the west by Senegal, and on the northwest by Mauritania. The area is 482,077 square miles (1.2 million square kilometers), and the population (1994) is 9.1 million.

The constitution of the country provides for religious freedom. French is the official language, but Bambara, Senufo, and other dialects are spoken. The capital is Bamako, a city of 435,313 inhabitants. Timbuktu (now Tombouctou), now a small city, was once an important center in the medieval empire of Mali that flourished between the eleventh and seventeenth centuries and was at its peak in the thirteenth. The climate of Mali is hot, and the northern portion is in the Sahara.

Mali is part of the Sahel Union Mission, which is part of the Africa-Indian Ocean Division. Its territory is now a mission station with two churches and 205 church members who are actively sharing their faith with the population. ADRA is developing many projects there.

Malinki, K. Morrison

MALINKI, K. MORRISON (d. 1957). African evangelist and teacher. He was born probably about 1852; at least he remembered the time before White men came in numbers to his country. His homeland was Nyasaland. Three times he was sold as a slave, and each time he was ransomed or escaped from his captors. In 1884 he saw White men for the first time, and four years later went to the Church of Scotland Mission near Blantyre, where he was educated. In 1890 he finished his school and was given a teaching certificate.

In 1892 Malinki met Joseph Booth, a missionary of the Zambesi Mission. In that same year he was married and Booth baptized both him and his wife. Booth later joined the Seventh Day Baptists, and, from talking with him, Malinki became convinced that the seventh day was the Sabbath and began to keep it.

In 1900 Malinki opened up his first school near Cileka. When Thomas Branch, one of the first Seventh-day Adventist workers in Nyasaland, arrived to take charge of Plainfield Mission in 1902, he became acquainted with the school Malinki was running and encouraged him. Malinki continued to open up more schools around Cileka until he had five under his supervision.

In 1907 Joel Rogers took over Plainfield Mission from Thomas Branch, and renamed it Malamulo. The next year Rogers persuaded Malinki to turn his schools over to the mission to operate, while he himself was appointed school inspector over all the Seventh-day Adventist village schools in Southern Nyasaland, a responsibility he held for 13 years.

In 1920 Malinki, with two other African evangelists, was chosen to take charge of mission districts. It was not surprising that his field should be around his home at Monekera, close to Cileka. In 1927 he was one of a small group of African pastors ordained to the ministry. He continued to operate mission districts for several years.

By 1930, when Malinki was about 78, he had retired from administrative work, but continued attending institutes and camp meetings.

He died at the ripe age of about 105.

Malta

MALTA. A republic consisting of Mediterranean islands, three inhabited and three uninhabited, about 60 miles (100 kilometers) south of Sicily; an independent state since 1964, the capital of which is Valletta. The area of the main islands is as follows: Malta, 95 square miles (246 square kilometers); Gozo, 26 square miles (67 square kilometers); and Comino, one square mile (2.6 square kilometers). The population (1994) is 367,000. The official languages are Maltese (of Arabic origin with a heavy overlay of Siculo-Italian) and English. Italian is also spoken. The official religion is Roman Catholic.

At the beginning of the Christian Era, Malta was a Roman possession. It was taken by the Arabs in 870, who, before being superseded by the Sicilians in 1090, left their mark by supplying the language and some of the customs of the Maltese. In 1530 the Knights of St. John established their headquarters on the islands and administered the area until the islands fell to the French in the Napoleonic wars. At the beginning of the nineteenth century the islands became a crown colony of Great Britain, and gradually achieved self-government and complete independence in September 1964.

Malta is part of the territory of the Italian Union of Churches, which in turn is a part of the Euro-Africa Division. The earliest Seventh-day Adventist workers in Malta were colporteurs. The first was Giuseppe Catalano, then publishing department secretary for southern Italy. Learning that Malta, where Paul was shipwrecked, had never been visited by SDA missionaries, he visited that island as a colporteur in 1957. He returned in 1958 with another colporteur, Martino Gerardo, and received permission for SDA colporteurs to canvass for three months each year. Since that time a bookselling campaign has been conducted on Malta annually.

Since 1985 the Italian Union of Churches, in cooperation with the Euro-Africa Division, has charged the Sicily Field with the evangelistic care of Malta.

In 1990 the National Commission for the Prevention of Alcoholism and Drug Dependency (NCPA) was founded. In this year a building was purchased where the SDA group can meet.

Several evangelistic initiatives have been launched. These include Bible correspondence courses, stop-smoking plans, literature evangelistic work, and others. In 1992 Enrico Long and his wife were sent to Malta for two years in order to promote evangelism there.

The Public Affairs and Religious Liberty Department is working with the government of Malta to obtain recognition for the Seventh-day Adventist Church.

Maluku Academy

MALUKU ACADEMY (Sekolah Lanjutan Advent) (formerly Ambon Academy). A coeducational boarding school on the high school level operated by the Moluku Mission of the East Indonesia Union Mission on the island of Ambon in Indonesia. In 1970 the school had an enrollment of 97 and a faculty of eight. Now the school has 169 students and 21 faculty members. Instruction is given in the Indonesian language with English as a second language.

The school was opened in January 1965 at Waiselan Kairatu on the island of Cerem in temporary structures. After finding that the site was inaccessible for adequate administration, the school was moved to Waiame, a sea-level location just six miles (10 kilometers) from the Ambon airport. The school benefited from the second quarter 1974 Thirteenth Sabbath Offering overflow. The master plan for the school development included construction, in 1975, of an administration building, dormitories, cafeteria, and faculty housing.

Maluti Adventist Hospital

MALUTI ADVENTIST HOSPITAL. A general hospital with nurses' training school situated on a 25-acre (10-hectare) tract of land in the foothills of the Maluti (meaning "high mountain") Mountains in Lesotho, 22 miles (35 kilometers) from Ficksburg, which is over the Orange Free State border of South Africa. It is operated by the Southern Africa Union Conference, an attached field to the General Conference. Bed capacity is 177. The staff includes an ophthalmic surgeon, a gynecologist, and three general practitioners, expatriate and African nurses. The hospital operates registered nurses' training courses. Eleven clinics are operated in the area around the institution. The hospital offers medical, obstetrical, X-ray, laboratory, surgical, and ophthalmic services, as well as a village health-care program.

The Thirteenth Sabbath Offering overflow for the second quarter 1949, plus appropriations from the Southern African Division and South African Union Conference, made it possible to erect the first buildings, including an outpatient clinic, a maternity block, nurses' quarters, a doctor's house, an electric-light plant, and a water system. The Native Recruiting Corporation gave £1,000 toward equipping the institution. Dr. F. W. Slate was appointed the first medical director, Martha Hansen, matron, and W. B. Piercey, business manager.

The hospital opened in March 1951 with a bed capacity of 30 and has since become one of the best-known hospitals in Lesotho and in the adjoining sections of the Orange Free State.

During the first year of operation requests came in for the establishment of outpatient clinics. Eleven have since been established at distances of from 20 to 80 miles (32 to 130 kilometers) from the hospital. These serve as evangelistic centers also.

In 1952 a £1,500 grant was received from the Governor General War Memorial Fund, which was used to erect a two-story building accommodating approximately 35 student nurses and four staff nurses and providing a large addition to the wards, tripling the bed capacity. A house was erected for male nurses also.

In 1958 an extension was added to the children's ward, doubling its capacity. Also in this year a new two-story entrance to the hospital, and another women's ward (20-bed) were built. In 1960 the church building (begun in 1958) was completed and dedicated, and a kitchen and dining room were added to the nurses' home. A donation made by the Chamber of Mines in 1961 was used for the erection of a new, modern block, housing two operating rooms with all facilities and an X-ray Department. A new duplex for single workers was also erected, while housing for medical personnel was built as the need arose. A new nurses' training block was completed in 1965.

In 1970 a maternity ward was built. A new children's ward was opened in 1972. A new staff house was built in 1974. A new student nurses' home was officially opened in 1977.

The nurses' training school, opened and registered with the High Commission Territories' Nursing Council in 1958, graduated the first trainees in 1962. In 1992 a new theater block, funded by American Aid, was officially opened.

MANALAYSAY, EMILIO (c. 1890—1921). Evangelist in the Philippine Islands. He was among the first Seventh-day Adventist members in Manila, having joined the church in 1911. Soon after that he gave up his work as a public school teacher and began to interpret for E. M. Adams, and attended the first workers' institute on the islands in 1912. In 1916, having proved himself a strong worker in the church, he was ordained by A. G. Daniells. An attack of malaria with complications interrupted a campaign of his at Tayabas, and he finally succumbed to the disease.

MANAUS ADVENTIST ACADEMY (Instituto Adventista de Manaus). An institution located in the Bairro de Cachoeirinha, in the city of Manaus, state of Amazonas, north Brazil. It belongs to the Central Amazon Mission in the North Brazil Union. It was founded in 1982 and began operating as a secondary teaching academy with enablement in health in 1989. The school offers a course of scientific preparation and teachers' courses. It also has a music conservatory. The academy is a day school that operates in two sessions, morning and afternoon. The 19 classrooms offer education to 1,328 students.

Manaus Adventist Hospital

MANAUS ADVENTIST HOSPITAL (Hospital Adventista de Manaus). A medical institution located in Manaus, Brazil. It opened in 1972 as a small clinic at Rua Belém under the guidance of Dr. Raymond Ermshar. Known as the Adventist Clinic, it enjoyed a good reputation from the beginning. The patient load increased until in 1986 it became a small hospital and was transferred to another location in the Industrial District, where it has been in operation for more than four years.

The hospital maintains 40 beds, with 180 employees. It is considered to have the best medical staff in Amazonas. There is a modern surgery center with four surgery rooms, electrocardiology, radiology, laboratory, ultrasound, and digestive endoscopy facilities.

Manila Sanitarium and Hospital

MANILA SANITARIUM AND HOSPITAL. A tertiary, acute-care hospital with a capacity of 152 beds and 19 bassinets operated by the North Philippine Union Mission at Pasay City, a suburb of Metro Manila, Philippines. The institution is affiliated with the Adventist Health Services/Asia of the Far Eastern Division.

Early Medical Work. Seventh-day Adventist medical work in the Philippines began in 1928, when a physician, H. A. Hall, arrived in Manila, and with the aid of three nurses—Mr. and Mrs. Charles Jeys and Mrs. E. A. Moon, wife of the manager of the Philippine Publishing House—opened a dispensary on the first floor of one of the two SDA mission houses located at the corner of Vermont and Indiana streets in Malate, a district of Manila. The work at first was carried on mainly for the SDA constituents who lived in Manila and the neighboring provinces. Teodora M. Beltran, a Filipino, worked as receptionist, interpreter, and nurse's aide. As the demands on the dispensary increased rapidly and more room was needed, the mission house adjacent to the dispensary was turned into a temporary hospital with two small wards, one private room and one operating room that served as the delivery room. Its capacity was about 10 beds.

Manila Sanitarium. To accommodate more patients and afford better facilities, a three-story building was constructed in 1929 on the lot beside the temporary hospital under the supervision of E. C. Wood, the builder for the Far Eastern Division, who came from Shanghai. The enlarged hospital, supervised then by F. A. Mote, was named the Manila Sanitarium and Hospital. Soon the hospital became well known not only in Manila but also throughout the Philippines for its efficient nursing service and pleasant Christian atmosphere. Principles of healthful living were taught, and patients were impressed with the vegetarian diet and hydrotherapy treatments. Hazel Sevrens (later Mrs. Guy C. Jorgensen) served as the first business manager. Dr. H. W. Miller, the "China Doctor," of Shanghai, also helped greatly in the development of the hospital.

In 1930 a school of nursing was opened under the supervision of Fannie Hiday and Ruby Barnett. Later Bessie Irvine and Bertha Parker supervised the school. At the start a few non-SDA graduate nurses had been employed to augment the nursing staff.

In 1931 the old mission house that had been used temporarily as a hospital was replaced by a second three-story building adjacent to the first. The funds for construction were obtained through a public solicitation campaign under the leadership of M. F. Wiedemann. Olga Oss (Mrs. John Oss), an experienced fund-raiser for the China Division, came to Manila to assist in this campaign, and with local solicitors visited leading residents of Manila, many of whom were former patients at the hospital. The second unit provided additional private rooms and wards, and had a chapel on the first floor, where workers and patients assembled for daily and weekly religious services. At the completion of the second building, the Manila Sanitarium and Hospital was formally dedicated.

During 1933 and 1934 Dr. Hjalmar A. Erickson served as the hospital's acting medical director until Horace A. Hall reassumed his former position up to 1935. The former then gained full directorship of the institution until 1936. The next few years saw a steady increase in patronage of the hospital. This necessitated the construction of a larger structure. In 1940 a four-story concrete building was erected on two and a half acres (one hectare) of land at the corner of Donada and San Juan streets in Pasay City, where the hospital still stands. The first buildings on Vermont were sold.

During World War II. The next year, when World War II came to the Philippines, the Japanese took over the Manila Sanitarium and Hospital and operated it as a navy hospital from January 1942 to February 1945. When the Japanese evacuated the hospital, a demolition bomb was detonated under the center of the structure, causing heavy damage. Afterward, the building was occupied by the American Army until July 1946, but in June 1945, SDAs opened a temporary clinic on the ground floor, amid the ruins of the hospital, in order to serve the neighboring community.

Postwar Developments. Rehabilitation work began in July 1946, but because of the shortage of building materials it was not until Mar. 3, 1949, that the Manila Sanitarium and Hospital, housed in a restored four-story building with 90-bed capacity, was officially reopened, with W. C. Richli as medical director until 1950 and H. A. Munson as business manager.

In 1953 the Laboratory Department of the hospital accommodated the opening of the School of Medical Technology by Mrs. Willa Hedrick, a medical technologist who acted as the school's chairperson. It was the first such school to be established in the Philippines.

Jan. 5, 1958, saw the opening of a new two-story annex, constructed and furnished through the liberality of many friends and patrons of the hospital. (Sir Henry Pollock, a former resident of Manila, donated about one third of the cost of this building.) This annex housed the Outpatient Department, Dental Department, and Pharmacy on the ground floor, and the Medical II and Obstetrics departments on the second floor.

A three-story apartment building, with six units for the staff doctors, was constructed in 1967 on a nearby lot opposite the North Philippine Union Mission compound.

In mid-1968 a fully carpeted medical-surgical unit, with 20 private rooms furnished with electrically operated beds and other equipment, was opened. This unit was built on the third floor of the two-story annex through the efforts of Dr. H. W. Miller, E. L. Longway, Mrs. G. C. Ekvall, and Mrs. L. L. Quirante. The funds they raised were matched by the hospital.

During the summer of 1968 a third floor was added to the student nurses' dormitory to accommodate more students.

The period between 1970 and 1972 was characterized by a massive renovation and expansion program of the following departments: Dietary, Laboratory, Emergency Room, Dental, Physiotherapy, Central Service, and X-ray.

In 1972 R. Oseas C. Pilar became the first Filipino to be appointed medical director. Eduardo Corpus was named business manager.

In 1973 the renovation-expansion work was extended to the operating room, recovery room, conference room, pediatric unit, intensive-care unit, and the south end of the third floor of the main building. An elevator shaft had also been constructed to warrant another elevator for passengers in the future.

In 1974 the board approved a name change to Manila Adventist Hospital, but later it was voted to retain the original name. The following year the medical directorship plan was changed, with the highest officer receiving the title “administrator.” During this period the hospital received full accreditation from the Far Eastern Division hospital accrediting board.

A number of events characterized the early 1980s. These included the launching of the Human Performance Laboratory and the Intensive Cardiology Services, including an intensive care unit/coronary care unit made possible through the generosity of Will Henderson, president of Queen’s Medical Center in Honolulu.

A hospital-financed medical clinic was opened on the island of Palawan. This received voluntary support from medical and paramedical personnel from all over the United States.

During the late 1980s the hospital suffered financially because of political upheaval. In 1988 major decisions were implemented, including the sale of property in Carmona, funds from which were invested.

To enhance its emphasis on health education, the hospital sponsored a daily morning radio program featuring devotionals and health tips. A new telephone system was installed in 1990, and the hospital was able to acquire an adjacent property that was offered at a price much lower than market value.

During the 1990s the institution continued to show progress. Management workshops are conducted regularly. A generator now ensures uninterrupted power and services. The cafeteria was renovated and pharmaceutical services were improved. Newstart Lifestyle seminars are conducted by the Health Education Department.

At present the hospital is enjoying an average occupancy rate of 71.16 percent, accredited internship and residency programs in the areas of OB-GYN, surgery, medicine, and anesthesia.

History

History. The Manitoba-Saskatchewan Conference was formed in 1932 to meet the economic problems created by the 1930s depression. The older component of this union was the Manitoba Conference (organized in 1903), at that time comprising the territories of Manitoba and Northwestern Ontario. Originally Manitoba was a mission territory assigned to the Northern Union Conference. Saskatchewan was first organized as a mission field in 1907 and five years later as a conference. Since the union of the conferences, the only territorial change has been the transfer in 1960 of the northwestern part of Ontario to the Ontario-Quebec Conference.

The first convert in the territory known today as the Manitoba-Saskatchewan Conference was George Ross, of McLean, Saskatchewan. His conversion in 1887 resulted from his study of Seventh-day Adventist publications lent to him by a friend who had been receiving them from California. Diedrich Neufeld, who homesteaded near Rosthern, Saskatchewan, in 1893 was probably the first Seventh-day Adventist to settle in the area. Neil McGill claimed to be the first SDA in Manitoba; he attributed his conversion to the reading of Uriah Smith's Thoughts on Daniel and the Revelation. This is probably true, because C. H. and Addie Richards worked as colporteurs in Manitoba as early as 1889.

Beginnings of the Work in Manitoba. The first church in Manitoba was organized at Wakopa in 1893 by C. W. Flaiz. That same year Flaiz conducted in Hamiota the first series of public meetings held on the prairies. On July 22, 1894, the Morden church, a German congregation (in which the Nickel and Toews families were charter members) was organized three miles (five kilometers) south of Burwalde. On Dec. 19, 1894, W. H. Falconer organized the Austin church at McGregor (to which belonged Thomas Atkinson and the Greenslade brothers), and on Apr. 14, 1895, the Winnipeg church. The first Seventh-day Adventist church building in Manitoba was erected by the Austin church and dedicated during the general meetings held in McGregor, June 5—10, 1895.

Some of the early SDAs suffered Sunday law persecution. In 1895 Henry Whitehouse was arrested for picking up potatoes on Sunday on the Alcock farm, Gladstone, Manitoba. His sentence was $10 and costs, or in default thereof, 20 days in the common jail in Portage la Prairie. Two years later John McKelvy, of Wellington, Manitoba, served a sentence in the Portage la Prairie jail for Sunday labor. In that year (1897) occurred four other arrests. Edward Kelly, of Winnipeg, was fined $1 and costs for operating his barbershop on Sunday. When he refused, the bailiff seized about $40 worth of his goods to satisfy the fine. Jacob Nickel, of Morden, was arrested, but the case was dropped when he announced that he would choose jail rather than a fine. T. W. Hodgins and E. Martin, of McGregor, were fined for digging a well.

Late in 1896 J. C. Foster organized the Roden church. By Dec. 31, 1899, the membership in Manitoba had increased to 248, and two new churches had been organized. Work by the J. F. Gravelles resulted in a church at Killarney in January 1900, and one year later in another church at Whitemouth. By the autumn of 1901 there were nine organized churches in Manitoba.

The Manitoba Conference Organized. In July 1903 the Manitoba Conference, including what is now southeastern Saskatchewan (and probably also the western part of Ontario), was organized in the city of Winnipeg. Soon afterward the conference opened a school near Portage la Prairie, called Northwestern Training School (Portage Plains Academy). By 1911 there were only seven churches and one company in the Manitoba Conference, with a membership of 227. Two churches and the one company, comprising one third of the membership, were German. There was also a Scandinavian church. The Icelandic work was pioneered by Miss S. Johnson in the early 1900s. Three ordained ministers served the constituency—one English, the second German, and the third Scandinavian. During the next decade a number of new churches appeared, but there were also apostasies, which resulted in the disbanding of seven churches in one biennium. Because the tithe dropped from $15,103 in 1920 to $9,721.29 in 1923, the conference was forced to reduce its working staff by nearly half. Despite this reduction, from 1920 on, there was a steady growth in membership till it reached 564 in 1930. During this period work among the Ukrainians was initiated by J. H. Zachary and expanded by S. Demchuck and G. Soloniuk. New German congregations were organized in Winnipeg (1926) and at Whitemouth (1929), and an evangelistic campaign in Winnipeg, by F. W. Johnston, resulted in so many additions that the old Bannerman church was replaced by a new structure on Young Street. From 1926 through 1929 the conference was called (in the Statistical Report) the Manitoba and Western Ontario Conference.

Beginnings of the Work in Saskatchewan. The first series of meetings in Saskatchewan by an SDA minister was conducted in Yorkton by Henry Dirksen in 1898. Seventh-day Adventist teachings received little further publicity until 1906, when three series of meetings were staged—the first by Johan Peters in the home of E. Jorgers at Plain View, the second in Regina by F. H. Conway and Paul Curtis, and the third in Yorkton by Curtis. Conway organized a church at McLean in April, one of the earliest in the conference. The earliest church is believed to be the one at Waldheim, although records of its early history are lacking. This church originated from a home Sabbath school held in the log house of Diedrich Neufeld from 1893, when he settled on this homestead that later became the site of the town of Waldheim. The Sabbath school soon became a three-family school, rotating among the homes. By 1899 several other SDA families came, and according to the recollection of a charter member, the church was organized soon after, perhaps in 1900. For a time, beginning in 1904, the membership diminished through apostasy and migration. But at the camp meeting held in Regina, 1907, some members were reclaimed and others added. Soon after, the church was reorganized, and in 1910 the present church building was erected.

In 1907 three series of meetings were conducted simultaneously in Regina—the first by A. C. Gilbert and P. Curtis, the second by H. S. Shaw and F. H. Conway, and the third, in German, by C. Sulzle and B. C. Haak. One of the Shaw meetings was attended by several members of a Haynal family who were visiting in Regina. On leaving the meetings, they were given literature in their own language (Romanian), which they studied carefully. This brought about the conversion of a rather large family group and the organization of the Rouleau church on July 16, 1907. Later three others joined who had been prominent in the Nazarene Church and who had not dared openly to attend the Sulzle meetings but had listened outside in the darkness and then had surreptitiously visited Sulzle in his tent to learn more.

Within the next few years four more churches were organized. The first of these was established about 1910 at Fenwood as a result of an evangelistic campaign conducted by C. Sulzle; the second, the Hillesden church, organized a year later by A. C. Gilbert; the third, the Hodgeville church, organized in April 1912 as the result of the work of C. Sulzle, T. T. Babienco, and E. F. Locker; and the fourth, the Swift Current church, organized in June 1912, the result of the work of C. J. Rider and W. G. Forshaw.

The Saskatchewan Conference Organized. In 1912 the Saskatchewan churches were organized as a conference. At the end of that year there were nine churches, a total membership of 301, three ordained and three licensed ministers, and eight church school teachers. Within its 20 years of history the Saskatchewan Conference operated two institutions—treatment rooms in Saskatoon for five or six years, first under G. R. Close and later under M. L. Long, and Battleford Academy from 1916 to 1931.

Late in 1912, after the creation of the Saskatchewan Conference, churches were organized at Sonningdale and Dundurn, which were composed of SDA immigrants from the United States and from England, who, attracted by the offers of homesteads after Sir Wilfred Laurier became prime minister of Canada in 1896, had settled in Saskatchewan during a wave of immigration. Churches were also formed as a result of the missionary endeavors of other immigrants, such as Mrs. Charles Henkes in Canora, the Farnsworths at Sonningdale, whose distribution of SDA publications among their Russian neighbors resulted in churches at Beaver Creek and Borden, and the Hurlburt sisters, who started a chain reaction responsible for churches in the Macrorie district, at Surbiton, and at Samburg.

Because among these immigrants there were many from Continental Europe, the conference employed T. T. Babienco to work among the Russians; D. D. and J. D. Neufeld, O.

Ziprick, and Henry Berg to work for the Germans; and M. Ostoich, Theo. Diminyatz, T. M. Krainean, and B. Iliescu to evangelize the Serbians, Romanians, and Hungarians. By 1920 there were six German, three Russian, and three Romanian churches in the conference. English churches were established by M. Mackintosh, C. J. Rider, W. G. Forshaw, A. C. Gilbert, W. G. McCready, G. W. Rader, and William Brown, a layperson.

By the close of 1921 the Saskatchewan Conference had grown to 30 churches, with a membership of 1,190. In 1931 there were 1,371 members in 29 churches. Because of poor crops and financial problems, the tithe dropped from $46,258.30 in 1917 to $21,197.05 in 1922, making necessary a temporary cut in conference staff. By 1928 there was some improvement in the tithe, but when the 1930s depression and drought struck, the tithe reached an all-time low of $15,127.42 in 1931. In spite of salary cuts and austerity measures, eight or nine new churches appeared.

Manitoba-Saskatchewan Conference. In 1932 the Manitoba Conference (still including Western Ontario) and the Saskatchewan Conference united as the Manitoba-Saskatchewan Conference. At the close of that year there were 42 churches in the conference and 2,185 members. During the 1930s, which began with the depression and ended with the beginning of World War II, and which saw repeated crop failures, there was a continual exodus to other sections of Canada. Several churches closed; however, through continued evangelism new churches were organized. Even after economic recovery, between 1942 and 1952, the number of churches dropped from 41 to 30, but there was almost no change in membership. In the sixties there was a moderate growth. In 1960 western Ontario was transferred to the Ontario-Quebec Conference.

During the past two decades, because of the poor economic situation, large numbers of Seventh-day Adventists have moved from the rural areas into the cities. Many of the young people have gone off to Seventh-day Adventist colleges to be educated in other lines than agriculture. This has resulted in the closing of several country churches and companies. However, seven new churches and one company have been organized in provincial towns and cities.

The Manitoba-Saskatchewan Conference maintains one permanent campground, which is near the town of Theodore, Saskatchewan. It has an auditorium and several other buildings. It is used for camp meeting and summer youth camps.

Manley, Myrl Otis

MANLEY, MYRL OTIS (1913—1988). Missionary, educator, administrator. During his many years of service to the Seventh-day Adventist Church he served as principal of Vincent Hill School and as president of three colleges: Spicer Memorial College, Union College, and Caribbean Union College. He also was president of the Burma Union Mission. Perhaps his most outstanding contribution to the church pertained to mission fields in general, as he devised the mission orientation program at Andrews University.

Mann, Victor L.

MANN, VICTOR L. (1880—1951). Canadian-born physician, pioneer missionary in West Pakistan. He became a Seventh-day Adventist at 19 years of age, and after graduating in medicine from the University of Pennsylvania in 1909, joined the staff of the New England Sanitarium. He had married Adeline Bristol in 1905. In 1911 he went to Southern Asia, where he took charge of the SDA medical work in India and also edited a health journal. In 1913 he and F. H. Loasby went on a tour of investigation in West Pakistan and established a mission at Chuharkana, near Lahore. After eight years in Asia, Mann returned to the United States, took postgraduate work at Harvard University, worked at Wabash Valley Sanitarium for a short time, and then in 1921 joined the faculty of the College of Medical Evangelists, where he remained until his retirement in 1933. Soon after his retirement he received a Sc.D. degree in medicine from his alma mater.

Mansell, Ernest Price

MANSELL, ERNEST PRICE (1889—1974). Pioneer missionary, pastor. He was born in Minnesota, and was a successful colporteur at the age of 15. In World War I he was a conscientious objector, the first in the 13th Cavalry and subsequently in the Quartermaster Corps. In 1919 he married Edith Eleanor Windsor and studied at Emmanuel Missionary College. From 1920 to 1923 he served as publishing secretary for the New Jersey Conference and for the following four years served in that capacity for the Rio de Janeiro Mission. In 1927 he was appointed director of the Pernambuco Mission, a post he held until 1930. In that year the family moved to Portugal where they initiated new work in the Madeira Islands with Mansell serving as mission director until 1934. He was ordained to the gospel ministry in 1933, and the following year opened work in the Azores, serving as director of the mission there until 1940. He was then asked to pioneer the work in Portuguese East Africa, but en route the family was captured by the Imperial Japanese Army and spent three years in internment camps. In 1945 they reached Portuguese East Africa, and for the ensuing eight years Mansell directed the work in Mozambique.

After his retirement he was called to pastor churches with a significant Portuguese constituency in the Central California Conference.

Manson Academy

MANSON ACADEMY. A coeducational boarding school on the high school level operated from 1907 to 1915 by the British Columbia Conference at Pitt Meadows, some 20 miles (32 kilometers) east of Vancouver, British Columbia. The academy was established in 1907 on a 318-acre (130-hectare) farm donated to the conference for educational purposes by William Manson four years earlier. For some three years prior to 1907 a church school had been operated in a log house built by G. E. Johnson. The building also served as a meeting place for the SDA congregation. In 1908 a three-story dormitory building was erected. The academy closed in 1915 and the property was sold in 1919.

Principals: L. B. Ragsdale, 1907—1909; Kenneth R. Haughey, 1909—1912; C. E. Perry, 1912—1913; H. E. Giddings, 1913—1915.

Maplewood Academy

MAPLEWOOD ACADEMY. A coeducational boarding school on the senior high school level, operated at Hutchinson, Minnesota, by the Minnesota Conference. It is fully accredited by the SDA Board of Regents as well as by the University of Minnesota.

The predecessor of Maplewood Academy was the Minnesota Conference School, opened by Charles C. Lewis and others in Minneapolis in 1888. For many years this school was conducted in the basement of the Seventh-day Adventist church at the corner of Fourth Avenue South and Lake Street and had a yearly attendance of more than 100 students, among whom were many who are now prominent workers in the denomination. Later the school moved to a three-story hotel building in Anoka and became known as Minnesota Industrial School. The growing need for a suitable permanent school led to the purchase of a site three miles (five kilometers) northeast of Maple Plain. Here Maplewood was established in 1904, and later in succeeding years its facilities were enlarged.

At the spring meeting of 1928 the General Conference Committee considered the advisability of uniting Hutchinson Theological Seminary with Maplewood Academy and moving the latter institution to Hutchinson. To this both the Norwegian-Danish and the Minnesota Conference constituencies agreed, and the merger was effected.

The 20-acre (eight-hectare) campus is situated on a prominence commanding a view of the surrounding country. The three-story administration building, a Hutchinson landmark, also served as both boys' and girls' dormitory for a number of years and contained the bindery as well.

In 1963 the girls moved into new quarters, and the boys in 1969, with room for 130 students in each dormitory. In 1980 a new administration building was constructed to replace the former structure. This new building houses the offices, classrooms, and a chapel that will seat about 400.

A music building stands on the south end of the campus, and houses the Home Economics Department and a basement cafeteria and kitchen. An auditorium-gym completed in 1967 is used for physical education, social activities, and camp meeting convocations. At the edge of the North Woods a church seating 700 accommodates both students and community members. In addition, the North Woods serves as an outdoor meeting place, a recreational area for the students, and a camp meeting site.

Maracle, Charles Gordon

MARACLE, CHARLES GORDON (1900—1967). Minister, graphic arts specialist, board member. He was born in Deseronto, Canada, and at the age of 12 moved with his parents to Toronto. His ambitions to become a master printer began to be realized when he worked as a compositor in what is now known as the Maracle Press, Limited. In years to come he became presiding chairperson of the organization. He also served five years in Washington, D.C., as superintendent in charge of production at the Review and Herald Publishing Association. In 1921 he married Edna Leach. Ordained to the ministry in 1937, he served as pastor to two churches.

As a recognized authority in the field of graphic arts he became well known as a specialist in management, production planning, estimating, and cost accounting for an efficient printing plant. He served with distinction as a member of the national advisory board of the church in Canada. He also pioneered the work of Seventh-day Adventist public relations with the government at Ottawa.

Maranatha Adventist Secondary School

MARANATHA ADVENTIST SECONDARY SCHOOL (Colegio Adventista Maranatha). A school sponsored by the North Dominican Conference and located in San Francisco de Macorís, Dominican Republic. Founded in 1958, it offers classes from kindergarten through grade 12. In 1993, 95 students were enrolled, with seven teachers.

Maranatha Volunteers International

MARANATHA VOLUNTEERS INTERNATIONAL. A ministry registered under the name Maranatha Flights International in 1969. It was founded as a nonprofit organization by John Freeman, a Seventh-day Adventist commercial photographer. He operated out of his home in Berrien Springs, Michigan.

In 1989 Maranatha Flights International merged with Virginia-based Volunteers International, whose president was Robert Bainum. At the same time, the ministry's name was changed to Maranatha Volunteers International and headquarters were relocated to Sacramento, California.

Maranatha coordinates volunteer laborers who then help fund and construct urgently needed buildings throughout the world field. The organization works closely alongside the Seventh-day Adventist Church as a supporting ministry but encourages Christian volunteers from all denominations to join short-term mission teams.

The word “maranatha” is of Aramaic origin and means “Jesus, come quickly.” By constructing buildings in which people can learn more about Jesus, Maranatha contributes to the evangelism priorities of the church.

Every year nearly 2,500 volunteers from all walks of life spend their vacation on short-term building projects, international or stateside, orchestrated from start to finish by the Maranatha staff. An individual volunteer or group of volunteers chooses a project based on location and desired length of time—usually between one week and one month.

There is always a need for skilled contractors, masons, plumbers, electricians, and carpenters on each project site. An unskilled worker who has a sincere desire and willingness to help wherever needed also possesses an “essential skill” for construction.

From its founding through 1993 Maranatha has mobilized about 25,000 volunteers, worked in approximately 50 countries, and completed nearly 800 projects valued at more than $31 million.

Maranatha's magazine, The Volunteer, is printed six times a year and is free to all requesting a subscription. Among its many features is a project selection list, with every upcoming project, its leader, and date of construction.

The Maranatha Guide to Adventure is Maranatha's own instructive guide to short-term missions. It is composed of three components: a comprehensive handbook, an inspiring video, and a useful set of cards. Drawn from more than 25 years of experience in sending volunteers to developing countries, this practical how-to guide is valuable for short-term mission experience in general, beyond its function of helping Maranatha volunteers. MGA may be purchased through the corporate headquarters at 1600 Sacramento Inn Way, Suite 116, Sacramento, California 95815.

Maria Trinidad Sanchez Secondary School

MARIA TRINIDAD SANCHEZ SECONDARY SCHOOL (Colegio Adventista Maria Trinidad Sanchez). A primary and secondary school located in La Romana, Dominican Republic. It is owned by the East Dominican Mission. This Seventh-day Adventist school opened its doors to the La Romana community for the first time in 1953, with an enrollment of seven students whose first teacher was Professor Luisa Monte de Oca, supervised by the local church board.

In its beginnings the school was called Colegio Adventista Ranfi. Classes were taught in the church building. Four years later two small classrooms were constructed on the church grounds. In 1962 the name was changed to Colegio Adventista Maria Trinidad Sanchez.

Toward the end of the 1960s the church bought a house adjacent to the school, where it started an intermediate school, remaining there for a period of seven years.

In the early 1970s the construction of new facilities was started by Rafael Familia, the school director, and his wife, Norma. The construction was completed in 1980.

The high school level began between the years 1978 and 1980, receiving the state authorization in 1981 and being accredited in 1985. In 1993 there were 315 students in the primary level and 93 in the secondary level. Of the school's 12 teachers, six teach on the secondary level.

Marienhöhe Seminary

MARIENHÖHE SEMINARY (Schulzentrum Seminar Marienhöhe). A coeducational boarding school on the high school/senior college level situated on the outskirts of Darmstadt, Germany. It has three state-accredited divisions, namely, the gymnasium (secondary school), the Kolleg, and the two-year bilingual secretarial course. The school is owned by the Euro-Africa Division and is operated by a board of directors. It mainly serves union conferences of Germany. In 1993 the enrollment was 608 for all school branches and the school staff totaled 94 (teachers, deans, and administration, full-time and part-time).

The school is situated on partly wooded, rolling land. The original estate included a large building containing the auditorium, classrooms, and also living quarters for girls. The other buildings on the campus include a large classroom building, a men's dormitory, a women's dormitory, a gymnasium, and a large building for administration, library, dining hall, kitchen, and church. There are two apartment houses for teachers on the campus, and also buildings for the small farm and workshops. Several apartments for teachers have been built between the campus and the city.

The state-accredited nine-year gymnasium (grades 5 through 13) grants the state-recognized Abitur, which is necessary for entrance into German universities. Prerequisite is a four-year elementary school course. The Oberstufe (upper level, grades 11 through 13) of the gymnasium has a course system with majors and minors. According to their abilities and future plans, students choose course combinations, retaining a number of compulsory subjects that provide a broad general education.

A second possibility (Kolleg) is open to students who already have completed a vocational training; they have been integrated within the upper level program for the Abitur.

The theological seminary was located on this campus until 1994, when it was moved to Friedensau in the eastern part of Germany. The seminary was first opened in 1921 at Kirchheim/Teck, Wurttemberg, under the name of Central European Missionary Seminary. The next year the school was moved to Bad Aibling in Bavaria, where it was called the Aibling Seminary. In the school year 1924—1925 the school moved to Marienhohe and opened with two school buildings. Teachers lived in three apartment houses. The following courses were given: six-year ministerial, higher education, commercial, prenursing, home economics, and kindergarten teaching. Seven industrial shops were established. The ministerial students engaged in canvassing with Seventh-day Adventist publications every Wednesday.

When in 1934 the Prediger-und Missionsseminar Neandertal, situated at Mettmann, Rhineland (established in 1921 by the West German Union Conference), was closed because of political pressure, it was incorporated into the Marienhöhe Seminary; then from 1939 to 1947 the Marienhöhe school was closed. After the war both schools opened again separately, at Marienhöhe and at Mettmann (Neandertal), in 1948. In 1949, the state-accredited gymnasium (grades 5—13) was founded at Marienhöhe. The Neandertal school was closed again in 1952 and was again absorbed by the Seminar Marienhöhe.

In the years 1988—1993 the school went through considerable change and development. A secretarial course was founded in 1988 and accredited in 1992. A German language course began in August 1992. A realschule (grades 7—10), prerequisite for many kinds of vocational training, was begun in 1993. In 1992 the school was declared to be an Associated School of Europe by the education ministry. This status brings financial advantages and help for projects concerned with inter-European contacts.

Marion County Hospital

MARION COUNTY HOSPITAL. A former accredited, modern, 38-bed general hospital in Jefferson, Texas, that served approximately 10,000 people. The local medical staff was supplemented by physician specialists from surrounding towns. Marion County Hospital was constructed and was owned by the Marion County Hospital district. Prior to the opening of the institution in September 1969, the hospital district board entered into a five-year lease agreement with the Texas Conference of Seventh-day Adventists for the operation of the hospital. In 1974 this lease was renewed for 25 years.

In 1980 operation of the Marion County Hospital was taken over by Adventist Health System/Sunbelt Health Care Corporation. After continued financial losses the hospital was divested in 1986.

Marion Party

MARION PARTY. An offshoot movement of the mid-1860s (based in Marion, Iowa) that absorbed the remnants of an earlier defecting group in Michigan and finally became an organized denomination.

“Hope of Israel” Party (1858). About the beginning of 1858 in Michigan, Gilbert Cranmer was refused a license to preach until he would stop using tobacco and would solve certain home problems. Upon his refusal, Cranmer went out on his own to preach, and obtained a few followers among Seventh-day Adventists. In 1863 these defectors revived the defunct Messenger of Truth (see Messenger Party) and changed its name to The Hope of Israel (not to be confused with the journal of that name in Portland, Maine). The emphasis of the new offshoot group was on liberty to use tobacco and to indulge in other practices disapproved of by SDAs. The Hope of Israel lasted about two years before it was discontinued for lack of financial support, and the Cranmer group united with a group led by two Iowa ministers that became known as the Marion Party.

Marion Party (1866). A defection began in 1865 in Iowa with the first president and secretary of the newly organized Iowa Conference. These two were, respectively, B. F. Snook, a former Methodist minister, and W. H. Brinkerhoff, a former lawyer, both SDAs since about 1860. Opposed to a strong church organization, both these ministers carried on a campaign of criticism and stirred up disaffection in Iowa against the general leadership of the SDA Church, particularly against James and Ellen White.

The conference constituency in July 1865 replaced Snook by George I. Butler. Thereupon Snook, accompanied by Brinkerhoff, drew away some of the members and in 1866 established headquarters of a new offshoot group at Marion, Iowa, for which reason they were thereafter denominated the Marion party. They also drew to themselves some unaffiliated groups of Adventists and the adherents of Gilbert Cranmer’s earlier party in Michigan, whose defunct paper The Hope of Israel they revived and issued thereafter under various names, with several interruptions. The movement failed to enlist many SDAs. Snook abandoned this group and became a Universalist minister. Brinkerhoff returned to his earlier profession, the practice of law.

Church of God (Seventh Day). The “Marion party” became known as the Church of God (Adventist), and later established headquarters at Stanberry, Missouri. This church retained observance of the seventh-day Sabbath but differed on several points, such as the millennium. It held the theory that Christ was crucified on Wednesday and rose on Saturday and taught that the Lord’s Supper should be observed annually at the time of the Passover. One offshoot from the Stanberry group was organized in 1933 as the Church of God (Seventh Day) in Salem, West Virginia; it reunited with its parent in 1949 and the merger, with headquarters in Denver, has since been called the Church of God (Seventh Day), Denver, Colorado. There remains an unmerged group, the Church of God (Seventh Day) at Salem, West Virginia. (See Frank S. Mead, Handbook of Denominations, 1961 ed., p. 75.) Several smaller splinter groups exist also.

The Radio Church of God, at Pasadena, California, an independent group operating a broadcast, a paper, and a school, was founded by a former minister of the Church of God (Adventist) and later of the Church of God (Seventh Day), but it differs doctrinally from both and from Seventh-day Adventists.

Maritime Academy

MARITIME ACADEMY. A school operated from 1903 to 1932 by the Maritime Conference in Canada. It was opened in 1903 by George McCready Price as the Farmington Industrial Academy on a 250-acre (100-hectare) tract donated for a school by Daniel Dimock. Because the land was too rocky and hilly to make the school farm a success, the school was moved after two years to a 200-acre (80-hectare) farm at Williamsdale, Nova Scotia, and renamed Williamsdale Academy. When this site proved unsatisfactory, in 1919 the academy was moved to Memramcook, New Brunswick, and was called the Maritime Academy. It operated at Memramcook until it was closed in 1932 because of the economic depression.

Principals: George McCready Price, 1903—1904; Gertrude Williams Worden, 1904—1905; E. E. Gardner, 1905—1909; J. L. Stansbury, 1909—1912; Thomas D. Rowe, 1912—1914; L. O. History

History. Beginnings in the Area. In 1862 R. O'Brien, of Walton, Nova Scotia, accepted the Sabbath from reading Andrew's History of the Sabbath. In 1878 John R. Israel, a Nova Scotian who had become a Seventh-day Adventist in the U.S., held meetings in Digby County. About the same time two laymen named Gelotte and Sawyer distributed SDA publications and held meetings in homes in Victoria County, New Brunswick. Prince Edward Island was entered in 1891, when colporteurs sold 1,400 copies of Bible Readings there. The next year H. W. Cottrell and R. S. Webber held a series of meetings in Summerside.

The earliest converts in the Maritimes were two or three won in Israel's meetings at Tiverton in 1878. They were probably the family of Byron Outhouse. The earliest known Sabbathkeeper in New Brunswick, according to George McCready Price, was his uncle, George McCready, who attributed his conversion about 1884 to the reading of Seventh Day Baptist literature. Several years later an SDA colporteur, A. J. Rice, won the first converts in Moncton and Saint John. Mary Ann Clary is believed to have been the earliest adherent on Prince Edward Island.

In 1887 I. E. Kimball began regular public evangelism in the Maritimes. His series of meetings in Temperance Hall, Halifax, resulted in six converts, two of whom, Mrs. Patterson and Mrs. Hunt, of Dartmouth, became in 1900 charter members of the Halifax church. Also in 1887 David A. Corkham, an 1886 convert of Israel, began an evangelistic career, working first at Truro, Nova Scotia, where he collaborated with A. J. Rice in conducting meetings. In the spring of 1888 he moved to Tantallon, where as a result of his work three were baptized and a church of nine organized on Aug. 12—the first Seventh-day Adventist church in the Maritimes. That same summer he organized a Sabbath school in Scott's Bay. In Indian Harbor and also in Tiverton, where John Israel had earlier sown the seed, he was in large measure responsible for the organization of two churches in 1889.

By 1890 there were three organized churches in Nova Scotia—Tantallon, Tiverton, and Indian Harbor—and there were small companies at Truro and Scott's Bay, and isolated members in Halifax, Dartmouth, French Village, Chester, Moncton (New Brunswick), New Glasgow, and Saint John (New Brunswick). About this time the church building in Tantallon was erected. A new church replaced the original Tantallon church in 1975.

In Moncton on Aug. 28, 1891, H. W. Cottrell launched the first public Seventh-day Adventist meetings in New Brunswick. The resulting church was organized on the following May 15. This congregation secured without cost the old Free Meeting House, built in 1821, and renovated it. A year later, Oct. 14, 1893, after a series of meetings conducted by R. S. Webber and F. I. Richardson, a second SDA church in New Brunswick was organized in Saint John, and other churches were organized at Annapolis, Nova Scotia (1895), Hopewell Cape, New Brunswick (1896), Scott's Bay, New Brunswick (1896), Elgin, New Brunswick (1896), St. Martin's, New Brunswick (1897), and Greenfield, Nova Scotia (1898). On Aug. 11, 1899, G. E. Langdon began a series of meetings in Halifax, Nova Scotia, which ended in 1900 with the founding of a church of 20 members in that city.

By June 30, 1897, there were in the Maritime region nine churches and 160 members. Levi Longard, a member of the Tantallon church, was active in the colporteur work and in evangelism for nearly 30 years, forming a company in West Jeddare, Nova Scotia, about 1900. At the time of the General Conference session of 1901 there were 11 churches and 215 members.

Troubles came early to both workers and converts. Corkham was rescued from a mob at Tantallon, and H. J. Farman found that someone had cut every rope around his tent during his meetings at Greenfield. As early as 1889 two members, James Dauphinee and Stephen Longard, were fined for Sunday labor, and in 1897 two others were accused but not prosecuted.

The Maritime Conference Organized. The 1889 Yearbook lists New Brunswick and Nova Scotia as part of the Maine Conference. From 1890 to 1902 the area was the Maritime mission in District no. 1. In 1902 the Maritime Conference was organized during the general meeting held at Saint John, New Brunswick, with G. E. Langdon as the first president. There were 11 churches and 230 members.

Subsequent History. In 1903 the Farmington Industrial Academy, later known as the Maritime Academy, was established. During the first decade following the organization of the conference, evangelistic meetings were held in Charlottetown and in Montagu, Prince Edward Island, which met with great prejudice and opposition. Meetings held by W. R. Andrews in Fredericton, New Brunswick, were more successful, and a church building was dedicated May 31, 1903. In 1911 J. A. Strickland pitched a tent in Harvey, where despite violent opposition 20 persons were baptized. Later, two of these converts, Gilbert Graham and Robert Embleton, were arrested and fined for hauling hay on Sunday.

Between 1912 and 1921 the membership in the Maritimes grew from 232 to 415. The work was carried on largely in three centers—North Sydney, New Glasgow, and Carlingford. Churches were organized at Sydney Mines (1914), North Sydney (1915), New Glasgow (1919), and Carlingford (New Brunswick). In Charlottetown a few converts were won, but it was many years before a church was established.

In the terrible explosion that rocked the city of Halifax in 1917, the little Seventh-day Adventist church building (dedicated on Jan. 10, 1904) was damaged beyond repair. A child of one of the members lost her life.

Because of a depression that swept the area after passage of the Fordney-McCumber tariff of 1922, which wrecked the fishing industry, SDAs joined the exodus to the United States, and the membership in the Maritimes dropped from 415 to 306 from 1922 to 1926. During the time when the new Halifax church building was under construction, fully half of the members moved away.

From 1926 there was a gradual growth in membership. New congregations were organized at Barnesville, New Brunswick (1929), through the work of R. H. Cooke, Arthur Kierstead, and Owen A. Munroe; in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, through the work of F. W. Johnston (1936); more recently in Middleton (1948), Minto (1952), and Fredericton (1961) in New Brunswick; and in Nova Scotia at Fox Point (1955), Barrington (1957), Bridgewater (1959), Sydney (1959), and Dartmouth (1960). In Barrington and Fredericton there had been churches that had disbanded, and in Fox Point and Minto there had been companies for many years. Since 1932, when the membership stood at 362, about 300 members have been added each decade. The 1993 membership was 1,639, with 26 churches. Throughout the years the number of workers has remained generally constant.

The first youth camp in the Maritimes was held in 1942. Three years later a permanent site was purchased at Pugwash, on the shores of Northumberland Strait. Originally intended as a junior campsite, it was gradually developed to accommodate the annual camp meetings, with dining room, auditorium, washrooms, and cabins.

The medical work was never developed in the Maritimes. Beginning in 1947, Dr. Martin Hoehn operated a hospital in Riverside, New Brunswick, but the project was abandoned after only a few years of operation.

The number of church schools in the Maritimes fluctuated with passing years. As early as 1899, a Miss Curth conducted a family school in the Dimock home at Farmington. Two years later George McCready Price taught a church school in Saint John. From 1904 to 1944, as the need required, Mrs. Martin Kierstead taught a small school in her home. After 1919 several church schools existed intermittently, the one with the longest record being the Carlingford school. In September 1962 there were three junior academies—at Halifax, Nova Scotia, Moncton, New Brunswick, and Barnesville, New Brunswick. During 1974 new multiroom schools were built at Halifax and Barnesville. In 1981 Sandy Lake Academy, located near Halifax, began operating as a 12-grade school.

Mark of the Beast

MARK OF THE BEAST. In Rev. 13 an identifying “mark” that represents submission to the authority of the first, or leopardlike, beast mentioned in the chapter, during the time of its eschatological revival, when an attempt is made to extend its authority over the entire world. Like most of the Revelation, the thirteenth chapter is essentially symbolic. In the imagery of the chapter the first beast represents a human religious system allied with the supernatural powers of evil, and opposed to God in the person of those on earth who choose to be loyal to Him (vs. 1, 2, 7). The second, or lamblike beast, is presented as the agent by which the authority of the first beast is made universal (v. 12). The device used to force compliance is to require a “mark” of allegiance of all in their forehead (mental assent) or in their hand (outward conformity). The announced alternative to compliance is the application of extreme economic sanctions, and eventually the death penalty (vs. 15—17). In the Revelation the mark of the beast stands in contradistinction to the seal of God (Rev. 7:2—4). See also Revelation, Interpretation of.

In general, commentaries on the Apocalypse prior to the fourteenth century are content to explain the mark of the beast simply as a mark of the coming antichrist. From the fourteenth century onward pre-Reformation and Protestant expositors have identified it as a mark of submission to the Papacy. Walter Brute, a Wycliffite writer on prophecy, considered it to be the supposedly indelible imprint made by the sacraments of the Roman Catholic Church upon those who receive them (L. E. Froom, Prophetic Faith of Our Fathers, vol. 2, p. 86). Others, such as John Purvey, who, upon Wycliff’s death, took his place, regarded the mark received in the hand to be compliance with works prescribed by the church, and on the forehead, as the public profession of papal teachings (ibid., p. 99). Reformation writers identified it as subservience to the canons, decrees, and traditions of Rome or Rome’s power to excommunicate (ibid., pp. 300, 306, 342, 367, 461, 462, 616, 617, 678). New World expositors took a similar view of it (ibid., vol. 3, pp. 40, 96, 353; vol. 4, pp. 95, 247).

From the beginning Seventh-day Adventists have connected the mark of the beast with the observance in the future of Rome’s counterfeit of the Bible Sabbath, when it will be enforced by law and observed as a token of submission to Roman authority.

In the second edition of his pamphlet The Seventh Day Sabbath, a Perpetual Sign (January 1847), Joseph Bates asked (p. 59), “Is it not clear that the first day of the week for the Sabbath or holy day [of which he speaks on page 57 as “a perpetual covenant” of allegiance to the true God] is a mark of the beast?” Writing to Bates in April 1847, Ellen White identified receiving the mark of the beast as the act of giving up “God’s Sabbath,” and keeping “the Pope’s [sabbath]” (A Word to the “Little Flock,” p. 19). James White similarly wrote: “The observance of the first day as a day of holy rest, instead of the seventh, is a mark of the beast, it undoubtedly is the mark mentioned in the solemn message of the third angel” (Present Truth 1:68, April 1850).

In 1851 Roswell F. Cottrell called the mark of the beast “the counterfeit sabbath of Rome” (Review and Herald 2:40, Oct. 7, 1851). J. N. Andrews spoke of the mark as an “institution of papacy, enforced by Protestantism” (The Three Messages of Revelation XIV, 6—12, 1860 ed., p. 99).

Perhaps the earliest full Seventh-day Adventist statement on the mark of the beast occurs in an article by J. N. Loughborough in 1854: “The Sabbath is a sign between God and His people [Ex. 31:13—18 and Ex. 20:19, 20 previously cited]; hence it seals His law as genuine. As the seal of an earthly monarch is a sign between him and His subjects, so the Sabbath is a sign between the Lord and his subjects, that they may know Him from all others. Take this fourth commandment from the ten, and the seal of the living God is gone, and the knowledge of their author is taken from us. Here is where Papacy has aimed a blow. The Pope has taken away the seal of the living God, and the ten commandments as taught by him do not contain it. . . . [Cites catechism on the substitution of Sunday for the Sabbath on the basis of church authority.] In place of God’s seal or mark, we have Sunday attached to the law. It does not point out the living God but claims to be instituted on the authority of the Papal church. Yea, it points to the Pope. It is ‘the mark of the beast.’ The two-horned beast is to cause all ‘to receive a mark in their right hand, or in their foreheads.’ We do not suppose that this is a mark, visible in the forehead; but as we have already shown, it is Sunday. The forehead is the seat of the mind. There the decision is made by men whether they will keep this institution or not. This mark is also to be received in the right hand” (Review and Herald 5:75, 79, Mar. 28, 1854).

Just what the reception of the mark in the right hand might be Loughborough was not sure, but suggested the raising of the right hand in taking an oath to observe Sunday, in order to secure exemption from the economic sanctions of Rev. 13:16, 17. He was clear, however, in making it “an event yet future.”

In his classic commentary, Thoughts on the Revelation (1865, i.e., 1867), Uriah Smith, foremost early Seventh-day Adventist expositor of Bible prophecy, wrote: “To receive the mark of the beast in the forehead, is, we understand, to give the assent of the mind and judgment to his [the first beast’s] authority, in the adoption of that institution which constitutes the mark; to receive it in the hand is to signify allegiance by some outward act. The mark is the mark, not of the two-horned beast, nor of the image of the beast, but of the papal beast. . . . The mark of the beast is understood to be a counterfeit Sabbath which is erected in opposition to the Sabbath of Jehovah, which we have shown on chap. vii, 1—3, to be the seal of the living God” (p. 224).

Seventh-day Adventists emphatically deny that anyone now has the mark of the beast. For instance, James White in an 1852 editorial stated: “We do not teach that those ‘that keep the first day as a Sabbath, and they that believe the Sabbath is abolished, have the mark of the beast’” (Review and Herald 2:100, Mar. 2, 1852).

As he goes on to explain, it is only after the Sabbath message has been fully proclaimed and after the observance of the first day of the week is enforced by law that this line of demarcation between the faithful and the unfaithful will be drawn. A number of years later Uriah Smith wrote in similar vein. “We do not hold that Sunday-keeping will constitute the mark of the beast, till enforced by the government in direct opposition to the Sabbath of the Lord” (Review and Herald 44:52, July 28, 1874).

Ellen White stressed this aspect of the subject in 1888: “When Sunday observance shall be enforced by law, and the world shall be enlightened concerning the obligation of the true Sabbath, then whoever shall transgress the command of God, to obey a precept which has no higher authority than that of Rome, will thereby honor popery above God. . . . They will thereby accept the sign of allegiance to Rome—'the mark of the beast'" (GC 449; Ev 233, 234).

In 1899 she declared: "No one has yet received the mark of the beast. The testing time has not yet come. There are true Christians in every church, not excepting the Roman Catholic communion. None are condemned until they have had the light and have seen the obligation of the fourth commandment" (Ev 234).

Marmon, Ilka Mendes Reis

MARMON, ILKA MENDES REIS (1906—1989). Bible instructor, secretary. Born in Minas Gerais, Brazil, she attended Brazil College after joining the Seventh-day Adventist Church. After graduating in 1935, she was called to work as a Bible instructor in Rio Grande do Sul and later at her birthplace, Minas Gerais, and also in São Paulo.

In 1944 she became the first secretary to the Voice of Prophecy in Brazil—with no typewriter and a borrowed desk! In spite of this lack, she established the substructure for the Bible correspondence school.

In later years she moved to the United States, where she married James Marmon. She served as secretary to George Vandeman of It Is Written and also served as chaplain in a California hospital.

Marsh, Joseph

MARSH, JOSEPH (1802—1863). Editor of The Christian Palladium, an organ of the Christian church, and pastor of a Christian church at Union Mills, New York; later editor of the Millerite Voice of Truth (afterward called the Advent Harbinger) at Rochester, New York.

For a brief period following the Millerite disappointment of Oct. 22, 1844, he held that the proclamation of the tenth day of the seventh month was the “midnight cry” and that the prophetic time reckoning was correct. Even though he gave up this idea, he held aloof from the Albany Conference (April 1845), at which the main group of Seventh-day Adventists organized (see Millerite Movement).

He later went over to the “Literalist” view, with its “Judaistic” millennium (see Premillennialism), which was opposed by Himes and the principal Adventist leaders, as well as by the Sabbatarian Adventists. His Advent Harbinger around 1850 carried his editorials and also articles by Crosier, Storrs, and others, opposing the Sabbath and teaching the “Judaistic” millennium. His book The Age to Come became a rallying point for a minority party known as “Age-to-Come Adventists,” which won a few adherents from among the developing Seventh-day Adventist group (see Messenger Party).

Marshall Islands Mission Academy

MARSHALL ISLANDS MISSION ACADEMY. A 12-grade school on the Majuro atoll in the Marshall Islands. Marshall Islands Mission Academy is a coeducational day school operated by the Guam-Micronesia Mission. Situated in the population center of Delap, the school serves the educational needs of the Marshallese population on the Majuro atoll and several surrounding atolls. In 1993 the enrollment in the secondary grades was 170, with a teaching staff of eight and a graduating class of 32. The total preschool-12 enrollment in 1993 was 507.

The forerunner of the school was the first Seventh-day Adventist school in the Marshall Islands, founded by Sid Nelson in 1968. Situated at the opposite end of the atoll in the community of Laura, this small rural school of 80 students continues today as a K-8 program serving the Laura area. Marshall Islands Mission Academy opened its doors for the first time in January 1980. Founded on its current site in Delap by the then-district leader Walter Barber, the elementary portion of the school had begun one and a half years earlier. During the first few years of operation the buildings were shared by both elementary and secondary classes, with the academy meeting from 2:30 p.m. to 7:15 p.m. In 1984 a Thirteenth Sabbath overflow offering provided a major portion of the funding to construct a new classroom building and allow a more normal teaching schedule.

Marshall Islands Mission Academy continues to serve the Marshall Islands and the outreach work of the Seventh-day Adventist Church. During its brief history from 1980 to 1993 it has helped establish four additional educational institutions in the Marshalls. The educational work has truly been the opening wedge for the Seventh-day Adventist Church in the Marshall Islands.

Principals: Gale Crosby, 1979—1980; Bill Clawson, 1980—1981; Gary Wilson, 1981—1984; Mervin Kesler, 1984—1989; Bruce Lane, 1989— .

Marshall, Jesse Simon

MARSHALL, JESSE SIMON (1888—1960). Educator and administrator in Latin America. It appears that he grew up in a Seventh-day Adventist family, but did not join the church until he heard a public appeal by Ellen White. Upon conversion he determined to devote his life to missionary service, and enrolled in the ministerial course at Emmanuel Missionary College. In 1914 he became a teacher of history and dean of men at Southern Training School. After this school was succeeded by Southern Junior College, he retained his positions for another two years, until 1918. After graduating from Emmanuel Missionary College in 1919, he went to South America as president and business manager of the River Plate Junior College in Argentina. He was ordained in 1929. In 1934, after 15 years as president of the college, he went to the Antillian Union Mission to serve as educational and MV secretary, and two years later took charge of the administration and development of the Antillian Junior College. He returned to the United States in 1947 and the following year became business manager of Sunnysdale Academy in Centralia, Missouri, where he served for a period of two years.

Martinique

MARTINIQUE. An island in the Lesser Antilles (West Indies) and an overseas department of France, lying 25 miles (40 kilometers) south of Dominica and 20 miles (32 kilometers) north of St. Lucia. It has an area of 425 square miles (1,100 square kilometers). Mount Pelé, in the north, is the highest point (4,583 feet [1,400 meters]). Martinique (Madinina), discovered by Christopher Columbus in 1502, was first colonized by the French in 1635 and has remained in their possession ever since. In 1946 it became a department of France. The population (1991) is 365,000. The capital, Fort-de-France, has a population of 110,000. Martinique is strongly Roman Catholic, the Protestants constituting only a small percentage of the population. The most important non-Catholic denomination is the Seventh-day Adventist Church, which, after a slow and difficult beginning, is now firmly established and is progressing rapidly.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Sometime before November 1919, Philip Giddings, a Seventh-day Adventist missionary from British Guiana, visited Martinique, won one convert, and interested another man. In November he reported a second visit (Review and Herald 96:25, Nov. 20, 1919) in which he converted the interested man. In 1924 he established his home at Fort-de-France, and held services in his house. A few months later a Sabbath school was organized, and the first four converts were baptized. Giddings visited the towns and villages of the island, going from house to house teaching SDA beliefs, selling Bibles and books, holding cottage meetings, and baptizing here and there. When he left for Haiti in 1928 he was succeeded by Michel Nord Isaac from Haiti, whose series of meetings in the town of Trinité led to the organization there of the first SDA church on the island in 1929. The second church was organized in the same year at Fort-de-France. It was also in 1929 that the French West Indian Mission (comprising the territories of Martinique and Guadeloupe and its dependencies) was organized with two churches, 48 baptized members, and one ordained minister. The work has grown rapidly since, with 13,215 members reported in 1993 in the Martinique Conference.

Education

Education. On July 22, 1954, the mission committee voted to open its first school in a small room attached to the West Fort-de-France church. Mrs. Lisette Moutachy was the first teacher of 18 pupils in the first grade.

After two years in the small room, the school was transferred to its present location on the eastern side of Fort-de-France. The present school, Kerlys, is located on a 21,500-square-foot (2,000-square-meter) piece of land, the purchase of which was authorized in 1954.

Owing to the large enrollment at Kerlys (537 in 1993, with 216 on the secondary level) and the desire to make Christian education available for the youth of the whole island as well as other French-speaking peoples of the Caribbean, it was voted to buy approximately 125 acres (50 hectares) of land in the St. Luce area for the establishment of a boarding secondary school. This school opened in September 1974 with capacity for receiving 120 boarding students.

His first mission appointment was at Ikizu Training School in Tanganyika (now Tanzania) in 1943. In 1945 he was united in marriage to Merle Wilson. The couple eventually moved to Bugema Mission College in Uganda, where they taught for several years and then went to Kamagambo Training School, where Marx served as principal. Masanga Leprosy Hospital

MASANGA LEPROSY HOSPITAL. A 200-bed institution owned by the Sierra Leone government and operated on behalf of the government of Sierra Leone by the Seventh-day Adventist Church. It is a specialty hospital, operated primarily for the care and treatment of leprosy patients, although some nonleprosy patients are treated by visiting surgical specialists. The church first began to operate this institution in 1965 as a leprosarium, and patients entered for several months or possibly years of residential treatment. Currently, patients are treated as inpatients for a few weeks and then discharged to their homes for continued treatment as outpatients. Some patients with surgical problems or other complications are admitted for longer periods.

Masanga began admitting tuberculosis patients in 1991. Forty out of 200 beds are allocated for these patients.

An active Physiotherapy Department assists greatly in the rehabilitation of many patients. Selected patients are taught woodworking and tailoring as part of a rehabilitation scheme. Outpatient treatment for two large districts in Sierra Leone is given to approximately 12,000 patients annually.

Master Guide

MASTER GUIDE (originally called Master Comrade). A class originated by the General Conference Youth Department in 1928.

The Master Guide Course has been structured as a natural flow on from the Guide course, and its content is such as would have appeal and interest to a 16- to 19-year-old. It was felt that the Pathfinder organization would be failing if it does not promote a course that encouraged young people beyond the Pathfinder age to continue with the club and become aware of the value of leadership skills.

Because of its closely connected work with Pathfinders, this class is seen as a transition between Pathfinder ministry and senior youth ministry. It is expected that those in the Master Guide program be active in church activities relating to Pathfinder-age children.

As senior youth they find nurture and growth with other senior youth, but work with Pathfinders. This course is viewed as the first award in youth leadership and not the ultimate award, as the previous program bearing the name would indicate.

Its objective is to create an awareness of leadership and provide an enjoyment in discovering one's own leadership potential.

A conference seminar is provided for Master Guide participants. The content of the seminar is based on their duties and responsibilities as a Pathfinder staff member, counselor, or junior counselor. Many requirements can be met during the time that the participant is engaged in the Pathfinder program or in Master Guide Club activities.

Matandani Training School

MATANDANI TRAINING SCHOOL. A coeducational junior academy, offering two years' industrial training to students who have satisfactorily completed two years of high school. In 1993 the two-year training course was temporarily closed because of improvements being made on the school plant. Matandani is situated on a 200-acre (80-hectare) tract of land about 80 miles (130 kilometers) northeast of Blantyre, Malawi (formerly Nyasaland), operated by the Malawi Union. It draws its students from the other Seventh-day Adventist missions in Malawi, thus having representatives of a number of tribes. The school is registered with the government, which authorized it to provide specialized industrial courses preparing boys for examinations set by the Industrial Council for certification as Grade II artisans in their trades.

The industrial school developed from a mission school at Matandani station, on an estate near the Mozambique border, bought in 1908 for $112. S. M. Konigmacher and his wife, Battle Creek trained nurses, opened the mission. By 1911 there was a large enrollment and there were many out-schools. Through the years educational and evangelistic work had been carried forward under the leadership of such men as H. J. Hurlow, G. A. Ellingworth, W. L. Davy, M. M. Webster, E. B. Jewell, B. Ellingworth, and Y. Sosola.

Grades and facilities were steadily added, and in 1950 an industrial training department was opened, which grew to be the main department of the school. Courses in joinery, carpentry, and building were offered. Power machinery is used, run by current from the mission's hydroelectric plant. The graduates of this school hold a high record for faithfulness to their church and for their industry. From 1968 the industrial training program included two years of high school. A girls' dormitory was constructed in 1974. In 1994 the school had a faculty and staff of 17.

Matariah Mercy Home

MATARIAH MERCY HOME. An orphanage formerly operated by the Egypt Field of Seventh-day Adventists at Matariah, a suburb of Cairo, United Arab Republic, formerly ancient Heliopolis, the city called On in the Bible (Gen. 41:45).

The orphanage was founded in 1947, under the direction of A. G. Zytkoskee. Mrs. Erna Kruger, a German nurse, whose husband and child had died in Egypt, was connected with the home from the beginning, first as a matron and after 1955 as directress. A school was originally operated at the orphanage, but this was not continued. Medical assistance was supplied to the children, many of whom had trachoma and other diseases. In 1964 a modern orphanage home was completed and dedicated.

Plans that were laid for a vocational-industrial program failed to materialize.

Since the departure of Erna Kruger for retirement in Germany, the orphanage has been turned into a home for two sustentee Seventh-day Adventist couples and a place of refuge for needy Egyptian and Sudanese youth, who enjoy free accommodation. Kruger was instrumental in rearing young deprived Egyptians who now hold leadership positions in the Middle East Union.

Matilainen, Ida

MATILAINEN, IDA (1905—1988). Evangelist. Beginning in 1948, she worked in Kainuunkylä, Finland, near the Arctic Circle, where she traveled by bicycle, moped, or skis. She carried food and literature to the sparsely populated area where roads are sometimes nonexistent. Although she had little formal education, she was an avid student of D'Aubigné's History of the Reformation of the Sixteenth Century and other theological works. She once addressed a Communist celebration using Isaiah 13, concluding that faith in a crucified, risen Saviour is the only way to escape the impending destruction of the earth.

She raised up a group of 20 believers in a desolate area. When lamp fuel was scarce, she quoted the Bible from memory.

Matsanova, Anna Ronis

MATSANOVA, ANNA RONIS (1902—1991). Author, speaker. Born in Latvia, she graduated from Riga Theological Seminary in 1928, and was sent to open work in Sloka. In a rented cinema hall, she preached alone and went door-to-door selling Seventh-day Adventist books.

With a knowledge of Russian and German, she was called to Riga where an evangelistic center was being established. There she met and married a young minister.

In Latvia she organized meetings for poor Russian children, feeding them and telling them of Jesus. She also wrote and translated materials for the church in Russia. In these surroundings she was inspired to write of the sufferings of God's people in the land, but dared not let it be commonly known that she was writing. After hiding her writings for 30 years, she published a hand-typed book, Walking the Path of Thorns.

Later he and his wife were called to Kenya, where they pioneered the work among the Luo people near Lake Victoria-Nyanza. After being interned during World War I, he spent seven years in East Africa and then was called to pioneer in Rwanda-Burundi. Eight years later he helped open the Ngoma Mission Station and Hospital. Later he worked at other stations and pioneered the message in the northeast Congo mountains. He continued to serve after retirement and remained in his beloved Congo during the days of revolution.

Matteson, John Gottlieb

MATTESON, JOHN GOTTLIEB (1835—1896). Minister, editor. He was born in Langeland, Denmark, where he had the advantage of a good literary and musical education. In 1854 he emigrated with his parents and two sisters to the United States. At New Denmark, Brown County, Wisconsin, the family built a log cabin on a 20-acre (eight-hectare) timber lot. Converted in 1859, Matteson began at once to work with great success, as a layman, for the conversion of his neighbors, and the next year he entered a Baptist theological seminary in Chicago, and in 1862 was ordained and sent out to preach for the Baptists. In 1863 he learned of the Seventh-day Adventist faith from P. H. Cady, and accepted it. At the request of his former congregation he gave a six months' series of lectures explaining his new belief, with the result that all except one family followed him.

Matteson became a powerful preacher of the Advent message, with special emphasis on the love of God. He conducted revivals and established churches in Wisconsin, Michigan, Minnesota, Illinois (see Illinois Conference), Iowa, Kansas, and Missouri. He was also a ready writer. He prepared tracts and pamphlets and edited a songbook in Danish-Norwegian. In 1872 the Advent Tidende ("Advent Herald"), of which he became editor, was launched. Some of the magazines were sent into Scandinavia. Soon urgent appeals for a worker came from there. In 1877 the General Conference sent Matteson, with his wife and two daughters, to Europe. After a year of fruitful work in Denmark, where the first conference outside of North America was organized in 1880, he made Christiania (Oslo), Norway, his permanent headquarters. Here the largest halls could not contain his audiences. Before long a church was organized and a publishing work started. In January 1879 he launched Tidernes Tegn ("Signs of the Times"). Two years later he brought out a songbook, including a number of songs—both words and music—of his own composition. From the little publishing house in Oslo (see Norwegian Publishing House) books, papers, and tracts flowed into all the Scandinavian countries, resulting in the organization of new groups and churches, from which young men were trained and sent out to extend the work.

Although not robust in health, Matteson preached and traveled almost incessantly, carrying his writing and editorial work with him. In 1888, after the work had been well established in Norway, Sweden, and Denmark, he returned to America. Despite his feeble health, he undertook heavy responsibilities in editorial and educational work. His last three years were spent at Union College, Lincoln, Nebraska, as Bible teacher and editor.

Mattison, Milton Marion

MATTISON, MILTON MARION (1886—1928). Missionary to India. He was born into a family of early Seventh-day Adventists in Texas and was educated at Keene Academy, from which he graduated in 1909 with a normal diploma. For the next two years he taught church school in Oklahoma and then accepted a call to go to India as a self-supporting missionary. He and his wife, whom he had married shortly before, arrived there in 1912. In India he engaged in colporteur work for two years and then in 1914 was ordained to the gospel ministry in Calcutta and sent to open a mission station and a school at Hapur in North India. Later he served as superintendent of the SDA work in the United Provinces and as acting superintendent of the Northwest India Union Mission. However, the overwork and climate undermined his health. He contracted malaria while on the journey to America on furlough, and though he recovered sufficiently to reach home, he died of heart failure while traveling on a train to a sanitarium for further treatment.

Mattison, Nora Mabel (Kinzer)

MATTISON, NORA MABEL (KINZER) (1886—1953). Teacher and Bible instructor in India; wife of M. M. Mattison. She was a graduate of Keene in the class of 1910 (normal diploma), later taught church school for two years at Ketchum, Oklahoma, and in 1912 married Milton M. Mattison. The two sailed to India, where she assisted her husband in his mission work. While the Mattisons were on furlough in the United States in 1928, Mr. Mattison died. However, Mrs. Mattison returned to India with her two daughters and served first as matron and then as dean of women at the Vincent Hill College. Returning to the United States, she was matron at Broadview Academy in 1936—1937, and in 1939 completed her college education, graduating with her daughters from Washington Missionary College (now Columbia Union College). She again returned to India and worked as Bible instructor in Ceylon, Delhi, and Bombay, and then joined the staff of the Vincent Hill College, from which she retired in 1946.

Matula, Paul

MATULA, PAUL (1882—1945). Pioneer Czech minister in North America. At the age of 18 he came to America, settling at Newark, New Jersey, where he married Suzan Kirch, his childhood friend. About 1907 F. L. Kucera, who later worked as a colporteur, shared with him a Seventh-day Adventist tract, with the result that several months later Matula and his wife joined the church. Observing his zeal and success in spreading his newfound faith, the General Conference invited him to conduct evangelistic work for people of Czechoslovak origin. From then on until the time of his death Matula served in Czechoslovak churches in New Jersey, Ohio (Cleveland), and Michigan (Detroit, 1934—1945). He was ordained to the ministry in 1912.

Matutum View Academy

MATUTUM VIEW ACADEMY. A coeducational boarding school on the senior high school level, operated by the Southern Mindanao Mission, on the slopes of Mount Matutum, Acmonan, Tupi, South Cotabato, Philippines. The school property is made up of approximately 17 acres (seven hectares) of land, with 10 permanent buildings for the elementary and high school, an auditorium, boys' and girls' dormitories, library, science-administration building, home economics, guesthouse, automotive shop, cafeteria, and powerhouse for water supply. The school farm produces a variety of fruits and vegetables such as bananas, corn, avocados, coconuts, marangs, jackfruits, and mangoes.

The school started as a mission school, and for four years continued, with Candido Fallan as teacher. Then it was operated as a church school; and in 1967 Ismael Solilapsi, the barrio captain, and G. M. Somoso started the formal application for a junior high school. On July 7, 1969, the operation of the junior academy was recognized by the government, with an enrollment of 75 students and three faculty members. The school became a senior day school in July 1971, with 174 students enrolled. Since 1976 the school has operated as a senior boarding academy.

Matutum View Academy has been accredited with the Association of Christian Schools and Colleges of the Philippines since 1989 as well as with the General Conference of Seventh-day Adventist Board of Regents.

In addition to complete elementary and secondary courses, the school offers supplemental technological and vocational subjects such as typing, automotive, radio mechanics, practical electricity, and basic computer courses for the regular students and for out-of-school youth.

Maun Medical Mission Hospital

MAUN MEDICAL MISSION HOSPITAL. A medical institution formerly operated at Maun in northern Bechuanaland Protectorate in southern Africa, within the territory of the Zambesi Union. It is listed in the Yearbook from 1937 to 1945, at first as a medical mission, and later as a medical mission hospital.

Maung Maung

MAUNG MAUNG (1862—1936). One of the first Seventh-day Adventists in Burma (now Myanmar), pastor, and evangelist. His father and grandfather, descendants of an old Burmese noble family, were among Dr. Judson's early converts to Christianity. U Maung Maung received a good education with some medical training. Shortly before the first SDA missionary came to Burma his sister read in her Bible that Saturday was the holy day and began to observe it. Later H. B. Meyers, the pioneer canvasser in Burma, held studies with her and her brother with the result that Maung left his well-paid government position and began to preach his newly found faith among the Burmese people at his own expense. In 1904 he attended a general meeting of SDA workers in Calcutta, and his pleas for the establishment of regular SDA work in Burma led to the assignment of H. H. Votaw to the field. Maung himself was in the first group to be baptized by Votaw, who arrived in Burma in 1905. For nearly 30 years Maung continued as pastor and evangelist, preaching, treating the sick, translating, and writing. He was ordained in 1927, near the close of his service. A few short inspirational reports on the work in Burma appeared in the Review and Herald under his name.

Mauritania

MAURITANIA. An Islamic republic in the northwestern part of Africa, independent since November 1960. It is bounded on the north by Algeria, on the east and south by Mali, on the south by Senegal, and on the west by the Atlantic Ocean. The capital is Nouakchott. It has an area of 419,231 square miles (1 million square kilometers), and a population (1994) of 2.2 million, mainly Moorish (or Berber and Arab stock), with a strong Black element. The national language is Arabic, but the educated people also speak French. The religion is Muslim. This territory is part of the Sahel Union, which in turn is part of the Africa-Indian Ocean Division.

As far as is known, Seventh-day Adventists entered this republic for the first time in 1992, when leaders from the General Conference, the Sahel Union Mission, and Africa-Indian Ocean Division visited the territory. There are no Seventh-day Adventist members there. The Sahel Union plans to conduct stop-smoking programs in Mauritania.

Mauritius (including Rodrigues Island)

MAURITIUS (including Rodrigues Island). An island 720 square miles (1,865 square kilometers) in an area lying about 550 miles (880 kilometers) east of Madagascar in the Indian Ocean. A former British colony, it was granted independence in March 1968. Sugar production is the principal industry. In recent years appreciable success has been achieved in setting up secondary industries and developing tourism. The population (1994) stands at 1.1 million, 51 percent of whom are Hindus, 16 percent Muslim, 26 percent Catholic, and 4 percent Protestant.

Rodrigues is an island about 350 miles (550 kilometers) east of Mauritius, administered as a district of Mauritius. It has an area of 40 square miles (100 kilometers) and a population estimated at 25,000, mostly of African origin.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. The territory of Mauritius and Rodrigues islands constitutes the Mauritius Conference, which is part of the Indian Ocean Union Mission, which in turn is part of the Africa-Indian Ocean Division. Statistics (1992) for the Mauritius Conference: churches, 25; members, 2,915; ordained ministers, 6; licensed ministers, 5. Headquarters: Rose Hill, Mauritius.

The territory of Rodrigues forms part of the Mauritius Conference. In 1992 the membership of the two churches on the island was 45.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Seventh-day Adventism was introduced to Mauritius by Rosie (Rosina) Le Môme, of Mauritius, who in 1912 visited Switzerland to improve her health. In Lausanne she attended lectures by H. H. Dexter and accepted the SDA faith. Soon after her return she won her two sisters, and awakened such an interest in her neighborhood that she was unable to cope with it alone. She requested the Mission Board to send a missionary as soon as possible. The Latin Union Conference sent Paul Badaut from France, who, on May 2, 1914, held his first preaching service in Mauritius. On Sept. 12, 1914, the first converts (four men, 21 women) were baptized and the first church was organized on the island. About 1921 Paul Badaut was succeeded by Marius Raspal, of France. As the work progressed, new churches were established and chapels were built.

The first known SDAs to enter the island of Rodrigues were E. Michel and his family, who came from Mauritius in 1925 and settled and worked in Port Mathurin, the principal town on the island. In 1929 A. J. Girou, president of the Mauritius Mission, went to Rodrigues to baptize seven converts. While there he supervised the purchase of a house for Michel and also bought a store that was remodeled as a meeting hall.

In 1932 Girou returned to baptize others and to organize a church with Michel as elder. In 1933 he paid a third visit to baptize the converts at La Ferme, where he also purchased property for a chapel.

The Mauritius Mission was a part of the Latin Union Conference until December 31, 1928. For seven years after that it was a detached field administered by the Southern European Division. On Jan. 1, 1936, when the Indian Ocean Union Mission was organized, this mission became a part of the union. Beginning in 1950 a medical dispensary was operated for a number of years, but it no longer exists. The following figures show the steady progress of the work on Mauritius—1928: six churches, 201 members; 1935: 10 churches, 529 members; 1947: 11 churches, 829 members; 1962: 14 churches, 1,282 members; 1974: 16 churches, 1,554 members; 1992: 25 churches, 2,915 members.

Maxwell Adventist Academy

MAXWELL ADVENTIST ACADEMY. A school for the children of missionaries offering a secondary education, operated in Nairobi, Kenya. The school was started in 1949, and in 1986 it was moved out of Nairobi 15 miles (23 kilometers). Eugene Witzel was principal and builder from 1985 until August 1987, when Wes Peterson came as principal in order to lighten the workload of Mr. Witzel. After 18 months Mr. Peterson returned to the United States because of health reasons, and Timothy Graham was appointed principal.

From 1986 to 1992 the school grew from 55 students to 115. The campus has been improving each year as new stone buildings appear. The American form of education is offered, and in July of 1990 the school was accredited. The graduates have done very well in schools of higher learning.

Principals: Romon Kintz, 1978—1983; Mrs. Bill Edsell, 1983—1985; E. Witzel, 1985—1987; W. Peterson, 1987—1989; T. Graham, 1989— .

Maxwell, Arthur Stanley

MAXWELL, ARTHUR STANLEY (1896—1970). Author, editor, and administrator who gave 54 years of service to the Seventh-day Adventist cause. He was born in London on Jan. 14, 1896. After his father's death his mother and elder brother, Spencer (who later became a career missionary to Africa), were converted to the SDA faith in 1910 by Evangelist J. D. Gillatt. Young Arthur resisted, however, even climbing out a second-story window to avoid the minister's visit. His mother moved the family to Watford so Spencer could attend Stanborough Park Missionary College. There Arthur was persuaded to attend college. An intense study of Matt. 24 combined with a keen interest in Dan. 2 nearly convinced him to become an SDA, Dan. 2 and the Second Coming remaining among his favorite themes as long as he lived.

He first sold SDA literature as a student canvasser at the age of 16. When he topped the highest weekly sales of any student colporteur, and when he survived being caught by the tide while walking between two islands in the Outer Hebrides, he attributed his experiences to the direct intervention of Providence and thereafter lived convinced that God held a special destiny for him in His hands.

A year after his graduation (1915) from Stanborough College he joined the staff at Stanborough Press Limited, beginning as copyreader for Rachel Joyce, daughter of S. Joyce, Britain's outstanding colporteur at the time. The following year he and Miss Joyce were married. Six children entered their home: Maureen, Graham, Mervyn, Lawrence, Malcolm, and Deirdre.

In 1920 Maxwell was made editor of the British Present Truth, a post he held for 16 years during which he also edited Missionary Worker (renamed British Advent Messenger in 1936) and Good Health. He also served in various other capacities. In 1921, as pastor of the Watford church, he led a lightning campaign to build and pay for one of the first SDA church buildings in Britain. In 1922 he was sent as a delegate to the General Conference. In 1925 he began a seven-year period (1925—1932) as manager of the Stanborough Press.

In 1931 Maxwell, who was by then also religious liberty secretary for the British Union, became actively involved in opposing calendar reform. In June he delivered an address to the Preparatory Committee of the Transit and Communication Section of the League of Nations in Geneva. In October, at the plenary hearing, he appeared again as one of four SDA spokespersons.

In 1936 Maxwell was invited to edit Signs of the Times. In that year circulation of the Signs stood near 55,000. Within a decade it soared past 300,000. He continued as editor for 34 years.

Arthur Maxwell came to be known affectionately around the world as "Uncle Arthur." Uncle Arthur's Bedtime Stories were born in 1924. The first volume was highly successful and proved to be the first of 48 annual volumes (bound individually or in various combinations, including The Children's Hour), which sold 37 million copies.

In 1945 J. D. Snider, of the Review and Herald, asked him to write a set of Bible stories for children. Maxwell's response was a seven-year (1951—1958) effort that filled 10 volumes. T. K. Martin, director of the Art Department at the Review, supervised the illustrations, and G. A. Sutton, publishing secretary of the Pacific Union Conference, developed the Home Health Education Service to help colporteurs finance sales that, worldwide, passed 1.5 million sets.

In writing Bedtime Stories Maxwell's motive was to develop in children the same childlike faith in God that characterized his own life after his experiences with God in the Outer Hebrides. He wrote The Bible Story to help children "not only to understand the Bible but to love it," to "exalt the Bible as the inspired Word of God," and to "exalt Jesus as the Author" of the Bible and as Creator, Re-creator, and Redeemer. Determined that The Bible Story must in truth be the Bible for children, he read no commentaries of any sort during the years he spent writing it, instead rereading Bible passages in various versions "until they glowed." He believed the final product was a "translation of the Bible for children."

Arthur Maxwell wrote a total of 112 books during his lifetime. The phenomenal sales of his 79 children's books (52 million in 21 languages) sometimes eclipsed the fact that he was primarily the editor of journals for adults and that he wrote 33 adult books with a combined sales of more than 6 million in 23 languages (the combined languages for all his books being 32). One adult book, Your Bible and You, in which the Review invested $100,000 for illustrations, sold more than 1.6 million copies. It is hard to conceive the history of SDA publishing without him. During the 1970s one fifth of all Seventh-day Adventist publications bore his name.

In 1970 he was awarded an honorary Doctor of Letters from Andrews University.

Having devoted much of his life to work with children, it was a satisfaction to him in his later years that his own six children were active in some capacity in the Seventh-day Adventist cause.

Maxwell, Edgar Lindsay

MAXWELL, EDGAR LINDSAY (1878—1940). Missionary to Latin America. He was reared in the family of a Methodist minister. At the age of 13, after reading Uriah Smith's Daniel and the Revelation and other Seventh-day Adventist books from his father's library, he decided to become an SDA minister. At the age of 20 he began to preach in Oklahoma, and six years later was ordained to the ministry. He served as president of the Louisiana (1908—1912) and Tennessee River (1912—1913) conferences, superintendent of the Peruvian Mission (1913) and Inca Union (1914—1918), and as president of the North Latin-American Union (1919). Returning to the United States because of failing health, he taught Bible at the College of Medical Evangelists for about a year (1919—1920) and translated several books into Spanish for the Pacific Press Publishing Association (1920—1922). Settling at Mountain View, California, he entered law practice, having completed the law course by correspondence some time previously. In 1928 he was called to resume mission service as president of the Austral Union, but an illness overcame him in 1930, and he returned to his law practice. Though practicing law, he was active in church affairs, serving as pastor of a church for some years and carrying the religious liberty secretaryship of the Central and Northern California conferences.

Mayinza, Jim

MAYINZA, JIM (c. 1883—c. 1948). African teacher and evangelist. Born in a tribal village in Northern Rhodesia (now Zambia), he and his mother were captured, when he was 5 years old, by a raiding party of Matabele warriors from south of the Zambezi River and carried hundreds of miles south into slavery. An attempt to escape resulted in his separation from his mother. He knew only that his father's name was Sigabasa.

Several years later, when the British overthrew the power of the Matabele and declared all slaves free, Mayinza entered the employ of some of the European settlers, one of whom urged him to go to the mission and become "God's own boy." After this man died, Jim went to Solusi Mission, thirsting for an education, but not particularly for the White man's religion.

The kindness extended to him by F. B. Armitage and other missionaries resulted in his conversion. In 1901 he was baptized, the first convert at Solusi. When W. H. Anderson made a trip through Northern Rhodesia, at Mayinza's request he made inquiries for Sigabasa, but without success. When the Anderson family went north of the Zambezi in 1905 to establish Rusangu Mission, Mayinza remained as a teacher at Solusi. After Anderson had located Mayinza's parents, he sent for Mayinza. Thus he was reunited with his family. To be near them he joined the staff at Rusangu Mission.

After teaching and preaching for several years, he returned to Solusi for further training, then became an evangelist in Southern Rhodesia. He had a great burden to sell books to the Africans, but he found it difficult to convince the European workers that this could be done. There was a £10 license fee involved. Selling books without a permit resulted in his imprisonment and a warning that the offense must not be repeated. When Mayinza decided that he would sell his possessions to pay for a permit, the missionaries secured one for him. To their surprise, he proved to be a successful colporteur, and in this way he paved the way for hundreds of Africans who have followed his example in this type of missionary endeavor.

For many years Mayinza held evangelistic meetings and revivals, built up churches, and attended camp meetings. He was a preacher of great power, and his converts numbered more than 1,000—a remarkable figure. Worn out by his many long journeys, his ceaseless efforts, and exposure to the elements, he was at length retired. He spent the remainder of his life near his home village in Northern Rhodesia.

Mbyirukira, Mokotsi Jonas

MBYIRUKIRA, MOKOTSI JONAS (1914—1993). Administrator. Born in Rwanda, he lost his mother when he was 6 years old. He was baptized at 15 and ordained to the gospel ministry when he was 30. In 1955 he served as director of the first mission station of central Africa at Masisi, now known as East Zaïre Field. In 1960 he became the first African to serve as president of a field. In 1970 he became field secretary of the Trans-Africa Division and two years later was asked to be president of Zaïre Union Mission. He held this office until 1980.

In 1973 Solusi Adventist College awarded him an honorary degree in theology. In 1983 he was decorated as the “Chevalier de l’Orde National du Leopard,” becoming the first Seventh-day Adventist to be honored by a civic medal in Zaïre.

Pastor Mbyirukira was a member of the Zaïre Union committee for 28 years, of the Trans-Africa Division committee for 18 years, and of the General Conference Committee for 10 years.

MEARS, OLIVER (1820—1913). The first president of the Ohio Conference (1863—1866). He was a farmer and made no profession of religion until he became a Seventh-day Adventist about 1858. Shortly afterward he became one of the leaders in Ohio and of the SDA congregation at Lovett's Grove. Concurrently with preaching and visiting members, he continued farming. He was president of the Ohio Conference also from 1869 to 1870 and from 1873 to 1875.

Medan Academy

MEDAN ACADEMY. An educational institution on the senior high school level located at Medan, Sumatra, Indonesia. The school was opened in 1954 as an elementary and intermediate school, the first in the North Sumatra Mission. In 1961 it became an academy under the principalship of P. L. Tambunan, but operated only one year as an academy. A second attempt to raise the school to academy status was made in 1965, but without success. Finally, in 1971, the school again opened as an academy and has continued to the present as a day academy serving the Medan area.

Principals: H. W. Purba, 1975—1979; E. Siregar, 1979—1981; B. Silalahi, 1981—1982; A. E. Panjaitan, 1982—1983; E. Siregar, 1983—1987; F. E. Hutapea, 1987—1991; S. Sinaga, 1991— .

Medan Adventist Hospital

MEDAN ADVENTIST HOSPITAL (Rumah Sakit Advent Medan). A 34-bed general hospital located on a six acres (two hectares) of land approximately 2.5 miles (four kilometers) from the center of Medan, northern Sumatra, Indonesia. It is owned and operated by the West Indonesia Union Mission. The hospital was opened on June 1, 1969, with 21 beds, under the directorship of Dr. Elisha Liwidjaja. There were two physicians working on the staff, Dr. R. M. Widjaja and the medical director. Mrs. G. H. Simatupang was in charge of the nursing service, and G. H. Simatupang was treasurer. The institution prospered and soon became too small for its patronage. In 1971 a building with 20-bed capacity, similar to the first one, was erected, which increased the number of beds to 41. A semipermanent house was built at the back of the hospital for the treasurer and nursing service.

The hospital has surgical, obstetrical, X-ray, and lab facilities; a pharmacy; and a Dental Department, with a growing staff of Indonesian nurses. In 1993 the hospital had assets of more than US$1 million. Three medical clinics opened by the hospital serve 25,000 to 27,000 outpatients and 250 inpatients each year.

Medical Directors: Elisha Liwidjaja, 1969—1984; Vernon Manullang, 1984—1989; Eddy Antou, 1989— .

Branching out of the Communication Department, Media Services became independent at the 1990 General Conference session. OnLine Edition is one of Media Services' primary productions. Produced for the Adventist Review, it is a video magazine available to Seventh-day Adventist institutions and churches. An hour in length, OnLine contains different segments on news, doctrine, outreach, and relief work of the church. A large part of the budget comes from sponsors who purchase time segments that carry their message.

Besides OnLine Edition, Media Services produces a variety of other programs: from television commercials to Week of Prayer readings to division reports and ADRA stories.

Medical Cadet Corps

MEDICAL CADET CORPS. A training organization conducted by the Seventh-day Adventist Church for the purpose of preparing the young men of the church for their obligatory military service. Since the work of saving life is in keeping with the church's noncombatant beliefs, the General Conference Committee as early as the Autumn Council of 1916 encouraged the young men subject to the draft to prepare themselves to fulfill their obligations in medical military service. To help these young men to obtain training along medical lines, some of the SDA sanitariums, most of the colleges, including the medical college at Loma Linda, and some of the academies opened and conducted special classes in emergency first-aid work. Hundreds of SDA young people in the United States availed themselves of this training.

The program of giving basic military medical training, in preparation for military obligations, was begun in 1934, at Union College, Lincoln, Nebraska, by E. N. Dick, professor of history. Two years later a more advanced program of similar training was carried out at the White Memorial Hospital in Los Angeles, California, under the direction of Cyril B. Courville, M.D., a major in the U.S. Army Medical Corps Reserve. When the draft was begun in the United States in 1940, these training programs and others were combined; and training units were established in academies, colleges, and in larger centers where members were concentrated. In some localities a training plan for women in the church was instituted under the name Women's Cadette Corps. Training was aimed at nursing service at home or under the Civilian Defense program.

After World War II the Medical Cadet Corps training units were largely closed down; however, with the establishment of the draft in the United States again in 1950 the training program was revived and strengthened. Annual national camps to train instructors were conducted.

Instruction was in three categories: (1) special skills introductory to the work of a medical corpsman (for example, first aid, camp sanitation); (2) preparation for military training (basic drill, military courtesy); and (3) the SDA soldier's relation to the military (on principles of noncombatancy, Sabbath observance, and Christian living). With the cessation of the draft in 1972 the Medical Cadet Corps program was closed down in the United States.

The Medical Cadet Corps training program has also been inaugurated in countries in various parts of the world, particularly Puerto Rico and other Caribbean countries. This training is different in each country, since it endeavors to prepare the church member for the specific problems of military service he faces in his own country.

In 1991 a meeting was called to initiate plans for the North American Division to reconsider the MCC. Actions taken allow Adventist Chaplains' Ministries to revive the corps should the draft ever be reinstated.

Meanwhile, the organization is looking for a way to connect with the United States Department of Health and use their modified uniforms and discipline to create a community and disaster service identity for the program.

In 1993 there were about 1,000 members in Texas, Florida, Massachusetts, New Jersey, New York, Michigan, and Pennsylvania. The first national project was to provide security and other services at the Dare to Care Pathfinder Camporee in Denver, Colorado, in August 1994. Those who are involved in the 1990s version of the MCC are mostly people of Hispanic background. It is hoped that the course will become a vehicle of training and preparation for service in disasters, and that people of all ethnic groups will find it an attractive way to organize a young adult ministry in their communities.

Medical Center Hospital

MEDICAL CENTER HOSPITAL. A 208-bed full-service hospital in Punta Gorda, Florida, operated by Adventist Health System/Sunbelt Health Care Corporation. Charlotte Hospital opened with 12 beds in 1947. It was the first hospital in Charlotte County. By 1966 it had grown to 148 beds, and the name was changed to Medical Center Hospital. The hospital was deeded to the Seventh-day Adventist Church to own and operate on Oct. 1, 1969. Throughout the years the hospital grew to 208 patient beds.

In 1989 the Regional Heart Center opened, offering the only open-heart surgery program in Charlotte County. Medical Center Hospital also operated the only psychiatric services in the county.

With changes brought by the advent of health care reform in the 1990s, and because of the hospital's need for substantial capital, in 1993 AHS/Sunbelt put Medical Center Hospital on the market for sale.

Memorial Hospital (formerly known as Oneida Mountain Hospital)

MEMORIAL HOSPITAL (formerly known as Oneida Mountain Hospital). A 63-bed general hospital comprised of 52 acute-care beds and an 11-bed extended-care unit, operated by the Adventist Health System/

Sunbelt Health Care Corporation, and situated at Manchester, Clay County, Kentucky. It is staffed by 12 physicians, all in private practice, and one radiologist employed by the hospital, 62 full-time registered nurses, and 30 full-time licensed practical nurses. There are 220 full-time employees. Service is offered in the following departments: Medical/Surgical, Intensive Care, Pediatrics, Obstetrical, Physical Therapy, Radiology, Laboratory, Respiratory Therapy, Emergency Room, Pharmacy, Surgery, Social Services, and Women's Health.

The three-story brick hospital building has nine beds available in private room accommodations.

The hospital is situated on a 40-acre (16-hectare) tract of land that also includes employee housing, a church school, and three doctors' office buildings.

C. Adeline McConville, M.D., of Brooklyn, New York, raised the money and built the original hospital building in 1923. Since it was difficult to staff the hospital in a backwoods community without road access at that time, it was run by one or two registered nurses for the first 13 years and played only a minor part in the area.

In 1941, when the trustees turned the property over to the Kentucky State Department of Health, it was operated as the Oneida Maternity Hospital under joint state and federal subsidies. When in 1953 the federal funds were discontinued, the hospital was closed and turned back to the trustees.

In 1955, through the efforts of T. L. Britton, of Oneida, and R. H. Pierson, president of the conference, the complete hospital—grounds, buildings, and equipment—was turned over by the trustees to the Kentucky-Tennessee Conference, and was opened on Aug. 1.

In July of 1963 H. W. Davis came from Orlando, Florida, to serve as administrator of the institution. Shortly after his arrival he began to realize the need for a new hospital plant. Plans were made, and on two separate occasions applications for Federal funds were submitted and rejected. Undaunted, another application was submitted when Appalachian 202 funds became available, and on July 8, 1968, a telegram was received with the notice of a grant award in the amount of $256,345 from Hill Burton, and $1,794,414 from Appalachian 202 funds. The remainder of the funds needed for construction were raised through a $400,000 bond issue and local fund-raising efforts. On Sept. 5, 1971, the new hospital opened its doors for the transfer and admission of patients, and within 24 hours was filled to capacity.

On Aug. 30, 1973, Memorial Hospital became part of Adventist Health System/Sunbelt Health Care Corporation, Orlando, Florida. Present assets of the hospital are more than $8.7 million.

Memorial Hospital of Bee County

MEMORIAL HOSPITAL OF BEE COUNTY. A 74-bed hospital situated in Beeville, Texas, planned and built (1962) by the commissioners court of Bee County in counsel with and for lease to the Texas Conference of Seventh-day Adventists.

Negotiations were begun on July 10, 1961, by Ralph Jackson, chairman of the hospital planning board of Bee County. SDA methods of hospital operation were carefully explained and the Adventist-operated Hays County Memorial Hospital in San Marcos was inspected. After a public hearing in January 1962, Judge John Monroe, representing Bee County, and B. E. Leach, representing the Texas Conference, signed a 10-year lease with a 50-year renewal option.

Construction began Aug. 13, 1962, on a hospital with 74 beds and 16 bassinets, two major operating rooms, one minor operating room, X-ray department, clinical laboratory, and all other necessary ancillary facilities. The opening date was Mar. 15, 1964. The hospital opened a training school for vocational nurses on Sept. 15, 1964, and graduated the first class on Sept. 12, 1965.

The original board of trustees for the hospital was composed of the following: B. E. Leach, Marvin Midkiff, Conrad W. Skantz, W. B. Robinson, Altus Hayes, Dr. Kenneth C. von Pohle, Dr. Robert J. Kellar, Dr. D. I. Coggin, W. R. May, H. W. KLASER, and Howard Burbank.

In 1980 the Beeville Memorial Hospital was leased by Adventist Health System/Sunbelt Health Care Corporation and operated by them until 1985, when its operation was taken over by the Lutheran Health Corporation.

Menkel, Herman Carl

MENKEL, HERMAN CARL (1875—1957). Physician, evangelist, and editor. He was born in New York City and spent his childhood in Missouri, where he attended public schools. Beginning in 1893, he canvassed for three years, then, inspired by Dr. David Paulson, decided to devote himself to medical missionary work and enrolled in the nursing course at Battle Creek Sanitarium in 1896. He was married in 1898, and from 1900 to 1903 he and his wife were in charge of treatment rooms in Denver, Colorado, operated by the Colorado Sanitarium. Between 1903 and 1907 he studied medicine at the Denver Homeopathic School of Medicine and shortly after graduation in 1907 went to Calcutta, India, to take charge of the sanitarium there. In 1907 or 1908 he started Mussoorie Sanitarium. In 1910 he founded the Herald of Health magazine and was its first editor. While on furlough in 1911—1912 he served as preceptor of the Washington Foreign Mission Seminary, Washington, D.C.

Returning to India in 1913, he worked in Bombay. In 1914 he was ordained and called to Simla in northern India to take charge of the medical and evangelistic work there and later established and directed the Simla Sanitarium. In the same year he helped F. H. Loasby and Dr. V. L. Mann enter the Muslim areas of Punjab. From 1917 to 1920 he was vice president of the India Union Mission. In 1935 he became associate editor of the Oriental Watchman and Herald of Health and continued with the journal for many years.

He returned to the United States in 1944 and married Helen Spicer, daughter of W. A. Spicer (his first wife died in 1937), and for a time practiced medicine in Denver, Colorado. After retirement from active work in 1951, he served as medical secretary of the Oregon Conference until the time of his death.

Meredith, William Henry

MEREDITH, WILLIAM HENRY (1870—1952). Evangelist and church administrator in Great Britain. A Welsh coal miner, he began work, after his conversion, for the Seventh-day Adventist Church in 1895 as a colporteur. Later he served as Bible instructor (1896—1902); minister (ordained, 1903) in the Welsh Mission (1902—1904); superintendent of the Welsh Mission (1904—1907); president of the South England (1907—1911), North England (1911—1913), Midland (1913—1916), and East Central (1916—1919) conferences; minister in the North England Conference (1919—1921); president of the Welsh Midland Conference (1921—1922) and of the Welsh Conference (1922—1925); vice president (1924—1926) and president of the British Union Conference (1926—1932).

Mesa Grande Adventist Academy

MESA GRANDE ADVENTIST ACADEMY. A coeducational secondary school located in Calimesa, California. It was established in 1991. In 1993 it had an enrollment of 139 and a faculty and staff of 21.

Principals: Don Dudley, 1991— .

Message

MESSAGE (1935— ; files in GC). An evangelistic journal beamed toward the Black population. Issued at first quarterly; with vol. 3, 1937, it was issued bimonthly; vol. 7, 1941, two bimonthly numbers, the rest monthly; from vol. 9, 1943, through vol. 25, 1959, monthly; 1960—1964, 8 issues. The Message Ingathering annual number was first issued in 1951.

Message made its debut on the world scene at a time when hope in the hearts of mankind was at a low ebb. The nation and the world were gripped in the throes of the Great Depression. In a clear-cut statement, the first editor of Message expressed the objectives of the journal. “The man with a message,” he wrote, “is the man we want to hear. The magazine with a message is the magazine we want to read. Our message is the glorious news that Jesus saves men from sin and that He is soon to return.”

Message is, in a sense, a successor to the two earlier papers called the Gospel Herald, both founded by James Edson White, captain of the missionary riverboat Morning Star. The first of these was issued from 1898 to 1903; the second was launched as the Southern Missionary, with the second volume (1905) given the old title Gospel Herald. At the end of volume 3 (December 1906), an editorial announced that the next number to be issued would likely consist of 16 pages under the name The Message. However, the change was not made, and the Gospel Herald became the organ of the North American Negro Department. But the Gospel Herald ended publication in 1923, and in 1935—28 years after its name was first proposed—Message was launched.

Because of large single copy sales, its national and international circulation has sometimes topped 300,000. Normally it fluctuates between 75,000 and 125,000.

Editors: Robert Bruce Thurber, 1934—1936; James E. Shultz, 1936—1942; F. A. Coffin (acting), 1942—1943; R. L. Odom, 1943—1945; Louis B. Reynolds (first Black editor), 1945—1959; James E. Messenger de la Division Inter-Americaine, Le MESSAGER DE LA DIVISION INTER-AMERICAINE, LE (1952—1977; monthly until 1970; then quarterly, supplemented by the monthly four-page Éclair D'Inter-Amérique; French). The French version of the Inter-American Messenger, for the French-speaking constituency of the Inter-American Division. Until 1965 Le Messenger omitted some news items from other union fields in order to have more space for reporting progress and projects in the Franco-Haitian Union. Thus it served as a division and as a union paper. With the January 1965 issue it became an exact duplicate of the English magazine. Edited and translated at the division office, it was printed in Port-au-Prince, Haiti, and circulated free to French-speaking members.

Messenger [1]

MESSENGER [1] (1928—1941, 1951— ; until 1941 as Notes of Progress; bi-monthly). Official organ of the Seventh-day Adventist Union of Southeast Asia. Preceded in 1921 and 1922 by a paper for the union mission known as the Malaysia Digest, the present Messenger began as a mimeographed quarterly, Notes of Progress, in January 1928, in English. From 1938 onward until World War II it was printed as a monthly. Suspended during the war years, it reappeared in July 1951, renamed the Messenger. Beginning with the May-June 1960 number, the journal was published bimonthly and in separate editions for English, Chinese, and Malay readers. The Chinese and Malay editions were discontinued in 1968, after the July-August and November-December issues, respectively.

Messenger [2]

MESSENGER [2] (1948— ; successor to West African Advent Messenger, 1948—1975; Advent Messenger, 1975—1989; monthly). A West African Union paper printed at the Advent Press in Accra, Ghana, for the English-speaking membership in West Africa.

Messenger Party

MESSENGER PARTY. The first offshoot from Seventh-day Adventists. The defection began at Jackson, Michigan, in 1853—1854, when two ministers, H. S. Case and C. P. Russell, resenting Ellen White’s reproof given them for their harsh spirit toward some of the members, turned against her. Not long afterward they began to publish a paper called the Messenger of Truth, whence its supporters were called “the Messenger party.”

In the meantime in Wisconsin, J. M. Stephenson and D. P. Hall, recent converts of J. H. Waggoner, began to preach for SDAs. However, they had earlier embraced the “age-to-come” theory of the millennium (see below), the view of a minority group among the non-Sabbatarian Adventists.

Knowing that Stephenson and Hall held the Seventh-day Adventist “age-to-come” view, James White tried to preserve unity among Sabbathkeeping Adventists by agreeing, in June 1854, to keep silent on the subject in the Review and Herald if these two men likewise would be silent on it and devote their energies to preaching the SDA message. But late in 1855, finding that Stephenson and Hall had continued to advocate the “age-to-come” theory while preaching as SDAs, White felt bound to speak out. About that time Stephenson and Hall with their adherents aligned themselves with the Messenger party and used the columns of the Messenger to denounce the Review and Herald and particularly its editor, James White, hoping thereby to kill the paper’s circulation. Thereafter the “age-to-come” view came to be advocated increasingly in the columns of the Messenger of Truth.

The Messenger party became scattered as a result of internal strife, and for lack of financial support the paper ceased publication in 1857. Early in 1858 James White reported the following concerning the Messenger party: “Not one of the eighteen messengers of which they once boasted as being with them is now bearing a public testimony, and not one place of regular meeting of our knowledge among them” (Review and Herald 11:77, Jan. 14, 1858).

In SDA history the Messenger party and the “age-to-come” defection were relatively small. Many defectors returned to the church. But a number of the “age-to-come Adventists” and others later united and developed into the separate Adventist denomination known as the Church of God (Oregon, Illinois), or the Church of God (Abrahamic Faith), or Churches of God in Christ Jesus (see Adventist Bodies).

“Age-to-Come” Doctrines. The views of the “age-to-come” defectors from the SDA Church were generally similar to those taught by several former Millerite preachers, for example, by Joseph Marsh, who wrote a pamphlet entitled “Age-to-Come,” and promoted these views in his paper The Advent Harbinger (formerly the Millerite journal The Voice of Truth); by his assistant on the journal, O.R.L. Crosier, who had for a time observed the seventh-day Sabbath but did not remain with the group who became the SDA Church; and by George Storrs. These advocates of the doctrine agreed in the main but differed on details.

The “age-to-come” doctrine as held by certain Adventists was not new; in general it was merely another outcropping, with minor variations, of the older “Literalist” view (see Premillennialism), which had differed from the Adventist (Millerite and SDA) doctrine of the Second Advent.

In common with the Literalists, most of the believers in the “age-to-come” teaching held that the Second Advent would usher in a millennial kingdom during which probation would continue and the nations would be converted under the reign of Christ and the saints, and during which the Jews would play a leading role. By contrast the Adventists taught that the Second Advent would decide the fate of every human being and the kingdom would include only the immortalized saints. The “age-to-come” theory of the millennium was rejected by the majority party of the Millerites, which was led by Himes, as incompatible with Adventism. It was seen to be equally incompatible with SDA beliefs, especially because it involved a denial of the Sabbath. One result was that it called forth articles and books in reply, such as J. N. Andrews’ articles on the Sabbath and J. H. Waggoner’s The Kingdom of God.

Messianic Prophecies

MESSIANIC PROPHECIES. Old Testament predictions that point forward to the Messiah, the Anointed One promised to Israel—predictions pointing to Jesus Christ, especially to His first advent. On the way to Emmaus on the day of His resurrection our Lord drew the attention of two disciples to many OT predictions concerning His life and mission that they had not previously understood in a Messianic sense. The NT writers, particularly Matthew, constantly apply OT passages to Christ.

Seventh-day Adventists have accepted the historic Protestant emphasis on the fulfillment of the OT prophecies by Christ, including the first advent as fulfilling the prophecy of the 70 weeks of Dan. 9:24—27. James White, in an 1853 pamphlet, listed nine major “signs” as evidence that Jesus had fulfilled OT prophecies: (1) The star spoken of in Num. 24:17 was fulfilled in the star of Bethlehem; (2) Christ was born of a virgin, Isa. 7:14; (3) He was born in Bethlehem, Micah 5:2; (4) the children of Bethlehem were subsequently slain, Jer. 31:15; (5) John the Baptist was a forerunner of Christ, Isa. 40:3; (6) Christ preached the gospel, or good news, Isa. 61:1; (7) Christ’s humility at His trial, Isa. 53:7; (8) the manner and circumstances of the death of Christ were foretold in Ps. 22:13—18; (9) the time of Christ’s first advent as a fulfillment of the 70 weeks of Dan. 9:24—27 (Signs of the Times, pp. 3-5).

The Messianic prophecies have been treated frequently, and often at considerable length, by many SDA authors. For example, in 1892 H. A. St. John used 32 OT prophecies in a chapter concerning the life and ministry of Christ in his book The Sun of Righteousness (pp. 7-21). He included some of those cited by James White, went into greater detail on other points, and referred to additional prophecies. Some of his additional points are: Christ’s prophetic name Immanuel (God with us), Isa. 7:14; He was to be called out of Egypt, Hosea 11:1; He was to be a light bearer in Zebulun and Naphtali, Isa. 9:1, 2; He was to heal the deaf, the dumb, and the blind, Isa. 29:18; He was to raise the dead, Isa. 61:1; His triumphal entry was predicted, Zech. 9:9; He was to be betrayed by His friends, Zech. 13:6; the price of His betrayal was to be 30 pieces of silver, Zech. 11:12, 13; He was crucified with thieves, Isa. 53:12; Dan. 9:26; His life was one of poverty, Isa. 53:3; He would be given gall and vinegar on the cross, Ps. 69:21.

Ellen White makes countless references to OT Messianic prophecies and their fulfillment by Christ (for example, PK 681—702; AA 223—228). In Fundamentals of Bible Doctrine, a textbook on Bible doctrines in use for many years in many Adventist colleges, A. J. Wearner lists 50 Messianic prophecies (1945 ed., p. 38). Among those not already mentioned Wearner cites Christ as the seed of the woman, Gen. 3:15; as the seed of David, Jer. 23:5, 6; as a prophet like Moses, Deut. 18:15—18; and that not one of His bones was to be broken, Ps. 34:20.

SDAs believe that some of these OT passages constituted direct, intentional predictions of the nature, life, ministry, vicarious death, or resurrection of Christ at the time they were given (for example, Gen 3:15; Isa. 9:5, 6; Micah 5:2; Mal. 4:2). In other instances, local historical events, certain features of which had points in common with the coming of the Messiah, became historical types of the Messiah (for example, Gen. 12:3, cf. Gal. 3:16; Deut. 18:15; Isa. 7:14; Jer. 31:15; Hosea 12:1). In still other instances the personal experiences and insights of inspired writers, through the guidance of the Holy Spirit, were seen later as prefiguring Christ (for example, Ps. 22:7—18; 34:20; 69:21).

Metropolitan Adventist Academy (Puerto Rico)

METROPOLITAN ADVENTIST ACADEMY (Puerto Rico) (Academia Adventista Metropolitana). A coeducational day school on the senior high school level in Río Piedras, Puerto Rico. It is operated by the East Puerto Rico Conference and is accredited by the Puerto Rican Department of Education. In 1993 there were 362 students enrolled on the secondary level, with a faculty of 15.

The forerunner of this institution was a one-teacher four-grade church school begun by R. W. Prince in 1929 and continued by Eloy Acosta-Muñoz in 1930. The school occupied a small room next to the mission office in the basement of the old Santurce church building. When this building was damaged by a hurricane in 1932, the church and school were moved to San Rafael Street, new rooms were built, and the school was named Puerto Rico Junior Academy. In 1933 the school began offering secondary work under the leadership of José I. Rivera.

Eight grades were being taught under the direction of Angel Delgado when C. R. Olmstead arrived in 1944 and added one grade per year, graduating the first twelfth grade class in 1949. In 1948 the school was renamed Puerto Rico Academy. When that academy moved to Mayagüez in 1957, a local day school of nine grades continued in Santurce, which in 1960 adopted the name Metropolitan Adventist Academy. By 1964 it offered 12 grades again.

Because of plans to expropriate the academy property to make way for the construction of a modern freeway, a new eight-acre property was purchased near the metropolitan suburb of Río Piedras. A new school plant has been built there to serve the 92 churches and groups in the metropolitan area of the capital city, San Juan. The campus includes two two-story classroom buildings, a gymnasium youth center with capacity for 3,000, the East Puerto Rico Conference office, and a church.

Metropolitan Adventist Academy (Santo Domingo)

METROPOLITAN ADVENTIST ACADEMY (Santo Domingo) (academia Metropolitana Adventista). An institution offering Seventh-day Adventist education to the residents of the metropolitan area of the capital city, Santo Domingo, in the Dominican Republic. Its objective is to restore in all the image of the Creator. The school is situated in the central-west zone of the city and offers grades K-12 with 522 students.

This school was established in the year 1976 as a result of the union of two other schools (Edison and Ramón Matías Mella). In the beginning it had 400 students. In 1983 the school received the accreditation of the Inter-American Division, and in 1985 it received state accreditation.

Each day the students study the Word of God as well as other areas necessary to prepare them to be noble and respectful citizens in this world as well as heirs of the kingdom of heaven. A good number of them give their hearts to the Lord each year and are baptized.

The academy has a library, laboratories, a store, and volleyball and basketball courts. In the evening and on Sundays the facilities are used to give college level credits as an extension of the Dominican Adventist University.

Mexico

MEXICO. A Spanish-American federal republic situated on the southern extremity of the North America continent, between the United States on the north and Guatemala and Belize on the south, and between the Gulf of Mexico and the Pacific Ocean. It extends more than 1,600 miles (2,500 kilometers) from north to south and covers an area of 761,604 square miles (1.9 million square kilometers). The economy of Mexico is predominantly agricultural, but in the course of the twentieth century rapid industrialization has been taking place, and now Mexico enjoys a relatively high standard of living.

The population (1994) of Mexico is 92.3 million and is growing at the rate of 2.6 percent a year. Presently the people are leaving the countryside and moving into the cities, which are rapidly expanding. Modern Mexicans represent a blend of several stocks, mainly indigenous Indian and Spanish. According to a recent estimate, the ethnic structure of the population is 7.5 percent pure Indian, and 92.5 percent mixed. The official census does not distinguish the racial background, and racial origin has little to do with social or economic position. Spanish is the official language of the country, but still almost 16 percent of the people speak only in the dialects of the Indian tribes living there.

I. Historical Background

I. Historical Background. Mexico has had a long and turbulent history. Before the Europeans discovered America, the land was occupied in succession by three of the most advanced Indian civilizations of the New World, those of the Mayas, Toltecs, and Aztecs. The last of these, the Aztecs, were conquered by the Spaniards under Hernando Cortes about 1521. For almost three centuries after the conquest the country, renamed New Spain, was ruled by Spain. During this time Roman Catholicism was introduced, and the Spanish colonial system placed the greater part of the country's wealth in the hands of the church. In 1810 a revolt against the Spanish rule erupted, and by 1821 Mexico attained independence. A concurrent reaction against the hitherto privileged position of the Roman Catholic Church resulted in the church's disestablishment and disendowment by the 1857 constitution.

About 90 percent of the people adhere to the Roman Catholic Church, but about 5 percent are Protestant and 1.5 percent are other religions. About 3.5 percent say they have no religion. By the constitution of 1857 the church is separated from the state, and by the constitution of 1917 religious activities are strictly regulated. But on Jan. 28, 1992, the constitution was reformed, and now all churches must register with the government secretary and obtain their certificates as religious associations, thus having to pay taxes. Since May 6, 1993, the church has legal rights, can own property, support schools and hospitals, and is free to preach in public places.

As a background to Seventh-day Adventist work in Mexico, it might be noted that an "advent" expectation of sorts was known among the Indians of Mexico before the arrival of Christianity. In fact, much of the ease with which Cortes conquered the Aztecs could be attributed to the then-current expectation that a white-bearded god, Quetzalcoatl, would return to his people. The Maya Indians, founders of the oldest civilization in America, also had a tradition of the return of their god at some time in the future. The similarity between these ideas and the biblical narrative provided a background favorable to the Indians' reception of the missionaries' message of the returning Christ.

At the turn of the nineteenth century, at the time of a widespread international interest in the Second Advent, came the prophetic interpretation of the Chilean Jesuit priest, Lacunza, whose book was circulated in various Spanish-American countries, including Mexico. There it apparently found response in José María Gutiérrez de Rozas, a prominent and respected Catholic lawyer and high-ranking magistrate of Mexico City. In 1833 and 1834 he wrote a book on the prophecies of the second advent of Christ, a 235-page treatise entitled Consulta a los Sabios Sobre la Aproximación de la Segunda Venida de Nuestro Señor Jesucristo, in which he announced his expectation of the end of the 2300 days in 1847 or thereabouts. While writing this he was greatly impressed by the falling of the stars in November 1833, which he observed. In 1848, the year of his death, he published a defense of the works of Lacunza.

III. Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

III. Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work.

1. Beginnings. The earliest record of missionary work by the SDA Church in Mexico dates back to 1891, when an Italian-American tailor, S. Marchisio, went to Mexico City to sell the English edition of The Great Controversy. Two years later, in 1893, a missionary party, composed of Dan T. Jones, Dr. Lillis Wood (later Mrs. Starr), Ida Crawford, Ora Osborne (a recent convert, formerly a missionary for another denomination in Mexico), and Alfred Cooper and his wife, arrived at Guadalajara and assisted in opening a medical mission and a school. Later the clinic developed into the Guadalajara Sanitarium. This medical venture in Mexico was reported as the first attempt by SDAs in the line of medical missionary work outside of the United States (Review and Herald 7:437, July 10, 1894).

The first church in Mexico was organized at Guadalajara about 1893 or 1894 in connection with the establishment of the medical mission, and from about 1896, according to reports appearing in the Review and Herald, a missionary periodical was printed at Guadalajara under the name El Amigo de la Verdad.

In 1897 the General Conference sent G. W. Caviness to Guadalajara as a Seventh-day Adventist representative on an interdenominational Bible translation project. While there he studied Spanish and did some translating. In 1899 he moved to Mexico City to open work there. He was assisted by S. Marchisio and M. Placencia, who with their families had come to Mexico City from the United States. They began their work by organizing an English language school.

By 1904 Seventh-day Adventist work had spread to Guadalajara, Mexico City, San Luis Potosí, Torreón, Tuxpan, Monte Cristo, and Ameca, and the total reported church membership reached 72. By the end of 1907 companies had been established in Gómez Palacio, San Pedro, Tampico, and Monterrey, and church membership was reported as 121.

Shortly after this, adherents were also reported far to the south, on the isthmus of Tehuantepec. One of them was Aurelio Jiménez, who, as early as 1895, had read of the signs of Christ's second coming, on a tract used as a bread wrapper. In 1905 medicine he had ordered as a "sure cure" for alcoholism, and which he hoped would benefit his parents, came wrapped in a 2-year-old copy of El Mensajero de la Verdad. He subscribed to the paper, accepted its teachings, and was baptized by Caviness, who visited this family in 1909 at Ixtaltepec. Jiménez later became a denominational worker and was instrumental in spreading the SDA message in the mountains of Chiapas and in the plains of Tabasco, where the densest population of SDAs is now found.

The publishing work played a prominent role in the early days of SDA activities in Mexico. But it was not without opposition that Spanish papers and books were distributed. At one time, soon after Steps to Christ and Christ Our Saviour were first printed in Spanish in 1899, 50 copies of these books were burned in a public park in front of a church in Mixcoac; and once Marchisio was condemned to be shot, and saved himself only by speaking to the officer in English. In 1903 or 1904 a small printing plant was established in Tacubaya, a suburb of Mexico City, and the printing of the missionary paper, renamed in 1901 El Mensajero de la Verdad, was transferred there. This marked the beginning of a rapid spread of SDA teachings. George M. Brown took charge of the printing work, and J. G. Rojas assisted him. Brown remained in Mexico until 1908, when his little daughter died.

In July 1909 the first colporteur institute was held. Marchisio, Christian Schultz, and E. Fernández, who had already been canvassing in Mexico, were joined that same year by four students brought by Caviness from San Fernando Academy in California: J. L. Brown, J.A.P. Green, Earl Hackett, and A. A. Reinke. H.A.B. Robinson also joined the ranks of colporteurs in 1909. In 1910 another group joined them: Hersel Butka, Henry Brown, and J. B. Douglas. Reinke died of typhoid six months after arrival and was buried in the Dolores cemetery in Tacubaya. The others were able to take advantage of the centennial of Mexican independence in September 1910 by selling SDA publications, printed with the national colors, along the route of the huge parade in Mexico City. About that time El Mensajero de la Verdad was renamed Las Señales de los Tiempos, and the children's paper, El Amigo de los Niños, was first published.

Self-supporting missionary work was conducted in the early days not only by doctors, teachers, and colporteurs but also by businessmen. For example, after the Guadalajara Sanitarium ceased to be operated by the denomination in 1907, Alfred Cooper moved away from Guadalajara to settle in Mexico City and there operated a canning factory (later developed into a nationwide business), devoting his spare time to evangelism. Similarly, in San Luis Potosí, Julius Paulson operated a fruit cannery and a large bakery business while actively conducting missionary work.

Despite the revolutionary movement that kept Mexico in a state of upheaval from 1910 to 1917, SDA work continued to expand. In 1911 J.A.P. Green and Henry Brown were able to sell a large number of copies of Patriarchs and Prophets in Yucatán, a distant corner of the republic. In the same year H. L. Rawson began new work in Monterrey. Two years later Antonio Torres, a national who later became a worker and established a record for the longest continuous service in Mexico, was converted. In 1914, when the political situation made necessary the total evacuation of American workers for a short time, Carlos Nicolas, a Spaniard, was left in charge of the small group of national workers in the capital. Late in 1915 G. W. Caviness and the work of printing the missionary magazine were moved to Washington, D.C. Then in 1918 the printing was returned to Mexico, but a short time later the Pacific Press set up its Spanish language presses in the Canal Zone.

While the missionary publication was being printed in Washington, J. D. Leslie managed its sale in Mexico from 1916 to 1920. The colporteurs reported good success in their work; for example, sometime in 1920 five men, some of them new in the work, within five weeks sold 700 copies of Patriarchs and Prophets in the Tampico area.

During the formative years of the Mexican Mission, Dan T. Jones, George M. Brown, G. W. Reaser, and G. W. Caviness successively led the work. In 1920 J. E. Bond replaced Caviness, who left Mexico in 1921 after 24 years of service. A short time later Bond left because of poor health and J. A. Leland, E. F. Peterson, and F. L. Perry followed successively during 1922 and early 1923.

2. Organization. The SDA Mission in Mexico was organized about 1903. From then on to 1913 it was listed in the Statistical Report of the General Conference among the miscellaneous missions under direct General Conference supervision. In 1915 it was grouped with the Northern Latin American Missions (or Northern Spanish American Missions) under the General Conference, and continued to be when these missions became part of the newly formed North Latin-American Union Conference in 1918. In 1919 Mexico became a separate mission again. The 1921 and 1922 Yearbooks list Mexico under the Mexican and Central American missions. In 1922, when the Inter-American Division was organized with two groups of missions, the Mexican Mission was included in the western one; in the 1923 Yearbook it was listed under the Central American Mission.

In 1923 the Mexican Mission, which now reported 17 churches and 505 members in the whole republic, with seven foreign ministers, was included in the newly organized Aztec Union, together with Guatemala, El Salvador, Honduras, and British Honduras, and was administered by the union officers, whose headquarters were in Mexico City. J. A. Leland was the first superintendent, but was replaced almost immediately by D. A. Parsons, who directed the work in Mexico for seven years, until 1930.

In 1920 the territory of the mission was divided into six districts. In 1924 the area was organized into five missions: Gulf, under C. F. Staben, at Monterrey; Central Mexican, under E. E. Beddoe, in Mexico City; Occidental, under W. F. Hardt, at Guadalajara; Tehuantepec, under H. J. Winter, in Mexico City; Sonora, under C. E. Moon, at Nogales. The next year a sixth mission, Yucatán, was organized with only six members, under G. G. Brown, at Mérida.

At the General Conference session of 1926, held at Milwaukee, Wisconsin, the Mexican missions were combined into the Mexican Union Mission, with 29 churches and 656 members. Union headquarters were located first in Mexico City, then in 1936 were moved to Monterrey, and in 1948 back to Mexico City, a center convenient for travel and the conduct of public relations.

The original six missions, which were organized late in 1924 and 1925, went through several changes in territory and headquarters. Between 1931 and 1943 the number of missions was reduced to four, the Lake and Gulf missions absorbing the short-lived Sonora and Sierra Madre missions. Yucatán was absorbed by Tehuantepec. In 1943 Yucatán was reorganized, and Chiapas was detached in 1944 to form a separate mission, thus bringing the number of missions back to six. Between 1947 and 1953 the lines of demarcation were completely redrawn and the names of the missions changed to the present Central, Interoceanic, North, Pacific, South, and Southeast corporaciones. The term corporaciones was adopted to avoid the stigma sometimes attached to the word "mission." For a short period in 1952, a seventh administrative unit, the Western Mexican District centering in Guadalajara, was in existence, with three SDA workers.

In 1975 again a territorial adjustment, affecting several missions, was made. Several provinces were organized as the Western Mexican Mission, with headquarters in Guadalajara, Jalisco, and with an approximate membership of 2,500.

The Inter-American Division also voted to grant conference status, beginning January 1975, to the following missions: Central Mexican Mission, South Mexican Mission, and Southeast Mexican Mission.

As mentioned above, the Mexican Union was divided into the North Mexican Union and the South Mexican Union in 1985 and the conferences and missions were reorganized as indicated.

Soon after the organization of the Mexican Union, the first general meeting of SDAs in Mexico was held at Huerta Vieja, Guerrero, on Feb. 2—6, 1929. According to the report of the previous year, there were 33 churches and 1,083 members in the union. Following the early formative years under Elder Parsons (1926—1930), the administration of the union was placed in the hands of Clarence E. Wood (1931—1941), Harold F. House (1941—1943), Walter E. Murray (1944—1946), E. N. Lugenbeal (1947), Henry J. Westphal (1947—1953), E. J. Lorntz (1953—1954), and Harold F. House, second term (1955—1958), David H. Baasch (1959—1961), Alfredo Aeschlimann (1961—1970), Velino Salazar (1970—1978), and Samuel Guizar (1978—1985).

Some notable building projects undertaken largely by the union or with union and division help included church buildings at Tacubaya (1963), Monterrey (1936), Tampico (1943), Mérida and Villahermosa (1948), Puebla (1950), Narvarte (1951), Tecpatán (1956), Montemorelos (1959), and the Anahuac and Portales evangelistic centers in Mexico City (1962—1964). In 1973 a modern evangelistic center that seats 1,200 people was built and inaugurated in Mexico City.

IV. Departmental Work

IV. Departmental Work. 1. Medical Work. In 1929 Drs. T. Gordon Reynolds and Eugene E. Gloor opened self-supporting medical missionary clinic work and a training school for missionary nurses near Cajeme, a few miles north of Ciudad Obregón, Sonora, on the Pacific Coast. In 1932 a clinic was built in Tacubaya, a suburb of Mexico City. In 1934 Dr. I. S. Ritchie, who came to Mexico City as medical secretary of the union, led in training workers and educating lay members in medical missionary work. In 1936 G. A. Roberts, president of the Inter-American Division, recommended the building of many small clinics in connection with churches throughout Mexico. In response, Dr. Raymundo Garza, a 1938 convert through listening to an SDA radio program from Havana, and a member of the church in Monterrey, organized a successful clinic in rooms underneath the newly built church and office building in that city.

Other clinics were operated with varying degrees of success at Saltillo, Torreón, Namiquipa, and Durango in the north; Guadalajara, Ciudad Obregón, and Mexicali in the west; Tampico, Veracruz, Número Uno, Libertad, and Tacotalpa along the Gulf Coast; Ixtaltepec and Agua Escondida in Chiapas Mission; Puebla and Tacubaya in the center of the country. In 1947 Hospital y Sanatorio Montemorelos was established. There were also institutions undertaken on individual initiative. One of these, a hospital at Teapa, Tabasco, was built in 1950, and functioned sporadically for a few years. Another clinic and model village under the name Yerba Buena Mission was developed to serve as a center for medical and educational service.

Former Colegio Vocacional y Profesional de Montemorelos is now Universidad de Montemorelos. In September 1975 the School of Medicine of this university opened its doors.

2. Educational Work. In the earliest days of the SDA work in Mexico, small schools teaching English were operated in Guadalajara and Mexico City. Also, a small school for Mexican children in La Viza, San Luis Potosí, was operated in the early years and a small school for the Julius Paulson children in San Luis Potosí. But the enforcement of existing educational laws prevented the establishment of a permanent training school for many years.

A school for training gospel workers was begun about 1910 by W. Yarnell in Tacubaya, a suburb of Mexico City. Later, in January 1919, a brief workers' meeting was held at a private home in Laredo for the same purpose. From 1923 to 1925 the Aztec Union Training School in Mexico City operated, first under the direction of H. F. Brown, and later under that of F. M. Owen and C. E. Moon. From 1929 to 1931 the Tehuantepec Training School functioned at Puerto Mexico (now Coatzacoalcos) under the direction of Rafael Aguilar and Paciente Trinidad, with an enrollment of up to 84 students.

In 1931 a short course of three months' duration was given in Tacubaya. The director and only teacher there was Joseph W. Phillips, who was known in Latin America under the adopted name of José Felipe Caminos. This school was not listed in the SDA Yearbook. In October 1931 the Escuela Industrial y de Salud ("School of Industry and Health"), later known as Colegio Adventista Mexicano, was opened, with Harold F. House as principal. It is listed through 1935. This school had a business department, staffed by B. E. Villarreal and his wife, who moved their own business academy from Saltillo for this purpose, and a printing department, which furnished vocational training and employment for some students.

In October 1936 A. G. Parfitt and his wife, who had come from the Tehuantepec Mission, opened a small school in Mexico City. Statistical reports indicate that this was an elementary school the first year but became a secondary school in 1937. At the time of its opening in the Tacubaya church building, 12 young men of promise were sent from the various missions in Mexico. This school, known first as the Instituto Comercial Prosperidad and during its last year as the Instituto Biblico, continued until late in 1942. Then the new school at Montemorelos, now known as Universidad de Montemorelos (former Colegio Vocacional y Profesional de Montemorelos), took over its functions. In 1948 two schools were established to serve the needs of the SDA youth in northwestern and southwestern parts of Mexico, the Escuela Agricola e Industrial del Pacifico (now Colegio del Pacifico) and the Escuela Agricola e Industrial del Sureste (now Colegio Linda Vista).

Elementary schools for Indian children in remote areas were promoted about 1931 by C. E. Moon in the Central Mission, with such schools being operated at Santa Maria, Mexico, and Puente de Ixtla, Morelos. In time, as the application of educational laws became more lenient and the government engaged in a great campaign against illiteracy, new impetus was given to elementary schools, and after about 1943 their number rapidly increased. In harmony with the law, these schools are not operated by the church but by an independent organization, the Asociación Civil Filantrópica y Educativa (“Civil Philanthropic and Educational Association”), and religion is not taught in the classroom. The recognition by the federal government of the normal school at Montemorelos in September 1961 was a great aid in the elementary educational work, which had been hindered by the lack of recognized and trained personnel.

A number of primary schools in the mountains of Sonora were established and supported by a group of laymen in southern California who were inspired by SDA missionary doctors.

3. Church Ministries (Lay Activities Department). During the early years of the Mexican Union, the home missionary work was combined with the publishing work. C. E. Moon became the first to dedicate almost full time to the department (1942—1948). The lay activities of the church expanded during the following era, when visual aids such as Viewmaster projectors were introduced, and lay preachers’ evangelism and lay Bible instructors’ courses were developed. Because a minister in some districts is responsible for up to 40 churches and companies and can visit each only once or twice a year, the training of laymen has been considered especially important.

4. Sabbath Schools. Throughout the years Sabbath school membership has normally been about 180 percent of church membership. In the early days the Sabbath School Department was often entrusted to the wife of the president or of some other union or mission worker. Later it was carried along with other departments (usually the Home Missionary Department) by one of the mission officers. Vacation Bible Schools were successfully launched under the leadership of Sergio Moctezuma. The Church Ministries Department also promotes an outstanding branch Sabbath school program.

5. Publishing Work. As noted earlier, SDA publications for the Spanish-speaking countries of the Inter-American Division were transferred in 1918 to the Pacific Press branch in the Panama Canal Zone. The Mexican evangelistic periodical El Mensajero de la Verdad was superseded by El Centinela in 1922. Book and Bible Houses existed in separate mission offices until 1937, when the work was consolidated in one central agency in Monterrey, near the union office. In 1942 the Book and Bible House moved to Mexico City, where Melchor Covarrubias and A. J. Calderón were in charge until 1949, when they were succeeded by José Leor. In the early days of the Aztec Union, J. D. Leslie and J. B. Nelson led the colporteurs. By 1963 the number of regular colporteurs rose to more than 130, with an equal number of students joining them during school vacation periods.

6. Radio. In 1945 C. E. Moon began a radio program on health topics, entitled La Voz del Hogar. Because of existing laws, the Spanish Voice of Prophecy program for a time could be broadcast on only one station. A related correspondence school, conducted by G. W. Chapman, was well received, and many students proceeded from the home and health course to the regular Voice of Prophecy lessons. In 1962, through the efforts of Sergio Moctezuma and David García Poyato, the regular Voice of Prophecy program was put on the air on eight stations.

In 1975 the Voice of Prophecy program (Voz de la Esperanza) was on 57 stations, and the La Voz del Hogar program was on 32 stations.

7. Young People's Work. The first youth leader in the Mexican Mission listed in the Yearbook was J. R. Manzano in 1923. In 1942 the first youth camp was held at the Balneario de San Francisco, near Monterrey. A second was held at Lagunas de Sempoala near Mexico City in 1943. Two youth congresses were held in 1944 and in 1948. The heroic stand of Josué Tirado, a student from the Montemorelos school who set a fine example of faithfulness under adverse circumstances in military service during World War II, led to the official recognition of the noncombatant position for SDA youth and to their assignment to the medical corps.

The first Medical Cadet training camps were held in the early 1950s at Montemorelos, Camohmila, Popo Park, San Francisco, and Tata Santos. In 1953 a model junior camp was held at San Francisco, Nuevo León, for the benefit of mission MV secretaries. Youth congresses were held in 1952 at Puebla and Teapa, and a delegation of 30 attended the Pan-American Youth Congress in San Francisco, California, in 1953. The Pathfinder and leadercraft training programs were initiated in Mexico in 1954.

The Guanajuato state project, a youth evangelistic program, launched during 1952—1953 by the MV Department, initiated the first permanent work in this area at the geographical center of the republic. It led to the establishment of a church at León, and was an inspiring precedent for later union- and division-sponsored projects for entering new territory in Colima (1961), Aguascalientes (1962), and Baja California Sur (1963).

Mexican MVs participated in the Golden Anniversary MV Congress in Havana in 1945; the Voice of Youth, Tell Ten, and Operation Fireside (Cristo al Hogar), and other missionary youth activities were actively promoted, and a youth congress was held at Puebla in 1961.

The Mexican unions present a great challenge in the Inter-American Division. Mexico, with a population of about 92.3 million, is the largest country in Inter-America. The federal capital, Mexico City, is one of the largest cities in the world.

The work of the Seventh-day Adventist Church is growing fast in Mexico. Its organizations and institutions are being strengthened and upgraded. Thousands of new members are added to the church every year.

Meyer, Albert

MEYER, ALBERT (1889—1963). Administrator. He was born in Pully (Vaud), Switzerland, one of four brothers who all became outstanding religious workers. In 1916 he entered the work in the Lemman (French-Swiss) Conference. In 1919 he was called to the Alsace and Lorraine Conference for evangelistic work and from there in 1921 to North Africa to serve as superintendent of the Algerian Mission. In 1928 he became head of the Moroccan Mission, and six years later he was called back to the Algerian Mission as district leader. From 1938 to 1944 Meyer served as the president of the Lemman Conference, and from 1944 to 1952 as president of the Swiss Union Conference. In 1946, while still serving as leader of the union, he was given the extra responsibility of serving as secretary of the Ministerial Association of the Southern European Division. This post he held until failing health made it necessary for him to retire in 1957.

Meyer, Oscar

MEYER, OSCAR (1887—1960). Conference administrator in France and Switzerland. Brought up in a Swiss Protestant home, he was baptized in 1904, at the age of 17, and joined the Seventh-day Adventist Church. He attended the Latin Union School at Gland, Switzerland. In 1910 he entered denominational employment and from 1911 to 1916 was secretary of the Lemman Conference. In 1912 he was married to H el ene Aufranc. Ordained in 1917, he served as a minister in Switzerland until about 1920, when he went to France. From 1924 to 1928, he was president of the South France Conference; from 1928 to 1932 and again from 1936 to 1942 he was president of the Franco-Belgian Union Conference and the North France Conference simultaneously. Until his retirement in the mid-fifties, he worked in southern France.

Meyer, Paul

MEYER, PAUL (1886—1945). Pioneer evangelist in Portugal and western France, conference administrator. A Swiss Protestant who joined the Seventh-day Adventist Church in 1905. He planned a career in business, but after attending the Latin Union School at Gland, Switzerland, for one year, he entered, in 1908, denominational employment. In 1912 he was ordained to the ministry and preached in Portugal. From 1917 to 1924 he was superintendent of the Portuguese Mission. Afterward he worked in northwestern France, and in 1937 and 1938 was president of the South France Conference. He died in the course of World War II in the Dachau concentration camp, where he was sent for his alleged smuggling of refugees out of occupied France.

Michael, The Archangel

MICHAEL, THE ARCHANGEL. The name and title of a celestial being mentioned in Jude 9 as contending with the devil about the body of Moses. The name Michael occurs also in Dan. 10:13, 21; 12:1 as one of the “chief princes” of the Jews, who had been helping Gabriel at the court of Persia, who alone shared Gabriel’s knowledge of the future, and who would deliver Daniel’s people from their foes at the end of time. The context requires that Michael be considered a supernatural being. In Rev. 12:7 Michael commands the angelic forces in the great struggle in heaven that resulted in the expulsion of Lucifer and his angels. In each instance the name occurs in the context of conflict with Satan. Clement of Alexandria, Origen, and Didymus refer to Jude 9 as a quotation from the pseudepigraphal Assumption of Moses, extant portions of which, however, do not contain such a statement.

The Millerites and others identified Michael the archangel with Christ. In an exposition of Dan. 12:1 William Miller wrote: “Michael, in this passage, must mean Christ; He is the great Prince, and Prince of princes” (Evidences From Scripture and History of the Second Coming of Christ [1840], pp. 108, cf. p. 209). Other commentators set forth three main arguments for holding that Michael is simply another name for Christ: (1) the statement in Jude 9; (2) the voice of Christ is the voice of the archangel (1 Thess. 4:16); (3) Michael is called a prince (Dan. 12:1) even as Christ is (Isa. 9:6, 7; Eze. 37:25; Dan. 8:25; 9:25; Acts 5:30, 31) (F. H. Berick, The Lord Soon to Come [1854], pp. 137—139).

Most Seventh-day Adventists have held that Michael is Christ. On the basis of these and other passages of Scripture, Seventh-day Adventists conclude that Michael is none other than Christ—“archangel” not in the sense of being the highest angel (chief among equals), but of being ruler over the angelic hosts (as infinitely superior to them). According to 1 Thess. 4:16, the voice of the archangel is heard when Christ descends and the righteous dead are raised, whereas in John 5:25—29 it is the voice of Christ, the Son of God, that summons the dead. In view of the fact that Michael means “Who is like God?” and that Satan’s rebellion was essentially a challenge of the deity and prerogatives of Christ as the Son of God, the name is particularly appropriate in the context of conflict with Satan, in which it always occurs. See SDACom 7:706; SDADic 714.

Michael, Wilhelm

MICHAEL, WILHELM (1884—1945). Teacher, writer, poet, and minister in Germany. Before joining the Seventh-day Adventist Church he studied classical philology and German at Munich, Leipzig, Heidelberg, and Halle, obtaining a doctorate from the latter, and the next year passed examinations qualifying him for university teaching. He was assistant master at the Convent of Our Lady at Magdeburg when he accepted the SDA faith and was baptized, in 1921. Soon thereafter he was called to teach at Neandertal Missionary Seminary, and became its principal in 1923. From 1928 to 1934, he was principal at Friedensau Missionary Seminary, then taught at Marienhöhe Seminary from 1934 to 1939, and returned to Friedensau in 1939, where he headed the seminary until it closed its doors in 1943 and became a military hospital. He was ordained to the ministry in 1940.

Besides teaching, he wrote numerous articles for SDA papers, and published several tracts. He was also a talented poet. Several of his poems appear in the German songbook.

History

History. Early Adventist Work in Michigan. The first Adventists in Michigan migrated to the state from the eastern United States, where they had heard the preaching of William Miller and others during the 1830s and early 1840s. In 1849 Joseph Bates came to Michigan to seek out some of these scattered remnants of the Millerite movement. At Jackson he met over a weekend with a group of these Adventists, among whom were the families of Dan R. Palmer, J. C. Bowles, C. P. Russell, Preston Dickinson, and old “Father” Whitmore. They were deeply convinced that Bates’s preaching, which dealt with the sanctuary, the Sabbath, and the “third angel’s message” (of Rev. 14), was the truth. On Monday morning Dan Palmer went to visit the Cyrenius Smith family, who had not been present for these meetings, and convinced them that Bates’s preaching was the truth.

Bates left for the East on Monday evening. The small group studied and prayed, and at the end of the week 15 people met in the home of Dan Palmer and kept their first Sabbath. A church was founded that year.

Among the early leaders in the church, along with Palmer, were Cyrenius Smith, Merritt E. Cornell, John Preston Kellogg, and Henry Lyon. Cornell, one of Bates’s early converts, had been a non-Sabbatarian Adventist minister. J. P. Kellogg, also a former Millerite, was a convert of Cornell’s and was the father of John Harvey Kellogg, longtime head of the Battle Creek Sanitarium, and of Will K. Kellogg, founder of the breakfast food industry. Henry Lyon was Cornell’s father-in-law.

Another early visitor to Michigan, and a later settler there, was John Byington, a former Methodist minister from New York, who crisscrossed the state, holding evangelistic meetings. J. N. Andrews made his first visit to Michigan in 1851, and J. N. Loughborough and James and Ellen White in 1853.

It was at Battle Creek, which soon became the center of Adventist activity in Michigan, that Joseph Bates found David Hewitt, to whom he was referred by the postmaster, of whom Bates had inquired as to who was the most honest man in town. From this beginning a congregation grew, whose first church was built in 1855 by another of Bates’s converts, J. B. Frisbie, who was the first pastor in Battle Creek. J. N. Loughborough and Merritt Cornell pitched the first Adventist evangelistic tent in Battle Creek on June 9—11, 1854. Funds for the tent were gathered from some of the early converts, such as Cyrenius Smith, Dan Palmer, and J. P. Kellogg. Earlier, in May 1854, James and Ellen White, J. N. Loughborough, and Merritt Cornell had held meetings in several counties in southern Michigan. In April 1855 Lyon, Palmer, Smith, Kellogg, and C. S. Glover made up a fund of $1,200 and offered this to James White for a new printing plant for the Review and Herald, then being published at Rochester, New York. The offer was accepted, and a two-story frame building, 20’ x 30’ (6 m. x 9 m.), was built in Battle Creek.

It was at Battle Creek, in 1861, that Seventh-day Adventist denominational organization was born. The problems of identification, ministerial ordination, finance, and the holding of church properties finally overcame the strong feeling against formal organization that had been inherited from the Millerite movement. In a meeting on Oct. 5 and 6, 1861, a year after the name Seventh-day Adventist was adopted, the Michigan churches united to form the Michigan Conference of Seventh-day Adventists. The first officers elected were the chair, Joseph Bates, and the secretary, Uriah Smith. The first conference committee was composed of J. N. Loughborough, Moses Hull, and Merritt Cornell. The next year, at the second session, 17 churches in Michigan and one in northern Indiana were received into the conference.

After the organization of the Michigan Conference, other conferences were formed, and on May 21, 1863, in Battle Creek, the General Conference of Seventh-day Adventists was organized.

Early Activities and Institutions in Michigan. One of the first actions of the Michigan Conference was to provide for an evangelistic tent. In 1868 the first SDA camp meeting was held on the farm of Elihu H. Root, at Wright. Early General Conference institutions founded at Battle Creek were the Health Reform Institute (1866), which became the Battle Creek Sanitarium; and Battle Creek College (1874), the forerunner of Emmanuel Missionary College and Andrews University. A local SDA school was operated for a time, first in a cottage and then in a church, taught from 1856 to 1861 by Mrs. M. M. Osgood, Mary Louise Morton, Robert Holland, and John F. Byington. But James White wrote in 1861:

“We have had a thorough trial of a school at Battle Creek, under the most favorable circumstances, and have given it up, as it failed to meet the expectations of those interested” (Review and Herald 18:134, Sept. 24, 1861). Seven years afterward, Goodloe H. Bell, generally recognized as the father of the first successful church school in Michigan, opened a private school at the urging of James White, in a cottage near the institute. This became in 1872 a church school.

Growth of the Conference. The annual conference reports in the Review and Herald show a continual growth of the church in Michigan. On May 1, 1867, the membership stood at 1,335. A year later it was 1,573. “Systematic benevolence” funds pledged to the church during that year were $8,539.62. By 1890 the membership had grown to 3,058 and the tithe, increasing $4,000 in that year, was more than $34,000.

The reports of the forty-first annual session, 1901, mentioned for the first time an auditor’s report from the Lake Union Conference, the Sabbath School Department, the election of a state canvassing agent, and the establishment of the Missionary Department. The Educational Department was organized, and the one in charge was known as the superintendent of Sabbath schools and church schools.

In 1902, with a membership of 7,216, the conference was divided. The Upper Peninsula of Michigan, the Superior Mission, and the Lower Peninsula were divided into three conferences: the North Michigan Conference (the counties of Emmet, Charlevoix, Cheboygan, Presque Isle, Leelanau, Antrim, Otsego, Montmorency, Alpena, Benzie, Traverse, Kalkaska, Crawford, Oscoda, Alcona, Manistee, Wexford, Missaukee, Roscommon, Ogemaw, Iosco, Mason, Lake, Osceola, Clare, Gladwin, and Arenac), with the conference office at Petoskey; the West Michigan Conference (the counties of Oceana, Newaygo, Mecosta, Isabella, Muskegon, Montcalm, Ottawa, Kent, Ionia, Allegan, Barry, Eaton, Van Buren, Kalamazoo, Calhoun, Berrien, Cass, St. Joseph, and Branch), with the office in Grand Rapids; and the East Michigan Conference (the counties of Midland, Bay, Huron, Gratiot, Saginaw, Tuscola, Sanilac, Clinton, Shiawassee, Genesee, Lapeer, St. Clair, Ingham, Livingston, Oakland, Macomb, Jackson, Washtenaw, Wayne, Hillsdale, Lenawee, and Monroe), with the office at Holly.

In 1917 the northern tier of seven counties in Indiana was added to the West Michigan Conference. In 1918 one of these counties, Lake, was annexed to the newly formed Chicago Conference. In 1926 the North Michigan Conference was absorbed into the West Michigan Conference and the Upper Peninsula was assigned to the North Wisconsin Conference.

In 1931 the two conferences and the Upper Peninsula were reunited, and the Indiana counties returned to the Indiana Conference. Now again Michigan Conference included the entire state. The conference office was located in Lansing, where in 1955 a new and efficient office building was erected.

Membership and tithe continued to grow. In 1934 the number of church members passed the 10,000 mark; by 1958, 15,000; and during the camp meeting session of 1973, conference president Robert D. Moon announced that membership had passed the 20,000 mark. (Actual membership of SDAs within the state was closer to 25,000 because of the number of Michigan SDAs belonging to the Lake Region Conference.) Not until 1948 did yearly tithe go beyond $1 million. Eleven years later $2 million was recorded, $3 million in 1965, $4 million in 1968, $5 million by 1971, and in 1973 more than $6 million in tithe was turned in.

In 1932 a tract of land was purchased near Grand Ledge, 10 miles (16 kilometers) west of Lansing, for a permanent camp-meeting site. Previously camp meetings had been held in various places. In order to utilize the land, the conference committee in 1958 voted to establish Grand Ledge Academy, its third boarding academy.

Michigan Conference is forever changing, and in 1988 the last camp meeting was held at Grand Ledge. In 1985 the last class graduated from the academy. The land is in the process of being sold. There are now mini-camp meetings and the possibility of having camp meeting at Great Lakes Adventist Academy, which was formerly Cedar Lake Academy. When Adelphian and Cedar Lake came together, the name was changed to Great Lakes Adventist Academy. It is now the only boarding academy in Michigan.

In 1948 the conference purchased an 840-acre (350-hectare) wooded area just outside of Grayling in the northern part of the Lower Peninsula. The land, known as Camp AuSable, with its 125-acre (50-hectare) Lake Shellenbarger wholly within its boundaries, is a four-season camping and retreat facility. It is structured to accommodate both individuals and groups, large and small. The camp enables spiritual renewal to be combined with recreation. Another camp at Scott Lake in southwestern Michigan was purchased in 1948, but was sold in 1974. In 1967 members of the Upper Peninsula, many of whom find the distance to AuSable a deterrent, established their own camp at Sagola. An attractive lodge has been built with cabins and RV sites. The Upper Peninsula camp meeting is being held there as well as junior camps and spring and fall retreats.

Departmental activities are similar to those in most conferences. However, world records were set for a number of years by Michigan in Ingathering, literature evangelists' sales, and the number of Vacation Bible Schools held.

Middle East College

MIDDLE EAST COLLEGE. A coeducational senior college situated on a 70-acre (30-hectare) site in a suburb five miles (eight kilometers) east of Beirut, Lebanon, in the foothills of the Lebanon Mountains overlooking the city and the Mediterranean Sea. It is operated by a 10-member board of trustees, appointed quinquennially by the Middle East Union committee. It serves the educational needs of a constituency of 6,028 (1993) members and seeks to serve the interests of the territory of the Middle East Union—an area that comprises 17 independent countries and sheikdoms, and has an estimated population of 278 million. The college offers courses leading to a Bachelor of Arts degree with majors in business administration, education, religion, and theology. The Associate of Arts degree is available in business administration, computer science, elementary education, office administration, and religion. The 1992—1993 enrollment was 150. There were 15 teaching faculty and 18 administrative and staff members.

The school is open to all eligible young people who are willing to abide by school regulations. Forty percent of the students are members of the Seventh-day Adventist Church.

The institution operates under a permit from the Lebanese Government Department of Education, and is recognized by the Department of Education of the General Conference of Seventh-day Adventists as a four-year senior college. It is an accredited member of the Association of Seventh-day Adventist Colleges and Secondary Schools, with a certificate by the Board of Regents. It is associated with La Sierra University, California, which is accredited by the Western Association of Schools and Colleges.

Middle East College was known before 1946 as the Adventist College of Beirut (Beirut College). It was founded in 1939 as a two-year training school for young people who had completed high school and aimed to become ministers and teachers. The school was first accommodated in an enlargement of a building occupied by an SDA elementary school called école Adventiste (founded 1929), in Mousseitbeh, Beirut. Wartime conditions compelled the administration to move the school to Amman, Jordan, for one year (1940—1941). Back in Beirut again, the school steadily grew, until by 1944 it was obvious that a new location had to be found. Rented quarters were used for three years in the neighboring town of Beit Meri (Grand Hotel and Hotel Ghassoub, 1944—1947) until necessary buildings on the present campus could be erected.

In 1946 the institution was renamed Middle East College and the cornerstone of the men's dormitory was laid by the president of the republic of Lebanon, Sheikh Bechara el Khoury, and in 1947 the college moved into its own buildings. In order to provide an adequate water supply and facilities for a farm, more land was bought at the foot of the mountain in 1951. A new administration building was erected in 1955, and two years later a college service center was completed—a store and service station, with a bakery adjoining. Meanwhile students were provided with vocational training and work opportunities in the furniture factory (College Wood Products), the Maintenance Department, the dairy, poultry farm, and gardens. (Later the dairy, poultry farm, and store and service center were closed.) A second floor was added to the men's dormitory in 1959. In 1962 the bakery was considerably extended to meet the demands for "College Maid" products. In 1963 a new well and a reservoir provided for increased needs for water. Long-range plans were laid for a library building, science laboratories, and a college-community church building. In 1974 facilities for physical education, the Music Department, a new assembly hall, and a student center were added.

Among school publications are the following: an annual, College Echoes (1941—1945); an annual, Pine Echoes (1953—); and a school paper, Voice of MEC (1955—). Not all of these were published every year.

Middle East Division

MIDDLE EAST DIVISION. A former large unit of church organization to which was assigned the territory of Aden, Bahrain, Cyprus, Iran, Iraq, Jordan, Kuwait, Lebanon, Libya, Muscat and Oman, Qatar, Saudi-Arabia, Sudan, Syria, Trucial Oman, Turkey, United Arab Republic, and Yemen.

The division was organized in 1951, with a membership of 1,466 in 35 churches. It took the place of the Middle East Union Mission, which had functioned as a detached union mission under the General Conference from 1941 to 1951. This union grew out of the Arabic Union Mission, which developed out of the earlier Oriental Union Mission, both unions being parts of the European Division. Formed in 1927, the Arabic Union Mission comprised three missions—the Egyptian, Syrian, and Mesopotamian—including the present territory of the Middle East Division except Turkey, Iran, and Libya. It was part of the Central European Division from 1929 to 1941.

Turkey and Iran, formerly detached missions of the Central European Division, were added, and later the Israel Mission, a part of the former Palestine-Jordan Mission, was detached and placed under the General Conference, and in 1955 was transferred to the Southern European Division.

The Middle East Division, organized in 1951, formerly had two union organizations—the Nile Union (organized 1951, embracing Egypt, Libya, Sudan, and the western portion of Arabia), the East Mediterranean Union (successor of the Arabic Union Mission, organized 1927; reorganized 1941, 1951), comprising the rest of the division territory except the Iran Section.

In 1970 the territory of the Middle East Division was joined with that of three unions in Africa to form the new Afro-Mideast Division. The countries comprising the former division were then reorganized to form the Middle East Union.

Division Presidents: G. J. Appel, 1950—1958; R. A. Wilcox, 1958—1966; F. C. Webster, 1966—1970.

Middle East Messenger

MIDDLE EAST MESSENGER (1945—1980; 1945—1948 as Union Messenger; bi-monthly; English; files in GC). Official organ of the Middle East Division. With the formation of the Middle East Division, beginning in 1952, the Messenger was issued quarterly. From 1963 to 1969 the paper was issued as a bimonthly. With the reorganization of the Middle East Division in 1970, the Messenger became the official organ of the Middle East Union.

It was succeeded in 1980 by a quarterly paper called Middle East Union News.

Middle East Press

MIDDLE EAST PRESS. A publishing house with printing facilities publishing in six languages, operated by the Middle East Union Mission and founded in 1947 at Beirut, Lebanon. The only earlier Seventh-day Adventist publishing house in the area was the Arabic Literature Society, which began operation at Matariah, near Cairo, about 1928. But long before that Z. G. Baharian published the first tracts by multigraphing in 1891, and continued printing at Istanbul for several years, preparing literature in Greek, Armenian, and Turkish. A regular publishing program, employing colporteurs, was maintained in Turkey until the disruptions of World War I. In Egypt a book on the prophecies of Daniel was early (1902—1906) published in Arabic, and by 1912, 10 Arabic tracts were issued. Soon work began on a 250-page health book. The Sure Word of Prophecy, by M. H. Brown, ran through at least two editions (one edition was 7,500 copies), and by 1924, when a large religious book was needed, Our Day in the Light of Prophecy, by W. A. Spicer, was selected for translation. In the absence of denominationally owned printing facilities, work was done commercially or by denominational houses in Brookfield, Illinois, and Hamburg, Germany. The latter printed in the Arabic, Greek, Turkish, and Armenian languages.

The Arabic Literature Society was established at Matariah (with assistance by the Missions Press Fund) about 1928, with C.H.C. Rieckmann as society secretary. The organization moved to Haifa, Palestine, in the early 1930s (Erich Maier, manager), in 1938 to Jerusalem. A. G. Rodgers was named manager in 1941. Society headquarters moved back to Egypt by 1943, this time at Alexandria (M. C. Grin, manager). In 1946 the Literature Society was absorbed by the Eastern Publishing Association, organized by the Middle East Union at the headquarters in Alexandria. Within months, when the union headquarters moved to Beirut, Lebanon, the publishing association was moved also and in 1947 was renamed the Middle East Press. The union president served as its director.

The Eastern Publishing Association had also absorbed at its founding the Turkish Depository and the Iran Literature Society. F. Bäcker, A. Barlas, and F. F. Oster served as managers of the depository at Istanbul. In Iran, first at Tabriz, then in 1938 at Tehran, A. E. Ashod, Alb. Hessel, and H. E. Hargreaves were managers, with a publishing committee appointed by the Iran Mission. Since 1947 Turkish and Farsi publications have been issued by the Middle East Press. From 1956 to 1960 an Iran branch of the Middle East Press served as a book depository and publisher of Farsi literature, but Farsi publication was again placed under the control of the Beirut house. Sabbath school quarterlies in Turkish and Farsi have generally been issued by the local missions.

Printing was done on Heidelberg cylinder and platen letter presses, and Roland and Ryobi offset presses. The offset machines were added in 1969 and 1971, and about the same time the addition of camera and platemaking equipment made the institution complete and self-contained, as far as the offset process was concerned. Other equipment included an Intertype machine for typesetting, a Cleveland folder, a saddle gang stitcher for the magazines, a Kolbus casemaking machine for the cloth cover books, and a Sulby Minabinda for binding paperback books. Bradma addressing equipment was used for the periodical mailing lists.

In 1984 the press operation was stopped because of the civil war in Lebanon and financial difficulties. Most of the presses and equipment were sold, and printing was done in outside printing houses. Material for printing is prepared by computers in the press.

Managers: R. C. Dinning, 1951—1952; M. J. McCulloch, 1952—1958; R. E. Anderson, 1958—1969; J. A. Aikman, 1970—1976; D.A.E. Gramkow, 1976—1982; R. F. Stokes, 1982—1984; B. Ghazal, 1984—1985; M. Elmadjian, 1985—1990; R. Fidelia, 1992— .

Middle East Union Mission

MIDDLE EAST UNION MISSION. A unit of the Seventh-day Adventist Church that was a part of the Afro-Mideast Division until 1981 when it became an attached union under the General Conference. Because of civil war in Lebanon, the headquarters were moved to Nicosia, Cyprus. The Middle East Union is organized into five fields: East Mediterranean (Lebanon, Syria, Jordan), Egypt, Iran, Iraq, and Sudan, and three sections: Cyprus, Gulf (Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman, Qatar, United Arab Emirates), and Turkey.

There are 71 churches in the union with 8,085 members. The population is 278 million. Headquarters are at Nicosia, Cyprus.

“Midnight Cry”

“MIDNIGHT CRY.” A phrase that the Millerites used repeatedly to describe their message to the world, adapted from the words of Christ’s parable regarding the wise and the foolish virgins who were sleeping while waiting for the bridegroom to come to the marriage. “At midnight there was a cry made, Behold, the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him” (see Matt 25:1—13). The wise, with their lamps burning, went with the bridegroom in to the wedding; the foolish, who went to buy oil, returned too late and were left outside.

The “true midnight cry” was the phrase used in 1844 in the “seventh-month movement” that emphasized the specific date of Oct. 22 for the advent of Christ. This message was based on the following reasoning: Disappointment had come in the spring of 1844; and afterward, in the language of the parable, the 10 virgins were sleeping while the “bridegroom tarried.” Since in symbolic prophecy a 24-hour day symbolizes a year, a night would symbolize half a year. Midnight would be midway of that six-month period between the spring disappointment and the expected date in October. It was in that summer that the “true midnight cry,” “Behold, the bridegroom cometh,” began to go forth.

In later Seventh-day Adventist writings the phrase “midnight cry” sometimes denotes specifically the “true” midnight cry, the message of the 2300 days ending on Oct. 22, 1844; sometimes in a loose sense it is applied also to the earlier message as including and climaxing in the 1844 movement.

Mile High Adventist Academy

MILE HIGH ADVENTIST ACADEMY. A coeducational day school located at 711 East Yale Avenue, Denver, Colorado 80210, operated by the Rocky Mountain Conference. Elementary grades, K-8, are also located on the same campus and are under the same board of trustees and school administration.

The school operating committee is made up of representatives from the Mid-America Union and the Rocky Mountain Conference, pastors, and lay members of the six supporting churches, whose membership totals 2,969. The lay representation is determined by the various church boards and the number of seats for each church is based on church membership. Each of the constituent churches pays a monthly subsidy based upon membership, tithe, and the number of students in attendance. These subsidies plus tuition and fees, along with conference assistance, provide the revenues for its operation.

The school began in 1927 as Denver South Church School, with an enrollment of 48 students in grades 7—10. The Denver West Elementary School merged with Denver South in 1928 to form the Denver Junior Academy, with grades 1—10.

The school was moved to its present location in 1949 and continued as a 10-grade school. The four-acre (1.6-hectare) campus was leased for 99 years from Porter Memorial Hospital. In 1956 grade 11 was added. This was done with the view of advancing to a full 12-grade academy. DJA became Mile High Academy in 1963 with the addition of the twelfth grade.

The plant has undergone several phases of development since 1949. In 1952 a cafeteria was erected. In 1957 and again in 1961 elementary classrooms were built on the north part of the grounds. When the school had evolved into a full academy, a wing housing the home economics, music, and vocational departments was erected. In the summer of 1968 an addition housing the administrative suite (with its main office, guidance services, health department, and office for the Denver area youth pastor), four classrooms, library (with a 6,000-volume capacity), science complex, and commercial department was completed. A full court-sized gymnasium was completed in 1983.

In 1993 there was an enrollment of 215 in the elementary grades and 92 in grades 9—12.

Principals: J. B. Stevens, 1963—1967; Randall Fox, 1967—1971; Charles Hanson, 1971—1976; Harvey J. Byram, 1976—1979; W. G. Nelson, 1979—1982; William Hinman, 1982—1984; Kelly B. Millennium

MILLENNIUM. The period referred to as “a thousand years” in Rev. 20—the interval between the first and second resurrections—during which Satan is bound and those raised in the first resurrection reign with Christ. Literally the term (Latin mille , “thousand,” and annum, “year”) means simply a period of a thousand years; for example, the Exodus occurred in the second millennium before Christ.

I. Millerite Views Versus Others

I. Millerite Views Versus Others. The founders of the Seventh-day Adventist Church, having belonged to the earlier Adventist (Millerite) movement, inherited from it the distinctive Adventist interpretation, namely, that the millennium represents the beginning of the eternal reign of the immortal saints and that it comes after the close of human probation. The Millerite view was a distinct departure from the popular millennialism of that time.

The other premillennialists (premillennialism is the view that the second advent of Christ precedes the millennium) called Literalists, and the postmillennialists (postmillennialism is the view that the second advent of Christ comes after the millennium) both taught a “temporal” millennium, that is, one in which existed mortals still unregenerate, in which births and deaths still occurred, and in which there was still sin and repentance. Both applied to the millennium the OT kingdom prophecies concerning Israel. The postmillennialists applied these prophecies in a spiritual sense and referred them to an age of gradual improvement, social betterment, and the triumph of Christianity in the world in its present state. The Literalist premillennialists interpreted these prophecies literally and expected the Second Advent to inaugurate a reign not only of resurrected saints but also of mortals on earth. This earthly kingdom was pictured as the “iron-rod rule” of Christ, under which the Jews would rule and teach the “nations” from literal Jerusalem, where the Temple and the sacrifices would be restored, until the final revolt and destruction of the rebellious nations at the end of the millennium. The Millerites, rejecting the positions of both these groups, emphatically declared: “The only Millennium found in the word of God, is the thousand years which are to intervene between the first and second resurrections, as brought to view in the 20th of Revelation” (“Fundamental Principles,” as printed in The Western Midnight Cry 2:65, Feb. 10, 1844).

The Seventh-day Adventist view is essentially that of the Millerites, but with one significant difference. SDAs teach that the redeemed are in heaven during the millennium and that the renewal of the earth occurs at the end of the period, whereas the Millerites held that the saints were to reign on the renewed earth during that time.

II. Development of Seventh-day Adventist View

II. Development of Seventh-day Adventist View. The shift toward the SDA view began in 1845. James White afterward wrote that as early as 1845 he had taught that the kingdom of God would not be established on the earth until the end of the millennium, and added that E. R. Pinney (a Millerite minister) had held the same view in 1844 (Review and Herald 7:61, Oct. 16, 1855). Pinney, however, by 1850 was holding the old Millerite view. An ex-Millerite writing in the Day-Star (8:28, Nov. 22, 1845) mentioned “some” among the Adventists who “conclude that we shall not have the new heaven and earth until after the second resurrection, or end of the 1000 years.” This view was adopted, he asserted, to avoid the absurdity of having the bodies of the wicked dead rise from the cleansed and renewed earth after Christ and the saints had already reigned over it for a thousand years. It is not known how many Adventists held this in 1844—some in one Philadelphia congregation, also Storrs and reputedly Fitch. But these held, in addition, probation for some after the Advent. This was part of Literalism, which Storrs embraced in 1845. But Pinney and White, like the majority of Adventists, utterly rejected that view of prophecy.

Enoch Jacobs, in an editor’s note, says that all Adventist writings “hitherto, have been very dark and cloudy about the work of this 1000 years” (ibid. 29).

This haziness on the details of the millennium is apparent in O.R.L. Crosier’s article (Day-Star Extra, Feb. 7, 1846) entitled “The Law of Moses,” in which he explained the new sanctuary doctrine and in which he equated the antitype of the Day of Atonement with a period including the millennium. He described the next age as “the times of restitution” (p. 42), the uniting of the capital and the King in heaven with His subjects and territory on earth, and the millennium as “a stepping-stone” to “the earth redeemed and Edenized again”; yet he obviously expected the saved to be taken to the heavenly city at the Advent.

The proto-Seventh-day Adventists, who adopted Crosier’s exposition of the sanctuary doctrine as an explanation of the Millerite disappointment, took scant notice of his treatment of the millennium, since their emphasis, like his, lay elsewhere. However, in May 1846 Joseph Bates expressed a position intermediate between the Millerite doctrine and what was to become the SDA view. He expected the earth to be renewed at the Second Advent in one spot only—the place on which the Holy City was to rest (The Opening Heavens, pp. 22, 32).

On Apr. 7, 1847, Ellen White wrote a letter to Bates, later published by James White in A Word to the “Little Flock,” in which she implied that, following the Second Advent, the earth would be uninhabited (p. 20). Although not directly mentioning the millennium, she designated the “jubilee” as a time “when the land should rest,” and described (as also in her earliest communication, dating from the end of 1844) the returning Christ as taking the resurrected and the living saints to heaven.

Two weeks later she wrote to Eli Curtis (ibid., pp. 11, 12) expressing disagreement with certain of his views, but agreeing with his belief that the new heavens and the new earth would not appear until after the destruction of the wicked at the end of the thousand years. She also described the loosing of Satan as taking place at the time when the wicked dead would be raised, and showed that they would be burned up, root and branch, while attacking the Holy City, after which would come the new heavens and the new earth, the home of the righteous.

First mention of the millennium in the pioneer Seventh-day Adventist periodical The Present Truth (1849—1850) was in the issue for April 1850, in which Mrs. White spoke of the resurrected saints in heaven during the one thousand years; of the Holy City then descending to the earth; of the wicked raised, attacking the city and being destroyed; then of the cleansing and renewal of the earth, “for the feet of the wicked will never desecrate the earth made new” (1:71, 72; also reprinted in 1851 in A Sketch of the Experience and Views of Ellen G. White, p. 33).

In September 1850, in an article in The Advent Review (1:49—51, September 1850), James White referred to the millennium as the antitypical jubilee, a period of rest for the earth. He observed further that after the upheavals in connection with the Second Advent, and after the slaughter of all except the saints, the earth would be desolate and uninhabited, while the saints would be judging the world and the fallen angels during this thousand-year day of judgment. In the Advent Review Extra (September 1850) Hiram Edson emphasized the same essential points that had appeared in James White’s article.

In the last issue of The Present Truth (1:86, November 1850) a communication from Mrs. White (also reprinted in 1851 in her Experience and Views, pp. 33—35) describes the millennium in similar terms; it mentions the saints’ participation in apportioning punishment to the wicked according to the records, and emphasizes the destruction of the wicked at the end of the thousand years as the execution of judgment.

In the early 1850s the millennium became a topic of controversy because the “age-to-come” theory, advocated by Joseph Marsh and certain other former Millerites, was then being advocated by a small group of Adventist dissidents in Wisconsin (see Messenger Party). This doctrine was actually nothing new, but was the old Literalist form of premillennialism, already mentioned, from which the Millerite view had dissented.

The necessity of combating this doctrine called forth considerable discussion of the millennium in the Review and Herald. Two points especially were stressed: (1) the kingdom promises to the Jews were conditional, and (2) the probation of all closes at the Second Advent. One article, by J. B. Frisbie (Review and Herald 5:6, Jan. 24, 1854), offered Scripture evidence to show that the binding of Satan would be a condition resulting from the absence of any people to deceive, and that the chaotic and empty earth would be the “bottomless pit” in which Satan and his angels were to be confined during the thousand years. Between 1855 and 1857 several series of articles were written by James White, Joseph Bates, and J. H. Waggoner; the last named spoke of the removal of the inhabitants of the earth, leaving Satan, as the scapegoat, to roam in a “land uninhabited” (ibid. 9:93, Jan. 22, 1857).

III. Summary of Seventh-day Adventist View

III. Summary of Seventh-day Adventist View. SDAs generally discuss the millennium under three headings:

1. Events at the Beginning of the Millennium. The event that marks the opening of the millennium is the second advent of Jesus Christ. This is clear from the context of Rev. 20. Immediately preceding a discussion of the events of the millennium, Jesus is represented as descending from heaven upon a white horse, accompanied by the armies of heaven, smiting the nations of the earth, and leaving the dead strewn on the battlefield (Rev. 19:11—21).

A resurrection is also noted, called the first, and those who are raised in it are represented as living and reigning with Christ (Rev. 20:4—6). Paul also connects the second coming of Christ and the resurrection of the righteous dead, adding that at the same time the living righteous are changed to immortality, and that both groups meet the Lord in the air (1 Thess.

4:16, 17; 1 Cor. 15:51—54). According to John 14:1—3, Christ takes the saints to the place He has prepared for them in His Father's house, heaven (see Second Advent).

At the beginning of the millennium occurs also the binding and confining of Satan, represented in the vision by the dragon's being chained and cast into the bottomless pit "that he should deceive the nations no more, till the thousand years should be fulfilled" (Rev. 20:1—3). These symbols Seventh-day Adventists believe will be fulfilled in the confinement of Satan to this earth, which has been desolated by the judgments of God (Rev. 16:17—21), and in the restriction of his activities, caused by the depopulation of the earth as a result of the removal of the redeemed to heaven and the destruction of the wicked.

2. Events During the Millennium. The earth during this period is without a human inhabitant and in a state of ruin and desolation caused by the judgments of God associated with the second coming of Christ (see above). The redeemed live and reign with Christ a thousand years (Rev. 20:4). Christ having taken them to be where He is, in heaven (John 14:3; Heb. 11:16). They sit on thrones, and "judgment was given unto them" (Rev. 20:4). This, SDAs hold to be the judgment to which Paul referred when he said, "Do ye not know that the saints shall judge the world? . . . Know ye not that we shall judge angels?" (1 Cor. 6:2, 3). Together with Christ the redeemed consider the cases of the wicked and decide their punishment.

3. Events at the Close of the Millennium. At the close of the period the wicked dead are raised (Rev. 20:5). This event looses Satan from his prison, for once more he has subjects upon whom to practice his wiles (v. 7). He deceives the nations of the wicked, and gathers them for an attack on the Holy City (v. 9), which by now has been transferred to the earth, though the actual descent is not mentioned till Rev. 21:2. The move upon the city results in the final destruction of the wicked in the lake of fire, which is declared to be the second death (see Hell). Out of the fires that destroy both sinners and the earth, emerges a new earth (2 Peter 3:12, 13; Rev. 21:1, 2; see Home of the Redeemed).

Miller, E. B.

MILLER, E. B. (1855—1900). Educator. In 1879 he received the first degree ever granted by Battle Creek College. He then taught in that institution until 1892, when he was called to take charge of the college in Claremont, South Africa (1893—1895). After teaching at Walla Walla College (1895—1896), he was appointed president of Union College (1896—1897), but ill health forced an early retirement.

Miller, Harold Amadeus

MILLER, HAROLD AMADEUS (1891—1966). Musician and educator. He attended South Lancaster Academy, Princeton University, and other schools. He taught at Mount Vernon Academy, Washington Missionary College, Southern Missionary College, Union College, and Pacific Union College.

After serving the denomination for 37 years, he retired in Tennessee, where the fine arts building at Southern Missionary College is named in his honor. In addition to his many teaching activities in the field of music, he produced scores of musical compositions. Ten of his hymns are included in the Church Hymnal.

Miller, Harry Willis

MILLER, HARRY WILLIS (1879—1977). China doctor, soybean product pioneer. He was born in a log cabin near Ludlow Falls, Ohio, the oldest of the five children of Amanda and John Oliver Miller. After graduating from Mount Vernon Academy in Ohio, he enrolled at American Medical Missionary College in Battle Creek. He graduated from medical school in 1902, along with Maude Thompson, who became his wife in that year.

In 1903 Miller, working with other physicians, took part in laboratory work involving fungus infections. Their experiments established the fact that certain fungi are far more dangerous, even life-threatening, than generally thought at that time.

Early on he established a reputation as a skillful surgeon with a promising future for a lucrative practice in the United States, but when a medical student suggested that the Millers could do a good work in China, the young couple caught the vision. They sailed on the Empress of India in October 1903.

In China Miller treated high government officials and lowly coolies alike. At that time Chinese men wore “pigtails” as a sign of loyalty to the government. Miller adopted this hairstyle and topped it off with a “mao tze,” a type of skullcap. He wore the long robes of the nationals, and when in areas dangerous to foreigners he sometimes tinted his face with diluted iodine.

His physician wife, Maude, died of sprue and overwork less than two years after their arrival in China. She was 25. More than three years later Miller, who had returned briefly to the United States, married Marie Iverson, a nurse, who dedicated her life to China as well as to her husband.

Miller was stricken with sprue in 1911, but a quick return to America for medical treatment saved his life.

While in the United States during World War I, Miller was asked to act as medical superintendent of the floundering Washington Sanitarium (now Washington Adventist Hospital). He accepted with reluctance.

About that time Miller developed skill and a reputation in successful thyroid surgery that involved a system of hydrotherapy in aftercare. Eventually the sanitarium increased to 250 beds, with most of the improvements being financed by fees for thyroid surgery.

In 1925 Harry, Marie, and their four children returned to China. Miller worked at the new, thriving Shanghai Sanitarium, dealing impartially with the wealthy and the poverty-stricken. High officials gave him many cash gifts, all of which were turned over to the hospital. During this time he became interested in the nutrition aspects of the soybean. This came about partially because the Chinese did not use animal milk. If a mother could not nurse her baby, and no wet nurse was available, the child died.

Miller was called repeatedly to the Philippines for highly specialized surgery cases. In 1928 he sat for the Philippine medical exams. He was doubtful of passing, but came out with the third-highest score, and was the only person ever to obtain 100 percent in any subject. He achieved this in surgery.

Anticipating the Japanese occupation of Shanghai, Miller and Allen Boynton had collected 350,000 pounds of rice. With this they fed about 20,000 Chinese. Miller organized a small “city,” with work assignments and responsibilities for the thousands of “citizens.”

Marie Miller died in 1950 when the family was back in the United States. Three years later Harry was asked to establish a sanitarium in Formosa. He was nearly 75. When he proposed to a sweet-singing teacher, Mary Elizabeth Greer, some 40 years his junior, she accepted, and they were off for eastern Asia. Later they served in Trinidad and Libya. Mary Miller once said, “Your wildest imagination could never approach the real adventure of our life.”

In later years Harry Miller worked seriously with the soybean. He made products that were tasty and practical. These included “vegeburgers,” “wieners,” and soy cheese. His crowning accomplishment, however, was a tasty, affordable, nutritious soy milk, which literally saved the lives of many Chinese babies. Before his death Miller saw his grain-and-soybean-based foods adopted as alternatives to meat all over the world.

In his 90s Harry Miller continued as a consultant to the World Health Organization and the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, and still made frequent trips to eastern Asia.

H. W. Miller Sanitarium and Hospital

H. W. MILLER SANITARIUM AND HOSPITAL. A 60-bed general hospital, operated by the Central Philippine Union Mission and located in Cebu City, a large city in the Philippines. It began as the Miller Clinic, opened in 1953 by Dr. R. T. Santos, in a mission-owned home situated behind the present institution.

In 1955 a building with a 20-bed capacity was erected, which was formally opened as the Miller Sanitarium and Hospital on Apr. 8, 1956. Dr. H. W. Miller, for whom the hospital was named, was present at the opening. Because of Dr. Miller's popularity as a surgeon, 27 major surgeries were performed during the first five days, thus exceeding the bed capacity.

Dr. Francisco T. Geslani was the first medical director and Antipolo D. Lazaro the first business manager. The first medical staff consisted of the medical director and four registered nurses. The entire working force consisted of only 13. But by 1974 the staff had increased to 92. The hospital was self-supporting from its beginning and continued to grow and expand.

Additional all-concrete annexes were built in 1959, 1964, 1968, and 1971. Dr. Miller and E. L. Longway solicited funds for the expansion of the hospital. A nurses' home, medical staff quarters, and a food factory were added. More and more rooms were added, improvements were made in the business office, the medical records section, the emergency room. The dining room and canteen were expanded. The Physical Therapy Department was relocated to a more spacious, convenient, and practical place. The Mary Miller Hall was renovated, and many more improvements have been made.

Other physicians connected with the hospital at various times were Arturo P. Roda, Jose and Adelfa Mintalar, Manuel J. Tornilla, Jr., Victoriano D. Fabriga, Loreto R. Garcia, Jr., Catalina Base-Habaradas, Ernesto and Erlinda Aqui, G. L. Mabaquiao, Lorna Nadal-Madrio, and Daniel T. Alfano.

The hospital has medical residency, medical intern, and laboratory technology intern training programs.

Miller, William

MILLER, WILLIAM (1782—1849). American farmer and Baptist preacher who announced the imminent coming of Christ and founded the movement popularly known as Millerism, or the Millerite movement, characterized by a distinctive type of premillennialism and giving rise to a group of denominations classed as the Adventist bodies. Miller was born in Pittsfield, Massachusetts, and was reared in Low Hampton, in northern New York, almost on the Vermont line. As an ambitious frontier boy with an unquenchable desire for knowledge, he was largely self-educated. Upon his marriage to Lucy P. Smith in 1803, he moved to Poultney, Vermont. Through friendship with several prominent citizens who were deists, Miller abandoned his religious convictions and became an avowed skeptic.

In the War of 1812 Miller served as lieutenant and captain. At the close of the war he moved his family to Low Hampton, where he hoped to live quietly as a farmer through his remaining years. At various times he served his community as deputy sheriff and justice of the peace. But Miller was not at peace with himself, for he was at heart a deeply religious man. In 1816 he was converted. Concerning this he wrote in 1845: “I saw that the Bible did bring to view just such a Savior as I needed; and I was perplexed to find how an uninspired book should develop principles so perfectly adapted to the wants of a fallen world. I was constrained to admit that the Scriptures must be a revelation from God; they became my delight, and in Jesus I found a friend” (Apology and Defence, p. 5).

Challenged by his skeptical friends, he set out to study the Bible: “I commenced with Genesis. . . . Whenever I found any thing obscure, my practice was to compare it with all collateral passages, and by the help of Cruden[’s Concordance] I examined all the texts of Scripture. . . . Then by letting every word have its proper bearing on the subject of the text, if my view of it harmonized with every collateral passage in the Bible, it ceased to be a difficulty” (ibid., p. 6).

Miller concluded that Scripture “is its own interpreter,” and that the words ought to be understood literally, that is, in their ordinary historical and grammatical sense, except in those instances where the writer used figurative language. In this Miller simply was following the path of conservative theologians. In his study of the prophecies he reached the conclusion that the writers pointed to his day as the last period of earth’s history. Specifically, he put his first and greatest emphasis on the prophetic declaration, “Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed” (Dan. 8:14) from which he reached his conclusion in 1818, at the close of two years’ study of the Bible, that “in about twenty-five years [that is, about 1843]. . . all the affairs of our present state would be wound up” (ibid., p. 12). Seeking to criticize his own conclusions and to examine all objections, he “was occupied for five years” (ibid., p. 15) more in examining and reexamining the arguments for and against his beliefs.

Convinced of “the duty of presenting the evidence of the nearness of the advent to others” (ibid.), he tried to excuse himself on the ground that he was not a public speaker. He was “very diffident and feared to go before the world” (ibid., p. 16). He wrote an extended statement of his beliefs to a minister friend named Andrus, in 1831, but he could not free his mind from that impelling sense of duty.

Finally in August 1831 he covenanted with God that “if I should have an invitation to speak publicly in any place, I will go and tell them what I find in the Bible about the Lord’s coming” (ibid., p. 17). What he did not know was that even as he was making such apparently safe terms with the Lord, there was traveling down the highway a young man bearing an invitation for him to preach the following day. The tumult that this unexpected invitation produced in Miller’s soul sent him to a nearby grove where he could pray. Into that grove went a farmer; out came a preacher. After dinner Miller left with the youth for nearby Dresden.

Invited to remain during the week, Miller found himself engaged in a revival. The preaching of the soon coming of Christ seemed naturally and inevitably to lead men to seek to make ready for that solemn event. Miller was soon to find himself in the position of having to turn down more requests than he filled simply because he could not be in more than one place at once, or because he had to spend some time on the farm.

In 1832 Miller published a series of eight articles in the Vermont Telegraph, a Baptist weekly. In 1833 he incorporated these articles into a 64-page pamphlet entitled Evidences From Scripture & History of the Second Coming of Christ About the Year A.D. 1843, and of His Personal Reign of 1,000 Years. In that year he was given a license to preach by the Baptists, and by the close of 1834 he was devoting his whole time to preaching. During 1836 he brought out his “lectures” in a book, which was later reprinted several times and enlarged from 16 to 19 lectures, with a supplement containing chronology and charts.

From October 1834 to June 1839 Miller’s manuscript record book lists 800 lectures that he had given. He accomplished this singlehandedly at his own expense, and with no theological training, wholly in response to direct invitations.

Miller was a good preacher, not a good promoter. However, help in the area of promotion soon came. In December 1839 he was invited by Joshua V. Himes, of the “Christian Connection” (now part of the Congregational Christian Church and the United Church of Christ), to speak in Boston. For Himes there was only one question of importance. If this message was really true, then what steps should be taken to blazon it over the whole land? Convinced of its correctness, he assured “Father Miller” that “doors should be opened in every city in the Union, and the warning should go to the ends of the earth” (Sylvester Bliss, Memoirs of William Miller, p. 141). Himes, a born promoter, immediately began publication of The Signs of the Times. Thus was launched the extensive publication activities of the Millerites, which later included other periodicals and a series of booklets called the Second Advent Library, composed of writings of Miller and others.

In 1840 Miller began lecturing in New York. In the late summer he, with a group of other ministers, signed a call for the first “general conference on the second coming of . . . Christ,” though he was prevented by illness from attending this and several subsequent conferences.

From 1840 onward Millerism was no longer the activity of one man primarily, but of a great and increasing group of men. Miller kept closely in touch with the activities of the movement, even when he was absent from the lecture platform because of illness. No other lecturer could take his place. In spite of the increasing tension between church organizations and the Millerite movement, there were still churches late in 1843 whose members were ready to go on record with their signatures by the score, urging Miller to come and preach.

What type of man was Miller that he could persuade preachers of different denominations to accept his teaching? Even his friends painted a rather modest picture of his platform ability. There must have been a certain force and appeal not only in the earnestness of the man but in the logical way in which he marshaled his arguments. True, there was patently an error somewhere in his reasoning, for Christ did not come “about the year 1843,” but that error was not immediately discernible. He lived in a day when it was not uncommon for preachers to make a major appeal to the emotions, yet he did not appeal primarily to the emotions, but to the intellect through a reading of the Word. There were often strong cryings and tears in his meetings, and men coming forward to kneel in contrition, but he sought to bring the conviction through a forthright preaching and exposition of the Scriptures, not by a maudlin appeal to the emotions.

In connection with a camp meeting at Newark in 1842, the New York Herald reporter gave this word picture of Miller: “In person he is about five feet seven inches in height, very thick set, broad shoulders; lightish brown hair, a little bald, a benevolent countenance, full of wrinkles, and his head shakes as though he was slightly afflicted with the palsy. His manners are very much in his favor; he is not a very well-educated man; but he has read and studied history and prophecy very closely; has much strong common sense, and is evidently sincere in his belief” (New York Herald Extra, composed of articles of Nov. 4—15, 1842).

Said a daughter of a Millerite preacher: “His power was in his strong mellow voice and earnest manner, making his most cultivated hearers to forget his homely phraseology and provincial pronunciation” (Jane Marsh Parker, “A Spiritual Cyclone,” Magazine of Christian Literature, September 1891, p. 325).

Miller’s counsel to a preacher friend might properly have come from a seasoned instructor: “Lead your hearers by slow and sure steps to Jesus Christ. I say slow because I expect they are not strong enough to run yet, sure because the Bible is a sure word. And where your hearers are not well doctinated, you must preach Bible. You must prove all things by Bible. . . . If you wish them to believe as you do, show them by your constant assiduity in teaching, that you sincerely wish it” (letter to Truman Hendryx, Mar. 26, 1832).

Although Miller repeatedly declared that his prophetic views were not new, he insisted that he came to his conclusions exclusively through a study of the Bible and reference to a concordance. According to a colleague, Southard, he never had a commentary in his house, and did not remember reading any work on the prophecies except Newton and Faber.

Miller used the general phrase “about the year 1843” to describe his belief as to the time of the Advent until in January 1843 he set forth the time as sometime “between March 21st, 1843, and March 21st, 1844.” He never set a date or day within this period. Writing from Washington shortly before Mar. 21, 1844, he said: “If Christ comes, as we expect, we will sing the song of victory soon; if not, we will watch, and pray, and preach until He comes, for soon our time, and all prophetic days, will have been filled” (Advent Herald, Mar. 6, 1844, p. 39).

After the passing of Oct. 22, 1844—a date that Miller did not set, but accepted at the last moment—Miller wrote to Joshua Himes: “Although I have been twice disappointed, I am not yet cast down or discouraged. . . . My hope in the coming of Christ is as strong as ever. I have done only what after years of sober consideration I felt to be my solemn duty to do. . . . I have fixed my mind upon another time, and here I mean to stand until God gives me more light.—And that is Today, Today, and TODAY, until He comes, and I see HIM for whom my soul yearns” (letter, Nov. 10, 1844, in The Midnight Cry, Dec. 5, 1844, pp. 179, 180).

He believed that perhaps a small error in the reckoning of chronology might still explain the Lord’s delay in coming. He was at first still confident that Providence had overruled in the preaching of the definite time, Oct. 22, and that Christ would probably come before the end of that Jewish year. Not until the spring of 1845 did he affirm that the 1844 movement was not “a fulfilment of prophecy in any sense,” and declared himself in opposition to “any of the new theories” that developed immediately after Oct. 22 in an endeavor to explain the disappointment. He disclaimed the doctrine (taught by some of the prominent Millerites) that the wicked will finally be annihilated, and that the dead lie unconscious in their graves until the resurrection.

Miller’s hope and confident belief to the last were that some minor error in the chronology explained the disappointment. He died in December 1849, in the literal expectation of the immediate coming of Christ.

Miller, William Wilson

MILLER, WILLIAM WILSON (1856—1945). Missionary to India, evangelist, and pastor. He became a Seventh-day Adventist in 1892 and began his service as a licensed minister in Ohio in 1899, pastoring the Cleveland church and working as chaplain of the city mission. After a period of tent evangelism, during which he met and married a coworker, Dr. Lovina Ruth Merritt, he was called to India to relieve J. L. Shaw, and from 1904 to 1911 served first as acting, and then assistant, superintendent of the India Mission. He is given credit for organizing the first Indian Seventh-day Adventist church. In 1910 he suffered a severe heat stroke and with his health impaired returned to America in 1911. Here he engaged in pastoral work in Ohio (1911—1920) and in Michigan (1922—1923), taught in the Department of Religion at Emmanuel Missionary College (1920—1921), and, after his formal retirement in 1922, was chaplain of St. Helena Sanitarium until 1928.

Millerite Movement

MILLERITE MOVEMENT. An interdenominational movement flourishing in the United States, with some extensions elsewhere, from 1840 to 1844, based on a distinctive prophetic interpretation, and giving rise to the group of denominations classed as Adventist bodies, the largest of which is now the Seventh-day Adventist Church.

I. Historical Setting

I. Historical Setting. 1. Miller and the Adventists. The “Millerites” actually called themselves Adventists, but were popularly known by the name of their leading exponent, William Miller, a New York farmer and a licensed Baptist preacher. Since the term “Adventist” is now often used in a broader sense or as a shortened form of Seventh-day Adventist, the more specific term “Millerite” is used here.

Miller first published his views on prophecy in 1832, but the year 1840 marks the launching of the movement on a wide basis. Miller’s colleagues included ministers of various denominations, some of whom did not agree with his expectation that Christ would return in 1843/44 but were otherwise sympathetic with his views.

The principal doctrine on which the Millerite movement was considered to be based was not primarily the “definite time” of the Second Advent, but an interpretation of prophecy embodying (1) belief in “the Advent near” and (2) a distinctive view of the nature of the kingdom of God.

2. Part of an International Awakening. The Millerites regarded their movement as the continuation and culmination of an international awakening of interest in the Second Advent, and a proclamation of “the Advent near,” that had developed almost simultaneously in many countries in the early 1800s. At that time the majority of Protestants were either indifferent to the Second Advent or were looking for it after a millennium of 1,000 (or 365,000) years of a spiritual reign, through the triumph of the church. It was against the latter view, called postmillennialism, that nineteenth-century premillennialists contended by their insistence that Christ would return before the millennium, and soon (see Premillennialism). Among them were Petri in Germany (before 1800), Gausson in Switzerland, Irving and others in England, Wolff in Asia, and others elsewhere.

3. Similarities and Differences. The Millerites circulated the works of some of these writers and regarded these premillennialists as forerunners and colleagues. They opened correspondence with some of the “friends of the advent near” in England, hoping that they could unite with them, but found their differing views on the second principal doctrine, the nature of the expected kingdom of God, an insuperable barrier.

A study of the writings on the prophecies in many countries shows that the Millerites were preceded by many expositors who held the same general historical interpretation of the outline prophecies of Daniel and the Revelation as they held, and even looked to 1843, 1844, or 1847 for the end of the 2300 days of Dan. 8:14 (the key prophecy on which Miller based his expectation of the Advent in or about 1843). Many expected, just as definitely and just as mistakenly as Miller, some momentous event or development of world history introducing, or leading to, the millennium, or the Second Advent.

What distinguished Miller's group from these other expositors was not the fact that the Millerites set dates, but the fact that they expected the Second Advent to bring the catastrophic end of the age, the cleansing of the world by fire, and the setting up of the eternal kingdom of the saints. Because the Adventists formed a large and vocal movement, their views were widely disseminated and discussed, and consequently their disappointment made headlines while the less spectacular predictions made by other expositors passed unnoticed or were forgotten. Furthermore, the Millerite movement, though interdenominational, eventually gave rise to several organized church bodies.

II. History of the Millerite Movement

II. History of the Millerite Movement. The groundwork of the Adventist movement of the 1840s was laid by the personal activities of William Miller. For his early preaching, beginning with a local revival in 1831, see his biographical sketch. In 1836 he published a book of 16 lectures. In that year eight Baptist ministers were preaching his views. In 1838 Josiah Litch, a Methodist minister, one of the first New England ministers to join the movement, published a 48-page pamphlet and a 200-page book expounding and expanding Miller's doctrines.

1. A Full-fledged Movement From 1840. From 1840 onward the Miller movement was no longer primarily a one-man project, but was led by a large and increasing group of men of various denominations. In 1840 Joshua V. Himes, of Boston, a minister of the Christian Connection (which later became part of the Congregational Christian Churches and then of the United Church of Christ), undertook to help "Father Miller" and to blazon to the world the message of the Second Advent in or about 1843. A man of faith and audacity and a born promoter, he set out to find openings for Miller to preach in "every city of the Union," and in February 1840 he launched a paper in Boston called The Signs of the Times. In October Miller and others issued a call to the first "General Conference of Christians Expecting the Advent," held in Boston, to which came ministers of various churches. This and later conferences served to coordinate the planning and thinking of a rather loosely knit movement. In the proceedings of this first Millerite conference the following appeared: "Though in some of the less important views of this momentous subject we are not ourselves agreed, particularly in regard to fixing the year of Christ's second advent, yet we are unanimously agreed and established in this all-absorbing point, that the coming of the Lord to judge the world is now specially 'nigh at hand'" (First Report of the General Conference of Christians Expecting the Advent, p. 15).

The second general conference opened June 15, 1841, with 200 present and voted to circulate the series of pamphlets called the Second Advent Library and to establish libraries and reading rooms in every town. This conference laid down the strategy of warfare in a number of suggestions, urging: (1) personal consecration, (2) personal work with others, (3) Bible classes for mutual study of the question, (4) social meetings for prayer and exhortation, (5) questioning ministers, (6) circulation of books.

In 1841 Litch, as general agent of the Committee of Publication, devoted his full time to traveling, lecturing, and fostering the distribution of Millerite publications. In his campaign to proclaim the Second Coming to every corner of the land, Himes, the publisher, issued a stream of booklets and periodicals and introduced stickers bearing Second Advent texts and slogans for use in sealing letters. In 1842 Himes launched a new paper, The Midnight Cry, in New York, and published 300 copies of a lithographed chart illustrating the prophecies, which was designed by Charles Fitch and Apollos Hale and authorized by the twelfth general conference held at Boston in May 1842 presided over by Joseph Bates.

By this time the date 1843 for the Advent was increasingly emphasized, although belief in “the time” was not required for membership in the conference; all who rejected certain false teachings about the Second Advent and the millennium and believed that the personal coming of Christ and the first resurrection were imminent could join. Some of the foremost leaders, such as Henry Dana Ward (Episcopalian) and Henry Jones (Congregationalist)—chairman and secretary, respectively, of the first general conference—never accepted Miller’s “definite time” for the Advent.

2. Expansion and Opposition. Beginning in 1842, Millerite camp meetings were held “to awake sinners and purify Christians by giving the midnight cry, viz., to hold up the immediate coming of Christ to judge the world” (Signs of the Times 3:88, June 15, 1842). With their charts, their books and periodicals, their camp meetings, their “Great Tent” (120 feet [40 meters] in diameter), and their startling message, the Millerites made no small impression on their contemporaries. Their message was preached in England by Robert Winter and others, and it went even to far corners of the earth through the distribution of their papers to sailors and by the sending of publications to “every English and American mission in the world,” “so far as the opportunity has offered” (Signs of the Times 6:109, Nov. 15, 1843).

In America the Millerites aroused increasing interest and opposition. Miller’s date “about the year 1843” made them the targets of theological opposition, of public ridicule, and of irresponsible journalism. The wildest rumors were circulated—that the Millerites were cheating the public, that they were disorderly, that they were fanatics whose delusions caused insanity, that they prepared ascension robes, that Miller had set Apr. 23, 1843, as the date of the end of the world. On the other hand, an occasional item in the press spoke of their sobriety, sincerity, and knowledge of the Bible. Occasionally a newspaper capitalized on the interest in Millerism by printing accounts of meetings or sermons, with refutations by prominent clergy.

In the face of the growing hostility in the churches, some Millerites questioned whether they should enter or remain in such churches, and others found themselves shut out. By the summer of 1843 the idea of separation was expressed (principally by Charles Fitch) and was printed in Millerite papers, but there was no united acceptance of it.

3. The End of “1843” Passes. Miller’s “year of the end of the world” passed by in the spring of 1844. Since the Millerites had not looked to any specific date and had allowed for the possibility of some slight error in computation, there was no sudden disillusionment. However, in May it was evident that “1843” must have run out. Miller acknowledged his disappointment but exhorted the believers to watch, for the coming of the Lord was near, even at the door. With Himes and others he went on a summer preaching tour to the “West”

(Ohio). The fact that Millerism was more than belief in a point of time explains why the movement did not disintegrate with this disappointment on the time element.

The increased suppression of Millerite believers in the churches led finally to their separation from these churches. Miller never accepted the idea of separation, but he did not speak against it when Himes himself finally conceded: “We are agreed in the instant and final separation from all who oppose the doctrine of the coming and kingdom of God at hand. . . . ‘Come out from among them’” (letter, Aug. 29, 1844, in Midnight Cry 7:80, Sept. 12, 1844).

By the summer of 1844 Millerism stood sharp and clear on the religious horizon as a well-defined and more or less separate movement, with ministers, Advent associations, and meetinghouses.

4. The October 1844 Expectation. After the spring disappointment camp meetings were announced for New England “if time lingers.” It was at one of these in August, at Exeter, New Hampshire, that a new expectation, one for a specific date, Oct. 22, was proclaimed.

Joseph Bates, in the speaker’s stand, stopped in mid sermon to hear S. S. Snow, a man with a new message, sound the call to make ready for the coming of the Lord and the cleansing of the sanctuary on the Day of Atonement, the biblical “tenth day of the seventh month,” which he reckoned as Oct. 22. This new date fired the Adventists in New England, changing their indefinite though very real conviction of the nearness of the Lord’s coming into a belief so specific as to send them forth with crusading zeal to warn men in the little while that remained. This “seventh-month movement,” as it came to be known, was soon to give a new tempo to Millerism and bring it to a dramatic and speedy climax.

The editor of the Advent Herald (the new name of The Signs of the Times) said in retrospect: “At first the definite time was generally opposed; but there seemed to be an irresistible power attending its proclamation which prostrated all before it. It swept over the land with the velocity of a tornado, and it reached hearts in different and distant places almost simultaneously, and in a manner which can be accounted for only on the supposition that God was [in] it. . . .

“The lecturers among the Adventists were the last to embrace the views of the time and the more prominent ones came into it last of all. . . .

“[About the first of October] we had such a view of it, that to oppose it, or even to remain silent longer, seemed to us to be opposing the work of the Holy Spirit; and in entering upon the work with all our souls, we could but exclaim, ‘What were we, that we should resist God?’ It seemed to us to have been so independent of human agency, that we could but regard it as a fulfillment of the ‘midnight cry’” (Advent Herald 8:93, Oct. 30, 1844).

This seventh-month movement finally gained the support of Miller, Himes, and other prominent leaders, about two weeks before the fateful day of Oct. 22. Though Miller’s earlier message of the imminent Advent had been called the “midnight cry”—“Behold, the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him” (Matt. 25:6)—this new specific message of the tenth day of the seventh month was claimed to be the true midnight cry.

5. The “Great Disappointment” and After. With spiritual exaltation and hope the Millerites gathered in churches and homes on Oct. 22. They truly believed they would meet Him; that with others “loved long since, and lost awhile,” they would be gathered into a blest abode where sorrow, sickness, and death are no more. But as the sun sank in the west, their hopes sank with it. Some waited until midnight; then their disappointment became a certainty.

To their disappointment were added the jeers and ridicule of scoffers and the problem of caring for the needs of those who had impoverished themselves for the cause. Most of the believers had spontaneously devoted the last few days or weeks to attending meetings or to engaging in missionary work before the expected end of the world. Although there seems to have been no general policy of selling possessions, farmers in some instances did not harvest their crops.

Many who had joined the Adventists through fear now went over to the mocking, scoffing rabble. But the true Millerites retained their faith. The leaders, and even some among those who had not joined the seventh-month movement, held that in the mysterious plans of God this preaching of an exact date when men must meet God had served the purpose of a test to discover those who really loved the Lord and His appearing. They reasoned that God overruled to make this disappointing experience serve a divine purpose.

Refusing to set another definite time, Miller looked for Christ “Today, Today, and TODAY, until He comes”; however, he could not refrain from expressing confidence that the fixing of the year was justified, and that Christ would surely come before “this Jewish year” would terminate. In the spring of 1845 he concluded that he had made some error in calculation, though he continued to look for the Advent as near. (See Miller, William.)

The experience of Millerism at this time has been graphically described as follows: “For years the river of Millerism had flowed on in ever-increasing volume. It was no meandering stream, listlessly spreading over flat country for lack of sharply defined banks. There was a sense of urgency, of hastening toward a destination, that gave velocity and a sharply defined course to the river. Though there were eddies and swirls and cross currents and even marshy spots along the banks, these were mere incidentals. The main course and character of the stream were evident to all.

“Now the river of Millerism expected to be swallowed up in the ocean of eternity on October 22—Millerite charts marked out no land beyond that point. Instead, the erstwhile fast-moving stream poured out over an arid, uncharted waste. The scorching sun of disappointment beat down, and the burning winds of ridicule swept in from every side. The river suddenly lost its velocity. There was no momentum to cut a clearly marked channel in this new, parched land. Sun and wind quickly began to play havoc with this directionless body of water, now spread thinly over a wide area. While a central stream of what had once been an impressive river, was more or less well defined, there were many lesser streams, which often ended in miniature dead seas, where stagnation and evaporation soon did their work. Indeed, no small part of the once large river, when evaporated under the scorching sun of disappointment, was finally returned to the sources from whence it came, the other rivers in the religious world” (Francis D. Nichol, The Midnight Cry, p. 274).

The Millerite movement was not constituted to meet the conditions that confronted it after 1844, and it markedly subsided after that year. Various small groups split off. In a conference at Albany, New York, held in April 1845, the majority party, led by Miller, Himes, and others, adopted a series of statements abandoning the 1844 ending of the 2300 days and looking to a future fulfillment of the midnight cry. This majority group divided, a decade later, into the Evangelical Adventists (now defunct) and the Advent Christians. (For a fuller narrative of the Millerite movement, see F. D. Nichol, The Midnight Cry, 576 pp.)

III. Millerite Eschatology

III. Millerite Eschatology. 1. Miller's Views Summarized. In William Miller's study of Bible prophecies one of his first major conclusions was that "the popular views of the spiritual reign of Christ" through the church on earth were "not sustained by the Word of God." He wrote: "I found it plainly taught in the Scriptures that Jesus Christ will again descend to this earth, coming in the clouds of heaven, in all the glory of his Father: . . . that at his coming the bodies of all the righteous dead will be raised, and all the righteous living be changed from a corruptible to an incorruptible, from a mortal to an immortal state, that they will all be caught up together to meet the Lord in the air, and will reign with him for ever in the regenerated earth: . . . that the bodies of the wicked will then all be destroyed, and their spirits be reserved in prison until their resurrection and damnation: and that when the earth is thus regenerated, the righteous raised, and the wicked destroyed, the kingdom of God will have come, when his will will be done on earth as it is done in heaven, that the meek will inherit it, and the kingdom become the saints'. I found that the only millennium taught in the word of God is the thousand years which are to intervene between the first resurrection and that of the rest of the dead as inculcated in the xx[th chapter] of Revelation; and that it must necessarily follow the personal coming of Christ and the regeneration of the earth: that till Christ's coming and the end of the world, the righteous and wicked are to continue together on the earth . . . , so that there can be no conversion of the world before the advent: and that as the new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness, is . . . the same for which we look, according to the promise of Isa. lxx. 17, and is the same that John saw in vision after the passing away of the former heavens and earth; it must necessarily follow that the various portions of Scripture that refer to the millennial state, must have their fulfillment after the resurrection of all the saints that sleep in Jesus. I also found that the promises respecting Israel's restoration, are applied by the apostle to all who are Christ's—putting on of Christ constituting them Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise. . . .

"Another kind of evidence that vitally affected my mind, was the chronology of the Scriptures. I found, on pursuing the study of the Bible, various chronological periods extending, according to my understanding of them, to the coming of the Savior. . . .

"Reckoning all these prophetic periods from the several dates assigned by the best chronologers for the events from which they should evidently be reckoned, they all would terminate together, about A.D. 1843" (Apology and Defence [1845], pp. 7—11).

2. Differences From Views of Contemporaries. The Millerites held that the millennial reign introduced at the Second Advent would be that of the glorified righteous in the immortal state, on a purified and renewed earth, and not, as many held, a triumphant reign of the church or of literal Jews in a mortal state (see Premillennialism).

In opposition to these concepts of a "temporal millennium" and world conversion either before or after the Second Advent, the twelfth general conference of the Adventists, held at Boston, voted: "Resolved, That we regard the notion of a Millennium previous to the coming of Christ when all the world shall be converted, and sinners in great multitudes saved, as a fearful delusion, . . . and that the nearer such a millennium is represented, the more dangerous is its tendency, because the more likely to encourage present impenitence, with the hope of future conversion to God.

“Resolved, That no portion of the New Testament scriptures gives the most indirect intimation of the literal restoration of the Jews to old Jerusalem, we believe that the arguments drawn from the Old Testament prophecies are based on a mistaken view of those prophecies; and that they have been fulfilled in what the gospel has already done, or remain to be fulfilled in the gathering of all the spiritual seed of Abraham into the New Jerusalem. . . .

“Resolved, That the notion of a probation [opportunity for conversion] after Christ’s coming, is a lure to destruction, entirely contradictory to the word of God, which positively teaches that when Christ comes the door is shut, and such as are not ready can never enter in” (The Signs of the Times 3:69, June 1, 1842).

3. “Midnight Cry.” The reference is to the cry heard at midnight in Christ’s parable of the wise and foolish virgins (Matt. 25:1—13), “Behold, the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him.” The Millerites regarded this scripture as a prophetic parable and used it as one of the bases of their message. For this application and the special emphasis placed on it the summer of 1844, see “Midnight Cry”; Seventh-Month Movement.

4. Various Prophecies. Several Millerite publications set forth detailed interpretations of various prophecies: the already widely accepted view of the four kingdoms of Dan. 2 and 7 as the Babylonian, Medo-Persian, Grecian, and Roman empires; the 10 horns as the barbarian kingdoms that succeeded Rome; the dragon of Rev. 12 as pagan Rome; the two beasts of chapter 13 as papal Rome and “the infidel French government” (Miller originally had civil and papal Rome, with the number 666 in Rev 13:18 representing 666 years of Roman paganism); 1260 years as the period of the papacy from the time of Justinian to 1798; the “seven times” (Lev. 26:18, etc.) interpreted as 2520 years, ending in 1843; the 70 weeks (Dan. 9:25) as 490 years, extending to A.D. 33, the crucifixion; the 2300 days (Dan. 8:14) as years from the same starting point, ending in 1843; and the thousand years of Rev. 20 as literal years between the resurrection of the righteous at the Second Advent and the resurrection of, and final execution of judgment on, the wicked. The Millerites generally believed that the 1290 years (of Dan. 12:11) ended jointly with the 1260 years in 1798, and that the 1335 years (Dan. 12:12) would end 45 years later, along with the 2300 years in 1843.

5. The 2300 Days. The key prophetic period was that of the 2300 (Dan. 8:14) years (see Twenty-three Hundred Days), ending with the cleansing of the sanctuary, which the Millerites believed to involve the final purification of the earth at the Second Advent. As noted earlier, Miller ended this period in or about 1843, but he never preached an exact date. Pressed to be more specific, he finally, by December 1842, defined “1843,” by which he meant the Jewish year, as probably “sometime between March 21st, 1843, and March 21st, 1844” (The Signs of the Times 4:47, Jan. 25, 1843)—for he knew the Jewish religious year ran from spring to spring. (Other Millerite leaders, knowing that the Jewish calendar was lunar, began and ended the year with the new moon of April.)

When the “Jewish year 1843” passed (in the spring of 1844) without the return of the Lord, and the public expected the Millerites to “yield the whole question,” Litch wrote: “The doctrine does not consist in merely tracing prophetic periods. . . . But the whole prophetic history of the world . . . affords indubitable evidence of the fact, that we have approached a crisis. And no disappointment respecting a definite point of time can move them, or drive them from their position, relative to the speedy coming of the Lord” (“The Rise and Progress of Adventism,” The Advent Shield 1:80, May 1844).

Then he quoted the “Fundamental Principles” of the Millerites as published in their periodicals in 1843, adding this footnote: “The above was written in the Jewish year 1843, which has now expired. . . . We can only wait, . . . continually looking for, and momentarily expecting, his appearing” (ibid.).

6. The Shift From 1843 to 1844. It was not until the summer of 1844 that the majority of the Millerites began to pay serious heed to a few who had been insisting that the correct computation of the 2300 years and the 70 weeks would lead to an ending date in the autumn, on the day of the month the ancient sanctuary was cleansed, the tenth day of the seventh Jewish month, which they understood to fall in 1844 on Oct. 22. (For the basis and development of this expectation, see Seventh-Month Movement, Twenty-three Hundred Days.) On this day they believed that Christ would end His priestly ministry and emerge from the holy of holies, or heaven, to return to the earth to “bless His waiting people.”

7. The Three Angels’ Messages. The Millerites believed also that they were fulfilling the prophecy of the flying angel of Rev 14:6, 7, the first of three (see Three Angels’ Messages), proclaiming, “The hour of his judgment is come,” and many of them also gave the second angel’s message, to come out of fallen Babylon (v. 8; cf. Rev. 18:4), advocating separation from hostile churches. They gave little or no attention to the message of the third angel (v. 9).

8. Aftermath—Three-Way Split. After the great disappointment of Oct. 22, 1844, the Millerites—at least those who did not fall away in their disillusionment—split into three groups, differing according to their respective views of the cause of their error in expecting the return of Christ in 1844.

a. The majority group, including, by April 1845, Miller and most of the leaders. These held that they had been right in applying the 2300—day prophecy and the parable of the Bridegroom to the Second Advent; and that, therefore, since the Lord had not come they had been in error in the chronology; that there had been no fulfillment of prophecy in 1843—1844 and the “definite time” movement had been a mistake.

b. A minority group known as the “spiritualizers,” or “spiritualists.” These held that they had been right both in chronology and in the expected event: the Second Advent had actually occurred at the time specified, but as a spiritual coming, in His saints (the spiritualizers). For their fanatical doctrines, see [Spiritualism \[1\]](#). Many of these went into extreme splinter groups, and a number of them joined the Shakers.

c. Another minority group, intermediate between the other two groups. Holding that the prophetic chronology had been correct, but that the error lay in the event expected, they rejected on the one hand the “spiritualist” view of an invisible Advent and a spiritual kingdom (they insisted that the Advent was personal, literal, and still future); on the other hand, they rejected the majority contention that the 2300 days had not ended and that the 1844 movement had been a complete mistake.

To this third group (as to the second) the majority party appeared to have abandoned the Adventist message by denying their past experience in the 1844 movement. The majority group, in turn, were inclined to condemn the third group, along with the second, for holding that the 2300 days had ended and that the “midnight cry” was valid.

Among this third group were the leaders of the future Seventh-day Adventists, who arrived at the conclusion that the proper interpretation of the symbols indicated a different fulfillment—not the Second Advent by the final phase of Christ’s ministry (see Sanctuary).

9. Albany Conference. The main body led by Miller and, especially, Himes, in the Albany conference in April 1845 took its stand on a series of statements, some of which may be summarized thus:

a. They retained their principle of a non-“Judaizing” premillennialism, that is, opposing the “Judaizing doctrine” of the restoration of the literal Jews as a fulfillment of the Abrahamic covenant.

b. They made what appears to be a rather vaguely worded concession toward the new view of conditional immortality taught by a few Millerite leaders.

c. They abandoned, necessarily, the 1844 date for the Second Advent, but in so doing they also abandoned the idea that the 1844 movement was a fulfillment of prophecy, or that a prophetic landmark had been passed that would explain the disappointment.

d. Since they had emphasized the close of human probation (which they held was symbolized by the “shut door” of the parable of the 10 virgins) as involved in the ending of the 2300 days, and since they were convinced that probation had not ended, they now insisted also that the 2300 years, and the parable with its shut door, had likewise not been fulfilled. (This left an opening for revisions of the chronology and later dates set for the Advent by the leaders.)

e. They declared themselves opposed to all “new tests,” and thereby barred not only various forms of fanaticism, but any advance in prophetic exposition based on the premise of a valid prophetic landmark in the 1844 movement. (For a fuller discussion of the Millerite teachings, see L. E. Froom, The Prophetic Faith of Our Fathers, vol. 4, part 2).

IV. Relation of Seventh-day Adventists to Millerism

IV. Relation of Seventh-day Adventists to Millerism. The leaders of the small group that formed the nucleus of the organized Seventh-day Adventist Church came out of the Millerite movement, and they regarded themselves as the true successors of the movement, as retaining and carrying on to completion the main principles of Millerite doctrine and correcting and clarifying the misunderstanding that had caused the disappointment and had resulted in the repudiation of the 1844 message by the leaders.

Retaining the distinctive principles of Millerite premillennialism, the Seventh-day Adventists modified certain points; for example, holding to the close of probation at the Second Advent but placing the renewal of the earth, and the establishment on it of the everlasting kingdom of the saints, at the end of the millennium. They accepted the minority view of conditional immortality. They explained the Disappointment by showing that the “cleansing of the sanctuary” represented, not the end of the heavenly ministry of Christ, but a new phase of it (see Investigative Judgment; Judgment). They held that their new Sabbath message was symbolized by the third angel’s message of Rev. 14:9—12, combining “the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus,” and that this third message involved the proclamation of the first and second also (see Three Angels’ Messages). Thus the doctrines of Millerism formed the background of many of the distinctive teachings of the Seventh-day Adventist Church. However, not all of these doctrines originated in Millerism (see Prophetic Interpretation), and they were incorporated selectively into the structure of the church.

Milne, Robert M.

MILNE, ROBERT M. (1896—1994). Missionary. A graduate of Canadian Union College, he began his ministry in China in 1920. He later served in Thailand before going to Hong Kong, where he served for 25 years. Working with Dr. Harry Miller and Ezra Longway, Milne raised millions of dollars to build two hospitals and a nursing school in Hong Kong. In all, he logged more than 70 years of service to the church. Still working overseas, he died in Hong Kong two weeks before his ninety-eighth birthday. He was the oldest missionary working overseas.

Milo Adventist Academy

MILO ADVENTIST ACADEMY. A coeducational school on the senior high school level for day and boarding students, situated in southwestern Oregon, 45 miles (70 kilometers) southeast of Roseburg, on Highway 227, in a valley along the South Umpqua River in the foothills of the Cascades. The academy, with a capacity for 300 students, occupies a campus laid out in an oval 800' x 500' (245 m. x 152 m.).

In 1950 the Oregon Conference committee, under the leadership of its president, L. E. Biggs, discovered in a survey that more than 300 young people of academy age in the conference were in public schools. In response to many requests, steps were taken to find property in southern Oregon suitable for a school where the need was greatest.

Walter M. Corwin, a Seventh-day Adventist, offered to sell his "Bar Lazy Eight" fruit-and-stock ranch of 447 acres (180 hectares) at a price substantially less than market value. On Nov. 14, 1950, a committee met on the property in an old prune-drying shed and agreed to accept his offer.

A campaign for $1 million was launched and more than $50,000 was pledged at the 1951 camp meeting.

Construction began on the barns in May 1952, and on the campus buildings in 1953.

Milo Academy opened on schedule in September 1955 with L. E. Russell as principal. At that time there was no administration building; the cafeteria was not complete; and work opportunities for students were limited. Hence the enrollment was restricted to just under 200.

A dedication was held on Oct. 7, 1956, at which the governor of Oregon, Elmo Smith, was the guest speaker; and Robert C. Martin, mayor of Grants Pass, was present. Regional accreditation has been maintained at Milo Adventist Academy since 1964.

Six original buildings are frame construction. Later additions are: enlarged cafeteria, 1959; new administration building, 1962; locker rooms and showers added to the gymnasium, 1965; new industrial arts facility (11 courses now offered), 1969; new brick church with gabled shake roof, 1972.

The dairy herd and equipment were sold in 1973. Thunderbird Academy Furniture industries began production on campus in 1974.

Milton Mattison Memorial Hospital

MILTON MATTISON MEMORIAL HOSPITAL. An 18-bed medical institution, it was completed in the month of April 1985 with a generous financial contribution made by Milton Mattison's family. Milton Mattison Memorial Hospital is situated on the outskirts of Hapur town on Meerut Road, Uttar Pradesh, India.

G. R. Bazziel was the administrator, and Dr. R. Samuel was called from Jullundur as chief medical officer to start medical work in this hospital. For almost one year this hospital functioned as a clinic because of lack of personnel, equipment, and accommodation. They both left the hospital. In 1986 S. R. Gill was assigned as the administrator of the hospital, and he worked for one year managing the hospital with non-Seventh-day Adventist doctors on contract until the end of 1986.

In 1987 Dr. A. Prasada Rao was assigned as the medical director of the hospital. Eye camps and free medical camps were conducted in the villages around the hospital within a 12-mile (20-kilometer) radius to make the hospital known to the people. Progressively the number of clinics has increased. Milton Mattison Memorial Hospital is extending medical services to the patients in the field of medicine, surgery, and obstetrics and gynecology. A storeroom was converted into a surgery room. During 1992 a small wing was added to the main building, which provides three special rooms and one storeroom. X-ray equipment was donated by Dr. Peter Jaggi from Switzerland.

Milton Mattison Memorial Hospital acquired about 15 acres (six hectares) of land for the extension of the hospital and housing for all the working staff on the campus.

Minas Gerais Adventist Academy

MINAS GERAIS ADVENTIST ACADEMY (Instituto Adventista de Ensino de Minas Gerais). A coeducational boarding school located in the city of Lavras in the state of Minas Gerais, Brazil. It was established in 1983 and reorganized in 1994. In 1994 there was a faculty and staff of 15.

Principals: Elias Fraga Germanawicz, 1994— .

Minchin, Edwin Lennard

MINCHIN, EDWIN LENNARD (1904—1987). Educator, youth leader. He was born in Perth, Western Australia, to a family who were among the first Western Australians to become Seventh-day Adventists. Following his father's death in 1917 and his mother's death less than a year later, Len was cared for by his two married sisters and his older brothers. With his brother Gerald, Len spent four years at the Darling Range School (now Carmel Adventist College). Later he attended Avondale College and graduated from the ministerial course. Together with his lifelong friend Tom Bradley he began work in South New Zealand, where he was a member of Pastor J. W. Kent's evangelistic team. Later he served as dean of boys and music teacher at Longburn College. He married May Pocock, whose mother had been one of Ellen White's helpers.

He became youth leader of the South New South Wales Conference in 1931, and thus began his long commitment to ministering to young people. In 1936 he began 10 years as secretary of the Missionary Volunteer Department for the Australasian Division (now South Pacific Division). His first youth congress, held at Avondale College in 1939, has remained a landmark. His service as a youth evangelist took him to the Northern European Division and then to the General Conference, where he served for 16 years prior to his retirement in 1970.

Minchin, Gerald H.

MINCHIN, GERALD H. (1901—1969). Teacher, missionary, departmental secretary. He was born in Western Australia and graduated from Avondale Missionary College in Australia, Union College in Nebraska, and the Seventh-day Adventist Theological Seminary. He began his denominational work as a teacher in Australia and later, from 1924 to 1926, in Hawaii. After coming to the United States he taught in Kansas and Missouri for nine years before receiving a call to overseas service. In Southeast Asia he was secretary of education and later was elected president of the Malaya Union Seminary.

World War II made it necessary for him to return to Australia, where he taught at Avondale College, and then in New Zealand. He spent 20 years of teaching Bible and serving as chair of the Bible departments at Canadian Union College, Newbold College, Atlantic Union College, and Columbia Union College. He retired in 1965, but taught an additional year at Andrews University.

He and his wife, Leona, were on a round-the-world trip and had reached Singapore when he was forced to undergo surgery. Two weeks later he passed to his rest in that city.

Minck, Adolf

MINCK, ADOLF (1883—1960). Church leader in Central Europe and Germany. He accepted the Seventh-day Adventist faith in 1908 and entered denominational service in 1910 as an evangelist, working first in Stettin and later in other places in eastern Germany. In 1913 he went as a missionary to the Adriatic mission field, where his headquarters were at Sarajevo, Bosnia (which later acquired worldwide fame as the place where the heir to the Austrian throne was assassinated). In 1914 he went to Hungary and served the German language congregation in Budapest. In November 1914 he was ordained to the ministry by L. R. Conradi and J. F. Huenergardt. In 1916, while working in northern Hungary, he was called into the German Army and spent the war years at its eastern headquarters. After World War I he returned to the Hungarian field, became its president, and reorganized the Hungarian Conference, which by that time, because of territorial readjustments after the war, had decreased in membership from about 2,200 to about 380. By 1925 the work was prospering and the Hungarian Conference was reorganized into the Hungarian Union, of which Minck became president. In 1932 he became Young People's, Sabbath school, and home missionary secretary of the Central European Division. Afterward he served as leader of the East German Union (1934—1936), field secretary of the Central European Division, and president of the German Inter-Union Association. In 1937 he was called to the presidency of the Central European Division and held that position through World War II and in the postwar restoration period until 1950. From 1950 until his retirement in 1954 he served as field secretary of the division.

Mindanao Mission Academy

MINDANAO MISSION ACADEMY. A coeducational boarding academy on the senior high school level, operated by the Northern Mindanao Conference on a 49.5-acre (20-hectare) tract west of Cagayan de Oro on the north of Mindanao Island, Philippines. The students, all nationals, are nearly all from Seventh-day Adventist homes. The school is a full-fledged member of the Far Eastern Association of Seventh-day Adventist Colleges and Secondary Schools, and since July 1, 1949, has been fully recognized by the Department of Education of the Republic of the Philippines. For its first two years it operated under government permit.

On July 1, 1946, the Mindanao Mission opened an elementary school, called the Mindanao Central School, at Cagayan de Oro. Because of the large enrollment, mission officials voted on May 25, 1947, to establish an academy in the Mindanao Mission, and the present site along the highway on the edge of the town of Manticao, Misamis Oriental, was purchased.

On July 14, 1947, the school, called Mindanao Mission Academy, opened as a senior academy, with classes held temporarily in army tents. A residence was rented to serve as girls' dormitory, principal's office, and business offices, and another tent was erected to serve as boys' dormitory. A year later the school moved to permanent buildings—an administration building, two dormitories, a dining hall, and five teachers' cottages.

Since the division of the Mindanao Mission into five parts—Davao, Northeastern, Northern, Southern, and Western—the Mindanao Mission Academy has served the Northern Mindanao Conference.

From the time of the establishment of the Mindanao Mission Academy in 1947 to 1993, 2,093 students had graduated.

Mindanao Sanitarium and Hospital

MINDANAO SANITARIUM AND HOSPITAL. A 85-bed general tertiary training institution operated by the South Philippine Union Mission. It is the outgrowth of pioneer medical work begun in Tamparan, Dansalan (now Marawi City) in 1948 by R. T. Santos with Dr. Feliciano D. Ponce, dentist, and Ruby Burrnett, Lucena Garcesa, and Tarcela Torrico, nurses. A two-story house was rented to become the Lakeside Clinic. Later it was transferred to Iligan City by Dr. Francisco Geslani and his wife. Construction began on the Mindanao Sanitarium and Hospital in April 1952. The institution opened on Mar. 11, 1953.

By 1967 plans for building expansion were conceived. The dream became reality in 1970 when the new two-story building was inaugurated. The completed annex building houses the different services, including the operating rooms and laboratory, an X-ray Department equipped with new machines, and an emergency room offering 24-hour help.

As the only training hospital in Iligan City, Mindanao Sanitarium and Hospital is the affiliation center for interns in the fields of medical technology, physical therapy, and radiologic technology; medical post-graduates; nurse residents; and resident physicians.

Medical Directors: F. T. Geslani, 1953—1956; R. T. Santos, 1956—1959; A. P. Roda, 1959—1968; Wenceslao Torres, 1968—1971; W. G. Dick, 1971—1975; A. P. Lasta, 1975—1976; L. H. Pagunsan, 1976—1986; A. F. Ongpoy, 1986—1987; J. Y. Dalaguan, 1988— .

Minister

MINISTER. One authorized to conduct the various functions of pastoral work within the Seventh-day Adventist Church. As noted in the Seventh-day Adventist Minister's Manual (pp. 17—19), a call to the gospel ministry is a uniquely personal call from Christ.

The divine call to ministry does not make pastors more important than other members, nor is ministry the only vocation to which people are “called.” The grandest work in the world is the work of service, and God calls every member to some ministry of service.

Actually, in most places of the world, local church elders serve as volunteer pastors, working under the general supervision of a salaried district pastor. Without these dedicated lay leaders, many Seventh-day Adventist members would not have immediate access to a spiritual shepherd.

The demands of the gospel ministry are many, and thus the scriptural requirements are rigorous: “Therefore take heed to yourselves and to all the flock, among which the Holy Spirit has made you overseers, to shepherd the church of God which He purchased with His own blood” (Acts 20:28, NKJV).

Ministers need many gifts: moral earnestness, leadership, intelligence, common sense, relational skills, and teaching ability. The requirements are high, but those who are truly called by Christ will be empowered by Him. Paul proclaimed, “And I thank Christ Jesus our Lord who was enabled me, because He counted me faithful, putting me into the ministry” (1 Tim. 1:12, NKJV).

Not all Seventh-day Adventist pastors are in the same ministerial category. Ordained ministers are those fully authorized to perform every pastoral function. Licensed ministers, on the other hand, are limited in performing pastoral functions. However, “the responsibility and authority” of licensed ministers “may in certain circumstances be extended to include the performance of specific functions of the ordained minister” in the churches to which they are assigned. “The authority for extending this responsibility belongs to the division committee which shall clearly outline for its territory the ministerial functions which may be delegated to licensed ministers” (GC Working Policy [1994—1995], pp. 308, 309).

For example, the North American Division has the following provision: Licensed ministers are “authorized by the conference to perform substantially all the functions of the ordained minister for the members in the churches or companies” to which they are “assigned and elected” as church elders, and for the communities they serve (NAD Working Policy [1994—1995], pp. 311, 312). Licensed ministers, however, are excluded from presiding over organizing churches, uniting churches, and ordaining local elders and deacons (ibid., p. 312).

“The conference/mission executive committee shall authorize, in harmony with the division policy, which functions of the ordained minister the licensed minister may perform” (GC Working Policy [1994—1995], p. 309).

Minimum requirements to be met by licensed ministers before being given extended ministerial functions include: completion of the ministerial training program, holding a current ministerial license, appointment to a ministerial or pastoral responsibility, election as a local elder in each church to which they are assigned, and ordination as a local elder (ibid.).

Another type of pastor is the commissioned minister. Although the General Conference Working Policy does not specifically designate a commissioned minister credential, the various world divisions are free to bestow such a credential if they choose. The North American Division, for example, does grant the commissioned minister license and credential as follows: “To associates in pastoral care; Bible instructors; General Conference, division, union, and local conference treasurers and departmental directors including associate and assistant directors; institutional chaplains; presidents and vice presidents of major institutions; auditors (General Conference director, associates, area and district directors); and field directors of the Christian Record Services” (NAD Working Policy [1994—1995], p. 101).

When the commissioned minister credential is granted, an appropriate commissioning service may be conducted. At that time the pastor receives a commissioned minister license. This license is granted to commissioned ministers who have fewer than five years’ experience. It is not the normal practice to ordain an individual holding this license (ibid.). Ordinarily an associate in pastoral care is granted a commissioned minister credential after four years of denominational service (ibid., p. 313).

Pastors in training are known as interns. They receive a license rather than a credential, not only because they are new in the ministry, but also to designate that their ministerial training is not complete until after their internship. Granting a ministerial license is not a commitment that ordination is ultimately assured. It merely provides the opportunity for licentiates to prove their calling.

Ministerial internship “designates a period of service spent in practical ministerial training, to be entered upon after the completion of the prescribed ministerial training course, this training period to be served under supervision in a local conference/mission, at a limited wage, for the purpose of proving the divine call to the ministry” (GC Working Policy [1994—1995], p. 303).

While internship limits the beginning minister in some ways, it does provide experience in all phases of ministry: “Local conferences/missions shall place ministerial interns in the conference/mission where there is prospect for well-rounded development in all the phases of the ministry—evangelistic, pastoral, teaching (i.e., personal and group instruction), and various departmental activities” ibid., p. 304).

When a conference gives an individual a ministerial license, “it should be recognized as a pledge on the part of the conference leadership to foster that employee’s growth” (ibid., p. 315). A special financial plan makes it possible for the conference to fulfill this pledge.

Preaching the gospel of Jesus Christ is the highest privilege and the most fascinating adventure ever given to humankind. “The greatest work, the noblest effort,” in which individuals can engage “is to point sinners to the Lamb of God. True ministers are colaborers with the Lord in the accomplishment of His purposes” (GW 18).

Ministerial Association

MINISTERIAL ASSOCIATION. A departmental level branch of the General Conference, headed by a secretary and associate and assistant secretaries. It endeavors through its professional journal, Ministry, conventions, institutes, and evangelistic field schools to elevate the spiritual experience of, and increase the efficiency of, ministerial, evangelistic, and other gospel workers. In the 1970s there was a new emphasis on including health professionals as part of the “blended ministry” team.

The Ministerial Association is represented in each division of the world field by a division Ministerial Association secretary and has wide representation on union and local conference levels.

Action to establish a Ministerial Commission was taken at the General Conference session of May 1922. A. G. Daniells, who for 21 years had been the president of the General Conference, was asked to head the new commission. He had a deep conviction that ministers should rise above their routine responsibilities, deepen their personal consecration, and broaden their preaching. He felt strongly that ministers should emphasize not only the distinctive doctrines of Seventh-day Adventists but also the basic fundamentals of faith and life, and especially righteousness by faith as presented in the Minneapolis General Conference session of 1888.

The commission, organized on Sept. 25, 1922, soon came to be known as the Ministerial Association, with a field constituency of “ministers, licentiates, Bible workers, editors of denominational papers, medical heads of sanitariums and superintendents of nurses’ training schools, heads of senior and junior colleges and academies” (Actions of the Autumn Council [1923], p. 6).

Between 1923 and 1925 the commission conducted many ministerial institutes throughout the United States. During a Southern Union institute held in Nashville, Tennessee, in 1926, the conclusion was reached that additional help was needed not only for the conducting of institutes but for the preparation of reading materials for ministers. As a result L. E. Froom, editor of the Watchman, was called to assist A. G. Daniells in 1926 and was associated with him until Daniells’ death in 1935. At the Milwaukee General Conference session that same year, nine outstanding leaders presented papers with a view to strengthening the ministry. Among these were W. W. Prescott, O. Montgomery, E. K. Slade, C. B. Haynes, I. H. Evans, as well as Daniells and Froom. Their presentations were later published in leaflet form and sent to ministers far and wide.

In 1928 a monthly periodical, Ministry, was launched. It carried in its first editorial column a discussion of righteousness by faith. Some of its regular features were headed “Forward and Upward,” “Around the World Circle,” “Delving Into the World,” “Kindly Correctives,” “Bible Workers’ Exchange,” and “The Minister’s Books,” and there was also a forum on methods. First issued in digest size, it was later enlarged and printed in 8½" x 11" (22 cm. x 28 cm.) size.

By this time the Ministerial Association was well under way. It was not a department but rather an association, embracing all the ministers and denominational workers throughout the world. Its objectives were to serve all workers by endeavoring to help in the development of Christian character and especially to encourage deeper spirituality.

Upon the resignation of Daniells in 1931, I. H. Evans was appointed the Ministerial Association secretary, and Meade McGuire was added to the staff. During the 1930s the Ministerial Association assumed an increasingly influential role in the denomination.

In the 1941 session the General Conference passed several recommendations, framed by the ministerial council preceding the conference. These recommendations called for more field participation in greater evangelism, and recommended that one of the secretaries of the Ministerial Association be “an experienced, successful evangelist,” who would assist in evangelistic institutes and foster the training of evangelists for metropolitan areas, and that another be “a qualified, experienced Bible worker” to foster the work of the Bible instructors and develop advanced training courses. For this purpose, R. Allan Anderson was called as associate secretary and Louise C. Kleuser as assistant (later an associate). Through the years association secretaries have taught many courses in the Seventh-day Adventist Theological Seminary and in continuing education programs throughout the world field.

In recent years such programs as Continuing Education seminars and self-study courses, PREACH (Project Reaching Every Active Clergy Home) magazine subscriptions and seminars, One Thousand Days of Reaping, Harvest 90, Project 27, Ministerial Supply Center, and a specialized ministry to local church elders have been developed and fostered by the Ministerial Association.

In 1983 an intentional ministry to pastoral wives was initiated by Marie Spangler. This entity, Shepherdess International, was regularized as part of the Ministerial Association in 1985. Ellen Bresee served as coordinator from 1985 to 1992, after which Sharon Cress assumed the responsibility.

Ministry

MINISTRY (1928— ; monthly; RH; 1994 circulation, 16,000; file in RH). The organ of the Ministerial Association of Seventh-day Adventists. It was launched in 1928 with the purpose, stated in the first issue, of (1) deepening the spiritual life, (2) developing the intellectual strength, and (3) increasing the soul-winning efficiency of the members of the association (1:16, January 1928).

Through the years it has had departments dealing with biblical studies, methods and techniques of evangelism, pastoral work, reports on the activities of the church around the world, advice on ministerial problems, the work of the Bible instructor and the minister's wife, the work of the local elder, feedback, religious news briefs, and book reviews.

For a number of years a 10- to 12-page health evangelism section was added, along with a section each month on archaeology and creation science.

In 1975 a pilot project entitled PREACH (originally, Project for Reaching Every Active Clergyman at Home; now, Project Reaching Every Active Clergy Home), inaugurated in the Columbia Union, provided Ministry to 25,000 non-Adventist clergy on an every-other-month basis for a two-year period.

This was expanded to include the entire North American Division and overseas divisions as well. In 1993 about 60,000 clergy of other faiths still received the journal free. In 1980 the editors developed a mission statement divided into seven areas: life of the minister; family of the minister; spouse; Bible and theology; practices; issues; and reports.

History

History. Beginning of the Work in Minnesota. Seventh-day Adventist influence was felt in Minnesota as early as 1856, when Joseph Bates, traveling in Iowa, gave publications to families migrating to Minnesota. In June 1860 L. Bartholomew reported 10 families worshipping on the Sabbath at Deerfield, several of whom had been won through personal work of W. Morse.

The first tent meetings were undertaken in the spring of 1860 at St. Charles by William S. Ingraham under discouraging circumstances. Eighteen of the 30 adherents in the area had taken up the “future-age doctrine,” evidently that of the defecting “age-to-come” party, which had brought destruction to several churches in Wisconsin. Ingraham reported reclaiming 14 of the undecided members and adding four new ones. Because of the encouraging response he held meetings also at High Forest in Olmstead County, where he was assisted by C. Norton, a new convert, and H. F. Lashier, who remained after Ingraham’s departure to work with 18 converts and other interested people. During tent meetings in that early period preachers of other denominations would often rise to challenge or harangue the speakers and would announce speaking engagements elsewhere. To hold the audiences the SDA speakers often would invite the challengers to preach in the tent, and then they would answer their detractors.

W. Morse reported that whenever a church was begun, D. P. Hall would appear with his ideas on spiritual gifts and his no-Sabbath and his “age-to-come” doctrines in an effort to draw away the members. In 1861 J. Bostwick organized 12 members into a company at Cherry Grove, and J. N. Andrews held meetings at Oronoco and Lake City, revived an existing church at Medford, and later a church of 22 members was organized at Cleveland.

The first conference in Minnesota was held Feb. 2 and 3, 1861, in Pleasant Grove, Olmstead County. Members came from as far away as 100 miles (160 kilometers) “to take into consideration the wants of the cause in this new state.” A tent committee was chosen to raise funds for the year’s evangelistic campaigns in which J. N. Andrews, J. Bostwick, and H. F. Lashier would be conducting meetings in Minnesota and northern Iowa. In 1862 similar conferences were held at Oronoco in February and at Deerfield in October, representing the churches of Oronoco, Ashland, and Deerfield. At this latter meeting, it was voted that the organized churches should constitute the Minnesota Conference, but a full-fledged organization was not completed until the next session.

Organization of the Minnesota Conference. On July 19, 1863, at a state meeting held at Deerfield, the churches of Minnesota were organized into a conference, with the constitution recommended by the newly organized General Conference. Washington Morse was elected president, F. W. Morse secretary, David Farnum treasurer, and the other executive committee members were Harrison Grant and William Merry.

During the succeeding years the SDA message continued to spread throughout the state through evangelistic meetings and personal work, and the membership grew steadily. The first Minnesota camp meeting was held in Wasioja, Dodge County, in October 1869. James and Ellen White and J. N. Andrews were present. In that conference John Hansen, a convert of John Matteson, and formerly a Baptist minister, was licensed to preach; he later worked among the Danes. In June 1870 another camp meeting was held at Wasioja. James White, reporting the meeting as “very large for Minnesota,” said that there were 19 family tents, 8 to 10 covered wagons, a boarding tent, and a large meeting tent.

Beginning in 1871, churches were formed at Greenwood Prairie, Pine Island, Riceland, Brush Creek, Tenhassen, Shelbyville, St. Cloud, and Dodge Center. In the summer and autumn of 1872, evangelism by D. M. Canright and Charles Lee at Litchfield, High Forest, Glencoe, and Albert Lea won more than 100 members, comprising eight new churches. Canright organized the English-speaking church at Hutchinson in April 1873. He estimated that the conference membership had increased by a third that one season.

In 1874 George I. Butler, assisted by Charles Lee, began work among the Swedes of Central and Northern Minnesota. The Swedes, coming from a country where church and state were united, and unaccustomed to freedom of religion, made the work difficult. However, in spite of economic boycotts invoked by their church against any members who dared to become Seventh-day Adventists, four Swedish churches were established with approximately 100 members.

The first Seventh-day Adventist church building erected in Minnesota was built at Grove Lake in 1874, where there were about 40 members. W. B. Hill reported 21 converts in Kingston and vicinity actively engaged in missionary work. Between 1874 and 1879 the Artichoke and Sauk Center churches were organized and the Hewitt group of about 30 was organized as a company in 1881.

The Mankato church, organized with eight charter members, was moved and reorganized on Jan. 18, 1886. It was joined in 1926 by the Eagle Lake church (whose building was erected in 1883) and in 1942 by the Good Thunder church (organized 1883).

Because the earliest SDA preachers met such bitter opposition from popular ministers of urban centers, they tended to restrict their meetings to rural areas and smaller towns. Hence it was some time before churches were established at Minneapolis or St. Paul. The first Seventh-day Adventist church in Minneapolis was organized Feb. 19, 1882, by H. P. Holser, with 20 members. Membership grew rapidly aided by the establishment of an evangelistic group in a city mission (opened 1886). In the first church building, on the corner of Lake Street and Fourth Avenue South, the notable General Conference session of 1888 was held. Here also the first Minnesota Conference school was opened in 1888, with C. C. Lewis as the first principal (see Maplewood Academy).

In the 1860s a few believers from out of the state moved into St. Paul, but it was not until 1883 that a church of 13 members was organized there by E. A. Merrill. This was followed by the opening of the Helping Hand Mission by W. B. White in 1885, and a gradual increase in the membership.

The Austin, Brainerd (a group originally from Crow Wing), Duluth, Owatonna, Roseau, St. Cloud, and Winona churches were organized between 1885 and 1895.

During the camp meeting of 1891, Adventists opened a cooking school for the first time. It began in the dining tent, but because of demand it was eventually opened to the general public in the large pavilion, with full attendance.

In 1895 the northern part of Dakota territory, which since 1884 had been a mission of the Minnesota Conference, became a part of the Dakota Conference.

In 1904 the Minnesota Conference opened Maplewood Academy at Maple Plain. The first decade of the twentieth century saw the founding of churches at Pipestone and Anoka, and near the latter the development of a campground that was used for many years.

The present Detroit Lakes church, begun in 1905, is a combination of the former Senjan, Lake Eunice, and Gresham churches. Its first church building, erected in 1915, was used for a school during the week. A company of four members was organized in Blackberry in 1908 (later increased to 30). Other churches of this period were Eagle Bend, Basswood, and Staples (a 1910 combination of two older churches north and south of the town). In 1910, in order to educate workers among the Scandinavians who had migrated to America, the General Conference established the Danish-Norwegian Seminary (later called Hutchinson Theological Seminary) at Hutchinson. The Virginia church was organized in December 1918 as a result of a series of meetings by S. White and H. Christianson.

Between 1920 and 1930 several churches were admitted to the conference: Williams, Tamarack, Hibbing, Willmar, Faribault, Wadena, International Falls, and Hancock and the Hutchinson First church (English), the Danish-Norwegian Seminary church, and the Maplewood Academy church merged to form what is now the Hutchinson church.

In Minneapolis the Stevens Avenue congregation (First Church) swarmed several times. In 1932 a group of Stevens Avenue laypersons, under the guidance of V. J. Johns, the pastor, held hall meetings among the Blacks. Then the conference asked T. H. Allison, leader of the Black work in the Central Union Conference, to hold a series of meetings. As a result, on Sept. 30, 1933, he organized the Glendale church of 26 members, of whom 14 came by letter from the First church. About the same time, 35 members living in the northeastern section of the city withdrew and formed the Auditorium church (1933). In 1964 the Auditorium church, with 297 members, constructed a new building and renamed itself the Northbrook church. The Glendale church and its offspring, St. Paul Sharon, requested and were granted a transfer to the Lake Region Conference in 1971.

The Red Wing, Thief River Falls, Hinckley, Princeton, Alexandria, and Lamberton churches were established between 1934—1944, and the Glenwood, Cloquet, Red Lake Falls-Fertile, Heron Lake, Northome, Aitkin, and Granby churches were organized in the late 1940s and early 1950s.

In a citywide reorganization of Minneapolis churches in 1958, the Minnetonka church of 110 members and the Southview church of 134 members were organized.

In 1967 the conference bought a modern church building in Minnetonka, just west of Minneapolis, added a wing and moved the state headquarters into this building. In 1986 these facilities were sold and the present office was built. These facilities house a satellite ABC with the main store being at Maplewood Academy in Hutchinson.

The conference instituted Trust Services in 1966, created stewardship education in 1972, and added a health education department in 1974. The health education department is a child of ABLE. ABLE (Adventists for Better Living Education) originated in the Twin City area by laypersons under the guidance of Dr. R. A. Olson. Stop-smoking plans, cooking schools, and two booths at the state fair were part of the health education program.

Minneapolis Junior Academy was erected on a 36-acre (15-hectare) plot in Minnetonka in 1968. North Star Camp on Rice Lake near Brainerd occupies a conference-owned 100-acre (40-hectare) tract with a mile and a half (two kilometers) of shoreline providing canoeing, sailing, waterskiing, and swimming. Two hundred acres (80 hectares) of government land adjoining the camp are available for hiking, horseback riding, and camping.

The conference is divided into welfare areas, with many churches operating busy Community Services centers. The center in Hutchinson serves as the warehouse for the entire conference. In the mid-1980s, Barbara Cox helped establish a street ministry program. In this program an emergency van is used to dispense clothing and food to the poor in the inner city of Minneapolis. The same van is used to feed and/or clothe victims and volunteers in disaster areas in the state.

The first camp meeting was held in 1869 in Wasioja, Dodge County. Through the years, camp meeting was held in different locations: Minneapolis, Mankato, Waseca, Anoka, Stillwater, and Hutchinson. Since 1967 it has been conducted on the campus of Maplewood Academy in Hutchinson.

In 1980 the Minnesota Conference became a part of the newly formed Mid-America Union Conference after the merger of the Central Union and Northern Union conferences.

Minor, Clorinda S.

MINOR, CLORINDA S. (fl. 1843). A Millerite writer of Philadelphia, and one of the founders of a Millerite paper for women in 1844, Advent Message to the Daughters of Zion. She was a leader, with C. R. Gorgas, of a fanatical group in Philadelphia, and after the Disappointment she favored the “spiritualizing” view of the Second Advent. Her poem “The Seventh Month” was reprinted in The Advent Review (vol. 1, no. 2, August 1850, p. 1 [i.e., p. 17]).

Mrs. Minor went to Palestine and set about establishing an agricultural colony, making arrangements with a Jewish farmer named Meshullam, but there was mutual dissatisfaction. In 1853 the Advent Harbinger reported the complaints and accusations.

Miracles

MIRACLES. Usually phenomena that cannot be explained by the operation of the known laws of the natural world; also the providential alteration of circumstances, or of the human attitude and volition, in such a way as to promote good or to restrain evil; from the Latin miraculum, an object or event that impresses those who behold it with wonder and astonishment, that transcends their knowledge, understanding, and experience, and for which, in their finite judgment, the laws of nature or change cannot provide an adequate explanation.

Miracles may be of divine or of satanic origin (Acts 19:11; 2 Thess. 2:9; etc.). The latter may be either genuine or counterfeit. Miracles may be classified according to their character or according to their purpose. Divine miracles may be of cosmic significance (for example, Creation, and the virgin birth, resurrection, and second coming of our Lord), or of personal significance (for example, instances of healing and deliverance from danger), or may be used for the advancement of God's plan for the salvation of the world (for example, the repeated instances of divine intervention on behalf of the people of Israel). A miracle may consist in the nature of the event itself, or in the auspicious timing of a natural event with respect to other events, or in its effect.

As to purpose or result, a miracle may be defined in terms of the Greek words thus translated in the NT: (1) dunamis, "an act of power," (2) sēmeion, "a sign" (Luke 23:8; John 2:11; etc.). With these Greek terms is often associated the word teras, "wonder" (Matt. 24:24; Acts 2:22; etc.). The same miracle would be a wonder by virtue of the awe it inspired in those who witnessed it, an act of power because it was a manifestation of divine power, and a sign in the sense that it was designed to impress truth upon human minds.

The miracles of our Lord called into operation power wholly unknown to man, and produced results that cannot be explained on the basis of human knowledge. His miracles were always practical and salvific, that is, they were designed to supply a genuine need and to lead men to find salvation through Him. He never exercised divine power to satisfy idle curiosity nor to demonstrate His ability to perform miracles, nor to benefit Himself. Upon various occasions Jesus refused to perform miracles because the necessary preconditions had not been met and because the effect produced would not have served a salvific purpose (Matt. 12:38, 39; cf. Luke 23:8, 9; John 6:30). His miracles also illustrated spiritual truth. The man healed of paralysis was first cured of spiritual paralysis (Mark 2:5—11). The blind man healed at Siloam enjoyed the restoration of both natural and spiritual eyesight (John 9:5—7, 35—38). Again and again He pointed to His mighty works as evidence of His divine authority, Messiahship, and message (Matt. 11:20—23; John 5:36; 10:25, 32, 37, 38; 14:10—11). Men recognized divine power at work in and through Him (Luke 9:43; 24:19; John 3:2; 6:14; 9:16, 33). For a list of the miracles of our Lord and a brief statement about the purpose of each, see SDACom, vol. 5, pp. 210—213. Christ is never recorded as working a miracle except to supply a genuine need. (This method has been called "the law of the economy of miracle.") He did not resort to what men would call a miracle if the desired result could reasonably be secured in a more natural way. God does not perform miracles to accomplish for men what they themselves, using the intelligence and ability with which He has endowed them, can do for themselves, or to supply men with things to gratify self-centered desire. God expects the recipients of miracles to feel a profound sense of need for something they realize that only God can supply; to believe that God can and will supply their need if such be in harmony with His will; to be willing to accept whatever divine wisdom sees is best; to cooperate with God in working toward the desired objective; to order their lives henceforth in harmony with the principles of the kingdom of heaven; and to bear witness to the love and power of God.

Miracles, especially those reported in Scripture, have been the occasion of considerable debate between science and theology. Natural science is possible only because nature functions in a more or less regular and orderly manner. As a result, it is possible to observe and explain the workings of nature. But miracles, being unique events, defy analysis by the scientific method. For instance, Creation, the Genesis flood, the incarnation and the resurrection of Christ, are not susceptible to explanation by ordinary scientific theories or procedures. Accordingly, those who view the world from an exclusively naturalistic perspective deny all miracles.

In view of the fact that there are counterfeit miracles, it would be as much an act of intellectual folly to accept all purported miracles without critical investigation as it would be to reject all miracles as being, a priori, impossible. With miracles, as with all other phenomena, the Christian will weigh the evidence on the basis of appropriate objective criteria, and arrive at his or her conclusions accordingly.

In a purported miracle of divine healing, for instance, there would have to be competent medical testimony that a certain physical condition actually existed prior to the miracle, which was not present afterward, that the change could not be attributed to any other known cause, and that human knowledge and skill could not have effected the cure. Because of the absence of such data in much of modern faith healing, so-called, and also because the principles and methods on which the popular faith healers operate differ so notably from those reported in Scripture, Seventh-day Adventists do not accept the claims made for these so-called miracles.

If the teachings and life of the human instrumentality do not conform to God's will as set forth in Scripture, and especially if the methods are sensational, Christians can assume that supernatural power—if indeed such was present—did not come from God. On the other hand, there are relatively rare instances in which all the requirements for a genuine miracle are present, and the facts are certified by competent witnesses.

To the casual reader the Bible may appear to be full of miracles. However, it should be remembered that the Bible narrative covers a great extent of time, and that for the most part such phenomena occurred only at rare intervals. Even so, the Bible reports more miracles than seem to occur today. This is doubtless attributable to the fact that there was more need for miracles in Bible times. For instance, modern medical science enables a skilled physician to effect healing in countless cases for which there was no known remedy in Christ's time; and God normally does not perform miracles to accomplish what may be achieved by natural means. We might also expect more miracles in less enlightened lands—where the need for them is greater and where a predisposition to accept miracles would facilitate the employment of such phenomena to lead men to a knowledge of God—than in lands where miracles are often held suspect and where they might even, at times, hinder the realization of that objective.

Of the credibility of miracles J. P. Henderson wrote in the Review and Herald for July 5, 1887 (64:418): “A miracle is simply the use of a higher power to arrest the progress of the lower. . . . A greater power may control a less; and He who is the Creator of nature has unquestionable power to control the thing created. . . . To question greater power than we possess is to measure the God of the universe by our own capacities.”

Comparing the extraordinary exercise of divine power manifested in miracles with the ordinary manifestation of the same power day by day in the natural world, Dr. David Paulson declared: “Sometimes a miracle is defined as something that is out of harmony with natural law; but this definition is a result of ignorance rather than of knowledge. . . . When we see something happening that we cannot explain, we call it a miracle, while those miracles that we are accustomed to see daily, we regard as simply commonplace events; but is one not as truly a miracle as the other?” (ibid. 78:228, Apr. 9, 1901).

In summary, Seventh-day Adventists accept the reality of duly attested miracles. They do not believe that the Creator is necessarily bound by what humans consider natural laws, as this would place a finite limitation on His infinite power as God, if it did not deny His existence altogether. The basic problem with miracles lies in one’s concept of God. A person who believes in an infinite, personal God who created and sustains all things and who is infinitely wise, powerful, and good will find no difficulty in believing also that when necessary He can and will utilize the forces of nature in ways He may see fit, to accomplish that which in infinite wisdom He deems best.

Miraflores Adventist Academy

MIRAFLORES ADVENTIST ACADEMY (Colegio Adventista de Miraflores). A private secondary educational institution that was formed to benefit the youth in their studies, with the objective of affording integral education. It was founded in 1919 and at that time called Industrial Institute. After selling large portions of land, it was circumscribed to the place it now occupies with students from the area and from Lima, Peru.

In 1953 the school took its present name. It is located at Avenida Comandante Espinar 750, in the residential area of the Miraflores district in Lima, the capital of Peru. It has the highest number of pupils of any Seventh-day Adventist institution in the country.

The school consists of modern classrooms, laboratory, library, cafeteria, and other environments. New areas have been inaugurated, the most important of which is the computer laboratory. The school's library has more than 4,000 books specialized for the secondary level.

The school has 585 students and 25 teachers.

Principals: Pedro P. León, 1953—1964; Eleodoro Rodríguez, 1965—1970; Juan Astete, 1971—1974; Rubén Chambi, 1975—1976; Félix Bendezú, 1977—1979; Eusebio Barreda, 1980—1982; Blanca Ramal, 1983; Walter Manrique, 1984—1987; Juan Melgar., 1988—1990; Eusebio Barreda, 1991—1992; Víctor León, 1993— .

Miraflores Adventist Clinic

MIRAFLORES ADVENTIST CLINIC (Clínica Adventista de Miraflores). A general hospital with a capacity of 90 beds, owned and operated by the Inca Union Mission, situated in Miraflores, a suburb of Lima, Peru.

The hospital originated when in October 1946 the Inca Union committee voted to rent a large house in the San Antonio district of Miraflores for a five-bed institution, under the direction of Dr. C. R. Potts, formerly from Puno, Peru. In March 1948 Good Hope Clinic was moved to a building that had formerly been the German embassy residence, which was purchased with $20,000 contributed by the General Conference, a $5,000 loan, and a small appropriation from local funds. This building was remodeled and adapted for use as a hospital during 1948 and on Feb. 13, 1949, was officially opened.

Later a four-story addition was erected at one side of the original building to house the kitchen, dining room, and two wards. In the early 1970s the name Miraflores Adventist Clinic was adopted.

Medical Directors: Clayton R. Potts, 1946—1955; Kern Pihl, 1955—1959; Ewaldo Weiss, 1960—1962; Clement E. Counter, 1962—1963; Teodoro Zegarra, 1963—1967; F. J. Romero, 1968—1970; E. Mission

MISSION. A unit of church organization similar in form and function to the conference, the basic difference in organization being that the officers of missions are elected by the next higher body. The division at its regular session elects the officers of the union mission fields—president, secretary-treasurer, and auditor; and the union mission at its regular session elects the officers of the local mission fields. (“Mission” is sometimes used as a short form for “mission station.”)

The local mission, like the local conference, has authority to elect or appoint all other employees in local mission work, in harmony with the policies of the union and within the limits of budget provision.

The union mission as well as the union conference has authority to elect or appoint all other employees in union mission work, in harmony with the policies of the division and within the limits of the budget provision.

As local and union mission fields grow in strength and experience, they normally develop to the point where they can qualify for conference status. The following factors are taken into consideration by the higher organizations when evaluating the eligibility of a local or union mission for conference standing:

a. Leaders, workers, and members of organizations for which conference status is sought must give evidence of possessing a clear perception of the denomination’s primary objectives.

b. The local or union mission must have attained a well-balanced program of church activities and shall have demonstrated its ability to cooperate with other related organizations and institutions.

c. Workers and church members in the local or union mission shall have given evidence of their confidence in and respect for duly appointed leadership and committees and show willingness to work in harmony with the policies and plans of the denomination.

d. The membership must be sufficiently large to justify the additional responsibilities implied in a conference organization. Its churches must be well organized and well staffed with competent leaders.

e. The local or union mission, including its subsidiary organizations, should possess financial stability, and shall have given evidence over a reasonable time of its capability to operate its work within its own finances and also to bear its share of the financial responsibility of carrying forward the world mission program of the denomination.

Before a new local conference or local mission is organized, the question is presented to the union for study and the union takes it to the division committee for final decision; and before a new union or union mission is organized the division obtains the approval of the General Conference.

Mission Aviation

MISSION AVIATION. The use of planes to advance the work of the church in inaccessible areas. Ever since Charles A. Lindbergh made his dramatic flight across the Atlantic in 1927, there have been those who could foresee that aviation would one day be an efficient method of reaching isolated and inaccessible areas of the world. Not until the close of World War II, however, was much serious thought given to aviation as a means of missionary transportation by Seventh-day Adventists.

During the early forties a few missionaries in the old Middle East Union bought war surplus planes and learned to fly them; but because there was no control and no policy to cover this form of mission endeavor, it was soon abandoned as too expensive and too dangerous an undertaking.

About this time Jerry Pettis, a young SDA minister in Kansas City, Missouri, flew regularly to Union College in Lincoln, Nebraska, on teaching appointments. But for the most part, aviation was unused among Seventh-day Adventist workers.

At the close of World War II, as aviation began to gain prominence and to be developed on a safer basis, many young workers turned their thoughts to this means of communication and transportation. Particularly did those missionaries in remote areas begin to consider the use of the light plane. It would make their lives easier and would give them instant contact with the world from which they were all but cut off. Many mission stations had been abandoned because no workers could be found who would live cut off from medical and other essential services of civilization.

In the 1950s a few people in remote mission fields bought their own planes, learned to fly them, and used them very efficiently in their work. One of these was Dick Hall in Borneo. Much of the money he needed for the purchase and upkeep of his plane came from individuals in the United States who could see the successful work being done in this field. Africa-bound doctors took their own planes with them and used them to take medical assistance to villages where it was impossible to go by truck or boat. Aviation, they decided, was here to stay and would, they felt, eventually be incorporated into the work of the church just as the mission launches had.

In 1958 James J. Aitken, long an aviation enthusiast, was elected to the presidency of the South American Division. The first trip that he took around the field convinced him that the use of the light plane would be the only method by which nearly two thirds of the division could be reached. Even those areas where launches were operating would be easier to work if there were planes to supply the mission boats. Deaths occurring from boat accidents only strengthened his belief that aviation used sensibly was the answer to many of the problems of the missionary. When a small child died on a mission launch because it was impossible to reach medical assistance in the slow boat, his mind was made up: Aviation was a must.

Aitken suggested that the General Conference set up an aviation policy with control of planes and pilots so that they could be operated sensibly and safely in areas where they were so desperately needed. In the meantime he enrolled in the local Uruguayan pilot school and learned to fly light planes, earning his license on Sept. 12, 1960. While the General Conference deliberated, he set in motion the machinery necessary for the development of an aviation policy in the mission field. He was encouraged by many interested persons in the United States who sent money for his project with the stipulation that it was “to be used for aviation or to be returned to sender.” The General Conference officially approved and voted a policy in October 1960, with the notable assistance of such men as W. R. Beach, M. V. Campbell, Norman Dunn, and others.

One of the first fields to benefit from the new aviation policy was the Inter-American Division. William Baxter, a longtime missionary pilot, had for years used a light plane out of Montemorelos, Mexico, to bring aid and comfort to many souls in out-of-the-way villages of the Sierra Madre. Aitken visited his station and school on his way to the United States and was delighted to see how well this new form of evangelism and missionary activity worked.

Back in the field, Aitken set about looking for a suitable place in which to establish an air base. It was decided to go to the jungles of Peru, next to the Wycliffe Bible translator’s base on Lake Yarinacoche near Pucallpa. Here 200 acres (80 hectares) of land were purchased for the amazingly low sum of $3,000. Men were employed to clear the base and build an airstrip. Soon a hangar was erected under the direction of Wellesley Muir, who, with his wife and family, lived at the base during much of the construction, existing in a tent and living on native foods.

Now it was time to purchase a plane that would be suitable for this jungle area. In 1963 Aitken used most of his furlough time consulting with aviation authorities and engineers, and finally found a plane that met all the qualifications for jungle use. It was the same type of plane used by the Wycliffe Bible translators so effectively, a Helio Courier, a stall type aircraft that could take off and land on a remarkably short landing strip.

On June 16, 1963, the Fernando Stahl, the first official denominational plane, was christened at the Angwin airstrip at Pacific Union College. Ana Stahl, widow of the pioneer missionary, Fernando Stahl, was there at 94 years of age to formally christen the new plane and to send it on its way to Peru, her beloved mission field.

The choosing of a pilot for the new plane was more difficult. No SDA school had aviation instruction as yet. Clyde Peters, a Kansas youth who was currently flying as spray pilot for the University of Nebraska and who had more than 3,000 flying hours behind him, was eventually chosen. A dedicated young man who had chosen aviation as his lifework, Clyde eagerly consented to join the working forces and to go to Pucallpa, Peru, as the first official pilot for the denomination.

The Fernando Stahl and Clyde Peters arrived in Lima, Peru, in the fall of 1963. Don Christman, president of the Inca Union, had prepared a red-carpet ceremony to welcome to his field this new and progressive instrument of evangelism. Almost immediately the new program gave startling results. In the first year more than 200 persons were airlifted from the jungle, their lives saved from almost certain death. The baptisms in that period in the Peru Mission reached 1,000 souls for the first time in history. During this time the natives, told that they would receive medical help and teachers, built 40 jungle strips for such use.

A second plane was needed to back up the Fernando Stahl, and Peters chose a Piper Super Cub with oversized tires for soft strips. In 1966 this plane was put into service and christened at the Inca Union Training School near Lima, being given the name Ricardo Hayden, commemorating the pioneer work done by veteran missionary Richard Hayden.

After more than three years of continuous service to the jungle the Fernando Stahl crashed into a flooded river when taking off from one of the soft jungle strips. Clyde Peters and his family were able to get out and no lives were lost, but the plane has never been found. Probably it floated off into some remote area of the jungle while the river was in flood. The Fernando Stahl was immediately replaced with funds donated by aviation enthusiasts in the United States. It was christened Fernando Stahl II. Later more planes were to join the fleet at the Pucallpa base.

In 1968 the Leo Halliwell was inaugurated at Andrews University, which by now had its own airport and flight instruction. The Leo Halliwell was sent to Brazil to back up the mission launches. It was a Lake Skimmer amphibious plane. Its first pilot was Dan Walter.

Since 1964, in the department of Beni in Bolivia, the church has had a plane operating for evangelistic use. The first pilot was Richard Gates. This plane serves a large central zone of that area where no roads exist.

The Eastern Africa Division had several aircraft, these planes being ferried over by Bob Seamount, former Voice of Prophecy quartet member and veteran pilot. The flying-doctor service was inaugurated in January of 1962 when a Cessna 180 aircraft, donated to the Eastern Africa Division, was handed over to Malamulo Hospital. Both Malamulo resident doctors at that time were experienced pilots. Malamulo has an airstrip and hangar, and airstrips at the various clinics in the union have been opened where safe landings may be effected. This medium of contact has been of inestimable service to the country and has been expanded to include the services of a dentist.

The South Pacific Division secured its first mission aircraft in July 1964. Piloted by L. H. Barnard, the first Cessna 180 carried the registration number VH-SDA, and was appropriately named Andrew Stewart, honoring one of Australasia's most colorful pioneer missionaries.

J. L. Tucker of The Quiet Hour raised money through his broadcasts to send a twin-engine Aztec to the South Pacific. J. J. Aitken, now in the United States, supervised the buying and outfitting of the plane and it was ferried to Australia by a layperson, Wayne Fowler. It was christened the J.L. Tucker. Elder Tucker has to date sent 30 planes to mission fields of the world, the money all raised through Quiet Hour broadcasts.

Mission aircraft have greatly accelerated the development of Seventh-day Adventist mission work in remote areas in Papua New Guinea, particularly in the highlands, where rugged mountainous terrain makes mission enterprise otherwise slow and difficult. Much time is saved, efficiency improved, and financial economies achieved as mission aircraft carry mission personnel and supplies. The West Australia and North New South Wales conferences each own and operate single-engined aircraft that are used for field visitation and evangelistic work in remote areas.

In the 1980s and 1990s the South Pacific Division developed a flying school and airstrip at Avondale College in Australia. Several conferences in Australia have owned aircraft through the years. These have proved practical for field visitation and evangelistic work in remote areas.

Korea also purchased and outfitted a plane for the work in that region. Because they needed it primarily for island work, they purchased a Lake Skimmer amphibious plane.

Aviation has progressed rapidly in the years since the General Conference policy was voted. Southern College, Andrews University, and Southwestern Adventist College have built airports and developed flight schools in the past few years. Blue Mountain Academy, in Pennsylvania, has led out in aviation activities as far as academies are concerned. It has one of the best grass strips in the country. This was donated and engineered by Dr. Harold Connor, a Seventh-day Adventist dentist in the metropolitan Washington, D.C., area.

The Adventist Aviation Association, established as a supporting ministry group, has chapters in several states dedicated to missionary outreach in remote areas.

In North America an aviation center was established at Andrews University in 1976 under the leadership of Ray Swensen to instruct, train, and to check mission pilots.

From 1985 to 1990 Robert Kloosterhuis and Leo Ranzolin led the Aviation Committee of the General Conference. In 1990 the North American Division assumed the leadership of aviation for the North American Division with Robert Dale, chair, and the General Conference established its own committee with Leo Ranzolin, chair, and Larry Colburn, secretary.

Aviation schools were established in Arizona, Washington, California, and Pennsylvania. Many laymen helped with these projects.

At the end of 1993 there were 38 aircraft worldwide. Of these, 17 were in the South Pacific Division and 14 were in North America. The Far Eastern Division had three. In the late 1980s and early 1990s the aviation program became quite costly because of the high price of insurance and the availability of commercial aircraft. One airplane was taken over by the Mexican government; another suffered an accident in Bolivia, and in 1992 Conroy Doneski, a mission pilot, died in a plane accident in Mexico. The Shining Path Terrorist Movement in Peru forced the church to close down the famous Pucallpa Airplane Field. Pilots had to come home on permanent return and moneys from the sale of the aircraft were used for other projects. In South America there was just one amphibian plane on the Amazon. However, the high cost of operating the plane made it difficult to maintain the program, and the story is similar for many of the missions in Africa and eastern Asia. Success stories continued in North America and in the South Pacific.

Under the leadership of Robert Folkenberg, president of the General Conference since 1990, who is also a helicopter and airplane pilot, there was dialogue and planning to encourage an aviation mission for the church. The plan was for a lay-driven program under a special board that would lead in a total revamping of aviation programs around the world, making it possible to use mission aircraft to foster the Global Mission program of the church. New alternatives were sought, especially for those difficult areas of the world where commercial aircraft is not available.

An example of the commitment for aviation was seen in the establishment of the work for the Irian Jaya Mission in Indonesia. The program was evaluated in 1991 and 1993, and a mission statement typifies the purpose of the aviation mission programs around the world: "Inasmuch as it is the goal of the Seventh-day Adventist Church to teach the gospel to all people, it is the mission of Adventist Aviation Indonesia to aid in the fulfillment of the objective in Irian Jaya through the use of aircraft to service existing remote villages and new areas open to the gospel."

Mission Board

MISSION BOARD. A former agency of the General Conference, active from 1889 to 1903 (but retained as an inactive corporation until 1919 for legal purposes), organized to direct the overseas mission work of the denomination. Its full legal title was Foreign Mission Board of Seventh-day Adventists (incorporated 1899), but the full title was not commonly used. In fact, as Seventh-day Adventist work spread in various countries, “foreign missions” changed in meaning. Originally everything outside North America was foreign work, but soon the church in foreign lands such as Germany and Australia became self-supporting, and then functioned as home bases, sending out and supporting missionaries to other lands. Thus “missions” rather than “foreign missions” is the common expression in SDA usage.

When the General Conference was organized in 1863, no Foreign Mission Board was appointed. The work at that time was concentrated in the United States and Canada. However, a change in attitude gradually took place. At the General Conference session of 1869 a Foreign Mission Society was formed to send the SDA message “to foreign lands, and to distant parts of our own country.” The General Conference Executive Committee was authorized to manage all matters pertaining to the society. Membership and donations were solicited.

By the early 1870s, under the counsel of Ellen White, Seventh-day Adventists began to comprehend clearly that theirs was a mission to the whole world (see LS 203—206). At the General Conference session in 1874, action was taken instructing the Executive Committee to send J. N. Andrews to Switzerland as soon as practicable.

The Executive Committee continued to carry the responsibility of supervising the work of sending missionaries to other countries until the General Conference session of 1889, when action was taken appointing a Foreign Mission secretary to report to the Foreign Mission Board, which consisted of a Foreign Mission Committee of six members, who with the nine members of the Executive Committee of the General Conference, were to constitute a Foreign Mission Board, “for the management of the foreign mission work of this [General] Conference” (General Conference Daily Bulletin, Nov. 5, 1889, pp. 141, 142). The Foreign Mission Board was “to appoint, instruct, and direct the foreign missionaries of the denomination.”

Between 1901 and 1905 a thorough reorganization of the administrative structure of the denomination was effected. The union conference plan of organization, which relieved the General Conference Committee of much detail work, left the committee with more time for general supervision of the work. There was also a definite move toward placing upon the General Conference Committee the responsibilities formerly carried by the various independent boards, which were at that time discontinued, with the exception of certain legal corporations, one of which, the Mission Board, was retained as a legal entity until 1919. At the General Conference session of 1903 action was taken assigning to the General Conference Committee the responsibility of supervising the missionary operations of the denomination. At the Annual Council of the General Conference in 1991 this responsibility was assigned to a standing committee established in 1930, known as The General Conference Committee on Appointees. Since 1991 it has exercised the functions connected with the appointment of workers from one country to another.

Under the division plan of organization, adopted in 1913, any of the divisions determines when a worker from one of the home bases is needed and whether adequate budget provision has been made. All calls are sent to the secretariat of the General Conference, and candidates are selected by the Committee on Appointees.

Thus the Committee on Appointees functions as a mission board even though it is not designated as such.

Mission College

MISSION COLLEGE. An institution developed from a small school that trained nurses at the Bangkok Adventist Hospital. It was established by Dr. and Mrs. Ralph Waddell in 1941. Four years after the establishment of the hospital, the Waddells requested permission from the government to start a school of nursing with the objective of training nurses to care for the patients. World War II broke out soon after the school opened, and it was forced to close. The teaching resumed in 1947 at 430 Pitsanuloke Road in Bangkok, near the Bangkok Adventist Hospital.

Improvement has been made in the teaching methods, curriculum, and facilities in order to keep up with the standard set by the Nursing Division of the Ministry of Health. Throughout the years the school has received financial support from Bangkok Adventist Hospital.

In 1950 the school graduated its first class, with 25 nurses receiving certificates.

In 1955 midwifery was added to the curriculum. The length of the new course was six months of classwork beyond the School of Nursing requirements.

In 1958 a three-story building was erected to accommodate offices and dormitories. On Dec. 2, 1958, Her Majesty Queen Sirikit graciously came to officiate at the opening ceremony.

Nurses are trained in the area of disease prevention, promotion of health to the general public in both the private and government sectors, whether they be in an urban or rural setting. The program and the graduates are well accepted by the general public and by the government of Thailand.

The administration recognized the necessity of keeping up with the trends in developing nurses to meet the country's needs in terms of members and qualifications. Therefore, the curriculum was upgraded to the baccalaureate level. In 1986 the School of Nursing received permission to establish a college.

The curriculum was accredited by the Nursing Council of Thailand and the Ministry of University in 1989. The graduates of nursing science are also recognized by the Civil Service Department.

In 1989 an expansion was made with the objective of fulfilling the needs of higher education among young people in the rural areas of Thailand. Permission to establish an extended campus in Muak Lek, Saraburi, was granted in 1990. The additional curriculum includes a Bachelor of Business Administration majoring in management and accounting, and a Bachelor of Arts in Humanities with an English major.

Missionary Literature

MISSIONARY LITERATURE. The phrase used by Seventh-day Adventists to describe all printed material such as tracts, magazines, or books dealing with the doctrines of the Bible, intended to disseminate the faith. This phrase is employed especially for printed matter that is distributed free as a method of lay evangelism.

The earliest known piece of SDA missionary literature was a 48—page pamphlet entitled The Seventh-day Sabbath—A Perpetual Sign, written by Captain Joseph Bates, which came from the press in August 1846 and which became a “mighty instrument” in the propagation of the doctrine of the Sabbath. (T. M. Preble, whose 1845 tract had been instrumental in bringing the Sabbath message to many people, did not belong to the group who became the nucleus of the Seventh-day Adventist Church.)

When in 1849 the original Present Truth, an eight-page sheet, was printed in a first issue of only 1,000 copies, it could hardly be foreseen that this paper was the forerunner of the church’s current missionary magazines, of which many millions of pages are printed monthly.

The publication of The Signs of the Times (a weekly for many years and at first partly a church paper) began in 1874. It later became exclusively evangelistic in character, the oldest of its kind. It, along with other periodicals and tracts, was distributed widely by lay members under the various local societies that formed the International Tract Society.

After the turn of the century came a greater development of missionary literature. In 1913 when the Home Missionary Department of the General Conference was organized, the responsibility of promoting the wider use of missionary literature for free distribution was assigned to this department.

Methods of circulation are varied. Many churches carry on a mailing plan whereby papers or tracts are sent to each boxholder in a county or a given territory. House-to-house visitation is encouraged, in which personal contacts are made and appropriate literature (specially prepared tracts or a copy of a missionary magazine) is given to interested people. Subscriptions for magazines are sent by mail to friends. Invitations to enroll in free Bible correspondence schools are extended to all who might be interested. Through lending libraries, books are made available by the home missionary council of each church, or by individual members of the church. Free copies of Signs of the Times are available from many airport displays in the United States. Boxes placed in shops also offer free copies with a year’s subscription at no cost to those who send in their names.

The two major missionary magazines in English are Signs of the Times, a 36-page four-color monthly published by the Pacific Press in Boise, Idaho, and Message, also 36 pages and in color, issued bimonthly by the Review and Herald Publishing Association in Hagerstown, Maryland. It is primarily for African-Americans in the United States. El Centinela, the Spanish, and La Sentinelle, the French equivalent of Signs of the Times, are also widely distributed in North America.

Outside of North America, millions of missionary magazines are printed in Korean, Norwegian, Danish, Polish, Chinese, Dutch, Italian, Afrikaans, Spanish, Portuguese, Finnish, German, Japanese, Urdu, Hindi, and Russian.

Missionary literature is printed in approximately 200 languages by more than 50 Seventh-day Adventist publishing houses around the world. With the modern equipment available in many of our houses, it is not uncommon to print and distribute a million copies of Great Controversy in a single language in just one year.

Another development beginning in 1950 was the annual publication of a “missionary book of the year.” Through quantity production these books could be made available at a greatly reduced price. In some cases these were reprints of large subscription books that for years had been sold by house-to-house methods. For example, Bible Readings for the Home, containing some 700 pages, had been sold by the colporteurs for decades. When it was reprinted as a Missionary Book of the Year by the Review and Herald Publishing Association, in one year 236,980 copies were circulated—many more than the total number of copies in all trade editions of the book distributed in the preceding 50 years. Several million copies of these missionary books of the year have been purchased, largely by Seventh-day Adventists, to be given or lent to friends, relatives, or neighbors. The publication of these annual books rotates among the two major publishing houses in North America.

In recent years North American publishing houses have combined forces with the laymen’s group ASI in producing inexpensive paperback newsprint editions for mass distribution. Presently they are offering Steps to Christ, Christ’s Object Lessons, The Desire of Ages, The Great Controversy, Acts of the Apostles, Patriarchs and Prophets, Prophets and Kings, and Bible Readings. Because of quantity printing, the price of these books has been kept to below $1 per copy.

Tract racks filled with attractive missionary literature are placed in railroad and bus stations, airports, laundromats, dentists’ and physicians’ waiting rooms, barbershops, and many other places where people have time to read. The circulation of missionary literature still plays, and will continue to play, a large part in the missionary activities of the members of the church.

Missionary Magazine

MISSIONARY MAGAZINE (1889—1902; began as Home Missionary, 1889—1897; absorbed Medical Missionary and the Gospel of Health, 1901; absorbed by the Advent Review and Sabbath Herald, 1902; monthly; International Tract Society, Battle Creek, Michigan, and Foreign Mission Board, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, New York, New York, and Battle Creek, Michigan; files in RH and GC). Until the end of 1897 an organ of the International Tract and Missionary Society; after that an organ of the Foreign Mission Board of Seventh-day Adventists.

Missionary Vessels

MISSIONARY VESSELS. Vessels used for missionary purposes. The work of these vessels formerly stressed evangelism and the sale of Seventh-day Adventist publications; today the emphasis is on medical missionary work.

SDA interest in missionary vessels developed from their ship missionary work. This type of work was done on ships in port and included such activities as distributing publications to the passengers, studying the Bible and praying with those who showed interest in SDA teachings, and sending publications to distant ports of call in care of passengers or crew. The heyday of this work coincided with the peak years of immigration to the United States (1880—1910), when thousands of emigrants sailed from the ports of Europe, and to a lesser extent from Asia, for North America. During this time Seventh-day Adventists had ship missions in Liverpool, Southampton, Hamburg, New York, Boston, Baltimore, Oakland, Hong Kong, Sydney, and other places.

While doing this type of work John I. Tay became interested in sending Seventh-day Adventist publications to the inhabitants of Pitcairn Island. Because commercial vessels seldom called at Pitcairn and many other South Pacific islands, a schooner called the Phoebe Chapman was purchased in Honolulu, Hawaii, for about $1,000 and put in sailing condition for about another $1,000. This ship was the first SDA missionary ship. It left Honolulu in July 1888 with missionary A. J. Cudney, and a crew of five, bound for Pitcairn Island via Tahiti, but was lost at sea with all hands.

Soon after, in 1889, the General Conference voted to build the schooner Pitcairn (later refitted as a brigantine) for the purpose of transporting missionaries to the islands of the South Pacific.

Within a decade several other vessels were put into use for missionary purposes. Some, such as the Sentinel (New York) and the Herold (Hamburg, Germany), were harbor launches, which developed from the need for transportation by ship missionaries. In the same decade the Morning Star was built for doing missionary work on the Mississippi and its tributaries. Also within the same decade the schooner Herald was built for missionary service in the Caribbean area and the yacht Thina for the Fiji Islands. Since the beginning of the twentieth century, SDAs have used many vessels of various types for various missionary purposes, such as the Tiare (South Pacific), the Veilomani (South Pacific), the Vavolombelona (Madagascar), and the Watchman (Maine).

The development of Seventh-day Adventist mission outreach in the scattered South Pacific Islands of the South Pacific Division was facilitated by a fleet of denominationally owned mission vessels. After World War II, the Pacific Seventh-day Adventist mission fleet grew to 25 vessels of varying dimensions up to 65 feet (20 meters) in length.

Mission vessels continued to play an important part in the mission work of the South Pacific for many years. However, because of greatly improved road communications and increased use of mission aircraft, today there are no mission vessels in use in the South Pacific.

Medical Missionary Launches. In 1928 on appointment as president of the Lower Amazon Mission, L. B. Halliwell made a careful study of the territory and the availability of transportation and found that mission launches were needed to reach the people living along the banks of the Amazon and its tributaries. With the aid of offerings from the young people of North and South America during 1930, the first launch was constructed, a boat with a displacement of seven tons (six metric tons) and a cruising speed of about seven knots. It was launched on July 4, 1931, and christened the Luzeiro (“Light Bearer”).

The hull, 30 feet (nine meters) long and 10 feet (three meters) wide, was built of itauba wood, a long-lasting Amazon hardwood. The boat was powered by a 20-horsepower German Diesel engine and was equipped with two generators for electricity. In it the Halliwells (he an electrical engineer and she a graduate nurse) cruised many thousands of miles preaching the gospel and bringing medical aid to multitudes of people who could be reached only by the waterways of the Amazon and its tributaries.

As the work continued to grow, other launches, also named Luzeiro and built according to a similar but improved pattern, were added. All were larger than the original boat and were equipped with more powerful Diesel engines. Some had double decks and a laboratory, examination room, a room for dental work, and one had a few hospital beds. From the small beginning in 1931, there are now boats on most of the important rivers in the South American Division.

Elder and Mrs. Halliwell were honored by the Brazilian government with the Order of Cruzeiro do Sul, which is granted only to foreigners who render outstanding service to the community.

Another typical missionary launch was El Mensajero (“The Messenger”), a 45-foot (15-meter) cabin cruiser owned and operated by the East Venezuela Mission in the Inter-American Division. It served as a floating medical and dental clinic on the lower Orinoco and Apure rivers and their navigable tributaries in Venezuela, and operated after 1960 on a six-month-a-year schedule. Prominent among the infirmities treated are amebiasis, intestinal parasites, and gastroenteritis.

In 1961 the mission decided to reorganize the work of the Mensajero to include preventive medicine and in addition to serve as an evangelistic unit known as the “Home Health Commission of the Orinoco River System.” The object was to develop a chain of mission outposts as well as to promote health education, so that the people could be taught the gospel along with personal hygiene, dental hygiene, nutrition, and horticulture. In addition to the outpost work, it was expected that one general missionary trip a year be made in the area assigned to the launch.

Glenn F. Henriksen served as the first captain of the launch, assisted by his wife, Carol Sands Henriksen, a registered nurse. An assistant pilot, who also served as evangelist and Bible instructor, was also assigned to the launch.

Successor to the Mensajero in the Colombia-Venezuela Union was the Auxiliadora, based at El Bagre on the lower reaches of the Magdalena River in Colombia, manned first by the Darayl Larsen family and then by the Gabriel Arregui family, both families combining the talents of minister, pilot, and nurse.

The total number of mission ships in use in 1993 were 11. A medical mission ship known as African Queen operated from Ugbo in the West Nigeria Conference, and 10 mission ships were in service in the South American Division. They were Luzeiro I, XX, XXI, XXII, and XXIII serving the Central Amazon Mission, the Luzeiro XXVIII serving the Lower Amazon Mission, the Luminar II serving the Central Minas Conference, the Luzeiro d'Oeste I serving the Central Brazil Conference, the Luzeiro do Araguaia serving the Mato Grosso Mission, and a mission launch in the West Bolivia Mission.

Missions

MISSIONS. Seventh-day Adventists take seriously Christ's commission, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature" (Mark 16:15). They believe that in a special sense they have been called to proclaim to the world the three angels' messages of Rev. 14:6—12 (see Remnant Church). The first of these messages is declared to be "the everlasting gospel" to be proclaimed to "them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people" (v. 6). This concept of their mission has led them to commit their physical, material, and spiritual resources to the cause of worldwide missions.

Seventh-day Adventists do not regard missions as something in addition to the regular work of the church; it is the work of the church. They take the world as their field (cf. Matt. 13:38). They are motivated in their endeavors by the prediction that when "this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations," then the end will come (Matt. 24:14).

The scope of SDA mission work is shown in the following tabulation (1992):

Countries in which the church is working—204

Languages in which the church is working—687

Languages in which the church issues literature—190

Missionaries sent overseas (one year)—304

Offerings for worldwide missions (1992)—$48,167,156

It took some years for the emerging church to develop a sense of a worldwide mission. This is shown by the following statement: "At times during the early days of the message, Seventh-day Adventists caught glimpses of a broadening work that would eventually embrace many nationalities. Not until the early seventies, however, did the leaders in the Advent movement begin to comprehend that theirs was a mission to the whole world. Even as late as 1872, the scripture 'This gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations; and then shall the end come' was regarded simply as a 'prominent sign of the last day,' meeting fulfillment in the extension of Protestant missions. Its complete fulfillment was in no way associated with the spread of the Advent movement throughout the world." (See Review and Herald [39:138, 139], April 16 and [40:36], July 16, 1872.) But in 1873 a marked change of sentiment began to appear in the utterances of leaders among SDAs regarding their duty to warn the world. (See editorial Review and Herald [42:84, 85], Aug. 26, 1873; and many other articles of similar import in the issues that followed.) By the close of the year 1874 this transformation of sentiment seems to have been effected almost completely (LS 203, footnote by compilers).

During the 1850s many immigrants accepting the Adventist message sent publications to their homelands and thus won converts (a few in Ireland by 1861). Some had a burden to go back and preach. One was M. B. Czechowski, a Polish Catholic who had been converted to Protestantism and who accepted the message in 1857. After a few years he felt a desire to return to Europe as a Seventh-day Adventist missionary, but the leaders of the Seventh-day Adventist Church thought it inadvisable to send him and he received no encouragement.

However, being determined, he applied to another Adventist denomination, which sent him to Europe in 1864. Arriving at Torre Pellice in the Piedmont valley of northern Italy, he assembled a group to whom he taught the SDA doctrines. He remained in Italy about 14 months and then went to Switzerland, where he established several Sabbathkeeping groups. Financial difficulties and other troubles forced him to leave Switzerland, and he went to Romania in the winter of 1868—1869, where he continued to propagate SDA views in spite of difficulties with a new language.

Czechowski avoided giving his converts any clue as to the people from whom he received partial financial support, or as to those from whom he received his knowledge of the Sabbath and the second coming of Christ. In spite of this, some of his converts in Switzerland learned by accident the address of the Seventh-day Adventist office of publications in Battle Creek. These corresponded with the Seventh-day Adventists in America, and from the publications they received in response became acquainted with Seventh-day Adventist work, became desirous of connecting themselves with it, and sent appeals for a Seventh-day Adventist minister to come from America to teach them.

In response to these appeals, the General Conference invited the interested persons in Switzerland to send a representative to the General Conference session of 1869. James H. Erzberger (often spelled Ertzenberger) was chosen as representative but arrived too late for the General Conference. However, he remained in America nearly 16 months, learning the English language and studying SDA beliefs. Before returning to Switzerland in September 1870, he was ordained to the SDA ministry. Meanwhile Adémar Vuilleumier, leader of the Swiss Sabbathkeepers, also came to America, where he remained two years, receiving instruction similar to that given Erzberger.

Although Erzberger did not arrive in time to attend the 1869 General Conference session, the General Conference that year voted to form “the Missionary Society of the Seventh-day Adventists” for the purpose of sending the Seventh-day Adventist message “to foreign lands, and to distant parts of our own country, by means of missionaries, papers, books, tracts, etc.” (Review and Herald 33:197, June 15, 1869). However, it was several years before the leaders of the church united behind an overseas mission program and sent out the first SDA missionary.

In January 1874 the first issue of the True Missionary appeared, a magazine containing articles urging Seventh-day Adventists to send out missionaries to other countries. These appeals and those of the Swiss Sabbathkeepers were effective, for on Sept. 15, 1874, J. N. Andrews, the first Seventh-day Adventist missionary to be sent to a country outside North America, sailed for Liverpool, en route to Switzerland.

In July 1876 he issued the first number of a French paper, Les Signes des Temps (“The Signs of the Times”), and a year later Maud Sisley (later Mrs. C. L. Boyd) was sent to Switzerland to assist in the publishing work. In 1883 Andrews died of tuberculosis and was replaced by B. L. Whitney. In 1877 J. G. Matteson went from the United States to Denmark to establish SDA work there, and in 1878 William Ings went to Great Britain.

Meanwhile Seventh-day Adventist missionaries had gone to Germany (1875), France (1876), and Italy (1877). SDA missionaries went to Norway in 1878 and to Sweden in 1880. Within the next few years missionaries were sent to open work in other parts of the world, such as Australia (1885); South America [British Guiana] (1885); South Africa (1887); Asia [Hong Kong] (1888); and South America [Argentina] (1891).

In 1886 a book entitled Historical Sketches of S.D.A. Foreign Missions was published by the Adventist publishing house in Basel, Switzerland, which did much to promote a missionary spirit among SDAs. In 1888 S. N. Haskell was sent on a two-year itinerary around the world to make a survey of the possibilities of opening mission work in various places. In 1889 a new periodical, the Home Missionary (called Missionary Magazine after 1898), designed to promote various aspects of missionary work, was launched.

As the missionary spirit of the denomination grew and as opportunities for establishing missions increased, the church's educational and medical institutions were geared to supply the demands for trained missionaries. At the same time workers trained at the Review and Herald and Pacific Press publishing houses were called upon to help in establishing publishing work in Europe and Australia.

In 1890 the ship Pitcairn was built with funds donated by Sabbath school members to carry missionaries to the islands of the South Pacific. The ship made six successful missionary journeys to the South Pacific between 1890 and 1899, visiting such places as the Cook Islands, Pitcairn, Samoa, Tonga, and Fiji. The ship became a symbol of successful gospel work, which inspired greater financial support for missions.

India and various countries in Africa, Europe, and Latin America were entered during the last part of the nineteenth century.

As SDA work became established in various countries, many of these countries became home bases from which missionaries were sent to other places. For example, the South Pacific Division, where missionaries first went in 1885, in 1973 sent out 44 missionaries to the world field.

Seventh-day Adventists use "missions" instead of "foreign missions" because the church is worldwide. SDAs do not, like Anglicans or Southern Baptists, for example, constitute a church in one homeland, to which work in all other lands is "foreign." Seventh-day Adventists operate in various divisions in many lands. Any of these may be a home base from which missionaries are sent out, as well as a base for "home missionary" work conducted in local areas. "Foreign" missionaries go from Fiji and the Philippines, as well as from America and Europe, to work in countries other than their own, and members around the globe give missions offerings to help in the support of the worldwide work of the church.

For a tabular summary of the comparative growth in membership, churches, workers engaged in direct evangelism, and conference or mission organizations in North America and overseas areas, see the table entitled "Growth of SDA Church by Decades."

The church's educational program has been designed to prepare the youth of the church in each division for service at home or overseas. The emphasis given to education is shown by the number of students enrolled in church schools, academies, and colleges in 1992.

Missouri Conference

MISSOURI CONFERENCE. A unit of church organization that encompassed the state of Missouri and was active from 1875 to 1980. Its headquarters was located at 8540 Blue Ridge Blvd., Kansas City, Missouri 64138. In the summer of 1980 the Missouri Conference merged with the Iowa Conference. Just before the merger, the Missouri Conference reported these statistics in early 1980: churches, 61; members, 6,843; church schools, 19; church school teachers, 36; ordained ministers, 27; licensed ministers, 3.

History

History. Beginnings of the Work in the Area. The Adventist (Millerite) movement of 1844 was preached at St. Louis, and as a result a small group of Adventists was established, the members of which had no knowledge of the Sabbath doctrine. One of the early Sabbathkeepers in the state was a former Methodist preacher named Hawkins, who in 1856 came to Missouri after the Methodist Conference of Ohio had called him to account for keeping the seventh day as his Sabbath. He wrote to the Review and Herald from Liberty, Missouri, that as far as he knew, he and his wife were the only Sabbathkeepers in the entire state.

Perhaps the first Seventh-day Adventist ministers to preach in Missouri were Moses Hull and E. B. Saunders, who, in 1858, on a visit from Iowa to Daviess County, Missouri, held four meetings with a group of SDAs who had never heard the Sabbath message. As the result of these meetings, about 26 people formed the first company of Sabbathkeepers in Missouri. Apparently the leader of this group—by his own account the first person in Missouri to “embrace the Sabbath of the Lord”—was Lewis Morrison, who had once been a “Campbellite.”

The Review and Herald carries accounts of early Adventist activities in Missouri. In 1859 the Victoria members asked that the Iowa evangelistic tent be brought into Missouri, and, in 1860, Moses Hull arrived to hold meetings. A member named Boltin drove more than 100 miles (160 kilometers) to get him. In 1863 J. H. Rogers wrote from Victoria that a church of 20 members had recently been organized. In 1866 D. T. Bourdeau and his brother reported holding meetings at Altovista (Alta Vista); Rogers had brought them from Sandyville, Iowa, 130 miles (210 kilometers). In June 1869 John Matteson held meetings for “the Danish brethren in Raymond”; there a church elder was elected. He also visited brethren in Civil Bend, in Daviess County.

In September 1869 “Brn. Blanchard and Bliss” preached at Avilla, in southwest Missouri, where a few SDA families had moved from Illinois. About 35 adherents were reported in that vicinity. By December 1869 a group at Hamilton was preparing for organization. In August 1870 R. J. Lawrence, from the Michigan Conference, held meetings at several places, then held a series of meetings at Prairie City (where he met with opposition from a preacher of the Disciples) and won 11 converts.

In time there were two small groups of Seventh-day Adventists in Missouri, one in the northern section of the state, centering in Daviess County, and the other in the southwest, around Avilla. However, they lacked close unity because of their wide separation, and the need to cement these groups and the scattered members in other parts of the state closer together in beliefs and activities became increasingly apparent.

Early Organization and Growth of the Missouri Conference. At a camp meeting held at Pleasanton, Kansas, in October 1870 and attended by some members from Missouri, with James White presiding, members from the churches of Civil Bend, Hamilton, and Avilla, Missouri, and two churches in Kansas united to form the Missouri-Kansas Conference and elected R. J. Lawrence president. Plans were made for a camp meeting in Missouri the next year.

After the organization the Whites visited the Hamilton and Civil Bend churches and reunited two factions at the latter place. Lawrence went to hold a month's meetings at Kingsville, in Johnson County, where he won 16.

In May 1871, at Civil Bend, the first camp meeting in Missouri was held, during which was convened the second session of the Missouri-Kansas Conference. None attended from Kansas and few from other sections of Missouri, for because of crop failures times were hard. The report showed four organized churches in the two states, with a membership of 103 persons, and 8 unorganized bodies, with a membership of 88 (several other bodies were not represented). At that time the conference had one ordained minister and four licentiate ministers.

In 1871 H. C. Blanchard held evangelistic meetings in Newton County in the southwest, and won 20 at Seneca and 26 at Diamond Grove. At Diamond Grove he held a camp meeting in August, to which some people traveled 70 miles (110 kilometers). In 1872 the Missouri-Kansas Conference and camp meeting were held at Avilla, and two new churches were admitted—Nashville and Big Spring. It was decided to buy a second tent for use in southern Missouri. Some of the denomination's most prominent ministers worked in Missouri at this time, among them George I. Butler, who was then president of the General Conference.

The 1870s were marked by hardships for many people living in the Midwest. A severe drought and a grasshopper "plague" dealt a damaging blow to the growth of the work in Missouri. Unable to raise crops, the farmers could not finance the preachers. As a result, many preachers were forced to take up manual labor for a livelihood. Yet the conference continued to grow, and new churches were organized in many areas—at Rockville in 1873; at Rolla and Nevada in 1874.

The Missouri Conference. At the 1875 camp meeting, held at Mound City, Kansas, the members voted to establish two separate conferences, Missouri and Kansas. J. H. Rogers, who had been president of the combined conference, became president of the Missouri Conference. At the first annual session of the separate Missouri Conference, held at Kingsville in 1876, it was reported that in the previous year the membership had grown from 240 to 322. At this session William Evans, a layman, was elected president of the conference and served for a one-year term.

After his tour of duty as General Conference president, George I. Butler returned to Missouri and established a church at Sedalia in 1878. He stated that there were then 40 Sabbathkeepers where a few months before there were none. The following year Elder Butler was elected president of the Missouri Conference, where he served two terms before returning to the presidency of the General Conference.

At the camp meetings of the 1870s and 1880s the people were privileged to listen to some of the denomination's leaders. It was reported that many people would walk or ride in wagons more than 100 miles (160 kilometers) in order to be present at such gatherings. At the 1888 camp meeting Ellen White, J. H. Kellogg, S. N. Haskell, and R. M. Kilgore delivered stirring messages to the congregations. These meetings served to strengthen the faith of the Missouri members.

By 1880 the Seventh-day Adventist message had been spread widely in the southern portions of Missouri, and a few preachers were crossing the line into Arkansas to develop new interests in that area. In Missouri H. C. Chaffee organized churches at Goldsberry (1881) and Armstrong (1890). Work in the metropolitan area of Kansas City, which resulted in the Central church, was begun in 1884 by D. T. Shireman, then a colporteur; he reported 24 converts in 1885—1886 through the "city mission." A similar mission in St. Louis reported 20 converts that year. A new church was developed at Joplin in 1899.

At the turn of the century there were 42 organized churches in the Missouri Conference, with a membership of 2,200 persons. The working force of the conference included 12 ordained ministers and four licentiates. In 1901 more than 200 new members were received into the churches throughout the conference. Some local church schools had been established by 1900.

The Conference Divided. In 1908 the Missouri Conference was divided into the North Missouri Conference, with A. R. Ogden, president, and offices at Utica; and the South Missouri Conference, with D. U. Hale as president, and headquarters at Springfield. The St. Louis area was formed into a separate mission field in 1910, with H. C. Miller as superintendent. At Clinton a school for educating ministers to work in the German language was operated.

Reunion and Subsequent History. Growth was slow during the first and second decades of the twentieth century. In 1914 the leaders of the conferences decided to reunite the separate organizations into one unit, with the conference office at Clinton. J. S. Rouse was elected president of the reunited Missouri Conference. During the third and fourth decades H. C. Hartwell served as president from 1920 to 1933, longer than any other president in the history of the conference.

By 1940 the conference membership had grown to 3,000 persons, and 53 organized churches were then in operation. The decade of the 1940s was highlighted in Missouri by a vigorous evangelistic program. In Kansas City 175 new members were added to the church. Other meetings held around the state resulted in churches being organized in Kingsville (1941), Bethany (1942), Owensville (1943), Ava (1943), and Kansas City (Park Memorial, 1944). Churches were established also in Salem, West Plains, and Fredericktown during 1946. At the close of World War II the church membership of Missouri had reached a new high of 3,676. However, the membership began to drop in 1944 and reached a low of 3,405 in 1947. Thereafter the membership showed a continual trend upward, reaching 4,361 members in 54 churches in 1960.

In 1946 Sunnydale Academy was opened in a rural site near Centralia, with H. C. Hartman serving as the first principal.

In the 1940s and 1950s youth programs were carried on effectively by the Missionary Volunteer Department. Summer camps were conducted each year in the Missouri state parks. There was a great need for having our own property to conduct summer camp programs.

An ideal piece of property was found on the Lake of the Ozarks near Climax Springs. The original tract of land was purchased in 1959 by the Missouri Adventist Medical Society. This beautiful property contains 143 acres (60 hectares), mostly wooded and rocky hills, with access to 1,900 miles (3,000 kilometers) of shoreline. It became known as Camp Heritage. During the 1960s and 1970s the conference built 16 cabins and a lodge for meetings and dining, which provided accommodations for 230. These facilities were available primarily for youth camps, but the camp was opened throughout the year for institutes, retreats, and church-related activities of the Central Union and the Missouri conferences.

Many of the churches developed welfare service centers and programs. Relationships were developed with the American Red Cross. The first time we coordinated our efforts with the Red Cross was in 1958 to aid tornado victims in the St. Louis area. In 1974 the Missouri Conference purchased a 14-foot (four-meter) utility van to use in emergencies in the conference or surrounding area. This mobile facility, stocked with food, clothing, and bedding, was also equipped to do mass feeding during emergency situations. The van was able to do some medical testing, such as blood pressure and lung capacity, and to educate the public in health principles.

On July 10, 1980, the Missouri constituency voted to merge with the Iowa Conference. For more details about why the merger occurred, see Iowa-Missouri Conference.

Mitchell, Edna May

MITCHELL, EDNA MAY (1909—1980). Nurse, administrator. Born at Kempsey, New South Wales, Australia, she graduated from Avondale College in 1929, then completed the nursing course at Sydney Adventist Hospital School of Nursing in 1934. Following postgraduate studies she joined the staff of Sydney Adventist Hospital in 1938, rising to the position of deputy director of nursing until 1950, when she became director of nursing at Warburton Adventist Hospital.

Mitchell, H. M.

MITCHELL, H. M. (1848—1904). Minister, treasurer. In early life a Methodist, he became a Seventh-day Adventist in 1878, served for many years as a minister, and then as General Conference treasurer from 1900 to 1903.

Mizpa

MIZPA (1927— ; the same title issued in a number of languages; bimonthly). Official organs of the North, South, and Central Philippine unions. Originally the only paper issued in the four major Philippine dialects, Mizpa served what was then the Philippine Union Mission, which included all the Philippines. After the formation of the two unions in 1951 there were five editions, the North Philippine Union Mission using the English, Tagalog, and Ilocano editions, and the South Philippine Union Mission the Cebuan and Panayan. Since the formation of the Central Philippine Union Mission, the Mizpa has been published separately by each union: the North Philippine Union publishes in English, Ilocano, and Tagalog; the Central Philippine Union in Ilongo and Cebuan-English (bilingual); and the South Philippine Union in Cebuan-English (bilingual).

Moberly Regional Medical Center, Inc.

MOBERLY REGIONAL MEDICAL CENTER, INC. A medical institution operated in Moberly, Missouri, by Adventist Health System/Eastern and Middle America from November 1978 to October 1993. The hospital was located 20 miles (32 kilometers) north of Sunnydale Academy. It was centrally located to serve a five-county area. Land was purchased for a new church and school in Moberly. Membership grew from 25 to more than 170 during the 15 years the hospital was SDA-owned.

The hospital enjoyed a number of financially successful years. Changes in the government payment system in the mid-1980s, along with more stringent patient admission criteria and debt caused financial problems. The decision was made to look for a buyer, and in October 1993 Moberly Regional Medical Center was sold to Community Health Systems.

Mobile Clinics

MOBILE CLINICS. A common outreach ministry of institutions and churches using trucks and vans, airplanes, and boats. These frequently provide services where no other health services are available, but suffer from the weakness of lack of continuity and the danger of introducing expectations for services that cannot be sustained. Mobile clinics are best used to provide local training and supervision of local personnel who are permanently located and who can provide first level health care and appropriate referral at all times. (See also Missionary Vessels.)

Model Central Secondary School

MODEL CENTRAL SECONDARY SCHOOL (Colegio Modelo Central). A coeducational secondary institution located at Primera Avenida Norte no. 1109, San Salvador, El Salvador. It was established in 1960, and has also been known as San Salvador Junior Secondary School. In 1994 it had a faculty of 17.

Principals: Noemi Franco, 1981—1982; Ada Barrientos, 1982—1986; Omar Escobar, 1986—1992; Mrs. Reyna Flores, 1992—1993; Jose Ramiro Aguirre, 1994— .

Modesto Adventist Academy

MODESTO ADVENTIST ACADEMY. A coeducational day school, K-12, situated in Modesto, California. It serves seven churches of the Central California Conference: Ceres, Modesto (Central, Parkwood, Spanish), Oakdale, Turlock, and Waterford.

The academy has an administration building, home economics department, shop, and a large auditorium-gymnasium, which also houses the music department. The school was first accredited by the SDA Board of Regents in 1941 and by the Western Association of Schools and Colleges in 1961, and is currently accredited with both organizations.

In 1993 the faculty consisted of nine teachers, and the school had an enrollment of 116. The school has graduated close to 1,500 students since its first graduating class in 1937.

The first organized Seventh-day Adventist church school in Modesto was started in 1910 at 201 Maze Boulevard. Before that, some students were taught in homes and at one time in a private garage. The Salida Seventh-day Adventist Church (now Parkwood) began operating a school one year later on the Kiernan Road church property.

The new four-room school building was built on a newly purchased lot at the corner of Fifth and E streets. The facility was completed for the 1915 school year, five years after the first formal school.

The facility served for 11 years before becoming too small. Once again, after soul-searching, three acres (1.2 hectares) were purchased in 1926 at 1205 Figaro Avenue. The 5th Street building was cut into two sections and moved to Figaro Avenue over a new basement, thus making a larger facility with the same building. During these years grades 1 to 11 were taught as needed.

In 1935 a movement was on to consolidate the Modesto and Salida schools and have a full 12-year academy. On Nov. 9, 1935, the Salida church accepted the invitation of the Modesto church, forming a union of the two schools on the Figaro Avenue property, with the new name Modesto Union Academy.

By 1950 growth was once again taxing the school facilities and the neighborhood seemed to be deteriorating. The Central California Conference was dedicated to getting Monterey Bay Academy started and could offer no assistance to the Modesto school.

In order to strengthen the school constituency, it was felt the school should be moved toward Turlock, even though it meant long trips for the Modesto and Salida students with only the Ninth Street Bridge available at the time.

In 1952 a 10-acre (four-hectare) plot was found at the corner of Hatch and Central avenues for $10,000. In two weeks the money was raised among the church members for the land purchase. New buildings were built (much of the lumber was reclaimed from Camp Beale), playgrounds were readied, and the first class of seniors graduated in 1953.

The school, now Modesto Adventist Academy, has been at its present location at the corner of Hatch and Central for more than 40 years.

Academy Principals: J. A. McClenaghan, 1936—1937; F. J. Wallace, 1937—1938; W. A. Potts, 1938—1939; J. W. Rhodes, 1939—1940; J. R. Nielsen, 1940—1943; A.

Moffett, Walter Clayton

MOFFETT, WALTER CLAYTON (1879—1976). Born in Townsend, Delaware, he accepted the Seventh-day Adventist truth as a youth and was baptized in Baltimore, Maryland, in 1897. After working for a time as a literature evangelist, he attended Battle Creek College and Mount Vernon Academy, graduating from Mount Vernon College. He entered the church ministry in 1905 and a year later was united in marriage to Mable Kennedy. He was ordained at the Ohio camp meeting in 1911. During his years of service he was successively elected to the presidency of eight conferences—Virginia, New Jersey, Maine, Massachusetts, Southern New England, West Virginia, Chesapeake, and West Pennsylvania. He also served as president of the East Canadian Union Conference and as dean of the School of Theology at Washington Missionary College, now Columbia Union College.

Moffett was active in the development of Shenandoah Valley Academy and Highland View Academy. He edited the Columbia Union Visitor and the Canadian Watchman, and was the author of The Great Beyond.

After his wife's death, he married Promise Kloss Sherman in 1967.

Moffitt, Luther Lambert

MOFFITT, LUTHER LAMBERT (1891—1985). Evangelist, missionary, administrator. Born in Boulder, Montana, he served as an evangelist in California, and as pastor, editor, conference president, and division secretary in South Africa. Returning to the United States, he was called as associate secretary and director of the Sabbath School Department and as secretary to the General Conference president.

Moko, Richard

MOKO, RICHARD (1850—1932). African minister. He was born in a Kaffir village near Grahamstown, Cape Province, South Africa, a descendant from a long line of Amakhosa chiefs. For his time he was well educated, having become fluent in both English and Dutch, the two official languages of South Africa, as well as in his mother tongue. For a number of years before his conversion he served as a court interpreter and was considered one of the best in the country.

In 1893 Moko accepted the Seventh-day Adventist faith through the influence of Fred Reed, and was baptized in 1895 (according to his obituary) at the second camp meeting held in South Africa. For a number of years he supported himself by selling books and pamphlets in the African townships that surrounded the principal cities in the Cape province. While so engaged, he was offered the pastorate of one of the largest and most influential non-SDA churches in Port Elizabeth, paying a good salary, but he declined to accept it.

Early in the 1900s Moko joined the working staff of the Cape Conference. Traveling from town to town, he established African churches, sometimes meeting violent opposition. Once in East London he had one of his teeth knocked out, but in that town an SDA church was later built, a matter of great satisfaction to Moko, who stated that he would gladly give every tooth he had if each one would result in the establishment of a church.

In 1915 Moko was ordained, being the first African SDA minister to be ordained in South Africa. With W. S. Hyatt he traveled widely through the Kaffir country in a small wagon, holding meetings and establishing churches. With G. W. Shone he looked for, and helped locate, the site for the Maranatha Mission. He retained his strength and vigor almost to the end of his long life.

Moldova

MOLDOVA. A republic that was a part of the former Soviet Union. It has an area of 13,012 square miles (33,700 square kilometers) and is bounded by Romania and Ukraine. The population (1994) is 4.4 million.

In 1918 Romania annexed all of Bessarabia, which Russia had acquired from Turkey in 1812 by the Treaty of Bucharest. In 1924 the Soviet Union established the Moldavian Autonomous Soviet Socialist Republic on the eastern bank of the Dniester. It was merged with the Romanian-speaking districts of Bessarabia in 1940 to form the Moldavian SSR.

During World War II Romania, allied with Germany, occupied the area. It was recaptured by the USSR in 1944. Moldova declared independence Aug. 27, 1991. It became an independent state when the Soviet Union disbanded Dec. 26, 1991.

Monaco

MONACO. A tiny principality with an area of 400 acres (160 hectares) and a population (1994) of 31,000, situated on the northern Mediterranean coast, nine miles (14 kilometers) east of Nice, France. It is a constitutional monarchy. French is the language spoken there, and the religion is Roman Catholicism. Some Seventh-day Adventists have lived in Monaco for many years, one of them since 1942. The work is assigned to the pastor of the church in Nice, which belongs to the South France Conference. From 1966 to 1969 services were held in a Protestant church. A few were baptized and a group was organized. When some passed away, those left decided to join an organized SDA church six miles (10 kilometers) distant, at Menton, France.

During the Global Mission renewed efforts were made in 1993 and 1994. On Monaco's powerful Monte Carlo radio station Seventh-day Adventist broadcasts have at different times gone out over the air in French and Italian.

The territory of Monaco is assigned to the South France Conference, part of the Franco-Belgian Union Conference, which in turn is part of the Euro-Africa Division.

Mongolia

MONGOLIA. A country in central Asia, bordered on the north by Russia and on the east, south, and west by China. It has an area of 604,095 square miles (1.5 million square kilometers) and its population (1994) is 2.4 million. The country is a large plateau at an average elevation of 5,000 feet (1,520 meters), and includes the Gobi Desert. Most of the people are rural and nomadic Mongols, but there are some Chinese, Russian, and Central Asiatic settlers. The official language is Khalkha Mongolian, now written with the Cyrillic alphabet. For centuries, beginning with the thirteenth century, Lamaistic Buddhism was the religion of the people. As a result, in the first years of the present century monks constituted about one sixth of the population. Under the Soviet influence the government conducted a campaign to dissuade the young people from taking part in religious activities, which has resulted in a society largely secularistic.

Historically the Mongols came into prominence in the thirteenth century, when, under Genghis Khan, they formed a large empire that stretched from the Pacific Ocean to eastern Europe. Gradually they lost their position and fell under the control of the Chinese, from whom the northern branch acquired independence upon the downfall of the Manchu Empire in 1911. Under the rulership of the Living Buddha they established a state, for many years called Outer Mongolia in Western literature. In 1924 the Living Buddha died and the People's Republic was proclaimed.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. SDA work for the Mongols was begun about 1926 by Russian missionaries who operated from Hailar, in northwestern Manchuria, China. They issued a hymn in Mongolian, mimeographed at the Russian Mission press at Harbin, Manchuria; later they added four small tracts. These were the first Seventh-day Adventist publications in Mongolian. After the consolidation of the Mongolian independent people's republic made it impossible for the mission work to continue there, plans were made in 1930 to open SDA work for Mongols in northern China (in Inner Mongolia). A plot of land and buildings were purchased at Kalgan, where in 1931 Otto Christensen established mission headquarters and a hospital. Two Russians, P. V. Rodionov and J. Maltsev, manned outstations at Tamachuen (Durban-Hodok) and Ssuwangtze. The Ssuwangtze station had a small dispensary.

In 1932, as a result of Christensen's appeal at the session of the China Division for a printing press for the Mongolian Mission, a special offering was taken amounting to 1,700 Mexican dollars on the evening of the thirtieth anniversary of the arrival of the first Seventh-day Adventist missionaries to China, the J. N. Andersons.

A set of matrices for making Mongolian type and a primitive type-casting machine were purchased by John Oss in Nanjing, and the Shanghai Signs of the Times Publishing House donated a small handpress and some type, ink, paper, and accessories. The first product of this press was the song “Tell It Again.” Some time later the Mongolian Mission purchased a Chinese-manufactured Gordon foot-powered press. Christensen often served as type caster, typesetter, makeup man, and pressman. On occasion he even had to make his own ink.

The publishing work was made especially difficult by the absence of an adequate vocabulary. The Old Testament in Mongolian was out of print, and the only way that Christensen could obtain a copy was to have someone write it out for him by hand. In the first two years of operation, the press produced four tracts, five songs, the book of Daniel, and the Ten Commandments. The Sabbath school lessons were published by mimeograph. In 1935 the first subscription book, The Way of Life, was issued. Bound in cloth, it sold for two Mexican dollars.

In the late 1930s Christensen returned to the United States, and soon thereafter war prevented further development of the work in the area. In the 1990s SDA work was again reestablished through Adventist Frontier Missions, and several have been baptized.

MONK, J. PAUL, JR. (1940—1994). Editor, administrator. In 1971 he became one of the first Black Seventh-day Adventist chaplains in the United States Army. After seven years of active duty he served in the Army Reserves, National Guard, and finally the United States Air Force, retiring as a lieutenant colonel.

He served the Seventh-day Adventist Church as a minister, journalist, and administrator for 30 years, nine of them as president of the Central States Conference. He also served as the tenth editor of Message, the oldest Black religious journal in North America.

Monnier, Henri

MONNIER, HENRI (1896—1944). Pioneer missionary in Africa. Born in Switzerland, he received his education there. At the age of 15 he was baptized into the Seventh-day Adventist faith at Lusanne. In 1915, finding the war affecting his prospects in Switzerland, he went to England, where he practiced his trade of watch repairing. In 1920 he married a young English girl and looked forward to living permanently in England. But a few months after the wedding he met D. E. Delhove, who had brought his family to England from Belgium. Delhove, who had been a missionary in East and Central Africa, persuaded Monnier and his wife to accompany him and his family back to Africa. Unfortunately, Mrs. Monnier, suffering complications from childbirth, died there when their child was only 5 months old. The Delhoves added her to their own growing family.

In 1921 Delhove and Monnier pioneered at Gitwe Mission. The next year the two men pushed northward to Rwankeri Mission. Here Monnier was stationed alone for nearly three years. Delhove would make the 100-mile (160-kilometer) trip to Rwankeri by mule occasionally, to encourage his fellow missionary. In 1924 he found him ill and homesick. Delhove packed him off to Europe and told him not to return until he had received medical treatment and had found a wife.

Successful in his mission, Monnier in 1925 brought back his bride, Olga Pavlov, a nurse and Bible instructor. They continued working, alternating between Rwankeri and Gitwe. Most of the time they were at Rwankeri Mission, which Monnier lovingly referred to as his mission. In 1927 Delhove and Monnier paid a visit to Gendia Mission in Kenya, where both were ordained by officers of the European Division who were visiting there. Monnier then returned to Rwankeri. He had become proficient in the Ruanda language, and took a prominent part in translating portions of the Bible into the vernacular. Four children were born into the Monnier family in Ruanda.

The Monniers were on furlough in Europe when World War II broke out. Government authorities refused to permit them to return to Ruanda. In spite of this, Monnier reached his post, but was finally forced to leave. Instead of returning to Europe, he went to Lebanon, where his family joined him. For some time he was stationed in old Damascus, and there died of typhoid fever.

History

History. Beginnings of the Work in Montana. On July 6, 1888, O. A. Johnson of Nebraska, appointed as a minister for the Montana Territory, began evangelistic meetings in a tent at Livingston, Montana. To a nucleus of four believers already residing there he added others and organized a Sabbath school. On Nov. 24 Johnson reported that 26 had signed the covenant, and that $329.78 tithe had been turned in. He also organized a tract society at Livingston and seven miles (11 kilometers) away a Sabbath school with some 15 members. Apparently he held meetings also in his native language, for he reports preaching to a group of Scandinavians at Livingston on Sunday afternoons. It seems that in addition to the group in and around Livingston there were a few “scattered brethren” elsewhere in Montana. There is also a report of tent meetings held at Bozeman by D. T. Fero, assisted by his wife and a man by the name of Reynolds.

When R. A. Underwood visited Livingston in January 1890 he found that the congregation had completed the first church building in the state, which was to be dedicated in the spring. In this church J. W. Watt and E. R. Williams held meetings in May and June. Between 1890 and about 1894 J. W. Watt conducted tent evangelism, sometimes in company with Eugene R. Williams (who with his wife was active in Bible work) in Boulder, Bozeman, Butte City, Chico, Como, Grantsdale, Helena, Livingston, Miles City, Townsend, and Virginia City.

Nearly two thirds of the estimated 125 members in Montana attended the first camp meeting, at Bozeman, June 7—15, 1892. At this camp meeting a committee of five were appointed to take charge of the work, with J. W. Watt, C. N. Martin, and Eugene Williams as ministers, two Bible workers, and 10 or 12 authorized canvassers. In their zeal for evangelism the members gave about $300 for a “tent fund”—a sizable sum for those days.

The church at Helena was organized by J. W. Watt and W. J. Stone in 1893, with 13 charter members. The membership reached 24 by November 1894. As a result of meetings held by Watt at Butte City, from Feb. 10 to Mar. 9, 1892, and from Oct. 25 to Dec. 30, 1893, 18 persons signed the covenant and several others began to keep the Sabbath. Butte City, with about 30,000 population, was at that time the largest city in Montana. Three colporteurs had been the advance guard. J. R. Palmer and W. J. Stone carried on meetings there in March and April of 1895, with the result that a church of 21 members was organized. By 1899 the membership had increased to 45. Watt also visited Billings, where he found six Adventists holding regular meetings.

W. J. Stone moved his family to Great Falls in July 1895, pitched a tent, and began a series of meetings. There were nearly a score of converts, and about 40 members were in this Sabbath school by November of the same year. A church building was erected during the latter part of 1895, for which businessmen of the city donated much of the money.

Montana Conference Organized. The Montana Conference was organized on Oct. 5, 1898, and was admitted into the General Conference at a meeting held in South Lancaster, Massachusetts, between Feb. 14 and Mar. 7, 1899. The first president was W. B. White; ordained ministers: W. B. White, H. Grant, W. J. Stone, C. N. Martin, J. C. Foster; licensed ministers: L. A. Gibson, C. T. Shafer, W. D. Emery; licensed missionaries: Edna Parker, Anna Sedgewick, Mrs. Emma Shafer. The conference office was at Pine and Warren streets, Helena, but the Sabbath school association headquarters were at Great Falls. A four-page conference paper, the Montana Bivouac, was published semimonthly (1898—1911). At first the conference was a part of General Conference district no. 6, but after the general reorganization of 1901 it was joined to the Pacific Union Conference, and later still to the North Pacific Union. On Jan. 1, 1900, the conference workers consisted of four ordained ministers, four licensed ministers, five missionary secretaries, 12 churches, 335 members. Tithe for the year ending Dec. 31, 1899, amounted to $5,727.62.

Soon after the organization of the Montana Conference, C. T. Shafer, working in the eastern part of the state, reported considerable interest in Miles City, Billings, Glendive, Wibaux, and other places. He had paid subscribers in more than a hundred families reading missionary papers.

In 1899 R. D. Quinn reports the opening of the Helping Hand Mission to carry on active work for the unfortunate in Butte, a city of 30,000, which had more than 300 saloons plus many gambling houses and Chinese opium dens.

Because the 300 church members in the conference were scattered over great distances, it was necessary to have four camp meetings to accommodate all. One of these was held in 1899 at Red Butte Settlement, 12 miles (20 kilometers) from Great Falls, June 29 to July 9. Eighty-six campers attended, some traveling with teams 150 miles (240 kilometers) over the mountains. Ten were baptized.

In 1906 five church schools were conducted in the state—at Kalispell, by Olive Kime; at Mount Ellis Academy, near Bozeman, by Adeline Rouleau; at Stevensville, by S. J. Wright; at Hamilton, by Eva Holbrook; at Harlem, by Sadie Rittenhouse. Montana Intermediate School (now Mount Ellis Academy) was established in 1902 as a 10-grade school with Claude Conard as teacher.

Subsequent History. At the end of 1905 the church membership was 429, and the number of churches 14. By Dec. 31, 1930, the conference had 939 members, 22 churches, four ordained ministers, three licensed ministers, and eight church school teachers.

As in the early years of SDA work in Montana, the outstanding features of the work in the first decade of the twentieth century continued to be evangelistic tent meetings, colporteur work, church schools, and annual camp meetings. At the camp meeting held in 1907, on the last Sabbath 18 were baptized and W. H. Holden and Stewart Kime were ordained to the gospel ministry. In May 1909 there were 19 regular colporteurs reporting good success; one of them was V. T. Armstrong, who later became a vice president of the General Conference. The books sold at that time were primarily Daniel and the Revelation, Heralds of the Morning, and The Great Controversy. In 1909 three tent companies were at work: at Plains, 75 miles (120 kilometers) west of Missoula, at Lewistown, and near Choteau. The work in the Plentywood area was begun by two laymen, A. R. Rice and Jason West, who came to Antelope, Montana, to take up homesteads in 1907 and 1908. They gave Bible studies, and later A. R. Rice and his wife conducted a branch Sabbath school. In 1912 Paul Iverson held evangelistic meetings, resulting in the organization of the Plentywood church with about 20 members.

Later churches were organized as follows: Helena, 1893; Great Falls, Feb. 2, 1896; Butte, 1898; Plentywood, 1912; Havre, July 28, 1917; Miles City, 1918; Lewistown, Nov. 26, 1921; Anaconda, 1925; Hardin, 1925; Glendive, 1933; Custer, 1935; Yaak Valley, Aug. 5, 1950; Fort Peck, 1951, now known as Glasgow since it was decided to move the church headquarters to Glasgow, Montana, in 1971; Bridger, Oct. 5, 1957; Shelby, Dec. 5, 1964; Ronan, 1967; Libby, 1967; Dillon, June 1969; Sidney, Sept. 1970; Bell Tower, Aug. 1974; Stevensville, 1976; Trout Creek, 1978; North Valley, 1979; Roundup, 1981; Superior, 1990.

In 1898 the conference office was in Helena and the Sabbath school association office in Great Falls. In 1899 the conference office moved to Missoula, and in 1902 back to Helena, where the tract society had remained. The Sabbath school association had its headquarters variously at Great Falls, Stevensville, Helena, and Bozeman. From 1905 the general offices remained at Bozeman except for a move to Great Falls (1923—1928) and Billings (1929—1932). There has been a consistent increase in the number of members and churches: Dec. 31, 1940: members, 1,395, churches, 27; 1950: members, 1,638, churches, 29; 1960: members, 2,059, churches, 30; Dec. 31, 1962: members, 2,227, churches, 30; June 30, 1965: members, 2,349, churches, 31; June 30, 1970: members, 2,525, churches, 34; Sept. 1974: members, 2,648, churches, 36; March 1993: members, 3,339, churches, 40.

Welfare centers were established in Hardin and Lewistown (1965), Kalispell (1966), Great Falls (1971), Bozeman (1973), and Havre (1977). Elementary schools were located in Kalispell (1962), Bozeman (1966), Missoula (1967), Havre (1972), Hamilton and Ronan (1974); Helena (1976), Lewistown (1983); and Choteau (1984). Mount Ellis Academy's new school plant and a new gymnasium were completed in 1973 and an industrial arts complex in 1978. Representative church buildings were built in Plentywood, Hamilton, Great Falls, Missoula (1959), Billings (1961), Butte (1962), Bozeman (1963), Miles City (1963), Ronan (1966), Choteau (1966), Glasgow (1971), Libby (1973), Bell Tower (1974), Helena, Roundup, Trout Creek (1979), North Valley, Stevensville, Superior (1981), and Livingston (1983).

Montemorelos University

MONTEMORELOS UNIVERSITY (Universidad de Montemorelos). A coeducational institution of higher education established in 1942 near the city of Montemorelos, state of Nuevo León, Mexico. It is situated on a 230-acre (95-hectare) tract of land. Forty acres (16 hectares) are used for the campus buildings, and most of the rest is a prosperous orange farm. The total enrollment for the school year 1992—1993 was 1,958 students. The institution has 120 teachers and a total of 250 employees. The University of Montemorelos offers 17 undergraduate professional programs (including a medical degree); seven master's programs, two of which are extensions of Andrews University; two specialties, one in restorative dentistry and one in ophthalmology; and one doctoral program (Ph.D.) in education. It has extensions of several of its undergraduate programs in Colegio Linda Vista (in south Mexico), Colegio del Pacifico (in northwest Mexico), and Seminario Adventista de Cuba. It also has extensions of master-level programs in the tertiary institutions of Colombia and Venezuela. It offers also several nondegree programs through the Music Conservatory, the Computer Institute, and the Language Institute.

The preparatory school of the institution (preparation for university study) offers programs of the “bachillerato” in accounting, biomedical, physical-chemical-mathematical, social, and pedagogical sciences. It also offers five terminal technical options along with the “bachillerato” in computer programming, accounting, physical education, nursing, and secretarial science.

All study programs are fully accredited by the Secretariat of Education and Culture of the state of Nuevo León and are registered in the General Office of Professions of the Mexican federal government. The institution belongs to the Mexican Federation of Mexican Private Institutions of Higher Education and operates in harmony with academic and quality standards set by the National Association of Universities and Institutes of Higher Education. It belongs to several national and international professional organizations related to the professional degrees offered. The School of Medicine is also registered in the directory of medical schools of the World Health Organization.

The university belongs to Universidad de Montemorelos, A.C., legal entity created to protect the properties of the institution, and it is operated by the Inter-American Division.

History

History. Escuela Agrícola Industrial Mexicana (ESAIM). (Mexican Agricultural and Industrial School), 1942—1951. From the time the Advent message entered Mexico, the missionaries felt the need of establishing an institution of higher learning. George W. Caviness, an educator and administrator (former president of Battle Creek College), was possessed by a deep desire to further the cause of Christian education. He strove to establish an educational institution from the time he first arrived in Mexico in the 1890s. But he was not successful until 1910, when he established Instituto Superior de Tacubaya (Tacubaya Superior Institute, in Mexico City). Because of political instability in the country that institution did not prosper. The same thing happened with other attempts that he and other missionaries and Mexican workers made during the following 30 years. Grave political convulsions prevented the realization of a dream of establishing an institution of higher education in the country.

Finally in May 1942 a property of cultivable land with abundant water was purchased. The name of the property was “La Carlota,” a name still used by the inhabitants of the area for the Seventh-day Adventist institutions established there. The property is located near the city of Montemorelos, about 50 miles (80 kilometers) from the city of Monterrey, capital of the state of Nuevo León, Mexico. An institution was established that was named Escuela Agrícola Industrial Mexicana. The property had only one old building (a two-story brick sugar mill). A building program started in July of that year. By November, when the school started, there were two teachers’ houses and the women’s dormitory that was occupied, but was without doors or windows. The same building included a kitchen, dining room, and chapel. The old building was used as the men’s dormitory and classrooms.

The institution offered secondary education and secretarial studies. One of the great needs it was expected to meet was the preparation of ministerial workers. For that reason, the Seventh-day Adventist Theological Seminary started functioning the same day as secondary classes started. It offered two years of theology, requiring the completion of the secondary school for entrance.

The first faculty members to arrive were the principal, A. G. Parfitt and his wife, Antonio Alarcón, and Mrs. Carmen Rodriguez (dean of women). Ivan Angell (school director) and Juan Gil, in charge of the construction program, arrived two months later.

In 1943 a visit from the president of Mexico, Manuel Avila-Camacho, took place on Apr. 24. He kindly helped in making it possible for J. C. Jacobsen to join the staff as agricultural instructor and farm manager. General Conference president J. L. McElhany also visited that summer.

From the beginning, the institution experienced a steady growth in all respects. The second school year, 1943—1944, opened with the dining room and water tower completed and a carpenter shop (temporarily used as a men’s dormitory) was built with brick from part of the sugar mill. The primary and secondary schools won state recognition on Nov. 13, 1944. During the summer of 1944 three classrooms were erected (west wing of the main building), as well as a laundry building. The third school year, 1944—1945, saw the establishment of a library and a physics laboratory and the publishing of the first annual.

The period of 1946 to 1951 was one of strong construction and academic development. Several buildings were erected including teachers’ houses, the men’s dormitory, the administration building, and classrooms.

On Jan. 26, 1947, the Montemorelos Hospital was inaugurated on a parcel of land adjacent to the school and to the national highway. The land was donated by the governor of the state of Nuevo León. The first medical director was Dr. H. E. Butka. The hospital was administered jointly by the administration of the school for seven years.

Also during this period a business course was given official recognition. The school of nursing was opened on Feb. 15, 1948, having the secondary school as prerequisite, and it was incorporated with the University of Nuevo León in 1951. The school of nursing operated for some time under the administration of the hospital, but in 1967 it became a part of the school.

The rapid growth of the institution and the plans for expansion of academic and technical development demonstrated the need of changing the name of the institution to Colegio Vocacional y Profesional Montemorelos (Montemorelos Vocational and Professional College) in 1951, with Prof. Horacio Hernández as its first principal. The following 20 years saw major achievements in the academic progress of the institution. During that time the ministerial course was enlarged to three years, still having completion of the secondary school as the entrance requirement.

An important milestone was the beginning of the preparatory school, incorporated to the University of Nuevo León in October 1956. The normal school was started in 1957, receiving temporary recognition in the fall of 1957 and official recognition in September 1961.

A chapel had been built in the 1940s that served both as an auditorium and for church meetings. But in 1959 a new church building with a capacity for 600 persons was dedicated. This new building served the needs of the institution during the following 30 years. The years 1959 to 1963 saw the addition of chapels and new wings in both dormitories, increasing the residence capacity to 450 students. The primary school building was also built during this period.

Another important milestone was the approval in 1967 by the Commission on Accreditation of the Inter-American Division of the four-year program leading to the “Licenciatura en Teología” as the program of preparation for the ministry. The “licenciatura” program of public accountant and auditor was also started in 1967, incorporated with the University of Nuevo León.

The academic level attained and the increase in the number of students pointed to the need of a better library. A careful selection of books and a substantial investment led to the development of what was then the best library in the Inter-American Division. In 1973 a new gymnasium-auditorium facility with a capacity for 2,000 was erected. A 100-acre (40-hectare) property located about three miles (five kilometers) from the main campus was acquired and adapted for student and faculty retreats, and for recreational purposes. Named “Ojo de Agua,” this facility includes groves, hills, and a swimming pool fed by a spring that feeds a creek perennially full of water.

During this period the minds of the students were directed with accentuated emphasis toward the needs of the mission field. The strengthening of ministerial training and of the program for preparation of teachers was in keeping with this ideal.

Universidad de Montemorelos (Montemorelos University), 1973—. The growth of the institution during its first 30 years, especially during the period of strengthening of COVOPROM, led the leaders of the church to dream about possibilities that nobody had dared to imagine: transforming the school into a university.

During the strong administration of Dr. Therlow J. Harper (1965—1973), COVOPROM became robust financially, academically, and in the principles of Christian education. Sensing God’s guidance in the development of the institution, the leaders felt that the Lord was leading them to take a gigantic step that required faith and sanctified boldness: to request the government of the state of Nuevo León to grant the institution university status.

Despite their faith and great hopes, they were still surprised to receive a positive response. On May 5, 1973, the constitutional substitute governor of the state of Nuevo León, Luis M. Farías, issued a resolution through which a charter was granted creating the Universidad de Montemorelos. The programs previously offered by COVOPROM under incorporation with the University of Nuevo León automatically became programs of the new institution, a private university with authorization to offer medicine, dentistry, secondary education in various lines, business administration courses leading to the title of certified public accountant, nursing, and other programs to be developed.

The General Conference authorized the expansion of programs and facilities to take advantage of the charter granted by Mexican authorities, and in March 1974, with representation from the General Conference treasury and the departments of education and health from Loma Linda University and a group of Mexican Adventist physicians, plans were made for admitting the first class of medicine, which started in September 1975 with 46 students.

The Thirteenth Sabbath Offering overflow for the second quarter of 1973 was assigned to providing a new food-service facility. This was the first of a number of new buildings that were part of a vigorous expansion program. Other buildings added at that time include a dining hall, university men's and women's residence halls (the old dormitories were left for secondary and preparatory students), a theology building, a building assigned for medicine and other health science programs, the administration complex, and a modern library.

The hospital (see Montemorelos University Hospital) was merged with the university by committee action in May 1974 to provide core clinical facilities for the new medical school. A new facility was erected to better serve this purpose, which was inaugurated by the president of Mexico, Mr. José López Portillo, on Apr. 25, 1981.

The expansion program has continued over the years. Other facilities include the building for the visual arts program, the music building, the nutrition classrooms and laboratory, and a large number of houses for faculty/staff and married students. This construction program gained a major thrust during the administration of Dr. Jaime Castrejón, who was president of the university from 1976 to 1982.

More recently a modern facility for the program of dental technology was built with special support from the U.S. National Association of Seventh-day Adventist Dentists (NASDAD). Other recent additions include modern laboratories for medical technology and other programs, a second floor for the library, and more houses and facilities for the graduate programs in education. A new university church was built with a capacity to seat 2,200 persons.

The growth of the SDA work in Mexico and in Latin America demanded the expansion of study options. The establishment of the school of medicine and of graduate studies brings students from about 40 countries around the world every year.

A Master of Arts in religion was started in 1981 as an extension program of Andrews University. The decade of 1983 to 1993 has been a period of extraordinary academic expansion. In 1983 new "licenciatura" programs were started in nutrition, medical technology, visual arts (first started as art education), and music. The one-year program of dental technology started in 1984. Also in 1984 the programs of elementary and early childhood education, part of the government program of normal education, were started.

In 1988 the institution signed an agreement with Andrews University to offer a program of Master of Science in administration designed to fulfill the needs for administrative skills felt by the administrators of the rapidly expanding fields of the Mexican unions.

The year 1989 was full of memorable happenings. The COVOPROM, which had been kept alive as a legal entity and that for some time served as the umbrella for the preparatory, secondary, and primary schools, was dissolved. The primary school was turned over to the Northwest Conference that year, and the secondary school the following year. It was decided to keep the preparatory school because preparatory schools are generally managed by universities in the Mexican system.

In 1989 the institution started its first graduate programs: the Master of Education with emphases in educational administration, curriculum and instruction, and higher education; and the Master of Public Health (in the areas of administration of health systems, preventive care, health education, and family health).

The music conservatory was started in 1990. Also in 1990 the institution opened the “licenciatura” programs of business administration and administration of computer systems. Graduate programs of Master in Family Life and Medical Specialty in Ophthalmology were started in 1991. The first engineering program (engineering in computer systems) started in 1992.

In 1993 several other graduate programs began: an advance clinical program in restorative dentistry, the Master of Business Administration, and the Master of Pastoral Ministry. This was also the year that the first doctoral program was started in Montemorelos: the Ph.D. in education.

Because there were 13 different academic units functioning as university schools with the resulting administrative complexity, the board decided in 1993 to approve an academic reorganization of the institution under the system of “facultades,” a term similar in meaning to the term “divisions” in English. As a result of this, all programs were organized in the following five academic units: (1) administration, (2) engineering and technology, (3) health sciences, (4) sciences, arts, and humanities, and (5) theology. A Division of Graduate Studies exists with the purpose of assuring academic quality in the graduate programs. Additionally the institution keeps the preparatory school as a separate unit.

Montemorelos University Hospital

MONTEMORELOS UNIVERSITY HOSPITAL (Hospital Universitario de Montemorelos). A 63-bed general hospital, used as the main facility for clinical practice of Montemorelos University health sciences students, including medicine and nursing. It is owned and operated by Montemorelos University. It offers services in general and family medicine, surgery, internal medicine, gynecology/obstetrics, pediatrics, and different sub-specialties. It operates a pharmacy, and it offers laboratory, X-ray, and other services. The hospital staff frequently holds medical, ophthalmic, and dental clinics in the nearby villages as a part of a program of peripheral clinics operated in conjunction with the university division of health sciences to give students opportunities for clinical practice.

The institution was opened on Jan. 26, 1947, as a culmination of medical missionary work initiated by two physicians, Iner S. Ritchie and Ralph Smith, in 1934, when they held improvised clinics in different parts of the country. Dr. Raymundo Garza and Pastor Haroldo F. House were also involved in the founding of the institution. Construction of hospital buildings was begun in 1945 on land situated next to the school and donated by Arturo B. de la Graza, governor of the state of Nuevo León. The Seventh-day Adventist hospital of Glendale, California, donated $72,750 and the Kellogg Foundation donated $145,500 for the building. Until August 1954 the financial administration of the hospital was connected with the school.

On Feb. 16, 1948, a School of Nursing was opened under the direction of Marguerite Peugh. In 1950 a nurses' home was built. On May 23, 1951, the school was accredited by the University of Nuevo León.

For some time the hospital extended its services to inaccessible regions by means of private planes piloted by hospital or school personnel, including W. E. Baxter, Jr., and Dale Collins. When a disastrous flood and hurricane struck the states of Colima and Jalisco in October 1959 the medical missionary plane, piloted by G. H. Fleenor, took nurses and provisions into the area.

In 1951 the first floor of a new east wing was built. In 1956 a second floor was added. This allowed the opening of private rooms and also gave space for medical offices and a department of physical therapy.

The School of Nursing became a part of the college in 1967. The hospital was merged with the university by committee action in May 1974 to provide core clinical facilities for the new medical school. A new facility was erected to better serve this purpose, which was inaugurated by the president of Mexico, Mr. José López Portillo, on Apr. 25, 1981. This facility was built with donations from many sources.

For several reasons the hospital has been facing serious difficulties for several years now. These include a decrease in the number of patients, the resulting financial troubles, and the consequent impact on the functioning of the academic programs in health sciences, including medicine. The administration of the university has installed a permanent process of evaluation and improvement, and several committees from the General Conference and the Inter-American Division have made insightful recommendations that are being implemented and that have been very useful in this process. Recent improvements in performance indicate that there are good reasons to hope for good results and better years in the near future.

Monterey Bay Academy

MONTEREY BAY ACADEMY. A coeducational boarding school on the senior high school level, established in 1949, operated by the Central California Conference, on the eastern shores of Monterey Bay, six miles (10 kilometers) northwest of Watsonville, California. It is accredited with the Seventh-day Adventist Board of Regents and the Western Association of Colleges and Secondary Schools.

The 379-acre (150-hectare) school grounds include 200 acres (80 hectares) of farmland, 25 acres (10 hectares) of lawns, and 11 acres (four hectares) of Colton pine trees. The remaining acreage is occupied by the academy proper, the industries, and faculty homes. There are 3,000 feet (900 meters) of ocean frontage.

The grounds, formerly a peach orchard and truck garden, were purchased during World War II by the U.S. Army to house the 251st Regiment of the National Guard and a hospital unit. After removal of the National Guard unit to Alaska, the camp, called Camp McQuaide, was used as a medium-security prison for U.S. Army deserters and men apprehended for extended absence without leave. When Camp McQuaide was abandoned a year after the close of World War II, the holding agency, the War Assets Commission, let it be known that the property was open for use as a school site at the "fair value" price of $347,000 to be amortized in 10 years as buildings were erected and used for the avowed purpose. On the 307 acres (125 hectares) there were 192 buildings, some of which could be used for temporary school purposes for three to five years. In 1948 the conference secured this property and bought an additional 72 adjacent acres (30 hectares).

With the intention of opening school in September 1949, several families moved to the grounds to prepare temporary facilities. Standish Hoskins became acting principal until D. J. Bieber, of the Hawaiian Mission Academy, could be released to assume the principalship. The school opened on Sept. 4, 1949, with 190 students and 25 faculty and staff members.

During the first year the best possible use was made of the existing Army buildings. The camp gymnasium and auditorium were used without change, the bowling alley was converted into a church, and the dental building became the administration building. At the same time the nurses' quarters of the former Army hospital were converted to dormitories and the hospital rooms were used for classrooms.

The first new building, the girls' dormitory, was completed in the spring of 1950, the boys' dormitory in 1951. In the second year a new cafeteria building and faculty homes were under construction. The new administration building was ready for use by the fall of 1953. In 1954 the science building, to incorporate the biology, chemistry, physics, and home arts units, was begun, and in 1957 the industrial arts unit, which houses auto mechanics, graphic arts, and welding areas. The dairy was completed in 1950 and has grown to be the second largest in the county. In 1973 the old Army camp gymnasium was demolished and a new, modern building now stands in its place. A trellis factory and redwood garden-equipment mill, later reorganized to produce the "Monterey Line" of redwood lawn and garden furniture, eventually was placed under the operation of the Harris Pine Mills, which added a second mill in 1959 in Watsonville, providing additional student work opportunities. The Harris Pine Plant was closed in 1987, and Little Lake Industries occupied the buildings for four years and continued the production of wood products. In 1991 Morgan Industries leased these buildings and presently manufactures a variety of rides for amusement parks.

Realizing the importance of career education and the benefits of a work program, Monterey Bay Academy has developed several commercial industries. Until recently wholesale garden produce was shipped to buyers under the name of Academy Produce. Berries and zucchini squash were the major crops grown. In 1966 the school laundry updated its equipment and retooled for commercial work, specializing in hospital linen. Local industries lease facilities to produce Rainbow Fins and antique car body parts. Currently many acres of land are leased to the production of strawberries and flowers on a commercial basis. Approximately 95 percent of the students are employed in some type of remunerative labor.

The school's first decade saw the completion of the amortization contract and the acquisition of the deed by the conference. In 1973 all conditions pertaining to the title deed were removed, providing the conference with a clear deed.

Montgomery, Oliver

MONTGOMERY, OLIVER (1870—1944). Administrator. He was born in Cedar Rapids, Iowa. When he was a child his family moved to Michigan, where he grew up. He was converted in 1898 and joined the Seventh-day Adventist Church in St. Charles, Michigan. He at once began doing self-supporting missionary work among the neighbors. He worked for one year in the Review and Herald publishing house, taught school one year, and served as tentmaster. In the autumn of 1904 he was granted a ministerial license; in 1906 he was ordained and made a member of the Michigan Conference Committee.

In August 1908 he was elected president of the Vermont Conference; in November 1909, of the Maine Conference; and in May 1911 of the Indiana Conference. In 1913 he accepted the presidency of the Southeastern Union Conference, and at the Autumn Council held in Loma Linda in 1915 he became president of the South American Division. He served in this division until 1922, when he returned to the homeland and became the head of the North American Division. Four years later he became general vice president of the General Conference, in which post he remained until 1936, when failing health again made it necessary for him to resign and seek less arduous work. Although retired, he continued to carry responsibilities until a year before he died. He served as part-time teacher in the Seventh-day Adventist Theological Seminary for a number of years and also as president of the Southern Publishing Association board.

Montgomery furnished many valuable articles for SDA Church papers. His book Principles of Church Organization and Administration has been recognized as a valuable contribution to the denomination.

Monument Valley Hospital

MONUMENT VALLEY HOSPITAL. A 20-bed hospital opened in 1961 in Monument Valley, Utah. The mission and hospital are under the auspices of the Pacific Union Conference and are owned and operated by the Nevada-Utah Conference.

In 1950 Marvin Walter was asked by the Pacific Union Conference to lecture among the churches in California with a film of the Navajo Indians, to raise $9,000 with which to open a medical mission in Monument Valley. In September of that year the Walters and their three children arrived at Harry Goulding's Trading Post with a 26-foot (eight-meter) house trailer to begin the project. In a 16-foot (five-meter) trailer Mrs. Walter, a registered nurse, opened a clinic. A four-wheel-drive jeep was used to carry help over sandy and almost impassable trails, to many sufferers far from the clinic. It also functioned as an ambulance to transport patients to the nearest hospital, 100 miles (160 kilometers) from the mission on a dirt road.

In 1951 a three-bedroom house was built, largely from movie sets left in the valley; by 1952 a small stone clinic was finished and the 16-foot trailer became the welfare center. Soon a larger frame building was added to the clinic. Many interested doctors came to help Mrs. Walter treat the Navajos.

In 1956 Dr. C. Paul Bringle, who had spent nearly 20 years in Africa, arrived as the first resident physician. Severe illness terminated his stay in 1957 (he passed away in 1958). J. Lloyd Mason, M.D., arrived with his family in February 1958. In 1959 the constituency of the Pacific Union Conference gave an offering for the erection of a hospital. The Utah Indian Affairs Commission, hearing of the need, furnished the water supply and sewage disposal systems.

The hospital, built by Merritt Crawford, was finished and dedicated on May 4, 1961. Meanwhile, Dail F. Lodge, M.D., and his family had arrived in January 1961.

The Monument Valley Mission, which includes a church (organized by Marvin Walter in 1957) and a school, has a total staff of 78, which includes doctors, nurses, technicians, administrators, and other ancillary help. A husband/wife team teach the eight-grade school with some 35 students. A pastor is assigned to the church by the conference. There are more than 16,000 outpatient calls and 700 hospital admissions annually.

Mookerjee, Lal Gopal

MOOKERJEE, LAL GOPAL (1882—1952). Pioneer national evangelist in India and Pakistan. He was a member of a family of early Seventh-day Adventist converts in Calcutta, India, and spent most of his life working among the people of Bengal. He received the major part of his education in the government schools of India, and for a time attended Rippon College. In 1901 he joined the SDA working force and was employed at the sanitarium and at the food factory in Calcutta, 1902—1905. In 1904 he married Grace Kellogg, one of the early SDA workers in India. In 1906 he pioneered the SDA work in what is now East Pakistan and established at his own expense the Gopalganj mission station. While there his wife contracted a disease that shortly afterward took her life.

Going to the United States, he attended Washington Missionary College for two years. Upon his return he engaged in evangelistic work in Calcutta until 1913. In 1911 he married Clara May Loveday. In 1917 he was ordained to the ministry. Later Mookerjee was president of the East Bengal field, editor of the Bengali Signs of the Times, secretary of the Northeast India Union, principal of the Northeast India Union Training School, Bible teacher at Spicer Missionary College, and departmental secretary in several departments of the Northeast and South India unions. In his later years he was associated with the establishment and development of the Voice of Prophecy correspondence school, and headed the religious liberty and temperance departments in the Southern Asia Division. He retired in 1950.

Moon, Allen

MOON, ALLEN (1845—1923). Minister, administrator. He was educated in Quaker denominational schools. In his youth he joined the Methodist Church, but in 1871 became a Seventh-day Adventist. He was called to the ministry in 1885, and after serving as president of the Minnesota Conference (1889—1890), he preached in the Illinois Conference. For some time he was president of the Foreign Mission Board, with headquarters in Philadelphia. He was president of the Illinois Conference from 1901 to 1902 and of the Northern Illinois Conference from 1902 to 1904, and then served as president of the Lake Union Conference for 10 years (1904—1914). For many years he was chairman of the Religious Liberty Department of the General Conference. Later he engaged in pastoral and other work until his retirement.

Moon, Clarence Earl

MOON, CLARENCE EARL (1883—1964). Pioneer medical missionary. He was born in California and took nurses' training at the St. Helena Sanitarium and Hospital. This, with a later course in physiotherapy, proved of great value as he and his wife carried on mission work in Mexico and Puerto Rico. He spent 32 years in mission service, during which time he organized the first Seventh-day Adventist church in Puerto Rico.

Moran, James Lewis

MORAN, JAMES LEWIS (1894—1972). Educator. Although he was an ordained minister, Moran is best known for his contributions to the educational system of the church. After completing his work for a baccalaureate degree from Fisk University, he attended Howard University and received his master's degree. In 1920 he was asked to organize and operate a 12-grade school, Harlem Academy, which was the forerunner of Northeastern Academy. In 1932 he became the first Black president of Oakwood Junior College, which position he held until 1945. After serving briefly in the newly formed local conference covering the Middle Atlantic States, Ohio, and West Virginia, he resumed his career in education. He helped to establish Pine Forge Academy and later returned to serve as principal of Northeastern Academy. After a retirement period because of ill health, he was invited to become principal of the 10-grade Fort Dupont Park School in Washington, D.C., where he served eight years. He retired from active service in 1966.

More, Hannah

MORE, HANNAH (1808—1868). An early convert, a former American missionary to Liberia. She joined the Seventh-day Adventist Church probably late in 1863, after a visit to the United States in 1861 or 1862, during which S. N. Haskell had placed in her hands a copy of J. N. Andrews' History of the Sabbath, and certain other Seventh-day Adventist publications. In 1866, after she lost her position as superintendent of an orphanage operated by an English missionary society at Cape Palmas, Liberia, she returned to the United States. She joined the South Lancaster, Massachusetts, church, then went to Battle Creek, Michigan, in search of work, wishing especially to teach, but no one offered her employment. Finally she accepted work in northwest Michigan, in the home of a former associate missionary who was not an SDA, where she died within a few months.

Ellen White, absent from Battle Creek at the time Hannah More left the area, reproached the Battle Creek members for their neglect. She mentioned the case in connection with her counsels on Christian benevolence and welfare work (1T 632, 666—680; 2T 140—145, 332) and also in connection with the need for missionary work in other lands, saying that God had given the church the gift of an experienced missionary to help it in its work, but that the opportunity to employ the gift had been neglected (3T 407, 408).

Through Hannah More's influence a fellow missionary in Africa, a man named Dickson, accepted SDA beliefs, and on returning to his native Australia became the first to preach SDA doctrines in that country.

Morning Star

MORNING STAR. A privately owned Mississippi River steamboat, used for about a decade, beginning in 1894, as a floating mission in connection with the work of the Southern Missionary Society for Blacks in Mississippi and Tennessee.

In the fall of 1893 J. E. White and W. O. Palmer attended a ministerial institute at Battle Creek, Michigan. There they learned of a set of 10 manuscripts written by Ellen White (J. E. White's mother) in regard to the urgent need for missionary work for Blacks of the South. Within a week the two men had dedicated themselves to this work. One sentence especially attracted their attention: "Small schools should be established in many localities." The men came to the conclusion that the only way to do this was to write and publish a suitable reader for the purpose. Accordingly they planned the Gospel Primer, wrote the Bible stories for it, set them in type (they were both printers), and then had the printing done at the Review and Herald office in Battle Creek, Michigan.

But then they heard that housing would be denied them if they went into the South to work among Blacks. Out of this problem came the decision to build a floating home for themselves—the Morning Star—which could be used also as headquarters for their mission work. The boat was built on the banks of the Kalamazoo River at Allegan, Michigan, its keel laid in March 1894.

White thus describes it: "The hull of the steamer was built of solid upland Michigan oak, was seventy-two feet long, with twelve feet beam and with three feet depth of hold amidships, and four at bow and stern. She was cabined fore and aft, . . . the cabin being sixty-seven feet long and sixteen feet wide, thus projecting over the hull on each side. The hull was launched May 1894, and then her cabin work put on. In July she was completed and started on her 1,500 mile journey to her field of operation" (Gospel Herald, June 1900, p. 37).

When the boat was nearly finished, White and Palmer were called to meet the large General Conference Committee then in session in Battle Creek. They were accepted as regular conference missionary workers, given their credentials, and assigned to Mississippi, with Vicksburg as the place to begin their work. They were each to be paid $8 a week, but this was not received until they arrived in Vicksburg three months later, on Jan. 10, 1895.

White and Palmer traded some tools at Ottawa, Illinois, for the sunken hull of a barge, raised it, and built an inexpensive cabin upon it, which they outfitted with some of the furnishings from the Morning Star. They named the barge Dawn, secured six young men colporteurs to occupy it, lashed it to the side of the Morning Star, and continued the journey to Vicksburg. At each new town where they stopped, the six men gave a whirlwind canvass for the Gospel Primer, then the group moved on. In this way the canvassers lived by their commissions and the Morning Star paid for itself with the royalties from the book. Other books followed and the same procedure was used.

The next year White bought Palmer's share and became sole owner of the boat. After two years the Morning Star was rebuilt. Her hull was lengthened to 95 feet (30 meters) and widened to 20 feet (six meters), thus allowing a deck 105 feet (32 meters) long and 24 feet (seven meters) wide, an upper cabin deck was added, and the pilothouse was placed above that. The rebuilt steamer, representing a total investment of about $4,000, then accommodated from 12 to 16 workers, a printshop, and a chapel furnished with folding chairs. Fully two thirds of the religious services were held on board.

After the Southern Missionary Society headquarters were moved to Nashville, Tennessee, the boat was moved from the Mississippi and sent up the Cumberland River, with Nashville as its home port. In 1906 it was beached and dismantled, with the intention of using it as the headquarters of J. E. White's book work, but it burned soon after. For many years the boat's star emblem representing its name graced one of the cottages at Oakwood College, Huntsville, Alabama. For the mission work conducted by the Morning Star group, see Southern Missionary Society.

Morning Watch

MORNING WATCH. A program of daily personal devotions consisting of the reading and/or memorizing of a Bible text along with personal prayer. The observance of the Morning Watch dates from the early development of the MV Department in 1907. Matilda Erickson Andross chose the first memory texts, one for each day of the year 1908, for the first Morning Watch Calendar of daily texts. The calendar has been published annually in many languages, and the English circulation has gone as high as 160,000. The first Morning Watch devotional book containing a page of inspirational thought for each text, entitled Mysteries Unveiled, was prepared for 1945 by Lynn H. Wood. For many years after that the MV Department sponsored a similar volume. Then the Youth Department sponsored a similar volume until 1983. Now the Review and Herald Publishing Association assigns a writer for the devotional book each year.

In the mid-1950s a compilation of Morning Watch texts especially for children was begun. Then in 1962 the Junior Morning Watch Calendar was supplemented by the first annual devotional book for Junior MVs, prepared by Miriam Hardinge, entitled Begin Today With God.

Since 1983 the Review and Herald Publishing Association has assigned writers for the junior devotional book. The Review and Herald has also published several devotional books for preschool children, and in 1992 the first women's devotional book was published by the Review and Herald Publishing Association.

MORNING WATCH (1842—1845; through 1844 as Midnight Cry; weekly; absorbed July 1845 by Advent Herald; J. V. Himes, New York; files in AU). One of the principal Millerite journals, The Midnight Cry, as it was known through most of its publication, came out first as a daily for one month, Nov. 17—Dec. 17, 1842, during evangelistic meetings in New York City, then was continued as a weekly, published by Himes but edited by N. Southard, in 1845 by N. N. Whiting.

Morocco

MOROCCO. A North African country, formerly divided between France and Spain, but an independent nation since 1956. It contains 171,305 square miles (443,680 square kilometers), supporting a population (1994) of approximately 28.5 million. The population is 99 percent Arab-Berbers, who are Muslims. Agriculture is the principal occupation, the chief products being grain, olives, citrus fruits, grapes, almonds, and cork. Morocco is rich in minerals, producing phosphates, manganese, copper, lead, and tin. It is bounded on the west by the Atlantic, on the north by the Mediterranean Sea, on the east by Algeria, and on the south by Western Sahara.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. SDA work in Morocco began in 1925 in Casablanca, when a European SDA layperson opened a Sabbath school. The same year an evangelist, Jean Reynaud, and his wife arrived there and carried on evangelism almost exclusively among the European population. They were aided by colporteurs who circulated publications with fair success. Before the year was over, Albert Meyer conducted the first baptism.

In 1928 Morocco was organized as a mission field with Meyer as president. A little later Ernest Veuthey and his wife settled in Fez. In 1932 and 1933 two physicians, R. R. Hilborn and his wife, from North America, conducted self-supporting medical missionary work in Morocco, particularly among the indigenous population. In January 1958 a church building was dedicated in Casablanca, which also provided office space for the headquarters of the Moroccan Mission.

By 1964 there were five churches and 165 members. Since that time mission work has been prohibited by the government and SDAs no longer have an organized work there. In 1993 about 12 members remained, scattered in different places. They met in private homes. The church building in Casablanca has been sold.

The territory of Morocco is part of Missions and Services in Trans-Mediterranean Countries (MISSERM), in the Euro-Africa Division.

Morse, Washington

MORSE, WASHINGTON (1816—1909). Pioneer Seventh-day Adventist minister. He was born and reared in Vermont. While in his teens he united with the Methodist Church, later becoming active in lay work. Early in the rise of the Adventist (Millerite) movement he identified himself with the group and devoted much of his time and substance to this cause. The disappointment of 1844 brought him to despondency, from which he was rescued about 1845 through the encouragement of Ellen Harmon. Through the urging of James White he began to preach in Vermont in 1852. The same year he participated in a council at which it was decided to acquire the first Adventist press. Also in 1852 he was ordained, in Vermont. In 1856 the local church dropped him from its membership. He moved to Illinois and later to Minnesota, where, while working on his homestead, he was active in missionary work. When the Minnesota Conference was organized in 1863, he was elected its first president. In 1865 he closed his public service, but through the years, almost to the time of his death, he continued to interest himself in the work of the church by canvassing and conducting voluminous missionary correspondence both at home and in Canada, where he went in 1896 to be near his children who were engaged in church work there. He died in Florida, where he moved shortly before his death.

From 1893 to 1910 she was secretary and treasurer of the Maine Conference and Tract Society. She made an outstanding contribution to the development of SDA work in Maine. From the mid-seventies to the mid-nineties her name appeared often as a contributor on the pages of the Review and Herald, and she contributed to other magazines as well. Her poems were published in collections, and she authored several textbooks on geography.

She continued on to the Medical College of Virginia, from which she graduated cum laude in 1952. She was in private practice for nine years, then became an instructor in pediatric medicine at her alma mater. She lectured on drug abuse in the United States and in eastern Asia. In 1977 she connected with the School of Nursing at Loma Linda University.

From 1977 to 1979 she was medical director at California State University at Fullerton, California, then she went as a medical missionary to Thailand, where she hiked and rode elephants to take medical aid to the tribespeople. The Mosserød Retirement Center has been working with the government, so that SDAs from other parts of the country who want to come and stay there will have their expenses refunded by the health-care plan. During the past years there has been a decrease in the number of clients, but so far the institution has adapted to the new situation.

Mount Diamond Adventist High School and Agriculture Centre

MOUNT DIAMOND ADVENTIST HIGH SCHOOL AND AGRICULTURE CENTRE (formerly Bautama Central School). A coeducational Boarding school on the junior secondary level situated on a 990-acre (400-hectare) tract of land about 20 miles (30 kilometers) east of Port Moresby, Papua New Guinea. The students come mainly from Papua.

The school originally began as Mirigeda Training School, established in 1932 on a site about one mile (some two kilometers) south of the present site. Its buildings were mainly of secondhand materials purchased cheaply from an old copper mine that had operated in the area. The school buildings were destroyed during World War II. After the war, under the direction of K. J. Gray, G. Johnson, and a group of indigenous workers, buildings of temporary materials secured from army disposals were erected at Bautama, a site near the coast, four miles (about six kilometers) from Mirigeda. By 1948 construction had proceeded to a point where it was possible to begin the school program, and in February of that year schoolwork began under the direction of R. M. Ellison. Like Mirigeda, Bautama served as a training school for the entire Papuan field and thus continued for several years, until training courses were begun at Kambubu and Kabiufa in the early 1950s. The school became known as Bautama Central School, enrolling students in primary classes only. This continued until 1972, during which year the school moved to a new site four miles (about six kilometers) inland, known as Mount Diamond. The Mount Diamond School, in 1973, became the third Seventh-day Adventist secondary school in the Papua New Guinea Union Mission. Funds for its establishment were provided mostly by a Thirteenth Sabbath Offering overflow. An SDA farmer, Harry Toepfer, who lived nearby, assisted significantly in the establishment of the school.

During 1972 an agricultural training program was begun by A. L. Voigt.

Mount Ellis Academy

MOUNT ELLIS ACADEMY. A coeducational boarding school on the senior high school level, operated by the Montana Conference at the east end of the Gallatin Valley, five miles (eight kilometers) east of Bozeman, Montana, on a 535-acre (220-hectare) tract of land near the foot of Mount Ellis. The forerunner of the school was a humble log cabin church school opened in 1900, 20 miles (32 kilometers) south of Bozeman, but that was moved in 1901 to Bozeman. At the beginning of the school term of 1902, 10 grades were offered, and the attendance reached 25. Classes were held in the Bozeman Seventh-day Adventist Church, with two rented houses serving as dormitories. Claude Conard, a graduate of Walla Walla College, was principal, business manager, and preceptor. The first graduates completed the tenth grade in 1904. This same year, following the admonition of Ellen White to locate boarding schools in the country, the conference committee secured 20 acres (eight hectares) of land five miles (eight kilometers) east of Bozeman on which to build a new academy.

In 1905—1906 the first new buildings, the girls' and boys' dormitories, were begun, while a Methodist church across the road served as an administration building. The new school was named Mount Ellis Academy. By 1908 the administration building was completed. Through the years other buildings were added, including a gymnasium, machine shop, and dairy barn. The total acreage of the school was increased to 535 acres (220 hectares), of which 120 acres (50 hectares) are under cultivation.

Disaster struck the academy in January 1955, when a fire destroyed the powerhouse, boys' dormitory, Music Department, and laundry. After the fire the board decided to rebuild the entire plant. By 1960 the school was completely rebuilt, including the boys' and girls' dormitories, administration building, laundry, dairy barn, powerhouse, and principal's cottage. In 1962 the academy was accredited with the Northwest Association of Secondary and Higher Schools.

In 1973 a new school plant and gymnasium were completed. In 1978 an industrial arts complex was built.

Mount Klabat College

MOUNT KLABAT COLLEGE (Universitas Klabat). A coeducational boarding school on the senior college level, operated by the East Indonesia Union Mission on an estate of about 96 acres (40 hectares), 15 miles (25 kilometers) east of Manado, provincial capital in northern Sulawesi. The students are Indonesians, about 80 percent from Seventh-day Adventist homes, and the rest from non-Christian or from other Christian groups.

History

History. The tensions and fortunes of politics and history have played important roles in the founding and development of Mount Klabat College. Even before the creation of the East Indonesia Union Mission in 1964 in the eastern part of what had been the Indonesia Union Mission, ideas and plans were in the making for a school of higher learning. Upon the appointment of A. M. Bartlett as president of the new union in 1964 more definite plans were laid. E. W. Higgins, Jr., was called from the Palau Islands to serve as college president, arriving in January 1965.

Because of political tensions throughout 1965, temporary school quarters were arranged for in a large house in the nearby village of Airmadidi—two rooms for the men, one for the women, and a connecting apartment for the R. A. Kalangi family, who were teachers and residence deans. One large room served as chapel, classroom, study hall, worship room, and recreation area. H. Soriton, the other national teacher, taught Indonesian language and government.

The school's enrollment on Sept. 30, 1965, totaled 29. The school was first called Perguruan Tinggi Klabat, but at the request of the government, it was changed to Sekolah Tinggi Klabat in 1970.

By March 1966 about 12 acres (five hectares) had been purchased and the decision made to begin construction of temporary buildings on the new campus. Three wooden buildings were erected, spaced rather closely in a U-shaped layout. One was the men's dormitory, one the women's dormitory, and the third housed the cafeteria, library, chapel, and study hall. These first three structures still stand but are used now for men's residence halls.

Mount Klabat College in its beginning was authorized to operate as a junior college, offering two-year terminal courses in ministerial training and elementary education. In 1965, 11 students were in the ministerial program and 18 were studying elementary education. Secondary education training was added in 1968. For the next three years enrollment steadily increased, reaching 84 in 1969.

Senior college status was gained in 1969 when the General Conference Department of Education approved the four-year ministerial curriculum leading to the bachelor's degree.

C. H. Damron served as acting president and chair of the Bible Department at this time. With the addition of two-year curriculums in business accounting and secretarial science, enrollment jumped rapidly, reaching 287 in 1971.

In 1973 H. L. Bissell became academic dean and led out in a curriculum development program that broadened the offerings to include majors in religion, theology, business, social science, secondary and elementary education, and minors in the above areas plus secretarial science, English, and home economics.

In 1967 the first permanent college building was dedicated, designated ultimately as the industrial center, but serving for seven years as the administrative and academic center and chapel. That same year the first three teachers' houses were constructed, plus the 60-foot (18-meter) water tower, which is supplied by a mountain spring. In 1972 the women moved into a new dormitory that housed 120, with eight in each room. Classes began in the first story of the new administration-classroom building in 1974. Facilities, though crowded, provide temporary library space, and laboratories for sewing, science, typing, photography, and language study, as well as other classrooms and offices.

The 96 acres (40 hectares) are used for about 2,000 coconut trees that provide a valuable cash crop, rice paddies, a variety of fruit and nut trees, and the cultivation of soybeans, corn, and peanuts. Other sections of the college property provide volcanic ash, sand, and rock for building purposes. The college operates two rice hulling mills, providing rice for commercial purposes and for the school cafeteria. Hollow concrete blocks have been made on campus for most of the recent construction projects.

The status of this institution was raised to university by the government in 1981. The university is divided into the Schools of Theology, Education, Economy, and Agriculture.

The 1993 enrollment was 1,067 students.

Presidents: E. W. Higgins, Jr., 1965—1967; C. H. Damron (acting), 1967—1968; E. W. Higgins, Jr., 1969—1975; R. A. Kalangi, 1975—1979; John Pesulima, 1980—1986; B. J. Dompas, 1987— .

Mount Pisgah Academy

MOUNT PISGAH ACADEMY. A coeducational boarding school on the senior high school level operated by the Carolina Conference on the slopes of Hominy Valley, about eight miles (13 kilometers) west of Asheville, North Carolina. It is accredited by the state and by the Seventh-day Adventist Board of Regents. The school was begun in 1914 as a self-supporting unit by three SDA families—the Wallers, Graveses, and Steinmans—in harmony with Ellen G. White's instructions regarding the establishment of such institutions. The group took as an answer to prayer for funds, and as a token to proceed, the arrival of a letter from California containing a personal check for $50 from W. C. White, sent to E. C. Waller at the direction of his mother, Ellen G. White.

Charles Graves and William Steinman sold their farms and purchased a 170-acre (69-hectare) site for the new school. They contributed implements and livestock, and offered their skills in truck gardening, carpentry, and dairying for the vocational and agricultural programs planned. E. C. and Anna Waller, with some training at Union College and with three years' teaching experience at Madison, Tennessee, assumed the administrative and most of the academic responsibilities, and also shared with others in the general work. Dorothy Graves, daughter of one of the founders, became bookkeeper and taught two classes. The expanding secondary school was called Pisgah Industrial Institute.

The early days were days of hardship, privation, prayer, and faith. By 1916 the 10-room farmhouse was unable to accommodate the growing enrollment, so the barn, now named Assembly Hall, was renovated. Tents pitched in the loft served as boys' dormitory that winter. In 1917 the laundry finally acquired running water, which was brought in wooden troughs from a hillside spring. In that year also the farmhouse, which had served as kitchen, cafeteria, girls' dormitory, and a faculty apartment, burned. Once-suspicious neighbors helped to complete the assembly hall during Christmas vacation and housed some of the girls in their homes for the winter. The Wallers' room became bedroom, classroom, music studio, principal's office, and on two occasions an operating room.

The original one-study program, meeting three hours each day, gave way after some years to a two-study system with 90-minute classes, and finally to the four-unit semester method now common. Afternoons were spent in work, the student originally donating the first two hours each day. Student-faculty government was initiated. A Pisgah tradition, adopted in 1915, was its reputation for outstanding choir work. The Carolina Conference, in the spring of 1920, sent V. B. Watts to be pastor and Bible teacher.

In 1929, looking forward to meeting the school accreditation requirements, the Wallers left for two years to obtain academic degrees. (Accreditation by the State Department of Public Instruction was granted in 1946.)

During the years 1914—1917 Drs. H. P. and Alice Parker, of California, pioneered medical work that, until recent times, was closely linked with the school. In 1920 the Pisgah Sanitarium was built, and the hospital was completed 12 years later. Nursing instruction was given for a time, but was discontinued after the institution was acquired by the conference.

Dr. O. S. Lindberg and William E. Westcott, and later Dr. Louis C. Waller (son of E. C. Waller), carried forward the work until the facilities were closed in 1957.

The E. C. Wallers finally chose to relinquish their heavy responsibilities, and in 1951 the Pisgah Institute was given by the Board of Trustees to the Carolina Conference in exchange for sustentation support for the seven veteran workers when they would need it.

Renamed Mount Pisgah Academy, the school changed, not in purpose but in many physical respects. In 1954 a new administration building was finished, followed shortly by three new staff homes and, seven years later, a girls' dormitory and four brick homes to replace outdated frame units.

The gymnasium and church were added in 1966, the cafeteria-music complex in 1970, two more faculty homes in 1971, and a boys' dormitory in 1972.

During the fall of 1983 the administration building burned and a larger, modern facility took its place. Besides regular classrooms and offices, it houses a biology-chemistry lab, a home economics facility, an auditorium, and a computer network. Between 1989 and 1993 slightly more than $1 million was spent upgrading and modernizing both dormitories, the gymnasium, cafeteria, faculty housing, water and sewer lines, and paving campus roads.

Mount Vernon Academy

MOUNT VERNON ACADEMY. A coeducational boarding school on the senior high school level, situated on a 300-acre (122-hectare) tract of land one mile (1.6 kilometers) northeast of the city limits of Mount Vernon, Ohio, on State Highway 3, organized primarily to serve the constituents of the Ohio and West Virginia conferences. Students of other religious persuasions are welcome provided they show due respect for the Word of God and are willing to observe the regulations of the school. In 1993 the academy had a staff of 26 and an enrollment of 122.

Mount Vernon Academy opened its doors in 1893 to 32 students and a staff of six teachers, with Prof. William T. Bland as principal. However, by the end of the first school year this small enrollment of students had grown to about 100.

The school opened in buildings previously occupied by the Mount Vernon Sanitarium, which had closed in 1891. Ellen G. White, when consulted, had written, in 1893: "Let the building be converted into a seminary to educate our youth in the place of enlarging the college at Battle Creek. I have been shown that there should . . . be located, school buildings in Ohio which would give character to the work" (Ellen G. White letter K35).

The day after this letter was written J. N. Loughborough submitted a report to the General Conference in session advising the same action.

Upon General Conference recommendation the stockholders of the sanitarium voted to adopt this recommendation and to form a new corporation for the management of the academy.

After operating on the secondary level for 12 years, the school was advanced from an academy to a college in 1905. During the next 11 years Mount Vernon College offered four-year courses leading to the B.S. and B.A. degrees. Secondary work also continued during this time. Norris W. Lawrence was the first president of Mount Vernon College.

When in 1914 the Washington Foreign Mission Seminary resumed the status of a college (now Columbia Union College), a decision had to be made as to the territorial advantages of the two schools. Upon an investigation by the Education Department of the General Conference, the school at Washington was made the training college for the Columbia Union and Mount Vernon College was reduced to an academy, except that it continued to conduct an additional two-year teacher-training course until 1915.

The old administration building was built in 1924. On Dec. 24, 1926, the old sanitarium building, the main campus building for many years, was destroyed by fire. As a partial replacement, Linden Hall, the girls' residence, was erected in 1927—1928. In 1940 Hadley Hall, the boys' residence, was built. It was named in honor of Dr. H. G. Hadley, a Washington, D.C., physician, whose generous financial help was an important factor in the construction of this building. In 1965 a wing housing 60 boys was added. The gymnasium was completed in 1951, and in 1958—1959 the industrial building, housing the City Laundry and Cleaners. Hiawatha Hall, completed in 1967, housed the cafeteria, kitchen, bakery, two laboratories, library, and administration offices in 1993.

Following the counsel of Ellen White regarding the importance of industries in Seventh-day Adventist schools, not only as a means of manual training but also as a financial aid to students, Mount Vernon Academy through the years has operated several industrial enterprises: a bakery, greenhouse, printing, carpentry, and a commercial laundry.

Presidents and Principals: William T. Bland, 1893—1896; James W. Loughhead (later spelled Lawhead), 1896—1904; Norris W. Lawrence, 1904—1906; Jeremiah B. Clymer, 1906—1908; Sylvester M. Mountain View Academy (California)

MOUNTAIN VIEW ACADEMY (California). A coeducational day school on the senior high school level, operated by the Central California Conference and 16 churches of the San Francisco Bay Peninsula area. It was formerly named Mountain View Union Academy.

Mountain View Academy is accredited with the Seventh-day Adventist Board of Regents and the Western Association of Schools and Colleges. In 1993 the enrollment was 119, with a faculty and staff of 17.

The parent school was an elementary church school established in 1906 for the children of the families who had moved in 1904 with the Pacific Press from Oakland to Mountain View. Its one-room building (later enlarged to two) stood on the spot where the present academy library stands, and was erected with funds raised from local SDAs and non-SDAs. The school, organized under the leadership of M. C. Wilcox and his wife, was opened with 48 pupils, and was taught by Mrs. Viola Miller. Grades 9 and 10 were added in 1915 and grade 11 in 1921. By this time the original building had been replaced by a larger one, which formed the nucleus of the present school plant.

In 1922 the school became a full academy. The Miramonte church school building was erected on Villa Street, and the elementary grades were transferred to it. Harland Johnston was the first principal of the academy and E. L. Maxwell the first board chairman. The faculty included Winea Simpson, Mrs. Amanda Pease, Mrs. Alma McKibbin, and Thomas Huxtable. The first graduating class, in 1923, numbered seven.

In 1924 an active Home and School Association was organized. Even though the academy functioned as a day school, a basketry industry was operated in 1929—1930; some articles of furniture also were manufactured. The school paper, The Reflector, was first published in 1935. The annual, El Camino Real, was published in 1925 and then annually from 1948.

Subsequent additions to the school plant were a music studio (1943), a chapel, an auditorium, a printshop, and home economics facilities (1949—1951). The entire hall, classroom, and office area was remodeled in modern style in 1959.

By 1962 the enrollment had increased so that new facilities were greatly needed. After a detailed study relative to rebuilding in Cupertino, it was instead decided to rebuild on the existing property. New academic facilities were built in 1967. In October 1970 the gymnasium was destroyed by fire. Immediate plans were made to rebuild. In April 1971, however, before actual construction began, the old Mountain View church was also destroyed by fire. Because of these new developments, construction plans were extended to include a chapel and music facilities. May 1972 witnessed the opening of the new gymnasium, and in August 1972 the multipurpose building was ready for use.

In 1978 plans and design were proposed for a new auto mechanics building. In May 1982 the building was ready for use.

During the 1970s and 1980s, after the destruction of the Mountain View Central church by fire, the entire block, with the exception of one house, was purchased by the school.

In 1993 the word “union” was dropped, and the academy became officially “Mountain View Academy.”

MOUNTAIN VIEW ADVENTIST ACADEMY. A coeducational nonboarding high school, situated at Richland Park, St. Vincent, West Indies. The school started at Richland Park in January 1952, under Lester Thomas as the first principal. It was later moved to Mesopotamia, but subsequently back to Richland Park. It is operated by the South Caribbean Conference and offers five years' instruction in academic preparation for the General Certificate of Education ordinary level examinations. In 1994 it had a faculty and staff of 18.

Mountain View College

MOUNTAIN VIEW COLLEGE. A coeducational boarding school on a senior college level, operating under the Central and South Philippine Union missions. The school is situated on a 2,500-acre (1,000-hectare) tract southwest of Malaybalay, on the island of Mindanao in the Philippines.

The college enrollment passed the 500 mark in 1961. In 1992 it was 1,767, and the faculty, staff, and industrial supervisors numbered 150. Mountain View College is distinctive in that it requires all students to work in one of the more than 25 industrial and service departments. The student-work phase of the program has won the approval of government officials and prominent educators.

History

History. Mountain View College began as an extension division of the Philippine Union College. Extension classes in first-year college began in June 1949 on the campus of Mindanao Mission Academy at Manticao, on the north coast of the large southern island of Mindanao, with an enrollment of 57. The next year second-year college work was offered, bringing the enrollment to 120. Twenty-one graduated from the two-year teacher training course and seven from the Bible instructors' course in April 1951.

The site for Mountain View College was chosen in 1950 by Andrew N. Nelson, Wilton O. Baldwin, and Benito G. Mary, upon the recommendation of E. A. Capobres, Antipas Valendez, and Pedro Claveria (the preliminary site survey committee). Later, after its own survey, a committee composed of mission, union, and division officers and a representative from the General Conference approved the site. The tract of land measured about 2,500 acres (1,000 hectares), bounded on three sides by mountain streams, and was situated in the cool highlands of Central Mindanao. A concession of about 15,000 acres (6,100 hectares) of mahogany timber adjoining the property was also applied for. In spite of many problems, water rights, forest concessions, and title to the land were eventually secured, and the site was occupied in January 1952. Vernon L. Bartlett, Mariano Abesta, and two students—Job Tanamal and Peter Cabardo—were the first to settle there. More students soon joined them. During the next year and a half a water system was installed, a sawmill was set up, and lumbering operations were begun; roads were bulldozed; virgin land was cultivated; crops were planted and harvested. Storage sheds, a bamboo chapel, a dining room, dormitories, classrooms, and office buildings were built in time for the opening of classes in June 1953. Almost 200 college students enrolled that first year, and academy classes were added the following year. In February 1952, at a meeting held in Pioneer Hall (the bamboo dormitory for student workers) the new college was formally separated from Philippine Union College and long-range plans were laid for its development. Among the pioneer builders of the new school were Benito G. Mary, P. M. Lopez, D. M. Hechanova, and C. L. Martin, who helped install an electric system and maintain farm machinery, and R. C. Hill, farm manager and later head of the college agriculture department.

It was the purpose of the founders to offer in this school education that emphasized practical as well as intellectual attainments, a type of education especially needed in a primarily agricultural country rapidly striving to develop industrially. There was also a need in the Philippines for a college with more work opportunities for the students, since Philippine Union College was able to give work experience to only about one third of its students at that time.

A unique feature of college activities from the beginning was the missionary work conducted by teachers and students in the community. They helped build chapels and churches, the first of which was the Lurugan church, about four miles (six kilometers) from Mountain View College; and later many small churches were established within walking distance of the campus. The college students assisted 71 churches in evangelism, leading to more than 850 baptisms during 1974.

In a financial crisis in February 1955, the closing or moving of the school was averted by help from the General Conference, the Far Eastern Division, and the South Philippine Union Mission. However, with the faculty cut in half and the courses drastically reduced, enrollment in June 1955 dropped to an all-time low of only 111. Thirty of these were in the academy, of which only the last two years were offered. With the emphasis on the industrial development of the school, during the remaining half of the decade by Todd C. Murdoch, president, student enrollment was again built up.

In 1968 the forest concession was changed to an experimental forest of 10,000 acres (4,100 hectares), under the management of the college. In 1972 a plan was implemented to place the sawmill under a separate board from the college in order to give a more efficient managerial base from which to operate. Until 1980 it continued to develop as a major college-affiliated industry and a major student work center. Its products were furniture components, school desks, custom-manufactured wood products, and pianos.

Outstanding among many who gave major help to the school were Tirso Jamandre, Sr., who gave $5,000 toward purchasing the land; M. E. Kern, whose gift made possible the construction of the Florence Kern Auditorium (1959); H. W. Miller, M.D., who donated the building and equipment to make vegetable protein foods; W. G. Richli, M.D., who helped in the construction of the college hydroelectric plant; F. R. La Sage, who developed the farm and ranch; C. H. Lauda, who supported the establishment of the college radio station, DXCR; and J. J. Strahle, whose gifts made possible a new health center and clinic (1975).

The first eight degrees for senior college work in the field of theology were granted in 1960. The next year the first 10 degrees in agriculture were awarded; bachelor's degrees in education and science were granted in 1962, and the first secretarial degrees in 1963. By 1974, degrees were offered in 12 different major fields, with the largest being nursing. The practical phase of the nurses' training is done on the college extension campus.

On Oct. 11, 1991, a fire of undetermined origin razed the 38-year-old wooden building that housed the administration offices and 14 classrooms. Upon learning about the sad incident, sister institutions and alumni from far and near responded by sending their donations to restore the school building. The new concrete structure was ready for use in the 1993—1994 school year.

Enrollment in 1992—1993 was 1,764 in the college, 170 in the secondary, and 110 in the elementary school. Both the secondary and elementary schools are laboratory schools for the education students.

History and Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

History and Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. SDA teachings appear to have entered West Virginia first through publications. About 1879, at the request of J.R.S. Mowrey (misspelled Maurey, Mourey), of Virginia, Mrs. Isaac Sanborn sent Signs of the Times to a few people at Rockport, Wood County, West Virginia. When word came that several were observing the Sabbath and wished to hear preaching, Isaac Sanborn, an evangelist working in Virginia, went and held meetings about one mile (1.6 kilometers) from Rockport near the end of 1879, and in February 1880 he organized a group of 16 converts.

Returning to West Virginia in June, he went to Jerry's Run, Wood County, near Rockport. Finding the time (at wheat harvest) inconvenient for meetings, he went to Ohio and returned in the latter part of June. On July 17 he baptized four and held a Communion service at the home of Caleb (or Cabell) Dugans, a prospective convert who was prevented by ill health from attending the meetings.

In July Sanborn went to Round Knob and Shambling's Mills, in Roane County, to visit persons interested through reading the Signs sent by the Vigilant Missionary Society of North Scituate, Rhode Island. Sanborn reported preaching his first sermon in that county at Round Knob at a monthly meeting of the Advent Christians. S. P. Whitney, the leading Advent Christian minister, was at first friendly, but later hostile. Yet Sanborn won 15 converts, including two "first-day" Adventist ministers. (Later, in 1893, Whitney resigned the presidency of the Advent Christian Conference of West Virginia and became an SDA minister; his name appears in the SDA directories of 1894—1896.)

In the autumn of 1880 Sanborn appears to have held meetings among the Advent Christians in Kanawha County. By early November he reported about 40 adherents in the state. In December he closed his work in the state, having won six, including a United Brethren minister at Berea.

In January 1881 J.R.S. Mowrey arrived in Charleston, and on May 22 organized a church of 16 members at Jerry's Run, apparently the first in West Virginia. By mid-July it was estimated that there were 100 SDAs in the state.

About the first of July 1881 came W. R. Foggin, who during the next six years, sometimes alone and sometimes with another evangelist, held meetings in the following places: 1882, Berea (Ritchie County), Addison, Sugar Grove, and Adkinson (Webster County); 1883, Three Forks and Reedy (Roane County), Sherman and Ravenswood (Jackson County), New Martinsville (Wetzel County); 1884, Mineralwells (Wood County), Ox Bow, Cisco (Ritchie County), and Freeport (Wirt County); 1885, Flat Woods (or Flatwoods), (Wirt County); 1886, Wiseburg (Jackson County), Kanawha Station, Flatwoods, Jerry's Run, and Tyner (Wood County), Berea (Ritchie County), Kanawha and Walker's Station (Wood County); 1887, Kettle (Roane County), Sherman and Ravenswood (Jackson County), Ox Bow, and Rusk, apparently near Walker's Station.

On Apr. 16, 1883, J. O. Corliss organized the second Seventh-day Adventist church in West Virginia, at Berea, with 11 members. On July 1, 1883, that church held a business meeting, apparently the first such meeting in the state. In 1884 the Berea church erected a building, apparently the first owned by SDAs in West Virginia.

During the 1884 General Conference it was recommended that "West Virginia be united to the Ohio Conference, and that Elder C. H. Chaffee [of Missouri] move to labor in that field." It was also recommended that "the generous offer of the Indiana Conference to furnish a tent to West Virginia" be accepted. It appears that this helpful interest on the part of the Indiana Conference was a result of the visits of S. H. Lane to West Virginia earlier in 1884. A year after the 1884 General Conference session the Ohio Conference in session accepted the request of G. I. Butler, then president of the General Conference, that the Ohio Conference take the West Virginia mission "under its watch-care" (Review and Herald 62:716, Nov. 17, 1885). A few months later, on Feb. 15, 1886, at the first "state meeting" "the brethren of the state all voted to be taken into the Ohio Conference" (ibid. 63:203, Mar. 30, 1886).

In July 1885 an influential member of the Christian Church of Kanawha Station (or simply Kanawha) in Wood County urged Chaffee and Foggin to hold a series of tent meetings in his town, volunteering to pay all the expenses (ibid. 62:507, Aug. 11, 1885). The meetings (July 30—Sept. 16) were well attended, and by the close 51 had signed the covenant, 19 had been baptized, and expenses to the evangelist had amounted to only 46 cents. It was "decided to immediately take steps to erect a house of worship; and notwithstanding the hard times, one hundred and twenty three dollars were pledged for that purpose" (ibid. 62:619, Oct. 6, 1885). It appears from later reports that during the winter of 1885—1886 others were added to this group and that the meetinghouse, which eventually was built, was owned by B. B. Johnson, an SDA from Wisconsin who later served as conference treasurer.

In 1886 Chaffee held meetings at Flatwoods (Wirt County), Barrackville (Marion County), Kanawha Station (Wood County), Fairmount and Paw Paw (Marion County), Kanawha Station and Parkersburg (Wood County), ending his work in West Virginia about Oct. 5, 1886.

While Foggin and Haughey held meetings in a second tent in Wiseburg and Jerry's Run in the summer of 1886, Chaffee and D. E. Lindsey held meetings at Fairmount, Marion County. At the Ohio Conference session, held from Aug. 11 to 24, 1886, the churches of Kanawha, Freeport, and Berea were received into the conference, W. R. Foggin representing the Kanawha church.

During the week of Oct. 3 to 9, 1886, A. A. Meredith preached four sermons to the group in Kettle, Roane County. I. H. Bee, who appears to have been the leader of this group, pleaded for a minister to organize them into a church (ibid. 63:667, Oct. 26, 1886).

The second West Virginia state meeting was held at Kanawha some time late in October or early November 1886, with some 85 attending. At this meeting it was decided to hold a camp meeting in the state the following summer (1887) and to purchase a tent. For this $225 was pledged. It was also decided that J. W. Stone, later the first conference president, “labor for a time” in West Virginia (ibid. 63:717, Nov. 16, 1886). It was reported that at that time there were “one hundred and fifty Sabbathkeepers in the state” (ibid. 63:747, Nov. 30, 1886).

It appears that about the time of the state meeting, Foggin and S. J. Iles, a new Seventh-day Adventist minister in West Virginia, had just closed several weeks of tent meetings at Tyner, Wood County. No converts were made at that time, but the evangelists felt that there were potential converts among those interested and requested Stone to come and hold meetings. He did so soon after the state meeting, and as a result nine signed the covenant and a Sabbath school of 21 was organized.

During the latter part of December 1886 Foggin and Iles held meetings at Kanawha, adding two to the church, and then held meetings at Walker’s Station, Wood County, a few miles from Kanawha. Later the Kanawha Station church was merged with the church at Walker and became known as the Ross Memorial church.

On Jan. 3, 1887, the evangelists left Walker’s Station for Freeport and from there walked to Kettle (probably in Kanawha County) where they closed a series of meetings about Jan. 20, 1887, which resulted in 16 signing the covenant and a church of 12 members being organized. Two of the new members were former ministers of the “first-day” Adventists.

The first camp meeting in West Virginia, originally announced for Sept. 6 to 13, 1887, was held at Parkersburg Sept. 13 to 20, with an attendance of about 125. The camp meeting committee consisted of B. B. Johnson, John F. Meade, John Lowman, and probably D. K. Mitchell, of Ohio, as chairperson.

Conference Organization and Development

Conference Organization and Development. On Sept. 15, 1887, West Virginia was separated from the Ohio Conference and organized into a separate conference. W. J. Stone was elected conference president; W. R. Foggin, secretary; and B. B. Johnson, treasurer. The conference committee consisted of the conference president, J. A. Stuart (Stewart), and J. B. Ramsey. There were about 200 Sabbathkeepers, including 92 SDA church members, in West Virginia at the time. E. W. Farnsworth of the General Conference and R. A. Underwood of the Ohio Conference were present at this camp meeting. On Nov. 13, 1887, the General Conference admitted West Virginia to the sisterhood of conferences. Tent meetings were held in connection with the camp meeting, conducted by the conference president and O. J. Mason.

Progress between 1887 and 1891 was slow but steady. The second camp meeting in West Virginia was held at Salem from July 24 to 31, 1888. The same year the Berea church building was dedicated and the Amos church was organized (and dedicated the next year). The 1889 camp meeting was held at Grafton Park, two miles (three kilometers) from Grafton, Taylor County, from Aug. 20 to 27. At the 1889 General Conference, West Virginia was made a part of the newly organized District 1 under A. T. Robinson. At the 1890 camp meeting held at Newburgh (Newburg), the SDA State Health and Temperance Society in West Virginia was organized.

In 1891 D. C. Babcock became president of the West Virginia Conference and initiated an aggressive program of evangelism. During his administration SDA work was opened in the eastern counties of the state and by August 1892, 38 persons had been baptized. In either 1891 or 1892 the first SDA primary school in West Virginia was operated successfully at Newark. This school was enlarged several times in the course of its brief history. In 1892 the West Virginia Monitor (later called the West Virginia Review), which began in 1890 as a small four-page bimonthly published by the state tract society, became the official organ of the conference, and continued in this capacity until 1903, when the Atlantic Union Gleaner became the official organ for the new union conference and its constituent conferences, which included West Virginia. In 1894 the Newark and Parkersburg churches were organized and admitted to the conference, and early in 1895 the companies at Debby (Mason County) and Huntington (Cabell County) were organized into churches. Many of these early churches have been disbanded, others have merged with nearby churches, and still others have been reorganized after having been disbanded for a time.

In 1894 the counties of Garrett, Allegany, and Washington in western Maryland were transferred to the West Virginia Conference. Later in 1903 these three counties and “three others closely allied, in the state of West Virginia [Morgan, Berkeley, and Jefferson counties], were transferred to the Chesapeake Conference” (Atlantic Union Gleaner 2:576, Dec. 16, 1903). When the Columbia Union was organized in 1907, the West Virginia Conference boundary lines were again changed so that the conference territory coincided with the territory of the state of West Virginia. In 1917 the conference boundaries were changed to their present positions.

The years between 1900 and 1910 were a period of internal as well as external difficulties for the West Virginia Conference. During this time SDA ministers were vigorously opposed by many Protestant clergymen; the holy flesh heresy diminished church membership; and the conference was burdened for a time with a debt of more than $3,000 and had eight presidents in rapid succession. In 1907 the membership of the conference reached the low figure of 170 members. However, with the exception of the first years of the present century, the membership has increased steadily since the conference was organized, as the following statistics indicate: in 1887, 92 members; in 1897, 229; in 1907, 170; in 1917, 311; in 1927, 437; in 1937, 760; in 1947, 1,012; in 1957, 1,542; in 1964, 1,812; in 1974, 2,150; in 1993, 2,452.

In 1942 the former Terrapin Park, in Parkersburg, a three-acre (1.2-hectare) tract of land, was bought and transformed into a permanent site for camp meetings. In 1945 the first building was constructed on the grounds under the direction of W. B. Hill, conference president. In 1961 an auditorium with a capacity of 1,000 was erected at a cost of $17,500. The same year an additional three acres (1.2 hectares) were acquired for family tents and parking at a cost of $15,000.

In the 1940s, R. L. Boothby and L. R. Mansell conducted evangelistic campaigns in Charleston, Bluefield, and Huntington.

From 1947 to 1953 five new churches were added to the conference: Beckley, 1947, after an evangelistic series of meetings by J. R. Johnson; Logan, 1949, after meetings by A. C. Marple; Richwood, 1950; Masontown, 1952, and Grafton, 1953, after public meetings by John E. Hoffman. Since then churches have been organized in Lewisburg, 1956, and Indore, 1962, as the result of branch Sabbath schools begun by the Princeton and Charleston churches, respectively.

From 1970 to 1974, four new churches were added: Mountaintop, 1970; Spencer, 1971; Williamson, 1973; Point Pleasant, 1974.

On Aug. 22, 1971, after considerable balloting and selection from among 33 names, it was unanimously voted by the Conference Executive Committee to recommend the new name "Mountain View Conference of Seventh-day Adventists" to be comprised of the territory of West Virginia (minus the three easternmost counties) and Allegany and Garrett counties in the state of Maryland.

A campground located in Huttonsville was purchased in 1974.

Mozambique

MOZAMBIQUE. A country stretching along the southeast coast of Africa, bounded on the north by Tanzania; on the west by Malawi, Zambia, and Zimbabwe; on the south by South Africa and Swaziland; and on the east by the Indian Ocean. It has an area of 313,661 square miles (812,383 square kilometers) and a population (1994) of 17.3 million. The majority of the inhabitants are animists, but there are also Muslims (most of whom live in the north), Catholics, and Protestants. Agriculture is the principal occupation, with cashews, sugar, maize, cotton, copra, and sisal the chief crops.

In 1505 the Portuguese settled at Sofala, the port through which the ancient Phoenicians and Egyptians took gold, ivory, and other forms of wealth. Maputo (formerly Loureno Marques) is the capital. Other important settlements are the seaport towns of Beira and Quelimane.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. SDA teachings entered Mozambique in 1931 when two African students from the Malamulo Mission School returned to their homes in Portuguese East Africa. Both engaged in active lay evangelism and soon reported 555 people in the Bible classes they were conducting. O. U. Giddings and Max Webster made a visit to Mozambique to investigate the interest, and in 1933 Webster was sent to the Zambesi district in Mozambique to establish a mission. He chose a site in the district of Lugela, 187 miles (300 kilometers) from the port of Quelimane, and an equal distance from the frontier of Malawi. In 1935, with permission from the governor-general, he established a mission, naming it Munguluni (which means “light”). While clearing land and erecting a mission house, a chapel, a school, and workshops, Webster preached with the help of a national worker, Horacio Luia, who knew both Portuguese and the local dialect. In 1937 the first camp meeting was held, to which 1,500 Africans came. They were timid and suspicious but listened. However, when Webster tried to take photographs, they fled into the bush. In 1939 the first converts were baptized. Carlos Gouveia, sent by the Portuguese Union in 1939, was the first teacher of the first Seventh-day Adventist school in Mozambique. Permission to operate the school was obtained in November 1940. Also for a number of years, Mrs. Webster operated a large dispensary. In 1941 Ernest P. Mansell was appointed to replace Webster, but he and his family were interned by the Japanese in the Philippines. After the war Mansell returned to the United States and later (1947) replaced Webster, who then returned to South Africa, after 13 years of pioneering work.

Until 1950 Mozambique was part of the Southern African Division, but in that year it became part of the Southern European Division. In 1953 the territory, known as the Portuguese East African Mission, became a detached mission in the Southern European Division, with headquarters in Lourenço Marques. In 1955 it was joined to the Angola Union to form the Portuguese African Union Mission, and in 1957 returned to its former detached status. In 1972 it was organized as a union mission. From Munguluni the mission work penetrated hitherto unentered sections, each with its own language. Thus new centers sprang up: Milange, 1954; Taquane, 1958; Mocuba, 1958; Marrucia, 1959; Mirriua, 1960; and Mecanelhas, 1963.

A new dispensary at Munguluni was opened Sept. 17, 1958, and another in Marrucia, September 1963. With funds supplied by a Thirteenth Sabbath Offering overflow in 1960, two more houses were built at Munguluni, and water and electricity were installed.

New work was begun in Beira by an office clerk, Daniel Harawa, who became an SDA in 1951 as a result of taking a Bible correspondence course. From a company formed in Beira, two others developed—one in Chemba, in the north near the Zambesi, and the other in Mabote in the south.

The Seventh-day Adventist church in Lourenço Marques stemmed from a family from Mauritius named Lamarque, who had come in 1918 and had kept the Sabbath in their home. They were later joined by a family named Inocentes, who had come from Lisbon in 1935, in whose home Webster had stayed because they were SDAs. The families had received publications from the Cape. With the establishment in Lourenço Marques in 1953 of the headquarters of the Mozambique Mission, the group meeting in the Lamarque family revived, and in October 1954 S. J. Graa settled in Lourenço Marques to work primarily among the Europeans. The next year a church of 22 members was organized. A rented house was adapted for a meeting hall and mission office. A church building, purchased by a Thirteenth Sabbath Offering overflow in 1960, was dedicated in 1963. P. B. Ribeiro became mission director in 1963. In April 1970 A. C. Lopes became the president. One year later he left and the treasurer, Joao dos Santos, was named acting president until Henrique Berg, the first Brazilian missionary to Mozambique, arrived in May 1972.

On Aug. 8, 1972, action was taken with division representation for the Mozambique Mission to be organized as a union mission, effective Jan. 1, 1973.

With the arrival of colporteur Lucio Soares in 1944 in Lourenço Marques the publishing work began. A radio correspondence school was organized in 1951, and reported 2,146 applications during 1973.

After years of strife, the Adventist Church in Mozambique now operates freely without major problems incurred by war. During the most intense time of war about 10,000 SDAs migrated to Malawi for safety. In 1994 they were returning and being reintegrated into the country. The goal was to reach a membership of 100,000 by the union's sixtieth anniversary in 1995.

Mozambique Adventist Seminary

MOZAMBIQUE ADVENTIST SEMINARY (Seminario Adventista do Setimo Dia de Mocambique). A coeducational boarding and day school operated by the Mozambique Union Mission, which forms part of the Euro-Africa Division. At its beginning the school was situated in the Zambesi district of Mozambique, on a 250-acre (100-hectare) tract of land about halfway between the Malawi border and the port of Quelimane, 187 miles (300 kilometers) distant. In 1963—1964 there were 25 students in secondary classes, and a teaching staff of four (two Europeans and two Africans). The school trains African ministers and teachers for Mozambique as well as helpers for the dispensaries.

The Seventh-day Adventist educational work in Mozambique began at Munguluni with the arrival in 1939 of Carlos Gouveia, of Portugal, as the first teacher for the mission. His work was officially recognized by a government order that was dated Nov. 6, 1940. When for health reasons Gouveia had to return to Portugal, the responsibility for carrying forward the educational work fell to the African helpers. From 1948 to 1954 Samuel Graca and his wife, of Portugal, worked in the school.

In 1957 the preparatory course for teachers was organized by J. A. Morgado, with A. Caldeira as the first teacher. The school was officially recognized by law in June 1963, as the Adventist College of Munguluni. It provided two years preschool, three years elementary, two years primary, and three years preparatory courses for workers and teachers.

In September 1973 the training classes for workers and teachers were transferred from Munguluni to a newly acquired property at Manga, a few miles from the city of Beira, and was developed as a seminary for African workers in Mozambique.

Principals: J. A. Morgado, 1957—1961; J. N. Ramos, 1961—1967; Joao Santos, 1967—1971; A. G. Lopes, 1971—1973; Armando Pires, 1973—1976; Bernardino Mabote, 1976—1978; Abilio Tungululo, 1978—1982; Victor R. Niconde, 1982—1990; Girimoio Muchanga, 1990— .

Mozambique Publishing House

MOZAMBIQUE PUBLISHING HOUSE (Livraria da Igreja Adventista do Setmo Dia de Mocambique). A publishing house established in 1963 at Lourenço Marques (now Maputo), Mozambique. Its first publication was a hymnal that was printed in June 1972, in Manhaua dialect. The adult Sabbath school quarterly followed at the end of 1973 and a Xitswa hymnal in February 1974. Most of the literature in Portuguese is imported from Angola, Brazil, and Portugal.

Managers: J. A. Morgado, 1963—1966; A. C. Lopes, 1966—1970; J. B. dos Santos, 1970—1976; B. Mabote, 1976—1980; J. M. da Costa, 1980—1981; D. Mesa, 1981—1982; B. Muabsa, 1982—1986; A. Coroa, 1986—1994; C. Fabiao, 1994— .

Mpofu, Peter Fayi

MPOFU, PETER FAYI (1866—1969). Pioneer national worker. In 1899, five years after the founding of Solusi Mission, Pastor Mpofu began service with the mission as a teacher and evangelist. With overseas pioneers, he was instrumental in establishing mission work in parts of Rhodesia and Zambia, accompanying Pastor W. H. Anderson on many safaris into unentered territory. He passed to his rest at 103 years of age.

Muderspach, Frithjof Hartvig

MUDERSPACH, FRITHJOF HARTVIG (1900—1960). Missionary in Africa. Born in Denmark, he accepted the Seventh-day Adventist faith in 1915, and was baptized by his father. Upon completing high school, he worked for a time in the Book and Bible House in Stockholm, Sweden. Later he took the nurse's course and met Borghild Kristine Willadssen, also a trained nurse, whom he married on Dec. 20, 1924. In 1925 they were called to Africa, where they spent the next 35 years, except for three years during which Muderspach was departmental secretary in the East Denmark Conference.

The Muderspachs went first to Utimbaru Mission among the Wakuria people in Tanganyika (Tanzania) near Lake Victoria. Here and at the Ikizu Mission the Muderspachs lived for seven years. Returning from furlough in 1933, they accepted a call to Uganda, where he worked for 13 years. Here he was closely associated with V. E. Toppenberg, and took over the field when Toppenberg, losing his wife by death, was forced to leave.

In 1946 the Muderspachs returned to Denmark, where he underwent an operation for a troublesome hip complaint. It was at this time that he served the local conference for three years. However, not being happy away from Africa, and despite his continued physical pain, he set out once again for Africa. The last 10 years of his life were spent as director of Gendia Mission and of several other missions in Kenya, president of the Uganda Mission, director of the Majita Station (Tanganyika), and finally director of the Utimbaru Mission Station, the station where he and his wife had worked 30 years previously.

On the afternoon of Apr. 28, 1960, Muderspach, with an African worker, Pastor Manjali, was returning to Utimbaru from a workers' meeting at the field headquarters at Busegwe. Six miles (10 kilometers) from home they came to a familiar ford. The night was dark, and it was not possible to see that a heavy rain in the hills during the afternoon had caused the water to rise dangerously. The car was picked up and carried downstream into a deep pool of water, and both men were drowned. A few days later the two workers were laid to rest side by side at Utimbaru Mission, amid expressions of deep sorrow from Europeans and Africans alike.

Mugonero Hospital

MUGONERO HOSPITAL (Hôpital de Mugonero). A 104-bed general hospital situated on land granted by the government on the shores of Lake Kivu in Rwanda, approximately 20 miles (32 kilometers) south of the town of Kibuye. The site is less than three degrees south of the equator and its elevation is 5,850 feet (1,800 meters). It is owned and operated by the Rwanda Union Mission. The present compound consists of several buildings. The hospital building houses general medicine, surgery, and traumatology, with general and semiprivate rooms. The administrative building houses also a library, central stock, and laboratory. Other buildings include an outpatients' dispensary, a nutritional center, maternity, maintenance, laundry, kitchen, three houses, five apartments, 15 worker's houses. There is also a farm and a brick factory on the compound.

On staff at the hospital are a medical director, two staff physicians, two medical assistants, 14 nurses, 11 trained ward aides, and a corps of nonmedical personnel.

During 1992 the hospital had 3,350 admissions, 9,935 outpatients' consultations, 5,310 visits to the nutritional center, 11,631 vaccinations, and 998 surgeries.

Through the years the hospital has offered courses for training ward aides. A midwife training course was given from 1959 to 1972, preparing the students to sit for examinations set by the government educational and medical departments. A four-year training course for medical assistants was offered from 1969 to 1972. Training for nurses aides began in 1973, and in 1983 nursing instruction was established. In 1984 Mugonero Nursing School was created by the hospital as an independent institution that also belongs to the Rwanda Union Mission. In 1992 the hospital started a program of continuing education for nurses, nurse's aides, and ward assistants.

Medical work at Mugonero was established in September 1931, when Dr. J. H. Sturges began to treat patients in front of the tent in which he was living while supervising the making of bricks, the cutting of sod for a temporary dwelling house, and the gathering of materials for the construction of permanent buildings. In October he was joined by his family and a builder, and construction began in earnest. In December A. Matter came as superintendent of the mission station. In 1933 the first ward was completed.

The original staff consisted of J. H. Sturges, physician, and Marie Matter, the first matron and nurse.

Medical Directors: J. H. Sturges, 1931—1934; G. H. Beckner, 1935—1940; L. K. Rittenhouse, 1940—1945; F. L. Visser, 1945—1947; R. S. Newbold, 1947—1950; L. K. Rittenhouse, 1950—1952; R. S. Mugonero School of Nursing Science

MUGONERO SCHOOL OF NURSING SCIENCE (École des Sciences Infirmières de Mugonero). A nursing school established in 1939 in Rwanda, eight years after the opening of the Mugonero (formerly Ngoma) Hospital. It remained an administrative unit of the hospital until 1984.

The two-year nursing school was first directed by Ruth Brown. The six graduates in 1941 were the first national graduates in nursing. This training continued until 1960.

In 1959 Ruth Brown started a two-year midwifery school. It was discontinued in 1972. The graduates were permitted to sit for the national exams and received officially recognized diplomas. Meanwhile Miss Naomi Bullard had launched a four-year nursing school. Only students with three years of secondary education were registered. Eleven students who graduated in 1972 were granted state-recognized certificates. After 1972, with the same admission requirement, the training continued under the leadership of Naomi Bullard until 1981. Then Cairn Beck, who took over the leadership from Naomi Bullard, reverted back to the two-year program because of a lack of teachers. The training continued until 1983. In 1976 the school was recognized formally by the government.

In 1981 a government education reform brought a new requirement: a six-year school system on the secondary level. Consequently the two-year training was discontinued in 1983 and replaced by a six-year formal nursing school. Because of limited facilities, at the beginning, students were admitted every other year until 1987. From then on the admissions were done annually. In 1993 the school became a full secondary school with all six classes. The first graduation of 18 students took place in June 1989, then two more graduations were held in 1991 and 1993. Graduations will now take place annually.

As a result of the anticipated student intake, the union committee took an action in June 1984 to separate this institution administratively from the hospital. The first director of the school since it became autonomous was Colin Richardson, an Australian. He was replaced in 1989 by Jean Nkuranga, the first national to head the school.

Principals: N. Bullard, 1968—1982; R. Lonser, 1982—1983; J. Olmedo, 1983—1984; Z. Ndoreraho, 1984—1988; Colin Richardson, 1988—1989; J. Nkuranga, 1989— .

Munson, Ralph Waldo

MUNSON, RALPH WALDO (1859—1934). Pioneer Seventh-day Adventist missionary in Indonesia. Educated at Oberlin College, he was sent by the Methodists to British India and Burma in 1886. A year later he joined the staff of the Anglo-Chinese Mission School in Singapore and became proficient in the Malay language. While in Singapore he heard an exposition of the prophecies relating to the second coming of Christ, which aroused his interest. Returning to the United States on furlough, he went to Battle Creek Sanitarium for treatments and while there accepted SDA teachings. In 1898 or 1899 he volunteered for mission service and in 1900 opened SDA work on the island of Sumatra. Because of his son's illness he moved to Australia in 1905, where he preached and translated many SDA publications into the Malay language. In 1909 he went to Java and worked there until Mrs. Munson's health made necessary their return to Australia in 1911 and to America several years later. Next he worked with L. J. Burgess and J. S. James on the preparation of basic texts of the Spirit of Prophecy for translation into Asian languages. He also lectured at Pacific Union College. After retirement he served as chaplain of St. Helena and Glendale sanitariums for more than 10 years and then pastored several churches.

Murwillumbah Seventh-day Adventist High School

MURWILLUMBAH SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST HIGH SCHOOL. A coeducational day school, K-12, situated on the outskirts of the rural township of Murwillumbah in the Tweed Valley of the far north coast of New South Wales, Australia. The school is operated by the North New South Wales Conference and draws students and support from eight churches in the Tweed-Byron region. In 1993 there was a high school enrollment of 128, with a staff of 10 full-time and four part-time teachers, and a primary enrollment of 100, with four full-time and two part-time teachers.

Seventh-day Adventist education in the district began in 1958 when a one-room primary school was opened under the Murwillumbah church. This expanded into a new building at the rear of the church in 1962 along with the addition of junior secondary grades.

In 1972, as a consequence of a series of providential events, a 32-acre (13-hectare) site was purchased on the outskirts of Murwillumbah. A new junior high school on this site was first occupied in 1974. A freestanding facility for the primary department was opened in 1977.

The school acquired full high school status in 1980 and is currently accredited with both the General Conference Board of Regents and the NSW Ministry of Education. The school offers a broad curriculum and flexible course structure to the New South Wales Higher School Certificate level.

MV Society Leadership and Membership. The Senior MV Society, "the youth church within the church," was staffed by officers elected by the church, composed of the leader, assistant leader, secretary-treasurer, sponsor, chorister, and accompanist; and others elected by the society, a devotional secretary, an educational secretary, a fellowship or social secretary, band leaders, a publicity secretary, and a servicemen's secretary. These officers, with the Junior MV superintendent, the church missionary leader, and the church pastor and/or elder, formed the MV executive committee, which directed all the work and planning of the MV Society. Membership in the Senior MV Society (ages 16 to 30, but including persons over 30 who carried MV leadership responsibilities) was of two kinds: regular, for young people who were members of the Seventh-day Adventist Church; and associate, for other young people with Christian ideals who wanted to join.

The Junior MV (JMV) Society also offered two kinds of membership: preparatory, for children under 10 who were old enough to understand the purposes of the society; and regular, for boys and girls 10 to 16 who understood the JMV ideals and who knew by memory and declared their allegiance to the JMV Pledge and Law.

The Junior Society was guided by a superintendent elected by the church, usually an elementary teacher, since most JMV Societies were conducted in the church school. Other officers elected by the society from their own group were a leader, a secretary-treasurer, a pianist or organist, and unit captains. These comprised the executive committee for planning programs and activities.

A supplementary organization for juniors was the Pathfinder Club, which extended the program of the JMV Society with particular emphasis on physical activities and various skills. Pathfinder Club officers were the director and deputy directors, elected by the church; and counselors, instructors, unit captains, and unit scribes, appointed by the staff. Pathfinder Clubs are still active in the Seventh-day Adventist Church.

Activities

Activities. The Senior MV Society's objectives were best revealed by the variety of features in four classifications:

Devotional: Personal devotional reading plans, such as the Morning Watch, the Bible Year and Encounter, were promoted. A group devotional activity was the MV Week of Prayer, conducted annually in the spring.

Educational: Leadership training included the youth ministry training courses, the Pathfinder Staff Training Course, and the extensive requirements for the rank of Master Guide. Other educational features of the society were the MV Book Club, MV Honors, nature clubs, and hobby clubs; also youth Bible conferences and courses in Bible doctrines and denominational history called Heritage of Truth.

Share Your Faith: The devotional and educational features were preparatory to participation in the society's supreme goal, expressed in its slogan, Share Your Faith. Under this heading was a great diversity of ideas and services. Some of the better known were MV Voice of Youth (public evangelism); Friendship Teams (neighborhood personal evangelism); IN Groups; Literature and Correspondence Bands; various MV Community Services bands for prison, hospital, rest home, and orphanage work (see "Share Your Faith").

Fellowship: Youth congresses and rallies, social gatherings, MV camps, nature exploration, and all other acceptable forms of recreation.

For most of the MV features here named, guidance literature was provided by the Youth Department. Members of the Junior MV Society participated in such of these as were suitable for their age.

Meetings

Meetings. The local MV Societies, both senior and junior, and the Pathfinder Club usually met once a week. Program material for the meetings and leadership guidance were provided in the quarterly magazine Youth Ministry Resources. Youth officers planned the programs; members of the groups participated in speeches, interviews, quizzes, panel discussions, and other programs, dealing with Christian ideals, religion, missions, church history, methods of service, cultural subjects, and nature.

Since the MV Society was, by definition, organized for "Missionary Volunteering," the weekly meeting was the time also for presenting plans, recruiting participants, and for reporting on the progress of projects connected with lay evangelism.

Aim, Motto, and Pledge

Aim, Motto, and Pledge. The blueprint for MV activities was found in the Aim, Motto, and Pledge. For the Senior Society these were:

Aim—The Advent Message to All the World in This Generation.

Motto—The Love of Christ Constrains Us.

Pledge—Loving the Lord Jesus, I promise to take an active part in the work of the Young People's Missionary Volunteer Society, doing what I can to help others and to finish the work of the gospel in all the world.

Pledge and Law

Pledge and Law. The Junior Missionary Volunteer Society and the Pathfinder Club were guided by a Pledge and Law.

The JMV Pledge: By the grace of God, I will be pure and kind and true. I will keep the JMV Law. I will be a servant of God and a friend to man.

The JMV Law: The Junior Missionary Volunteer Law is for me to—1. Keep the Morning Watch. 2. Do my honest part. 3. Care for my body. 4. Keep a level eye. 5. Be courteous and obedient. 6. Walk softly in the sanctuary. 7. Keep a song in my heart. 8. Go on God's errands.

Societies under the MV name and organization date from 1907. In this year plans for a Young People's Department were made in a General Conference Council at Gland, Switzerland; and later in the same year at Mount Vernon, Ohio, the new department was named the Young People's Missionary Volunteer Department. This department gave the societies their name and organization. In 1972 the name of the department was officially changed to Youth Department of Missionary Volunteers.

MV Societies in Colleges

MV Societies in Colleges. The MV Society was the center of the missionary activities of the school. The college society was of strategic importance, since the colleges attracted the talented group of SDA young people, those who after graduation become the leaders of churches and institutions. One important purpose of the school MV Societies was to send out graduates filled with the spirit of service and a desire to help the young people in the local churches. The sponsoring of a student missionary by the college MV Society was one North American project to promote interest in the worldwide work of the church. (See AY Societies.)

Mwami Adventist Hospital

MWAMI ADVENTIST HOSPITAL. A 210-bed general hospital and a leprosarium, situated on a 3,035-acre (1,230-hectare) tract, about 20 miles (32 kilometers) from Chipata, Zambia. It is owned and operated by the Zambia Union. The present staff consists of four doctors, six clinical officers, two tutors, one matron, eight midwives, seven registered nurses, 24 enrolled nurses, four laboratory staff, two radiographers, one hospital administrator, one chaplain, one maintenance supervisor, six clerical staff, a treasurer, and two accountants.

The land for Mwami Mission and the hospital was purchased on Oct. 2, 1925, and two years later Dr. E. G. Marcus arrived and began medical work. The first surgical operations were performed in the open air under a mosquito net. Later E. B. Jewell came to teach the two-year, and later yet, the three-year medical assistant's training course. When the leper colony was established the lepers were housed in small huts. However, by 1950 A. V. Bambury carried through a steady building program that provided permanent accommodations for 400.

Under the supervision of Dr. O. B. Beardsley, the general hospital building was completed in 1952. In 1953 an affiliation program was arranged with Malamulo Hospital, and the first year of the ward assistant's course for Africans was taught at Mwami. A regular nurse's training course was opened in 1962.

A development scheme was worked out for investing £120,000 in a general hospital. The final part of this program was completed in 1973 with the official opening of an outpatients' unit. The maternity wing, a staff nurses' house, and the new laundry building were also completed. The total number of deliveries in the new maternity wing exceeded 600 in the first year.

Later on a US$1.6 million building program was carried out. In 1989 a 36-bed eye center was completed; a new pediatric wing, six staff houses, a new outpatient facility, and a new fence around the hospital were also completed. In September 1991 the final part of the project was finished.

Medical Directors/Administrators: E. G. Marcus, 1927—1930; J. Janzen, 1931—1934; no doctor, 1934—1948; J. A. Hay, 1948; O. B. Beardsley, 1948—1954; P. G. Peach, 1954—1957; C. Blaine, 1957; K. Myaing, Tha

MYAING, THA (1874—1954). Minister. A Karen, born of Christian parents in the village of Ah Seh in the delta country of Burma (now Myanmar), he was educated in a Christian village school, and in young manhood became a village evangelist for the Baptists.

In 1916 he met Robert A. Beckner and learned the Seventh-day Adventist faith from him. He was baptized in 1917 by Charles F. Lowry, and in 1918 began to work with Eric B. Hare on the Karen mission station at Kamamaung, on the Salween River. He was ordained in 1927.

He was most skillful in reciting the old Karen folklore poems about the Creation, the Fall of man, the coming of the younger brother with the golden book, and the home of the saved, and he won converts wherever he went.

Walking throughout the mountain country of Lower Burma, he often suffered weariness, hunger, and peril by bandits and the vicissitudes of war. At the age of 80, while returning from a preaching tour, he was killed in a passenger bus that met with an accident.

Myanmar

MYANMAR (formerly Burma). A military republic in Southeast Asia bounded on the northwest by Bangladesh and India, on the northeast by China, on the southeast by Laos and Thailand, and on the southwest by the Bay of Bengal. It has an area of 261,789 square miles (678,034 kilometers) and a population (1994) of 44.3 million. The Burmese, who are racially related to Tibetans, comprise more than two thirds of the population. The rest is made up of Shans, Karens, Kachins, Chins, Kayahs, Rakhines, Mons, and relatively recent immigrants from India, Thailand, and China. The state religion is Buddhism. The minority groups practice Hinduism, Islam, Taoism, and Confucianism. Christianity (largely Baptist and Roman Catholic) has gained its greatest number of adherents among the Karens and Chins. The language of the country is Burmese, belonging to the Tibeto-Chinese group of languages, but unlike Chinese, it is written with an alphabet of 11 vowels and 32 consonants. Myanmar (then Burma) was founded in the eleventh century A.D.; later it was overrun by the Mongols. From the middle of the eighteenth to the second half of the nineteenth centuries, Myanmar again was independent; then it was annexed to British India. It became independent in 1948, but since then has been constantly beset by insurgency. The name of the country was changed from Burma to Myanmar in 1989.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. Begin-nings. SDA work in Myanmar (then Burma) began in 1902, when Herbert B. Meyers, who had become a Seventh-day Adventist in Calcutta, India, and A. G. Watson entered the country to sell SDA books and take subscriptions to the Oriental Watchman among the Europeans and English-speaking Burmese. The people were so interested that Meyers began giving Bible studies, and eventually held regular evangelistic meetings, working in Myanmar for the next several years. Soon after his arrival, he met a Christian woman named Daw May (whose mother, it seems, was baptized by Judson, a pioneer Christian missionary in Myanmar), who through reading the Bible had become convinced some two years previous that the seventh-day Sabbath is the true day of worship. Next he met her brother, Maung Maung, who upon joining the Seventh-day Adventist Church gave up a position with the government and devoted himself to the gospel work among the Burmese. For the next two years he worked at his own expense, gathering a group of converts. In 1904 the converts began to raise a fund to support a permanent preacher, and Maung Maung went to the general meeting of the SDA workers in India to plead for a worker. In response, Heber H. Votaw was sent from India, and the Burma Mission was established in 1905. He immediately began a program of evangelism with the help of Maung Maung, David Hpo Hla, and other national workers and devoted laypersons, and the church membership began to grow. In the same year the first tract in Burmese, The Commandments of God, Written Not in Tablets of Stone, but in Fleshly Tablets of the Heart, written by Maung Maung, was published, apparently at the expense of the church members, who made every effort to make the mission work self-supporting. According to W. A. Spicer's Our Story of Missions (p. 320), L. F. Hansen, who pioneered SDA medical work in Myanmar, was in Votaw's mission party. It is probable that Hansen did not remain long. However, permanent SDA medical work was begun by Dr. Ollie Oberholtzer in 1907 at Mawlamyine. Later she worked among the Shans in the interior. In 1914 F. A. Wyman and his wife opened treatment rooms in Yangon (then Rangoon).

The first Seventh-day Adventist church in Myanmar was organized in 1907 in Yangon, with 23 members. Later a group was formed at Meiktila, where an interest had been aroused by a telegraph operator who had been transferred there and who, knowing something about SDAs, talked to his neighbors about SDA beliefs. The Buddhists of the area, impressed with what he told them of the SDA educational philosophy, which stressed the training of the head, the hand, and the heart, asked that a school be established for their children. They even undertook to raise funds to help finance the institution. Thus in 1909 the Meiktila Industrial School (Toungoo High School) was founded, with R. B. Thurber as principal.

In 1910 Mary Gibbs began language study in order to work among the Karen people. In 1915 G. A. Hamilton established a Karen mission station at Ohndaw. A few months later Eric B. Hare and his wife joined them, taking charge of the work. The success of the Ohndaw school led to the opening of SDA schools in other Karen villages. The training given in these schools produced strong workers, who later helped to develop the work. In 1920 Mary Gibbs, who had married A. J. Denoyer, established a girls' school (called Taikgyi Girls' School) that, according to the Yearbook, continued until 1929.

In 1908 a plan to sell Burmese gospel literature, an innovation in Christian mission work in Myanmar, was inaugurated; R. A. Beckner took charge of this work. In 1912 the journal Kin Saung ("The Watchman") was launched under Beckner's editorship.

Organization and Growth. In 1919 the Burma Union, composed of the Irrawaddy Delta Mission, the Rangoon and Upper Burma Mission, and the Tenasserim Mission (now southeast mission) was organized. From then until World War II the work grew gradually. In 1922 there were six churches, with 182 members. There were three stations outside Yangon, and seven schools with the total attendance of about 420 pupils. There were 11 Sabbath schools. In Yangon there were three churches (one was English), with a total membership of about 50, another Burmese, with a membership of 19, and a third Telegu, with a membership of 17. By 1922 the Publishing Department had produced in Burmese Bible Readings and two 100-page books. A songbook was ready for the printers, and it was voted to publish Ellen White's Steps to Christ. These were in Burmese. In Karen, Hare had put out a history of the Sabbath and a large tract on the second coming of Christ, and had a manuscript nearly ready for a book titled On the Other Side of Death. The Karen publishing work was done on a duplicator.

In 1924 the work extended to northern Myanmar when H. A. Skinner opened a station among the Taungthu people. Another Karen station was established at Myaungmya by F. A. Wyman in 1927.

In 1939 there were 25 schools with 43 teachers and 949 students. Meiktila had 220 students, of whom 93 were SDAs or of SDA parentage; there were 75 students at Myaungmya and 74 at Ohndaw. The Publishing Department was issuing in Burmese the magazine Kin Saung ("The Watchman") and subscription books in Burmese and Karen. One nursing home, Maymyo Brightlands, was in operation, with Mrs. Tarleton in charge. Eight Burmese students had gone to India, some to Spicer Missionary College, others to the Nuzvid nursing school. Four nurses were training in Shanghai. Experience and Views by Ellen White was published, the first of her books to be published in that country. The next year, 1940, Dr. I. S. Walker opened a small medical center in Yangon. On Dec. 31, 1941, Myanmar had 898 members and 1,441 Sabbath school members.

During World War II missionaries stayed by into early 1942, but eventually had to leave. They made their way through the jungle to India.

Many of the Anglo-Indian members also made their way to India. The workers who remained endured many difficulties, including imprisonment, torture, and in some cases death. Some took refuge in the jungle, eking out a living and courageously traveling up and down the rivers among villages to encourage the members and baptize new converts.

After the war the missionaries returned and immediately made plans to build a strong evangelistic, publishing, educational, and medical work. A number of young people went to Spicer College in India to complete a delayed education.

Postwar Developments. For some three years following independence (1948), unrest in outlying districts hampered the work of the church. In 1947, with funds from a Thirteenth Sabbath Offering overflow, an old hotel was purchased in Yangon and converted into a sanitarium under the direction of Dr. J. C. Johannes. This developed into a 115-bed hospital. Work began in the Kinsaung Press in Yangon on May 28, 1950. In April 1953 a group of workers visited the Chin Hills near India, and shortly afterward A. E. Anderson pioneered the work there. By 1963 this area had 16 churches with more than 400 members.

For a time the Myaungmya school served as the high school for Myanmar young people. When facilities there became inadequate, with the help of rehabilitation funds allocated by the General Conference, the high school was transferred to Kyauktaing near Taungngu in May 1957.

To meet the need for training workers, the Burma Union Bible Seminary was opened in 1960, with 15 enrolled for a two-year course, and with W. W. Christensen as principal.

A Voice of Prophecy Bible Correspondence School was opened on Mar. 21, 1951, with Mrs. J. O. Wilson as director. To English courses it subsequently added Burmese, Karen, Hualngo, and Chinese courses.

At one time after the war there were 26 overseas workers in the country. When the revolutionary government came into power, overseas workers were asked to leave the country permanently. During 1965 a complete change was made in the leadership of the union, and for the first time leadership was placed in the hands of the national workers. The three union officers were Kay Paw, president; Tun Sein, secretary; Pein Kyi, treasurer.

The following institutions were nationalized during this period: Myaungmya Middle School, Paan Middle School, Rangoon Adventist Hospital, Toungoo High School.

Myanmar Union Adventist Seminary

MYANMAR UNION ADVENTIST SEMINARY. A school for ministers offering a three-year course, operated at Myaungmya by the Myanmar Union Mission. In 1960 the first class of the Bible seminary school was opened. W. W. Christensen was the director. In 1965 his health failed and he was forced to return to the United States. F. C. Wyman was appointed as the director. After serving for a few months, he was required to leave the country. Brown Kia was then appointed as director.

Between 1960 and 1972, 168 students attended the seminary classes. From the 1973 seminary year, two classes preparatory to the seminary course were added, and the seminary program became a three-year course, equivalent to the junior college level. The seminary opened on June 17 for the term 1974—1975, with 83 young people enrolled in the three classes.

Directors: W. W. Christensen, 1960—1965; F. C. Wyman, 1965; Brown Kia, 1966—1970; Kyaw Din I, 1971—1973; Kyaw Sein Pe, 1974—1976; V. Kipzanang, 1975—1978; Yan Aye, 1978—1991; Herbert Sein, 1992— .

NADEN, LAURENCE CHRISTOPHER (1906—1979). Evangelist, radio speaker. Born in Rotorua, New Zealand, and educated at New Zealand Missionary College (now Longburn Adventist College), he served as a pastor/evangelist. He was a pioneer of religious broadcasting in Australia and in 1937 became speaker of the Advent Radio Network based in Sydney. He served as president of South New Zealand Conference from 1939—1941 and of West Australian Conference from 1941 to 1943. He headed the radio ministry of the church in the South Pacific Division (then Australasian Division) until 1954, when he was appointed secretary of the division. Beginning in 1962, he served as president of the division until 1970.

Naga View Academy

NAGA VIEW ACADEMY. An educational institution established to serve the educational needs of Seventh-day Adventist young people in the Bicol region. Its history began in 1954 when a 262-acre (106-hectare) lot situated 1,000 feet (300 meters) above sea level on the western slope of Mount Isarog, 11 miles (17 kilometers) from Naga City, “the heart of Bicol,” was purchased by the North Philippine Union Mission.

Neri M. Alcantara pioneered the agricultural work immediately after the purchase of the land, but Pastor Arsenio A. Poblete, the first principal, spearheaded the academic program. The school opened on July 19, 1965. There were only 62 students from first to third year with seven staff members. The following year it became a senior academy and 14 students participated in the first graduation in 1967. In 1969 a primary school was opened with seven pupils.

Naga View Academy became an extension campus of Philippine Union College in 1971 under Pastor Juanito B. Villagomez. The enrollment rose from 105 to 273, while the staff members increased from seven to 17. Students moved from the administration building to the big dormitories; faculty homes were built. On Sept. 11, 1971, the water reservoir was opened and water flowed into the campus. On Oct. 8, 1973, the first and second years of both the Vocational Agricultural course and the Institutional Maintenance course were recognized. This was followed by the recognition of the first and second years of the liberal arts course in 1975. In 1979 the campus was “electrified.” In 1984 an auditorium was constructed under the administration of the late Aaron M. Salazar. During this period the two-year junior secretarial course was recognized.

In 1988 the liberal arts course recognition was granted by Region V DECS officials, and in April 1990 one of the greatest and most memorable events was recorded in the history of Naga View when five students received their diplomas granting them the bachelor’s degree in elementary education.

In 1991 the institution returned to the academy level.

Namibia

NAMIBIA. A vast, sparsely populated country on the South Atlantic coast of Africa. It is bordered by Botswana on the east, by South Africa on the south, and by Angola on the north. Windhoek is the capital city. The country has a population (1994) of about 1.6 million, 60 percent of whom live in the north. There are 14 cultural groups. English is the official language, but Afrikaans is spoken by the majority of the people.

Namibia became a German protectorate in the late 1800s. In 1915 the Germans surrendered the country to the South African forces. On Dec. 17, 1920, the League of Nations entrusted Namibia (then South-West Africa) as a mandate territory to South Africa.

After World War II the United Nations rejected South Africa's request to incorporate South-West Africa into South Africa. South Africa in turn refused to place the area under UN guardianship. This led to an international dispute with cries for independence growing stronger in the 1960s, finally triggering the Liberation War, which lasted for more than 20 years.

In 1978 the Western Contact group submitted a proposal to the United Nations to settle the Namibian dispute. The settlement plan was accepted by South Africa and the South-West Africa People's Organization. On Mar. 21, 1990, Namibia became independent.

Education became a priority for the long-term development of Namibia. Freedom of religion was adopted through the Bill of Fundamental Rights. About 90 percent of the population is Christian, with the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Namibia being the largest in the country.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. Seventh-day Adventism in Namibia dates back to 1937 and 1938 when Pastor J. van der Merwe conducted the first evangelistic campaign in Windhoek. Five people were baptized. For nearly two decades no further work was done in Namibia, or South-West Africa, as it was then called. The few members were cared for by Pastor S. Fourie, who was the pastor of the Uppington church. During that time two colporteurs, D. A. deBeer and W. van Heerden, were sent to strengthen the work in the area.

In 1954 the South West Africa Field was organized, and Pastor J. J. Bekker was appointed as the first president. He was the only pastor living in South-West Africa. He continued to labor until his sudden death in 1965. Since then nine other presidents have served the field. The membership has been slow but steady.

During the early years the work in Namibia was mostly confined to the central part of the country. During 1961 some of the members felt a burden to expand the work to Ovambo land, the most northern part of Namibia. A dedicated layman, Tobias Amakalie, was asked to pioneer the work in that area. He labored there for 20 years and established the first Black church in Namibia. During the same period Pastor F. Arends was called to work in the Windhoek area and established the first Coloured church in the field.

Nanga-Eboko Adventist Secondary School

NANGA-EBOKO ADVENTIST SECONDARY SCHOOL (Séminaire Adventiste de Nanga-Eboko). A coeducational boarding school operated on the secondary level by the Central African Union Mission, under the Africa-Indian Ocean Division. It is situated on the 140-acre (60-hectare) property of the Nanga-Eboko Mission (the first mission established by Seventh-day Adventists in Cameroon) near the town of Nanga-Eboko, in the heart of Cameroon.

The school was officially established in 1950. Previous to its opening, from 1936 to 1948, missionaries Paul Bénézech, André Nion, Marius Fridlin, and Aimé Cosendai had conducted certain Bible and pedagogical courses. Under the direction of Paul Bernard the new school offered the first two years of secondary instruction followed by courses in Bible and teacher training. With the arrival in 1955 of Sylvain Meyer as principal, and of several European teachers, the school, which had been known as French Cameroon Training School, became known as the Séminaire Adventiste and began to give a training course for evangelists. In 1956 a new dormitory providing sleeping quarters, dining room for 30 young women, and living quarters for the preceptress was completed. In 1958 a course for the training of primary school teachers was opened by Raymond Liénard. Also beginning that year, home economics and woodwork courses were taught according to the official system of technical teaching.

In 1970 the second cycle of secondary studies was introduced and recognized by the state. In 1973 the home economics course was extended to four years, proceeding to a professional diploma in children's nursing. Also in 1973 the woodwork course was transferred to Sangmélima. In 1974 a pedagogical department was begun, leading to the state diploma of teaching (C.A.P.E.) studied in a Seventh-day Adventist environment for two years. With a view to upgrading the quality of the theological course, the Equatorial African Union Mission took action in 1967 to make Nanga-Eboko the main training school for well-prepared Bible workers and evangelists and established a prerequisite of four years of secondary schoolwork. In 1970 the Collège Biblique de Niamvoudou was transferred to Nanga-Eboko, and in 1974 the prerequisite for evangelists was lifted to university entrance or baccalaureate level.

Physical improvements were systematically made and include new large offices, eight modern classrooms, two laboratories, a dining room, a block of nine apartments for married students, and a large library. Ten houses were purchased for the use of the staff.

The seminary serves a wider field than its union territory and is now accepted as the college for the preparation of workers in francophone African territories. The General Conference allocated US$300,000 in 1974 to strengthen the pedagogy and theology departments and to erect an adequate dormitory for young men coming from at least three divisions of the world field. Students are enrolled from Cameroon, Ivory Coast, Senegal, Chad, Central African Republic, Equatorial Guinea, Republic of Congo, Zaïre, and Burundi. The majority of the workers in the Central African Union received their training at Nanga-Eboko.

In 1993 there was a faculty and staff of 17.

National Association of SDA Dentists, The NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF SDA DENTISTS, THE. The only denominationally oriented dental organization to be recognized by the American Dental Association. Its organizational meeting was held at Grand Ledge, Michigan, on Aug. 15, 1943. NASDAD's development was led by Dr. J. R. Mitchell and Dr. M. Webster Prince, who with 11 other dentists formed the charter membership.

After its development it soon became obvious that state and private dental schools would no longer be able to provide dental education for Seventh-day Adventist young people because of Sabbath problems and regional acceptance policies. Therefore, it became a major project of NASDAD to promote a school of dentistry at Loma Linda University. With the assistance of the organization, the dental school became a reality in 1951.

Since this time NASDAD has provided thousands of dollars for material for many church-operated dental facilities overseas.

National Committees for the Prevention of Alcoholism

NATIONAL COMMITTEES FOR THE PREVENTION OF ALCOHOLISM.

Groups of leading citizens in various countries organized to unite their efforts in helping to solve the problems resulting from the use of beverage alcohol. Seventh-day Adventists, because of their strong stand on this question, their concern for public safety and welfare, and their desire to cooperate closely with other organizations in improving personal and community well-being (see Health Principles), have taken an active role to assist in establishing these National Committees and making their service effective.

As a result of this cooperative effort, National Committees now function in many countries. The First World Congress of the International Commission, with representatives from the National Committees and others present, was held in Kabul, Afghanistan, in 1972.

The first National Committee to be established, and the model for the others, was the one in the United States. The membership of this committee consists of the board of trustees, five educators, five public health officials, five physicians, five clergymen representing five religious organizations, five businessmen, five judges, five prominent women, five statesmen, five editors, five temperance leaders representing five national organizations, and five additional graduates from recognized professional schools. Incorporated on Feb. 12, 1954, as an educational organization, the National Committee in the United States has been declared tax exempt by the Treasury Department.

Each National Committee furthers the study of the effects of alcohol on the individual and on the nation, especially by conducting seminars and Institutes of Scientific Studies in strategic areas that carry on research work and provide training in all phases of the alcohol problem, with the aim of pointing up an effective prevention program.

National Service Organization

NATIONAL SERVICE ORGANIZATION. That part of Adventist Chaplaincy Ministries concerned with preparing, counseling, and ministering to members of the church liable to, or called into, military service.

In the North American Division a separate organization within the church to function in this area originated during World War I, when Carlyle B. Haynes was called to be secretary of an agency called the War Service Commission. At the close of the war the office was inactivated. When World War II began Haynes was again called to this work. According to the Yearbook, the Commission on National Service and Medical Cadet Training was established in 1940; after about two years it was renamed the War Service Commission. Some overseas divisions of the church handled the work through the conference administrations or the Religious Liberty Department of the church.

In 1950 the International Commission for Medical Cadet Service (renamed the International Service Commission) was set up to sponsor training programs in other divisions similar to the Medical Cadet Corps program in North America. It was merged with the War Service Commission at the General Conference session of 1954 under the name National Service Organization. However, the name War Service Commission continued to be used in the North American Division for some eight years.

Civilian Chaplains. During World War I and World War II ministers of Seventh-day Adventist churches near military bases in the North American Division were asked to function as camp pastors, that is, to visit and assist members in uniform. When this work grew in volume, several ministers were assigned to this work on a full-time basis. In 1950, when United States military forces were again strengthened, the organization again called some ministers to full-time work for service personnel in areas in which there was a concentration of members in military service. After 1959 these were called civilian chaplains.

Servicemen's Centers. During World War I action was taken to establish a rest home in France as a center for American SDA service personnel, but the war closed before this could be accomplished. During World War II in the United States many temporary centers for service personnel were established by the church under the War Service Commission. When the basic training center for the United States Army Medical Service was opened at Fort Sam Houston in San Antonio, Texas, a large center for SDA service personnel was established near the larger SDA church in San Antonio. Many churches have provided simple accommodations for service personnel where they can observe the Sabbath quietly away from the military base.

After World War II, when it became evident that there would be many American service personnel stationed in Europe for some time, such a home was established in Frankfurt, Germany, with a civilian chaplain in charge. In 1975 service personnel centers were operated at San Antonio, Texas; Frankfurt, Germany; and Seoul, Korea.

National True Foods (PTY) Limited

NATIONAL TRUE FOODS (PTY) LIMITED. A health food company situated a few miles south of Johannesburg, formerly owned and operated by the South African Union Conference. The company had been founded by L. H. Clack, in 1950, as a private enterprise. The first five years were spent in experimentation with various food products, in the erection of the factory, and in the securing of the necessary machinery. Then in 1956 Clack contributed his majority interest in the company to the South African Union Conference of Seventh-day Adventists, but continued as general manager.

By 1961 the company had begun to operate with a profit, and its products were being sold throughout southern and eastern Africa. The quadrennial period ending in 1962 showed a production and sales turnover of almost 1 million units of health food.

During the next few years sales fluctuated, and consideration was given to closing the plant. However, early in 1972 action was taken to obtain loan funds to provide sufficient operating capital in order to expand production. During that year, under the management of H. Barham, sales doubled and the following year they doubled again to more than R230,000. This operating gain gave greater stability. During 1974, plans were made for a new factory on the grounds of Sedaven High School, near Heidelberg, Transvaal, South Africa.

This enterprise ceased operations in 1978 and reverted to private control under the original founder. The products are now known as Clack Foods.

Native Americans

NATIVE AMERICANS. Seventh-day Adventist interest in Native Americans dates from as early as 1857, when R. F. Cottrell and W. S. Ingraham preached and gave tracts to a group of Senecas near Mill Grove, New York.

Early Converts. The first-known Native American Seventh-day Adventists were probably a Chippewa couple of Pine City, Minnesota, who took their stand early in August 1893 under the efforts of W. B. Hill,

C. W. Parker, and J. F. Pogue (Review and Herald 70:538, Aug. 22, 1893).

The following year (1894) D. T. Bourdeau reported holding meetings, with encouraging results, among certain Oneidas of Wisconsin, to whom Louis Plante, a French colporteur, had been selling SDA publications (ibid. 71:668, Oct. 23, 1894).

About 1896 William W. Simpson and W. H. Spear, two licensed ministers of the Michigan Conference (which at that time included the province of Ontario), responded to a letter from an Iroquois (Six Nations) living on a reservation near Brantford, Ontario, requesting the visit of a preacher. They learned that he had begun to keep the Sabbath as the result of reading a book purchased from a colporteur several years before. The ministers held tent meetings near the reservation in 1897, and as a result an Iroquois church was organized the same year by J. H. Durland. Except for Simpson and Spear, the entire church membership consisted of Native Americans. This appears to have been the first Native American Seventh-day Adventist church (ibid. 74:700, Nov. 2, 1897; 74:618, Sept. 28, 1897).

In 1898 A. G. Smith, a Mohawk (Six Nations) chief, was baptized. During a camp meeting at Owosso, Michigan, which was attended by American Indian converts of Simpson and Spear, funds were raised by means of which Smith and another American Indian, Matthew Hill, were sent to Battle Creek College to be trained as traveling missionaries to the American Indians in Canada and the United States. Smith returned to Canada and worked among the American Indians of Southwold, Ontario, and was instrumental in establishing the Oneida church in 1900. Hill was instrumental in establishing a church of 25 members on the Oneida reservation in Wisconsin by the end of 1901.

In September 1903 William Covert reported a meeting of the Oneidas held at Oneida, Wisconsin, to which the two American Indian churches in Ontario sent representatives; at the time the combined membership of the three churches was 85 (ibid. 80:19, Oct. 15, 1903).

Navajos. In 1916 Orno Follett and his family opened work among the Navajo of the southwestern United States in the Smith's Lake region, north of Gallup, New Mexico. Two years later the General Conference Committee appointed a committee on the "American Indian Mission."

The same year (1918) the Texico Conference bought 640 acres (260 hectares) of land at Lake Grove, in New Mexico, on the Navajo reservation. A small school, a two-room dispensary, and other buildings were erected. Falling victim to the influenza epidemic, the first teacher died a few days after arriving. The wife of a second teacher, B. W. Lowry, likewise fell victim and died after being there only a short time. The school term was finished by a Navajo teacher, Helen Begay, and later by Mrs. Follett. This school continued to operate until 1927. Follett worked among the Navajos until 1924, when his health broke, and he was replaced by O. W. Wolfe. After about three years the Wolfes were forced to leave for the same reason. The Folletts, who in the meantime had regained their health partially, returned and directed the mission from time to time for the next four or five years. During this time the Folletts opened missionary work among the Maricopa of Phoenix, Arizona.

In 1933 the American Indian work in North America was placed under the Bureau of Home Missions. After the Folletts left the Native American work for the last time the Lake Grove Mission was sold and Seventh-day Adventist work for the Navajos was at a standstill for several years. This work was revived in 1941 by Marvin Walter and has extended to the Navajos of other states (see Holbrook Seventh-day Adventist Indian Mission School; Monument Valley Hospital; Nevada-Utah Conference).

Other Tribes. In 1936 F. M. Robinson and his wife opened work among the American Indians of Oklahoma. They were followed by Oscar Padget and Calvin D. Smith, and later (1945) by A. W. Wennerberg. Frank Webb, a Chippewa from Minnesota, sold SDA publications for 25 years among the American Indians of Oklahoma and was known as the “Indian preacher.”

Work among the American Indians was also carried on in upper Michigan. Among the Chippewas at Zeba, Michigan, beginning in 1910, a school was conducted by Mrs. Harry (Armilda) Clausen for several years.

Among the Lakotas SDA work was established by such workers as Calvin D. Smith, Carl Brown, and E. L. Marley. A Lakota convert named Blackhoop translated The Bible Made Plain into Lakota.

In 1970 Tom Holiday became the first North American SDA Indian worker (Navajo) to be ordained to the gospel ministry. Bud Haycock, another educated Navajo, served as his able assistant.

Seventh-day Adventists have conducted American Indian work in other places, which are dealt with in articles on North American Division Conferences. Nauru

NAURU. An island in the Western Pacific 30 miles (48 kilometers) south of the equator. It was administered by Australia until 1968, when it was granted independence. It is now a republic.

With a land area of only eight and a quarter square miles (21 square kilometers), the island has as its only natural resource rich phosphate deposits, which are now mined by the Nauru Phosphate Commission, and worked by Kiribati and Tuvalu laborers and some Chinese workers. The population also includes Australians and New Zealanders, who work in offices and other specialized fields. The people all live along the 200-yard (180-meter) coastal strip that circles the island. In 1994 the population was 10,000.

The republic of Nauru boasts an airline and a shipping company. Throughout the years, Kiribati, Tuvalu, and Solomon Islander Seventh-day Adventist laity have worked in Nauru. There is an established company church in Nauru. During 1972 a budget was provided for evangelism and a visitation program was begun. At present SDA people are visited for a few weeks three or four times a year by a visiting pastor, and SDA work is almost entirely among the changing Kiribati, Tuvalu, and Solomon Islands working force. Nauru is assigned to the Kiribati Mission, a part of the Western Pacific Union Mission, which in turn is a part of the South Pacific Division. Statistics (1993) for the Kiribati Mission: churches, 6; members, 1,116. Headquarters: Bairiki, Tarawa, Kiribati.

Neandertal Old People's Home

NEANDERTAL OLD PEOPLE'S HOME. A home with a capacity for 200 residents, including a ward for invalids, situated in the vicinity of Mettmann, Germany, near Düsseldorf, in North Rhine-Westphalia, operated by the North German Union.

In 1921 the West German Union Conference, under the leadership of Paul Drinhaus, acquired Hellerbruch Mill, a former park, with surrounding forest land totaling about 21 acres (8.5 hectares).

In November 1921 the Neandertal Missionary Seminary was opened on the property, and until the school was closed in 1934, because of political pressure, scores of German young people received ministerial training there. In 1937 the property was taken over by the government. After World War II the property was returned to the church, and served as a refugee camp operated by the Seventh-day Adventist Welfare Association. Between 1948 and 1952 the seminary was reestablished, the school was combined with the Seminar Marienhöhe at Darmstadt, and the Neandertal Old People's Home was established on the property. At first the home had a capacity of 50 persons, but after a new addition was built in 1980, the capacity was increased to 184.

Superintendents: Fritz and Emma Besmehn, 1952—1953; August and Herta Blankenburg, 1953—1966; Rolf and Gertraude Dornemann, 1966—1974; Kurt and Friedchen Jungmann, 1974—1980; Herbert and Gisela Wagner, 1980—1990; Wolfgang and Birgit Schneider, 1990— .

Nebraska Conference

NEBRASKA CONFERENCE. A former unit of church organization comprising the state of Nebraska. Statistics (Dec. 31, 1980) at the time of the merger with the Kansas Conference: churches, 56; members, 6,037; church or elementary schools, 11; ordained ministers, 24; licensed ministers, 12; teachers, 29. Headquarters: 4745 Prescott Avenue, Lincoln, Nebraska. The conference formed part of the Mid-America Union Conference.

History

History. Beginnings of the Work in the Area. The first Seventh-day Adventist family known to have lived in this state, J. V. Weeks and his wife, came from Wisconsin and settled at Olatha in 1858. Their only contact with other SDAs was through the pages of the Review and Herald. In 1865 Solomon Myers, an SDA from Iowa, moved to Decatur, Burt County, Nebraska, opened a store, made acquaintances, began to preach at public gatherings in a schoolhouse nearby, and without assistance from any minister gathered 24 converts from the vicinity. A second settler from Iowa, J. Bartlett, then joined Myers in the work. In 1870 J. H. Morrison, a minister from the Iowa Conference, held a short series of meetings at Decatur upon the request of Myers. One attendant of these meetings had encountered Seventh-day Adventist teachings by reading the dampened back page of an old Review and Herald with which he had attempted unsuccessfully to start a fire. His interest led him to subscribe for the periodical. Later he joined the Decatur group, which had expanded to 35 in number. In 1871 G. I. Butler, president of the Iowa Conference (later one of the presidents of the General Conference), organized a church at Decatur, with M. D. Clark and J. L. Jordan as elder and clerk, respectively. From 1872 to 1878 R. M. Kilgore and C. L. Boyd worked in Nebraska organizing many companies, Sabbath schools, and churches. Poor roads made communication between these groups extremely difficult.

The early members attended camp meetings in Iowa until a growing membership warranted such meetings in Nebraska. The first to be held was at Blair in 1876, with an attendance of some 350 adherents. Those who attended felt that the time had come to have their own organization.

The Nebraska Conference Organized. On Sept. 25, 1878, the Nebraska Conference was organized at Seward, with C. L. Boyd as president and G. S. Reichard as secretary. A State Tract and Missionary Society also was established. The new conference consisted of 17 churches, with a membership of about 350.

Many of the settlers found the Seventh-day Adventist doctrines strange and new, yet because of their great hospitality they opened their doors to the ministers. Churches were organized but were often depleted when the roving, restless spirit of the frontier sent the settlers farther west. The first church building in the conference was erected in 1878 by the Stromsburg church—a congregation noted for its early temperance work.

Many churches originated from personal work rather than from public evangelism. At Sappa Creek, Furnas County, a housewife, formerly from Benton County, Iowa, prepared the way for the organization of the church at Richmond in 1878. The church at Weeping Water, Cass County, can be traced back to the missionary efforts of James Clark, who once had passed through Cass County and inspired another man to distribute tracts. In 1879 George B. Starr began work in Omaha, where there were no Seventh-day Adventists, by distributing tracts and papers, though a church was not organized there until 1890. At Beatrice in 1884 house-to-house work was conducted by J. Stanton, G. E. Langdon, and E. L. Saxton.

The church at Shelton had a noteworthy beginning. In 1884 L. A. Hoopes and J. P. Gardner conducted tent meetings, the common form of evangelistic meetings at that time. The opposers became so enraged that they bombarded the tent with burning arrows in an attempt to destroy it. Nevertheless, a church was organized there in 1885. The membership consisted of 16 elderly women. In 1893 this congregation decided to build a church, and in their enthusiasm they completed it in only four months.

A. J. Cudney (who later lost his life, when, on a mission voyage, his ship was lost in the Pacific) and O. A. Johnson devised a trial subscription project with Signs of the Times magazine to arouse interest in connection with an evangelistic tent series, a plan used for the first time at Blair in 1880. A church was organized as a result. Another attempt to reach more people with the SDA doctrine was the Bible Reading School, introduced for the first time in 1884 at Fremont by O. A. Johnson. He conducted lectures on doctrinal subjects and had the students present Bible studies on these subjects (eight each day) for criticism. Upon completing this course, the students in turn went out to give Bible studies in the community.

An institution more lasting in its influence was the so-called city mission of the evangelistic type—not to be confused with the welfare or “Christian help” type of city mission—one of which was operated in Omaha in 1897. City missions, as centers for personal evangelism and in some cases for meetings, were fostered in large cities in many states in the eighties. Such missions were opened in Beatrice (1894) and Grand Island (1887), but a more ambitious, conference-sponsored enterprise was operated in Lincoln. This was opened by H. Shultz and A. J. Cudney, who, after a house-to-house campaign with literature, which was followed by a three-week tent meeting and a state camp meeting in 1885, failed to secure another meeting place where interests could be followed up. But after a second state camp meeting held at Lincoln in 1886, a large group of Seventh-day Adventists was established. In 1887 the conference built a new four-story mission building in Lincoln, with a room for church services and facilities to hold workers’ training programs. In 1888 this mission reported a six-month training school.

In 1882 the growing conference assigned H. Shultz to work among the Germans and O. A. Johnson among the Scandinavians. H. Shultz and L. R. Conradi conducted the first SDA tent meeting in the German language held by this denomination, at Sutton in July of 1883. During a temperance lecture, held in connection with a tent campaign in 1883 in his hometown of Fort Calhoun, O. A. Johnson was beaten unconscious by a loud and boisterous crowd that he tried to disperse. By 1883 the conference had established churches and companies as far west as Indianola, Red Willow County.

In the first 20 years after the conference was organized, the membership increased from 350 to 2,200, with 34 conference employees. Western expansion created, in this and the neighboring conferences, a need for a college. In 1890 a site four and one-half miles (seven kilometers) southeast of Lincoln, Nebraska, was chosen, which became College View. In September 1891 the architect, W. C. Sisley, handed the keys of the new school, Union College, to the denomination. A church of 35 members was organized in College View early in 1891 and a German church of 24 members soon after; next came the Scandinavian church of 54 members, the first in this state. These three churches corresponded to the three separate departments of the college, one teaching in English, a second in German, and a third in the Scandinavian languages.

The General Conference sent A. R. Henry in 1894 to supervise the building of the College View church, which when completed was valued at $16,000 and had a seating capacity of 2,000. Its size made it a suitable meeting place for General Conference sessions, Autumn Councils, and other important gatherings.

Ground and buildings for the Nebraska Sanitarium north of Union College campus were donated by A. R. Henry. The sanitarium was opened in the spring of 1895 under the supervision of Dr. A. N. Loper. It flourished for a time, then lack of sufficient patronage caused the conference to close it in 1920.

The College View area attracted other institutions as well. The International Publishing Association was organized in September 1903 for the purpose of supplying publications in foreign languages throughout the United States, and early in 1904 it was located at College View. It was taken over as a branch by the Pacific Press in 1915, and about a year later, on Feb. 27, 1916, the building was destroyed by fire. This International Branch of the Pacific Press was then moved to Brookfield, Illinois.

The Christian Record Publishing House, a General Conference institution, moved from Battle Creek to College View in May 1904 and established temporary quarters in the basement of the Union College administration building. It is now Christian Record Services, Incorporated, the largest religious publishing house for the blind in the United States.

In December 1908 a 30-bed sanitarium called the Nebraska Sanitarium, after its parent institution at Lincoln, was established at Hastings, Nebraska. For a time it flourished, but by 1920 was on the decline. In 1918 the conference decided to begin an intermediate school at Shelton. The institution, known as Shelton Academy, opened in September 1919 with 115 students. In order to raise money for development, the flagging sanitarium at Hastings was sold in 1927. In 1947 the name of the academy was changed to Platte Valley Academy.

Church schools helped to strengthen the membership of the various churches. In 1925 there were 213 children attending such schools at College View, Crawford, Culbertson, Grand Island, Hastings, Omaha (Memorial church and Third church), Shelton, Tekamah, and Kearney (family school).

The conference operated a Bible correspondence school from 1942 through July 1967. The conference office, near the Union College campus, was secured in August 1944 and was completely remodeled in 1963. It shares space with the Adventist Book Center, which is on the first floor.

Until 1962 the academy serving Lincoln was operated as an integral part of Union College. It was then replaced by College View Academy, which is owned jointly by the college and the local churches but administered independently of the college. In 1963 Helen Hyatt Elementary School joined College View Academy to form the Seventh-day Adventist Schools of Lincoln. Both are in completely new buildings. In recent years more classroom wings and a gymnasium have been added to the academy.

In 1963 the College View church purchased Woodland Acres, a quarter-section camping and recreational area near Seward.

On May 19, 1962, the first Spanish church in the conference was organized at Scottsbluff, largely as a result of the work of the welfare center there.

Later Developments

Later Developments. In 1966 the conference purchased land for Camp Arrowhead, a youth camp, near Lexington. The camp serves blind and disadvantaged children as well as the youth of the church.

The Platte Valley Academy campus at Shelton was almost completely rebuilt. New dormitories, a gymnasium, a cafeteria, and an administration-chapel building were erected. A broom factory furnishes work for students, as does the dairy, which boasts new silos, loafing shed, and milking parlor.

The Trust and Stewardship Department was established by the conference to handle wills and trusts and to coordinate the details of raising funds to rebuild Platte Valley Academy and complete the building of Camp Arrowhead. The former Education-MV Department was divided into two departments to better meet the needs of the youth of the conference. For a time the Book Center began operating a bookmobile-type display trailer to take Book Center services to the churches throughout the conference.

In 1963 the Good Neighbor Services Center was built in Lincoln and began serving the community through welfare assistance and an educational program that offers stop-smoking plans, home nursing, money management, better homemaking, child care, nutrition instruction for retarded individuals, and other forms of outreach.

The historic College View church in Lincoln was replaced with a larger, modern building that more adequately serves the needs of the large congregation and the Union College students.

On Jan. 1, 1981, the Nebraska Conference merged with the Kansas Conference to become the Kansas-Nebraska Conference.

Nebraska Sanitarium (Hastings, Nebraska)

NEBRASKA SANITARIUM (Hastings, Nebraska). A former medical institution established in 1908 at Hastings, by the Nebraska Sanitarium at Lincoln and given the same name as the mother institution. It was situated in the northeast part of the city, adjoining, by good fortune, a municipally owned landscaped tract of 45 acres (18 hectares) with a golf course and a lake. The white brick structure, with every convenience and a modern operating room, was opened to the public on Dec. 10, 1908. From the beginning the institution had excellent patronage, which grew to the point where in 1913 the matron and other employees had to move out to increase the patient capacity.

A nurse's training school enrolled an average of about 20 young people, who lived in a dormitory about a block away. The institution was self-sufficient financially in spite of doing a great amount of charity work. The peak in patronage, which came in 1916 and 1917, when it averaged about 700 patients, was followed by a sharp decline, to a low of 215 in 1920. In that year a proposal to sell was turned down, and the sanitarium ran for seven more years before closing its doors.

Nebraska Sanitarium (Lincoln, Nebraska)

NEBRASKA SANITARIUM (Lincoln, Nebraska). A former institution founded in 1895 at College View, a suburb of Lincoln. Assisting in its establishment about four years after the founding of Union College was Dr.

J. H. Kellogg, of Battle Creek, Michigan. A large frame dwelling just north of the college campus was secured, and Dr. A. N. Loper took charge. As the work prospered, the sanitarium first rented part of North Hall, the men's dormitory, then later purchased the building.

Despite heavy initial indebtedness the institution prospered, and opened another sanitarium at Hastings, Nebraska, bearing the same name. In 1906 the institution made a clear profit of $12,000, at the same time doing much charity work. The college furnished patronage, the sanitarium used a certain amount of student labor, and the two institutions joined in operating an excellent nursing education program. However, managerial policies of the two institutions were sometimes at variance because of different points of view on student government and on the common use of certain facilities. The 80-bed institution reached its crest with 2,500 patients in 1915 and in 1916. Eventually mounting costs and diminishing patronage influenced the Nebraska Conference to sell the building back to the college, which needed it to care for an increasing enrollment. In 1920 the college purchased the building for $65,000 and the Nebraska Sanitarium of College View ceased to exist.

Negros Mission Academy

NEGROS MISSION ACADEMY. A secondary day school in the Philippines that serves the educational needs of the Seventh-day Adventist young people from the provinces of Negros Occidental, Negros Oriental, and the subprovince of Siquijor. It is located in Taculing, Bacolod City, in the province of Negros Occidental, a part of the Central Philippine Union Mission territory.

The academy began as a one-teacher school at the Bacolod Central Seventh-day Adventist Church in 1940. Its first teacher employed by the mission was Vicente Clava. The onset of war, which finally reached the heart of the “city of smiles,” brought the operation of the school to a halt. When total peace and order were finally restored, the school was in operation again. Through the leadings of the Lord the school prospered in terms of enrollment. The march of progress prompted the church leadership to widen its offerings. In 1965 the school management was granted permission by the government to offer a complete elementary course.

With this development, the limited area that housed the school facilities became small and congested. The growing population necessitated the relocation of the school. The Lord richly blessed, leading to the site where Negros Mission Academy is presently located. Graduation from the elementary level made another impact, especially upon parents whose children have gained the value of a Seventh-day Adventist education. The desire to have a church-operated secondary school was foremost upon the minds of those concerned parents. Their contagious enthusiasm compelled the mission leadership to lay plans for the establishment of a junior high school. A fund-raising campaign was launched, and as a result a junior academy was born. Negros Adventist Academy, which was later changed to Negros Mission Academy (its official name up to the present) opened its doors to students in 1968.

Negros Mission Academy began operating as a junior academy with 138 students. There were six full-time and five part-time teachers under the principalship of Pastor David J. Recalde.

In 1970 the permit to offer the third year secondary education was granted. Enrollment continued to increase with 236 students and nine full-time teachers. A year later the Department of Education, Culture, and Sports granted the academy management permission to offer the complete secondary course. Thirty-three senior students composed the first high school graduating class.

In 1993 NMA continued its role as a refuge for youth. It has also continued its growth in improvement of physical facilities. A recent addition to its first concrete building was a two-story edifice that houses the library and the administrative office. Although operating as a day school, NMA provides a dormitory for students who come from far places. The latest addition to its physical plant is a new chapel, which was built through the efforts of the students and teachers, as well as the assistance of generous alumni, supporters, parents, and mission and union workers.

After his marriage to Vera Elizabeth Shoff in 1918, the young couple were called to Japan, where he was ordained the following year. During his years of service to the church he served as the first president of Japan Missionary College; dean and president of Philippine Union College; evangelist, secretary, and president of the Japan Union Mission; educational secretary of Japan Union Mission and China Division; education and MV director of Western Washington Conference; academic dean of Emmanuel Missionary College; and teacher at La Sierra College.

Among the books he has authored is Modern Reader's Japanese-English Character Dictionary, which won first prize from the Society for the Promotion of International Cultural Relations. In 1972 the General Conference awarded him the Medallion of Merit. During the three years prior to his death he had been writing a Chinese-English dictionary, the basic phase of which he completed before his sudden death while traveling in Hong Kong.

Nepal

NEPAL. A kingdom situated in the Himalayas between India and Tibet. Its northern border is formed by some of the highest mountains in the world, including Mount Everest. It has an area of 54,362 square miles (140,798 square kilometers) and a population (1994) of 21 million. The people are of Mongolian and Hindu origins. Nepali is the national language, understood by most of the people. The main religions are Hinduism and Buddhism. Modern Nepal was formed in the eighteenth century from numerous small ancient principalities by a Gurkha ruler.

The territory of Nepal comprises a portion of the Himalayan Region, an attached field of the Southern Asia Division. In 1993 this region had three Seventh-day Adventist churches with a membership of 212. Headquarters of the Himalayan Region are in Kathmandu.

Since 1952 Christian missions have been operating schools, hospitals, and other social services in the kingdom of Nepal. Seventh-day Adventists operate the 50-bed Scheer Memorial Hospital in Banepa. ADRA is working in Kathmandu.

Netherlands

NETHERLANDS. A parliamentary monarchy, embracing the 12 provinces of the Netherlands in Europe and the Netherlands Antilles in the Caribbean Sea. The European part of the country has an area of about 15,800 square miles (40,922 square kilometers) and a population (1994) of 15.4 million. It is bounded on the north and west by the North Sea, on the east by Germany, and on the south by Belgium.

The Netherlands is frequently called Holland by other countries, the reason being that in the seventeenth century the two important provinces carrying on a large trade with overseas countries were North and South Holland, but the official name is the Netherlands. Although the Netherlands is one of the most densely populated countries in the world (958 per square mile [370 per square kilometer]), living conditions are favorable and the people enjoy a long life span. In spite of heavy emigrations to Canada and Australia, the population is growing fast. The government is endeavoring to enlarge the country peacefully by turning the sea into dry land. For many centuries the Dutch have fought the sea. An old proverb says: "God created the world, but the Dutch people made their own country."

About 36 percent of the population belong to the Roman Catholic Church, 37 percent profess no religion, and the rest are Protestant. The Protestants are divided into several denominations and religious groups, the largest being the Dutch Reformed Church (19 percent of the population).

The Netherlands has had a long history. The Dutch political state began to take shape while Spain dominated the country in the sixteenth century. Early in the seventeenth century independence was won, which was interrupted some two centuries later by French control from 1795 to 1813. Since then the Netherlands has been a kingdom ruled by the House of Orange, a family much loved by the people. Dutch independence was again temporarily lost during World War II, which brought enormous damage. After the close of the war the Dutch rapidly rebuilt their country.

The standard of education in the Netherlands is high. The country boasts several universities and many other institutions of learning.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. The territory of the Netherlands constitutes the Netherlands Union Conference, within the Trans-European Division. Statistics (1992) for the Netherlands: churches, 49; members, 4,213; church or elementary schools, 1; homes for elderly people, 2; ordained ministers, 26; licensed ministers, 3; Bible instructors, 1; teachers, 2. Headquarters: Biltseweg 14, Bosch en Duin, Netherlands.

In 1972 the union eliminated the two conferences. The NUC became a conference of churches but kept the union status. It organized seven districts with seven district committees. These committees bring to the union board suggestions as to how to stimulate evangelistic outreach in their districts.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. In 1876 J. N. Andrews reported that Les Signes des Temps, his French language paper published in Switzerland, had a small circulation in the Netherlands. Two years later a citizen of that country who had received some copies of it sent the money for two subscriptions and a list of 25 names of prospective readers.

During the summer of 1882 S. N. Haskell visited the Netherlands while traveling to Germany. He was accompanied by J. W. Gardner, who served as an interpreter.

Two years later G. I. Butler, while traveling in Europe, took a hurried trip to Haarlem. The purpose of the brief visit was to contact C. Velthuysen, a devout Seventh Day Baptist.

L. R. Conradi visited the Netherlands in 1887 and established the first church, which was located between Emden, Germany, and Groningen, Holland, apparently at Winschoten, with five people "signing the covenant." The following January, Conradi and Haskell were again in Holland and held services. The Winschoten group dwindled after its leader, M. J. Van der Schuur, and others left for America.

During 1887 the first Dutch Seventh-day Adventist periodical, De Bijbellezer ("The Bible Reader"), began to be published in the United States. Van der Schuur was on its editorial staff for several years.

In 1889 Conradi, accompanied by Pieter Wessels of South Africa, again visited the Netherlands and nine people "signed the covenant." Probably one of these was Mr. Mattheus Van der Schuur of Winschoten, afterward supposed to be the country's first convert. Apparently none of the original group still lived there.

In 1893 R. G. Klingbeil began preaching and selling books to the sailors in Rotterdam harbor. Two years later the first baptism of six converts took place in Rotterdam. This would indicate that the 1889 converts, like the original five, had been Baptists already and were accepted into fellowship without rebaptism.

In 1897 Joseph Wintzen came to the Netherlands and began publishing the monthly periodical De Zions-Wachter, later called Tekenen des Tijds ("Signs of the Times"). In 1901 J. Wibbens, coming to the Netherlands, began to publish the first church paper, De Arbeider (later called De Adventbode, "The Advent Messenger"). By 1912 there were 250 Dutch Seventh-day Adventists. On July 7, 1919, the church was recognized by the government as a religious society.

In 1901 the Holland Mission Field was organized, which included the territory of the Netherlands and Flemish Belgium (later called Holland Mission and still later Holland and Flemish Belgium Mission). The Holland Mission listed in the Seventh-day Adventist Yearbooks from 1910 to 1919 included only the territory of Holland. At the end of that period this mission was divided into the East Holland Mission and the West Holland Mission. In 1922 the two were combined into the Holland Mission (later called Holland Conference and Netherlands Conference), whose territory comprised the Netherlands.

The foundation of the Netherlands Publishing House was laid at The Hague in 1920, but for 25 years it remained a branch of the Advent-Verlag, in Hamburg. Books and pamphlets were translated and published in Dutch and sold by a steadily growing group of colporteurs. The first Ingathering paper was published in 1922. In 1952 the Netherlands Union established an old people's home, which cares for more than 80 aged people and provides them with security.

Netherlands Union Conference Formed. In 1938 the Netherlands Union Conference was organized with two conferences—the North Netherlands Conference and the South Netherlands Conference. Earlier the Netherlands had been first a conference in the West German Union and then a detached unit in the European division. From 1938 until 1945 the Netherlands Union was part of the Central European Division. In 1942 the Seventh-day Adventist denomination was recognized by the government as a church, with the same rights as other churches. At the General Conference session held in Washington in 1946 the Netherlands Union was made part of the Northern European Division. During the same year the Bible correspondence course patterned after the Voice of Prophecy was organized. In 1948 the Netherlands Union opened a junior college, Theologisch Seminarie Oud-Zandbergen, at Huis ter Heide with a five-year course in secondary education leading up to two years of college work in the Netherlands followed by two years at Newbold College in England.

Since Dec. 16, 1949, an SDA radio program in Dutch called the Voice of Hope has been broadcast every Sunday morning at 7:45 over Radio Luxembourg. This program is well known in the country and enjoys a wide circle of listeners in both the Netherlands and Belgium.

Since October 1971 the Netherlands government has granted Seventh-day Adventists 15 minutes of broadcasting every four weeks, free over Dutch Radio 5. The government is paying the expenses of the programs.

The Communication Department offers a service to the newspapers concerning work of Seventh-day Adventists at home and abroad.

The Netherlands Union Conference operates a modern kindergarten at “Oud-Zandbergen,” Huis ter Heide, attended by children of all denominations from 4 to 12 years of age. The education of these children conforms to governmental rules and Seventh-day Adventist principles. The school owns animals and the children spend part of their time looking after them. Thus they learn about nature and are led to love their Creator.

At the close of the war in 1945 there were only three SDA church buildings standing, worth less than 100,000 guilders. By 1993, after a period of rapid rebuilding, church property was valued in excess of 30 million guilders.

In 1947 F. J. Voorthuis became president of the union and P. van Oossanen of the North Netherlands Conference.

The first stop-smoking plans were held in Rotterdam in 1968. The “Bond voor onthouding van tabak en alcohol” (Health and Temperance) received subsidies from the government to organize these antitobacco campaigns. A Christian television station (NCRV) produced stop-smoking plans on television. The year 1970 brought new people, new responsibilities, and a new evangelistic method.

Within one year K. C. van Oossanen was elected president of the South Netherlands Conference and president of the NUC. J. F. Coltheart introduced an evangelistic campaign with a completely new approach in Rotterdam.

The Netherlands Union Conference published the book Wens der Eeuwen (The Desire of Ages) in 1973; Van Jeruzalem naar Rome (The Acts of Apostles) followed in 1975; De Grote Strijd (The Great Controversy) in 1975; Patriarchen en Profeten (Patriarchs and Prophets) in 1977. With the publishing of Profeten en Koningen (Prophets and Kings) the complete Conflict of the Ages Series was available in the Dutch language.

A new service flat was established in Apeldoorn in 1976. In 1981 Bert de Buck departed for Upper Volta as the Netherlands' first student missionary. In the same year ADRA International held its first meeting in Holland. The Liedboek voor de Adventkerk (Hymnbook for the Seventh-day Adventist Church) has been introduced, replacing the old Gezangen Zions (Hymns of Zion). Early Writings was published in 1984 after being out of stock for many years. That year the Geoscience Institute of Loma Linda University organized a weeklong seminar titled "Creationism Versus Evolutionism" at Oud-Zandbergen near Utrecht.

The year 1987 marked the centennial of the Seventh-day Adventist Church in the Netherlands. K.C. van Oossanen was elected as secretary of the Trans-European Division, the first Dutch officer of the division.

In September 1992 Paula A. Koeweiden-Cane Tuppen was elected the first woman treasurer of the Netherlands Union Conference.

In 1995 the Netherlands hosted the fifty-sixth session of the General Conference of the Seventh-day Adventist Church, the second such session to be held outside the United States. Meetings were held in Utrecht, in the heart of the country.

Netherlands Adventist Publications

NETHERLANDS ADVENTIST PUBLICATIONS (Advent Pers). A publishing house without printing plant, operated at the Netherlands Union Conference. For about two decades prior to 1939 the German publishing house, Advent-Verlag, at Hamburg, operated a branch in the Netherlands, during most of the time under the name Internationaal Advent Zendinggenootschap but later under the name Boekenhuis van de Advent-Zending. Since 1939 Dutch publications have been printed in the Netherlands. During the five years of occupation in World War II, the publishing house was divided into two establishments, a commercial section, serving the colporteurs, and a noncommercial section producing publications for the church. For only a short time during the war could the periodicals and books be published regularly, but ways were found to serve the literature evangelists. Bombing during the last part of the war destroyed the publishing house. After the war a new beginning was made under the name Stichting Boekenhuis “Veritas.” Being one of the first publishers to obtain the permission and having access to paper needed to print large editions of periodicals, the new firm made a good start.

The house publishes books written in the Dutch language and several translations of English and German books. The house also issues a monthly church paper, Advent (“Advent Messenger”), and a quarterly promotional of Adventist Development and Relief Agency Netherlands (ADRA-Actueel). In 1977 close cooperation between the Netherlands publishing house and Stanborough Press (UK) developed, particularly with the printing of the 10-volume Bible Stories. This closer cooperation resulted in the two houses together publishing the senior Sabbath school lesson quarterlies and a message magazine, Finale.

In 1994 the Netherlands Publishing House (Uitgeverij “Veritas”) became the Netherlands Adventist Publications (Advent Pers).

Netherlands Antilles

NETHERLANDS ANTILLES. An autonomous part of the kingdom of the Netherlands comprising two groups of islands in the West Indies, one at the southern end (Aruba, Bonaire, and Curaçao), and the other at the northern end (St. Eustatius, Saba, and St. Maarten [Dutch Section]) of the Lesser Antilles.

The larger group, the islands of Aruba (since 1986 independent from the Netherlands Antilles but still a part of the Dutch kingdom), Bonaire, and Curaçao, is situated 38 miles (61 kilometers) off the northern coast of Venezuela in the Caribbean Sea. Aruba has an area of 70 square miles (180 square kilometers), Bonaire 111 square miles (287 square kilometers), and Curaçao 172 square miles (445 square kilometers), making a total area of 353 square miles (914 square kilometers).

Aruba has a population of 61,717; Bonaire, 10,187; and Curaçao, 144,097. The total population (1992) of Netherlands Antilles is 250,000. Dutch is the official language, but Papiamentu—a mixture of Spanish, Dutch, and other languages—is the most commonly spoken language.

The population is cosmopolitan; Blacks and those of the Dutch culture are predominant. Jews were among the early European settlers and hold a prominent place in business and the economy. There is very little agriculture, and the economy of the islands depends primarily on the oil refineries of Aruba and Curaçao, and the tourist trade. Jewish and Christian religions predominate, the Roman Catholic Church being the largest.

The smaller, more northerly group, St. Eustatius, Saba, and St. Maarten (Dutch Section), has a total area of about 30 square miles (80 square kilometers). The population (1992) is 35,190. The economy of the area consists largely of agriculture and tourism.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. The first Seventh-day Adventist missionary to Curaao was C. E. Knight, who arrived in 1926 and organized a small company Oct. 16 of that year. Ill health forced him to leave the following year, and D. C. Babcock, who succeeded him, directed the work from 1927 to 1930. During those years the first piece of land for a church building was secured in Mundo Nobo, Curaçao. In 1930 a man named Liverpool began to keep the seventh-day Sabbath in Aruba. Soon six persons were baptized there. In 1934 a church of 16 members was organized in San Nicolas, Aruba. One of the first SDAs in Bonaire was Eustacia Felida, a granddaughter of a man named Cornelius Martin, who late in the eighteenth century was a preacher-farmer on the island. Martin and his wife taught the people about the second advent of Christ and were known for their godly lives. In 1934 land was donated for a church in Bonaire, and the first MV Society was organized in Curaçao with a membership of seven. In that year the total church membership of the Curaçao Mission reached 59.

Until 1935 these islands were included in the Venezuela Mission, but in that year the Netherlands Antilles Mission (until 1934 known as Curaçao Mission) was organized and incorporated under the name of “Adventzendinggenootschap.” In 1941 the Bonaire church was organized and the first series of SDA tracts was printed in Papiamento.

In 1950 the Oranjestad, Aruba, church was built and dedicated; and the next year a church was erected and dedicated in Chere-Asile, Curaçao. In 1954 the first MV camp was held on Bonaire. In 1955 a new church was dedicated and the first church school was opened with 36 pupils, in San Nicolas, Aruba. In 1956 a church was organized in Savaneta, Aruba, and the following year saw the dedication of the new Buena Vista church in Curaçao.

In 1968 an elementary school was opened on Aruba with four teachers and 110 pupils, and in 1970 a primary school was added to it, with 50 pupils and one teacher.

In 1969 an eight-teacher school was opened on Curaçao with an attendance of about 300 pupils. This building was a gift from the government. In 1974 a kindergarten school was opened on this island with 50 pupils and two teachers.

In 1962 the office was moved from rented quarters to a denominationally owned property. Vacation Bible Schools are held every year, with 500 to 750 children in attendance. There is a rapidly growing radio Bible school, which offers lessons in Dutch, English, Papiamento, and Spanish—the four principal languages spoken. Radio and television programs are also broadcast in these four languages. The work is advancing rapidly among the Papiamento-speaking people. Each church has an active Dorcas Welfare Society. Literature sales amount to $35,000 each year. In 1985 the mission became a conference.

Netherlands Junior College and Seminary

NETHERLANDS JUNIOR COLLEGE AND SEMINARY (Oud-Zandbergen). A coeducational boarding school on the junior college level operated by the Netherlands Union Conference at Huis ter Heide, near Utrecht. Bought in 1947, the school property is situated in the center of the Netherlands, and is surrounded by a large park. Since 1969 the school offered three years of secondary work followed by a theological course of two years. After these three years the students continue their education at Newbold College to study for either the B.A. degree in theology or a B.B.A. degree. The course is open to both young men and women. Students come mostly from the Netherlands and Belgium.

In 1973, because of extensive changes in the Dutch educational system, it was decided to limit the education offered in the secondary school to the final two years. In 1970 government recognition was granted for the secondary school, so that students might sit at Oud-Zandbergen for their final examinations. Since 1980 no courses for the secondary level have been offered; the school has, however, kept governmental recognition.

As of 1993 students can take the first three years of the theological course. Current courses include a one-year orientation course (Bible, Church, and Society); a part-time theological course open for church members and taking four years, based on the B.A. program; a training course for officers of local churches; courses in the English language and in computer programs. Meetings and symposia are also sponsored.

NETHERLANDS OLD PEOPLE'S HOME (Vredenoord) ("Place of Peace"). A home operated by the Netherlands Union Conference at Huis ter Heide, near Utrecht. It was founded in October, 1952, with 15 residents in a small country house. After enlargement, by 1959 it accommodated 80, nearly all Seventh-day Adventists. By the end of 1974 it had been modernized and enlarged and could accommodate 60. This institution is financially self-sustaining. By the end of 1975 a new home for the aged members was ready for guests in Apeldoorn.

Nethery, Jay Johnstone

NETHERY, JAY JOHNSTONE (1879—1971). Missionary, administrator. A native of Indiana, he was baptized at the age of 20, then began to study at Union College and later at the British Union school in London. He began his ministry in Wyoming and Nebraska. After his marriage he went to England and then to Egypt. In 1908 he returned to England and served in the South and North England conferences until 1912. Returning to the United States, he worked first in the Oregon Conference and then served as president of the following conferences: Idaho, Upper Columbia, Southeastern California, Southern Union, Central Union, Colorado, and Lake Union. In 1946 he was elected a general vice president of the General Conference, where he served until his retirement in 1950.

History

History. Beginnings of the Work in the State of Nevada. Seventh-day Adventist meetings in the state began June 1, 1876, in the “Institute Building” in Stillwater, when Jackson Ferguson, an SDA from Santa Rosa, California, began holding regular Sabbath services. In the autumn of 1877, when two other families from Santa Rosa moved to St. Clair, Churchill County, Jackson Ferguson held meetings in St. Clair also. In response to an appeal for help from the dozen Sabbathkeepers in St. Clair, the California Conference sent J. N. Loughborough. Arriving at Wadsworth on Feb. 1, 1878, he was met by Jackson Ferguson, who took him 35 miles (55 kilometers) to St. Clair on the western edge of what immigrants called “The Great American Desert.” Loughborough held 24 meetings in St. Clair in the only schoolhouse in the county (called the “Churchill County Institute”), with audiences varying from 45 to 70. Near the close of the meetings Loughborough baptized three in the Carson River, the first Seventh-day Adventists ever to be baptized in the state of Nevada.

On Feb. 24, 1878, a temporary state organization (described then as the Seventh-day Adventist Association in the State of Nevada) was formed, with Loughborough, president; John B. Ferguson, secretary; and Jackson Ferguson, treasurer. Eight months later, by vote of the General Conference, the Nevada group was taken “under the watchcare of” the California Conference.

The St. Clair group, besides paying Loughborough’s traveling expenses of $78 and his salary for four weeks, pledged $300 to purchase a 50-foot (15-meter) tent for evangelistic meetings in Nevada. Early in July 1878 Loughborough pitched a newly purchased tent in Reno, where there were four Sabbathkeepers. His meetings were a new sort of entertainment for the people of Reno, who packed the tent. The attendance went as high as 500, scores of whom had to stand outside. On July 30 Ellen White spoke to some 400 people. At the close of Loughborough’s meetings there were 22 Sabbathkeepers in Reno, and arrangements had been made for a regular Sabbath school, Bible class, and prayer meeting.

In September 1883 two delegates from Nevada, Allen and Harmon, attended the California Conference session. They expressed the desire of the church members in Nevada to unite with the California Conference, and also mentioned the needs of the area. At the fourth meeting of the session it was voted that Nevada be considered a part of the California Conference.

The first camp meeting in Nevada was held in Reno, Aug. 29—Sept. 8, 1884. Loughborough, H. A. St. John, and J. H. Waggoner, editor of the Signs of the Times, were in attendance at this meeting. At the 1885 camp meeting, held in Carson City, 50 people camped in 20 family tents, and 400 to 500 people were present at the opening meeting. Judges, lawyers, and the governor of the state attended some of the evening services. Soon afterward E. A. Briggs organized a church of 13 members at Virginia City, and the following year he held meetings in Mason Valley. Fourteen took their stand and arrangements were made for regular Sabbath services. At the 1887 camp meeting Loughborough reported that there were eight Sabbath schools in the state, with a membership of nearly 200.

As early as 1885 there were Seventh-day Adventists in Owens Valley, near Bishop, California, which later became a part of the Nevada Mission. The first were James Nimrod Newlon and his wife, Josephine. Their daughter Susie, reported to be the first White girl born in Owens Valley (Apr. 4, 1871), became the wife of J. E. Fulton. The Fultons’ second daughter, Agnes, became the wife of Eric B. Hare in Australia, in 1915.

In 1888 the first SDA church building in the state of Nevada was erected on an orchard property (now 325 W. 5th Street) on the northwest edge of Reno, then little more than a village. Also at Reno was the first church school in Nevada, opened in 1902 in a room at the rear of the church building.

Early in 1903 Albert J. Osborne and H. Camden Lacey conducted evangelistic meetings in a tent in Bishop. Later that year a church of nine members was organized. Nimrod Newlon gave a lot, purchased and hauled lumber, and built a church. A church school was started in 1905 with Mantha Higley, who taught 10 pupils for a salary of $20 a month.

In 1906 C. E. Leland and B. E. Beddoe conducted three weeks of tent meetings in Fallon, Nevada, about five miles (eight kilometers) from St. Clair. Four adults were baptized and a number of others covenanted to keep the Sabbath. The new church at Fallon eventually replaced the St. Clair church, which was disbanded. A report from A. J. Osborne in 1907 mentions church work at Genoa and Gardnerville, Reno, Verdi, Fallon, and St. Clair.

Until 1911 the Nevada churches were under the administration of the California Conference. When the California Conference was divided in 1911, the southern Nevada counties of Esmeralda, Nye, Lincoln, and Clark were assigned to the Southern California Conference, the other Nevada counties to the newly organized Northern California-Nevada Conference, with headquarters in Lodi, California.

In 1913 Nevada was organized as a mission, which included the state of Nevada and the counties of Lassen, Modoc, Mono, and Inyo, as well as parts of those counties in California that lay east of the summit of the Sierra Nevada Mountains. In 1920 the mission was organized as a conference with a membership of 303 in five churches. At the close of 1931, when the Nevada-Utah Conference was formed, there were 315 members and 12 churches in Nevada.

Beginnings of the Work in Utah. In the fall of 1889 the California Conference, which at that time covered California and Nevada, added the territories of Utah and Arizona, and opened the work in Utah by sending in a group of canvassers (literature evangelists). Their work was followed by that of an evangelist who conducted meetings in a portable tabernacle and won many converts. A church of 20 members was organized in Salt Lake City on May 1, 1892, where Bible instructors also had worked. There was also a growing interest in Ogden, where J. D. Rice held meetings in a Baptist meetinghouse, and Mrs. Rice gave Bible studies to a few interested Chinese. A church was organized in Ogden on Jan. 20, 1893.

In 1894 the Utah field was transferred to the administration of the General Conference and was subsequently organized into a mission.

As a result of C. M. Gardner's tent meetings and of personal work in Provo, Utah, about 1897, a number were baptized. Sabbath school records show from 40 to 53 members in 1898. A church building was erected in 1899. It was used until it was replaced by the present church in 1967.

In 1902, upon the recommendation of the Pacific Union Conference, the Utah Mission was organized as a conference, with churches in Salt Lake City, Ogden, Provo, and Logan, a total membership of 143, plus a few isolated members, and two ordained ministers. From 1916 through 1919 the Utah Conference was joined to the Inter-Mountain Conference, which included the states of Utah and western Colorado, with headquarters at Grand Junction, Colorado. In 1919, when the work in Utah was reorganized and the Utah Mission recreated, there were four churches and 195 members in Utah.

Nevada-Utah Conference Organized. In 1931 the Utah Mission and the Nevada Conference were united to form the Nevada-Utah Conference. The territory included the states of Nevada and Utah and that part of the state of California that lies east of the summit of the Sierra Nevada Mountains and north of Mono County. The membership of the newly formed conference was 438—from the Utah Mission 123, and from the Nevada Conference 315. The headquarters office, which had been in Reno in 1931, was moved to Salt Lake City in 1932.

Later Developments. By the first biennial session of the conference, Apr. 19, 1934, the membership of the conference had increased to 635, with 10 ministers. One new church, Las Vegas, had been organized with 36 members. The tithe for the biennium was $25,707.38, and the missions offerings, $21,853.85. There were eight church schools, three of which had classes up to the tenth grade, and one up to the ninth. The Nevada-Utah Academy, a 12-grade academy for the Salt Lake City area, was operated from 1936 to 1939.

There was a steady increase of membership in the conference to 792 in 1940; 968 in 1950; 1,488 in 1960; 2,083 in 1970; 3,317 in 1980; and 4,020 in 1990. Tithe in the conference for 1992 amounted to $2,631,257.42 and missions offerings the same year totaled $133,920.37.

In 1946 the counties of Inyo and Mono in the Southern California Conference were assigned to the Nevada-Utah Conference. In 1948 the conference office was moved back to Reno. A new office building was erected at 185 Martin Avenue, which was subsequently replaced by the present office building in 1956. In recent years new church buildings were erected in Boulder City, Price, Sparks, and Truckee and church buildings were purchased and remodeled in Ogden and Las Vegas for the Spanish congregations and in Pahrump and West Valley. New church school buildings were erected in Fallon, Monument Valley, and Ogden.

Work among the Navajo Indians at Monument Valley, in the southeastern part of Utah, was begun in 1950 by Marvin Walter, a minister, and his wife, a registered nurse. This mission, Monument Valley Mission, including church, school, and hospital built in 1961, is owned by the Nevada-Utah Conference, but managed by Adventist Health Systems/West and supported by the conferences in the Pacific Union.

New Birth

NEW BIRTH. A figure of speech by which Jesus sought to explain conversion to Nicodemus, as recorded in John 3:1—8. “Led by the Holy Spirit we sense our need, acknowledge our sinfulness, repent of our transgressions, and exercise faith in Jesus as Lord and Christ, as Substitute and Example. This faith which receives salvation comes through the divine power of the Word and is the gift of God’s grace. Through Christ we are justified, adopted as God’s sons and daughters, and delivered from the lordship of sin. Through the Spirit we are born again and sanctified; the Spirit renews our minds, writes God’s law of love in our hearts, and we are given the power to live a holy life” (Church Manual, [1990], pp. 25, 26).

In September 1850 the Advent Review (1:61) published an article by O.R.L. Crosier in which he mentioned the importance of repentance, conversion, and baptism in relation to Christ’s work in the sanctuary. Having, for the most part, formerly been members of evangelical churches, early Seventh-day Adventists took the new-birth experience for granted. It was accepted by all, and therefore was not a matter of debate or discussion, as were the distinctive doctrines that distinguished them from the churches they had left. They felt no need to dwell on points held in common by all. However, as time went on, doctrines held in common by Christian churches were also stressed. For example, writing in 1895, W. W. Prescott stressed the need for a complete transformation of one’s attitude in order to come into harmony with God. He emphasized the important place of the mind as the controlling factor in the human being, and pointed out that as long as the mind remains unchanged, Christianity is merely a profession and not a living experience. Summing up, he said: “It [the new birth] means the willingness to abandon everything that is of the flesh and connected with the flesh and [to] turn to God for all that He is to us in Jesus Christ” (General Conference Bulletin, Feb. 8, 1895, p. 111).

In 1892 Ellen G. White published a book entitled Steps to Christ, in which the various steps in conversion are discussed and in which the new birth is stressed. Millions of copies of this book, a classic in its field, have been sold.

The present denominational position on the question of the new birth is also set forth in The SDA Bible Commentary, on 2 Cor 5:17: “For a man to be constrained by the love of Christ to live no longer unto self but unto God, to judge men no longer by appearance but by the spirit, to know Christ according to the spirit and not according to the flesh, he must be created a new being. To transform a lost sinner into a ‘new creature’ requires the same creative energy that originally brought forth life. . . . It is a supernatural operation, altogether foreign to normal human experience.

“This new nature is not the product of moral virtue presumed by some to be inherent in man, and requiring only growth and expression. There are thousands of so-called moral men who make no profession of being Christians, and who are not ‘new’ creatures. The new nature is not merely the product of a desire, or even of a resolution to do right . . . , of mental assent to certain doctrines, of an exchange of one set of opinions or feelings for another, or even of sorrow from sin. It is the result of the presence of a supernatural element introduced into a man, which results in his dying to sin and being born again. Thus are we created anew in the likeness of Christ, adopted as sons and daughters of God, and set on a new path. . . . Thus we are made partakers of the divine nature and are granted possession of eternal life. . . . The new believer is not born a full-grown, mature Christian; he first has the spiritual inexperience and immaturity of infancy. But as a son of God he does have the privilege and opportunity to grow up into the full stature of Christ” (vol. 6, pp. 868, 869). See also Conversion; Justification.

New Caledonia and Loyalty Islands

NEW CALEDONIA AND LOYALTY ISLANDS. New Caledonia, one of the major islands of the South Pacific, lies about 700 miles (1,100 kilometers) east of the Queensland coast of Australia. This French Territory has a land area of 7,243 square miles (18,759 square kilometers). Its dependencies are the Loyalty Islands, the Isle of Pines, and others. New Caledonia was annexed by France in 1853 and for a time served as a penal settlement. In 1885 a governor was appointed, supported by a local parliament.

The population (1991) is 172,000, consisting of Europeans, Melanesians (indigenous), Polynesians (Tahiti), Wallisians, Vietnamese, Indonesians, New Hebrideans, and Martiniquis.

The Loyalty Islands, consisting of Lifou, Uvéa, and Maré, lie about 60 miles (100 kilometers) east of New Caledonia. The indigenous inhabitants are a mixture of Melanesian and Polynesian stock. The Loyalties have an area of about 800 square miles (2,100 square kilometers) and a population of 16,193. These areas are divided between French Protestants and Roman Catholics.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. The territory of New Caledonia and Loyalty Islands constitutes the New Caledonia Mission in the Western Pacific Union Mission, which in turn is in the South Pacific Division. Statistics, 1993, for the New Caledonia Mission: churches, 4; members, 575; ordained ministers, 2; licensed ministers, 2; licensed missionaries, 4. Headquarters: 17 Rue du R.P. Gaudet, Vallee des Colons, Nouméa, New Caledonia.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. The first Seventh-day Adventist missionaries to work in the island group were Capt. G. F. Jones and his wife, who sailed from Sydney for Nouméa, New Caledonia, on Oct. 23, 1925. The islands were considered to be some of the most difficult areas in the South Pacific.

The Joneses were later assisted by Miss C. F. Guiot, a French layworker who arrived in New Caledonia on Nov. 30, 1926, and was appointed some 12 months later by the Australasian Union Conference as a Bible instructor. In 1926 Jones visited the Loyalties and distributed publications in the French language.

The first indigenous convert was an inhabitant of Maré, Loyalty Islands, and a member of the chief's family, named Sarah. After her conversion she introduced Mrs. Ada Peyras, of New Caledonia, to Jones for Bible studies. As a result Mrs. Peyras joined the church and became the first convert in New Caledonia.

When several leading Protestant families embraced the SDA teachings opposition arose. Opponents discovered that the Seventh-day Adventist Church was not registered in the territory and therefore had no legal standing in the French community, and hence Jones was refused permission to continue his work. He withdrew from New Caledonia at the end of 1927, at which time there were 10 baptized members and 25 Sabbath school members. Miss Guiot, a French citizen, continued to serve as a missionary for more than 20 years, until 1950.

When the Central Pacific Union Mission was organized in 1949, New Caledonia, with the Loyalties, became a part of it. The Seventh-day Adventist Church has now received legal status.

The New Caledonian Mission was organized in 1954 by Paul Nouan, a French evangelist. In 1961 a church site was acquired in Nouméa and new headquarters established. While G. Hermans was president (1964—1972), a representative mission office, president's house, and church were built.

Throughout the years, French pastors, including Marcel Bornert and Leon Hilaire, have paid periodic visits to the Loyalty group off the eastern coast of New Caledonia. A new chapel was built on the island of Maré in 1973, during the brief stay of Maurice Fayard on that island. In 1974 an evangelist was placed on Maré.

A girl from the island of Lifou was among 17 baptized in Nouméa in September 1974, becoming the first from this place to take her stand as an SDA. A young woman from Wallis Island, a dependency of New Caledonia, was also baptized on this occasion, becoming the first SDA from her country.

The Voice of Hope and educational radio programs are broadcast on a government-controlled station.

New England Conference

NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE. The name of two former units of church organization, the first, existing from 1870 to 1903, and the second from 1923 to 1926.

The first comprised the territory of the present Southern New England Conference (Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Rhode Island) plus New Hampshire (which is now in the Northern New England Conference); about 1873 it extended farther south and for a time (until 1889) included New York City, Long Island, and New Jersey. For the list of presidents in the New England Conference, see Southern New England Conference. In 1903 the conference was split, with New Hampshire and Massachusetts becoming the Central New England Conference and Connecticut and Rhode Island comprising the Southern New England Conference.

The second was the result of the merger in 1923 of the Northern New England Conference (originally embracing New Hampshire and Vermont, organized in 1910) and the Maine Conference, with headquarters in Maine. In 1927 it again took the name Northern New England Conference; its presidents are listed under that article.

NEW HEBRIDES SDA MISSION HOSPITAL A former 30-bed general hospital operated by the New Hebrides Mission on the island of Aore, in the northern part of the New Hebrides group and about 10 miles (16 kilometers) by ship from the airfield and port of Santo.

A hospital in the New Hebrides had long been planned. Finally 50 percent of the Thirteenth Sabbath Offering overflow for the second quarter of 1958 was allocated for the project. However, because of many problems it was not until 1960 that the actual construction began, on the large property that then served for the Parker Missionary School, the mission headquarters (since moved), and the mission slipway and workshop.

A 16-bed unit, including general wards, a maternity ward, and an X-ray unit, was officially opened on June 11, 1961. The first assistant medical officer and the charge nurse were both Fijians, who immediately began training the New Hebrideans on the staff.

The hospital was under the control of a board, the chairman being the president of the local mission. A six-bed tuberculosis ward was opened in 1967, and an operating theater in 1970. During its 13 years of operation, the hospital was directed by Dr. Joeli Taoi.

During the mid-1970s the hospital was closed, but a clinic still functions in a portion of the building.

History

History. Beginnings. Seventh-day Adventists are reported in New Jersey as early as 1874. In that year Nahum Orcutt reported organizing “Systematic Benevolence” with a group of nine adults and six children in South Vineland. He also reported holding meetings for the public in an effort to remove strong prejudice among the two classes of non-Sabbatarian Adventists who were numerous there (Review and Herald 43:54, Jan. 27, 1874). By the end of the summer he reported that he had baptized five new converts and “partially organized a church” there, with a membership of 14, which petitioned the New England Conference to admit them to their fold (ibid. 44:86, Sept. 1, 1874). This was the first Seventh-day Adventist church in the state (organized in June 1874).

The little band of Sabbathkeepers were zealous in spreading their faith. Reading rooms in Vineland and nearby Millville were kept supplied with Signs of the Times. On occasional visits by a minister, converts were baptized. In February 1877 W. J. Boynton reported five accepting the Sabbath in North Vineland.

In April, reports Orcutt, the 20 “resident members” appointed an elder and a deacon. In July 1877 he wrote: “Our members, twenty-five in number, are scattered up and down the West Jersey R.R., a distance of forty miles. What an opportunity to let our light shine!” (ibid. 50:31, July 19, 1877). Two years later the work that had begun faltering somewhat under stiff opposition was revived when I. Sanborn visited the Camden area. He wrote, “I found fourteen Sabbathkeepers, in a disunited state,” and told of organizing a society or company of 16 members. The stronger group in Vineland encouraged the Camden members, and on Jan. 11, 1881, a strengthened Camden group was organized as a church, which “voted to be taken under the watchcare of the New England Conference, to which treasury they will send their tithes” (ibid. 57:28, Jan. 11, 1881).

One of the problems frequently pointed out by the early leaders was the constant movement of new members from New Jersey to other areas. From accounts given by D. A. Robinson and S. N. Haskell it is evident that Sabbathkeepers in Camden met unusual trials. It was during such a time that a tract-distribution program was carried on in nearby Philadelphia by the Camden members, some of whom were living in Philadelphia. The Review and Herald of Sept. 24, 1889, reported that

D. T. Fero organized a church in Philadelphia.

Two were baptized in Pleasantville, New Jersey, by J. S. Schrock in 1886, and two in 1889 in Branchville, where there was already a couple who had been baptized there three years earlier.

In September 1889 the Atlantic Conference was formed, including the territory of New Jersey. The Review and Herald of Nov. 5 reported the meetings held by D. E. Lindsey in Paulsboro, which closed “with a crowded hall and a great interest,” partly as a result of the agitation of the church-state issue by the National Reform interests of that time (66:698). In 1890 a church of 17 members was organized at Paulsboro and a new building was erected by the end of that year, which was dedicated Jan. 18, 1891.

In 1891 an interest was reported in Beverly, and from enthusiastic colporteur work, “a considerable interest” in Paterson. Plans were discussed for making a beginning in Jersey City. The first two camp meetings of the Atlantic Conference were held in New Jersey—one was reported in Mount Holly in 1891 and another in Newark the next year. A tent meeting in Mount Holly resulted in the organization of a church there about that time by R. D. Hottel and D. E. Lindsey.

In September 1893 E. E. Franke pitched an evangelistic tent opposite Jersey City’s largest Catholic cathedral, St. Patrick’s. The result of his meetings was a formation of a church of 47 members (with Sabbath attendance as high as 100). Five months from the time the tent was pitched a church building was erected and dedicated. So widespread was the interest that in 1895 there were two companies that later became the first and second churches.

Meetings were begun in Salem in 1896, and a church was formed there that same year. In 1897 C. H. Keslake and J. C. Stevens held tent meetings in Perth Amboy. Opposition in the city developed even before the meetings began. Two nights before the opening service, troublers routed Stevens from his bed and warned of serious consequences ahead if he should proceed. On the opening night a mob of above 200 surrounded the tent, beating the ropes and pelting the canvas. Reporting on this incident, C. H. Keslake said: "At the close of the service . . . the situation became quite threatening. Men stepped into the tent, one especially making use of the vilest language and indulging in the most indecent gestures. . . . When it seemed that the climax had been reached, and physical harm appeared imminent the Lord's restraining power was made manifest. . . . Someone stepped into the tent, laid hold of the ringleader, and led him out. The only damage done to us was the cutting of the ropes of our tent" (Review and Herald 74:620, Sept. 28, 1897). About 10 years later a church of a dozen members was formed there.

In 1898 S. B. Horton and C. D. Zirkle opened tent meetings in Plainfield.

New Jersey Conference Organized. With the turn of the century came the organization of the New Jersey Conference in December 1901 (apparently began functioning 1902). The new conference was part of the recently formed Atlantic Union Conference. It had two ministers and 14 churches, with a membership of 386; the first president was J. E. Jayne. The two decades following the organization represent the period of New Jersey's strongest growth and development. Through a combination of colporteur activity, lay evangelism, and public preaching, churches were formed in many areas, among foreign-language groups as well as among those speaking English.

When E. E. Franke entered Trenton in July 1901, he soon found that his 60' x 80' (18 m. x 24 m.) tent with 1,000 seats was not adequate to hold the crowds. One account tells of thousands witnessing the baptism of about 60 in the Delaware River (Review and Herald 79:45, Jan. 21, 1902). A church of 75 was organized Sept. 26, 1901, with a Sabbath school of 175 members. Yet this progress was not without opposition. Writing in February 1902, H. W. Cottrell, president of the Atlantic Union Conference, said: "There appears to be a determined effort on the part of many in Trenton to crowd out or crush out, and if possible, destroy the hold present truth has on the people of that city. No hall of sufficient size to accommodate the people who desire to hear the message can be secured for either influence or money" (ibid. 79:76, Feb. 4, 1902).

At the second annual conference session held in Trenton in 1904, the conference headquarters were moved from Paterson to Trenton, and a Tract Society (Book and Bible House) was organized. The total membership was 402.

Later Developments. In 1907 the conference was included in the new Columbia Union Conference. In 1910 the first church school in New Jersey was opened, in Bridgeton. Five grades were taught, and 11 pupils, including a blind girl, finished the year. The school was maintained by pledges and a monthly collection. In 1912 schools were opened in Fairton and Pleasantville; and in 1913 in Trenton, Newark, and Ramah. By 1919 the number of schools had increased to substantially what it was in 1964 (seven elementary and five 10-grade schools), although the total enrollment (430) was more than double what it was in 1919.

The first annual report (Dec. 31, 1902) of tithe was $4,193.84. After 10 years the amount increased to $14,698.86, and another 10 years brought the figure to $67,623.70, while in the early 1960s tithe receipts totaled more than $525,000 annually.

Total mission funds in 1902 were $506.12, increasing in two decades to $38,251.73, largely the result of Ingathering. In 1992 mission offerings were more than $302,619.

Although the membership fluctuated, in 1993 it stood at an all-time high of 8,125, with new additions by baptism of more than 500 each year. Of the 69 churches, 29 are Spanish, one is Hungarian, one Brazilian, two Korean, one Filipino, and two French.

The total investment in schools, parsonages, church structures, and related buildings exceeded $40 million.

A 167-acre (70-hectare) farm in Kingston that had served as campground and youth camp since 1946 was replaced in 1963 by an estate of 375 acres (150 hectares) in the beautiful rolling hills of northwestern New Jersey close by the Delaware Water Gap. Here a boarding academy is situated (see Garden State Academy), and camp meeting is held there each year.

There is a medical facility less than seven miles (11 kilometers) from the academy (see Hackettstown Community Hospital).

New Life Health Food Products

NEW LIFE HEALTH FOOD PRODUCTS. An industry that is a department of Brazil College (Central Campus), which is located in Engenheiro Coelho, São Paulo state, approximately 110 miles (180 kilometers) from the city of São Paulo.

This industry was founded by Pastor Durval Stockler de Lima at the end of 1957. Before its inception, Pastor Durval suffered from heart problems and sought help in the United States. There he was introduced to whole grains and health food products, which helped him regain his health. After returning to Brazil, he decided to start a small industry using whole grains and natural foods. He named the project New Life.

The industry began in the home of Pastor Durval, and the first products were based on royal jelly, beer yeast, whole-grain cereals, and soy.

After retirement in 1975 Pastor Durval offered the management of the industry to the Seventh-day Adventist Church, asking 5 percent of the profits for his support. The proposal was not accepted, and the industry was sold to a non-Adventist. In 1985 Superbom acquired the industry from the owner and operated New Life until 1988, when it began to operate independently, answering directly to the South American Division.

In the middle of 1990 the division offered New Life to Brazil College (Central Campus). Principal Walter Boger accepted the industry, which functions as a department of the school and provides work for industrial students.

New Life produces and commercializes 15 different products, all of which are based on whole-wheat grains, soy, honey, and beer yeast. The monthly production is about 15 tons (14 metric tons), and sales are about US$40,000, with 38 employees.

Managers: Durval Stockler de Lima, 1957—1975; Gil Medeiros, 1976—1984; Rene Marquete, 1985—1987; Gilson Z. Borda, 1988—1990; Flavio Machado Pasini, 1991— .

History

History. Beginnings of the Work in the Area. Many events connected with the rise of Seventh-day Adventism occurred in the state of New York. William Miller, leader of the Adventist, or “Millerite,” movement, of which all the earliest SDAs had been members, was reared in Low Hampton, N.Y. He preached his first sermon on the Second Advent in the neighboring township of Dresden on Aug. 14, 1831; and at Troy in 1836 he published his 16 lectures in book form, setting forth his views and his conviction from his study of the book of Daniel that the appearance of the Saviour could be expected around the year 1843. George Storrs, a Millerite minister and pastor at Albany, began to speak out clearly on the subject of immortality. As a result of diligent study he became convinced of the unconscious sleep of the dead, of immortality only through Christ, and of the final annihilation of the wicked, and in 1842 he preached and published his Six Sermons, which influenced many Adventists. In Verona, Oneida County, Rachel Oakes (later Preston) accepted the Sabbath; afterward she moved to Washington, New Hampshire, where she influenced the first group of Adventists to accept the Sabbath.

It was at Port Gibson that Hiram Edson, on the morning after the disappointment of Oct. 22, 1844, walked with a companion through a cornfield and arrived at an understanding of the sanctuary that provided the reason for the disappointment the day before. With his two friends, Dr. Franklin B. Hahn and Owen R. L. Crosier, he spent a number of months in intensive study of the Bible. Later they published their findings on the sanctuary, its services, and its cleansing in the Day-Star Extra of Feb. 7, 1846 (and earlier in the Day-Dawn). Crosier's presentation brought about correspondence with Joseph Bates and James White. Later, at a conference held at Edson's home, Bates presented the Sabbath truth he had been studying. Edson, already interested in the Sabbath as a result of his studies on the sanctuary and of reading what

T. M. Preble had written, was convinced by Bates's clear presentation of the subject, and kept the next Sabbath. Hahn joined him. Thus the little Adventist company at Port Gibson was the first to unite the sanctuary and Sabbath doctrines as cardinal points of their faith.

Beginning in the spring of 1848, a series of "Sabbath conferences" was held that did much to unify and mold the future of the increasing number of Sabbathkeeping Adventists. The second of these conferences convened Aug. 18 at Volney, in David Arnold's barn or carriage house. Another conference was held in Hiram Edson's barn at Port Gibson, Aug. 27.

The early publishing work, which played a large part in uniting the scattered members and in spreading Seventh-day Adventist teachings, was conducted for some time in New York. At Oswego in 1849 and 1850 numbers five through ten of Present Truth were published. The four issues of The Advent Review were published at Auburn in August and September 1850. Also in September Hiram Edson published The Advent Review Extra at Port Gibson, and James White brought out a 48-page pamphlet reissue of The Advent Review, printed at Auburn. Later, the Present Truth and The Advent Review merged into a larger paper, which became the familiar Advent Review and Sabbath Herald (see Review and Herald). Volume 2 was printed at Saratoga Springs in 1851. During the summer of 1851, Ellen White's first book was published at Saratoga Springs. (This 64-page pamphlet, A Sketch of the Christian Experience and Views of Ellen G. White, with its 1854 supplement, provided the first two sections of her Early Writings, published in 1882.)

James White moved the publishing work to a rented house in Rochester in April 1852, where for the first time Adventists did their own printing on their own press. The Washington handpress, type, and office fixtures were purchased for a total of $652.95. For three years, beginning in May of 1852, the Review was published in Rochester, also the Youth's Instructor, in which appeared the first Sabbath school lessons. In 1853 a Sabbath school was started at Rochester, and a year later one at Buck's Bridge, with John Byington as leader. It was at Buck's Bridge, in 1855, that John Byington—a former Methodist preacher who was destined to become the first president of the General Conference—erected on his farm what doubtless was the first church building built and dedicated by Seventh-day Adventists. In 1858 a church was built at Roosevelt that is said to be "the oldest church building erected by the denomination" and now in use by them. Many of the churches that played an important part in early Seventh-day Adventist history are nonexistent today. Some have been absorbed by nearby larger churches; others were disbanded because of deaths and by members moving away. The church that began in the home of James and Ellen White in Rochester, when the publishing work was moved there in 1852, is locally believed to be the oldest church organization that has continued without a break to the present time.

Organization of the New York Conference. At a conference held at Roosevelt, beginning Oct. 25, 1862, the New York Conference (later called the New York and Pennsylvania Conference) was organized, comprising all the churches in New York and Pennsylvania. Sixteen churches entered the organization—Pennsylvania: Ulysses, Mixtown; New York: Catlin, Clarkson, Eagle Harbor, Grass River, Kirkville (now the Syracuse church), Mannsville, Mill Grove, Olcott, Oswego, Rochester, Roosevelt, Somerset, West Monroe, and Willing. David Arnold was elected the first president; J. M. Aldrich, secretary; and J. B. Lamson, treasurer. Other active members were Hiram Edson, S. W. Rhodes, C. O. Taylor, and R. F. Cottrell. Other churches were added the next year.

At the seventeenth session, held Nov. 13, 1878, the conference was divided. All the state of Pennsylvania and the counties of Chemung, Steuben, Allegany, Cattaraugus, and Chautauqua in New York became the Pennsylvania Conference, and the rest of New York became the New York Conference. Later these five counties were returned to the New York Conference. On Dec. 18, 1901, at a conference held in New York City, the Greater New York Conference was created to include Greater New York, Long Island, and the three counties of Rockland, Putnam, and Westchester. Then in order that the colporteurs might have country territory in which to work, to these were added in 1912 the counties of Sullivan and Ulster, and in 1922 the counties of Greene, Delaware, and Columbia. The New York Conference was a part of District no. 1 until 1901, when it became a part of the newly organized Eastern Union Conference, which shortly afterward became the Atlantic Union Conference. In 1890 the New York Conference began publishing the New York Indicator at the conference headquarters in Rome, with F. N. Johnson as editor. It served the conference well until 1911, when it was discontinued and the Atlantic Union Gleaner was sent instead to each family.

The conference was reorganized again in September of 1906 and divided into two. The western part of the state became the Western New York Conference and the part that comprised that portion of the state east of a line formed by the eastern boundary of the counties of Cayuga, Tompkins, and Tioga, except the counties south and east of Sullivan, Greene, and Columbia, became the New York Conference (commonly known as the Eastern New York Conference). Rome continued as headquarters for both conferences until the next year, when the Western New York Conference moved its offices to Salamanca. In 1915 the headquarters were moved to Rochester. In 1919 the offices of the (Eastern) New York Conference were moved to Utica. At a joint session held at Union Springs on Aug. 11, 1922, both conferences were reunited to form the New York Conference with headquarters at Union Springs.

The first school conducted by Seventh-day Adventists was established, in a home, at Buck's Bridge in 1853, with Martha Byington as teacher. In 1902 there were six schools: West Salamanca, whose teacher, Homer W. Carr, later became president of the Western New York Conference; Vienna; North Creek; Saranac Lake; Rome; and Minetto. Soon others were started. One of them, opened in December 1906 at Tunesassa, later became Fernwood Academy, which was joined in 1921 by the Eastern New York Academy at Clinton, to form the present Union Springs Academy at Union Springs.

The New York Conference has no medical institutions, but early SDA interest in diet and hydrotherapy as aids to health were stimulated in Dansville, New York, by the visit sometime in 1865 of James and Ellen White, John Loughborough, and Uriah Smith at Dr.

Jackson's Dansville institution. Some attempts were made early in the century to respond to the testimonies on diet and the need of health institutions published by Ellen White. Dr. Albert Satterlee, his wife, and Lenore Galloway, a nurse, opened treatment rooms and a sanitarium on Niagara Street in Buffalo (operated from 1902 to 1907); Dr. Isadore Green started the Black River Sanitarium in Watertown; and treatment rooms were operated in Rochester. Also for a time a city mission, The Star of Hope, where "a bed and a bowl of soup could be had for five cents," was operated at Buffalo, as were a city mission in Albany, and reading and lecture rooms in the downtown areas of Albany, Syracuse, and Buffalo.

Work among the Americans began about 1902, when Wilson Cornelius, from the Onondaga Reservation, visited Canada and learned of the seventh-day Sabbath. Upon returning home he attended the South Onondaga church and was later baptized. Frances Waldorf, a state nurse on the reservation for a time, stirred up an interest that was continued by Bible studies given by Mrs. Collins. A church was built on the reservation in 1941, and the congregation was organized June 13, 1942 with 22 members, who included members of the Mohawk, Oneida, and Onondaga tribes. David Schendoah became leader.

Among Syrians interest developed through Paul Baroudi, a Syrian peddler, who, when traveling through North Creek about the year 1912, used to stop overnight at the home of David Carr, who was the first to call his attention to the Sabbath. Later a Syrian who lived five miles (eight kilometers) away talked to him and gave him literature, which he studied diligently. Convinced, Baroudi was baptized in 1913 and won many of his relatives also. He became a colporteur, selling The Great Controversy, and through his earnestness won many others. A number of Syrians settled around North Creek, and for a long time were a majority of the members of the North Creek church.

Through the years work was carried on for the Swedish people in Jamestown, and Swedish-speaking ministers were provided. In 1922 a brick church building was erected. However, with the younger generation all using English, the Swedish and English churches united in 1959 and worship together now in a new church.

German work was carried on in Buffalo by German-speaking ministers, but today only English services are held.

For work among the Blacks, see Northeastern Conference.

Later Developments. Better Living programs, featuring the Five-Day Plan to Stop Smoking, cooking and nutrition schools, physical fitness and weight-reduction seminars, are being conducted with gratifying results. Under the impetus of the MISSION '72, '73, and '74 programs, public evangelism got under way in many places with pastors, lay members, and the conference evangelist holding crusades.

Effective utilization of the mass media continues to produce results as radio and television are being employed. The Amazing Facts radio program, and the daily Voice of Prophecy program, in several geographical areas, have been blessed by Heaven in reaching and converting hearts.

A breakthrough came in 1974 when the Five-Day Plan was telecast live over channel 21, WMHT, educational channel outlet in Schenectady, New York. The program was broadcast for five consecutive nights over cable television into the neighboring states of Vermont and Pennsylvania as well as straight transmission to the Tri-City capital district of Albany, New York.

The herculean challenge of reaching every home in the metropolitan area of Rochester with God's present truth message was implemented as the SDA churches of this famous Kodak city joined in preparing a Power Pack, comprised of Steps to Christ, an information-survey-request card, and a special locally designed and written brochure on the theme of Christ's second advent entitled "Ready or Not, Here I Come." More than 200,000 Power Packs in convenient doorknob hanging plastic envelopes were distributed in a four-week period.

As a result of the providential sale of the old mansion at 528 Oak Street in Syracuse that had housed the conference office since 1945, a new $250,000 headquarters office building was erected and occupied in 1970 on Onondaga Hill on Syracuse's south side on an 11-acre (four-hectare) parklike tract of land. This edifice houses all the departments plus a new Adventist Book Center, and provides additional office space for future growth.

Camp Cherokee, the youth camp situated in the natural splendor of the Adirondack Mountains on imposing Saranac Lake, has new buildings. Opportunity camps for underprivileged, non-Adventist youth from urban areas have been hosted here, providing an excellent ambience for youth evangelism. Such camps were held in addition to the regular camp schedule for SDA youth from the conference.

Union Springs Academy, the conference's secondary boarding high school, overlooking beautiful Lake Cayuga, one of the Empire State's finger lakes, has witnessed growth and expansion with a new administration classroom wing, a shower-locker room addition, an ample new recreational field, and more.

Camp meetings are held each summer on the campus of Union Springs Academy.

New Zealand

NEW ZEALAND. A constitutional monarchy in the Southwest Pacific; it recognizes the reigning British monarch as its sovereign. The British crown is represented in New Zealand by the governor-general, whom the queen appoints after consultation with the New Zealand government.

The country consists of two main islands about 1,300 miles (2,100 kilometers) southeast of Australia, with an area of 103,736 square miles (268,676 square kilometers). Adjacent to the South Island is Stewart Island, 670 square miles (1,740 square kilometers). There are also several minor islands and dependencies.

The population (1994) is 3.3 million, 85 percent of whom are of European extraction, and 9 percent of whom are Polynesian, mostly Maoris. Education is integrated ethnically, is compulsory, and is provided free by the state. New Zealand maintains universities in the following centers: Auckland, Hamilton, Palmerston North, Wellington, Christchurch, and Dunedin.

The native fauna includes no predatory animals or land snakes. The climate is healthful. The country has fertile plains, producing a variety of fruits and food products, mountains with swift-flowing rivers providing hydroelectric power, and rich subtropical forests. The North Island's thermal area includes volcanoes, geysers, hot springs, and boiling pools. The South Island embraces the Southern Alps, with snow-clad Mount Cook, 12,349 feet (3,764 meters), and the Tasman Glacier. New Zealand's chief products are dairy products, wheat, and wool.

New Zealand was discovered by Tasman in 1642. Capt. James Cook landed there Oct. 9, 1769, and claimed possession of the islands for England in the name of George III. The first missionary to the Maoris was Samuel Marsden, an Anglican minister, called the Apostle of New Zealand, who began work there in 1814. White settlers came about 1840, the year in which New Zealand became a British colony. By 1881 colonists numbered about 500,000.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. The territory of New Zealand is divided into the North and South New Zealand conferences and forms a part of the Trans-Tasman Union Conference (which includes also parts of Australia), in the South Pacific Division. Statistics (1992) for New Zealand: churches, 82; church companies, 13; members, 10,311; church schools (including Longburn Adventist College), 17; ordained ministers, 41; licensed ministers, 4 (excluding teachers); church school teachers (including part-time but excluding Longburn Adventist College staff), 44.

Statistics for the constituent conferences—North New Zealand Conference: churches, 63; church companies, 9; members, 8,377; church schools, 14; ordained ministers, 32; licensed ministers, 3; church school teachers, 37. Headquarters: Manukau City. South New Zealand Conference: churches, 19; members, 1,934; church schools, 2; ordained ministers, 9; licensed ministers, 1; church school teachers, 10. Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. As early as 1874 an interest in Seventh-day Adventist teachings was awakened in individuals in New Zealand by publications sent from friends or relatives in the U.S. (J. H. Waggoner, in The True Missionary 1:12, December 1874). In October 1885 S. N. Haskell, an American SDA minister, came to Auckland from Australia and lodged in the boardinghouse of Edward Hare, who with his wife became the first converts in New Zealand. As a result of Haskell's work, within four weeks a small group began to observe the seventh-day Sabbath in Auckland. Haskell and Hare then journeyed about 150 miles (240 kilometers) north to Kaeo, the site of the Hare family homestead. After three weeks Haskell was called back to Australia, but by this time a group at Kaeo had decided to observe the Sabbath.

About three months later, in March 1886, on his way to America, Haskell revisited Kaeo. He stayed for two weeks, baptized 15 people, and organized a Sabbath school. Robert Hare, a younger brother of Edward, had already departed to Healdsburg College to study for the ministry.

The first evangelist appointed to serve in New Zealand was A. G. Daniells, who arrived in New Zealand Nov. 13, 1886, with a large tent. Before the end of the year he visited Kaeo and baptized an additional 15 people. The first Seventh-day Adventist church in New Zealand was then organized at Kaeo with 30 members. The first Maori convert was won at this time.

On Dec. 29 a tent series was opened in Auckland with meetings every night. A keen interest was evident, and five months later, in May 1887, a Sabbath school of 78 was organized and the yet unbaptized Sabbathkeepers began to erect a church building in Ponsonby, Auckland. This building was in use by July, but not until October were the 67 members baptized and organized into a church. Their house of worship is reputed to be the first Adventist church erected in the Southern Hemisphere. (This building was erected before there existed an organized SDA church to occupy it, for the people who built it were new converts yet unbaptized. Already in the preceding year the Pitcairn Islanders, also yet unbaptized converts, worshiped in their own building, but it was one in which they had formerly worshiped. Apparently the first house of worship built in the Southern Hemisphere by a baptized Seventh-day Adventist congregation was that in Beaconsfield, South Africa, soon after the organization of the church in August 1887. The Auckland building can lay claim to being the first in the Southern Hemisphere to be built for use as a Seventh-day Adventist church.)

The first New Zealander ordained as an SDA minister was Robert Hare, ordained at Oakland, California, May 24, 1888. On returning to New Zealand he joined Daniells in Napier, where they erected their tent, Oct. 29, 1888, for meetings that continued every night for 12 weeks. As a result, a church of 28 members was established, who dedicated their church building Dec. 25, 1889. In 1890 they reported a membership of about 75. In the meantime Hare had taken the tent to Gisborne, where in due course a Sabbath school of 36 members was organized, and later in 1890 a church of 19 members was established and a church building purchased.

First Conference Organized. On May 29, 1889, the first conference was organized, known as the New Zealand Conference, with a constituency of 155 church members in three churches. A. G. Daniells was elected as the first president. M. C. Israel, who had recently opened up the work in Tasmania, assisted in the organization. E. M. Morrison, of California, prepared and sent out 10 colporteurs from the meeting at which the organization was effected.

Hare next pitched the mission tent in Palmerston North in December 1889, held meetings until Mar. 16, 1890, won 24 converts, and had 45 attending Sabbath school. Hare was then transferred to Australia.

At the Napier camp meeting in March 1890 M. C. Israel was elected president of the New Zealand Conference, whose headquarters were in Wellington.

During 1891 tent campaigns were held in Kaikoura, Blenheim, and Nelson, in the South Island. In December 1891 G. B. Starr and his wife, with Ellen White and her son W. C. White, called at Auckland on their way to Australia. Mrs. White spoke at the Ponsonby church.

Ellen White in New Zealand. In 1893 it was arranged that Mrs. White should spend some months in New Zealand, visiting and counseling the growing churches. She attended the camp meetings in Napier and in Wellington, the latter of which was attended also by O. A. Olsen, General Conference president, and Dr. M. G. Kellogg. During her stay in New Zealand, churches were established at Hastings, Kaikoura, and Ormondville. While at the Browns' homestead at Paremata, near Wellington, she wrote a number of chapters of the book The Desire of Ages.

First SDA Union Conference. At the Middle Brighton camp meeting, Melbourne, Australia (Jan. 15—25, 1894), the first union conference in the denomination was organized, when the Australasian Union Conference was formed, which embraced the territory of Australia, New Zealand, and a large area of the Pacific Islands. The executive officers were W. C. White, president, A. G. Daniells, vice president.

J. E. Fulton arrived from the United States in 1895, and with J. O. Corliss, who had worked in Australia, engaged in evangelism in Auckland. By the end of 1895 churches had been established in Kaeo, Ponsonby (Auckland), Napier, Gisborne, Palmerston North, Wellington, Ormondville, Hastings, Kaikoura, and Epsom (Auckland). Companies had been formed in Blenheim, Nelson, Norsewood, and Dannevirke. In 1896 E. W. Farnsworth arrived from the United States to work in New Zealand. By the end of 1905, 13 churches were reported, with 506 members, and three church schools. In July 1900 the Christchurch Sanitarium was opened.

On Feb. 3, 1908, a boarding academy was dedicated and opened at Pukekura, near Cambridge, North Island, which later was moved to Longburn, near Palmerston North; in 1913 it became the Oroua Missionary School, and later New Zealand Missionary College, now Longburn Adventist College.

New Zealand Conference Divided. In 1915 the New Zealand Conference was divided; the territory north of Cook Strait became the North New Zealand Conference, with J. M.

Cole as president, and the territory south of Cook Strait became the South New Zealand Conference, with W. H. Pascoe as president. In the North New Zealand Conference in 1915, there were three churches with 513 members, and two church schools with 33 pupils.

New Zealand Part of Trans-Tasman Union. In 1948—1949, when the Australasian Union Conference was formed into a division (composed of union conferences and union missions), which ultimately became known as the Australasian Division of Seventh-day Adventists, the North and South New Zealand conferences were constituted a part of the Trans-Tasman Union.

The Maori Work. Intermittent evangelism has been conducted among the Maoris through the years, and a number have become church members. There are two all-Maori churches.

B. Haraki was the first Maori minister to be appointed. In several churches in the North New Zealand Conference with integrated congregations, dedicated Maori laymen serve as elders.

Sanitarium Health Food Company. Branches of the Sanitarium Health Food Company begun in Australia in the late 1890s have been established in New Zealand, the earnings of which are used exclusively for the church's educational and missionary enterprises. The company was founded to provide simple, nutritious, healthful foods for the community. It began without capital in a small wooden building, with a brick oven attached, built at Papanui, Christchurch, in 1900 at a cost of £50.

Its staff of two consisted of a manager and a manufacturer of whole-wheat products and of a cereal health coffee. From this small beginning the work continued to expand until today there is a staff of hundreds serving large factories producing many tons of food products, including a variety of breakfast foods, meat substitutes, and yeast extracts.

Recent Developments. Advances have been made in the use of radio, Bible correspondence courses, Vacation Bible Schools, youth and Sabbath school conventions, and in a new emphasis upon public evangelism.

An increasing number of national-speaking Polynesian churches have been established in North New Zealand. The largest national group are the Samoans, but there are also Tongan, Cook Island, and Fijian churches. A significant number of church members in North New Zealand are of Polynesian background.

In January 1974 the Auckland Adventist Hospital was opened by the lord mayor.

In 1970 a new high school was built at Auckland in spacious surroundings, with an enrollment of 66; this grew to 160 in 1993.

Newbold College

NEWBOLD COLLEGE. A coeducational senior college operated by the Trans-European Division on an 84-acre (34-hectare) estate 30 miles (50 kilometers) west of London, in Bracknell, Berkshire. It offers both undergraduate and postgraduate studies. Undergraduate courses are offered in business administration (accounting and management), the humanities (history and English), music, religion, and theology. Master's degrees are offered in education, pastoral ministry, and religion. All B.A., B.B.A., and M.A. degrees are offered through affiliation with Andrews University, Berrien Springs, Michigan. A new program of affiliation was entered into with the Open University Validation Services of Great Britain in 1993 leading to recognition by that university of the college's course offerings. The college operates a school of English for non-English-speaking persons from around the world interested in learning the English language in an English environment and culture.

Newbold was founded in North London in January 1902 as the British training college under the name of Duncombe Hall Missionary College, under the direction of Homer R. Salisbury. The next year it moved to Holloway Hall, North London, and during the years 1904 to 1907, the college continued in Manor Gardens, near Holloway Hall. In 1907 it moved to the 55-acre (22-hectare) Stanborough estate near the town of Watford, Hertfordshire. Here the school, named Stanborough Missionary College and enlarged to 218 acres (88 hectares) in 1919, remained until 1931. By 1911, 36 of its students were in denominational work in Britain, and 20 were serving as missionaries overseas. Beginning in 1915, the curriculum included courses leading to the London University Matriculation and Intermediate Examinations in Science and Arts. Training in carpentry, shoe repairing, and agriculture was also provided. Later a two-year teacher training course and a primary school were added. During the 1920s a large number of graduates and former students were appointed to foreign service.

In 1931 the college moved to Newbold Revel, a 300-acre (120-hectare) estate near Rugby, in central England, which had extensive buildings, including a mansion, a gymnasium, and a number of cottages; other facilities included a sawmill, farm buildings, and provisions for dairy and sheep farming. From this estate the college took its present name, Newbold College.

During World War II the British government requisitioned the estate for the use of the Royal Air Force, and from 1941 the college was relocated in temporary quarters at Packwood Haugh, Hockley Heath, about 10 miles (16 kilometers) south of Birmingham. In January 1946 it moved to its present site in the village of Binfield, near Bracknell, Berkshire. While it is within easy reach of London, it is also close to Windsor, Reading, Winchester, and Oxford—to mention a few of the many nearby places of educational and cultural interest.

The Binfield purchase consisted of three major buildings that were the original homes located on separate but contiguous properties—Moor Close, Egremont, and Binfield Hall; the first is used as a women's residence, the second as an all-purpose unit, and the third a married students' residence. The first custom-built facility was Salisbury Hall in 1956, housing administrative offices, classrooms, and assembly hall. This was followed by Keough House, built in 1962 as a men's residence, a gymnasium in 1972, and the Roy Graham Library, built in 1974 and extended in 1986. The library has a capacity holding of 100,000 volumes and houses the E. G. White-SDA Research Centre.

Later additions included Murdoch Hall, built in 1983, housing the seminary, business administration department, computer services and general administration; and Schuil House, built in 1989 as an additional single students' residence. Since 1975 a married students' village has been developed around Binfield Hall. A student body of 325 is enrolled, served by a teaching staff of 35. A typical student group comes from more than 50 countries spread around the world.

The college operates a horticulture enterprise, a laundry, and full maintenance and grounds departments.

Newbury Park Adventist Academy

NEWBURY PARK ADVENTIST ACADEMY. A coeducational day school on the senior high school level situated on U.S. Highway 101 in southeastern Ventura County, 45 miles (70 kilometers) northwest of Los Angeles, in Newbury Park, a community within the city of Thousand Oaks.

Accredited by the Seventh-day Adventist Board of Regents (1951) and a charter member of the Western Association of Schools and Colleges (accredited 1962), the school's average enrollment is currently 125. Its teaching staff numbers 12 full-time, two part-time, and four classified members.

Following the closing of the old San Fernando Academy in 1923, the Southern California Conference maintained an interest in establishing a boarding school in a rural setting. It purchased land near Oxnard, which it sold about 1937. Finally, in 1945, the conference committee purchased 135 acres (55 hectares) traversed by U.S. Highway 101 at the southwest edge of Conejo Valley, and called Frank E. Rice, a graduate of Stanford, to become principal-manager of the yet-unnamed school.

Elder David Voth (conference president) had formulated a plan to let young people from the city live in a rural setting, study a college preparatory curriculum, and become vocationally proficient, all with a Christian atmosphere.

Mr. Rice put together a staff of professional teachers with unique vocational training willing to teach academic classes and to supervise vocational activities. One such man was Ray Alderson, who was commissioned to direct and develop the total vocational program. His inventive genius set up a sophisticated poultry operation with a high level of production and efficiency, all the while teaching the Bible classes and pastoring the school church.

School opened in September 1948 with minimal buildings. Over a period of time the campus expanded to 560 acres (230 hectares). Wells were dug, and 39 faculty homes and four small apartments were built. In keeping with the vocational emphasis, a laundry was established, a broom/mop factory was set up, extensive agricultural pursuits were established, and a pedigreed dairy herd was acquired. The excellent farm produce as well as the maintenance service personnel and equipment kept the school a prominent factor in the community of Newbury Park for 20 years. After the highway became a freeway, an equestrian center was developed, but by 1983 the demographics had shifted, necessitating the closing of the dormitories and changing over the academy to a Ventura County constituency day school.

The academy is in possible transition to be rebuilt on the back portion of the existing 457 acre (185-hectare) site.

Nicaragua

NICARAGUA. The largest country of Central America, with an area of 50,193 square miles (130,000 square kilometers), lying between Honduras on the north and Costa Rica on the south, and reaching from the Caribbean Sea on the east to the Pacific Ocean on the west. Its population, about 60 percent of which is urban, was 4.1 million (1994). The average annual population increase is nearly three percent. Roman Catholicism is the principal religion, but for many years the government has upheld religious freedom.

History

History. Beginnings of Seventh-day Adventist Work. F. J. Hutchins, the first missionary to bring the SDA message to Nicaragua, arrived in 1892 and sold books. In 1898 C. F. Brooks became an SDA through Hutchins' influence. He worked for 12 years as a layperson while awaiting baptism, and established the first group of believers at Yulu (where a church was later organized) before H. C. Goodrich visited the area in 1912 and baptized him and two converts from among the Mosquito Indians of the Caribbean coast. A church was organized in Laguna de Perlas in 1914. In 1916 J. A. Reed established the Corn Island church.

Progress of the Work. The Nicaragua Mission was organized in January 1929, with Ellis P. Howard as the president. At that time there were four English-speaking churches on the east coast, the only portion of the country entered; there was only one Spanish-speaking member at that time. Property was bought in Managua for the mission office building and the first SDA church in that city.

Medical work was begun in Bluefields in 1920 by Dr. N. M. Brayshaw. Later Dr. C. E. Nelson transferred it to Puerto Cabezas. In 1958, under the direction of Dr. F. B. Moor, Jr., it was moved to La Trinidad, where a modern hospital was developed. The Hospital Adventista de Nicaragua was taken over by the Sandinistas during their control of the country in 1979.

Nicaragua Adventist Hospital

NICARAGUA ADVENTIST HOSPITAL (Hospital Adventista de Nicaragua). A former general acute-care hospital with a capacity of 30 beds and six bassinets situated on the Pan American Highway at La Trinidad, Esteli, Nicaragua, 75 miles (120 kilometers) north of Managua, the capital of the country. It was owned and operated by the Central American Union. The hospital property, worth $362,065, included 161 acres (65 hectares) of land and several modern buildings, including a nurses' dormitory, cafeteria, church, church school, workshop and laundry, four apartments, and 13 modern residences. The hospital employed three physicians, 16 graduate nurses, 23 student nurses, and 15 other employees, and offered general medical, surgical, and obstetrical care, with ward and private services. There were laboratory, physical therapy, X-ray, and emergency facilities, and two operating rooms. It was easily accessible to all parts of Nicaragua and Central America.

The hospital was organized as a self-supporting (privately owned) institution in 1948 by C. J. McCleary, a physician, under the name Clinica y Hospital Adventista. It was first situated in the small lumber town of Puerto Cabezas, on the isolated northeastern coast of Nicaragua. On Jan. 1, 1954, the Central American Union took over the administration of the hospital. Because of the remoteness of the hospital from the centers of population of the country and the insecure future of Puerto Cabezas, the original buildings were sold in 1958 and the hospital was moved to La Trinidad. After two years of operation in the unfinished buildings, the new hospital was officially opened on Jan. 22, 1961. Physicians William and Karen Shea were on the staff from 1960 to 1963, and were replaced in August 1963 by Vernon C. Sparks.

In 1950 a Nursing School was begun under the direction of Marjorie Bell and was accredited with the Nicaraguan government. In 1974 the school offered a three-year professional nursing program with a total of 107 graduates up to that date. The first year was given on the campus of Central American Adventist University in Costa Rica. In 1974 the enrollment was 44. The school was affiliated in psychiatry with government institutions in Managua.

By 1980 Nicaragua Adventist Hospital had been taken over by the Sandinistas and ceased to function as a church institution.

Medical Directors: Fred B. Moor, Jr., 1954—1968; Vernon C. Sparks, 1968—1973; Jose Delfin Rosales, 1973—1976; Donald Vargas, 1977—1979.

Nichol, Francis David

NICHOL, FRANCIS DAVID (1897—1966). Editor of the Review and Herald for 21 years, minister, and author. He was born at Thirlmere, Australia. His parents, John and Mary Nichol, had become Seventh-day Adventists after reading a stray copy of the Review and Herald. When he was 8 years old the family moved to Loma Linda, California, where his father had been invited to join the pioneer group of workers in the development of the hospital and medical school. He graduated from San Fernando Academy in 1914 and from Pacific Union College in 1920. The preceding year he had married Rose Elizabeth Macklin.

Upon graduation Nichol served briefly as pastor in Vallejo, California, and in 1921 became associate editor of the Signs of the Times for six years. Beginning with the General Conference session of 1922 he edited the General Conference Bulletin, a quadrennial task he continued for the remainder of his life.

In 1927 F. M. Wilcox invited Nichol to become associate editor of the Review and Herald, and soon after Wilcox's retirement in 1945, he was appointed editor in chief, at which post he remained until his death. From 1934 to 1945 he was concurrently editor of Life and Health. During his long editorial career he wrote incessantly—articles, editorials, and books, some involving extensive and painstaking research. He was also editor of The Seventh-day Adventist Bible Commentary.

Nichol became closely identified with a number of special areas of denominational interest and concern, especially the medical work, the area of science and religion, and the life and work of Ellen White. For 15 years he was a member of the Board of Trustees of the Ellen G. White Estate, for the last three of which he was chair. In 1925 in San Francisco he and Alonzo L. Baker engaged in a series of debates on evolution versus Creation. A project in which he took special interest was the Review and Herald Memorial church in Hyattsville, Maryland, which he and a group of workers from the Review and Herald established and of which he was the founder and first pastor.

Among his more than 20 books are The Answer to Modern Religious Thinking, Answers to Objections, Behold He Cometh, Certainty of My Faith, Creation—Not Evolution, God and Evolution, Ellen G. White and Her Critics, Why I Believe in Mrs. E. G. White, The Midnight Cry, God's Challenge to Modern Apostasy, Why I Am a Seventh-day Adventist, Making Ready for Heaven, Questions People Have Asked Me, and Reasons for Our Faith.

Nichols, Otis

NICHOLS, OTIS (1798—1876). A Millerite, one of the first to accept Joseph Bates's teachings of the seventh-day Sabbath. Having begun to keep the Sabbath in 1845, he offered the hospitality of his home at Dorchester (now South Boston), Massachusetts, and his means to the traveling preachers of the Seventh-day Adventist faith. Ellen White wrote about him and his wife: "They were ever ready with words of encouragement to comfort me . . . , and often their prayers ascended to heaven in my behalf" (2SG 68). In his home, on Nov. 8, 1848, she had the vision in which she was shown the need of the publishing work. A lithographer by trade, he prepared the prophetic charts used by the early Adventist evangelists.

Nicola, Leroy T.

NICOLA, LEROY T. (1856—1940). Minister, secretary of the General Conference, secretary and treasurer of the International Tract Society. He joined the Seventh-day Adventist Church at the age of 18 and graduated from Battle Creek College in 1880. The next year he was ordained to the ministry and engaged in pastoral work in Des Moines, Iowa. From 1893 to 1897 he was the secretary of the General Conference. From 1897 to 1901 he was secretary and treasurer of the International Tract Society. Later he was pastor of churches in New York, Massachusetts, and Michigan.

Nielsen, Niels Balle

NIELSEN, NIELS BALLE (1899—1968). Evangelist and treasurer. He was born in Copenhagen and began his ministry as an evangelist in Denmark in 1918. Following this he served for five years as secretary-treasurer of the Danish Conference. In 1925 he and his wife answered a call to India, where he served as treasurer for the Oriental Watchman Publishing House for two years. This was followed by a five-year term as secretary-treasurer of the South India Union Mission. After a short time in his homeland he became secretary-treasurer of the Ethiopian Mission for 14 years. This was followed by a number of years of service in West Africa.

Niger

NIGER. A republic in north central Africa, independent since 1960. It has close ties with France. The capital is Niamey. It is bounded on the north by Algeria and Libya, on the east by Chad, on the south by Nigeria and Benin, and on the west by Burkina Faso and Mali. The area is 489,189 square miles (1.2 million square kilometers). The population (1994), estimated at 8.6 million, is mainly Tuareg and Djerma. The official language is French, but there are many unwritten Sudanic dialects, also Arabic and Tuareg. About 80 percent of the people are Muslims, but there is some admixture of animism. Most of the people live in the south, from the Niger River to Lake Chad, because the northern portion, being part of the Sahara Desert, is too hot and dry.

During the Middle Ages, Arab invaders and African Muslim leaders established empires in several African territories, among which were those of Hausaland and Bornou, in the territory that is now Niger.

From 1971 to 1978 this country was a part of the Equatorial African Union; from 1979 to 1980, a part of the West Central African Union; and from 1981, a part of the Sahel Union Mission, which is in the Africa-Indian Ocean Division. In 1972 a delegation of Seventh-day Adventist ministers went to Niamey, capital of Niger, to contact the authorities with a view to opening SDA work in the country. The president of the republic received the delegation in person and expressed a desire to have medical work opened up by the Seventh-day Adventist Church. As of 1993 there was a mission station with 30 members in this country.

Nigeria

NIGERIA. An African federation, it won independence on Oct. 1, 1960, and became a republic in October 1963. Nigeria is bounded on the south by the Gulf of Guinea, on the east by Chad and the Cameroon republic, on the north by Niger, and on the west by Benin. The country, with its capital at Abuja, consists of 30 states and the federal capital territory of Abuja.

Nigeria's area is 356,669 square miles (923,773 square kilometers). The most populous state on the continent, it has an estimated population (1994) of more than 98 million, 50 percent of whom are Muslims, mainly in the north, and 40 percent are Christians. The rest are chiefly animists. During the eighteenth century as many as 100,000 slaves a year were shipped through the ports along the Nigerian coast. Agriculture is the principal occupation, the chief exports being cocoa, palm products, peanuts, and cotton. Since the early 1970s crude oil production has become the chief source of the national income.

The geography of Nigeria is strikingly varied. Immediately north are mangrove swamps that soon give way to tropical rain forests in which palm products grow abundantly. Farther inland is a rolling plain dotted with orchard-type trees, and beyond them rises a plateau with grotesque little thorn trees. In the far north even the thorns disappear, and there is nothing but burning sky and scorched wasteland as one reaches the outer fringes of the Sahara, the white-hot heart of Africa. Two large rivers, the Niger flowing southeast and the Benue flowing west, converge at the city of Lokoja, dividing the country into three natural geographical regions.

About 100 years ago missionaries began entering Nigeria to establish schools. Many Nigerians have fathers and grandfathers who were educated men. The first university was established in Nigeria in 1948. In 1993 there were 33 state universities and many colleges and polytechnic schools.

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. Seventh-day Adventist missions in Nigeria began in 1914, when D. C. Babcock, who had worked in Sierra Leone since 1905, arrived in Lagos. He was accompanied by two Sierra Leone workers, R. P. Dauphin and S. Morgue. Leaving his family at Lagos, he made a tour northward as far as Jebba, on the Niger River about 600 miles (1,000 kilometers) from the coast. Babcock selected a mission site at Erunmu, 12 miles (20 kilometers) north of Ibadan, capital of the Western Region. One of the young men who had come with Babcock from Sierra Leone learned the Yoruba language so quickly that within five months he opened a school near Lalupon. The missionaries' language instructor, son of a local chief, soon began to keep the Sabbath. Before the end of 1914 three schools were in operation and seven converts were reported.

In 1917 Babcock, stricken with ill health, was compelled to leave for England with his family. On the way they narrowly escaped death when their ship was torpedoed and sunk. E. Ashton, of England, succeeded Babcock and was succeeded in turn in 1920 by W. McClements of Northern Ireland. McClements remained in charge of the work in Nigeria until his transfer to Accra, Ghana, in 1946, to become the president of the newly organized West African Union Mission.

In 1923 Jesse Clifford and his wife, of England, having served in Sierra Leone and Ghana, came to begin work in the Eastern Region of Nigeria. They established there the Aba Station, which later became the headquarters for the work in East Nigeria, the most fruitful West African field. In the same year

W. G. Till, of England, opened a station at Otun, 60 miles (96 kilometers) from Shao. This station became the center of a prosperous work in the Ekiti area. With Otun well established, headquarters were transferred in 1927 from Shao, where they had been set up, to Ibadan, the capital of the Western Region.

In the Eastern Region a second station was opened at Elele in 1930, in the charge of

L. Edmonds, of England. In 1931 he was succeeded by Clifford, who was stationed at Aba. Elele then came under the direction of A. C. Vine, also of England.

Organization and Advance. In 1930 the East and West Nigerian missions were organized. In 1931 Seventh-day Adventists entered the Northern Region, when J. J. Hyde, coming with his wife and young son from Sierra Leone and Ghana, opened the Jengre station. Mrs. Hyde immediately began dispensary work, and by successfully treating victims of an epidemic, forged an enduring link between the people and the mission. The dispensary later developed into the Jengre SDA Hospital in the charge of Dr. J. A. Hyde, son of J. J. Hyde. The headquarters of the Northern Mission were later transferred to Bukuru, but Jengre still remained a busy station with a hospital and a large school.

At Ibadan a teacher training school was opened in 1932, directed by W.T.B. Hyde, of England. This school was transferred to Ihie in 1947 (see [Seventh-day Adventist Training College \[Ihie\]](#)). In 1944 the first SDA hospital in the Western Region was opened at Ile-Ife. The 1946 reorganization of all the work on the west coast brought W. G. Till from Otun to Ibadan as president of the new West Nigerian Mission. In 1948 a Voice of Prophecy Bible Correspondence School was inaugurated at Ibadan by E. Keslake, a minister from the United States. Later a weekly Voice of Prophecy broadcast from Ibadan was begun. Shortly after, the TV program Faith for Today was granted a half hour every Sunday night.

In the East Nigerian Mission a forward step was taken in 1947 when the Nigerian Training College and Secondary School was established at Ihie. This absorbed the training school previously established at Ibadan. The coming of regional self-government resulting in the establishment of a greatly increased number of schools under a free primary education plan pointed out the need for a West Nigerian Mission training school. As a result, the Adventist Training College was opened at Otun in 1955 under C. A. Bartlett, of England. Later developments in the Western Region included the establishment of the Adventist College of West Africa and the SDA Grammar school at Ede, both in 1960.

In 1952 the North Nigerian Mission was organized. In 1955 E. E. Hulbert, of England, began work in the Calabar area in the Eastern Region, while at the same time P. E. Onwere began work in the Warri area. Hospitals were opened in cooperation with local authorities, at Ahoada and at North Ngwa.

Tremendous changes have in recent years taken place in Nigeria. As an increasing number of nationals have graduated from Nigerian universities or have returned from universities abroad to take up responsible posts of leadership, the government of Nigeria has taken over a number of our institutions. Almost immediately after the Nigerian civil war, the government took over the management of the Nigerian Training College and SDA Secondary School at Ihie as well as our two East Nigerian hospitals, the Ahoada County Hospital, and the Northern Ngwa County Hospital. The institutions still operated by the church now have an increasing number of nationals who are holding positions of leadership.

A new mission was organized in 1971—the Rivers Mission with headquarters in Port Harcourt. The positions of president, secretary-treasurer, and departmental leaders are now all held by nationals in all our conferences and missions in Nigeria.

Because of the large increase in membership in the West African Union, in 1972, Nigeria was separated from that organization and organized into the new Nigerian Union Mission, with headquarters in Lagos. S. Gustavsson became the first president of the new union. When he left in 1977 H. S. Andersen became the union president until 1984 when O. Adeogun succeeded him. Since 1990 L. T. Daniel has been the union president.

In 1977 the East Nigerian Mission became the first conference in the union. That same year what later became the Edo-Delta Mission was carved out of the West Nigerian Mission. In 1986 the East Central Mission was formed, and in 1989 the West Nigerian Mission became a conference.

The year 1993 was a landmark year in many ways. The Rivers Mission became a conference; the North Nigeria Mission was reorganized into the North East and North West missions. The South East Mission Station became a mission.

Nile Union Academy

NILE UNION ACADEMY. A Seventh-day Adventist coeducational secondary day and boarding school operated by the Egypt Field at Gabal Asfar, 10 miles (16 kilometers) northeast of Cairo, Egypt. It is accredited by the Board of Regents of the General Conference. Religious training is emphasized.

A forerunner of the school was the short-lived Arabic Union Mission Training School, operated at Matariah, near Cairo, from 1927 to about 1930, directed by V. E. Toppenberg, with Ibrahim Khalil as a teacher.

Then the Fayoum Training School was opened November 1946 at Seila, in the oasis of Fayoum. This school was situated on a 65-acre (26-hectare) farm purchased partly with the life savings of an Armenian church member in Cairo, who died shortly afterward. During the first year, when the administration building was under construction, the 25 students who attended lived in tents. The land was improved by the installation of irrigation works and the planting of several thousand fruit trees. A dormitory was also constructed. Robert L. Rowe was the first director of the school; he continued to be in charge of the farm when, in mid-1948, E. C. Wines was appointed principal. The school, while at Seila, was known variously as the Fayoum Training School, the SDA Training School, the Egypt Training School, and the Egypt Academy.

When it was decided to move the institution, a 33-acre (13-hectare) piece of land was secured in the agricultural village of Gabal Asfar in 1952. However, a secondary school was first conducted in Heliopolis (1953—1954) with J. S. Russell as headmaster before boarding facilities were arranged at Gabal Asfar. Meanwhile the administration building was being constructed at Gabal Asfar, irrigation works and canals were prepared, and the building of two faculty cottages was begun. Classes began at Gabal Asfar in October 1954, with 39 boys.

First known as the Adventist Institute and the Nile Union Training School, it was designated the Nile Union Academy in 1955. It was operated by the Nile Union from 1951 until 1962, when the union was dissolved, then by the Egypt Section.

In 1958 agriculture and carpentry were added to the curriculum, and enrollment increased to 50. Increasing government regulation of the secondary school curriculum led to the adoption of a seminary-type program, and in the 1960s the school was renamed the Coptic Adventist Theological Seminary (later simply Adventist Theological Seminary). It was recognized by the government and accredited by the ministry of education as a theological school. The boys' dormitory was completed in 1959 and within a few months electricity, water, and telephone services from Cairo were connected. A new wing was added to the administration building in 1961 and a girls' dormitory was opened in 1989.

The school lost its government recognition in 1986 and in 1994 was still attempting to regain it. Since 1986 it has again been known as Nile Union Academy. Meanwhile, the academy is recognized by Cambridge University (UK) as a center for teaching the IGCSE curriculum.

Niue

NIUE (Savage Island). An island lying about 300 miles (500 kilometers) east of the Vava'u islands in the north of Tonga, with a land mass of 100 square miles (260 square kilometers). The population (1989) of 2,500 is distributed among more than a dozen villages, the largest being Alofi, the administrative center and port of entry. Almost the entire coastline is a rocky cliff of raised coral rock. The soil is fertile though not plentiful, for the rocky terrain makes cultivation difficult.

In the latter part of the nineteenth century, Niue came under British jurisdiction and was subsequently annexed by New Zealand in 1901 as part of the Cook Islands. Niue became self-governing and independent on Oct. 19, 1974. Christianity was first brought to Niue by John Williams, of the London Missionary Society.

It became self-governing in 1975, with New Zealand being responsible for its defense and foreign relations. Niue islanders are issued New Zealand passports.

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. In March 1909 J. E. Steed, then in Samoa, made contact with Niue Islander Vaiola Kerisome, who accepted the SDA message and in January 1910 accompanied Steed to Australia, where she attended Avondale College. In 1914 she assisted in the Maori work in New Zealand and late in 1915 returned to Niue. Some nine months later S. W. Carr arrived, staying until 1919. During his time three thatched meeting houses were erected, in Alofi, Avatele, and Sialiuta, and the Alofi church was organized in 1918. From 1920—1924, E. J. Giblett led out. Just before Giblett left Niue, Vaiola Keresome married Allan Head, an English businessman on the island. Working alone and without remuneration, she cared for the work of the church on the island by conducting a children's Sabbath school, translating Patriarchs and Prophets into the Niuean language, and nurturing the baptized members.

Recognizing her educational talents, the then New Zealand minister of island affairs, Sir Maui Pomare, encouraged her to take up teaching and commence an education program on the island. So successful was Vaiola Head that in later years she became known as the "Mother of Education" on Niue Island. In 1958 she was awarded an MBE (Member of the British Empire) honor. Vaiola passed to her rest on June 13, 1963.

Because of significant migration to New Zealand, the population has decreased throughout the years, and this has affected church membership.

Nokuphila Hospital

NOKUPHILA HOSPITAL. A 60-bed medical institution for Africans, operated from 1936 to 1959 in the Western Native Township, a few miles from Johannesburg, by the South African Union Conference. It was closed when all the Africans living in the area surrounding the hospital were moved to an area 12 miles (19 kilometers) from Johannesburg, where the government operated a 1,200-bed hospital. In 1944 the hospital was served by one resident doctor, two consulting doctors, two White and two African nurses. There were 20 African student nurses in training. During the 24 years of its existence, during which it graduated a number of African nurses, Nokuphila Hospital reported 34,932 patients admitted, 10,841 medical cases, 5,713 major and 20,473 minor surgical operations. Of the outpatients (clinic), new cases numbered 116,758 and return visits 145,640.

The spiritual work was fostered by African pastors and staff aided by White doctors and nurses. A church company was organized at the hospital in 1956.

Medical Directors: A. N. Tonge, 1936—1938; D. H. Abbott, 1938—1940; H. J. Davies, 1940—1941; W. R. Grant, 1941; E. G. Marcus, 1942—1943; W. R. Grant, 1943; G.A.S. Madgwick, 1943—1953; W. R. Grant, 1954—1956; P. G. Peach, 1957—1959.

Noncombatancy

NONCOMBATANCY. The status of one who does not bear arms. From the first the Seventh-day Adventist Church has staunchly advocated noncombatancy for its members. In 1863, during the American Civil War, the United States passed a draft law with special provisions for churches that held noncombatant principles. The newly organized General Conference of Seventh-day Adventists filed official statements with state governors and with the federal government listing its noncombatant teachings. The first of these statements, addressed to the governor of Michigan on Aug. 3, 1864, read in part: “We now lay before Your Excellency the sentiments of Seventh-day Adventists, as a body, relative to bearing arms, trusting that you will feel no hesitation in endorsing our claim that, as a people, we come under the intent of the late action of Congress concerning those who are conscientiously opposed to bearing arms, and are entitled to the benefits of said laws.”

The various statements were accepted, and the church was notified that its members were entitled to the noncombatant provisions of the law.

The subject did not come up again until World War I. In the United States a statement confirming the position taken during the Civil War was adopted by the North American Division on Apr. 18, 1917: “We hereby reaffirm the foregoing declaration. We petition that our religious convictions be recognized by those in authority, and that we be required to serve our country only in such capacity as will not violate our conscientious obedience to the law of God as contained in the decalogue, interpreted in the teachings of Christ, and exemplified in His life” (North American Division Committee Minutes 1:517, Apr. 18, 1917).

Since the church had by that time grown to worldwide proportions, representations were made to various governments by the Seventh-day Adventist organizations within these countries—for example, the following statement was presented to the prime minister of Great Britain and is quoted in part from the minutes of the British Union Conference for Jan. 12, 1916: “As a church we are opposed to war. Our people in the United States, during the Civil War, were recognized as noncombatants, and lately in Australia and South Africa we have been granted exemption from combatant duties and from general work on the Sabbath.”

In Continental Europe, World War I broke with such speed that Seventh-day Adventist Church leaders were unable to gather for counsel, hence no official stand was taken. Later, at a council of the European Division Committee at Gland, Switzerland, Jan. 2, 1923, a statement of noncombatant principles was issued, which read: “Declaration of Principles. The executive committee of the European Division of the denomination of Seventh-day Adventists, assembled in conference at Gland, Switzerland, having carefully counseled concerning Sabbathkeeping, military service, bearing of arms in time of peace and during periods of war, unanimously declare themselves in harmony with the general teaching of their brethren of that denomination throughout the world, as follows:

“We recognize earthly governments as ordained of God for the purpose of securing to their people the blessings of order, justice, and tranquillity; that in the exercise of their legitimate functions such governments should receive the loyal support of their citizens.

“We assert the justice of rendering tribute, custom, and honor to earthly governments, as enjoined in the New Testament.

“We revere the law of God contained in the decalogue as explained in the teachings of Christ and exemplified in His life. For that reason we observe the seventh-day Sabbath (Saturday) as sacred time; we refrain from secular labor upon that day, but engage gladly in works of necessity and mercy for the relief of suffering and the uplift of humanity; in peace and in war we decline to participate in acts of violence and bloodshed. We grant to each of our church members absolute liberty to serve his country at all times and in all places, in accord with the dictates of his personal conscientious conviction” (Review and Herald 101:4, 5, Mar. 6, 1924).

The Seventh-day Adventist principles on noncombatancy have led in the past, in some countries, to a member’s being imprisoned when confronted with an order to bear arms when drafted into military service. However, in most countries today the governments recognize, to some degree at least, the conscientious conviction against the bearing of arms.

Medical Cadet Corps. One factor in the improvement in the position of SDA noncombatants in the armed forces, apart from the recent rather general attitude that the individual should be granted the privilege of having conscientious convictions and living in accordance with them, was the practical work done by the SDA leadership in preparing their young men for the draft through the Medical Cadet Corps. In the 1930s in the United States, there was a realization that military medical service could give draftees an opportunity to comply with their duty to their country without compromising religious convictions, and that if some voluntary preparation for this service had been done before induction it would then be easier to secure assignment to the medical service.

In many countries other than the United States where there was obligatory military service, and where noncombatants were allowed to serve in the military forces, the Medical Cadet Corps training program has been adopted.

Current Provisions for Noncombatants. In the United States, Selective Service regulations provide a classification of 1-A-O for noncombatants who declare their conscientious objection to combatant duties before they are drafted. The noncombatant status of those drafted under this classification is secure unless they voluntarily sign a request to be assigned as combatants. The status is described in the following directive of the Department of Defense, Aug. 21, 1962, no. 1300.6:

I. Purpose

“I. Purpose. This directive establishes uniform procedures for the utilization of conscientious objectors in the Armed Forces. . . .

V. Procedure

“A. 1. Individuals inducted into the Service who have previously been classified as 1-A-O by local induction boards should be assigned to noncombatant service, which in accordance with the President's Executive Order no. 10028, dated January 13, 1949, is defined as:

“(a). service in any unit of the armed forces which is unarmed at all times;

“(b). service in the medical department of any of the armed forces; wherever performed;

or

“(c). any other assignment the primary function of which does not require the use of arms in combat provided that such other assignment is acceptable to the individual concerned and does not require him to bear arms or to be trained in their use.”

The term ‘noncombatant training’ shall mean any training which is not concerned with the study, use, or handling of arms or weapons” (quoted in Military Regulation and Procedure, National Service Organization of the General Conference of SDA, pp. 3—6, 11).

Seventh-day Adventist Noncombatants in the U. S. Armed Forces. Several SDA non-combatants in the U.S. Armed Forces have distinguished themselves while in the service. One, a United States Army medic, Private First Class Desmond T. Doss, of Lynchburg, Virginia, was awarded the Congressional Medal of Honor, the nation's highest decoration, for outstanding bravery in helping the wounded in the Okinawa campaign in April and May 1945. The 26-year-old medical soldier, unarmed, performed so many feats of heroism in saving the lives of his comrades on the battlefields of Guam, Leyte, and Okinawa, that his name became a symbol for outstanding gallantry throughout the 77th Infantry “Statue of Liberty” Division.

Another example of noncombatant heroism while in the service of their country is “Operation Whitecoat,” a project involving medical experimentation, staffed entirely by SDA volunteers. These volunteers endanger their lives in time of peace in order to perfect means to combat disease in the Army and in the general population.

Documents on the Seventh-day Adventist attitude toward war and military service are provided by the National Service Organization.

Nord, Gustav Edward

NORD, GUSTAV EDWARD (1881—1955). Educator and conference administrator. Born in Sweden, he was asked to leave home at the age of 16 because of his Seventh-day Adventist beliefs. After working in the Illinois Conference, he began evangelism for the Swedish people of New York City and Brooklyn (1905), then spent seven years in building up Broadview Swedish Seminary and serving as president (1910—1917). After evangelistic work in Massachusetts, he led the Swedish language work in North America.

As leader of the SDA work in Sweden (1921) and president of the Scandinavian Union (1922), he vigorously promoted evangelistic work. During his administration the sanitarium at Hultafors was established, also the Ekebyholm school, of which he was president for four years.

After a term as home missionary secretary of the Northern European Division (1936—1940), he returned to the General Conference as leader of the Scandinavian, Russian, and Ukrainian departments. Later he became pastor of the Swedish churches in New York and Brooklyn (1946) and retired from active service in 1950.

Nordås Retirement Center

NORDÅS RETIREMENT CENTER (Adventkirkens Eldresenter, Nordås). A combined retirement center and skilled nursing facility, situated on the outskirts of Bergen, a renowned harbor founded about A.D. 1070 in the rocky fjord country of western Norway, and surrounded by seven mountains.

It was established in the fall of 1982 on property donated to the Bergen Seventh-day Adventist Church by the municipality, on 1.5 acres (.6 hectare) of land then considered wilderness-ground and today constituting the fastest growing part of the larger Bergen area. The center was founded and financed by local members of the Bergen church. The center is administered as a foundation, and the running of the skilled nursing facility is financed by the community of Bergen.

The building costs of about $3 million provided an H-shaped, two-story concrete building, featuring a total of 61 separate apartments averaging 430 square feet (40 square meters), and including larger apartments for married couples.

Originally intended as a home where retired church members from the local Bergen church and the West Norway Conference could live and spend the later years of life together in a Christian fellowship, the center also included a 31-apartment section for those elderly who needed board and care. In 1991 this particular section was converted to a skilled nursing facility/subacute rehabilitation ward, and today employs five registered nurses, 12 licensed vocational nurses, one part-time physician, and 102 other employees. Also physical therapy, occupational therapy, and supervision in clinical geronto-psychology are provided.

Basically built for retired church members, the center also accepts non-Adventist applicants who want to live in a Christian environment. Approximately 50 percent of the patients in the skilled nursing facility section are church members. Approximately 50 percent of the patients on this ward are between 90 and 98 years of age.

The 31-bed ward and the retirement home (featuring apartments for 24 single elderly and six married couples), are fully occupied at all times.

Up to 1993 the following conference presidents have served as chairpersons of the board of the foundation: Kåre Kaspersen, Henryk Jaworski, Finn F. Eckhoff.

Directors: Fritz Kolvik, 1982—1983; Grete Bøhmer, 1983— .

Norfolk Island

NORFOLK ISLAND. A territory of Australia, lying in the Pacific about 930 miles (1,500 kilometers) northeast of Sydney. The island has an area of 13.3 square miles (34.4 square kilometers) and a population (1990) of 1,800.

In 1788 Norfolk Island became a British convict settlement, and served as such until 1855. In 1856 all of the nearly 200 inhabitants of Pitcairn Island, descendants of the mutineers of the Bounty, were transferred to Norfolk Island. (Within a few years about 40 returned to Pitcairn Island; from these are descended the present islanders.)

Seventh-day Adventist Work

Seventh-day Adventist Work. SDAs first visited Norfolk Island late in September 1891, when the missionary vessel Pitcairn brought a party of missionaries headed by E. H. Gates. In the party were also several recently baptized Pitcairners who had come to visit their relatives. A minister, A. J. Read, and his wife were left on the island and stayed from September 1891 to March 1892. J. M. Cole worked there in 1895, and on May 21, 1895, a church was organized. S. T. Belden and his wife arrived on Norfolk Island, Dec. 17, 1894, and established themselves upon the island. Belden died there in 1906 and his wife many years later. H. Mitchell and his wife, with their son, Harold, followed, and remained four years, and A. H. Ferris and family were appointed in January 1911. In 1914, during the pastorate of Ferris, a church building was erected. Besides the church building and the minister's residence, the denomination owns a seven-acre (three-hectare) plot of ground adjoining the minister's residence, purchased in 1962 for future development of the work.

In 1974 the relocation of the church complex was commenced on this newly acquired land. A youth hall was completed, containing Dorcas Welfare facilities, and a new church was built in 1975.

There is one church on Norfolk Island, with a membership (1992) of 48. It belongs to the Greater Sydney Conference in the Trans-Tasman Union, which in turn is in the South Pacific Division.

NORTH ADVENTIST ACADEMY PUERTO RICO [1] (Academia Regional Adventista del Norte). A K-12 coeducational institution located in Vega Baja, Puerto Rico, under the direction of the East Puerto Rico Conference. The Vega Baja Adventist Academy was established around the year 1969 by Jorge Campos and his wife, Amelia, as a primary school constructed on the church grounds. In 1972 it was moved to a new location, offering grades K-6, and in 1974 was transferred to its present location. With God's help and the hard work of the brethren, a new structure was erected at the new site.

In the year 1987 the first high school senior class graduated. In 1993 the school had 169 students in grades K-6 and 235 in grades 7—12, making a total of 404 students and 11 teachers.

Statistics (1992): churches, 4,597; members, 803,015 (Sept. 30, 1993); elementary schools, 1,069; ordained ministers, 3,362; licensed ministers, 488; elementary school teachers, 3,736; college and academy teachers, 2,899. Headquarters at 12501 Old Columbia Pike, Silver Spring, Maryland.

“North American Division” appeared as early as 1910 in the Yearbook, although not as an organizational unit. In 1909 the General Conference constitution had been amended to add a third vice president, who was to work in “the Asiatic division,” along with the first and second vice presidents who had already been assigned specifically to Europe and North America, respectively, since 1903. In the 1910 Yearbook the list of officers includes the “Vice-President for North American Division,” along with those of the European and Asiatic divisions. Then at the 1913 session these three divisions were set up as organizational units. For the form of organization and the subsequent change in status, see Division.

The North American Division comprises nine union conferences (which are in turn composed of 58 conferences), which are listed here, but there are also separate articles for each union and each conference or mission.

North American Division Evangelism Institute (NADEI)

NORTH AMERICAN DIVISION EVANGELISM INSTITUTE (NADEI). An institution operated by the North American Division for the training of pastors, seminarians, and laypeople in the art of soul winning. NADEI is located on the campus of Andrews University in Berrien Springs, Michigan, and works in close cooperation with the Seventh-day Adventist Theological Seminary.

The institute was founded in 1979 by the Lake Union Conference, under the direction of Mark Finley. It was known as the Lake Union Soul-winning Institute (LUSI) and was located in Hinsdale, Illinois. Its first facility was provided for only $1 per year and served for the first two and a half years of its existence. In January 1982 three apartment buildings with 12 apartments each were secured in La Grange, Illinois, a Chicago suburb. Five of the apartments were converted to offices and a classroom. The rest of the apartments provided living quarters for students.

On Oct. 12, 1983, the General Conference in Fall Council voted to establish the Lake Union Soul-winning Institute as a North American Division entity beginning Jan. 1, 1984, and the name was changed to reflect its division status. Mark Finley served as director of the Institute until July 1985. Russell Burrill then was appointed director and continues in that position at the time of this writing. In 1993 the staff consisted of five teachers and six supporting staff.

Seminarians had been required to take one quarter of their seminary training at NADEI. Usually this was their final quarter. In an attempt to increase the seminarian's exposure to evangelism, the NAD, in 1992 year-end meetings, voted for the institute to move to Berrien Springs, Michigan, where the evangelistic program was spread out over the full nine quarters of seminary training. This has resulted in a blending of academics and practics. As a result, the seminarian is no longer divorced from evangelism during his or her studies.

The institute continues to offer its specialized course to pastors in the field, as well as lay students. It has been authorized by the NAD to issue a Bible instructor's certificate to laypeople who complete the 30 credits required in the program. In addition, the institute provides a resource center with one of the most complete selections of church growth and evangelistic supplies in the denomination.

Directors: Mark Finley, 1979—1985; Russell Burrill, 1985— .

North American Division Multilingual Ministries (NADMM)

NORTH AMERICAN DIVISION MULTILINGUAL MINISTRIES (NADMM). The church work for special ethnic or language groups in North America, especially for foreign-speaking people, is carried on by local conferences with the aid and counsel of the North American Division Multilingual Ministries Department. The department was originally called North American Missions Committee (NAMCO), but in November 1988 the name was changed to North American Division Multilingual Ministries (NADMM).

In the mid-twentieth century it was estimated that more than 40 million persons had taken up residence in the United States as immigrants since 1820; that 35 million Americans were immigrants or children of immigrants, and that 22 million had some language other than English as their mother tongue. There are also more than 4 million non-English-speaking people in Canada.

SDA Foreign Language Statistics (1973): churches, 299; members, 22,187; workers, 193; baptisms (1962), 803; tithes, $1,511,544.62; missions offerings, $381,683.25. These statistics are now included in conference statistics and are no longer kept separately. Between 1960 and 1964, there were 18 churches organized (German, 1; Japanese, 1; Spanish, 14; Ukrainian, 1; Yugoslavian, 1). The fastest-growing foreign language work in North America, the Spanish, comprised in 1973, 137 churches with a membership of 14,988, and was served by 107 ministers.

At the close of 1992 the non-English-speaking membership was more than 106,000, comprised of the following language groups: Hispanics (Spanish-speaking), 440 churches, 68,000 members; Francophone (French-speaking), 90 churches, 14,805 members. The Asian community, church membership stood at 19,684 as follows: Korean, 72 churches, 8,034 members; Filipino, 26 churches, 5,736 members; Japanese, 5 churches, 1,277 members; Indonesian, 5 churches, 1,108 members; Chinese, 8 churches, 1,399 members; Samoan, 6 churches, 969 members; Hmong, 2 churches, 109 members; Vietnamese, 4 churches, 347 members; Thai, 1 church, 142 members; Tongan, 1 church, 118 members; other Asian groups not mentioned already have a total of 445 members.

Other language group statistics: Portuguese, 9 churches, 1,550 members; Native Indian, 32 churches, 1,254 members; Yugoslavian, 7 churches, 700 members; Romanian, 3 churches, 360 members; Ukrainian, 2 churches, 200 members; Hungarian, 6 churches, 240 members; Russian, 2 churches, 60 members; Czechoslovakian, 1 church, 20 members; Polish, 1 church, 17 members. The hearing-impaired, who have a “special” language, include 5 churches exclusively for the hearing-impaired, with 775 members, some of which worship in churches that provide interpretation.

An Awakening of Responsibility. The pioneers of the Seventh-day Adventist movement felt that it was their obligation to work for people of other languages who had come to the shores of North America, being admonished to do so by Ellen White.

Foreign Language Publications. Already in 1856 James White, J. H. Waggoner, and Uriah Smith had been appointed to prepare a tract on the Sabbath question for translation into German and other languages. The tract, written by J. H. Waggoner, was circulated in 1858. In the same year it was issued in French (1,500 copies) and also in Dutch.

The appeal of Mrs. White in December 1871 for publications in other languages “to raise an interest and the spirit of inquiry among other nations,” resulted in the promotion of a missionary fund of $2,000 for the purpose of initiating a literature program. Germans, Danes, Norwegians, and Swedes helped to raise the money. Many initial contacts in Europe were made by publications sent by new Americans to the lands of their origin.

John G. Matteson’s interest in the Scandinavians in America prompted him to publish the first SDA periodical in a foreign language, Advent Tidende (“Advent Herald”), in Danish-Norwegian. It was printed by the Review and Herald at Battle Creek, Michigan, beginning January 1872.

Publications of other periodicals followed: Swedish, Svensk Advent Harold (“Swedish Advent Herald”), 1874; German, Stimme der Wahrheit (“Voice of Truth”), 1879, later changed to its present name, Zeichen der Zeit (“Signs of the Times”). For current periodicals in foreign languages, see Periodicals.

After the Review and Herald plant burned in 1902, the printing of foreign publications was moved to the College Press, College View, Nebraska, and later the work was carried on under the name International Publishing Association. This association was taken over by the Pacific Press Publishing Association in 1915, but the building it occupied was destroyed by fire in 1916, and a factory was built at Brookfield, Illinois. There the work continued until it was transferred in 1959 to the home office of the Pacific Press Publishing Association at Mountain View, California, as the Inter-American Publications and Foreign Language Division.

North American Foreign Department Organized. The 1905 General Conference session recommended the creation of a North American Foreign Department. The Yearbook of 1905 (late printing) lists the following persons under the department: G. A. Irwin (chair), I. H. Evans (secretary), N. P. Nelson, G. F. Haffner, S. Mortenson, B. G. Wilkinson, and the manager of the New York City foreign literature depository.

This department, with headquarters in Chicago, Illinois, was to direct the securing and the circulating of literature in North America in various languages and to assist the organized conferences and mission fields in evangelism among their respective peoples. The secretary of the department was authorized to draw $20 a week as salary.

Superintendents and advisory committees were set up, including the following superintendents: German, G. F. Haffner; Swedish, S. Mortenson; Danish-Norwegian, L. H. Christian.

When O. A. Olsen became full-time secretary of the Foreign Department in 1909, the foreign membership in America included 3,000 Germans, 2,000 Danes and Norwegians, 1,500 Swedes, and some of a few other nationalities.

Foreign Language Schools. In 1909 the General Conference approved the establishment of three foreign-language schools; the Swedish to be located in the Lake Union Conference; the German in the Central or Southwestern Union Conference; the Danish-Norwegian in the Northern Union Conference (see Broadview Academy; Clinton Theological Seminary; Hutchinson Theological Seminary). At the recommendation of O. A. Olsen, secretary of the department, a city mission training school for preparing foreign-language workers was established in New York City.

Role in Foreign Missions. About 1910 O. A. Olsen reported the encouraging beginnings among the Italians, Serbians, Romanians, Russians, and several other nationalities.

In order to set before the foreign-speaking church members in North America the needs of overseas missions, in 1918 a goal of $150,000 in offerings was set, divided among the various language groups.

Bureau of Home Missions. When, during World War I, the name Foreign Department caused some embarrassment it was changed in June 1918 to Department of Home Missions for North America, and in July 1918 to Bureau of Home Missions for North America.

At that time the membership of the foreign-language churches in North America was 11,791. In 1919 there were 13,632 members. Many ministerial recruits from among the students at the colleges and from among the workers entered denominational service in Europe.

Miscellaneous Language Educational Program. In 1920 the Swedish Seminary at La Grange, Illinois, petitioned the General Conference to help provide funds for buildings in which to offer education for young people of Italian, Russian, Polish, Bohemian, Hungarian, Finnish, Romanian, Serbian, and other language backgrounds.

Administration of the Foreign Language Work. At the Autumn Council of 1920 the General Conference Committee recommended that the foreign language workers look to the local conference administration for guidance and direction, while the bureau was to provide counsel and assistance coordinated with conference operations. Thus the Bureau of Home Missions moved into the same relationship with conference administrations as that held by other departments. The headquarters of the bureau were transferred from Chicago to Washington, D.C., the General Conference headquarters. Associate secretaries were appointed for Danish-Norwegian, Swedish, German, French, Spanish, Yiddish, Russian, and miscellaneous languages. In 1933 work for North American Indians was put under the bureau.

In 1933 a Bureau Committee of seven to nine members was appointed by the General Conference Committee to direct the bureau in carrying on its work. A comprehensive and detailed working policy was adopted for the foreign language work in North America. In 1939 it was revised so that the work and responsibilities of the Bureau of Home Missions secretary and associate secretaries were to be arranged by the General Conference Committee itself.

Progress of the Work. In 1935 W. H. Branson reported that in the United States preaching was being done in 24 languages besides English. The 64 workers were reported to have baptized more than 1,600 in 1934. The members of the foreign-speaking churches brought in $356,000 in tithes for the same year and contributed $284,000 in mission offerings.

World War II and After. World War II was a blow to the Japanese work in the United States. The Japanese-speaking church members were placed in relocation camps. In response to a plea for publications and workers to move into these areas, the General Conference made salaries available from the emergency fund of the bureau for the employment of three workers.

In 1945 the work of the bureau expanded again. Arrangements were made for the bureau to produce Bible correspondence lessons in German, Italian, Polish, and Spanish.

Home Foreign Committee. In 1951 the Home Foreign Bureau (as it had been called since 1946) was dissolved. The North American Committee on Administration determined that the “work among the foreign-speaking people of North America is primarily the responsibility of the local conferences”; therefore the work should come directly under the direction and supervision of the local conference administrations, though appropriations for carrying on the work locally would still be provided by the General Conference. The General Conference officers appointed a foreign-language committee of seven to study how to work among foreign-speaking people in ensuing years. This committee became known as the Home Foreign Committee.

North American Missions Committee. In 1957 the name of the Home Foreign Committee was changed to the North American Missions Committee.

In the same year Interchange, a quarterly bulletin for the foreign-language workers in North America, was mimeographed. The name of this publication was changed in 1976 from Interchange to Impact.

Committee members for the North American Missions Committee elected by the General Conference in 1975 were N. C. Wilson, chair; M. S. Nigri, vice chair; R. A. Wilcox, secretary; M. E. Kemmerer, treasurer; F. L. Baer, J. W. Bothe, C. E. Bradford, J. C. Kozel, Walter Ost, M.D., A. J. Patzer, A. H. Roth, V. W. Schoen, B. M. Wickwire.

Bible Correspondence Courses. In 1974 evangelism through correspondence courses began to be emphasized with the following languages being used: English, Armenian, Arabic, Chinese, Czech, Finnish, French, German, Greek, Holland-Dutch, Hungarian, Italian, Japanese, Norwegian, Polish, Portuguese, Russian, Spanish, Tagalog, Turkish, Ukrainian, and Yugoslavian.

Radiobroadcasts. Radio work was also put to use in reaching the people of other languages, including American Indians. In 1974, besides English, there were broadcasts in Armenian, Arabic, Bohemian, Chinese, Croatian, Danish, Dutch, Finnish, French, German, Greek, Hungarian, Ilocano, Italian, Norwegian, Polish, Portuguese, Russian, Spanish, Swedish, Tagalog, Turkish, and Ukrainian.

Jewish Work Assigned to the Committee. Evangelism for the Jews previously conducted by the Hebrew Scripture Association was placed in 1964 under the direction of the North American Missions Committee under the name of the Israelite Heritage Institute. Officers of the North American Missions Committee were officers of this auxiliary organization. (See Israelite Heritage Institute.) In 1983 Clifford Goldstein became editor of Shabbat Shalom, a magazine for the Jewish community.

Special Activities. By the end of 1967 NAMCO had developed a series of 12 filmed Bible studies for the deaf, with Arthur W. Griffith, the only Seventh-day Adventist-ordained deaf minister, who labored principally in the Oregon Conference, as the “signer.” (See Deaf, Work for.)

Hispanic Work. Hispanic Adventism had its beginnings in 1899 in a little town called Sanchez, Arizona. Although the town no longer exists, the Spanish work has flourished from that one-room adobe church with 22 members to more than 68,000 Seventh-day Adventists with 440 congregations to date in North America.

Spanish Advisory. Work among the Spanish-speaking population of the North American Division became more firmly established with the appointment of the Spanish Advisory in 1981, a name that was changed to Hispanic Advisory in 1989.

In 1984 the Institute for Hispanic Ministry at Andrews University was established to enhance the training and preparation of Hispanic pastoral ministry and leadership in the NAD. The year 1985 brought about the establishment of a Hispanic scholarship fund to assist Hispanics pursuing studies in nonministerial postbaccalaureate degrees. The Hispanic Education Advisory was appointed at the division level in 1988 to give guidance and orientation to Hispanic youth.

The year 1974 was the beginning of Revista Adventista, the official Spanish edition of Adventist Review. In 1984 it was voted that El Centinela, a publication that had its beginnings in 1896 in Latin America, become the official missionary journal for the Hispanic population of the NAD.

French Work. Within the two decades between 1970 and 1990, the French-speaking members of this division came into prominence because of their impressive growth. By 1992 the combined membership of the two French subgroups, the Quebecois and the Haitians, was nearly 14,000 strong.

Although the Quebecois and Haitians share a common language, they have two separate cultures. The Haitian population, which retains its West Indian culture, centers mostly in the United States, with some members in Montreal and Quebec. In the Quebec Conference, Haitians represent 35 percent of Seventh-day Adventist Church membership.

The French Literature Translation Coordinating Committee was appointed in 1991, which was replaced in 1992 by the Francophone Advisory. The first meeting of this advisory took place in January 1993. Total NAD Francophone membership in 1993 numbered 14,805.

Asian Work. An Asian associate director for the Multilingual Ministries Department of the North American Division was appointed in 1991 as a half-time employee of the North American Division and half-time employee of the Pacific Union, to be the director of Asian/South Pacific affairs for both entities.

Korean Work. The first Korean believers in the North American Division met in 1960 as a branch of the White Memorial church in southern California, with approximately 40 members. The total Korean membership at the end of 1992 stood at 8,034.

Literature began rolling off the presses of the Korean Adventist Press on May 12, 1980, with permission of the Pacific Press Publishing Association, under the supervision of the Southern California Conference. The press, which received denominational status in 1991, prints and distributes books and periodicals for the Korean churches in this division.

In 1982 a weekly Korean Faith for Today television broadcast began in Los Angeles; 1992 saw the beginning of yearly Korean Bible conferences (camp meetings), one on the East Coast and one on the West Coast. Also in 1992 Koreans sponsored two missionaries: Charles Cho to Tashkent, Uzbekistan, and Ben Chon to Alma-Ata, Kazakhstan, both formerly part of the Soviet Union.

In 1941 George E. Peters, secretary of the department, began to mimeograph a departmental bulletin that was named The Informant, and sent it monthly to the workers of the department. J. H. McElhany, General Conference president, called a small committee at the suggestion of the Regional Department secretary, which recommended the printing of this bulletin by the Review and Herald under the name of The North American Informant, which was to represent and to be mailed out to the entire constituency of the regional churches. The 1944 Spring Meeting, held at Chicago, Illinois, voted to publish this journal. The first issue appeared in 1946. The magazine furnished news, promotion material, and other matters of general interest. This paper ceased publication in November 1978, following the Annual Council action to close the Office of Regional Affairs.

North Dakota Conference

NORTH DAKOTA CONFERENCE. The unit of church organization that comprised the territory of the state of North Dakota. Statistics (1981): churches, 45; members, 3,316; ordained ministers, 19; licensed ministers, 15; elementary schools, 6; elementary teachers, 10. Headquarters: 1315 Fourth Street Northeast, Jamestown, North Dakota. The conference formed a part of the Northern Union Conference.

History

History. Beginnings of the Work in the Area. Apparently the first Seventh-day Adventists in the North Dakota area were members who had moved in from elsewhere. By late 1883 the General Conference was concerned about sending an evangelist to the region served by the Northern Pacific Railway (the first railway to enter North Dakota, which had reached to Bismarck by 1873 and had crossed into Montana by 1881). In the summer of 1884, after many calls from the SDA settlers, the General Conference asked G. C. Tenney, a minister of the Wisconsin Conference, to go to northern Dakota (the two Dakotas had not yet been separated). Because the members there were geographically isolated from the southern part of the Dakota Conference (see Dakota Conference), the area was to be a mission supervised by the Minnesota Conference. By December Tenney reported that he had spent three months there, that M. M. Olsen was working among the Scandinavians, that there were three or four colporteurs in the field, and that a third of the 75 SDAs were new converts of a few weeks. The first general meeting, held in Fargo, Dec. 6—8, 1884, was presided over by O. A. Olsen, president of the Minnesota Conference. The Fargo church, the first in present North Dakota, was organized with 17 members at this time; all SDAs in North Dakota (totaling approximately 75) were invited to join by letter.

At this time a Tract and Missionary Society was formed for the Fargo, Larimore, and Watson areas. Such societies played a large part in spreading the SDA faith in this early period.

During the next decade work was carried on at Stone Prairie, Hamlin, Styles, Forman, Gladstone, Dayton, Lisbon, Wahpeton, Lakota, Hankinson, Walhalla, Crown Center, Earnest, Elm Point, and Emerado.

Tenney, with Martin Olsen, worked in the Fargo area. In the summer of 1887 W. B. White, leader of the North Dakota Mission, reported that the Fargo church, which held its meetings in a hall on Broadway, had a Sabbath school of 25 members, to which 11 new members were added. He later met with the Hamlin members for a quarterly meeting, where many of the Styles members were present. This led to the electing of Sabbath school and church officers for the Styles church. He mentioned groups at Forman and Gladstone, Richardton (where the meeting place was the waiting room of the railroad station), and Dayton, where a Sabbath school and church of 12 members was organized.

Probably the first tent series in North Dakota was held at Lisbon in 1887 by White and C. M. Chaffee, assisted by a colporteur, D. W. Reed, selling Thoughts on Daniel and the Revelation. White reported a church of eight members organized there. At the end of the year White was replaced in the mission by M. M. Olsen.

At this time, when there was a great interest in the “local option” question on the sale of liquor in the territory of North Dakota, H. F. Phelps presented a series of lectures on health and temperance at Wahpeton.

The Tract and Missionary societies and the canvassing work were stressed with good results. A. L. Hollenback reported that though the crops were poor, he sold $310 worth of Daniel and the Revelation in 20 days, taking 19 orders in one day.

By 1890 there were 11 members and 25 Sabbath school members at Lakota. By 1893 there were interested families in Walhalla, Crown Center, Earnest, and Elm Point.

The first camp meeting in North Dakota was held at Jamestown, July 11—18, 1893, on the James River, one-half mile (.8 kilometer) from town in a grove of elms. The meetings were conducted in the German, English, and Scandinavian languages. There were more than 200 present, some coming as far as 150 miles (240 kilometers) over dry prairies in wagons with their children.

Union With Dakota Conference. At the Jamestown camp meeting of 1895, with more than 200 present, the North Dakota Mission voted to transfer to the Dakota Conference, which previously consisted of present South Dakota (see South Dakota Conference).

In 1897, as a result of meetings by Valentine Leer and Conrad Reiswig, the Bowdon church, a sod building, was erected by the members, augmented by members from South Dakota. During the next few years the work progressed in Fargo, Larimore, South Sykeston, and St. John. In the last-named area, where many French-speaking people lived,

D. T. Bourdeau, General Conference French-language worker, spent some time in 1899. That same year a Sabbath school of 30 was organized at the new state capital of Bismarck.

The North Dakota Conference Organized. The North Dakota Conference was organized in 1902 at the Carrington camp meeting with John G. Walker as president. Conference headquarters were established at Fargo, on property purchased with $4,000 contributed by the members present at the meeting. At this meeting membership statistics showed the composition as: German-speaking, 250; English language, 75; Scandinavian, 25. For many years camp meeting services were held simultaneously in separate tents in the German, Scandinavian, English, and Russian languages. The 1903 conference session, at the Carrington camp meeting, voted the legal incorporation of the North Dakota Conference, the publishing of the North Dakota Gleaner, and the opening of an intermediate school as soon as possible, for which $2,600 was pledged. From this beginning developed Sheyenne River Academy.

During the first decade of the twentieth century, as a result of evangelistic campaigns and colporteur work, the following churches were organized: Kenmare, Valley City, Beach, Heaton, Bowman, Goodrich, Kulm, Max, Carrington, and Williston.

The Review and Herald of Aug. 18, 1904, gave a statistical report of the North Dakota Conference as follows: churches, 24; total Sabbathkeepers, 761; canvassers, 7; total workers, 22; church schools, 3; church school enrollment, 50; Sabbath schools, 35.

Subsequent History. The work continued to grow during the years 1910—1920, with churches being organized at Lehr, Deisem, Cleveland, Keene, and Grassy Butte.

Many Russians were coming into the state by 1920. In 1924 the first Seventh-day Adventist Russian church in North America was established at Kiev. For some time separate Russian camp meetings were held, and the Sheyenne River Academy not only offered Russian as a foreign language but also conducted a department in which the classes were taught in Russian.

The period between 1921 and 1930 was a time of financial hardship for the church in North Dakota. Banks closed, thousands of farmers lost their homes. In spite of the fact that many members moved away from the state, the work progressed. Churches at Harvey, Napoleon, Grand Forks, Devils Lake, Dickinson, Hebron, and Bismarck were established during this period. The Review and Herald of Feb. 26, 1925, reported that in spite of the bad economic conditions 197 members were added to the church the previous year.

The North Dakota Conference began the Home Study Bible League in 1927. In a banner year for missionary work, 180,797 pamphlets written in English, German, Russian, Norwegian, and Bohemian were distributed. During the 1930s depression the decrease in tithe brought a decrease in the number of conference workers, but a greater lay participation was urged. A lay preachers' institute, the first of its kind in this part of North America, was held at Jamestown, Oct. 29—31, 1937. The first meeting found 24 lay preachers present, 16 from North Dakota. As a result of the training received at the institute, eight evangelistic campaigns were carried on simultaneously across the state.

After years of lapse a new Lisbon church was organized Feb. 11, 1934, and the Wahpeton church was reorganized in 1939.

When World War II brought a need for special training for SDA young men, a Medical Cadet Corps training camp was conducted at Sheyenne River Academy, Jan. 15—Feb. 5, 1941. Early in 1941 the first Dorcas Federation in the North Dakota Conference was organized.

The work continued to spread during the early 1940s as churches were organized in Hurdsfield, Beulah, and Robinson as a result of extensive evangelism. At the Harvey, Bowdon, McClusky, and Jamestown meetings, conducted over an eight-month period in 1943, 77 persons were baptized, a result of the united efforts of radio, colporteur, and evangelistic endeavors. The church at Burt, after having been closed two years, was reopened in 1945.

During the fall of 1946 the Bowdon Country church, one of the largest churches in the state (built 1916), was destroyed by fire. It was rebuilt in 1947 and dedicated on June 24, 1950. In this church are a number of families whose children are in denominational employment—Bietz, Krueger, Leiske, Schander, Widicker, and Koenig.

In Wahpeton in 1950 a medical clinic was established by three Loma Linda medical graduates, who were joined a little later by an optometrist and another physician.

Later Developments. The conference membership, which had increased from 1,898 in 1926 to 2,401 by 1936 was reduced by 1939 to 2,190 because of the exodus that began in the dust bowl years of the middle 1930s. The gradual change to mechanized agriculture and larger farms had caused many to leave the state, but normal growth had a stabilizing effect on the membership statistics. By 1951 there were 2,480 members. The growth continued steadily until an all-time high of 2,902 was reached in December 1973.

More illustrative, perhaps, of the growth and development of the work is a summary of some of the major improvements in facilities. When the conference headquarters were moved from Fargo to Jamestown in 1914 the building then purchased served for 47 years. In 1961 a new headquarters office was built in Jamestown at a cost of $50,000. In 1957

a large auditorium, constructed on the grounds of Sheyenne River Academy for $40,000, became available for camp meeting use and accordingly the annual camp meeting was moved from Jamestown to Harvey. In 1952 a summer youth camp was purchased on Lake Metigoshe, just west of the International Peace Garden. Subsequent developments included dining hall, kitchen, four barracks-style housing units, a headquarters building, and a lodge built in 1970. Many churches have been built or renovated; 18 were dedicated between 1950 and 1963. Several new schools were also begun during this period. Between 1968 and 1979 new churches were built in Wahpeton, Bowman, Edgeley, Dickinson, Langdon, Jamestown, Bowdon, Keene, and Grand Forks. The Grafton church was purchased in 1973. New Leipzig purchased a church from the Baptists in 1975, which was to replace the church in Burt. Stanley was organized in 1975, and in October their church was raised in a week by volunteers. Mandan began a company in 1977 with 51 charter members. The group rented a church building. Churches that were remodeled during this time include Devils Lake, Valley City, Bottineau, Turtle Lake, Lisbon, Streeter, Beulah, Max, Hurdsfield, Gackle, Hebron, Lehr, and Beach. In 1974 the Grand Forks and the McClusky parsonages were sold and new ones were purchased. Other parsonages, a teacherage in Dickinson, and the Hurdsfield school were sold and new parsonages were bought for Harvey, Hazen, Langdon, and Ellendale. Three new parsonages were built in 1975—1976. One each for Lehr, Bowman, and Bowdon. The Beach school closed in 1978. From 1974 to 1976 other improvements included a new school for Max, a Pathfinder building for Bismarck, a public announcement system for the camp meeting auditorium, and a well at Northern Lights Camp.

In 1974 a new Book and Bible House was built, to be known as the Better Living Center. Provisions were made for a room in which to hold Five-Day Plans to Stop Smoking clinics and nutrition classes. This building also houses the bookmobile.

Television (Faith for Today and It Is Written) and radio (with the Voice of Prophecy and the Amazing Facts broadcasts) were used conference-wide for several years between 1952 and 1972. In 1972 a new program of entering areas where there were no churches or only small companies was begun. By 1974, 10 additional workers had been added to the ministerial force. Two evangelists were employed. In addition to these ministers, Carl Ludwig, who had retired from Loma Linda Foods, was employed to start the trust services work in 1970. It was largely through the income from trusts written that funds became available for this expansion in 1973 and 1974. The tremendous increase in tithe from $666,000 in 1972 to $913,000 for the close of 1973 also contributed to the expansion of the work.

During the second quarter of 1975, 172 people were baptized. A church was organized in Stanley in 1975. Again in 1976 a large tithe increase was noted. In June there was a $55,000 increase over 1975, and 14 doctors and dentists moved into the state during that year to expand the medical work. In 1977 the Bold Adventure Plan to establish churches in new areas was launched. Pastors and laymen would choose a meeting place, have church there, and visit in the afternoons and survey every home in preparation for later evangelistic meetings.

In 1971 D. G. Albertsen, the lay activities secretary, started a Signs of the Times One Hundred Club, which became a great success. The Signs subscriptions grew from two per member to more than five per member in 1974. Never before had such an achievement been reached by any conference.

In 1973 and 1974 North Dakota also led the world field in Listen magazine subscriptions per member.

At a constituency meeting in July 1970, it was voted to accept a letter of intent by Brother and Sister Wallace Carlson, of Dickinson, to give to the conference $1,250,000 over a five-year period, beginning in October of 1974, toward the building of a new academy. Carlson also agreed to build staff houses at cost. In subsequent meetings, the purchase of land east of Bismarck at the Menoken Interchange on I-94 was approved and 560 acres (230 hectares) of land were purchased for a building site. In 1974 the South Dakota Conference was invited to join with North Dakota in this building venture and both conferences at separate constituency meetings approved of building and operating a new academy under Northern Union Conference leadership. In 1975 it was voted to set aside $150,000 per year for five years for the new academy building. Two hundred fifty thousand dollars a year additional funds would be raised from the constituency for three years. Groundbreaking for the new academy was on Apr. 11, 1976. The new school, named Dakota Adventist Academy, was open beginning with the 1977—1978 school year. To help fund the project, businesses in Bismarck were solicited beginning in January of 1978. In 1977 sales for the first day of the Sheyenne River Academy sale amounted to $23,000. In 1977 loans from constituents were taken out so that the DAA building program could continue. It was clear that housing costs at DAA exceeded what had been planned for as a gift from Wallace Carlson. The conference presented a “Bold Plan for Christ” in 1978 to pay off the debt. In 1979 camp meeting was held at Dakota Adventist Academy. In 1978 regional camp meetings were held in both the east and the west of the state along with a long weekend meeting at Dakota Adventist Academy.

In 1981 it was voted to merge with the South Dakota Conference. This merger took place in the fall of 1981. Because the academy was in North Dakota, it was decided to have the conference headquarters in South Dakota. When the conferences merged, there were 45 churches in the North Dakota Conference and a membership of 3,316. See Dakota Conference for additional information.

North Norway Rehabilitation Center

NORTH NORWAY REHABILITATION CENTER (Rehabiliteringscenteret Nord-Norges Kurbad). A physical rehabilitation center, founded in 1952 and situated at Tromsø, 70 degrees north. The institution has 95 beds and serves the community with ambulant physiotherapy. The patients come mainly from the three northern counties of Norway (an area the size of Great Britain), and the booking lists have been large for years. The institution has about 70 employees.

The institution operates its own health food store. In December 1979 the center moved into new facilities on a beautiful and attractive piece of land that was sold to the rehabilitation center in 1974 by the local municipality. The new building contains two large swimming pools, a gymnasium, and all necessary rooms for training the patients.

History

History. The beginnings of the North Pacific Union Conference go back to the organization of the Walla Walla, Washington, church on May 17, 1874. From this base the work of the church began to expand throughout the Northwest.

The North Pacific Union Conference was organized in 1906 and was made up of the following territory: Oregon, Washington, Idaho, Montana, British Columbia, Alaska, and Hawaiian Territory, with a membership of 5,131 and 144 churches. In the 1908 Yearbook British Columbia was moved from the North Pacific Union Conference to the Western Canadian Union Conference. The 1909 Yearbook shows that the Hawaiian Mission was placed under General Conference direction.

North Sulawesi Academy

NORTH SULAWESI ACADEMY (Sekolah Lanjutan Advent). A coeducational boarding school on the senior high school level operated by the North and South Minahasa missions at Tompaso II in the heart of Minahasa, North Sulawesi, Indonesia, in a mountainous area at an elevation of 2,000 feet (600 meters). The school draws students mainly from Sulawesi (the Indonesian name for “Celebes”) and adjacent islands. It is a fully accredited high school; instruction is given in the Indonesian language, with English as the second language.

The school opened on Aug. 16, 1948, with L. R. Winkler as principal and with 118 students, in temporary buildings made of bamboo with thatched roofs. The desks, beds, and benches likewise were all made of bamboo. It was called North Celebes Training School from 1948 until 1950. Later, additional land was purchased, and with John Anderson as builder and supervisor, the administration building, dormitories, dining room, kitchen, and teachers’ homes were erected. Most of the work was done by students.

In 1955—1956 the administration of the school was transferred from the Indonesia Union Mission to the North Celebes Mission. The purchase of more land gave the school a total of 40 acres (15 hectares). By 1958 two reservoirs with a capacity of 18,690 gallons (70,700 liters) were completed.

Because of civil strife in the North Celebes the school was closed in 1958, but a day school was operated in Manado in temporary quarters. With the rehabilitation of the buildings at Kawangkoan in 1962, the school returned to the original campus and reopened in August, with 320 students enrolled.

The present buildings are an administration building with 23 classrooms and offices, three dormitories, one kitchen with a cafeteria, a school store, and 16 homes for teachers.

North Sumatra Academy and Indonesia Union College Extension

NORTH SUMATRA ACADEMY AND INDONESIA UNION COLLEGE EXTENSION. (Sekolah Lanjutan Advent). Formerly North Sumatra Training School. A coeducational boarding school on the senior high school level operated by the North Sumatra Mission near Pematang Siantar, Sumatra, Indonesia. The school was opened in 1949 by Karl Tamboenan, the president of the North Sumatra Mission, within the city of Pematang Siantar, and offered a two-year training program beyond the elementary level for Bible instructors and a preparatory course for those planning to study further at Indonesia Union College, in Bandung, Java. Prior to this, during World War II, when all European schools were closed and overseas missionaries were interned, the national workers, feeling the need for a Bible training school, by committee action operated a school at Tarutung, Sumatra, with Albinus Mamora serving as principal.

The initial enrollment of the new school was 40 with two teachers, Mampe Siregar, the acting principal, and Elman Hutapea. Having neither classrooms nor dormitories, the school held its classes in a small rented house used as a church. Later Sutan Mangatas Siregar took over the principalship.

In February 1950 the Indonesia Union Mission assumed control of the school. On a rented lot within the city temporary buildings were constructed, including an administrative building, a dormitory, and a kitchen. The students moved into the completed buildings in the middle of 1952, and operation as a boarding school began. The enrollment increased to 70 and two more teachers were added.

In 1955 the school, by this time a senior academy, was moved to the present site, a tract of land at Martoba, about three miles (five kilometers) from Pematang Siantar, purchased by the North Sumatra Mission. The curriculum was adjusted to the requirements set for government schools.

The enrollment has steadily increased. After the curriculum was adjusted in 1972 to meet government requirements, it gained equal status with government schools.

A new dormitory accommodating 152 boys, and one unit of three permanent classrooms and a counseling room were completed in 1966 and 1972, respectively. A new cafeteria also has been constructed.

This academy serves both North and Central Sumatra missions. The college program was started in 1977 as an extension of Universitas Advent Indonesia, with majors in theology, accounting, and education. Government recognition was received in 1989 and renewed in 1992. Of the 100 students attending in 1992, nearly 100 percent are Seventh-day Adventists.

Principals: Sutan Mangatas Siregar, 1949—1950; Richard Figuhr, 1950—1952; A. P. Mamora (acting), 1952—1953; Richard Figuhr, 1953—1958; John Sakul (acting), 1958—1959; Robert A. North York Branson Hospital

NORTH YORK BRANSON HOSPITAL. An acute-care community hospital operating 318 beds, NYBH is Canada's only Seventh-day Adventist-affiliated hospital and serves a population of more than 165,000 people in the north region of the Greater Toronto area.

Land for the hospital was purchased by the Ontario/Quebec Conference in 1950. Construction proceeded as grants and donations arrived from the municipal, provincial, and federal government, the General Conference, the Canadian Union and local conferences, local businesses, and church members. Members also provided many months of volunteer labor. William H. Branson, the president of the General Conference at the time, and for whom the hospital was named, officiated at the groundbreaking ceremony on Mar. 7, 1955. The 80-bed hospital was opened on July 7, 1957.

As the surrounding community grew, NYBH expanded in several stages: in 1959 the bed capacity was doubled to 160; a five-story wing was added in 1966; and the final phase of the most recent wing was opened in 1990 with a new surgical suite, postanesthetic care unit, and surgical day-care unit.

Conversion to a greater range of outpatient and day-care services has shifted the focus from inpatient beds. In 1993 more than 60 percent of surgeries were performed on an outpatient basis. NYBH's 1,200 employees, 300 physicians, and 350 volunteers annually care for 43,000 emergency patients, 14,000 inpatients, including nearly 2,000 newborns, and 66,500 day-care/clinic patients.

Specialized services include cardiac care, combined maternal and newborn care, diabetes education, an eating disorders program, a pediatric walk-in clinic, and surgical day care. The Centre for Health Promotion offers classes to the public in smoking cessation, stress management, weight control, nutrition, and fitness.

NYBH is accredited by the Canadian Council on Health Facilities Accreditation and is a member of the Ontario Hospital Association, American Hospital Association, and Hospital Council of the Greater Toronto area.

Northeast Argentine Academy

NORTHEAST ARGENTINE ACADEMY (Instituto Adventista Juan Bautista Alberdi). A coeducational boarding school on the senior high school level, situated on 173 acres (70 hectares) of hilly ground three miles (five kilometers) from Além, Misiones province, about 60 miles (100 kilometers) northeast of Posadas, capital of the same province. It is owned and operated by the North Argentine Conference.

History

History. The forerunner of Northeast Argentine Academy was a primary school known originally as the Escuela Sabatista (“Sabbatarian School”), founded in 1923 by Juan Wedekamper (Wiedekaempfer), a Seventh-day Adventist teacher, at Picada Rusa (later renamed Picada Libertad), in Misiones province. This school became officially recognized in 1925, and in 1933 its name was changed to Escuela Rivadavia (“Rivadavia School”), under which name it continued to function as a primary school until 1943, when the first year of secondary instruction was added to the curriculum and the name was changed to Instituto Juan Bautista Alberdi. The next year the second year was added, and in 1950 the third year, thus completing the three years required for the basic secondary course. This basic secondary course received recognition in 1953 and in 1955. Later two years of the normal course were added, making the secondary course complete. This normal course received recognition in 1961 and again in 1962, making possible the graduation of the first 13 teachers.

The school offers a basic course, a teacher preparatory course, a commercial course, and a course for music education. Graduates of the school are qualified to teach anywhere in the country of Argentina.

The academy began as an elementary school in 1923. It became a secondary school in 1953.

In 1993 the academy had 316 students and 33 teachers.

Northeast Argentine Sanitarium

NORTHEAST ARGENTINE SANITARIUM (Sanatorio Adventista del Noreste Argentino). The youngest of four medical institutions supported by the Seventh-day Adventist Church in Argentina. It is situated in the province of Misiones. In 1966 the construction of a building with a total area of 66,700 square feet (6,200 square meters) to be built in stages was approved. The first stage consisted of the basement and first floor of 43,040 square feet (4,000 square meters).

In 1972 the institution opened its doors to the public and began the gradual progress of growth that led it to become the second largest medical institution of the Austral Union. In 1993 there were 70 beds, five doctors, one biochemist, 18 nurses, and 27 other employees.

The complete project will provide facilities for 200 beds, in an arrow-shaped building situated on the top of a mountain and facing a wide valley partly covered by virgin jungle. Northeast Argentine Academy is located nearby.

The present area of influence of the sanitarium is the city of Leandro N. Alem and extends approximately 250 miles (400 kilometers) up to the borders of Brazil and Paraguay.

Northeast Brazil Academy

NORTHEAST BRAZIL ACADEMY (Educandário Nordestino Adventista). A coeducational boarding school on the secondary level, situated on 250 acres (100 hectares) of valley land near the city of Catende, about 110 miles (175 kilometers) south of the city of Recife, state of Pernambuco, Brazil. It is owned and operated by the East Brazil Union Conference for the purpose of meeting the educational needs principally of the states of Bahia, Sergipe, Alagoas, Pernambuco, Paraíba, and Rio Grande do Norte in that union. The North Brazil Union Mission also contributes students and assists financially in the maintenance of the school.

The forerunner of Northeast Brazil Junior College was Escola Intermediária de Belém de Maria (Belém de Maria Intermediate School), which opened in 1944 on a piece of land purchased in 1943 by the Northeast Brazil Mission. In 1946 the name of the school was changed to Instituto Rural Adventista do Nordeste, or IRAN (Northeast Brazil Rural Institute), and the number of courses was increased to include the beginning of an unaccredited secondary course. In 1949 a large level tract of adjoining land was purchased, and in September 1950 the name of the school was changed to Educandário Nordestino Adventista, abbreviated ENA (Northeast Brazil College). That same year, on Nov. 16, the school was taken over by the East Brazil Union, and larger and more modern buildings were built on the recently purchased land. Late in 1954 the normal training and business courses were begun, and they received official accreditation along with the secondary course, which had been accredited since 1951.

In 1957 a two-year theological course was introduced, the students finishing the last two years in the Instituto Adventista de Ensino (Brazil College) at São Paulo. Because of the great distance-more than 2,500 miles (4,000 kilometers)-between the two schools, it was voted in 1963 to begin a full four-year theological course on a temporary accreditation basis at ENA. In 1975, in harmony with a new law, the school began a three-year program on the secondary level with specializations in elementary education, business, and nursing (nurse's aides). In 1987 the theological course was transferred to the Instituto Adventista de Ensino do Nordeste (Northeast Brazil College; formerly Bahia Academy) and this school again became an academy.

Northeast Brazil College

NORTHEAST BRAZIL COLLEGE (Instituto Adventista de Ensino do Nordeste). An educational institution located near the historic city of Cachoeira on a ranch of 920 acres (372 hectares).

Education began at the school with a primary program in 1980. Secondary classes were offered beginning in 1981. In 1987 the theology courses were transferred to this institution, and its name was changed from Bahia Adventist Academy to Northeast Brazil College. Also the name of the Educandário Nordestino Adventista was changed from Northeast Brazil College to Northeast Brazil Academy.

In 1993 there were 866 students attending on the primary, secondary, and college levels.

Northeast Luzon Academy

NORTHEAST LUZON ACADEMY. A coeducational boarding school on the junior college level, operated by the Northern Philippine Union Mission. It is situated on a 57-acre (23-hectare) property at Mabini, Alicia, Isabela, Republic of the Philippines. The 1993 enrollment was 693 on the secondary level and 65 on the college level. There were 24 teachers.

Northeast Luzon Academy began as a church school at Divisoria, Santiago, Isabela. In 1948 the first year of the secondary course was added, and the school became known as the Northeast Luzon Junior Academy. Twenty-two students enrolled that year in classes held in a temporary building with bamboo walls, grass roof, and a bare, earth floor. The next year, when 70 students were enrolled, a subsidy from the Philippine Union Mission made it possible for the academy to offer second- and third-year courses. An annex was constructed with galvanized iron roofing.

During the school year 1950—1951 the Northeast Luzon Academy was permitted to operate as a full-fledged secondary school. Enrollment increased to 102, and at the end of the year 20 students graduated. During the school year 1960—1961 the academy was transferred to its present site. In the 1982—1983 school year the school became a junior college and extension campus of Philippine Union College. In 1991 it once again reverted to academy status.

Northeastern Academy

NORTHEASTERN ACADEMY. A coeducational day school on the senior high school level operated at 532 West 215th Street, New York, by the Northeastern Conference to serve the membership of the conference, including particularly that of the Metropolitan New York area, a constituency of approximately 25,000.

An academic or college preparatory curriculum with ample commercial subjects is offered the students. The predecessor of Northeastern Academy was Harlem Academy, established in 1920 and operated by the Greater New York Conference and the Harlem church. Before that time no special effort had been made to set up an educational facility for the Black Seventh-day Adventist youth in New York City.

Harlem Academy was set up at the Harlem church on 131st Street, with James L. Moran as the first principal. The school included grades 1—9 and had a faculty of five. A grade was added yearly until the status of a 12-grade academy was reached. At the time of the purchase of Carlton Hall, at 106-108 West 127th Street in 1924, the school had 12 grades, with six teachers and 28 students on the secondary level.

It was listed as a 12-grade school through 1931—1932. Then it became an elementary school until in 1939 and 1940 it appeared as the Harlem Junior Academy, then as the Ephesus Junior Academy from 1941 to 1946.

After the establishment of the Northeastern Conference in 1945, the school was moved to the newly acquired headquarters, the City Tabernacle church, 562 West 150th Street. Then the elementary school was separated as the Manhattan Elementary School and the secondary grades (9—12) became Northeastern Academy in 1947, at 806 Jennings Street, Bronx, New York. In 1958 it was moved to 1122 Forest Avenue, where it remained until 1974. It was then moved to its present location at 532 West 215th Street, New York City. In 1993 there were 14 on the faculty and staff and 188 pupils.

The school was accredited in 1959 by the SDA Board of Regents and in 1962, 1986, and 1993 by the New York State Board.

History

History. Beginnings of the Work in the Area. The movement of Black adherents toward the Seventh-day Adventist Church in the East can be traced to the Advent awakening of the 1830s and 1840s when numerous free Blacks attended William Miller's meetings throughout New England. At least two Millerite preachers were Blacks: Charles Bowles, of Boston, Massachusetts, and John W. Lewis, of Providence, Rhode Island. "Father" Bowles, as he was often called, addressed large White congregations and was instrumental in establishing several churches. He preached up to February 1843.

Another Millerite was William E. Foy, of Boston, described as a "mulatto," who was the first of three persons in the SDA movement to receive visions relating to the Disappointment. He related these publicly for some time before a similar experience came to Hazen Foss and later to Ellen G. Harmon. When Foss heard the first vision related by Miss Harmon he testified that he believed the visions regarding the experiences of the SDAs had been taken from him and had been given to her.

Because of the Black following that Miller had carried, it is not surprising that there were handfuls of Black Americans in White churches formed by SDAs in cities of New York state and New England.

Among the persons attracted to Adventism in the East were some distinguished Blacks connected with the antislavery cause. Frederick Douglass, of Rochester, New York, saw in the falling of the stars an omen of the Second Advent (mentioned in his book My Bondage and My Freedom). Although he did not join the Adventists, his daughter, Rosetta Douglass Sprague, became a member of the Seventh-day Adventist Church some years later in Washington, D.C. William Grant Still, of the Underground Railroad movement, was another who heard William Miller and became a decided believer in the Second Advent, though there is no record of his having joined the Adventists. Sojourner Truth, who spent half her life in New York state and then some years in New England, attended and spoke at a camp meeting of Adventists (Millerites) in Connecticut in 1843, though the records state that she did not agree with them. (For the tradition that she became an SDA, see Truth, Sojourner.)

Around the turn of the century numerous messages from Ellen White were addressed to the church regarding evangelism for the large Black minority within the American nation. Because the majority of Blacks lived in the South, her words were often quite specific about that field.

"Few realize the magnitude of the work that must be done among the colored people," she wrote.

"In the South there are millions who . . . must be given the light of present truth. . . . Colored evangelists are to be educated and sent forth to proclaim the truth in its simplicity" (Ellen White, in Atlantic Union Gleaner 3:1, 2, Oct. 26, 1904).

These entreaties were read as eagerly in the North as in the South, and numerous ministers and laymen took seriously the charge to reach the growing population of Blacks with SDA teachings.

The first record in the East of Seventh-day Adventist believers in the Black community was noted in New York City in 1902. Two groups, including a few who had attended the White church, began to hold meetings in a home. A layman, J. H. Carroll, himself a recent convert from the Catholic faith, was encouraged by the conference to begin meetings. Contacts were made among Methodist and Baptist churches, and one of his first converts was J. K. Humphrey, an ordained Baptist minister.

Meanwhile, company no. 2, under the leadership of J. C. Hennessey as local elder, was growing, but because of his illness it did not develop as rapidly as church no. 1. This second group was formally organized as a church of 12 members in 1904, and J. H. Carroll was made leader. They met on 134th Street in Harlem.

For church no. 1, J. K. Humphrey was the logical choice for a leader. He began his work in Manhattan, then went to Brooklyn to begin a new company; then back to Manhattan, to the congregation that for years was known as the First Harlem Seventh-day Adventist Church. The group bought a building at 131st Street and Lenox Avenue, and the membership swelled rapidly till it reached about 600.

Not to be forgotten in the area of the Northeastern Conference is the work of the laymen. Of the 107 churches in the conference (1993), many were begun by persons who were not on the employment rolls of the organization. Percy Brownie, for example, went from Manhattan to work with James J. North at New Rochelle, where SDAs were living. They distributed the Autumn Leaves Series of tracts for 15 weeks. Then they fasted and prayed for an opening in a home where they might begin Bible studies. The answer came immediately, and as a result, seven people were baptized. The same two laymen then conducted a tent meeting, with the result that, among others, Thaddeus D. Wilson joined the church. Then the Brownie-North team held two more series of meetings. After this Thaddeus Wilson joined James North to conduct four more series; from one of these originated the Mount Vernon congregation, which in 1992 had a membership of 528.

Elsewhere in New York, the Berea church in Nyack came into being as a result of the work of a Mrs. Faulden. The Ellenville church was begun by a Mr. Maddox. Samuel Barber was active in the beginning of the Brooklyn Red Hook church (known today as the South Brooklyn church). Sydney Armstrong and his wife pioneered two churches, the Linden Boulevard church in St. Albans and the Brooklyn Temple church, formerly the Brownsville church, in Brooklyn. The Westbury Mission, which has grown into the Bethany church in Westbury, New York, was founded by the Foster family, and the Brooklyn Mount of Olives church by Theodore X. Perry. Ada Montell and James North began the work in Babylon, New York, which has merged with the Amityville congregation to form the Bethesda church of Amityville. The Corona church was begun by Charles M. Willis and the Newburgh church by a Mrs. Johnson. The Staten Island church was developed under the leadership of a Brother Golson. The Bronx church stands today as a memorial to the work of Arthur King, Ruth B. North, and Edwin M. Thompson.

In Connecticut the Bridgeport church resulted from the efforts of three laymen: Mack Hawkins, Alfred Edwards, and a Mr. Arline. The Hartford church was started by Matthew Bell.

Farther north, in Boston, a group of 15 Black Seventh-day Adventists was organized in 1912. They assembled in a storefront on Shawmut Avenue under the leadership of

W. R. Utchman. Later they met for a while in the home of a Mrs. Chivers. For several years ministerial students from South Lancaster Academy, 40 miles (64 kilometers) away, shepherded the group. After the church moved to Cabot Street the congregation showed marked growth and eventually purchased a building at 87 Shawmut Avenue. After several years this rapidly expanding congregation outgrew this building, and new property was purchased at 108 Seaver Street, Dorchester, Massachusetts, the present site of the church.

Early developments in western New York included a home operated by Mrs. Bella Dorsey in Rochester for Black children who were sent to her by the courts. In 1922 the former Fernwood Academy property at Tunesassa was leased to her to be used as an industrial school for Black children. It continued for several years. Evangelism among the Blacks was carried on in Rochester and Buffalo by a Black minister.

As the interest grew, the members decided to have churches of their own. The Eastside church was started in Buffalo, and in 1936 six members left the Browning Memorial church in Rochester to form the Ebenezer church in that city. In 1944 the Buffalo Eastside and the Rochester Ebenezer churches united with the newly formed Northeastern Conference. Since then the work among the Black people has grown rapidly, as is evidenced by the fact that both the Emmanuel Temple of Buffalo and the Jefferson Avenue church of Rochester have more than 500 members each. A growing church, under the direction of its own pastor, exists in Syracuse, and a church has been established in Niagara Falls. On the eastern edge of the upstate area the church in Albany continues to flourish.

J. K. Humphrey, pastor of the First church in Harlem, was a man of great gifts—a musician as well as a scholar. He had an exceptional memory and a great faculty for organizing people and getting things done. In the 27 years that he served the church, he baptized hundreds of people into its membership. But unfortunately there developed in 1930 a division between Humphrey and the Greater New York Conference regarding a sanitarium, a home for the aged, and a general real-estate development that he hoped to found. The result was that Humphrey withdrew from the denomination, taking with him the church building and the major part of the congregation, and forming a movement known as the United Sabbath Day Adventists. However, when the State Supreme Court reversed the judgment of the lower court and returned the building to the SDAs, many of the former members also returned.

But before the split the Greater New York Conference, aware of the situation, had brought in Matthew C. Strachan to strengthen the second church in Harlem, on 127th Street, and after the Humphrey apostasy George E. Peters, newly elected secretary of the North American Negro Department, was invited to take up pastoral work in New York. Upon his suggestion, the name of the second church was changed to Ephesus. Worship services and evangelistic meetings, held in an auditorium that was used by the newly organized Harlem Academy, attracted such crowds that the congregation rented and later purchased a larger church with a parsonage, at 123rd Street and Lenox Avenue. During this period other churches were being organized in the Bronx, Mount Vernon, Rochester, and Buffalo.

Northeastern Conference Organized. The Black membership had grown to the degree that the necessity of making a singular appeal to this largest minority within the American population became apparent. The number of people won to the church in communities such as Harlem and the Bedford-Stuyvesant area in Brooklyn was not commensurate with the vast opportunities available in a city such as New York. The existence of such a situation here and elsewhere was recognized by the General Conference, and resulted in the organization of what came to be known as regional conferences. On Oct. 3, 1944, the Black constituency of the Atlantic Union Conference came together in New York to organize the Northeastern Conference, and elected Louis H. Bland as president; Lionel Irons, secretary-treasurer; Jonathan E. Roache, secretary for the Education and Missionary Volunteer departments; and James J. North, Home Missionary and Sabbath School departments secretary.

Temporary quarters on 127th Street, New York City, served the conference until a building could be purchased at 560 West 150th Street, which housed the conference office, Book and Bible House, church school, and another congregation—a nucleus from the Ephesus church—that assumed the name of City Tabernacle. This congregation has experienced such steady growth that its membership exceeded 1,000 in 1992.

The Ephesus church, the largest, soon grew to 1,600 members, and with an expanded program of evangelism, composed of health lectures and Sunday night meetings, to which were invited diplomats of several African and Asian countries, the membership grew to 2,200 in 1962. In 1968 fire destroyed the Ephesus church building, causing the congregation much inconvenience. The task of renovating was completed after some hardships, and the members moved back into the building in 1977.

Since it began to operate (Jan. 1, 1945), the Northeastern Conference has made continued progress. The membership at the close of 1945 was 2,468, with a working force of 21, plus 27 colporteurs; at the close of 1961 it was 7,179, with a working force of approximately 45. In 1952 there were 163 baptisms. In 1973 there were 1,437. The period 1963—1973 showed very prolific growth within the Northeastern Conference. The membership doubled, increasing from 8,097 to 16,328. The 1992 membership makes up 51 percent of the membership in the Atlantic Union.

During the spring of 1975 the Northeastern Conference moved its headquarters from 560 W. 150th Street, New York City, to its new office building at 115-50 Merrick Boulevard, St. Albans, New York. Its secondary school (Northeastern Academy) has moved its operations into a very commodious structure in upper Manhattan, and the conference maintains a fine campsite at Hyde Park, New York. There are presently (1992) 107 congregations, all the way from Boston to Manhattan and as far west as Niagara Falls, New York, and the young people in these churches are organized into 95 AY Societies and 78 Pathfinder Clubs.

Northeastern Mindanao Academy

NORTHEASTERN MINDANAO ACADEMY. A secondary school popularly known as NEMA, established in 1978 at Los Angeles, Butuan City, Philippines. In 1982 NEMA attained government recognition and became a member of the Association of Christian Schools and Colleges (ACSC). In 1989 the school acquired accreditation status granted by both the Far Eastern Division of SDA Accrediting Team and the ACSC Accrediting Agency, Inc. (ACSC-AAI). Such industries as a farm, a bakery, a cafeteria, and a store, augment the school's financial income. Recently this boarding school earned level II accreditation status from the Federation of Accrediting Agency of the Philippines (FAAP) through the ACSC-AAI, and a four-year accreditation, recommended by the Far Eastern Division of Seventh-day Adventist Accrediting Team.

Principals: N. Macarine, 1978—1980; M. C. Mendez, 1980—1982; J. C. Catolico, 1982—1986; I. G. Entima, 1986— .

History

History. For the early history of the Seventh-day Adventist Church in California, see California Conference. By 1911 the California Conference, with headquarters in Oakland, had grown to the point where it became necessary to divide for purposes of greater efficiency. At the official fortieth annual session of the California Conference held in Fresno, Feb. 9—19, 1911, it was voted to give several counties to the Southern California Conference and to divide the remaining area of the California Conference into three conferences: the California Conference, the Central California Conference, and the Northern California-Nevada Conference, with headquarters in Lodi, and with C. L. Taggart as president. The Northern California-Nevada Conference was to consist of the following counties. In California: Butte, El Dorado, Colusa, Lassen, Nevada, Shasta, San Joaquin, Sacramento, Tehama, Yolo, Merced, Mariposa, Siskiyou, Modoc, Plumas, Glenn, Sutter, Yuba, Sierra, Amador, Alpine, Calaveras, Tuolumne, Placer, and Stanislaus; in Nevada: Washoe, Churchill, Humboldt, Elko, Lander, Eureka, White Pine, Storey, Ormsby, Lyon, and Douglas. The newly formed conference covered an area of 108,428 square miles (280,800 square kilometers) with a population of 416,563 and was comprised of 27 churches with a total membership of 1,193.

The Nevada counties remained a part of the Northern California Conference until 1913 when they came under the Nevada Mission, which also included Modoc, Lassen, Mono, and Inyo counties in California.

The Northern California Conference inherited these pioneer churches: Petaluma (organized 1868), Healdsburg (December 1869), Santa Rosa (December 1869), Woodland (1872), Vacaville (1873), St. Helena (May 1874), Napa (1874), Oakland (1885, now Grand Avenue), Sacramento (1885, now Central; originally Pleasant Grove), Eureka (1885), Calistoga (1887), Deer Park Elmshaven (1890, originally Sanitarium), Stockton (May 1893, now Central), Placerville (1893), Sebastopol (1893), and Ukiah (1898).

By 1932 the Northern California Conference had 31 church organizations, with 26 buildings valued at more than $100,000. The membership stood at 2,656, with 497 baptisms during the quadrennium ending Dec. 31, 1931, partly because of the strong emphasis given to evangelism, with such evangelists as Schaffner, Bradley, and King leading out. Tithe during the quadrennium reached $322,304.94, and mission offerings totaled $209,168.95. There were 37 Sabbath schools at this time, with a total membership of 2,829.

The 1930s were difficult years, but the church responded to new mission opportunities and operated nickel-lunch cafés in places such as Marysville and a penny cafeteria in Sacramento.

In 1932 the California Conference terminated its function, and its territory was divided between the Central and Northern California conferences. According to the 1933 Yearbook, the following counties comprised the Northern California Conference: Del Norte, Siskiyou, Humboldt, Trinity, Shasta, Tehama, Mendocino, Glenn, Butte, Sierra, Lake, Colusa, Sutter, Yuba, Nevada, Placer, Sonoma, Napa, Yolo, Marin, Solano, Sacramento, El Dorado, Contra Costa, Alameda, San Joaquin, Amador. The newly reorganized conference comprised 60 churches with a membership of 5,460, and soon moved its headquarters offices to Oakland.

Prior to the reorganization in 1932, the Northern California Conference had 12 church schools with 23 teachers and an enrollment of 350. Within its territory was Lodi Academy and Normal Institute, organized in 1908 as a supplement to the college to the north, especially for the training of teachers for the growing number of church schools in the conference. With the growth of the conference membership, additional academies were organized: the Golden Gate Academy in Oakland (1923) and Sacramento Union Academy (1958), both day schools. In September 1962 Rio Lindo Academy near Healdsburg opened with a capacity enrollment of 340. Rio Lindo Academy is a boarding school.

Lodi Academy was a boarding school until 1967 when the old buildings were razed and new construction began on the present new facilities. At present it is a day school.

In June 1946 property in the Sierras west of Lake Tahoe and bordering U.S. Highway 50 was secured for a conference summer camp. It was named Pinecrest.

On Apr. 28, 1974, the constituents voted to purchase an 840-acre (350-hectare) property known as Leoni Meadows, located 25 miles (40 kilometers) southeast of Placerville, for a new summer camp. Now 960 acres (400 hectares), the camp is surrounded 90 percent by the El Dorado National Forest. The summer program, which began in 1978, serves about 2,000 campers annually. Facilities for use as a year-round meeting and conference center accommodate approximately 550 attendees plus staff. The location is ideal for water sports on the Jenkinson Lake and snow skiing at Echo Summit (60 miles [100 kilometers] away) and Ski Lodge (50 miles [80 kilometers] away).

Within the territory inherited by the Northern California Conference from the old California Conference was the St. Helena Sanitarium and Hospital (now St. Helena Hospital and Health Center), founded at Crystal Springs near St. Helena in 1878. The oldest continuously operating Seventh-day Adventist hospital, St. Helena Hospital is a regional provider of acute-care services for Napa, Lake, Mendocino, Solano, and Sonoma counties. With 188 licensed beds and 36 residential health center beds, the hospital brings to the region diverse specialties such as cardiovascular surgery, pulmonary rehabilitation, mental health, oncology, preventive medicine, progressive women's programs, and complete home health and hospice services.

The Ukiah Valley Medical Center (formerly Ukiah Adventist Hospital, established in 1956) is a full-service 116-bed community hospital presently operating on two campuses. It offers a full range of outpatient programs plus strong community health education programs. Since August 1988 the facility has been the sole provider for a service area along Highway 101 of more than 60,000 residents, primarily in southeast Mendocino County.

In 1960 Feather River Sanitarium in Paradise was given to the Northern California Conference and a new acute-care hospital was built (the only one in Paradise), opening Nov. 12, 1968. Feather River Hospital, a 125-bed facility, offers a pediatric center, a free-standing rehabilitation clinic and home health agency, as well as a center for women's health, providing a unique combination of services unavailable elsewhere in the northern section of California.

The constituents voted on Mar. 25, 1979, to develop a retirement center to be operated under conference jurisdiction. Napa Valley Adventist Retirement Estates was built in Yountville and became a conference institution in November 1981. The facility offers residents 80 apartments for independent living and eight for assisted living. It provides a licensed Christian retirement community in a beautiful setting where dignity, privacy, and independence may be enjoyed.

Foreign-language and ethnic groups include 10 Black congregations (one company), with nine ministers and 4,144 members; two Filipino churches, with one minister and 145 members; one Haitian company, with one minister and 18 members; one Japanese church, with one minister and 156 members; three Korean congregations (two companies), with four ministers and 381 members; one Laotian group, with one lay leader and 24 members; one Samoan company, with one minister and 36 members; nine Spanish congregations (three companies), with nine ministers and 1,846 members; two Vietnamese groups, with one minister and 50 members; and one Yugoslavian church, with one minister and 106 members.

During 1993 churches operated 64 Community Services centers. Four of those (Fortuna, Manteca, Napa, Stockton Market and E) serve the public full time and include such extra services as senior citizen activities and DUI alcohol education. Major inner-city operations include 21 church projects (street ministry, food kitchens, drug awareness, tutorial counseling, prison ministry, health van, recovery center, cultural awareness), summer ministries (employing students to assist in inner-city projects), and camperships (currently sponsoring 35-50 inner-city youth at summer camps).

The Northern California Conference had a membership of 37,302 as of July 1, 1993, and is one of the four largest conferences in the North American Division.

Northern Luzon Adventist College

NORTHERN LUZON ADVENTIST COLLEGE. A coeducational boarding school on the elementary through college level, operated by the Northern Luzon Mission. The school is situated in Artacho, Pangasinan province, on the island of Luzon, Philippines, on a 27-acre (11-hectare) tract along the national road, 130 miles (210 kilometers) north of Manila.

The school developed from a church school, which originated in 1923. In 1925 a three-room building was erected and grades 1—7 were offered; later the eighth grade was added. The school was then operated as the Ilocano Junior Middle School.

In 1931 the name of the school was changed to Northern Luzon Academy and the first year of high school was introduced. Cora Lugenbeal, the first principal, and four other teachers comprised the faculty, and in 1932 a second year was added. In the same year the stone administration building was erected. Government recognition was granted in 1934. Full elementary and high school courses were offered in 1937. In March 1938 the academy graduated its first class.

In 1939 two dormitories were built and a second story was added to the administration building. By this time the enrollment had reached 400, and the faculty numbered 12. During the Japanese occupation, 1942—1944, the school was closed and most of the buildings were destroyed by bombs and fire.

In May 1945 the academy reopened with a faculty of eight. A new administration building, a one-story structure with a chapel behind it, was built, and a dining hall, a kitchen, and teachers' quarters were erected of Quonset hut materials. Later a spring was secured and an improved water system was completed. In 1947 government recognition was renewed.

A building program beginning in the late 1960s resulted in the construction of a store, a library, a duplex teachers' cottage, a clinic, a shop, a home economics building, and an auditorium. In 1990 the college program was added, and from 1988 the following buildings were added: a college building with six classrooms, a new girls' dormitory, five high school classrooms, a technology and home economics building, a duplex college teachers' cottage, two more laboratory rooms, and a computer room.

When the Agno Valley District of the Bureau of Private Schools celebrated the golden jubilee of private education in the Philippines, Northern Luzon Academy was one of three secondary schools that had opened before the war to receive the Award of Merit for outstanding quality of work.

The college liberal arts program offers degrees in the following areas: Bachelor of Arts, Bachelor of Science in Education, Bachelor of Elementary Education, Bachelor of Theology, Bachelor of Accountancy, and Secretarial Management. Four-year and two-year computer courses also are offered.

In 1989 the school achieved a five-year Level II Deregulated Status for its high school program from the Association of Christian Schools and Colleges.

The name of the institution was changed from Northern Luzon Academy to Northern Luzon Adventist College during the 1992—1993 school year. During the 1993—1994 school year the school had a staff of 67 with a total enrollment of 1,235 students (259 college, 594 academy, 382 elementary).

History

History. Beginnings of Work in the Area. The birthplace of the Advent movement is surely somewhere in Northern New England. William Miller preached his second series of lectures on the soon coming of Christ in Poultney, Vermont. His earliest published work was a series of articles in the Vermont Telegraph (1832). When Miller came to preach in Portland, Maine (1840), the Harmon family of Gorham, Maine, attended and accepted his teachings. After the great disappointment of the Millerite movement, Ellen Gould Harmon (later Ellen White) received her first vision in Portland, Maine, in December 1844 (see EW 13—20). She related her first messages at her sister's home in West Poland, Maine. Ellen met James White in Orrington, Maine; they were married on Aug. 30, 1846, and lived in Maine while traveling together throughout New England to speak to Advent believers. James White first published a 24-page pamphlet entitled A Word to the "Little Flock" in 1847 and mailed it from Brunswick, Maine; in 1849 the publication of an eight-page bulletin, Present Truth, started the publishing work of the church; in 1850 the first volume of the Second Advent Review and Sabbath Herald was issued from Paris, Maine. This paper became the official weekly church publication after the Whites moved to New York in 1852. The first Sabbath school lessons were written by James White as he traveled from Rochester, New York, to Bangor, Maine, in 1852.

The combination of the Second Advent and Sabbath messages was first introduced in the Washington, New Hampshire, congregation of Christian Brethren. Many had become Millerites and were searching the Scriptures for a deeper understanding. Mrs. Rachel Oakes (later Preston), a Seventh Day Baptist, while visiting her daughter in Washington, shared the doctrine of the Sabbath with the Adventist believers. William Farnsworth became the first Sabbathkeeping Adventist, observing the seventh-day Sabbath as early as March 1844. After the “passing of the time,” he publicly stated he had decided to keep the seventh day of the week as Sabbath, and his brother Cyrus and others joined him. The “first Seventh-day Adventist minister,” Frederick Wheeler, a former Methodist minister who had accepted Miller’s message in 1842, began keeping the Sabbath while serving the Washington, New Hampshire, church in 1844.

It was probably from this first group of Sabbathkeepers that another New Hampshire Adventist minister, T. M. Preble, learned the Sabbath truth. In February 1845 he published a tract showing that the seventh day should be observed as the Sabbath. This led to the conversion of seven families in Paris, Maine, including the father of J. N. Andrews, the Stowell and Stevens families, and two young women who later became Mrs. J. N. Andrews and Mrs. Uriah Smith. The Preble tract also introduced Joseph Bates to the Sabbath. He in turn wrote several tracts on the Sabbath that influenced James and Ellen White to keep the Sabbath. Joseph Bates became a prominent leader in “Sabbath Conferences” held in New England in 1848, and was chosen as chairman of the conference in Battle Creek in May 1863, when the name Seventh-day Adventist was adopted to designate the body of Sabbathkeepers who were looking for the soon coming of Christ.

Conference Organizations. The first steps toward organization among Sabbathkeeping Adventists occurred in northern New England. In the summer of 1851 the Royalton, Vermont, church ordained Washington Morse by “the laying on of hands, to the administration of the ordinances of God’s house” (cf. Review and Herald 2:15, Aug. 19, 1851). An old book, the covers gone, speaks of Adventist (Millerite) meetings held at Bordoville, Vermont, in 1838, when “100 infidels were converted by E. B. Crandall’s preaching.” The Vermont Conference was organized on June 15, 1862, when several small companies with a total of 45 charter members were united by J. N. Loughborough, A. C. and D. T. Bourdeau, and H. Pierce. Albert Stone, a former Baptist minister and Millerite, was elected chairman, and Stephen Pierce, secretary. Vermont was the first conference to give the entire Sabbath school offering to missions, as is done in the world field. Mrs. White wrote in Life Sketches, page 181: “In no state have the brethren been truer to the cause than in old Vermont.”

As a result of tent meetings held by M. E. Cornell and D. T. Bourdeau a group was formed in Norridgewock, Maine, in 1863, and organized as a church Dec. 12, 1866, by M. E. Cornell, J. N. Andrews, and James and Ellen White. The original church building is still used for services. The Maine Conference was organized in Norridgewock, Nov. 1, 1867, with James White, D. M. Canright, and J. N. Andrews present. L. L. Howard was elected president; H. C. Winslow, secretary; and W. A. Towle, treasurer. Hard work, evangelistic tent meetings, and tract societies spread the message throughout the state, resulting in many small companies and churches forming. Cliff Island, in Casco Bay near Portland, at one time was said to be populated by a majority of Adventists, with one of the first Adventist church schools in Maine. On Apr. 20, 1910, the Maine Conference Association of Seventh-day Adventists was formed and still continues to operate today as a legal association.

The first Seventh-day Adventist Church to be fully organized in New Hampshire was the historic Washington church on Jan. 12, 1862. New Hampshire was then included with Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Rhode Island in the New England Conference, which was organized in 1870. From 1903 to 1910 New Hampshire and Massachusetts formed the Central New England Conference. In 1910, at the request of the Atlantic Union Conference, New Hampshire and Vermont united as the Northern New England Conference; then in 1923 Maine was added to the conference territory. The conference headquarters, first located in Rochester, New Hampshire, were moved to Portland, Maine, in 1938 to Forest Avenue. The offices of the Northern New England Conference are currently located at 91 Allen Avenue, Portland, Maine.

The Present Work of the Northern New England Conference. In seeking to continue the work done by the pioneers, the Northern New England Conference leaders often have claimed the promise found in Testimonies, vol. 1, page 149: "I saw that when the message shall increase greatly in power, then the providence of God will open and prepare the way in the East for much more to be accomplished than can be at the present time." To prepare the way for the power of God to work in the future, an emphasis is placed on involving the youth, family members, and tried-and-true adults/seniors in a variety of church activities.

Youth. One goal of the Education Department is to keep all church schools that have from 4 to 42 students open, so each child in the conference has an opportunity to have a Christian education. To strengthen the tie that binds, the conference hosts a yearly teacher's convention, a music clinic, and a number of quarterly workshops. The well-equipped Lawroweld youth camp on Lake Webb offers a diversity of programs: in the summer there are one-week aquatic, family, junior, teen, and blind camps; in the fall the academy retreat and outdoor education camp give students an opportunity to study God's lesson book in nature; an annual Bible camp attracts students from grades 8 to 12 throughout the conference.

At Pine Tree Academy a Bible Labs program encourages students to take part in visiting nursing homes, helping in animal shelters and food banks, and volunteering in hospitals, libraries, and day-care centers. Youth Emergency Service (YES) is a conference-wide program that teaches youth how to handle emergencies and disasters, and encourages participation in our existing Community Services programs. Youth-to-Youth and "Action Units" are small groups or Sabbath school classes that are involved in outreach: several prison ministry, flea-market witnessing, and literature distribution groups are active. Youth also volunteer on the Community Services van, which offers free blood pressure screening; take part in public evangelism, conducting meetings and giving Bible studies, and visiting and reclaiming nonattending friends and former members.

Family Members. The main gathering for Northern New England families is the old-fashioned tent camp meeting held each June-July for 10 days on the Pine Tree Academy grounds. There is a four-day family life camp over the Labor Day weekend, and Caring for Marriage weekends and seminars throughout the year. The youth camp is available to churches for weekend meetings. The conference sponsors children's ministries training for Sabbath school leaders and teachers, Vacation Bible School personnel, and Neighborhood Bible Club leaders.

Adults/Seniors. The Northern New England Conference honors those very active church supporters who have dedicated a portion of their lives and income faithfully to the church in several ways. Each year there are several retreats scheduled at Camp Lawroweld for specific groups: a church ministries festival for church ministries leaders in the local churches; a medical retreat for the medical professionals who serve throughout the conference; and a women's retreat to give women a much-deserved break. There is also a retirement home located adjacent to Parkview Hospital for the convenience of members who have retired. Each year at camp meeting the retirees are honored with flowers and a special meal. The conference leaders speak weekly on Sabbaths in conference churches; hold and sponsor 8—10 public evangelistic meetings per year, while encouraging the development of small Bible study and nurture groups and lay evangelism; and support the work of the local pastors, Bible workers, and training programs such as AsPire—assisting pastors in reaching excellence—to help every member to minister with his or her God-given talents and spiritual gifts.

During the year there are Area Information Meetings (AIM), similar to town hall forums, scheduled quarterly and as needed throughout the conference to keep members in touch with conference leaders. Finally, four annual meetings commemorate the work of the Adventist pioneers. These are held in Bordoville, Vermont; Washington, New Hampshire; Norridgewock and Cliff Island, Maine—in northern New England, the birthplace of the Seventh-day Adventist Church.

Northern Ngwa County Hospital

NORTHERN NGWA COUNTY HOSPITAL. A 30-bed general hospital formerly operated by the West African Union Mission on a 65-acre (26-hectare) site at Okpuala-Ngwa, eastern Nigeria. Equipped with laboratory facilities, it had 51 full-time workers, including two doctors and five national graduate nurses.

Seven buildings were erected by the community: an outpatient block, an inpatient unit to accommodate 30 patients, a kitchen and laundry block, two doctors' residences, a girls' dormitory, and a mortuary.

The hospital, opened to patients in August 1963 (officially opened July 6, 1964), was planned in 1959 in negotiations between the Northern Ngwa County Council representative, Chief Nwachuku, and Dr. Harold Cherne, medical director of the Ahoada County Hospital, and approved by the West African Union committee and the Northern European Division committee. The community agreed to put up the buildings and equip the hospital, and guaranteed to subsidize its operating cost beyond fees collected, while the operation of the hospital, including handling of all personnel matters, was to be in the hands of the mission committee.

A community board acted in an advisory capacity. The mission agreed that as the institution grew it would take the responsibility for establishing and operating a nurse's training school in the institution.

Dr. S. A. Nagel was called to be the medical director, assisted by Dr. James McDuffie. In September 1969 Dr. Nagel returned home on furlough. This was about the same time the International Red Cross committee took over the hospital from that time until the end of the civil war in 1969.

After the war the government of East Central state took the institution over and made it a general hospital for the new Ngwa division.

Northern Union Conference

NORTHERN UNION CONFERENCE. The North American administrative unit that formerly comprised the following local conferences: Iowa, Minnesota, North Dakota, and South Dakota.

The Northern Union Conference was organized in 1902, formed from part of the territory of the Northwestern Union Conference, which had been formed Apr. 18, 1901, at the General Conference when it was voted to organize union conferences. Minnesota, North and South Dakota, Manitoba and the Northwest Territory (including the present provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta) made up the Northern Union Conference. In 1907, when the Western Canadian Union Conference was formed, the Canadian territories were taken from the Northern Union, and the Iowa Conference added to it. In 1932 the territory of the Northern Union Conference was absorbed by the Central Union Conference. Then in 1937 the Northern Union was reorganized with the conferences: Iowa, Minnesota, North Dakota, and South Dakota. It was reorganized in 1980 as part of the Mid-America Union.

Presidents: C. W. Flaiz, 1902—1904; R. A. Underwood, 1904—1912; Charles Thompson, 1912—1919; C. F. McVagh, 1919—1920; E. T. Russell, 1920—1924; Charles Thompson, 1924—1932; E. H. Oswald, 1937—1941; Maynard V. Campbell, 1941—1946; Jere D. Smith, 1946—1954; R. H. Nightingale, 1954—1962; J. L. Dittberner, 1962—1971; Arthur Kiesz, 1971—1973; W. O. Coe, 1973—1975; L. J. Northwest Medical Foundation

NORTHWEST MEDICAL FOUNDATION. A nonprofit Seventh-day Adventist health-care corporation established in 1972 as an organization to increase the availability of health manpower in the Northwest and to strengthen the medical work of the church in the region.

Initially NWMF was considered to be primarily a recruiting agency for Portland SDA hospitals and VertiCare, an SDA corporation that was formed in 1972 to establish and manage medical centers, or clinics, in the area of Portland Adventist Hospital and other localities of the region that were in need of both physicians and medical facilities. The foundation served in the beginning as an information clearinghouse on medical practice opportunities in the Portland area and other points of the Northwest. Portland Adventist Hospital was the “parent” organization that instituted the NWMF and VertiCare programs.

As it became apparent that NWMF had potential for a greater role in providing management direction of SDA medical institutions over a wider area—including centralized services such as purchasing, data processing, and public relations—the foundation became the overall entity to coordinate the medical work in the Northwest. In this reorganization Portland Adventist Hospital and VertiCare became subsidiaries of NWMF. The foundation in August 1973, by lease, assumed management control of Tillamook County General Hospital, Tillamook, Oregon, and later in the year, of Walla Walla General Hospital, Walla Walla, Washington.

Other hospitals in the region have expressed interest in NWMF and its potential for strengthening the health-care delivery systems of communities that are currently without adequate medical programs. An aspect of bringing a strong health ministry to these communities is NWMF’s vigorous physician recruitment program, which has encouraged an increasing number of medical personnel to establish themselves in the Northwest.

NORTHWESTERN ADVENTIST ACADEMY (Academia Adventista del Noroeste). A K-12 school started by Juanita Pagán in Aguadilla, Puerto Rico. It began as a church school with 10 students and a teacher paid by Mrs. Pagán. In 1977 the institution was moved to larger facilities, where classes were held until 1982.

In 1981 a lot was acquired in Barrio Camaseyes and buildings were constructed. In 1982 the school opened its doors offering K-11 and the following year, K-12. In 1993 there were seven teachers on the primary level and seven on the high school level. The building has 14 classrooms, a laboratory, a library, two rooms as computer labs, a dining area, and offices. There are 205 students in the primary school and 166 in high school.

Norway

NORWAY. A kingdom occupying the western side of the Scandinavian peninsula and extending more than a thousand miles from a point parallel with central Labrador to a point north of the Arctic Circle, where for several weeks in summer the sun does not set. The scattered population of 4.3 million (1994) live principally along the coast. The major part of its approximately 125,000 square miles (324,000 square kilometers) is mountainous, some peaks reaching an elevation of 8,000 feet (2,440 meters). The Norwegians make their living principally by mining, manufacturing, construction, agriculture, forest industries, commerce, transportation, and fishing. Christianity entered Norway during the eleventh century and gradually won over the pagan Norsemen. Early in the sixteenth century when the teachings of Luther were widely accepted, Norway became Protestant and its state church is Lutheran. About 90 percent of the people claim the Lutheran faith. Some 230,000 belong to various other denominations, with the Pentecostals forming the largest non-Lutheran group. Nearly 6 percent of the population have no church affiliation. There are more than 30,000 Roman Catholics in the country.

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics

Seventh-day Adventist Statistics. The territory of Norway used to constitute the northern part of the West Nordic Union Conference. In 1992 the West Nordic Union Conference was dissolved, as Denmark founded a union of churches and Norway a union conference. The new Norwegian Union Conference, which is a part of the Trans-European Division, consists of three conferences. Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work

Development of Seventh-day Adventist Work. Beginnings. As early as 1874 the Review and Herald reports a letter from a woman named Reirsen in Norway, telling that she and her husband had begun to keep the seventh-day Sabbath and that several others were interested as a result of having read the Advent Tidende. She also expressed the wish either that she could move to America to see her fellow believers, or that someone might be sent to Norway to preach to them. This was one of many calls from Scandinavian readers of the American papers. This Danish-Norwegian paper, the first non-English periodical published by Seventh-day Adventists, was begun by John G. Matteson, a Dane who had emigrated to America.

In 1877 Matteson sailed for Europe, where for a year he worked in Denmark before crossing to Christiania (Oslo), the capital of Norway. Traveling from place to place by train and steamer, he found small groups of adherents in several places. One of these interested people was a ship agent named Swenson, who helped Matteson greatly. By selling publications Matteson supported himself and helped spread his beliefs. During the winter he held a series of meetings in Christiania, where a message such as his had never been heard before. In spite of strong opposition from the ministers of the state church, the interest increased until about a thousand persons were crowding into a building built to seat 800 and were filling the aisles and even sitting in the windows. The ministers next took their battle into the newspaper columns, but it seemed that the more they wrote about SDAs, the more the people wanted to know what this new religion taught.

By January 1879 Matteson reported to the Review and Herald that some 80 persons were attending his meetings in Christiania, and about half of these had begun to keep the Sabbath. On Jan. 13 he wrote: "Last Sabbath we formed a church under the law of dissenters in this country. We went before the authorities and were by them acknowledged as a Christian church agreeably to law. Thirty-three persons had signed their names" (53:54, Feb. 13, 1879).

About 60 were in the afternoon Bible class. In February he reported that a (building) society was formed "to purchase property for the use of the S.D.A. church" and a building was bought that would provide a meeting hall and apartments (ibid. 53:78, Feb. 5, 1879). On June 10 he wrote: "We have now held ten meetings in our new hall. . . . Twenty-five willing souls have been buried in baptism, and others will soon be ready. These, with our brethren and sisters that have come to us from the Baptist denomination, have united, and thus form a church of commandment—keeping believers" (ibid. 54:22, July 10, 1879).

On July 30 he reported: "To the present time forty-six persons have been baptized, and sixty-two in all have united with the church" (ibid. 54:68, Aug. 21, 1879).

Also in 1879 Matteson launched at Oslo the second SDA publishing house to be established outside North America and began to publish the Tidernes Tegn ("Signs of the Times"). Within 12 months 1,200 copies were being printed monthly. Norwegian members in America sent him 400 paid subscriptions of the Tidernes Tegn for their relatives in Norway.

As a result of Matteson's reports in the Review and Herald, Scandinavian members in America set out to collect more than $2,000 for the Danish and Norwegian Mission. Soon J. B. Jespersson came from America to assist Matteson, and later E. G. Olsen, who began work in the town of Larvik.

Between 1880 and 1886 Matteson held meetings in various places, including Drammen. In 1886 O. A. Olsen, N. Clausen, and John Lorntz came from America to join the workers, Clausen and Lorntz helping in the publishing house. A school for training colporteurs was started in Christiania. By 1887 there were four organized churches with a membership of a little more than 200.

On June 8, 1887, the first-known Seventh-day Adventist camp meeting in Europe met at Moss, Norway, a town about 40 miles (65 kilometers) south of Christiania. It was followed by a session of the European Council (June 14—22), which was attended by Ellen White, her son

W. C. White, O. A. Olsen, S. N. Haskell, L. R. Conradi, B. L. Whitney, S. H. Lane, William Ings, J. H. Waggoner, D. A. Robinson, and C. L. Boyd. Mrs. White spoke words of encouragement. "Go forward!" was her watchword to the colporteurs who were to press onward into every town and hamlet. The first Seventh-day Adventist church building in Norway was dedicated at Christiania in March 1886.

Organization and Growth. The first Norwegian Conference was organized at the Moss camp meeting in 1887 with O. A. Olsen, a native son of Norway, elected president. At the next General Conference, held in Battle Creek, the Norwegian Conference was admitted to the sisterhood of conferences.

When Olsen was elected president of the General Conference in 1888, Lewis Johnson took his place in Norway (1889) and served 10 years until Olsen returned.

Seventh-day Adventist medical work began in Norway in 1898 when two graduates of the Battle Creek Sanitarium, Alma Andersen and her sister, Emma Fleischer, opened a clinic in Christiania (now Oslo). The clinic was continued for a number of years and was known as Kurbadet (Oslo Health Home). It is now closed, and an evangelistic center is in the process of being founded in this historic building.

As a part of the general reorganization stemming from the 1901 General Conference, the Scandinavian Union Conference was formed, made up of Denmark, Norway, Sweden, and Finland, with P. A. Hansen serving as president for the first seven years. In 1901 Norway had five ordained ministers, four licensed ministers, 20 churches, and 631 members. In 1931, when this union was divided, Norway, Denmark, Iceland, and the Faroe Islands joined to form the West Nordic Union Conference, with headquarters in Oslo.

In Norway a number of organizational changes took place during half a century. Between 1912 and 1917 there were two conferences. From 1917 to 1920 there were three conferences. At the end of 1920 Norway had seven ordained ministers, six licensed ministers, 38 churches, and 1,686 members. Then for nine years there was only one conference; from 1929 to 1942 there were two again; from 1942 to 1950, four, and from 1950 on, three conferences.

In 1947 a Bible correspondence school was begun and placed under the direction of G. Gudmundsen. This became the Norwegian Bible Correspondence School.

The members are widely scattered; this helps explain why only 412 children are in church schools. One interesting fact is that Hammerfest, a city lying north of the Arctic Circle, is the most northerly Seventh-day Adventist church in the world.

Norwegian Junior College

NORWEGIAN JUNIOR COLLEGE (Tyrifjord Videregaende Skole). A coeducational boarding school on the junior college level operated at Røyse, Norway, by the Norwegian Union Conference. It was established in 1958 on the eastern side of the northwestern arm of the beautifully situated Lake Tyrifjord. The school, established on approximately 77 acres (30 hectares) overlooking the lake, is 10 miles (16 kilometers) from Honefoss and 40 miles (65 kilometers) north of Oslo. It is primarily a boarding school, but about 25 percent of the students are day students. The location of the school serves quite adequately the 5,396-member Seventh-day Adventist constituency.

The first denominational school in Norway was a three-month colporteur and worker institute conducted in 1887 by O. A. Olsen, who later became president of the General Conference. This educational program, carrying the name of Philadelphia School, continued for only a few years. Beginning in 1894, Norwegian students went to a joint school of Scandinavian Seventh-day Adventists at Frederikshavn in Denmark. After that, the mission school established at Skodsborg, Denmark, in 1908 with Erik Arnesen as principal and moved in 1918 to Naerum, Denmark, served as the educational center for both Denmark and Norway.

In 1921 Norway opened a school of its own in a summer sanitarium building rented for one year at Solberg, Hadeland, on the shore of Lake Randsfjorden. On Oct. 3, 1921, the first group of 35 students met there. Henry Grundset was the first principal of this school, called the Solberg Misjonsskole. In 1922 a large farm property was purchased for a school at Ullensaker, Akershus, in the central part of Norway, about 30 miles (50 kilometers) north of Oslo. This institution, known as the Onsrud Mission School, had an average enrollment of about 50 or more for a number of years. During the latter part of World War II the number rose to about 100. Onsrud Mission School served as a training school for missionaries to overseas fields as well as for national workers and for students who wished to continue their studies at Newbold Missionary College in England, or at colleges in America or South Africa. A four-year course was offered at Onsrud with the main emphasis on biblical and other subjects related to the missionary purpose of the school. However, some students, in addition, followed the government curriculum for the realskole, and they sat for the government-recognized examinations as "private students." Beginning in 1939, Onsrud Mission School became a six-year school corresponding to a junior college.

In 1952 the Onsrud property was sold, and plans were laid to build a new school. From 1952 to 1958 the Norwegian students received their denominational education at Vejlefjord Realskole, Denmark. Some of the Norwegian teachers moved to Denmark with their students to prepare those who wished to take the Norwegian realskole examination.

Meanwhile a committee under the chairmanship of the president of the West Nordic Union, Alf Lohne, in 1955 found a new site for the school on the shore of Lake Tyrifjord in the heart of southern Norway. An administration building, an office building, and one dormitory were completed in 1958. On Sept. 18 the new school opened its doors to 101 students. The curriculum was based on the requirements of the realskole with additional Bible instruction. The three-year realskole course was given government recognition in 1960. The same year a three-year gymnas course (English language line) was introduced, based on a completed realskole, or a five-year gymnas course based on a completed seven-year elementary education (14 years of age). In 1961 a science course was added to the gymnas program. Government recognition of the gymnas was granted in 1964 as the first full classes in both lines were completing their work.

The school was granted junior college status in 1962 by the General Conference. All departments have full government recognition. Current enrollment (1993) stands at 250 students, with a teaching staff of 18 full-time teachers. Beginning with the 1971—1972 school year the realskole intake was discontinued and, in harmony with educational developments throughout Norway, the realskole was phased out over a period of three years. It was replaced by the three-year ungdomsskole (grades 7—9), which is the second part of the new grunnskole (grades 1—9), the first part being called the barneskole (grades 1—7). On campus the East Norway Conference is operating a school (grades 1—7) for 30 students. In 1974 a business administration course on the gymnas level was introduced, having been granted full government accreditation from its start. In 1965 an additional dormitory was erected, increasing dormitory capacity to 180 students. In 1970 the school plant was basically complete with the building of a chapel-auditorium, a heated indoor swimming pool, a gymnasium, modern classrooms for art instruction, a bomb shelter with ancillary facilities, and a spacious library.

The gymnas, now called videregaende, meets the entrance requirements to European universities. Gymnas graduates are generally given junior-year standing at Seventh-day Adventist senior colleges.

Norwegian Publishing House

NORWEGIAN PUBLISHING HOUSE (Norsk Bokforlag). A publishing establishment with its own printing facilities, operated by the Norwegian Union Conference in Oslo, Norway. The publishing house was organized July 27, 1882, under the name Den Skandinaviske Forlags-og Trykkeriforening (The Scandinavian Publishing and Printing Association), later changed to Den Skandinaviske Bokforlags (The Scandinavian Publishing House). For some years it was listed in the Yearbook as the Christiania Publishing House.

Books and periodicals were printed for Sweden and Denmark, as well as for Norway. Since 1940 the institution has been named Norsk Bokforlag and prints for Norway only.

Seventh-day Adventist publishing work in Norway began in January 1879 when J. G. Matteson published Tidernes Tegn (“Signs of the Times”), containing mainly his sermons. For the first three months it was published weekly and then semimonthly. The magazine has continued under different names and is at present the monthly Tidens Tale (“Voice of the Times”). The health periodical Sundhedsbladet in Danish-Norwegian (later called Sunnhetsbladet for Norwegian readers only) was begun in 1881 by Matteson and was edited for many years by Dr. Carl Ottosen, founder of the Skodsborg Sanitarium. It is issued monthly.

Since 1900 the publishing house has published a church paper, Evangeliets Sendebud (“Gospel Messenger”), and since 1932 a young people’s paper, Advent-Ungdom (“Advent Youth”). During the year 1992, 169,552 books, 416,000 tracts, and 374,600 periodicals were sold at a value of Nkr16,585,553 (US$2,370,000). A substantial group of full-time colporteurs has carried out door-to-door evangelism since 1882.

NOUJAIM, SELIM ELIAS (1898—1966). Educator, editor, departmental secretary, administrator. A native of Maassir, El-Chouf, Lebanon, Noujaim began his work as a teacher in the Egypt Mission, where he also organized schools. He performed this same service in Iraq and Lebanon and emerged as one of the church's leading educators. Known as a scholar of Arabic, he translated a number of church publications into that language and edited Hope and Health magazine. In the East Mediterranean Union he served as educational secretary as well as temperance and religious liberty secretary, and director of the Voice of Prophecy in that area. His last position was that of president of the Lebanon Mission.

As the first national worker from the Middle East to develop a wide influence of leadership, he provided the church with valuable insights and paved the way for greater national participation in denominational administration.

Stauffer to Argentina and helped to open Seventh-day Adventist work there through the sale of SDA publications. He canvassed also in Brazil, the Malvinas (Falkland Islands), and Chile. About 1895 he married Ethel Threadgold and later went to England. In 1907 he and his wife went to Central America, where he sold SDA publications. In 1908 his only daughter and his wife died. He died at Clarkston, Washington, at the age of 96.

Number of the Beast

NUMBER OF THE BEAST. The cryptic number 666 or, in some ancient manuscripts, 616 (Rev. 13:18). It is declared to be “the number of a man” (or “a human number,” RSV), “the number of the beast,” and “the number of his name” (Rev. 13:17, 18; 15:2). The reader “who has understanding” is invited to “reckon the number of the beast” (Rev. 13:18, RSV), and the saved are declared in Rev. 15:2 to be those “that had gotten the victory over the beast, . . . and over the number of his name.”

Seventh-day Adventist Views. In 1836 William Miller proposed that the first beast of Rev. 13 be interpreted as pagan Rome, and the second beast as papal Rome. The “number of the [first]beast” he took to be a time period of 666 years, during which the power of pagan Rome was exercised over the people of God, that is, Jews and Christians, and reckoned this from 158 B.C., when he supposed that the Jews made their league with Rome (1 Macc. 8:23ff.), to A.D. 508, when, according to his (unproved) calculation, “Paganism ceased” with the conversion of the last of the 10 kingdoms occupying the former Roman territories (William Miller, Evidence From Scripture and History of the Second Coming of Christ [1836], pp. 54—56, 62).

This view does not seem to have been especially influential in the prophetic interpretation of Sabbathkeeping Adventists, since they very early applied the “number of the beast” to the second two-horned beast instead of to the first. In 1847 James White makes this identification and declares of this second beast: “This last power that treads down the saints is brought to view in Rev. 13:11—18. His number is 666” (A Word to the “Little Flock” [1847], pp. 8, 9).

A similar understanding is reflected in his publication at the same time of a letter written by Ellen White to Joseph Bates. The manuscript of this letter, dated Topsham, Maine, Apr. 7, 1847, is not extant. Bates printed it as a broadside under the title “A Vision, Vol. I, no. 1.” As published, it contains the following statement in the context of a discussion of the symbols of Rev. 13: “I saw that the number (666) of the Image Beast was made up; and that it was the Beast that changed the Sabbath, and the Image Beast had followed on after, and kept the Pope’s, and not God’s Sabbath.” In 1868 Uriah Smith explained that the number 666 in this statement, as suggested by its enclosure in parentheses, had not been in the original letter written by Mrs. White but had been inserted by Bates, as reflecting his understanding of her meaning (The Visions of Mrs. E. G. White [1868], pp. 100—102). Smith further points out that the expression “image beast,” which she uses, is difficult to apply either to the beast to whom the image is made or to the beast that makes the image. He therefore takes this “image beast,” whose number Mrs. White declares to be “made up,” as a reference to the “image to the beast” (Rev. 13:14). He suggests that this image also has a number (not necessarily 666), which, though not mentioned in Scripture, is the number to which Mrs. White refers.

James White endorsed Smith’s book as a whole, stating that he had carefully read the manuscript (Review and Herald 32:60, Aug. 25, 1868). This would appear to indicate that with the retrospect of two decades he agreed with Smith’s explanation of the passage in question. In the light of Smith's and White's statements it seems evident that this passage cannot be taken as a clear indication of Mrs. White's thinking on the number of the beast. However, it does throw light on James White's understanding of the problem in 1847. Shortly after Bates's publication of the letter, White included it in his initial publishing venture A Word to the "Little Flock" (Brunswick, Maine, 1847, pp. 18—20). In this reprint he continued the figure 666 in parentheses, as printed by Bates, and added a footnote reference to Rev. 13:18 (p. 19).

Like Bates, at that time he obviously understood the "image beast" to be the second beast and connected it with the number 666. This identification of the number 666 with the second beast was of course in harmony with his opinion stated in one of his own essays in the same publication and cited above. The same connection was made by George W. Holt in 1850, who went on to identify this beast as "protestant and republican" (ibid., pp. 8, 9; G. W. Holt, in Present Truth 1:64, March 1850).

Later the same year a further step was taken by Otis Nichols, who published a prophetic chart on which the two horns of the second beast are stated to be "papist and protestant," "whose names number 666" (L. E. Froom, Prophetic Faith, vol. 4, p. 1074; see note 6). Apparently before the chart was circulated, a corrected reading was pasted over these horns: "Republicanism & Protestantism." The intent of this interpretation seems to have been made clear by J. N. Andrews, writing the following year in the Review and Herald, where he identifies the two horns of this beast as "Republican civil power" and "Protestant ecclesiastical power," and interprets the beast itself as the United States. Applying the number 666 to this beast, he then suggests: "The Protestant church may, if taken as a whole, be considered as a unit; but how near its different sects number six hundred three score and six, may be a matter of interest to determine" (1:81—86, May 19, 1851).

In 1853 J. M. Stephenson took the alternate view that the number is that of the first beast, arguing on the basis of Rev. 15:2 that number, mark, and image all belong to the same beast. He denied that the number is to be solved by "the ancient mode of reckoning by letters," because it is the number of a specific man, and such reckoning can apply it to many different men. The "man" he therefore took to be "the man of sin," which he identified as the "Papal Anti-Christian church." He declared, "We may trace the lineage of every Protestant church back to the mother of harlots [Rev. 17:15]." "These divisions [of Protestantism] have continued dividing and subdividing until, according to the Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge, they now number about six hundred three score and six" (Review and Herald 4:166, Nov. 29, 1853). The following year J. N. Loughborough quoted Stephenson in the second installment of an article in The Two-Horned Beast that appeared in the Review and Herald (5:79, Mar. 28, 1854). M. E. Cornell took 666 to represent the "Protestant sectarian bodies" (ibid. 6:43, Sept. 19, 1854). In 1855 Andrews wrote again on the subject, still applying the number to the second beast, developing his argument that this beast is the United States, and identifying the "image of the beast" (v. 15) as "apostate religious bodies": "The image it appears is made up by legalizing the various classes that will acknowledge the blasphemous claims of the beast. . . . It is thus that we understand the number of the beast" (ibid. 6:204, Apr. 3, 1855).

This view was maintained by Andrews in a reprint of the series dated 1864 (The Three Angels of Revelation XIV. 6—12, p. 95).

However, in 1866 Uriah Smith proposed a radically different interpretation. As Stephen had done, he connected the number 666 with the first beast, and saw it as symbolizing the papacy. The “name” for which the number stands he took to be the Latin title VICARIVS FILII DEI, “Vicar of the Son of God,” the sum of whose letters in Roman numerals equals 666. This phrase, though not a part of the official papal title, is the equivalent of a common term for the pope, and made its initial appearance about A.D. 760 in the false Donation of Constantine (see SB, no. 1751). Andreas Helwig (c. 1572—1643) had proposed this title as the name cryptically referred to by the “number of the beast.” Concerning this title, Smith declared that “the most plausible name we have ever seen suggested as containing the number of the beast, is the blasphemous title which the pope applies to himself, and wears in jeweled letters upon his miter or pontifical crown” (Review and Herald 28:196, Nov. 20, 1866).

In an 1877 reprint of his book The Three Angels of Revelation XIV. 6—12, Andrews also adopted this view (p. 109). Smith continued this interpretation throughout the various editions of his highly influential Thoughts on Daniel and the Revelation, and largely through the medium of this book his view has come to be held widely among Seventh-day Adventists. However, no proof for his assertion that these words appear on the papal crown has been discovered (see SB, no. 1750; C. D. Vineyard, “The Papal Tiara” [unpublished M.A. Thesis, S.D.A. Theological Seminary, 1951]). Although there is nothing to be found in the published writings of Ellen White on the interpretation of the number 666, she clearly taught that this number is to be identified with the first beast of Rev. 13, which beast represents the papacy (GC 445).

The NT and the Early Church. The scheme of adding up the numerical values of the letters in a name or word, as demonstrated above in the term VICARIVS FILII DEI, is an ancient practice known as gematria. This was possible in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, as in each of these languages letters were used for numerals. In the two latter languages all letters of their alphabets were given numerical value in alphabetical order, running in succession through the units, tens, and hundreds. Thus any name could have a number. Numerous examples of this appear in ancient literature and inscriptions. At Pompeii (before A.D. 79) two instances have been found: in one a man speaks of his lady and declares, “The number of her honorable name is 45”; in another the writer declares, “I love her whose number is 545.” Similarly the epitaph on a Jewish grave from the time of Alexander Severus (A.D. 222—235) reads: “I proclaim Gaios to be equal in number to these two, both holy and good”; here the name Gaios and the Greek words hagios (“holy”) and agathos (“good”) each total 284. An interpretive use of gematria in rabbinical literature appears in the midrash on Lev. 16:3ff.: “There are three hundred and sixty-five days in the solar year. The numerical value of hassatan (Satan) is three hundred and sixty-four. This alludes to the fact that during all the days of the year Satan brings accusations, but he does not bring any accusations on the Day of Atonement.”

Similarly in Christian exegesis gematria is found in the Epistle of Barnabas (first half of the second century). Commenting on the statement that Abraham circumcised 318 men of his household (Gen. 14:14; 17:23—27), Barnabas 9:8 declares: “Notice that it first says ‘ten and eight,’ and then, in a separate phrase, ‘three hundred.’ As to the ‘ten and eight’: ‘ten’ = I, ‘eight’ = H. There you have IESUS [Gr.]. But since the Cross, prefigured by a T, was to be the source of grace, it adds the ‘three hundred.’ It therefore points to Jesus in two letters, and to the Cross in one.”

These examples illustrate the wide use of gematria in the ancient world.

From the beginning, Christians seem to have understood the number of the beast as gematria. Our earliest evidence comes from Irenaeus of Lyons (c. A.D. 180), who discusses the question at length. He confesses doubt as to the meaning of the number, which suggests that no tradition concerning this had been handed down through the churches of Asia, from which Irenaeus had come, for elsewhere he is in possession of a number of such traditions attributed to John, preserved there. Irenaeus sees several significances in the number: it is the age of Noah at the Flood (Gen. 7:6; 600 years) plus the dimensions of Nebuchadnezzar’s image (Dan. 3:1; 60 x 6 cubits); it also represents for him the division of world history into six periods of one thousand years each. Prophetically, however, he takes it as gematria and suggests three words as possible solutions: euanthas (e=5, u=400, a=1, n=50, th=9, a=1, s=200), a name similar to one, euanthēs (“beautifully flowering”), given the god Dionysus, and a not uncommon personal name that may have been adapted purposely to total 666, but with no ascertainable relationship to the figure portrayed in Revelation v. 1:1; lateinos (l=30, a=1, t=300, e=5, i=10, n=50, o=70, s=200), “Latin”—“for,” he points out, “the Latins are they who at present bear rule”; and teitan (t=300, e=5, i=10, t=300, a=1, n=50), his own preferred solution, which seems to be a variant spelling of “Titan,” referring to the mythological Titans who rebelled against their father, the god Uranus. Irenaeus notes that the term was also applied to the sun. Though he does not say so, in addition there may be an implied reference in this name to the Emperor Titus (A.D. 79—81), who destroyed the Temple in Jerusalem. Irenaeus concludes, however, that the meaning of the number cannot be known with certainty, though he is satisfied that it applies to antichrist. Commentators throughout ancient and medieval times proposed these and many similar terms and phrases with no greater likelihood of probability. Thus the Venerable Bede (c. 672—735), in addition to Irenaeus’ teitan, which he defines as “giant, . . . as if he excells all things in power,” gives two additional names that he had borrowed from other commentators, antemos (a=1, n=50, t=300, e=5, m=40, o=70, s=200), which he understands to mean “contrary to honor,” and arnoume (a=1, r=100, n=50, o=70, u=400, m=40, e=5), which he defines as the verb “to deny,” obviously taking it as the Greek verb arneomai.

666 or 616? Already in Irenaeus’ day, within a century of the writing of Revelation, there was a question whether the number should be 666 or 616. Irenaeus says that the reading “666” was found “in all the most approved and ancient copies” of Revelation and was testified to by those who had themselves seen John. However, the reading “616” survives in Codex Ephraemi (C) from the fifth century and in minuscules 5 and 11, as well as in an ancient commentary falsely attributed to Augustine. At the same time there is evidence that some early texts probably did not contain v. 18 at all: while the commentary of Pseudo-Augustine gives the number as 616, the text on which it is based, as well as the related commentary of the Spanish monk Beatus (d. A.D. 798), both omit the verse. As these works probably are based on a lost commentary by Ticonius (A.D. 390) from North Africa, it seems likely that from the fourth century at least there was an Old Latin text in which this verse did not appear. A number of modern scholars have favored the originality of the reading 616. It is pointed out that this is the lectio difficilior, that is, “the more difficult reading”: it is easier to account for an original 616 having been “rounded off” into 666 than vice versa. It is sometimes interpreted as standing for Gaios Kaisar (3 + 1 + 10 + 70 + 200 + 20 + 1 + 10 + 200 + 1 + 100), “Gaius Caesar,” that is, Caligula (A.D. 37—41), the first emperor to have demanded sacrifice to himself as a god. Thus he conceivably could have been seen as a prototype of the antichrist to come. Deissmann and Cullmann suggest that it represents the phrase Kaisar theos (k=20, a=1, i=10, s=200, a=1, r=100, th=9, e=5, o=70, s=200; “Caesar god”). This could reflect the pretensions of Caligula or perhaps of Diocletian (during whose persecution the Revelation probably was written), who proclaimed his own divinity and insisted on emperor worship. Others have defended the priority of 616 on the thesis that Nero, not Diocletian, is the figure intended, and have seen the solution in a Hebrew writing of his name, nrv qsr, “Nero Caesar,” which in Hebrew numerals also equals 616 (n=50, r=200, w=6, q=100, s=60, r=200). In this connection 666 is also frequently interpreted of Nero, his name being spelled in Greek fashion (Nerōn) but in Hebrew letters, nrwn qsr (n=50, r=200, w=6, n=50, q=100, s=60, r=200). Thus the suggestion has been made that both numbers are really variants of one original cryptogram. This is probably the most widely adopted solution among scholars today. However, several factors have been pointed out that appear to militate against this interpretation. First, if it is granted that the Revelation was intended to be understandable to its initial readers in their context, it is questionable that the Christians of the province of Asia would have understood a gematria based on the Hebrew alphabet. While this would not have been impossible (Irenaeus, as far away as Gaul and writing regarding the Valentinians, a heresy centered at Rome, argues a question of gematria on the name of Jesus [Iēsous = 888] by appealing to the priority of a Hebrew spelling), it does appear improbable from the fact that twice in the Revelation the writer feels the necessity of explaining to his Greek-speaking readers that certain terms are Hebrew (Rev. 9:11; 16:16). Second, the Hebrew spelling qsr for “caesar” is defective, the usual form being qysr, although a few examples of the former have been found, and this unusual form possibly could have been intended for the sake of the number 666. Third, it is highly questionable whether the number is to be understood as that of a specific emperor or any individual man, as the beast represents an institution rather than a person. In favor of the originality of 666 it may be said that the oldest manuscripts, and the vast majority of manuscripts of all textual groupings, read 666.

Nunawading Adventist College

NUNAWADING ADVENTIST COLLEGE. A coeducational secondary level (years 7 to 12) day school located at Nunawading, Melbourne, Victoria, Australia; operated by the Victorian Conference. The school has an enrollment of around 200 students and, each year, the students are successfully presented as candidates for the state-run VCE program and state examinations. Students then proceed to tertiary studies at the local universities or at Avondale College.

The school shares a parklike 40-acre (16-hectare) estate with the Victorian Conference headquarters, Coronella retirement village, and the Victorian Conference campground. The school operated as Nunawading Adventist High School from 1974 until 1988, offering the first four years of secondary education (years 7 to 10). 1989 saw the amalgamation of Nunawading and Hawthorn Adventist High School, with the combined schools located at Nunawading. At this time the name Nunawading Adventist College was adopted and the school program was extended to include years 11 and 12.

Nursing Education

NURSING EDUCATION. Nursing was a part of Seventh-day Adventist health work from its beginning (1866), but the first School of Nursing was opened in 1883 at the Battle Creek Sanitarium. By 1983 more than 40 programs of nursing education were operated by Seventh-day Adventists around the world, including master's degree programs in Loma Linda and the Philippines.

Levels of Nursing. The philosophy of Seventh-day Adventist nursing in the United States is expressed in the levels of nursing found in its programs (see top of next page).

Collegiate Nursing Education. In 1932 the General Conference recommended that SDA colleges offer a one-year prenursing course. By 1935 all the hospital schools of nursing required one year of college for entrance. In 1936 one SDA college (Columbia Union College) offered a five-year program leading to a baccalaureate degree with a major in nursing education. This course included one year of college and three years in a hospital School of Nursing followed by an additional year of college.

Subsequently most SDA colleges in the United States and overseas began operating nursing degree programs.

Nusa Tenggara Academy

NUSA TENGGARA ACADEMY (Sckolah Lanjutan Advent). A coeducational boarding school, opened in 1967 at Knete, Amarasi, Timor, a distance of 36 miles (58 kilometers) from Kupang, Indonesia. The enrollment at that time was 70 students. There were three teachers, including the principal, N. Sasela. In 1969 A. Rantung was appointed principal, and the number of students increased to about 90. The Nusa Tenggara Mission then planned to build permanent buildings there, but owing to shortage of water it was decided to find another location.

In 1969 a piece of land was bought in Tarus. This 100-acre (40-hectare) property was by the sea, only 10 miles (16 kilometers) from Kupang. In 1970, under the principalship of W. A. Sahetapy, the school moved to this new location, which later was found to be unsuitable owing to malarial mosquitoes and floods.

Two years later, under the leadership of S. Wewengkang, Nusa Tenggara Academy with 60 students moved again to a new location, which is not far from Tarus but close to the roadside. Government recognition was given to the academy in 1973.

Nussbaum, Jean

NUSSBAUM, JEAN (1888—1967). Physician, religious liberty secretary, friend of popes and world leaders, defender of the consciences and rights of millions. He was born Nov. 24, 1888, at La Chaux-de-Fonds, Switzerland, the second son of Tell and Berthe Nussbaum. Swiss law required school attendance six days a week. Therefore, Berthe took in washing so that she could pay the judge her weekly fine each Monday morning for allowing her son to skip school on Saturday. Also on each Monday morning, Jean's teacher invariably called the other students' attention to the boy's peculiar beliefs and asked him to explain to the class why he'd missed school the previous Saturday. He completed his primary grades and stood at the head of his class, but the local high school refused to excuse him from Saturday classes.

Accompanying his father and two other volunteer colporteurs to France, he there topped their literature sales. Then his father began evangelistic activities in the university city of Montpellier, southern France, and Jean enrolled in the local Protestant school. He won first prize in the school's history and mathematics competition for the entire area, and a woman professor offered to coach and prepare him for a bachelor's degree. But the idea of higher learning frightened Tell. He didn't want his son to lose his religious interest, as had been the case with the 15 young men he'd helped with their medical education. Greatly respecting his godly parent, Jean resolved to follow in his footsteps. At 15 he gave his first public evangelistic lecture on Daniel 2 and showed promise of becoming a dynamic preacher.

That autumn he enrolled in the lyceum preparatory course. He excelled in mathematics, and his teachers urged him to enter the polytechnic school and prepare himself for medical school. Tell Nussbaum still doubted the wisdom of higher education but recalled his visits with Drs. Daniel and Laretta Kress during his evangelistic meetings in Nice. Perhaps his son could be as useful and dedicated as they. He decided medicine was a worthy way for his son to serve his God.

Jean oriented his studies toward medicine and enrolled in the Faculte des Sciences. The following year he entered the famous medical school at Montpellier. When his parents moved north, Jean transferred to the smaller Lyons medical school, where he again met Sabbath observance problems. Not once did he compromise with the principles his parents had instilled in him. His church's teachings motivated his entire life. They were his thoughts and his character. After a year's successful internship in the famed Alpine tourist resort of Chamonix, he completed his thesis in Lyons and received his degree in medicine. Then he returned to Chamonix, but within two weeks World War I broke across Europe.

To help stem the typhus epidemic that had exhausted and immobilized sections of the Balkan peninsula, Nussbaum signed a contract with the Serbian government. He began serving in the Nis hospital, organized and managed by Belgrade society women. They assigned their youngest and most capable nurse, Milanka Zaritch, to interpret for him. A few weeks later typhus took the life of her superior, and Milanka became directress of the hospital.

Nussbaum lived in a nearby cavalry barracks room with four other men. Austrian prisoner of war Johan, assigned to clean their room, discovered that Jean was a Seventh-day Adventist and appealed to him to help him get Sabbath privileges also. But Johan's immature concept of good public relations provoked Jean, as the orderly got himself into deeper trouble. Yet his case involved vital religious freedom principles, and the SDA doctor couldn't abandon him to a sure death. The new director became so intensely interested in Nussbaum's first effort to protect the conscience of another that she joined her efforts with his in pleading with government officials in Johan's behalf.

While nursing Jean through a typhus infection, Milanka compared her Serbian Orthodox beliefs with his uncomplicated faith. His strong physique, a product of careful diet, exercise, and healthful habits, overcame the disease. His almost Spartan religious beliefs so attracted her that she with her mother and a niece began studying the Bible with him and soon asked for baptism into the Seventh-day Adventist Church. Jean and Milanka's friendship deepened, and they were married on an autumn day in 1915. Almost overnight political developments plunged Serbia into further disaster, forcing the newlyweds to begin a two-month unplanned honeymoon trek with a fleeing multitude. Inching up hairpin trails to Montenegro's summit and over Albania's icy roads, they came to the Drin Gulf, where they waited for a boat to Italy.

In Paris Nussbaum contacted the Medical Bureau for a possible location and relieved an ailing doctor in Dieppe. Then he settled in Le Havre and along with his practice held Sunday Bible classes in his office and lectured once a week on health in a public hall. He conducted evangelistic lectures in nearby Rouen and raised up churches in both Le Havre and Rouen. Then the Nussbaums began a lifelong residence in the elite Neuilly sector of Paris, where he practiced medicine.

The Southern European Division asked Nussbaum to represent them at the forthcoming Geneva League of Nations meeting to study a new world calendar proposed by Moses B. Cotsworth and backed by millionaire-philanthropist George Eastman. The meeting would take place in five days. Nussbaum was to join Charles S. Longacre, International Religious Liberty Association world secretary; Arthur S. Maxwell, editor in chief of the Stanborough Park Press in England; and Roy S. Anderson, of London (recently arrived from Australia), representing the Australasian Union Conference of Seventh-day Adventists. Since most of the delegates would speak French and the three delegates knew only English, the General Conference desired someone speaking French to help them understand behind-the-scenes maneuverings.

That evening Longacre arrived in Paris and asked Nussbaum to contact influential government leaders who might help them in their cause. Nussbaum presented the SDA position on the Sabbath to the head of the French delegation. In Geneva he thought of his wife's godfather, Voyislav Marinkovitch, who supervised Yugoslavia's political activities, and approached their mutual friend Djouritchitch, head of the Yugoslavian delegation. The Calendar Reform session convened, and Longacre, Maxwell, and Anderson presented their well-prepared papers. Nussbaum didn't intend to speak, but in the critical turn of proceedings finally agreed to do so. His exquisite French oratory turned the tide, and when the vote of the 42 voting delegates was taken, only three favored the adoption of a 13-month blank-day calendar.

Appointed religious liberty secretary of the Southern European Division, he began to lay the groundwork for any future calendar proposals. He presented the matter to Cardinal Pacelli in Rome and during succeeding months and years, even after the cardinal became Pope Pius XII, the Seventh-day Adventist religious liberty secretary often visited with his Vatican friend. He always found the pontiff to be most cordial.

Nussbaum attended the 1937 Universal Christian Council for Life and Work in Oxford, England, and the ecumenical council that followed in Edinburgh. During 1937 he also traveled four times to Bucharest to intercede for fellow Seventh-day Adventists when a Romanian government death decree threatened their lives. He appealed to Bulgarian and Orthodox church leaders to grant religious freedom to the Baptists and Seventh-day Adventists who lived in Bulgaria.

During the World War II occupation of Paris he continued his medical practice. Contacting the German commandant regarding religious problems, he won his respect so that Dr. Reichle often discussed with him problems the French Resistance created for him. Nussbaum's cordial relations with the German occupying officials caused his friends to fear for his safety when Allied forces neared Paris. But he believed his God could help him maintain good relationships with all nationalities, and he got along as well with the Allies when they returned as he had with the Germans.

In 1945 he attended the San Francisco Conference of United Nations and the following year the United Nations session in London. There he met Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt and visited with her in her London apartment and later in her Hyde Park home. She always received him as one who had priority on her time.

Through the years he worked closely with other physicians. He served as president of the French Anti-Tobacco Society and as president of the Institute Curie, composed of Protestant doctors in the Paris area. For 10 years Radio Monte Carlo broadcast his health and evangelistic lectures.

In his religious liberty work he always tried to base his conclusions of a problem on a Bible text. He contacted patriarchs, ministers of cults, education, and of war. With courtesy he met and powerfully influenced the heads of state of a dozen different countries, always with an air of personal understanding and humility. His efforts to reopen Seventh-day Adventist churches in Spain met with success. He traveled to Bogotá, the Vatican, and the United Nations in New York before Colombia again granted worship privileges to SDAs. He served his church well, accomplishing some of his most difficult assignments through a self-imposed program of secrecy. The records kept often contain only the notation that the problem was solved.

Nussbaum, Tell

NUSSBAUM, TELL (1859—1932). Evangelist and administrator in France and Switzerland. He was a maker of chronometers at La Chaux-de-Fonds, Switzerland, when he became a Seventh-day Adventist. He was baptized at Tramelan, Switzerland, in 1886. During the same year he married Berthe Favre. After his baptism he filled several offices in the Chaux-de-Fonds church. In 1898 he volunteered for evangelistic work and in 1906 was ordained at a camp meeting at Nîmes, in southern France. From 1910 to 1914 he was president of the French Conference, and after 1915 worked in Switzerland, although he continued to live in France. In 1925 he returned to Switzerland for surgery and after recovery preached in the churches until his retirement, probably in 1927, in Neuchâtel. He met his death when struck by a truck while riding his bicycle to church on a Sabbath morning.

Nutana

NUTANA. A health food factory in Denmark, originally owned and operated by the Seventh-day Adventist Church. It was established in 1898 by Carl Ottosen. This was the same year he founded the Skodsborg Sanitarium. Nutana covered about 60 percent of the health food market in Denmark during the 1980s. The institution was sold in 1991.

Nyazura Adventist Secondary School

NYAZURA ADVENTIST SECONDARY SCHOOL. A coeducational boarding school offering primary and secondary education near Nyazura station, Zimbabwe. In January 1993 the enrollment was 551 students with 24 teachers in high school, and 400 pupils in the primary school with 10 teachers.

History

History. Inyazura Mission School, now known as Nyazura Adventist Secondary School, was founded in 1910 by M. C. Sturdevant, superintendent of the Solusi Mission. Desiring to establish work further in the interior, he went to Mashonaland to look for a site for a mission station.

He was directed to a Mr. Folks, who said he was about to surrender his own farm to the government in order to return to England. He suggested that it might prove a suitable location for the mission.

After careful investigation, Sturdevant accepted the offer and the government was pleased to set the land aside for mission purposes with the understanding that a tract of land of similar size be deducted from the land belonging to Solusi Mission.

The Folks farm, consisting of 3,666 acres (1,500 hectares), had fertile soil watered by two rivers, both of which flow the entire year. The main mission was first named Tsungwezi Mission and later renamed Inyazura after the Beira-to-Salisbury Railway had placed a siding (Inyazura) six miles (10 kilometers) from the mission. The improvements on the farm consisted of 15 acres (six hectares) of plowed land and four native huts. The place is surrounded by hills and mountains and beautiful scenery.

The huts mentioned provided shelter for the first year. Early in 1911 bricks were made and burned, and by the end of November Sturdevant and his family were occupying a comfortable six-room brick cottage. A new school building was built of poles set perpendicularly and plastered inside and outside with mud, roofed with grass, and provided with brick seats plastered with mud.

To these buildings were added a store, a tool shop, and a large dining room, all with iron roofs, besides a number of huts, lion-proof cattle kraals, and a mule stable. The mission school opened Jan. 1, 1911, with 12 students who boarded at the mission. By the end of 1912 the enrollment had grown to 73, 40 of whom were boarding students.

Times were hard, and a number of missionaries who died of malaria and the influenza epidemics of 1914—1918 are buried at the small mission cemetery, a testimony to the untiring efforts, faith, and dedication of these workers who were laid to rest in the service of the Master.

The first baptismal candidates included Gibson Dumba, William Mberi, and Zacharia Mbengo Mutungwazi, who later became one of the first Shona teachers. Among the early students were three who later were among the first pastors. They were Edward Janda, Enock Waungana, and Jonah Chimuka.

In December 1950 the Zambesi Union Mission Committee voted to request the Southern African Division Committee to sell 1,000 acres (400 hectares) of land at Nyazura Mission and to invest the proceeds from this sale in the erection of a new European school, Rhobecon, later known as Anderson School. It is located near Gweru.

Nyazura Mission was a boarding primary school from 1914 to 1966. In 1967 a junior secondary school was introduced. In 1971 the first students sat for government examinations.

During 1976 the school closed down because of the war of liberation. It reopened in 1979. The years 1982 to 1992 saw rapid progress. To improve the infrastructure of the school, a church building, new classrooms, additional boys' and girls' dormitories, teachers' houses, administration offices, and a library were constructed during this period. This resulted in Nyazura winning the prestigious Meritorious Award from the Ministry of Education in 1991 and in introducing more advanced classes in 1993.

Nyhyttan Health and Rehabilitation Center

NYHYTTAN HEALTH AND REHABILITATION CENTER (Nyhyttan Halsä och Rehabilitering). A 90-bed sanitarium situated 38 miles (60 kilometers) from the town of Örebro, Sweden, on the farm property of Nyhyttan, purchased in 1897 for the establishment of a Seventh-day Adventist school in Sweden (see Swedish Junior College and Seminary). Former owners of the property had been iron miners, and had produced iron until 1789. In 1993 there were 50 employees and one full-time physician.

The sanitarium work at Nyhyttan opened in 1905, when C. Kahlström took charge of a summer health resort, offering a vegetarian diet and hydrotherapy. The number of guests during the first summer was about 50. In the beginning conditions were primitive; for example, wooden bathtubs were used. A doctor from Örebro visited the institution at intervals. The sanitarium was operated only during the school's summer vacation. In 1906 a special building for hydrotherapy was erected. In 1910 there were 75 guests, in 1914 there were 150.

In 1932, after the loss of the hydrotherapy building through fire, a new building with facilities for hydrotherapy and other types of physiotherapy was erected. In 1933, when the school moved to Ekebyholm, Nyhyttan Sanitarium began to operate the year round. The average number of patients was then 30 and the personnel numbered 15. In 1961 a modern building was erected containing offices, large treatment rooms, guest rooms for ambulatory patients, and a special section for bed patients. In 1961 a new church building with a seating capacity of 176 was dedicated. Since 1954 the sanitarium has had one full-time physician.

Through cooperation with the Örebro and Stockholm councils, a number of the patients sent by them are assured places at the sanitarium.

Oak Park Academy

OAK PARK ACADEMY. A coeducational boarding school formerly operated on the senior high school level at Nevada, Iowa, by the Iowa Conference. The school began in 1902 and continued for 78 years, closing its doors in 1980.

In 1901, when the Iowa Conference was looking for someone to start denominational secondary education in the state, they turned to a native son, T. H. Jeys. A man of vision and humor, Jeys had already started a school at Elk Point, South Dakota. A farm was procured joining the eastern limits of Stuart, Iowa, 40 miles (65 kilometers) southwest of the capital city of Des Moines, but the school, first known as the Iowa Industrial Academy and later as Stuart Academy, was housed during the first year (1902—1903) in the rented Baldum Hotel in Stuart. There were 35 students. Later a summer school was held to prepare church school teachers to take charge of conference schools.

The first buildings completed were the girls' dormitory and the barn. The new barn was used as the kitchen, dining room, classrooms, chapel, and boys' dormitory. There was no electricity. Rooms were made by using canvas partitions, heat was furnished by wood stoves, and water was carried from a well and heated on the stoves. There were no books and no laboratory. The teachers wrote the lessons on blackboards, to be copied by the students. Despite hardships, the students enjoyed the year and thanked God for the opportunity of a Christian education.

As in Seventh-day Adventist schools in general, vocational training was given from the first. Students worked in construction and on the farm; also in gardening and canning, since the farm yielded a large amount of the food supply. Students were required to work for two hours each day during the school year, for which they were credited at 10 cents an hour on their school expenses. A glove factory was operated, in which the students were paid by the piece.

In 1907 the first class of seven was graduated. During the fall of 1907 there was a larger student body, the buildings were completed, and a water system had been installed. There were not only textbooks but also a library. A larger dormitory for girls was built in 1908, and the former dormitory was turned over to the boys. The kitchen, dining room, laundry, and girls' dormitory were in one building.

By 1910 the need for larger facilities was apparent. By this time the Iowa Sanitarium had been moved to Nevada. Certain advantages in having the school and the sanitarium on the same campus in central Iowa were pointed out: the sanitarium was near the center of the state, it would supply a ready market for both dairy and garden produce, and it would give the students employment experience that would be of great value to them in their future work as teachers, ministers, and missionaries.

In October 1911 the academy was moved into one new building at Nevada, near the Iowa Sanitarium, and the name was changed to Oak Park Academy. After a disastrous fire in 1943 destroyed the sanitarium, the academy operated as the only institution on the campus. Additional buildings and improvements included a camp meeting auditorium and gymnasium on the site of the sanitarium (1948); a printshop (1950), for which improved equipment was provided to continue the teaching of printing, which had been taught since the school moved to Nevada; a building housing the broom shop and milk-processing plant; an addition to the main building for the Music Department; a boys' dormitory (1955), which left the entire upper floors of the main building for the girls; a church building (1961); four staff houses (1963); a laundry building (1964); a duplex house (1967); girls' dormitory (1971); broom shop (1971); two staff houses (1971—1972); and landscaping and paved streets (1972).

The class of 1980 was the last to graduate from Oak Park Academy. Because of declining enrollment and economic hardship, the Iowa constituency called a meeting in June 1980 to determine the future of the school. With only 93 students anticipated in the fall, it was voted to close its doors. The Missouri Conference invited the Iowa students to be a part of Sunnydale Academy, and this communication between the schools triggered talk about merging the two conferences.

A number of Oak Park students tried Sunnydale. As a result, enrollment at the Missouri school was increased in the fall of 1980.

Much of the Oak Park property is still owned by the Iowa-Missouri Conference. The girls' dorm, now called Oak Park Center, is used frequently by pastors and laypersons for meetings. The dorm rooms provided housing for volunteer laborers from all over the United States who came to help with repair work during the Midwest flood of 1993.

A loyal alumni association continues to hold meetings annually that draw approximately 600 attendees. This enthusiastic group has gone beyond just socializing and are focusing on raising funds to provide scholarships to help Iowa young people attend other Seventh-day Adventist academies.

Oakwood Academy

OAKWOOD ACADEMY. A coeducational school for grades K-12 located near Huntsville, Alabama. It began operation as a school separate from Oakwood College in the fall of 1945. The first academy faculty members were R. L. Reynolds, Louise Davis, Edna Lett, Margaret Johnson, and Gladys Fletcher. A $196,000 academy building was occupied Apr. 1, 1974. Grades 7—12 have classes in the J. T. Stafford Building.

In 1974 grades 9—12 were moved from the college's facilities to their present location in the J. T. Stafford Building.

Although the academy was moved from the college's facilities to its own building, Oakwood College still assumed total financial and operational responsibility for the academy program. In 1981, because of the financial strain, the college relinquished this responsibility to Huntsville Area Seventh-day Adventist Schools (HASDA), a group comprised of the Oakwood College, Mount Calvary, First, and New Life churches.

In 1984 Oakwood Academy became a member school of the Department of Education of the South Central Conference of Seventh-day Adventists. The HASDA school board is presently in the process of building a new educational complex that will accommodate the total academic program.

Publications are the student newspaper, The Ocadian, and the student yearbook, the Quercus.

Oakwood College

OAKWOOD COLLEGE. An accredited coeducational liberal arts college in Huntsville, Alabama, operated by the General Conference of Seventh-day Adventists.

Oakwood College's beginnings may be traced to 1895, when the General Conference Association sent an educational committee of three to the South to select and purchase property (not exceeding $8,000) for a school for Black youth. These were G. A. Irwin, who as director of the Southern District of the General Conference had developed a special interest in the Black work; O. A. Olsen, the president of the General Conference; and Harmon Lindsay, who had assisted in the founding of Battle Creek College.

In Huntsville (population approximately 15,000) they learned of a 360-acre (145-hectare) farm about five miles (eight kilometers) northwest of the town, which they inspected. After the committee made its report, Olsen and Irwin returned to Huntsville to negotiate for the land. With them was M. E. Olsen, son of O. A. Olsen.

As the committee began looking over the land, Irwin said that he felt deeply impressed that this was the very place they were looking for, and the others concurred. As Irwin and Olsen walked under the 65 towering oaks that stood on what was to become the heart of the campus, they decided that the place should be called Oakwood.

In striking contrast to the symmetrical appearance of the giant oaks were the mass of brush and briars and low-hanging limbs a few yards to the south; the dilapidated manor house and, west of it, the well, choked with debris; the old leaning barn and the row of nine cabins, all falling apart—four ordinary log cabins and five built of squared cedar logs planted upright in the ground and clapboarded.

Among those who began clearing the land after it was purchased by the General Conference was George Washington Warsaw, who was born on the land when it was known as Irwin's farm, and who operated a small nursery almost to the time of his death in 1957. In a personal interview he described the old cotton gin and the nine cabins.

Before the arrival of the first principal, Solon M. Jacobs, of Iowa, in April 1896, J. J. Mitchell, of California, and Grant Adkins, of Atlanta, were in charge of the property, and two students, George Graham, of Birmingham, and Grant Royston, of Vicksburg, were on the grounds. The men who composed the school board, in addition to Jacobs, the principal and business manager, were O. A. Olsen and G. A. Irwin, both of whom came and in their overalls worked with the principal and others as they began to prepare the site. Jacobs added to the Old Mansion a room to be used as the kitchen and dining hall. In November a new two-story building was ready, the first floor to be used for classrooms and the second floor as a men's dormitory.

Oakwood Industrial School. With four buildings and a property valued at $10,157.57, four teachers, and 16 students (eight women and eight men), Oakwood Industrial School opened its doors on Nov. 16, 1896. The faculty consisted of H. S. Shaw, A. F. Hughes, Hattie André, former missionary teacher on Pitcairn Island, and the principal, Solon M. Jacobs.

Consonant with the Seventh-day Adventist philosophy of education, the school aimed to develop the total person, so that each individual might understand the true values of life and one's proper relationship and duty toward God and others, and to teach the students how to think and act for themselves, to master circumstances, to develop breadth of mind and clearness of thought, to live by the courage of their convictions, and to appreciate the dignity of labor and the sense of achievement in any assignment faithfully performed.

At the end of the first school year, H. S. Shaw was elected principal, and Jacobs and his wife continued until 1903 as manager and matron, respectively. Their son and daughter, Lewin and Clara, were instructors. Hattie André, who taught and supervised the women's home for three years, was called to Australia. After 1899 some changes were made in the curriculum, and two-year diplomas were given for the completion of "the common branches." Emphasis was given to organized agriculture, carpentry, bricklaying, canning, broom making, blacksmithing, and other industries. Before 1912 the following buildings had been erected, chiefly by student labor: Oaklawn (principal's home), a study hall, Butler Hall (young men's home), a printshop, a dining hall, an orphanage, a sanitarium building, and a duplex apartment as living quarters for teachers.

Oakwood Junior College. Oakwood operated for two decades on the secondary level under the names Oakwood Industrial School, Huntsville Training School, and Oakwood Manual Training School. Then in April 1917 the North American Division council met on Oakwood's campus and elevated Oakwood Manual Training School (so named since 1904) to the status of a junior college. In 1918 the first two students completed the junior college course. Also in 1918 C. J. Boyd concluded a 10-year campus improvement plan. The trustees purchased 600 acres (245 hectares) north of the Oakwood Road, still known as the Ford place, which enlarged the property to slightly less than 1,000 acres (400 hectares)-adequate for the operation of a large farm, garden, and various vocational activities. During the years of Oakwood's existence as a junior college, many graduates, having completed the two-year theological, collegiate, teacher training, music, secretarial, or prenursing courses, entered various phases of SDA work. The Alumni Association of Oakwood College was organized in 1926.

Oakwood College. Before the end of the 1930s, administrators had explored the possibilities of raising Oakwood Junior College to the senior level. By 1943 the academic foundation and faculty qualifications were deemed adequate for the board to vote senior college status. In 1945 the first baccalaureate degrees were conferred by J. L. Moran, first Black president of the college.

When the enrollment of many World War II veterans necessitated an accelerated building program, officials discovered by examining the school's forest resources that hundreds of thousands of board feet of lumber were in their possession, sufficient for the construction of 10 barracks-type buildings with scarcely observable decrease in timber acreage. Timber utilization and reforestation made it possible to offer a small forestry education curriculum in 1947.

In 1993 the college property consisted of 1,185 acres (480 hectares). Its family living quarters included 13 teacher's cottages and 30 married students' apartments. The major academic buildings are: the Blake Memorial Center, completed in 1968, named for Principal W. J. Blake, containing the administrative offices, college cafeteria, and student center; Moran Hall, started in 1939, with east and west extensions built in 1943—1944, respectively, named for J. L. Moran, Oakwood's first Black president; Green Hall (1952), named for W. H. Green, first Black SDA departmental leader; Ford Hall (1954), named for Harry E. Ford, pioneer Hinsdale

X-ray technician and business manager of the Riverside Sanitarium; Ashby Auditorium (1956), named for N. E. Ashby, language teacher and registrar; the Anna Knight Elementary School (1960), named for Anna Knight, pioneer Black missionary, educator, and nurse; Peters Hall (1964), named for G. E. Peters, evangelist and second Black departmental leader; Eva B. Dykes Library (1973), named for professor emeritus Dr. Eva B. Dykes, the first Black woman to complete the required studies for a Ph.D. degree; the Natatorium (1974); and the J. T. Stafford Academy Building (1974), named for J. T. Stafford, former principal. The four residence halls are Peterson Hall (1955), named for F. L. Peterson, former president; Carter Hall (1966), named for Bessie Carter, staff member and benefactor; Edwards Hall (1969), named for O. B. Edwards, Oakwood educator and administrator; and Wade Hall (1990), named for Trula Wade, a pioneer in residence hall leadership at Oakwood.

Before the expiration of the 1940s, the administration of the college devised a plan, still in operation, for the academic advancement of faculty members, under which many studied in the leading universities of America. In 1951 the board also appointed an accreditation committee, which met regularly and worked diligently toward qualifying the school for recognition and approval by the Southern Association of Colleges and Schools. Two of the presidents, F. L. Peterson and G. J. Millet, with their administrative officers and staff members, worked unrelentingly until this goal was attained in 1958. Then full membership as a liberal arts college was achieved in 1961. In 1963 the Southern Association of Colleges and Schools granted Oakwood College unlimited accreditation, and in 1964 Oakwood College became a member of the United Negro College Fund. On Oct. 2, 1974, Corliss Claibon was recognized as the 1,000th student. The students pursue majors in biology, business administration, business education, chemistry, elementary education, English, food and nutrition, history, home economics, mathematics, medical technology, music, nursing (Associate in Science degree), psychology, religion, social work, and sociology. After thorough preparation many pursue advanced study elsewhere, and they participate in secular, professional, and religious activities in various parts of the United States. Since 1916 numerous missionaries from Oakwood have gone to foreign lands.

It is significant that Ellen White said in a speech to the students and teachers at Oakwood on June 21, 1904, that "it was God's purpose that the school should be placed here [near Huntsville]." "You have precious opportunities here [in this school]."

The college publications are The Spreading Oak, the student newspaper; The Acorn, the annual student yearbook; the Oakwood Magazine; Campus Dateline, a weekly newsletter; and OC Today, a bimonthly newsletter for alumni.

There he was ordained and helped to develop the SDA work in Russia. In 1896 he returned to Germany and served as evangelist in the East German Conference, and between 1905 and 1918 as president of the Prussian, German-Swiss, Rhenish-Prussian, and Hessian conferences. Oertlimatt Old People's and Nursing Home

OERTLIMATT OLD PEOPLE'S AND NURSING HOME (Stiftung Altersheim Oertlimatt). An institution founded in 1967 near Krattigen, Switzerland. Located at the entrance to the beautiful Bernese Oberland, surrounded by green meadows and overlooking Thuner and Brienersee, it is a dream come true for the 60 residents living there. The 2,300-foot (700-meter) elevation and mild climate are ideal for the elderly, camping, and vacations.

The funds that made this project a reality were raised by the German Swiss Conference in Zurich. The cost for a resident to live in the home is so arranged that every church member can meet it, with government subsidy granted as needed. A new building was added in 1982, and in 1993 another new extension was opened.

Together with neighboring families, the pensioners organized their own church, which has been meeting in a lovely new chapel since 1972. For many years Oertlimatt has been famous for conventions and other gatherings.

This service was inaugurated in 1936 with the appointment of Judge Millward C. Taft, a lawyer who served as state's attorney in Vermont and chief judge of the probate court of Montgomery County, Maryland, as general counsel to the General Conference. Taft began "special work" in 1927 at the General Conference and later served as an associate director of the Religious Liberty Department (1928—1936).

History

History. Beginnings of the Work in Ohio. Both prior to 1844 and following the Disappointment, Ohio received considerable attention from the Millerite preachers. H. S. Case, a pioneer Seventh-day Adventist worker, preached in Ohio in the early 1850s. According to reports in the Review and Herald, J. N. Andrews introduced SDA teachings in Cleveland, Cincinnati, Norwalk, and Milan, Ohio, as early as 1851, and Joseph Bates in Olena, Seville, Akron, Parma, Clarksville Hollow, and Rochester in 1853. For example, Bates writes James White of visiting in September 1853 “the church at Milan,” and in October tells how Ira Day took him by carriage to a number of places in Sandusky County to meet former Millerites who had lost their interest after the Disappointment. He spoke in a public hall in Green Springs, to which the whole town turned out, and preached in Marysville and Cincinnati. In December of the same year J. N. Loughborough, also writing to James White from Milan, mentions holding five meetings in Green Springs. At the final lecture on Sunday night the schoolhouse was filled, and many listened outside with their ears against the windows.

In February 1858 G. W. Holt gave a course of lectures on the SDA views in a schoolhouse at Lovett's Grove, about two miles north of Bowling Green in Wood County. The meetings lasted only two weeks, but no less than 30 people began to keep the Sabbath. The next month James White reported holding conferences at Green Springs with the believers at Gilboa, and with the new Sabbathkeepers at Lovett's Grove. It was on this trip, while attending a funeral service in a schoolhouse at Lovett's Grove, that Mrs. White was given a two-hour vision covering much of the material printed in the book The Great Controversy. In November M. E. Cornell reported that the Gilboa congregation was building a church and that the Lovett's Grove members were preparing a home for the minister.

In 1860 James White and his wife held a series of meetings in a tent, and the 30 Sabbathkeepers at Lovett's Grove were organized into a company. On Feb. 8, 1862, Oliver Mears, a farmer-preacher, and H. S. Case organized this group into a church. This was the first Seventh-day Adventist church to be organized in Ohio.

Organization. After the adoption of the denominational name (1860) and the formation of the Michigan Conference (1861), steps were taken toward organization in other states. In 1862 there were churches organized at Cass, Portage, Lovett's Grove, Green Springs, Attica, Jackson, Gilboa, and Ayersville. Even before the local churches had been formally organized, there was an embryonic form of state organization in Ohio as early as 1859, that is, a conference (in the sense of a meeting) at which, in addition to preaching, there were business sessions, with a chairman, a secretary, and delegates from the churches. The 1859 conference, as reported in the Review and Herald, transacted business to finance "the [evangelistic] tent enterprise in Ohio," and recommended the plan of systematic benevolence in the churches. On May 31, 1863, shortly after the organization of the General Conference as a permanent body, the Ohio Conference was organized by the adoption of the constitution recommended by the recently organized General Conference. Oliver Mears was elected president.

As late as 1866 Joseph Clarke wrote that Ohio was without ministers and was dependent upon those coming from the neighboring states. Those coming from Michigan were often long absent from their homes. Two of these were I. D. Van Horn and R. J. Lawrence, who came with their tent to Belleville and Fredericktown in the summer of 1866. In his report Clarke mentions about 14 worshipping on the Sabbath in Fredericktown and 30 or 40 in Belleville. Literature evangelists, who traveled on horseback, also had a part in strengthening the small but growing membership of the state. Until funds became available for representative places to worship, Sabbath services were held in tents, private homes, and rented halls.

The conference business session in 1866, meeting at Lovett's Grove, voted that 90 percent of the funds received under the plan of systematic benevolence should go to the conference. The treasurer's report showed that the conference had $332.21 on hand at the last report. From the $599.07 received during the conference year, $288.50 had been paid out by order of the conference committee, which left a balance of cash on hand of $642.78.

From Bowersville a new convert, William Cottrell, wrote early in 1866 of visiting from home to home sharing his faith, and stated that he and his wife knew of no other Sabbathkeepers in the area. However, two years later Van Horn, on Sunday, Feb. 23, 1868, organized a church of 16 in Bowersville, with William Cottrell as elder. He reported that the health principles were being accepted rapidly, but that dress reform, adopted by the women, was bringing jeers and scoffs.

The first camp meeting in Ohio was held at Clyde in 1869. Subsequent ones were held in Mansfield, Newark, Galion, Columbus, Springfield, Cleveland, Marion, Findlay, Akron, Dayton, Canton, and Mount Vernon.

The Cleveland church was organized in 1877, with 18 charter members, and churches in Newark and Blooming Grove were organized in 1878. In 1882 A. J. St. John and R. A. Underwood, who held meetings in Akron, reported 21 adherents in the city, seven of whom had been baptized recently.

In Mount Vernon, which later became a conference center, a church was organized in 1885, with a membership of 15. It met first in rented quarters, then moved in 1889 to the gymnasium constructed by the Mount Vernon Sanitarium (operated 1888—1892). It met there until 1926, when it moved to the chapel of Mount Vernon Academy (founded 1893) and later to the new academy gymnasium (completed in 1953). Finally a Colonial-style church building was erected, which was occupied in 1957.

In the 1890s the membership of the Ohio Conference passed 1,200. Churches that were organized in that decade include: Millersburg, Washington Court House, Dayton, and Hicksville. The Wilmington, Youngstown, Akron, Portsmouth, and Columbus churches were founded between 1900 and 1905.

In 1901 the Ohio Conference became part of the Lake Union Conference at its formation, and of the Columbia Union Conference in 1907.

A semimonthly conference paper, the Ohio Welcome Visitor, began to be published in 1896 at the subscription price of 25 cents a year. In 1901 it was changed to a weekly, and in 1907 this publication became the Columbia Union paper, renamed the Columbia Union Visitor.

The Ohio Conference is credited with forming the first conference-wide young people's organization in 1899, known as the Christian Volunteer Society. Two years later the General Conference asked the Sabbath School Department to look after the work of newly formed young people's societies. Six years later the organization had become so large that at the 1907 General Conference council, held in Switzerland, it was recommended that a separate department for the young people's work be established. It was at Mount Vernon, Ohio, that the Seventh-day Adventist Young People's Society of Missionary Volunteers was launched.

In December 1920 there were 2,860 Seventh-day Adventists in 65 churches throughout Ohio, among them Mansfield, Ravenna, Bucyrus, Canton, and Worthington. In 1944 there were 89 churches. The next year 10 Black congregations became part of the newly formed Allegheny Conference, but by the end of 1954 there were again 89. The Cleveland German church, founded in 1910 with 12 charter members, had more than 200 members. By 1972 few of the members used the German language, so it became an English-speaking, church and the name was changed to the Brooklyn church.

In 1974 there were three foreign-language churches in the Ohio Conference. The Youngstown Spanish church began as a Spanish Sabbath school class, and in 1960 a branch Sabbath school was begun in separate quarters. A church of 17 members was organized in 1962 and by 1974 had increased to 115. The Cleveland Hungarian church, organized with 17 charter members in 1958, grew to 39 by 1974. The Cleveland Yugoslavian church has an older history. It was organized in 1941, and by 1974 numbered 107 members.

Later Developments. A new camp meeting pavilion, 100' x 200' (30 m. x 60 m.) in size, valued at $150,000 at the time of erection, was built at Mount Vernon and was ready for use in 1956. A new conference office building was completed and occupied in 1959. The Ohio youth facility, Camp Mohaven—a 429-acre (175-hectare) plot on the Mohican River, just north and west of Brinkhaven, Ohio—was initiated in 1961. A lodge, staff house, bathhouse, and swimming pool were ready for the 1962 camping season. Since then other buildings, including cabins, have been erected. In 1980 the Ray and Lucy Hausted Nature Center became an important addition to the camp.

On July 7, 1961, ground was broken in Kettering, Ohio, for the Charles F. Kettering Memorial Hospital. The name was later changed to the Kettering Medical Center. This is a philanthropic project turned over to the Adventist Church for planning, staffing, and management. In 1967 Kettering College of Medical Arts was established on the campus, offering professional and preprofessional degrees in the health sciences. In 1976 ground was broken for a satellite facility in Miamisburg, Ohio. The Sycamore Hospital opened its doors in 1978. Total beds for Kettering and Sycamore hospitals was 673 in 1994.

The most recent division of KMC was added in 1986 when Sycamore Glen Retirement Community became operational. Located adjacent to Sycamore Hospital, Sycamore Glen offers both independent and assisted living arrangements for senior citizens. SDA membership in Dayton has grown from 436 in 1963 to 1,841 in 1992.

Loma Linda Foods, founded in the 1930s as the International Nutrition Laboratories by Dr. Harry Miller, operated in Mt. Vernon first as the primary location of the plant, and then beginning in 1951 as the eastern division production center for the denominationally owned Loma Linda Food Company. In 1989 the decision was made to sell the company.

Harding Hospital in Worthington, Ohio, is recognized nationally as a leader in psychiatric, chemical dependency, and eating disorder treatment. Founded in 1916 by George T. Harding II, M.D., a brother of President Warren G. Harding, the institution's treatment is directed toward the whole person, combining scientific medicine, psychiatry, and concern for spiritual issues. Originally known as Columbus Rural Rest Home and later as the Harding Sanitarium, it is an accredited 120-bed facility. Prevention and healthful living have always been emphasized. Special programs for clergy, physicians, and other health professionals and their families are featured.

Worthington Foods was founded in 1939 by George T. Harding III, M.D., and his associates to provide vegetarian foods for health-conscious people of all denominations. The company expanded its line of products in 1951 by acquiring Miller Foods and in 1960 by acquiring Battle Creek Food Company. Madison Foods and the LaLoma product line also became a part of Worthington. In 1970 Worthington Foods was acquired by Miles Laboratory. In 1982 a group of businesspersons led by James L. Hagle, Allan R. Buller, and George T. Harding IV, M.D., bought the company and have operated it as a public company since 1992.

In 1967 a Lay Advisory Council was established to advise the conference administration and to generate creative new ideas and plans to help advance the work of the church. Membership was on the basis of one member elected by each church, but later was made proportional to church membership. It reports its recommendations directly to the conference committee.

Spring Valley Academy is a coeducational K-12 school established in 1969. Located on nearly 50 acres (20 hectares) at 1461 East Spring Valley Road in Centerville, it was formerly known as Dayton Junior Academy. It is operated by the constituent churches in the metropolitan area of greater Dayton and accredited by the Board of Regents of the General Conference and the North Central Association of Schools and Colleges, and is chartered by the Ohio Department of Education. The high school division in 1993 accommodated 150 students in a college preparatory program. It is affiliated with joint vocational schools for those students desiring a vocational program. The staff consists of 41 members, of whom 26 are teaching, 10 are nonteaching, and five are in administration.

Ohme, Bruno

OHME, BRUNO (1881—1945). Missionary in East Africa and Indonesia; educator and conference administrator in Germany. He was born in Leipzig, Germany, into a Lutheran family. After baptism (1900) into the Seventh-day Adventist Church he attended Friedensau Missionary Seminary between 1901 and 1903. At the same time, he worked as a colporteur and as a nurse at the Friedensau Sanitarium. Later in preparation for a mission appointment, he worked as Bible instructor and attended a school for Oriental languages in Berlin.

In 1905 he married Helene Schlenvoigt, and the same year they went to German East Africa (now Tanzania), where he was director of the German East Africa Mission. He was ordained to the ministry in 1908. During World War I he was interned and transported to India. In 1919 he returned to Germany. The 1921 Yearbook lists his name among ministers of the East Saxon Conference. The 1922 Yearbook does not give his position, but lists his address as that of the Malaysian Union. The 1923 Yearbook does not list him. The 1924 and 1925 Yearbooks list him as president of the Northeast Saxon Conference.

From 1925 to 1928 he was president of Friedensau Missionary Seminary. In 1928 he went to superintend the work in the newly organized Netherlands East Indies Union Mission. In 1934 he returned to Germany, and for a time was president of the Silesian and Baden conferences, where he worked until he and his family were killed in an air raid on Dresden in the winter of 1944—1945.

Okanagan Academy

OKANAGAN ACADEMY. A coeducational day school on the secondary level, with a large elementary school, situated on a 15-acre (six-hectare) site on Hollywood Road one mile (1.6 kilometers) south of Highway 33 in Kelowna, British Columbia. It is operated by a board chosen from six central Okanagan Valley churches with a constituency of about 1,200 church members. The academy is accredited both denominationally and provincially. It publishes a yearbook called The Corona. Secondary enrollment in 1993 was 54; total staff, 13.

The elementary school from which the academy developed was housed first in 1917 in the home of its teacher, Robert Clayton. A year later it was transferred to an old hotel four miles (6.5 kilometers) from Kelowna. James Lawson, who owned the building, boarded students coming from a distance, enabling them to attend the school. About 1920 the church purchased some property at Rutland and with secondhand material constructed a dual-purpose building—the rooms on the lower floor serving as school and the upstairs as a church. This was the beginning of the present home of the academy. From 1920 to 1925 the school expanded to include grades 9 and 10. In the fall of 1926 the Kelowna Intermediate School, as it was called then, reverted to an elementary school and continued as such until 1938, when it became a 10-grade school known as Rutland Junior Academy. Six years later it added two more grades, becoming Rutland Academy. By 1947 it had adopted its present name.

A separate church building was erected in 1940, and the original building was devoted entirely to educational purposes. Three years later it became apparent that more space was required, and soon afterward an addition was made to the original structure. In 1952 a Quonset-type auditorium was erected.

In 1968 an eight-classroom building plus library was built at a cost of $250,000. Two classrooms were added in 1971 to accommodate the industrial arts classes and later an auditorium-gymnasium complex.

History

History. The work in the area of the Oklahoma Conference was begun by Richard H. Brock in the spring of 1892. During that summer the General Conference sent a tent and assigned G. W. Page, from the Arkansas Conference, to assist Brock. They conducted meetings in Oklahoma City, baptized 12, and organized a company of 15 members. Then they moved to Norman for another series of meetings, baptized three, and organized a Sabbath school of 25 members.

In the fall the tent was shipped to Edmond, where the first camp meeting was held from Oct. 4 to 11, with about 100 in attendance. There were three visiting ministers—J. H. Durland, Henry Shultz, and S. S. Shrock. During this meeting the Oklahoma and Indian Territory Mission was organized, with Brock as leader and Mary L. Brock as secretary-treasurer. A Sabbath school association was also organized, with R. H. Brock as president and Inez Stoops as secretary.

The expression “Indian Territory” has its background in the early history of Oklahoma. In 1834 Indians were brought from the Southeastern states and assigned reservations in the Midwest, where Whites were not allowed to settle, and their area was organized as the Indian Territory, in which the tribal authority of five tribes was established. One sector in this Indian Territory that had not been assigned to the Indians at any time was called Oklahoma, meaning “Red man” in the Choctaw language. This unassigned land was opened to White settlers on Apr. 22, 1889. On that day nearly 50,000 people entered the territory in a race to stake out the land. Two years later more areas were opened by piecemeal and mostly by the same procedure, namely, a race. Then the last areas were distributed by lottery in the summer of 1901.

At the close of 1892 there were 132 members, who had paid a tithe of $240.24 and given $40 to foreign missions; there was one ordained minister, 10 canvassers, and 10 other workers.

The second annual session of the Oklahoma and Indian Territory Mission was held during a camp meeting at Oklahoma City from Sept. 28 to Oct. 8, 1893. Now there were nine organized churches—four German and five English—with a total membership of 246, and three companies ready to be organized. The treasurer reported a total of $796.87 in tithe, $57.92 as annual offerings, and $10.10 for first-day offering.

Early directors of the sale of publications were W. M. Crothers, of Battle Creek, Michigan; J. M. Dickerson, of Texas; and R. W. Parmele. During the summer of 1897 J. B. Blosser, the first man to give his entire time to the colporteur work after the conference was organized, took charge. Hattie White Sorenson canvassed all the towns along the two railroads in Oklahoma during 1893. She also worked nearly all of what is now Kingfisher County, driving a two-wheeled cart. Eugene Couch canvassed sparsely settled territory (now Woods County) on foot in the summer of 1897.

Reporting for 1893 in the 1894 Yearbook, A. J. Breed, superintendent of General Conference District no. 5, said: "Oklahoma is a mission field carried on by the General Conference. At present there are laboring in the field two ordained ministers, one licentiate, and six canvassers. Thirteen churches have been organized with a membership of upward of 300. There are 12 Sabbath schools, as reported in the April number of the Sabbath School Worker of 1894, with a membership of 421. There has been paid in tithes to sustain the work, $1,451.59, besides first-day and annual offerings amounting to $89.34. They have purchased a new 54-foot (16-meter) tent with a 20-foot (six-meter) splice, at a cost of $187, for use at camp meetings, and for carrying on the work in new fields. One camp meeting was held, with 234 encamped."

Oklahoma Conference Organized. Oklahoma was organized as a conference at the camp meeting held in August 1894. It comprised the territory of Oklahoma and the reservations of the Cherokee, Creek, Choctaw, Seminole, and Chickasaw Indian tribes. There were then 17 churches and a membership of 500, with three ordained ministers. The first conference president was J. M. Rees. At the General Conference session in February 1895 the four-month report for the new conference mentioned $3,090.26 worth of books sold; tithe totaling $3,244.87; offerings to foreign missions, $316.19; 20 Sabbath schools with a membership of 526; and four meetinghouses built.

The general offices for the Oklahoma Mission and the Oklahoma Conference have been in Oklahoma City continuously. They were first at 318 Fourth Street and were moved several times before a building was erected in 1899 at 217 NW. Seventh Street, which served as conference headquarters, church, and church school for many years. In its basement the first church school in Oklahoma was opened (1899—1900) even before the rest of the structure was completed. The conference office continued there until the property at 525 NW. Thirteenth Street was purchased in 1942. The office was moved again in 1970 to its present location.

Many of the early SDAs in Oklahoma were German speaking, who came to the territory from Kansas and the Dakotas at the time when the lands of Oklahoma were thrown open to White settlement. Among the German churches organized were Hooker, Okeene, and Shattuck, which still exist; and East Cooper, West Cooper, Omega, Tangier, and Prague, which no longer exist. For many years services in these churches were conducted in German, and at each annual camp meeting there was a German tent specifically erected for meetings in that language.

The Oklahoma Conference has also conducted work among the Indians. For 25 years Frank Webb, a Chippewa from Minnesota, carried on colporteur-evangelistic work. A. W. Spalding tells of other missionaries sent in since 1936—F. M. Robinson and his wife, “followed by Oscar Padget and C. D. Smith. The latest missionaries are Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Wennerberg, who came there in 1945. . . . The Indians of Oklahoma are no longer on reservations but are mingled with the White population. Consequently, the Indian church members . . . are in churches containing both White and Indian” (Origin and History of Seventh-day Adventists, vol. 3, p. 323).

In the fall of 1940 a friend of Seventh-day Adventists sold a 40-acre (16-hectare) campsite of unimproved land at the southeast edge of Oklahoma City to the Oklahoma Conference at a sacrificial price. This property on Sooner Road, named Bierig Park, was developed for the yearly camp meeting program. For 40 years it served the Oklahoma constituency well.

In 1979 this site was sold, and 461 acres (190 hectares) of wooded land, with a 45-acre (18-hectare) lake, were purchased. The name Wewoka Woods Adventist Center was given to the new location. This incorporated the use of a geographical name as well as a name unique to Oklahoma. “Wewoka” is a soft Indian name that not only identifies the area but brings to mind the significant role of Indian culture in the state.

Development has included an auditorium seating 2,500; a lodge that provides dining facilities, meeting rooms, and living accommodations; four cabins with sleeping rooms and kitchens; a junior-Olympic-sized swimming pool; an Adventist Book Center; more than 200 campsites for recreational vehicles; and 132 cement floors for family tents. All buildings are air-conditioned and winterized.

Wewoka Woods provides a rural setting for camp meeting, the summer camp program, Pathfinder activities, and all programs for youth, the ministerial family, and for lay training. Local church use includes retreats, officer instruction, and outdoor church school.

From 1958 to 1991 the conference operated the Ardmore Seventh-day Adventist Hospital. From 1965 to 1985 the Jay Memorial Hospital, in the town of Jay, was operated by the conference.

The conference school system is affiliated with Ozark Academy at Gentry, Arkansas, and Southwestern Adventist College at Keene, Texas.

Office Building. In 1969 a 2.5-acre (one-hectare) tract of land was purchased at 4735 NW. 63rd Street. Early in 1970 a large new modern office building was constructed at an approximate cost of $240,000 to house the conference headquarters and the Adventist Book Center. This facility provides adequately for the needs of the conference administration, and there is ample space for future expansion when needed.

Summit Ridge Retirement Center. In March 1974 Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Wolfe, of Jones, Oklahoma, donated a 94-acre (40-hectare) tract of land near Oklahoma City for a retirement center. An additional 80 acres (30 hectares) has since been purchased for further expansion.

Summit Ridge is a community made up of 29 single-family residences, four duplexes, two fourplexes, and two mobile homes. The activity center includes offices, dining hall, eight efficiency apartments, and two wings (for residential and intermediate care), providing for a total of 67 beds.

A fellowship hall and a church seating 450 are attached to the activity center, making spiritual and social activities convenient to residents and within walking distance of those living in the community.

Okohira, Teruhiko H.

OKOHIRA, TERUHIKO H. (1865—1939). Evangelist, administrator. Born into an influential family in Satsuma Province, Japan, he was early driven by an ambition to become a great businessman in his newly awakened country. In 1883 he entered a business college in the United States, was converted by a Methodist minister, and consequently lost the support of his father. While working in a hotel in California in 1892 he accepted the Seventh-day Adventist faith and enrolled at Healdsburg College. While a student there he led in establishing the Golden Gate Japanese-English School in San Francisco. In 1894, at the close of the school year, he made a strong appeal in a Friday evening vesper service for a volunteer to accompany him in taking the SDA message to Japan. The president of the college, W. C. Grainger, responded, and in 1896 they left for Japan under General Conference appointment. In 1907 Okohira and another minister, H. Kuniya, were ordained as the first Japanese ministers of the Seventh-day Adventist Church. Okohira was a delegate to the General Conference sessions of 1913 and 1936.

During his 43 years of service in Japan, Okohira was at various times church pastor, editor of the Japanese Signs of the Times, mission director, and teacher in the workers' training school. In 1939, the year of his death, he went as a delegate to the publishing meeting in Singapore, held in conjunction with the Far Eastern Division committee meeting.

Oliveira, Enoch

OLIVEIRA, ENOCH (1924—1992). Administrator, author. He was reared in a Seventh-day Adventist home in Brazil, where his father was the first national to be a literature evangelist. In 1945 Enoch graduated from Brazil College, then attended Andrews University, where he earned a Master of Arts degree in 1959, a Master of Divinity degree in 1967, and a Doctor of Divinity degree in 1975. He began his ministry in the Paraná Conference in the South Brazil Union, and was ordained in Curitiba, Paraná, in 1952. He served as Ministerial Association secretary of the South American Division from 1959 to 1970, secretary of the division from 1970 to 1975, and was the first national elected as president of the division, in which position he served until 1980. At the General Conference session in Dallas, Texas, he was elected to be a general vice president of the General Conference. He served in this capacity for 10 years, the second Brazilian to hold that position. In 1990 he retired to South America with his wife, Lygia.

Oliveira was noted for his theological knowledge, preaching ability, care for pastors, and literary works. His first book, Religious Liberty in Latin America, was published in 1968. God Is at the Helm was written in Portuguese in 1985 and then translated into Spanish in 1986. Another book, Year 2000: Anguish or Hope? was published in Portuguese and Spanish in 1988. His last book, Good Morning, Lord, was published in 1990, the first Portuguese devotional by a national author.

Olsen, Alfred Berthier

OLSEN, ALFRED BERTHIER (1869—1960). Physician; pioneer of Seventh-day Adventist health education in Britain. He was the son of O. A. Olsen, onetime president of the General Conference. He took his medical training at the University of Michigan under the sponsorship of the General Conference Committee and the Medical and Surgical Sanitarium Board in the first group of Christian physicians to be thus sponsored (1891—1895). Upon graduation he joined the faculty of the newly opened American Medical Missionary College, where he served as secretary of the board and professor of physiology and pathology until about 1901, and as special lecturer from 1903 to 1905. In 1901 he secured recognition of his qualifications in Britain and took over the health education work begun there by Drs. D. H. and Laurretta Kress three years previously. In the same year he and his brother, M. E. Olsen, founded the British Good Health magazine. Between 1901 and 1919 he was superintendent of the Caterham Sanitarium. On return to the United States after World War I, he specialized in psychiatry and served on the staffs of the Harding, Battle Creek, Wabash Valley, and Hinsdale sanitariums.

Olsen, Mahlon Ellsworth

OLSEN, MAHLON ELLSWORTH (1873—1952). Educator, administrator. Son of O. A. Olsen, who was president of the General Conference from 1888 to 1897, Mahlon Olsen received his B.A. at Battle Creek College (1894) and his Ph.D. in English at the University of Michigan (1909). In 1894 he was appointed secretary to his father, and in 1901 went to England as managing editor of the Good Health magazine. After eight years he returned to America and completed his work for the Ph.D. degree. He then taught English at Washington Missionary College (1909—1917), served as principal and president of South Lancaster Academy and Lancaster Junior College (1917—1920), and was head of the English Department at Union College (1920—1923). In 1923 he became president of the Fireside Correspondence School, later known as the Home Study Institute, and held that office until his retirement in 1946. Included in his works are: Origin and Progress of Seventh-day Adventists, The Carpenter of Nazareth, The Prose of Our King James Version, and Much-Loved Books.

Olsen, Ole Andres

OLSEN, OLE ANDRES (1845—1915). Administrator, General Conference president. He was born at Skogen, near Christiania, Norway. When he was 5 years old his parents came to the United States and settled on a farm in Oakland Township, Wisconsin. At the age of 9 he with his parents began to keep the Sabbath. He was baptized in 1858. The winters of 1864 and 1869 he spent in a Baptist school in Milton, Wisconsin. The school year 1876—1877 he attended Battle Creek College. In 1869 the Wisconsin Conference granted him a ministerial license, and for two summers he served as tentmaster and assistant to Isaac Sanborn. About 1870 he began work among the Scandinavians. On June 2, 1873, he was ordained, and in 1874 he was elected president of the Wisconsin Conference. After two years he was released from the presidency to resume his work for the Scandinavians. Later he served as president of the Wisconsin (1880—1881), Dakota (1882—1883), Minnesota (1883—1885), and Iowa (1884—1885) conferences. During the spring of 1886 the General Conference sent him to the Scandinavian countries to supervise the growing work there.

While busy at his post in Europe, Olsen received word that he had been elected president of the General Conference during the memorable session held in Minneapolis in 1888. This post he held for nine years. During his administration, progress was reported in expanding, organizing, and developing the Seventh-day Adventist cause throughout the world field. Olsen first advocated the formation of union conferences. The first union, the Australian, was organized during his visit there and with his cooperation. After laying down his General Conference responsibilities, he worked for a year in South Africa, giving special attention to work for the Africans. After this he spent about two years shepherding the work on the European continent. In 1901 he was asked to head the work in Great Britain. Under his supervision the field was organized into a union conference, a training school was established, and the various lines of work were strengthened. In 1905 he went to Australia, where he served as president of the union for four years. In 1909 he was made secretary of the North American Foreign Department of the General Conference, and in 1913 was elected vice president of the North American Division, posts he filled until stricken with a heart attack on Jan. 29, 1915.

Olson, Albert Victor

OLSON, ALBERT VICTOR (1884—1963). Administrator. He entered the service of the Seventh-day Adventist Church in 1902 as a colporteur-evangelist, then served as a church school teacher. He was ordained at age 24. After a period of pastoral service in Minnesota (1906—1912), he was a pastor-evangelist in Montreal, Canada (1912—1914); in 1914 he was elected president of the Quebec Conference and in 1916 of the Ontario Conference. From 1917 to 1920 he was president of the Eastern Canadian Union; from 1920 to 1929 president of the Latin Union, with headquarters in Gland, Switzerland; and from 1929 to 1946 president of the newly organized Southern European Division. In 1946 he was elected a general vice president of the General Conference and held that office until his retirement in 1958. After retirement he continued to serve as chair of the board of trustees of the Ellen White Estate, and was engaged in other church activities until the day of his death.

One Hundred Forty-Four Thousand

ONE HUNDRED FORTY-FOUR THOUSAND. The special group of “sealed” saints mentioned in Rev. 7:4 and 14:1, described as consisting of 12,000 from each of the 12 tribes of Israel. They are identified as “the first fruits unto God and to the Lamb,” “redeemed from among men.” The sealing of the 144,000 is described after the delineation of the events under the “sixth seal” (Rev. 6:12—17; cf. Rev. 8:1), which include the second coming of Christ and “the great day of his wrath.” John saw “four angels . . . holding the four winds of the earth, that the wind should not blow on the earth, nor on the sea, nor on any tree” until the “servants” of God have been “sealed . . . in their foreheads” (Rev. 7:1—3). In the context of the sixth seal, wind would represent strife, turmoil, and natural calamity, which in the Revelation are associated with the great day of God’s wrath, and particularly with the seven last plagues (Rev. 15:1). Accordingly, the sealing work here presented takes place at the close of the present age, but prior to the great climactic scenes that precede Christ’s second advent.

In Rev. 7:3 the 144,000 are said to be “sealed . . . in their foreheads,” while in Revelation 14:1 they have the “Father’s name written in their foreheads,” which fact attests divine approval, acceptance, and ownership. They are “not defiled with women,” but are “virgins” (v. 4)—they have refused the false teachings of “Babylon the great, the mother of harlots and abominations of the earth” (Rev. 17:5; cf. Rev. 12:17; 14:8, 12). In their mouth is “no guile,” that is, they are what they appear to be, they are “without fault before the throne of God” (Rev. 14:5).

The 144,000 sing “a new song before the throne” (v. 3), which only they can learn. In a similar setting in Rev. 15:1—3 John listens as what appears to be the same group of people “stand on the sea of glass,” which is “before the throne of God” (Rev. 4:6; cf. Rev. 14:3; 15:2), singing “the song of Moses the servant of God, and the song of the Lamb.” (The Song of Moses was a song of divine deliverance from foes bent upon the destruction of God’s people at the Red Sea [Ex. 15:1—19; Deut. 31:30; 32:1—43].) The foes over whom the victory has been gained are designated in Rev. 15:2 as “the beast” and “his image.”

Significantly, the Rev. 14:1—5 passage on the 144,000 immediately follows the beast-image-mark-name-number sequence of Rev. 13, implying that this group refuses to comply with the demand of Rev. 13:15, 16 to worship the beast and its image and to receive its mark or the number of its name. Instead, they receive the seal and name of God.

Furthermore, the three angels’ messages (Rev. 14:6—12), immediately following vs. 1—5, focus on the worship of the true God (vs. 6, 7) in contrast with that of the beast and its image (vs. 9—11), which constitutes an apostate religion (v. 8).

By implication the “saints” who accept the three messages and are characterized in v. 12 as “they that keep the commandments of God” instead of worshiping the beast and its image, and who have “the faith of Jesus,” are the saints of vs. 1—5.

According to J. N. Loughborough (Review and Herald 83:8, 9, June 14, 1906; 83:8, 9, June 21, 1906) Seventh-day Adventist interest in the sealing message and the 144,000 began in 1848 when some non-Sabbatarian Adventists hailed the epidemic of revolutions in Europe as the opening phase of the battle of the great day of God, and the spirit rappings in Hydesville, New York—also in 1848—as the arrival of the spirits foretold in Rev. 16:13, 14, which were to go forth to gather the nations to Armageddon. Seventh-day Adventists denied this and contended that the 144,000 must be sealed first: “There is a message to go forth bearing the seal, and we have discovered that message in the seventh chapter of Revelation, and are going forth to give that message.” The Sabbath was identified with the sealing message of Rev. 7, and as a result, the Sabbath came to be seen as God’s seal. “The position of our people then,” said Loughborough, “was that the sealing work at that time was going on, and that some of the 144,000 were then being sealed.” During the next few years, Ellen White repeatedly spoke of the sealing work currently in progress (EW 36—38, 44, etc.).

Corollary to the belief that those who accepted the third angel’s message and the Sabbath were being sealed was the belief that any who died would not in that way forfeit membership in the 144,000, but would come forth in a special resurrection to join their brethren who remained alive to the coming of the Lord (cf. 1 Thess. 4:13, 16). Loughborough went on to explain that those who accepted “the original faith on the subject of the one hundred and forty-four thousand believed that some were then being sealed, and that they were to be of those resurrected in the time of trouble, and be of the one hundred and forty-four thousand. . . . The faith of the Sabbathkeepers from that time until some of the modern ‘lights’ came in [1906] was that those who died in the faith were among the sealed ones, and would constitute part of the one hundred and forty-four thousand.”

Loughborough then proceeded to reconcile the seeming discrepancy between the idea that the 144,000 are all living saints (see below) and the belief that those who have died in the faith of the third angel’s message will also be numbered among that privileged group. He explained this on the basis that following the third message of Rev. 14:9—11, a special blessing is pronounced upon those (v. 13) who accept that message (as applied to the Sabbath), and he identified this blessing as the privilege of coming forth in a special resurrection at the beginning of the seventh plague. Those who do so, he explained, will live through the crisis of the seventh plague, or “great tribulation,” and will, in fact, be among the living saints at the time of the general resurrection of the righteous.

Two early articles on the subject of the 144,000 were written by James White (Review and Herald 5:123, May 9, 1854) and Uriah Smith (ibid. 8:76, July 3, 1856). Smith argued that the sealing work precedes the seven last plagues because these are included in the “winds” the four angels hold in check. In the issue for July 30, 1861 (18:68), he identified the 144,000 as “those who will be translated [without seeing death] at the coming of Christ.” White (ibid. 25:162, Apr. 25, 1865) located the sealing time by the contextual location of the message between the sixth and the seventh seal. He dismissed the argument that the 144,000 are literal Jews on the basis that if so the names of the 12 tribes appearing on the gates of the city would, by a parity of reasoning, make it strictly a Jewish city with Jewish inhabitants.

Smith (Thoughts on the Revelation [1865; i.e., 1867], pp. 131—134) identifies the 144,000 as “the last generation of Christians, the Christians of our own day,” and the Sabbath as the seal of God. He explains the 144,000 being designated as belonging to “the twelve tribes of the children of Israel” on the basis that in the NT those who believe in Christ constitute “Abraham’s seed” (Gal. 3:28, 29), or spiritual Israel (Rom. 2:28, 29, etc.).

As to who constitute the 144,000, White explained that “those who die under the third angel’s message are a part of the 144,000; there are not 144,000 in addition to these, but these help make up that number. They are raised to mortal life shortly before Christ comes, and . . . are changed to immortality when Christ appears” (James White, in Review and Herald 56:216, Sept. 23, 1880).

As to the number 144,000, Smith later wrote: “The number 144,000 must mean a definite number, composed of just so many individuals. It cannot stand for a larger but indefinite number; for in verse 9 another company is introduced which is indefinite in its proportions, and hence is spoken of as ‘a great multitude, which no man could number’” (ibid. 74:504, Aug. 10, 1897).

Nevertheless, he thought the actual numerical count might be much greater than that: “The 144,000 may include only the adult males connected with the great Advent movement, while the women and children associated in the same movement would be so many additional ones to be saved from among the living in that day. The plausibility of this idea lies in the fact that the Hebrews were so numbered when delivered from Egyptian bondage, which was a figure of the deliverance of the remnant of the true Israel from the Egypt of this world at the coming of the Lord” (ibid. 505).

On this basis he suggested that there might actually be more than 700,000 persons in the group, including women and children. But he does not see where so large a group can be found to qualify. As to whether those who have died in the faith of the third angel are to be raised to life to join the 144,000, he writes: “Do the 144,000 represent only those who have never passed through death? Not at all. The conditions of the prophecy make it necessary that many who are now in their graves should be included in the 144,000” (ibid.).

Smith apparently believed that many of those who die in the Lord must be numbered with them. The seal of God is the Sabbath, and those who accept it must therefore be included in the 144,000. He concludes: “Thus the evidence seems clear and conclusive that the 144,000 are gathered from the last generation before Christ comes; that they are brought out by the third angel’s message; that even those of them who die in the message are blessed, being restored to the number by a resurrection before Christ appears” (ibid. 506; see also 74:568, Sept. 7, 1897).

The 144,000 figure prominently in Ellen White’s delineation of the great climactic events preceding the second coming of Christ. In The Great Controversy (p. 649) their song is said to be “the song of their experience” in passing through “the time of trouble such as never was” and “the anguish of the time of Jacob’s trouble”; also, they have gone through the seven last plagues. According to her earliest description, about the end of 1844 (EW 15, 16) “the living saints” are “144,000 in number” at the time God’s voice is heard announcing “the day and hour of Jesus’ coming.” As “the living saints,” in contrast with those saints who are raised to life at Christ’s coming (cf. 1 Thess. 4:16, 17), they recognize “their friends who had been torn from them by death.” In heaven they alone have the privilege of entering the holy temple. Their names are engraved in gold on tables of stone (p. 19). They triumph over the decree to slay the saints (cf. Rev. 13:15), which precipitates the time of Jacob’s trouble.

In summary, Seventh-day Adventists believe that the 144,000 are those saints who, in the providence of God, live through the great climactic events immediately preceding the return of Christ. Seventh-day Adventists do not find any clear indication as to whether precisely 144,000 individuals are involved, or whether the number is figurative.

Some think the evidence tends to favor a literal number, on the basis of Ellen White's description of them as "the living saints" (EW 15). Others, pointing to the symbolic nature of the prophecies of the Revelation, indicate that if the number sealed from each tribe is to be taken literally, then the people who are sealed must likewise be considered literal Jews, and the New Jerusalem, on whose gates the tribal names appear, must be strictly a Jewish city, for literal Jews only. They point out also that precisely 12,000 from each tribe would suggest arbitrary selection on the part of God, and that elsewhere in the NT Gentile Christians are commonly spoken of as constituting "Israel."

History

History. Beginnings of the Work in the Area. The dissemination of Seventh-day Adventist teachings began in the area when in November 1851 Joseph Bates accompanied by Hiram Edson visited Canada West (Ontario since 1867). They visited those who had been part of the Miller movement and from among them gained their first converts. James and Ellen White visited Melbourne, Canada East, in 1850. Among the earliest converts were Joseph Hool and John Claxton in Canada East, D. C. Corcoran, of Delaware, and Peter Gibson, of London in Canada West.

In Canada West R. F. Cottrell conducted meetings in Bronte in 1863 and in Milford in 1872—probably the first in that territory. On June 4, 1876, a congregation was organized in Wyoming, Lambton County, as a result of evangelistic meetings by John Fulton. This was the first Seventh-day Adventist church in Ontario. Seven years later, Apr. 16, 1883, a second was organized in Belleville by A. C. Bourdeau. The same year George Brown began work in Toronto by selling SDA publications in a shop on Yonge Street.

In 1889 ministers from Michigan began intensive evangelism in southwestern Ontario. At Albuna, in Essex County, the first church was organized, and there too the first church building in Ontario was erected (1893). Churches appeared in rapid succession over southern Ontario as a result of the work of William Ward Simpson, J. H. Durland, P. M. Howe, E. J. Dryer, A. O. Burrill, William Spear, and J. F. Ballenger. In 1897 a church of Iroquois Indians was organized near Brantford, Ontario—apparently the first Indian Seventh-day Adventist church in North America. In 1900 the Oneida church near Southwold, Ontario, was founded as the result of the work of an Indian missionary to his own people. (See Native Americans.)

The early converts in Ontario sometimes suffered persecution because of a provincial Sunday law (the dominion law was not enacted until 1906). R. Watt and Thomas Griffith were arrested (1895) for working on the so-called Lord's day, but were released because the act did not apply to farmers. John Matthews, Watt's hired man, served 30 days in the Chatham jail, where he was kindly treated. In eastern Ontario a Miss Mucklewee was convicted for raking hay, but the sentence was never enforced. At Darrell, Ontario, villagers burned the lumber procured to build a place of worship. Later three ministers working on the building on a Sunday were sentenced to imprisonment (December 1895), though only two, Simpson and Howe, actually served out the sentence; the third, Burrill, chose to leave the country.

The Ontario Conference was organized in 1899 in London, Ontario, and included all of Ontario. Within a few months after the organizing of the Ontario Conference, new churches were established in Hamilton, Peterborough, Brantford, and Ottawa, and between 1900 and 1910 at least 12 churches were organized, two of which were Indian: one at Southwold, near St. Thomas, and the other on the Brantford Reservation. By 1910 that portion of the Ontario Conference west of the 89th meridian was added to the territory of the Manitoba Conference.

F. W. Johnston organized new congregations in Napanee (1912) and Kingston (1913), and revived the Peterborough church in 1915. Matthew J. Allen added 61 members to the Hamilton church and 27 to the Brantford church, besides building up congregations at Simcoe, Toronto (Central), and Windsor. George W. Sowler, pioneer colporteur, was responsible for the first church on the Niagara Peninsula, St. Catharines. J. T. Errington, a self-supporting minister, erected the first Seventh-day Adventist church in Toronto in 1911; and in 1916 in Port Arthur he began two years of Bible studies in the homes that brought the Port Arthur church into being.

In 1920, on the recommendation of the General Conference, the eastern Ontario counties of Renfrew, Lennox, and Addington were transferred to the Quebec Conference. Five years later the Quebec Conference was renamed the St. Lawrence Conference.

In the 1920s churches were established in Sarnia, Pembroke, Almonte, Renfrew, Sault Ste. Marie, Mattawa, and Toronto, including the Toronto Ukrainian church, organized in 1929 by A. M. Baybarz—the first foreign-speaking church in the conference. An exodus to the United States reduced the Ontario membership from 937 in 1919 to 760 in 1928, though intensive evangelism in 1930 by O. D. Cardey and others brought the figure to 995 at the end of 1930.
